congregations in 1816. Each of them had its own presbytery and diaconate, as also unrestricted liberty of electing its pastors. In order to give them a part in the direction of the Protestant schools, a common Consistorium was established in 1820, in which each church is represented by a Senator, its oldest minister, and a member of the presbytery. This Consist., however, has no ecclesiastical authority, but is a mere school-board.—The Luth. Church, though very numerous, has attained to a far less satisfactory development. It consists of 7 rural and one city congregations. In the latter there are 12 pastors. But as the parishes are undefined, and hence each member is at liberty to select any pastor, an equal distribution of duties and well ordered pastoral labors, are an impossibility. Since the beginning of this century the government of the Church is invested in a Senate, selected from all Christian denominations. Its executive is the Consistorium, composed of two Senators, the three oldest city pastors, and a lawyer. The pastors are elected by the Senate on the recommendation of the Consistorium. After 1832 the latter was ordered always to consult the congregational authorities, consisting of 18 elders and an equal number of deacons. On Feb. 2, 1849, a commission was appointed to prepare a plan of a new congregational organization; but this plan, in preparing which a deputation of the ministerium also participated, bore too deeply the impress of those unquiet times, for it to be recommended to the Senate by the Consistorium. These efforts to effect a new organization were resumed some years ago, the ministerium, however, being excluded from participating. Although a successful result is very desirable under present conflicting circumstances, yet a satisfactory accomplishment of the task seems as yet very doubtful; since the first requisite of a prosperous congregational life, a division into parishes, is decidedly refused by the representatives.—(See Frankf. Relig.-Handlung., 4 vols. fol., 1735.—K.-Gesch. v. den Ref. in Frankf. a. M., etc., with a preface by Dr. J. PH. FRESENIUS: Frankf. u. Leipz., 1751.—Whittingham, A brief discourse of the troubles begun at Frankford in Germany, A. D. 1554: Lond., 1575. A literal reprint, Lond., 1846.—RITTER, ev. Denkw. d. Stadt Frankf. a. M. od. ausführl. Bericht, etc.: Frankf., 1726, 4to.—KIRCHNER, Gesch. d. St. Frankf. a. M. Bes. II. Thl.: Frankf., 1810.—STEITZ, der Luth. Präd. H. Beyer. Ein Zeitbd. aus F.'s K.-Gesch. im Jahr. der Ref.: Frankf., 1852.—BECKER, Beiträge Z. d. K.-Gesch. der ev. Luth. Gem. zu Frankf. a. M., etc.: Frankf., 1852.—SCHRADER, Mittheil. aus der Gesch. der deutsch. Ref. Gem. in Frankf. a. M., in den "Vorträgen bei der Feier des 50. Jahrest. der Einweih. d. K.," etc.: Frankf., 1843.—SCHRÖDER, Disc. sur l'hist. de l'église reform. franç. de Fr., in the troisième jubilé sécul. de la fondat. de l'église ref. franç. de Fr.: Francf., 1854.

G. E. STEITZ. — Reinecke.

Fratricelli.—The origin and character of these persecuted fanatics, has long been involved in obscurity. They have been variously described, according to the different feelings with which they were contemplated. The name is used by mediæval writers often in a broader and in a narrower sense, and thus the difficulty of ascertaining facts in regard to them is increased. Guido of Perpignan (Summa de hæc. Hav. 1528, fol.), considers them adherents of Segarelli, and Dulcino. Mornay (Myst. iniq.), adopting this view, calls them, and the Apostolic Brethren, a branch of the Waldenses. Trithemius (Ann. Hirsaug., II., 74), traces them to Tanchelin, and Flanders. Others consider them the pantheistic brethren of the free Spirit, or even dualistic Cathari. Raynaldus thinks they were fanatical Franciscans. This is the general opinion. Even the Franciscan Alvarus Pelagius, who wrote in 1330, expresses this view (de planctu Eccl., II., 51). Wadding (Ann. ord. Min., ad ann., 1317. Nr. 24, &c.), endeavors to vindicate his order against this opinion; but he sacrifices facts to his zeal. These facts are as follows. To quell the desire of division which agitated the Franciscan order during the 13th cent., Celestine V. empowered Petrus de Macerata, and Petrus de Foro Sempronio, with other Italian spirituals, to form a distinct society, called Pauperes eremiti Domini Celestini. But the other Franciscans having persecuted them, the society was dissolved by Bonif. VIII., 1302. Enraged by this persecution, these eremites, now called Fratricelli, went about exciting the people to fanatical measures. They affirmed that there had been no Pope since Celestine, carried the rule of poverty to its utmost extremity, and frequently uniting with the Beghards, declared that they had no sin, possessed the Holy Spirit, and needed neither penance nor the sacraments. Clem. V. endeavored to reunite them with the other Franciscans, but the spirituals refused, and the animosity increased. In 1314, a party of Fratricelli drove the Franciscans from the monasteries of Béziers and Narbonne. John XXII. prohibited (1317) their manner of life, and commanded the Inquisition to suppress them. They had spread in Italy, Sicily, S. France, and later in Germany. They denounced the Romish C. with ever growing bitterness, appealing mainly to the postill of Peter Olivius. Those of their brethren whom the Inquisition punished they considered martyrs (See the bull of John XXII., Jan. 23, 1318, in Raynaldus, an. 1318, Nr. 45; and the Culpæ Aequinorum, in the Lib. sentent. inquisit. Tolosanæ, appended to LIMBORCH's Hist. inquis.). The number of these victims daily increased; some were burned, others imprisoned for life. In 1321, and the succeeding years, they were most violently persecuted in Italy, where they called themselves fratricella della opinione. After 1350 they disappear, especially as the spirituals, who remained true to the Church, but would not be reconciled with the order, were tolerated, and at length formally recognized by the Council of Constance.—Later writers, as Prætorius (Elench. hæret., 186), and even Bayle, accuse the F. of scandalous customs and vices. Contemporaneous accounts say nothing of these. C. SCHMIDT.*

Frederick II., ruling Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel from 1760–85, was born on the 14th of Aug., 1720; noted for his apostacy, Feb. 1749, — Manism. He was enticed to this, by his conwith the court of Bavaria, by the pomp of the Rom. worship, and by his expectations of the crown of Poland. He was carefully educated under the court teacher (the renowned General Von Donop), and the philosopher Peter De Crousaz, from whom he imbibed predilections for French literature. As hereditary prince, he distinguished himself in the Austrian war of the succession. As imperial General-Field-marshal, he promoted, in 1744, the freeing of the Bavarian hereditary dominions, and accomplished, at the head of a Hessian army, in the service of his father-in-law, George II., various warlike exploits in Scotland. Soon after his return from England, accompanied by his father, Landgrave William VIII., he visited the Elector of Cologne, Clement Augustus of Bavaria. Here he abjured the Reformed faith. For five years he concealed this transition from his father, who was a zealous adherent of that faith. Meanwhile he performed various diplomatic services for his father, in Paris, Brussels, and London; and only in September, 1754, did the old Landgrave learn his son's apostacy. To avert the dangers of attempts at reaction, and to secure the religious confession of the country, the Landgrave caused a so-called Act of Assurance to be passed. Frederick himself confirmed this in 1754, whereupon it was adopted into the Constitution of the Hessian States, and sworn to by all the Hessian Boards, and was guaranteed by the corpus evangelicum of Ratisbon, by the kings of Great Britain, Prussia, Denmark, Sweden, and the States-General. In vain did Pope Benedict, the Elector of Cologne, the Bishops of Augsburg, the Courts of Vienna and Paris, attempt to destroy this Act of Assurance, and to draw the Hessian hereditary prince and his future dominions into their plans of reaction.—In consequence of his change of faith, his pious consort, Mary, Princess of England, separated from Frederick. Her marriage had been expressly designed to promote the Protestant religion. She retired, with her three sons, to Hainault, where she died in 1773. The same year he concluded a second marriage with Philippine, the beautiful daughter of the Margrave Frederick William of Brandenburg. On this occasion, Frederick the Great made the Landgrave promise by oath, neither to turn his new consort from the Evangelical religion, nor to have his children educated in any other. This marriage remained childless. Frederick fulfilled his various promises. The Constitution of the Church, which, as Frederick assumed the government, had been placed under the executive control of a special ministry of State, remained undisturbed. No preference was shown in any way for the Romish Church. In mixed marriages the sons went with the father, and the daughters with the mother. The private worship of the Landgrave was confined to the court chapel, and enlarged concessions were made to the Lutherans. The Landgrave zealously encouraged learning. Under the direction of his genial minister, Von Schlieffen, much was done for education. The Carolinum in Cassel, the Universities of Marburg and Rinteln, were much improved by erecting new professorships, enlarging endowments, and calling distinguished teachers. His preference for French culture, however, led Frederick sometimes into unwise appointments. He showed an especial fondness for the fine arts. The museum and picture gallery were filled with the choicest treasures. The castles of Cassel, Wilhelmsthal and Weisenstein, were beautified. But the means for all this, he obtained by hiring 22,000 of his subjects to the English service, in the war against the United States of North America, for whom, from 1776 to 1784, he received over 21 millions. In view of this he relinquished to his subjects the half of their war contributions and other extraordinary taxes, and paid the debts of his dominions.

KLÜPFEL.—Derr.

Frederick III., called the Wise, Elector of Saxony, from 1486—1525, born in Torgau on the 17th of January, 1463, is, on account of his relations to Luther and the Reformation, an important character in church history. After the death of his father, the Elector Ernest, he assumed the government of the Dukedom of Saxony and its electoral dignity; and, in connection with his brother John, his subsequent successor, and surnamed the Constant, he governed the other Ernestinian possessions. He is represented as a sensible, considerate prince, and enjoyed, on account of his political sagacity and his integrity, great respect among the princes of the Empire, and with the Emperor Maximilian I., who, on removing to Italy, in 1496, assigned to him the imperial vicegerency. In affairs of the empire he belonged to the party which, led by the Elector Berthold, of Mayence, urged the reformation of the imperial constitution; and when, in 1500, the form of government recommended by this party, gained the ascendancy, the Emperor placed him at its head. One of his most important acts, was the founding of the University of Wittenberg. He spoke of it as his daughter, and spared neither care nor expense, to gain for it distinguished teachers. Calling Luther and Melancthon to it, he unconsciously became the creator of the Reformation University. He had no thought of a Reformation in the Church. Though favoring the humanities, for the sake of his University, he had taken no party position in this respect. He was still a good Catholic; and when already an Elector, he made, in 1493, a pilgrimage to Palestine, became in Jerusalem a Knight of the Holy Sepulchre, and collected 5000 relics for his Cathedral at Wittenberg. In earlier years, also, he was ambitious to obtain the papal gift of honor, the Golden Rose. This he obtained, but only when for him it was valueless. The first presentiment of Luther's significance, it is said, came to him in a dream (See d'Aubigné's Hist. Refor., Vol. I., p. 265, Amer. Tract Society edition). During the night of All-Saints, 1517, just as Luther had nailed up his theses, the Elector is said to have seen, in a dream, a monk writing some theses on the Castle in Wittenberg, with letters so distinct, that they could be read in Schweinitz. His pen grew so long, as to reach to Rome, and disturb the tiara of the Pope. Frederick, about extending his arm to arrest it, awoke. Luther earnestly attacked the Romish Church system; Frederick remained calm, neither opposing nor encouraging him. At the Diet of Augsburg, 1518, which Maximilian had called to secure the imperial succession to his grandson, Frederick, for the first time, requested the mediation of the popish legate, Cajetan, and his friendly treatment of Luther. The renewed demand to send Luther to answer at Rome, or at least to dismiss him from his situation at Wittenberg, caused Frederick, for a time, to waver. Concern that his University should not lose one of its most important teachers, and Luther's bold self-defence, prevailed with him. Luther, he said, had as yet not been convicted of heresy, and he positively refused to dismiss him. The Elector's favor became now of the utmost importance to Luther. By the death of Maximilian I., the Elector became vicegerent of the empire. It was even thought he might become Emperor. In the contest between the grandson of Maximilian, King Charles of Spain, and King Francis of France, it would have been quite possible to unite a majority upon the Elector of Saxony. This would have been of the utmost significance, not only for the Reformation, but also for the whole national future of Germany. Frederick had too little ambition to contend for the imperial dignity. He understood too well the almost insurmountable difficulty of keeping the powerful States of the empire in subjection. Duke Philip of Solms, his attendant, being consulted, feared his master would not be able sufficiently to exercise the primitive power. This being also Frederick's own opinion, he had it publicly proclaimed by his servant. Besides, Frederick, generally very discreet, and already nearly sixty years of age, had no desire to assume such a burden in the evening of his life. Instead of permitting his own election, he cast the decision for King Charles of Spain. Here also ended the vicegerency. True, the Emperor appointed him regent of the imperial government, which, according to the wishes of the States-Reform party, was to be instituted during the absence of the Emperor; but the imperial commissioners did not institute this government, and hence did not deliver the diploma which constituted Frederick III. regent. As Elector, however, he continually protected Luther. When Eck, in the fall of 1519, brought with him from Rome, and endeavored to have enforced in Saxony, the papal bull against Luther, Frederick positively refused to assist in this, and repeated his demand, that Luther should be tried, in some safe place, and before pious and learned judges. He also permitted Luther, unpunished, solemnly and publicly to burn the papal bull. His most important act, however, for Luther, was, that he had him arrested on his way from the Diet of Worms, and taken, for safe keeping, to the Wartburg (See d'Aubigné as above, Vol. II., p. 276). Not courageous enough indeed, to declare himself openly for him, and openly to oppose and disobey the decision, he secretly instructed the governor of this castle, and another knight, thus to secure Luther against persecution. Disturbances having broken out in Wittenberg, Luther notified the Elector of his purpose openly to return. The latter entreated him not to come, as he could not protect him. Luther replied: "I come under a much higher protection, and have no intention whatever to seek protection from your Grace, yea, I think to protect your Electoral Grace more than you can protect me."

The movement in Wittenberg had already reached a point, where the carefully calculating disposition of the Elector, and his timidity to resort to active measures, proved unavailing. He had hitherto protected Luther, not from active espousal of his cause, but rather to prevent a rupture, and for the purpose of conforming matters to a course of peaceful development.

His protection of Luther, says Ranke (Deutsche Gesch., Band 2, S. 22, dritte Aufl.), resulted, at first, from a regard to political interest; afterwards it became a duty required by justice; but above all, he shared the implicit reverence for the Holy Scriptures, which Luther caused to prevail. All else, he found, however ingenious it might sound, could be contradicted; the word of God alone was holy, majestic, and the truth itself. It filled him with deep reverential awe. This also restrained him, both from an active participation in Luther's cause, and from any decided opposition to the innovations in Wittenberg; however unwelcome to him these were, he ventured not to condemn them.

The cruelties of the peasant war affected him most painfully; but he lived not to see its end. He died on the 5th of May, 1525, in his Castle of Lochau, aged 63 years, after having a few hours previously, by receiving the holy communion in both kinds, confessed himself a disciple of the new doctrine. Having never been married, he left no posterity of equal rank, and only two natural sons.

KLÜPFEL.—Derr.

Freedom, Moral. — Our conception of this subject is of the first importance to Christian doctrine and morals. Upon it depend all right ideas of man and his development, the providence of God and his government of the world, nature, and the design of the creation; no question lies so near the heart of theology and philosophy. For this reason a complete theory of human freedom can only be given in the connection of an entire system. Here we must limit ourselves to a brief glance at the chief points.

By the freedom of the human will may be understood, first of all, the ability which it has to produce effects, of itself, by the activity of its inherent powers. Of this ability, which fatalists and determinists are wont to style freedom, we do not here treat. That man, in this sense, is a self-moving creature is beyond dispute, but this cannot be truly called freedom; for such an ability may be granted, and yet everything like real freedom be denied to him, by asserting that his acts are a necessary result, natural fruits of original powers and instincts working reciprocally with influences from without. Man would then differ from the animal only in degree, not in kind — merely in the higher tendency of his instincts and the clearness of the consciousness which directs them in their play; he would be just as little the creator of his own acts; his freedom would not be moral. — Opposed to this lowest conception stands the ethico-religious idea of freedom; the deliverance of the human will from the determining influence of lower, sensual instincts; the agreement of that will with the moral law. In this emphatic sense the words of Christ, in John 8 : 32, 36, and of Paul, in 2 Cor. 3 : 17, are used, where true freedom is strongly contrasted with the bondage of the moral will under sin. Of such freedom actually in possession it is not our design here to speak, but only of that which is formal, the freedom of choice. Is man really the master of his own actions? Is his will in action delivered from an absolute law that determines it, be it from without (God or nature), or from within (his own instincts or ideas), if not wholly at least in part? It is certainly an important question: How far does this ability of choice extend, if indeed it can ever be ascribed to him? Can the realization of the highest moral problem, in a word, freedom in the second, emphatic sense, be attained through the power lying in this freedom of choice? Or what aid for the solution of that problem can the freedom of choice in man give?

That man now is actually free in the last-named sense of the word, is a simple revelation of his own consciousness, an intuitive fact. By the recognition of myself as a person, as an Ego, I place myself over against the body and the whole sphere of nature, and claim thereby a supernatural existence, or perform at least a supernatural act. The Ego is the formal causa sui; to deny it the power of self-determination, is to deny it just that by which alone it is what it is. Individuality (the Ego) reflected upon itself (self-conscious) proves, by this very reflection upon itself, its power to tear itself loose from determining influences; so that to it this freedom could be shown as rather supplementary than superfluous; a thing already accomplished by the act.

Yet it may be said, grant that man, by the fact of his personality makes good his claim to freedom, i. e., the capacity of a self-determination independent of natural causality, or at least not to be explained by it—is not this Ego, which is by no means a pure activity, but interwoven in manifold ways with the external world, most of all through the body, determined by impulses arising from this very connection? Though the theoretical Ego may even rest upon an act of freedom, is also the practical Ego in its working, causa sui? To give a plain proof of it we need point only to asceticism which is possible to man alone, and especially to suicide. The latter never occurs in the animal world, and by its very contrariety to nature furnishes a most striking proof of the formal freedom of man, by virtue of which he can take a negative position against the basis of his own personality. But a more thorough answer is given to the question by the simple intuitive works of our own spirits. We find: amid a multitude of possible acts, amid the motives and incitements to perform one or more of them, the Ego can fall back upon itself; it takes counsel, weighs the reasons for and against, and at length decides for this or that purely from its own consciousness. Before acting, it was entirely certain, that it had the power to perform all or at least some of them (two are enough to prove the freedom of choice); it had indeed reasons, motives, but these by no means wrought with the necessity of causes; the decision was occasioned by a motive, but not at all produced by it, for to each particular motive the Ego could give at least either a positive or a negative answer. When a decision is made, the act is performed with a sympathy (pathos), which may indeed give it the appearance of being constrained; but the man could, if he would, control this sympathy—he could bestow it on another act as well as this, and even if it cost him self-denial, the possibility of such a victory over self is the strongest proof of freedom. But the consciousness of a free causality of the will appears still more plainly in its relation to the moral law. Here there is no compulsion, only a command, which may be met by obedience or by disobedience. If the Ego choose the latter, then it bewails it not as misfortune, but accuses itself of guilt; it must feel penitence, i. e., it sees itself compelled to acknowledge freedom of choice (which perhaps it would willingly reason away on philosophic grounds), and confess that among the possible modes of acting it could have chosen a different one. Likewise, in our judgment of others, fortune and misfortune are carefully distinguished from merit and guilt, praise and blame being only awarded to the latter.

That the consciousness of freedom of choice is an essential element of personality, is proven by all these facts, and so strong are they, that any system which comes into conflict with them, whether it be on philosophical or religious grounds, must fall to pieces. Freedom of choice, as we will soon see, has indeed a limited sphere; a conception of the human will, as absolutely independent and indeterminate, would be certainly untrue. On the other hand, a system, which assigns to freedom of choice no sphere of action, and regards man as blindly subject, like other creatures in nature, to the operation of laws that cannot be resisted, is no true picture of the world as it is. Such a system, be it religious or philosophical, may in apathetic times, among decayed nationalities, prevail for a time, but sound human consciousness will continually battle against it with the watchword: Make room for freedom! Such a system will also find itself involved in greater difficulties than those which it strives to avoid. If it be believed, for example, that the omnipotence and omniscience of God, and especially the entire dependence of man upon him, leave no room for human freedom, how can we, if everything that happens on earth is thus rolled back upon him, defend the divine goodness and holiness? Whether it is easier to suppose, that God, because he wishes our freedom, limits his omnipotence and omniscience (for it must even come to this), or that the history of our race, with all its manifold wickedness, sin and cruelty is the work of a holy God? He who cannot endure in thought the dualism of a Divine will (which is the source of law) and a free human will, must be driven almost by necessity to that which is more intolerable—a twofold government of the world, divine and devilish, in perpetual conflict with each other. Or, if any one, not on God's account, but for the sake of his opinion concerning the unalterable necessity of nature, denies the free causality of the will, how can he possibly explain the existence of self-consciousness and all those undeniable facts of moral consciousness, which have altogether the same realness and certainty in the sphere of intuition, as in the external world, the fact, that the stone, deprived of its support, falls to the ground? Just as an advocate of the corpuscular theory of light, by reflection upon the phenomena of interference and polarization, must find himself constrained to accept the theory of undulation, so also duty, i. e., an inward obligation, requires the advocate of natural causality to modify his views in such a way that these facts may find room. And yet by the admission of human caprice we do not seriously endanger the certainly indispensable idea of a system of natural necessity; for caprice, especially in its power over nature, has its fixed limits—"care is taken that trees do not grow to heaven." Titanic enterprises are impossible to man; the will which deals with the laws of nature according to its own pleasure, exists only in the world of romance; freedom of will has bounds which it cannot pass over (see Art. on Miracles).

To enter into details cannot be here done; for the problem of freedom, as before said, can only be solved in the connection of an entire system. But we may briefly remark, that a solution of the most important questions arising from this subject is given by the system of the Holy Scriptures, which, though they have so little of a formal, scientific character, and leave so much unanswered, cannot but impress the most frivolous unbelief and the greatest assumption of absolute knowledge with a sense of their wonderful grandeur, their beautiful harmony, and a comprehensiveness which overlooks nothing of essential moment, neither sacrificing the idea of nature and of God for the sake of freedom, nor the latter for the sake of the former, but standing in full harmony with the facts of moral and religious consciousness. God the creator of the world, and in it of the free creatures, who, though bound to nature, are yet above it—wholly dependent on God as to their being, but in their acts under his law, a law of liberty; this freedom left to itself, now more, now less—frequently awakened, guided, educated, by direct spiritual means or by divine influences exercised through nature as a medium; history, an interweaving of divine and human activities (Gen. 50 : 19); the distinction of two grand ages, that of the present, where freedom of choice has the widest scope and its greatest abnormalities are suffered, where God has not yet fully revealed his power, where the Lord has "taken a far journey" (see Mark 13 : 34); and that of the future, the time of the harvest, when the pure results of the development of human freedom will appear, and they who have sought and used their freedom in subjection to God, will be transferred also to a sphere of loftier activity (Rom. 8 : 21-23; Rev. 21; Matt. 25)—these are the main features of the biblical view of human freedom and its development.

Having now proven from his immediate self-consciousness, the actual existence of freedom of choice in man, and shown that its acknowledgment neither conflicts with the idea of nature nor of God, because the Scripture unites human liberty with the strictest notions of the divine government of the world, it only remains for us to determine more accurately its sphere of operation, and to answer the question, How far man's moral perfection can be regarded as its work?

It has already been observed that human freedom is only relative. It is so, because it has fixed limits on all sides. It has its limits on the side of God and his government of the world: his laws it can indeed transgress, but is soon made to feel that such a course is destructive to itself. It has, moreover, its limit on the side of nature, over whose laws it can exercise a vast control, yet not so vast as to suspend their operation. Upon nature man can only work through his body. Finally, the freedom of man has its limit in his individuality and character, which are in a great measure what they are, by virtue of his nationality, circumstances, age, education. So long as he occupies a very low stage of intellectual and moral culture, his acts, his whole course of life is certainly little else than a product of all these factors. But as soon as he attains to self-consciousness and his will reflects upon itself, the determining power of these influences is broken, and he is able to bring various reactionary influences to bear against them; especially, if he becomes conscious of the moral law, and endeavors to bring his life and conduct into conformity with its divine precepts. The difficulty of conquest and the measure of success will be, it is true, just in proportion as external and sensual impulses have acquired strength by habit and use; but to deny the ability of the will thus to act is the same thing as to deny its freedom, and declare all the phenomena of conscience, such as remorse, approval, and the like, a mere sham. Even "natural men," like the heathen, distinguish between those who are conscientious and those who are not, between the righteous and the wicked, the virtuous and the vicious. To deny it, therefore, is nothing less than to close the eyes against a palpable fact.

Far different is the answer to the question, whether the actual, complete fulfilment of the moral law, the realization of the ideal of human life, is possible in this way; whether freedom in this emphatic sense of the word can be attained by the exertion of that which is merely formal. Experience replies with a decided negative. Nowhere does it appear that any one ever became actually good and holy, by the mere use of his natural freedom of choice. Every one finds rather within himself radical evil, indifference, resistance to the pure dictates of conscience (which, however, have certainly the priority) and a preponderance of sensual impulses, to decide in favor of which the will has a previous inclination (original sin); every one has to accuse himself of increasing this evil inheritance by the action of his free will. Only a good man can perform that which is truly good; but to make himself such a good man no one has ever yet succeeded by the mere exercise of free will. Only "in God" can that which is truly good be achieved. Even if we grant a partial fulfilment of the law (morality) to be attainable by free will, the right relation of man to God through his participation of the divine life, is something which far transcends his power. Because now the Scriptures always keep in view this highest conception of the good, deny that man has a freedom, which can accomplish that which is truly good (John 3:6; Rom. 5:1; Gal. 5:17; 2 Cor. 3:5); the relation of those within the circle of divine grace to those without is that of freedmen to bondmen (John 8:36; Gal. 4). The act, from which the possibility of performing a good work first arises, is not itself productive, but an act of pure, unconditional surrender, a trustful acceptance of the divine grace offered by God in Christ—in one word, faith. Freedom could indeed produce of itself a relative good; yet even this, compared with what is good in the highest, divine sense, is again no good; man ought thus to acknowledge, that he does not become righteous by the works of his own unaided freedom, but only when this is raised into an entirely new sphere. If now, in conclusion, it be asked, whether the act of surrender itself be a matter of free choice, or if it be produced by an irresistible working of divine grace, the latter is to be positively denied, and the former as decisively affirmed. According to the undoubted fundamental view of the Scriptures, this act of faith toward God is only solicited by him, not produced. Man can of himself accept or reject the grace offered to him. The Apostle Paul, who sometimes may appear to favor the other view, had he intended to discriminate the formal act of accepting or rejecting grace, would no doubt have recognized the freedom of choice. But looking chiefly at the objective blessings of divine grace, he denied that man had anything to do with their production, and that so strongly, in order to cut off all ground for boasting, that it would almost seem as if he regarded the formal acceptance on the part of man as itself a work of God. But if we, in harmony with the teachings of Scripture elsewhere, ascribe this acceptance to moral freedom of choice, which by this act contributes a most valuable share toward the attainment of the moral ideal, we do not say too much, nor leave any room for boasting; for if a rich man offers a bag of jewels to a beggar, how absurd would it be for the latter, forgetting the giver, to boast of his non-refusal—the merely formal act—as that work to which he owed his wealth!

The more important works on this subject are: The famous treatise of Schelling, Ueber die menschliche Freiheit, Philos. Schrift. I. G. F. Bockshammer, Die Fr. des menschl. Willens: Stuttg., 1821. Romang, Ueber Willensfreiheit u. Determinismus: Bern., 1835. Signart, Das Problem von d. Fr. u. Unfr. des menschl. Willens, Tüb. Zeitschr. für Th., 1839, 3. Herbart, zur Lehre v. d. Fr. d. m. Willens: Gött., 1836. Frauenstädt, Die Fr. des Menschen, &c.: Berlin, 1838. E. Zeller, Ueber d. Fr. des m. Willens, das Böse u. die mor. Weltord. in seinen Th. Jahrb., 1846, 3; 1847, 1, 2. J. Müller, Die christl. Lehre v. der Sünde. Rothe's Theol. Ethik. Schliephake, die Grundlagen d. sittl. Lebens: Wiesbaden, 1855. JONATHAN EDWARDS, "Inquiry on the Freedom of the Will;" and DAY's Examination of Edwards' work.

H. PARET.—Porter.

French Catholic Church.—This portion of the Roman Catholic Church has an individuality, and presents a peculiar phase of the Catholic principle; the harder to characterize, because embracing all the peculiarities which an exuberant nationality could add to an already luxuriant Church. It is to be considered by itself in regard to its organization; the exercise of its powers; its relation to the whole Church and to the State; its doctrine, discipline, and cultus; its spirit and tendencies; its works; and its general influence.

1. In the organization of the Church, the clergy and spiritual orders have a less prominent and overshadowing position, than in the Rom. Catholic Church elsewhere; though even in that Church in general, it is wrong to suppose the clergy identical with the Church. The French Church has 15 archbishoprics; 69 bishoprics; 1,393 parishes; 29,532 succursales; 7,190 vicarships supported by the State; besides the congrégations and communautés des femmes.

Of the clergy there are two classes: the superior and the subordinate. The higher clergy are six cardinals, viz., the archbbs. of Lyons, Bourges, Besançon, Rheims, Bordeaux, and Tours; one belonging by birth to the middle nobility, all the others to the citizen rank; 15 archbishops, each at the head of an ecclesiastical province; and 69 bishops, who, as the proper and sole governors of their dioceses, and communicating directly with the temporal powers, and with the supreme authorities of the Church, are rather co-ordinate with the archbishops, than subordinate to them. The bishop is assisted by vicars-general and secretaries (in number according to the size and demands of the diocese), a corps of officials, and a chapter of canons (to which, at one time, the election of the bishop was entrusted). The subordinate clergy, placed over single parishes, are Curés, Desservants, and Vicaires; with Pro-curés in some dioceses, and Aumôniers des Lycées, collèges, écoles normales, and of hospitals, prisons, army and navy, each of which has its aumônier en chef. Also chaplains of the male and female congregations. In all, some 39,000 persons, exclusive of professors and students.

All the officers of the diocese receive their place and title directly or indirectly from the supreme head, and are subject to removal by him. Yet between the bishop and the lowest priest there is only the difference of rank, not of class, as between clergy and laity.

The religious societies, or spiritual orders, form a sort of transition from the laity to the clergy—nothing more; though some of them, through their clerical members, have at least an equal share with the clergy in the internal government of the Church. They fall into three principal classes: (1.) The proper Ordres religieux, whose members live in close houses (cloisters), under a perpetual vow of consecration. Of these, the order of the Jesuits is unquestionably the mightiest support of the Church. Not fully restored to its early strength and position since its final suppression, yet certainly restored in regular form, active in many ways, and actually in possession of many institutions of education and discipline (Collèges, Missions, Retraites, Noviciats). Next are the remnants of the Benedictines, devoted, as of old, to Church history, liturgy, and literature; but behind the age with their lumbering ways of communicating thought, and not likely to spread, or even hold their own. The Dominicans, under Lacordaire, through a better perception of the wants of the age in France, and by devotion to eloquent preaching, have risen in public esteem. The Oratoriens, and the Trappists have likewise grown in importance by pious and timely labors. The Carthusians and Capuchins are less popular and influential. (2.) The Lazarists (prêtres de la mission, not to be confounded with the chevaliers de S. Lazare), and the Prêtres des missions étrangères, show how much acceptance those societies enjoy, without the form of a monastic order, living in common, the more effectively to meet the wants of the age and the enlightened wishes of the Church. The latter is the most skilful foreign missionary society of the French Church. The congrégations and communautés, both male and female, are innumerable; few devoted to a purely contemplative life—this is at this day an exception even in the morality of the Church. Most are devoted to education and labors of love in hospitals, prisons, &c. (3.) Brotherhoods (confréries), whose members do not leave the lay ranks nor their temporal calling; and sociétés for particular purposes, all attached to the Church, committed to its views, its wishes, and its work.

That the laity thus, notwithstanding the sharp distinction made between them and the clergy by ordination, are still, through the various associations, in which they serve the Church and her spirit, engaged in one and the same work, and form one and the same whole, with the clergy, is very noticeable; for it is owing to this very fact, that, in spite of the sharply drawn boundary line of the Church herself, the administration of all her functions is so easy.

2. In the executive field, the great peculiarity of the French Catholic Church especially appears: that, agreeably to its organization as above described, it has no one national head, no primate, no patriarch, even nominal; each bishop has the direct charge of all the affairs of his diocese. Special titles among them are mere honorary designations, indicating no special authority. The archbishop is but a sort of primus inter pares among his bishops, never invading the internal control of their dioceses. The bishop is supreme in his diocese, subject only to the universal laws of the Church, and the will of the common supreme head at Rome. Here is the largest play for personal freedom, yet every security against caprice. With the unchangeable laws and the changing primacy, the unbroken tradition, the sense of the great public, the spirit of the Church, unite to discourage innovation. Every bishop, too, is counselled and restrained by his subordinates, whom he watches and directs. The monarchical unity of the whole resides in the relation of all to the one head at Rome. This virtual aristocracy of diocesan bishops, leads not rarely to differences of views and regulations among them in matters not determined; sometimes going so far, that the supreme power must interfere.

3. But here we come to another main point: the relation of the French Church to its centre, the Church of Rome, and to the State. This, though more clearly defined and more firmly established than in any other national Church, has been still subject to constant changes, according as the Church has needed most the spiritual or temporal power, and as either of these two powers has more or less needed, or been able to serve, the other. The bishops of France have kept at the head of their privileges these two maxims: (1.) The supremacy of the pope over the bishops is confined to spiritual things; in temporal affairs they owe allegiance to the temporal rulers. (2.) In doctrine the pope's decrees are irreformable, only when they have received universal consent through a general council. To these add the purely political proposition, that kings and princes, according to the ordinance of God, are subject in temporal matters to no spiritual power. These principles, however, were never acknowledged by Rome, were condemned by Innocent XI., and have never been practised with universal sympathy by the French Church itself; revived, for example, particularly by Napoleon I., as a law impressed by public instruction upon the mind of the nation; but in other circumstances so far set aside, that Gallicanism at last remained as unwelcome to the bosom of the clergy as its older opponent ultra-montanism, and far more foreign to it. This change is due to the experience of the French Church, that the self-control, which she largely enjoys, is supported better by a close connection with the universal Church and its unchangeable government, than by attachment to the State and its changeful forms. Yet, with all its deference to Rome, the French episcopate by no means holds that inveterate ultra-montanism, which would but satisfy the claims of the Roman See. The bishops are not apostolic vicars by the grace of the pope, but successors of the apostles by the grace of God. The papal bulls are not binding till accepted by the episcopate. And in the older bishops a vigorous Gallicanism still survives, but finds little sympathy in the nation at large. — The posture of the episcopate towards the State has followed the same course in its posture towards the Roman See. At first sight the State seems everywhere supreme, virtually appointing the bishops, supporting them, building their churches, appointing their priests, watching them and their ministrations, protecting them, promoting them from office to office, and authorizing their synods. But the control is only apparent. The clergy are first consulted about every nomination. The State can make bishops of priests, but not priests of laymen. In such ways its authority in externals is materially modified; and in the more internal affairs of the Church, in doctrine, discipline, and worship, civil interference could be withstood by the smallest priest.

We speak of the French Church and its episcopate as more free and independent now, than formerly, simply because both share in that progress of the age, which, placing all under a common law, allows to every one his natural definite sphere. That this independence is only a larger freedom of motion in a better and legally determined sphere, is already evident, and appears further from the manner in which doctrine, worship, and discipline, are treated in the French Church.

4. The doctrine is, of course, that of the whole Church, but presented in her own way, in conformity with the national mind and the taste of the age, in connection with the truths, which an incontestable progress in all departments of human study unfolds. In academic instruction we discern two tendencies, an ancient and a modern. The ancient is that love for metaphysical speculation, which produced the great scholasticism; philosophy and theology having remained united and interchangeable ever since their union was completed by Thomas Aquinas. The modern tendency is an altogether special endeavor to harmonize the truths of biblical doctrine with those of general physics, cosmology, and geology, or to keep them in harmony with the latest advances of these sciences. The old philosophical school is also characterized rather by opposition to non-churchly, independent speculation and rationalistic metaphysics, than by effort to win and reconcile them. Yet both these tendencies in the French Church are held subject to the Catholic maxim of the unchangeableness of Christian doctrine, on the principle, that "the rays of philosophy on religion, and of religion on philosophy, present to us every day in new points of view, things which still do not really change, but are in their essence unchangeable." Within the limits of an honest subjection to this maxim, the law of progress freely asserts its right, and the French Church labors to keep pace in her forms and representations of the received doctrine with the high advances of the age, gathering the contributions also of the active mind of other countries.

Each bishop as a rule trains his own clergy; each diocese has a higher, and one or more lower seminaries. In the higher seminaries which are conducted by a superior under the supervision of the bishop, the students are everywhere instructed in the Scriptures, dogmatics, ethics, and canon law; according to circumstances in Hebrew, philosophy, physics, liturgy, church history, &c. In the provinces bordering on Germany, they have exegesis and pastoral theology. The higher academical studies are provided for in the theological faculties which are outwardly under the ministry of public instruction, but inwardly under the direction of the bishop of the diocese. These faculties, however, except that of the Sorbonne in Paris, are not in much repute, nor at all superior to the seminaries in their science or modes of instruction. The Ecole ecclésiastique des hautes études, is the institution, which really, with clear insight, pays true regard to the spirit of the age. Its organization in reality does homage to the scientific supremacy of the laity. The school, divided into two classes between clergy and laity, each under its own director, has for its teachers ten laymen, who have all received in the University the diploma of doctor or licen-iate in the sciences or in letters. The school has eminent ability, and promises much for the future.

The homiletic and popular form is properly the radiant point of public instruction in the French Church. Nature has richly endowed the nation with the gift of eloquence, and with a special delight in it. Ministers everywhere aim especially to perfect the power of pulpit discourse, and find abundant stimulus not only in the stated feasts, but also in extraordinary occasions. The preaching missionaries, whose business it is to address themselves to the indifferent, the erring, the hostile, the illuminists, rationalists, atheists, materialists, to reclaim them, find themselves compelled to gain access by the attraction of their words, and the earnestness of their teaching. The free, persuasive conference, is a favorite form for the popular inculcation of the doctrines of the church.

Catechetical instruction, which has heretofore not been so systematically attended to in France as in the Catholic Church of Germany, bears everywhere the stamp of definitive statement and unchangeableness of doctrine. — With all its assertions of the great privilege of freedom in still doubtful points, which have caused the French Church to appear often in the Roman Index, that Church still keeps the already settled doctrines as its own, and various circumstances show, that the Index has a greater power now than formerly in France.

The same inclination towards Rome appears in the discipline and worship of the French Church. Of old it has had its own liturgy in almost every diocese. So has every diocese its own usages, feasts, saints; agreeing in the main, differing in particulars. These differences have become very unpleasant to some now living members of the clergy, and determined them to the unconditional adoption of the Roman liturgy. The question is especially with the Breviary and the Missal. The matter is thus of great importance for the Roman See. Yet not on this account, nor from any presumptive inclination to submission, but for the sake of unity, from a desire for a better choice, and in consequence of great aversion to the changes made in the Breviary and Missal, particularly those of 1744, the Roman came to be adopted in one diocese after another. These changes made the liturgy to be set aside comparatively a new one; and when Pius V., in two bulls in the name of the Council of Trent, commands that his Breviary and Missal be introduced into all the dioceses, unless another has been in use at least two centuries, the bishops are thus very strongly authorized to refer the agreeable change, as it had already been decreed by the two French Synods of Toulouse, 1590, and of Narbonne, 1609. In the diocese of Evreux, through a most remarkable pastoral letter of its bishop, of Jan. 5th, 1854, the adoption of the Roman Breviary and Missal has been followed by the adoption also of the ritual, the ceremonial, and the hymns of the Roman Church; still to the no small grief of Gallicanism over this ultra-montane revolution. — The worship of the French Church is distinguished also, according to the national taste, in the cities particularly, by profuse and elegant ornamentation of churches, chapels, altars, and by splendid music; sometimes to such an extent as to incur censure from the more strict and severe; though such censure is only the exception.

The discipline is still more free than the worship. It is a fundamental maxim here, that all which belongs to discipline is quite beyond the province of faith, and so can change according to time and place. The French Church, therefore, has been able to adopt in general the decrees of the Council of Trent without the canons relating to discipline. Yet since it is another maxim, that the Church cannot exist without some disciplinary laws, the French Church has had her own, though in a certain agreement with the whole Church. These laws have suffered in stormy seasons, and in philosophic periods; and the diocesan synods, by which the episcopate has sought to restore and complete them, are among the most influential phenomena of our time. Aiming only at restoration and development, not touching at all the great questions of doctrine, church, pope, and emperor or king, their quiet deliberations are as little to be compared with the debates of the Councils of the 15th century, as with a church-diet of evangelical Germany. Perhaps nowhere else is the peaceful spirit of the present French Church, striving only after harmony with every power of the age, better expressed.

5. It is really at present the main tendency and spirit of this church to secure to itself on a more extended scale than ever its desired power over the mind in the way of conviction; not without fixed means, according to unchangeable doctrine and settled rules; but without outward force, by the luminous presentation of what is in its view the only truth. Toleration is a favorite word, though every founder of dissent is still very rigidly dealt with. Next to the German, the French Church is unquestionably more tolerant than any other. Yet her principles allow not a word of toleration in the Protestant sense, which concedes eternal salvation to Christians of another confession. She has abandoned inquisition and persecution, and fallen into better views of freedom of conscience. But spiritual weapons and warfare, scientific and literary polemics, and the zealous spirit of proselytism, she by no means renounces. And the Protestant Church, or single doctrines, institutions, events, teachers, members of it, she makes the first object of her exertions, to enlighten all respecting the truth, which she exclusively possesses. With this view, besides producing from her own bosom, she freely avails herself, by translation, of all such productions abroad as suit her polemic purposes; and the spirit, which would suppose the purest motives in all the converts of the Church, and charge even the most censurable upon the converts of her opponents, — the spirit of bigotry, of blindness to history, and of prejudice against all movements outside of the Catholic Church, even in many cultivated and learned persons, — has not perceptibly declined in the French Church since the days of Bossuet.

6. The missionary and benevolent operations of the French Church, are inseparable from its institutions; the name œuvres, works, is applied alike to both. Respecting these we cannot here go into detail; suffice it to indicate the character of the French Church in this respect by a very general enumeration. In labors of Christian love, in caring for the poor, sick, widows, orphans, and all who need material help, few national Churches show so much, under so many, so beautiful, and so inviting forms. Here is one of the bright sides of the French societies and orders. Nor are these abundant labors, it must be confessed, entirely wanting in evangelical spirit. Yet of course the idea of sanctification by good works plays its part, and these charitable operations engage not only the great majority of the spiritual orders and religious unions, but also the great majority of the laity of all classes, either personally or through offerings of every kind.—Almost as numerous are the institutions, and as highly esteemed the works, of charity for spiritual purposes, for the improvement of convicts, the restoration of penitents, the reclaiming of wanderers, the protection of the destitute of every sex and age; institutions exhibiting not only the right spirit, but also admirable skill and winning deportment.

Her missionary labors among non-Christian people, both abroad and at home, are perhaps the greatest honor to the French Church. Of this the Lettres édifiantes are a lasting monument. A considerable list of associations is employed almost exclusively in preparing those called to this work; at the head of which stands the Congrégation des Prêtres de la Mission, the society of the Lazarists, with seven directors under a general superior, a seminary at Paris with five professors, stations at Constantinople and Salonica, a college at Bebek on the Bosphorus, two posts in Greece, a house and a college in Smyrna, five stations in Syria, one in Persia, three apostolic vicarships and a bishopric in China; settlements in Abyssinia and Egypt, in the latter country a college; with still more important and numerous institutions in America, particularly in the United States, where, to its forty apostles belonging to all nations in Europe, it has gained five and twenty students; and in Brazil, where it possesses three main institutions, a hospital, a seminary, and a mission. Next to this stands the Séminaire des Missions étrangères. Then the Congrégation du sacré cœur et de l'adoration perpétuelle; the Congrégation du Saint-Esprit et du Saint-cœur de Marie; which was united in 1848 with the recently-founded Congrégation du Saint-cœur de Marie, with stations in the two Guineas, in Senegambia on the Senegal, with two bishops and an apostolic prefect, and other distant connections. The Société des prêtres de la miséricorde, founded in 1834, and affiliated to the Propaganda in Rome, prepares under the direction of the central house in the capital city, in a noviciate at Orleans, and in its institutions at Bordeaux, New York, and St. Augustine in Florida, clerical laborers for missions at home and abroad; besides teachers for Latin schools, and preachers or directors for those extraordinary spiritual exercises so much thought of in the French Church.—We should also remark, that female societies are often attached to these missionary operations in various ways.

But of all the works and institutions of the French Church, those are the most popular and the most important, which have proceeded, if not from an entirely new spirit, at least from a spirit very much renewed, and which are best adapted to the wants of the time, and most promote the influence of the church: the educational. Though the clergy has from the first claimed the education of the young, and even the imperial university was founded with a view to have its members a congregation in celibacy; yet the demands of the spirit of the age have separated between the university and the clergy, though many clergymen are called even to the higher places in the government and instruction. But the clergy have aimed with diligence, skill and success, to provide in their own institutions, under a government of their own, a small clerical university; and just now, since the law of March 15th, 1850, which opened the doors of the national institution most widely to them, a whole series of collèges Catholiques, and maisons d'éducation dirigées par des ecclésiastiques, have arisen. A brilliant beginning unquestionably for a remarkable counter-reform against the whole system of purely state education.—Then the Archbishop of Paris, with his clergy, has founded a special normal school, for the education of teachers, which gives great promise. Though the higher faculty studies must be left to the State, yet the Church, through such societies as that of St. Vincent de Paul, brings the religious element to bear effectively upon them. The public common schools, also, outwardly under the care of the State, and admirably appointed, are internally for the most part under the direction of the clergy. All are subject directly or indirectly to the heads of the diocese, though enjoying considerable freedom in their own sphere. The number also of institutions, and of female laborers for female youth is equally large; most of the female associations being employed in the tuition of the young of all classes.

In all these institutions and labors of charity, no other part of the Catholic Church is richer than the French; and these are unquestionably the simple and splendid means which have placed her, after revolutionary dissolution and momentary suppression, already not only upon her former footing, but upon even much higher ground.

7. As to the general position of the French Church, we may briefly say, that it is everywhere represented in all the circumstances and relations of the French people. It stands as Chapitre impérial at the grave of past dynasties, as grande-aumônerie in the palace of the present. In the senate its cardinals take the first place. In army and navy it alone is called to the official chaplaincy; the protestant clergy being merely allowed voluntary service. In all public state ceremonies it alone officiates. It sits in all the councils of public instruction, and controls the religious education of the nation. In literature and science, and even in the daily journalism, it has a leading part. All the political sheets belong to it, and among the great journals, an anti-Catholic one has never been able to sustain itself longer than a couple of months. In a word, though the Catholic Church is not identical with the French, yet is the French nation, though not in its laws, at least in its manners and customs, Catholic. In the eye of the law all worships are alike; but a real equality of the clergy of different confessions, or an actual equality of the different churches, is not to be thought of. Not that the French nation is Catholic in the old Spanish or Italian sense, or even in the old French. The progress of active thought for the last three centuries has liberated the spirit of investigation there, and introduced a certain Protestant element, in opposition to obligatory faith. Yet the Reformation in its non-political aspect, that is, evangelical Protestantism, is so little acceptable to the hearts of the people, that the most inveterate prejudices and the most honest aversion still exist against it, and the active posture of the clergy against it only agrees with and carries out this feeling; not only their posture against all philosophy, science, and politics, which do not proceed from the Church, but also against all theology independent of her. Though the influence of the Church here, in producing uniformity and fixedness of faith, falls far below her ideal,—many of her members conforming merely outwardly and for policy, not from conviction,—still in her principles and works the Church maintains her standard. And not only all religious training and education, but even the direction of the inner, nay, the inmost life, has either remained or been restored to her; and in fact is in many respects more largely and firmly in her hand now, than, for example, in the century last past. This great fact, induced in part by political circumstances, goes further than any other to explain the grand enterprises and the whole working of the Church.—Her influence upon the progress of philosophy, science, and literature, with all her protestations of the tenderest regard, is at bottom only that of resistance, in so far as the movement threatens the religious element. Her former exclusive influence on the fine arts is almost gone; and the same must be said of her influence on politics, and the shaping and administration of the State. She has always played an important part, indeed, in French politics, but never a leading and formative one. She has been present everywhere as an important spiritual or moral element in material shape and social form; but it cannot be said, that she has made any considerable impression upon the principles of the constitution, the maxims of the government, the course of the administration, or still less upon relations and affairs abroad, some itself not excepted. Here, where Catholicism reigns in the inward and the outward life of the people, in art, literature, custom, and law, and even tinges strongly the French Protestantism, it could not be less perceptible, as a formal power, than it is.

[Abbé Ferdinand Fr. Châtel, born 1795 in Taunat en Bourbonnais, of poor parents, attempted to start a new French Catholic Church, after the Revolution of 1830. Châtel had attracted public attention as priest, by his preaching, and especially by exciting articles in the Réformateur and Echo de la Religion et du siècle. After 1830 he gathered several dissatisfied clergymen around him, and through them a small company which held meetings in various places. Soon he held public worship at different points in Paris and its vicinity, and even in distant towns. His adherents elected him évêque-primat. As long as Châtel and his friends merely advocated ecclesiastical reforms, the people listened to them, and the government tolerated the movement. But when he allowed himself to be chosen évêque-primat, and avowed as his faith "la loi naturelle, toute la loi naturelle, rien que la loi naturelle," public opinion turned against the new Church. In 1842, the police stopped their public worship, and Châtel obtained an office under the king. Thus all traces of the movement soon disappeared.]

MATTER.—Yeomans.

French Confession (confessio gallicana) was composed in the French language in 1559, confirmed by the first national Synod of Paris, and presented to King Henry II (see Art. French Reformation), but soon found occasion to be presented to King Charles IX. at the Synod of Poissy (1561), in presence of the temporal and spiritual dignitaries of the realm (see Art. Poissy, Conference of). It was afterwards ratified by the national Synod of Rochelle, in 1571; hence, it is often, in France, called the Confession de la Rochelle, and some have been led to suppose, that the confession current under this name was a different one from that composed in 1559, and ratified in Poissy in 1561. In La Rochelle it was subscribed not only by the clergy and elders present, but also by Joanna, Queen of Navarre; Henry, prince of Navarre; Henry Bourbon, Prince Condé, Louis, Count of Nassau, Admiral Coligny, and several other persons of rank. The French text is given in Beza's histoire ecclésiastique, Tom. II., 173, sq., and in the confessions de foi des églises réformées: Montpellier, 1825. A Latin version was published in Geneva in 1566, found in the Corpus et Syntagma and other collections. A German translation appeared so early as 1562, in Heidelberg.

The general Calvinistic spirit of the document has given rise to the false impression, that Calvin was its author. On the strict biblical principle, it not only rejects all traditions and tenets contrary to the Word of God, but enumerates all the several canonical books of the Old and New Testament. It propounds the doctrine of predestination and the kindred anthropological points, but without supralapsarianism. On the sacraments, particularly the Lord's Supper, it is most strictly Calvinistic. And the prominence which Calvin, and with him the French Reformed Church, gave to church government and discipline, appears in the articles on those subjects. The Confession takes pains to counteract the impression, that the Reformed Church taught insubordination towards the temporal power. It even claims for the civil authority power to punish breakers of the commandments of the second table, that is, heretics. It has long since lost all force.

HERZOG.—Yeomans.

French Lutheran Church, from Louis XIV. to the Revolution.—(See RÖHRICH, Mittheil. aus d. Gesch. d. ev. K. d. Elsaszes: Strasb., 1855). Before 1648 there was no Lutheran Church in France. The first French reformers were doubtless influenced by Luther's writings, and for a time the adherents of the evang. doctrines were called Lutherans. But Calvin's influence soon predominated, and the name Lutheran was dropped.—By the peace of Westphalia Elsass was ceded to France. In several territories of Elsass the Augsburg Confession had been adopted. These included the imperial cities of Colmar, Münster, Weissenburg, and Landau, in which a pure or mixed Lutheranism had been established. The peace of W. had guaranteed religious liberty; this was further confirmed, 1678, by the peace of Nymwegen. Each retained the confession adopted by it in the normal year 1624. In 1681 Strasburg was ceded to France under similar guaranties; and in 1796 Montbéliard separated from Würtemberg and joined France, on the same conditions. These were the constituent parts of the Lutheran C. in France, and the territorial diversity of its origin may still be seen in the various liturgies, hymn books, and catechisms found in different sections, as well as in its divers forms of church organization.—Louis XIV. and his successors formally maintained the guaranties, but sought by every means to further the Romish interests in those districts. To this end various ordinances against proselytism, mixed marriages, &c., were issued. It is said that 64 churches were thus regained for the Romish Church.

DR. KIENLEN.*

French Reformation, the, to the first General Synod, A. D. 1559.—The reformatory movement, originated by Luther, found many special points of connection in France. Certainly nowhere had history so plowed up the ground of Catholic tradition, so richly sowed it with partly anti-Romish and partly genuine evangelical seed, and so abundantly enriched it with the blood of confessors. In the South-east this seed had already sprouted in the little Church of the Waldenses (see the Art.), and in the South among the Cathari (see the Art.). The contests for Gallican liberties, if they never attained a permanent victory, did very much darken the nimbus of the Popes by their continual repetition, whilst the University and Parliament of Paris, greatly weakened the papal authority in the wide circles of its influence. Among the active agents of this reformatory movement in France we must not overlook the satirists and humorists. The satire of that time had not yet been banished from language and literature by a central academy devoted to the court, and even cynicism had not yet been killed by ambiguities and erotic ornaments. Most prominent among others of the laborers of this class is Francis Rabelais, who, although at one time a Franciscan and then priest at Meudon, near Paris, labored as a reformer in so far as he, like Luther and Calvin, called the Sorbonists only sophists, and honored their leader in their quarrels with humanists, Dr. Natalis Beda, on account of his gluttony, with the authorship of De optimitate triparum, which learned treatise he professed to have found in the library of St. Victor, in Paris, under the title: Pantofla decretorum, Decretum universitatis Parisiensis super gorgiasitate muliercularum ad placitum, and L'apparition de sainte Gertrude à une nonnain de Poissy estant en mal d'enfant. In addition, around the reformatory germ were lying layers of the most different spirits at the court, in Parliament, among the clergy and nobility, who promised to advance the Reformation by decided approval or by negation of what had been transmitted, by religious and moral earnestness, by sympathy for the confessors, by scientific and intellectual endeavors, by ridicule of priests and monks, in short, in the most manifold ways. We must mention here, first of all King Francis I., "the restorer and father of the sciences." Next to the King is his sister, "the tenth muse and fourth grace," Margaret of Valois, or of Angouleme, or of Orleans, wife, first of the Duke of Alençon, then of the King of Navarre. The greatest promoter of the French Reformation was Renata, daughter of Louis XII. and Duchess of Ferrara, who protected the Reformers, and communicated the evangelical spirit to her daughter, the heroine Johanna d'Albret, the mother of Henry IV. Among the men whom she gathered around her and protected in her little sovereignty of Bearne, the first place belongs to Jacob Lefèvre (Jacobus Faber), called after his birth-place, near Boulogne, von Etaples (Stapulensis), because, without being a Reformer, he let shine an evangelical light before Luther and Zwingli. It is certain, that he taught the doctrine of justification by faith in Christ, without the deeds of the law, before Luther, and at the time when the German Reformer had not yet decided in favor of the real presence of Christ in the eucharist, he held the local presence and the doctrine of ubiquity (see the Art. Faber Stapulensis).

All these and many similar hopes of a complete territorial reformation of France remained unfulfilled, and we must look to other and more direct causes for the origin of the movement.

The first of these is the power of Roman Catholicism, which comprehended and penetrated every civil and social relation. Although we find the same existing in other Catholic countries and States, yet it exerted a mightier influence upon this susceptible and lively nation. Ever since the baptism of Chlodwig, France was regarded as the oldest Catholic kingdom—this transaction being glorified by a miracle (see the Art. Chlodwig); its rulers being regarded not only as the "most Christian kings" and "the eldest sons of the Church," but were placed by Gregory the Great as far above all other kings, as these latter were above other men. "Quanto ceteros homines regia dignitas antecedit, tanto ceterarum gentium regna regni vestri profecto culmen excellit" (Gregorii M. Opera, studio Ord. S. Benedicti, T. II., Paris, 1705; Epist. 6, lib. VI.). Pepin and Charles the Great are called "the noblest and most glorious sons" of the bride of Solomon's Song, her "spirituales compatries," etc. (Muratori, Rer. Ital. Script., T. III., P. 2, p. 94–123). To this must be added the traditions concerning the banner of the Oriflamme, which an angel gave to a hermit at St. Germain, and the gift of healing the scrofula which was given by God to Chlodwig and his successors. These traditions exercised a mighty influence upon the minds of the people.

Moreover, there were circumstances which, because in France they opposed the papal system more than anywhere else, promised to promote the Reformation, but notwithstanding hindered it, and so far as they weakened it, they strengthened the national religion and Church; whilst in Germany the want of political unity aided the Reformation. Under almost sovereign princes the Reformation could, in the former country, establish itself upon the broad and firm foundation of the possession of the soil by the secularization of the ecclesiastical possessions, which was impossible to the crown vassals of the latter, at least it would have been very difficult for Francis I., after the conclusion of the Concordat with Leo X., to attempt so radical a measure.

The French Reformation experienced similar treatment from the University of Paris, and specially its theological faculty, or the Sorbonne; which made itself so distinguished as the protectress of the liberties of the Gallican Church, and as the opponent of hierarchical usurpation, and even in the year following the publication of Luther's 95 theses, published a decree against the indulgence-nuisance.

A similar position in opposition to the Reformation was taken by the Parliament of Paris, which also considered itself called to protect the rights of the crown and the liberties of the nation against the usurpations of the hierarchy, and thus obtained a respect which would have been lost by the introduction of the Reformation. By holding fast to its corporate rights and honor, the Parliament indirectly injured the Reformation, in that it led the people to rise as one man against the Concordat, so that the King, provoked by this opposition, could be more easily persuaded by the Romish court, to oppose the new and therefore illegal and unconstitutional agitations of freedom. Therefore it was not difficult for the papal nuncio to persuade the King, that "a new religion introduced among a people only caused a change of the ruler" (Brantome). — Another influence, hostile to the Reformation, was connected with this, and came from the directly opposite quarter, namely, the general and just aversion to the Concordat, which was even shared by the clergy.

But finally the moral claims of the "new religion" were by no means adapted to gain an entire nation, especially a court, whose ornament and noblest, purest, and most Christian character was Margaret of Navarre, in whose graceful novels, the conceptions of earthly and heavenly love are mixed together, and who, in her old age, when she had realized the earnestness of life and experienced godly sorrow, wrote: "We pass our time with mummeries and farces" (Genin, Lettres de Marguerite, p. 1). The French Protestants, who apprehended the Reformation principle of faith as a principle moral renovation, became for this reason the rebuking conscience of their Catholic countrymen, were hated as such, and, as Davila (Lib. . . Istor. delle guerre civili di Francia) declares, were the materia peccans in the bowels of France, which must be expelled by the shedding of blood!

Thus, therefore, we see, that a territorial and Church-reform was not possible for the people and kingdom of France, but only such a Reformation as proceeding from the free moral change of the individual and resting upon internal power, should open a way without, or even against external might.

As the French and Swiss Protestants were called "Lutherans" by their enemies previous to the division which originated in the controversy about the sacrament, so there is truth in designating the French Reformation in its beginnings as "Lutheran" (which has been objected to) inasmuch as it was Luther who fanned the latent flame of reform, so that it spread itself over the land and people. But he could not preserve this flame in its purity. Many circumstances united to prevent this. Although Luther apprehended the universality of Christianity and the idea of the true Catholic Church, as no other Reformer scarcely did, still his nature was too German to exert the same influence upon the French which a prominent Romanic character could. To this must be added his aversion to the French as a people, and the language in which he wrote his works, which could only be carried to France in weak translations.

Thus then, the French Reformation depended upon itself until Calvin took hold of it, but it was not entirely forsaken. If God gave the German Reformation a pyramidal form, he also so controlled events in France long before the Reformation, that it had to search for its centre of gravity down among the broad foundations of the totality of believers. Thus we find at first and before Calvin became prominent, a difference existing between these Reformations made by history, the one possessing a democratic the other a monarchic character, and both equally legitimate, because they were produced by the God of history.

The fire of persecution, however, exerted such a purifying influence upon the democratic character of the French Reformation, that even its impure elements, as the Libertines and Anabaptists, did not run to the communistic and demagogical excesses of the German peasants and Anabaptists, but preserved a more speculative character. Similar causes, such as the methodical French spirit, connected with a natural tact for organization, prevented the usual party tricks and excesses at the elections for ecclesiastical officers. Thus in many places small congregations were organized, which assembled periodically in secret places; such an one even existed at Paris under the protection of the Queen of Navarre, and was served by Roussel. For the ecclesiastical office of teaching, notwithstanding the rejection of the priestly character, was from the first so highly honored, that wherever it was possible, the Catholic priests who accepted the Reformation were placed over the little congregations, and only in cases where there was neither such nor any other kind of called teacher, was a layman appointed as servant (ministre) of the congregation by its free choice. In extraordinary cases, however, there were exceptions to this, which, in the later constitution of the Church, were even acknowledged (see Art. Court). Generally, the French-Reformed Church in this respect approached nearer to the Apostolic and primitive Church. This enabled it to preserve its life amidst the many extraordinary vicissitudes through which it passed, and by running into a radicalism which denied the office of teaching, exposed it to mortal jeopardy.

On the other hand, at Meaux a circle of evangelical men gathered around Bishop Briçonnet, which, without being schismatic, sought to labor in a reformatory way by doctrine and example within the diocese of this Bishop, and by his authority. The first place among these men belongs to Lefèvre; the others are, Gerhard Roussel (called Gerardus Ruffus, also le Roux and Ruffi), Francis Vatable (Vatablus), Martial Mazurier, Josse Clichthou (Jodocus Clichtoveus), Michael von Arande (Arundel), and William Farel (see Articles). Being soon suspected of heresy, these men succumbed partly to their own fears, as especially Briçonnet, and partly to actual persecution. Lefèvre and Roussel fled from the latter to Strasburg, and, under the protection of the Queen of Navarre soon returned to France, where they took a middle position between the old and new Church. Farel, however, who was not the man for such a position, returned to his native Dauphiny, where, wandering in the forests, he as a missionary opened a wide door for the Reformation. Martial Mazurier, who, in a fit of carnal zeal, cast down and broke a stigmatized image of St. Francis of Assisi, was led through fear of the stake to recant, and being liberated from prison, he not only taught and preached against his previous convictions, but also influenced a young man and hopeful pupil of Lefèvre, Jacob Pavannes (also Pauvant, Ponent, etc.), who had been imprisoned with him, to recant; finally even appeared as accuser against his own brother. Meanwhile in this same city of Meaux, a greater and wider effect was produced by the teaching and example of these men than they designed or wished. John Le Clerc, a wool-dresser, was led to a saving knowledge of the truth partly by the evangelical sermons of Briçonnet, and partly by reading the Bible (translated by Lefèvre) and evangelical tracts, which were scattered abroad at this time already by faithful and fearless "basket-carriers" (porte-paniers). Connected with his knowledge was a fierce zeal against the Popish doctrines and practices, which was so inflamed by the abuses which he saw in the Church, and by the persecutions of which it was guilty, that he applied many passages of Scripture against idolatry to the Roman Catholic Church, and placed Popery and heathenism, worship of images and idolatry in the same category. This zeal did not allow him to be contented with going from house to house in order to confirm his converted brethren, but drove him to an open assault on the papacy. He nailed a treatise on the door of the cathedral of Meaux in which he denounced the papal indulgences, and called the Pope anti-Christ (1523). He was soon after discovered as the perpetrator, was arrested and condemned to be whipped for three days with rods, and on the third day to be branded on the forehead. This penalty was inflicted. This branding perhaps disclosed to Pavannes the wrong which he had inflicted on his own conscience by his apostacy. It gave him no rest "until he had confessed, by word and writings, the pure Christian faith, especially the doctrine of the Lord's Supper. In the following year (1525) he was burned at Paris."—(Act. Martyr, 1560, fol. 52, b. das grosse Martyrbuch. By Dr. P. Crocium: Bremen, 1682, p. 181, etc.).

Meaux has justly been called the cradle of the French Reformation. For here it was that, under Lefèvre, evangelical knowledge was united in a focus, and where, also, after the persecution, an evangelical congregation was collected by John Le Clerc, and where Peter Le Clerc, another wool-dresser, and perhaps the brother of the former, served the congregation, and, with thirteen of his brethren, was burned in 1546 (Act. Martyr).—But Meaux was not only the cradle of the French Reformation, the movements there present us a faithful and almost perfect image of this Reformation, which, according to Göbel (Die religiöse Eigenthümlichkeit der luth. u. der reform. Kirche, 1837, p. 78), and Merlé d'Aubigné (Le Luthéranisme et la Réforme, 1844, p. 34), is more a renewal than an improvement of the Church, so that in our limited space but little remains to be said about it. A faith which overcame tortures and death, an evangelical spirit and knowledge upon the standpoint of the Old Testament, which regarded Roman Catholics as the heathen nations, whose extermination the Lord has commanded, and put Roman Catholic images on a level with idols, are the unmistakeable features of the cause, which Calvin found existing, and further delineated with but little modification. For, to confine ourselves to the last feature, if he did regard painting and sculpture as gifts of God (Inst. Lib. I. C. 11., § 12), and also strongly disapproved of wild iconoclasm; it is clearly evident from his interpretation of the second commandment, that he desired the removal of images from the Churches. Just as little is it to be denied, that the line of separation between the commanded removal of images from the places of divine worship, and the forbidden destruction of the same is very fine and difficult to be seen by the mass; especially when they can regard it as a bloodless reaction against bloody cruelties. Thus in a representation made to the King during the first religious war, their spokesmen said, among other things: "Idolatry and the erection of idols, Sire, is an abomination. . . . The defence of the same (at the religious conference at Poissy), could stand as little against the arguments of our preachers, as the image of Dagon could stand before the ark of the Almighty God. . . . May it please you to investigate the matter more closely and consider, that, if it (the destruction of images) did not take place at your command, it was still good and holy in itself, and that nothing is so abominable as idolatry, and nothing more acceptable to God than its extermination and destruction" (Remonstrance au Roy, sur le fait des Idoles abba- tues et déjettées hors des Temples, en quelques Villes de ce Royaume. Mem. de Condé, T. III., pp. 355-364). Finally, Beza, in 1561, wrote to the Queen of Navarre, after censuring the violent destruction of images, which, as it seemed to him, had no foundation in the word of God: "Nevertheless, because the matter, in and of itself, takes place according to the will of God, who condemns idolators and idolatry; and it appears, that a secret decree of God is the foundation of so general a matter, which perhaps by this means would shame the great by the small, I therefore satisfy myself by censuring in general what deserves censure, and by moderating such violent zeal, so far as I am able." We think we perceive the truth of the matter here, from the historical point of view at least, which shows, that the rage against images promoted the Reformation in many places and hastened the result; indeed, that here and there it never would have come to pass without it.

If, however, the final judgment concerning this subject is perhaps difficult and doubtful, and different opinions may exist about it, nothing but the most unjust party zeal can deny the honor of martyrdom to the French Reformed Church, and especially, until the conspiracy of Ambroise (1560), of a pure martyrdom in all its martyrs, and in the Church from whose bosom they came. That the French Reformation was compelled to take almost every step in its own blood, that the number of the martyrs was uncommonly large, and their heroic faith extraordinary—is especially proven by the most unsuspected Roman Catholic testimony. Jacob Severt, doctor of the Sorbonne, wrote and published at Lyons, 1622, an anti-martyrology, under the authority of the Pope, and the revision of seven cardinals, in which, it is true, he colors the facts related by Crespin with the dark colors of his party; but not only does not contradict a single one of them, but even adds some to their number, which escaped Crespin (consult also Histoire de la naissance et progrès de l'Hérésie, by Florimund de Ræmond).

The element, which the reformatory impulse proceeding from Luther and Germany brought with it to France, and therefore can be called a Lutheran or German element, seems soon to have yielded to the nationally and locally nearer and stronger Swiss element. At least, the local presence in the Lord's Supper taught by Lefèvre soon gave place to the Zwinglian symbolical view. Notwithstanding these foreign influences, the French element remained the stronger and more prominent, and from it proceeded the remarkable church constitution and discipline, which the Reformed Church comprehends under the expression, Discipline ecclésiastique. It is, however, not to be denied that this discipline and the whole reformatory movement in France would soon have disappeared if Calvin had not given it a permanent character. He animated and strengthened the movement during his brief residence in France, bound its wild tendrils to the staff of dogmatic knowledge by his celebrated Institutes; and, when it was near sinking under external pressure and internal weakness, from Geneva he directed, protected, and strengthened it, and as often as it was driven out of France, gave it there an asylum, from which it could return home refreshed, purified and strengthened. Especially did he prepare there a place of culture for his countrymen (see Art. Calvin), whose importance St. Francis of Sales, Bishop of Geneva, expressed in the words: "Science is the eighth sacrament of the ecclesiastical hierarchy for a priest. . . . Our unfortunate Geneva has overreached us with it." (Œuvres de saint François de Sales. Edition du Panthéon. T. II., p. 604). To the French Reformed, and especially to their preachers, belongs the honor of embodying Calvin's ideas of Church government and discipline, and his dogmatic views, in a common confession of faith. This took place in May, 1559 (See de Thou, Hist. Lib. XXII., Ebrard, Das Synodalleben der ref. Kirche in Frankreich. Reform. K.-z., No. 2, 1853), when the first National and General Synod was opened under the presidency of Rev. Francis Morel, and M. de Collonges (also Coulonges), and when the confession of faith in 40 articles, and the church constitution (discipline ecclésiastique), in 40 general articles (Matières Générales), followed by other articles concerning special cases (Faits spéciaux) were reconciled and united.

The confession of faith and church constitution breathe a moral strictness, which is offensive to modern feeling, especially that of the higher and educated classes, but which becomes a martyr church; at the same time also do they exhibit a stern rejection of everything Roman Catholic. Both documents bear the stamp of Calvin, and proceeded also certainly in great part from his inspiration, if, from internal and external evidences, it is to be assumed, that they were not directly written by him, but much rather are to be attributed to Anton de Chandieu, who already in 1557 was known as a preacher in Paris (known also as an apologetic writer and author of Octonaires sur la vanité du monde, under the Hebrew names Sadeel and Zamariel).

More important for our subject is the pre-eminence which was given to the French Church constitution by the providence of God. For, notwithstanding the radical separation of Church and State, of spiritual and temporal government, the church constitution was still in Geneva the woof and warp of the civil organism, and Church and State acted and reacted on each other.—The French Church constitution originally rested, as already remarked, upon the broadest democratic foundation of the totality of believers, from which foundation, as from the roots of a tree, the sap rose through the veins of consistories, colloquial and provincial synods, up to the National and General Synod. The danger connected with the ochlocratic principle and element, was neutralized by the indirect mode of election, which followed the first election of elders and deacons, always held directly by the congregation and pastor; according to which, the consistory, composed of preachers, elders and deacons, could complete itself by its own election or co-optation, without going back to the people. Thus the original ochlocratic, or rather democratic principle and element passed over to the aristocratic or oligarchic, whose dangers were neutralized by the veto held by the people. But a more powerful neutralization was exercised over the organs of the Church by the threatening sword of persecution. Therefore the French Reformed loved their church constitution as the apple of their eye, and resisted the attempts made by eminent men, as the philosopher Ramus, and the preacher Morel, to introduce an entirely ochlocratic constitution with direct elections by the people. In the existing constitution there was a continual reciprocal action, a constant relation of the head to the members, and of these to that, as the Apostles made it the condition of an ecclesiastical organization; whilst, as the Church was scattered over all France, it refreshed it, through many channels, with the water of life, and gave it the character, yet remaining, of a missionary Church. And as finally, in the course of events, a commissary of the King represented the State in the National Synod, and directed the Church in civil matters, both were placed in their true and pure relations to each other.

V. POLENZ.—Beck.

French-Reformed Church.—(For its previous history, see Art. French Reformation).—First Period, embracing the transition of the French-Reformed Church to a "State within a State," (from the conspiracy of Amboise to the Edict of Nantes, 1560–1598). In the reign of Henry II. (1547–1559), the French-Reformed had so vastly increased, and their spirit and well-adapted church organization had given them so much internal strength, that it was difficult any longer to regard and treat them as the adherents of an illegal religion. They themselves made every effort to secure legal toleration or recognition. And they were the more strongly tempted to aim at becoming the State religion, as no other religion since the time of Constantine the Great, had attained to this position, and as they regarded the Romish faith as false, and near its end. This view was still further strengthened by the fact, that, in the spirit of the Old Testament, they regarded it as the duty of the State government to root out the false, and to establish the true religion; the more so, as it was in entire accordance with the spirit of the age, filled with sanguine hopes, to demand, that the civil power should give it that status, and should declare the Rom. religion illegal. This tendency was increased by the fact, that Princes of the Royal family, as the King of Navarre and his brother, the Prince of Condé, and numbers of the nobility, among others the three brothers Chatillon, and Admiral Coligny, attached themselves to the Reformation. In this manner, a powerful political element connected itself with the French-Ref. Church. We must not forget, also, the unprecedented inhumanity and faithlessness of the State government, which reached its acme in the celebrated massacre on St. Bartholomew's night in 1572. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that the Huguenots (as the French-Reformed were now called¹), also seized upon the weapons of speech and the press, in which they were as superior to the opponents, as the latter were in the weapons of the flesh; and that, almost always beaten in the field of battle, they entered upon the arena of dangerous political speculation. We find, besides, that in the 16th century (a period of general political disenthralment and fermentation), ideas the most dangerous to the State, agitated the Roman Catholics, and such of them, too, as were influenced neither by the Reformation nor by the hierarchico-democratic ideas of the Reformation,—we refer to Catholics among the magistrates, and the educated classes generally. We find these ideas, for instance, running riot in the work of Stephan de la Boétie (councillor of Parliament), called by the wise and loyal de Thou, "a divine spirit:" De la servitude volontaire ou le Contr'un—a work that has become celebrated through Montaigne. How then was it to be expected that the crushed and persecuted Calvinists should keep themselves quite free from such extremes? Thus sprang up, not to mention less celebrated pamphlets, works like Hotman's Franco Gallia; Lanquet's, a very intimate friend of Melanchthon, Vindicia contra Tyrannos, and an anonymous Le Politique; from which, notwithstanding their other differences, a so-called Huguenotic civil right was deduced. As compared with the history of Calvinism in England, Scotland, and the Netherlands, they cast great suspicion upon the Reformed Doctrine and Church, and seem to justify the charge of a political Calvinism in the 16th and 17th centuries.

In any event, however, the degrading charge, that the French Reformation opened its way by means of the weapons of flesh, is contradicted by its history; for only after it had accomplished this Reformation by its internal force, and after it had fully developed itself in doctrine and organization, did its adherents lay hold of such weapons. Our regret that such was the case is mitigated by the judgment expressed by a Lutheran theologian (BENGL, Gnomon, N. T., Act. VIII., 36), "That the kingdom of God adapts itself to all circumstances, without doing violence to them; that, like the air, it yields to all bodies, and yet penetrates them all;" this penetrating, however, scarcely ever coming so clearly to light, as in the Fr. Ref. C. which was rather driven from the right path, than a wanderer.

Upon the death of Henry II. (1559), his son, as Francis II., ascended the throne. A child in years and intellect, called by Beza a worthless boy (miserabilis puer), he allowed himself to be entirely ruled by the uncles of his wife, Mary of Scotland, Duke Francis of Guise, and his brother, the Cardinal of Lorraine. Their political position, the relation of their niece to Queen Elizabeth, that of Scotland and France to England, the high clerical position of the Cardinal, the towering ambition of the two brothers,—all influenced them to look upon the Reformed as their opponents, and made them most cruel persecutors. In these circumstances

¹ Among the various derivations of this term, which arose first about the time of the conspiracy of Amboise, the most correct, historically and etymologically, seems to me to be that of Soldan, who derives it from Aignos, Aynos, Aynossen—Eidgenossen (See his History of Protestantism in France, 1855, Vol. I., Appendix II.).

It was natural that the Reformed should seek the protection of their nobles, and that the latter, excluded from their rightful positions by the arrogant Guises, should, from political reasons, afford them that protection. Thus arose the celebrated conspiracy of Amboise, not fully understood, even to the present day, as to its participants and all its ramifications. In this, even many dissatisfied Rom. Catholics took part; but the French Calvinists were its soul. Its object was to break the power of the arrogant Guises. Betrayed by a Calvinist, immense numbers were executed in the presence of the king, and the lords and ladies of the court, as an after-dinner diversion. Calvin and Beza had some knowledge indeed of the undertaking, but condemned it earnestly and advised against it. The King of Navarre was deeply involved in it, but most of all, the Prince of Condé. The unexpectedly speedy death of the King saved the Prince from certain, as it did his brother from probable death, at the hands of the executioner, not from assassination, and rescued the Calvinists from entire extinction by placing the two parties on a more equal footing. This state of things was sought to be maintained by the Queen-mother, the notorious Catherine de Medicis, not only from the natural proclivity of her character, but from the desire of securing the empire for her minor son. The Huguenots were thus enabled again, not only to breathe freely, but even to entertain good hopes of at least securing toleration. And inasmuch as all persecuting edicts had proven fruitless, the administration party (under Hospital, see Art.), becoming gradually more moderate, after many abortive legal attempts, at last placed their whole reliance upon the promulgation of the edict, which, without putting in jeopardy the State religion, granted toleration to the new religion, and protection to its adherents. For these were now so numerous, that their extirpation appeared impossible without plunging France into all the horrors of a civil war. But the more the Huguenots increased in strength, and in political influence, the more did the Guises feel the necessity of concentrating and enlarging the specific Rom. Cath. party. It was an easy task for them to detach the aged constable of Montmorency from the Bourbons and the Chatillons, and to bring him over to their party, and thus form the so-called Triumvirate. They were soon further strengthened by the addition of the King of Navarre, whose moral sense, never very strong, had been blunted by his infidelity to his excellent wife, Joanna d'Albret, and his intrigue with one of the Queen-mother's maids of honor, so that he fell an easy victim to the cunning and intrigues of the Cardinal. Francis Baldwin, the latitudinarian apostate, who gave the Prince Cassander's (see Art.) work, and the Spanish legate, who held out to him the hope of recovering Upper Navarre, at last brought him to a total apostacy.

In order, also, to widen the breach between the Calvinists and Lutherans, the Cardinal designed partiality for the Augsburg Confession, and favored the celebrated Colloquium of Poissy (see Art.). Although the anticipations of the Calvinists, regarding the effect of that colloquy, were not realized, it exerted an important influence for their cause. It afforded them the first opportunity of publicly testifying their faith, of demonstrating their moral superiority, and of correcting many unfavorable prejudices. They took occasion also to expose the ignorance of their opponents, and made them the laughing-stock even of their own party. The Church and the Sacraments were the main points discussed. The former was intended to embarrass the Reformed, in view of the newness of their Church, and the defective call of their clergy. The latter, with reference to which the Cardinal laid before his opponents for subscription an article taken from a Lutheran Confession, was designed to place them in the dilemma, either to complete the schism between the Lutheran Germans and themselves, as incurable Sacramentarians, by rejecting the bodily presence, or by accepting it, to cast a brand of burning into the midst of their own Church. It is well known that the former object was in part at least attained, inasmuch as the repeated warning sent by Calvin to Poissy, not to allow themselves to be burdened with the Augsburg Confession, to which he had himself subscribed, so laid him open to the assaults of the Lutherans, that his explanation that he had subscribed said confession (i. e., the variata), in the sense of its author (Melancthon), and not in the sense of its later expositors, could not screen him from their condemnation.

It is to be regretted that Calvin allowed his indignation at the Cardinal's perfidy, to betray him into harsh expressions against the Augsb. Confession. A better spirit, however, prevailed with some of the members, and even with the Cardinal, so far, that for the purpose of making an effort toward union in the doctrine of the Supper, it was agreed to hold a Colloquium, composed of five members from each party. It was proposed, with a good intention, on the part of the Rom. Caths., to assent to the bodily presence in any appropriate terms (en quelques bons termes, according to Beza's history¹). This had already been done in a formula, approved by Montluc, Bishop of Valence (but half a Calvinist), and Claude d'Espence; and on the Reformed side, by Beza and des Gallars. After some difficulties with respect to the mode of receiving the body of Christ truly and substantially (vere et substantialiter), a formula was at last agreed upon, in which the bodily presence was by no means admitted; but the substance, on which the Calvinists insisted, and with it also the real presence according to Calvin's view, was vindicated against Martyr and the Zurichers. The public rejoicing of the Queen-mother and the Cardinal, with respect to the agreement, was not, and could not be, of long duration; for the fanatical populace, even in a less agitated period, would scarcely have allowed an ecumenical Council to have thus obscured the doctrine of transubstantiation. At this time, when so near the impending bloody contest, its adoption was entirely impossible; and it was therefore natural, and indeed wise, on the part of the Sorbonne, to anticipate the excitement that would necessarily arise upon its promulgation, by declaring it unsatisfactory, delusive and heretical. Its Catholic compilers and supporters could not, of course, escape suspicion, and the Queen-mother and the Cardinal could only cleanse themselves from the stains of heresy by the blood of the Huguenots. In the meantime, so wide-spread became the influence flowing from this Conference, that Beza was forced to declare, that he dreaded the impetuous zeal of his adherents more than the persecutions of his opponents. The religious meetings of the Huguenots could not only be no longer hindered, but took place in masses of thousands. In many places the Reformed took possession of the Cath. churches by force, in others this was unnecessary, as the churches were found deserted, and in some cases their Catholic fellow-citizens allowed them a joint use.

¹ Deserving of further investigation, is the denial by Soldan of a fact asserted by all historians and biographers (and lately by Baum in his valuable work, Theodore Beza), that the Cardinals had called five German theologians to the Colloquium, in order to bring them into a contest with the Reformed. One of the strongest arguments of Soldan is, that if the Cardinal had had this in view, he would either have called the German theologians earlier (it is well known they came too late), or else would have delayed the Sacramental controversy, which the Calvinists were extremely anxious to postpone until their arrival (See Hist. of Prot. in France, Vol. I., pp. 531, &c.).

Under these circumstances appeared the celebrated edict of January (1562), so much the more remarkable and important, as it was the first act which secured to the Reformed public recognition and religious freedom, and as it was issued immediately upon the reception of the most exciting intelligence concerning their violent proceedings in Guyenne, and after an almost insolent remonstrance from the Spanish legate. This edict had been discussed in an extraordinary session of the Council of State, and had been carried more especially by the influence of a speech made by the excellent Chancellor, in which, in answer to the question, "whether the religious assemblages of the Huguenots were to be tolerated or forbidden, he had maintained, that there might be many citizens who were not Christians, and that he could still live at peace with those not having the same form of religion." This edict commanded those of the new religion to restore all the temples, church buildings, furniture and other property, wrested by them from the Catholics; all incomes withheld from the clergy, etc.; forbade them all religious meetings, and the building of their own temples in the cities; and allowed them these assemblages only outside of the cities, and that only for the time being "until God would bestow upon them his grace, and lead them back to the one fold, and until the decision of a General Council," etc. Although this edict secured but little to the Calvinists, and that provisionally, and indeed forced them to give up in many places what they already possessed, yet it was received by them, especially by Beza, with great joy. On the part of the Catholics it produced dissatisfaction and even resistance. Many Parliaments (as for instance that of Paris), made the strongest remonstrances against it, and could only be forced to register it after repeated royal commands (Lettres de jussion), and then only with saving clauses and conditions. The Paris Parliament especially insisted that the toleration of the two religions was incompatible with the territorial divisions and arrangements of the Church, and propounded the serious question, How a Bishop, as a shepherd of souls, could raise his voice against the wolves, and warn his flock against them, and at the same time permit them without hindrance to go out of the cities to hear the preachers, and thus yield greater obedience to the commands of the King than to those of God? The Duke of Guise took no part in such questions of principle, but expressed his views, and those of the Catholic majority, briefly and summarily, in the declaration; that he would cut the edict in pieces with the edge of his sword.

The Duke of Guise, called upon by his friends, by the leaders of the specific Cath. party in Paris, and by his brother the Cardinal (after the Conference at Zabern), to rescue the Church, suddenly made his appearance, with a numerous armed retinue, on Sunday, March 1st, 1562, in the city of Vassy in Champagne, at the moment the Ref. congregation there had assembled for worship. A collision was natural and inevitable; and the sad massacre of Vassy took place. It is not necessary to suppose that this massacre was premeditated by Guise. Yet it was natural that it should be so regarded by the Huguenots, and that the report of the event, as it ran swiftly over France, should set on fire the materials everywhere ready for conflagration. Neither the craft of the Queen-mother, nor the wise moderation of the Chancellor, could now prevent a conflict. The universal cry of the Reformed, Israel to your tents! precipitated them into a terrible religious and civil war, in which the Queen-mother and her son, for a time vacillating, and sometimes even leaning to the side of the Calvinists, and seeking their aid against the triumvirate, was finally forced irresistibly into the party of the latter. Occasionally the war was sought to be stayed by the so-called edicts of pacification, to which the Calvinists always agreed, even after repeated experiences of perfidy, with almost child-like confidence, demanding no other guarantee than the word of the King. We must ascribe this, on the one hand, partly to inconsiderateness and exhaustion, partly also to their Christian and loyal disposition; and on the other hand, to the mighty force of French national unity. To the latter alone can we ascribe it, that, at the conclusion of the first war by the peace of Amboise (1563), the Calvinists, with a bravery and self-devotion praised even by their Catholic fellow-citizens, aided in driving out of France the English who had been summoned to their aid. The Catholics also acknowledged, that amidst all the horrors of war, the Calvinistic troops maintained a degree of piety and discipline, exceeded only in the Puritan armies of the following century. Admiral Coligny, was like a rock, on which the waves of disorder broke themselves; and those Reformed ministers, who suffered death, not alone on the field of battle, but on the scaffold, may be regarded as the leaven that vivified the Huguenotic armies. Convinced of the justice (FAYUS, in vit. Beza, p. 47, calls it bellum sacrum)

f the war, opposing by the power of their eloquence and example, a noble party in their own ranks who were not actuated by such earnest motives, they bore the chief burden of the perilous enterprise.

If we direct our attention, for a moment, to the internal history of the Huguenots, we perceive that as early already as the peace of Amboise, two distinct tendencies are apparent among their ministers. The one class desired to preserve peace; the other, equally averse to war, yet regarded it as their only means of religious freedom, and therefore insisted, that it should be prosecuted with decision and vigor. These two tendencies did not issue in distinct parties for some time. The former was represented by the Prince of Condé and the nobles, the latter by the Admiral and the ministers generally. As the political element crept more and more into the general cause, it gradually produced an unhappy split into distinct parties, specially as the Huguenots no longer had Coligny to guide and aid them. These parties called each other "Politicians" and "Conservationalists." To the former belonged Henry of Navarre, afterwards King Henry IV., and to the latter the Prince of Condé (in knightly character equal to his father, in morality far superior), who was assassinated in prison after the defeat of Jarnac (1569). The former called themselves the "Faiseurs," the latter the "Dieux." The former, in their most favorable aspects, presented a wise moderation, the latter, a self-sacrificing zeal; the darker shades of the picture betray in the former, selfish intrigues in the latter, a spirit of contention and turbulence.

The peace of St. Germain en Laye (1570) put an end, for the time being, to the third religious war. It granted the Huguenots, besides certain concessions over and above the January edict, the cities La Rochelle, Montauban, Cognac, and La Charité, as pledges of good faith (so often violated), or as "cities of security." This is, in many respects, important. For we see here the commencement of the abnormal position into which the French-Reformed Church fell, in reference to the State, as a "State within a State," and that the same came not from her, nor from her doctrine, but that she was driven into this position by the force of circumstances flowing from the intolerance and faithlessness of the Catholics, and from the principle of the State that there could be but one religion. As it was the duty of "his most Christian Majesty, and eldest son of the Church" after taking the oath of coronation, not only to exclude them from the State, but to extirpate them, the Huguenots had no other resource than to seek, according to circumstances, to establish within this hostile State another and an independent one.

Although the massacre of St. Bartholomew's night (1572) which, according to Perefixe, Archbishop of Paris (Histoire du Roy Henri le Grand) was "that horrible deed which has never had, and, if God permit, will never have its parallel," was not, according to the latest historical investigations, the result of a long diabolic premeditation; it is yet proven, by equally authentic accounts, that its seeds were deeply imbedded in the fanaticism of the Catholic clergy, and that the abominable deed was the subject of conversation, before its consummation, at Catholic courts and other places, and in truth even among the Huguenots themselves.¹ The plan of a total extermination of the Protestant Huguenots throughout France, of which the massacre at Paris was to be the commencement, failed. It led, however, to the fourth religious and civil war, and to the formation of the new party of "Politicians," under the auspices of the youngest brother of the King, the Duke of Alençon (afterwards of Anjou), and the sons of the Constable of Montmorency. The connection of the Huguenots with this party led naturally to great changes in the religious principle of the Calvinists. Another more permanent and more destructive result of the massacre was this, that the loss of so many Huguenotic nobles by murder, flight, intimidation, and apostacy, from the general cause, transferred the contest from this time on, more into the hands of the citizens of cities and villages. Here their writings found ready access, and the recollections of the mediæval freedom of their cities aroused them to truly republican aspirations.

In the meantime (after a new and speedily violated peace) there arose a far more dangerous enemy to the King in the celebrated "Holy League," whose object was the defence and preservation of the Catholic religion. Henry III., for the purpose of controlling this League, took refuge in the doubtful resource of placing himself at its head. To convince the League of his Catholic sentiments, in the first meeting of the States, at Blois, he revoked all edicts favorable to the Reformed, and decreed that henceforward the Catholic religion alone should be recognized. The consequence was a new (the ninth) war, which was brought to a close by the edict of Poitiers (1577). In this the Reformed were secured in the concessions granted them at the peace of St. Germain. It went beyond the former, in that it granted them nine cities of security for six years, their own cemeteries; and that they should have Councils (the so-called

¹ This is placed beyond all doubt by diplomatic despatches printed in Groen van Prinster's "Archives ou Correspondence inédite de la Maison d'Orange Nassau," T. IV., p. 13, etc., in which the massacre of St. Bartholomew's night is portrayed by the French diplomats in despatches to the Roman and Spanish courts, where they expected an approval of the act, as an "acte prémédité;" but in those to the Emperor, where approbation was not expected, as an "acte non prémédité." The Emperor openly declared, that about the time of the marriage festival of the King of Navarre, he had been written to from Rome: "que à ceste heure que tous les oyseaux estoient en la cage, on les pouvoit prendre tous ensemble, et qu'il en avoit qui le désiroient." And he said to the French ambassador: "que quand on veut faire une chose, on ne demeure jamais à faute de trouver couleur et prétexte." With reference to the massacre we refer to Wachler (Leipzig, 1826), and Soldan (Histor. Taschenb., 1854). The work of the latter has received the well-merited honor of a translation into the French. Capefigue represents the massacre as exclusively the result of a bigoted public opinion, long nourished and long repressed, but at last violently bursting out. The number of those who fell a sacrifice is variously given from 20,000 to 100,000.

"Chambres mi-parties") in the Parliaments of Bordeaux, Grenoble, Aix, and Toulouse, each composed of eight Catholic and eight Reformed counsellors, with one Catholic and one Reformed President. This edict also disavowed the massacre of St. Bartholomew's night.—The troubles caused by the movements of the Duke of Anjou in the Netherlands, spread also over France, while the Holy League fanned the hatred of the fanatical populace, and the King in every manner rendered himself more and more despicable. After the Duke's death, as the King was without issue, and the King of Navarre was next in succession, the danger thus threatening the Cath. religion, was seized upon as a new means of exciting animosity against the Huguenots and the unfortunate King, and the latter was compelled, in fulfilment of a disgraceful compact with the League (Nemours, 1585), to revoke the peace of Poitiers (which he was so proud to call his peace) and all the concessions that had been made the Reformed. After this edict (called also the July, or Union-edict), of which d'Aubigné says, that it brought thrice as many Huguenots to the mass as the massacre on St. Bartholomew's night, and which kindled a new and bloody war (called the war of the "three Henrys"), there was scarcely any necessity that the King should, for the purpose of exterminating the Reformed, and with them the last vestige of the Reformation in France, promulgate the Union-edict of Chartres, wrung from him by the insolent Guise after the terrors of the barricades and his flight from Paris. In this edict Henry pledged himself upon oath not to lay down arms until the last heretic had been extirpated from his kingdom. He imposed the same duty upon his subjects, and, at the same time, commanded them never to recognise as their King one not belonging to the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman religion. This oath was followed, in the second convocation of the States at Blois—in which this Union-edict was solemnly sworn to by its members, and made a fundamental law of the State—by a formal act of reconciliation with the Duke (Dec. 4, 1588), sworn to by the King "on the holy mystery of the altar." Immediately succeeding this transaction Henry caused the assassination of the Duke on the 23d of the same month, and on the 24th, that of his brother the Cardinal of Guise!

This double murder, followed by a conditional papal excommunication, so exasperated the Holy League and through it the great majority of the Cath. population, against Henry III. that he found himself compelled to seek the aid of the very Huguenots whose extermination he had so solemnly sworn to accomplish but a short time before. "It was now," remarks Ranke (Hist. France, Vol. I., p. 467), "of inestimable value, that there was yet in France a power, unsubdued by this universal movement, namely, the army of the King of Navarre." To all the enemies of the French-Reformed this incontestible fact can be held up, that it was due to them alone that the French monarchy was maintained, and saved from falling a prey either to a partition among powerful nobles, or the Spanish empire.

On the death of Henry III. (murdered by a fanatic monk named Jacob Clement, 1595), Henry of Navarre (Henry IV.) was indeed recognised as King by most of the nobles then at the court; but he found himself in so difficult a situation, that only by his heroic courage, the splendor of his victories, and his noble disposition, was he enabled to maintain himself. Besides an open war with the powerful League, to which new strength was constantly flowing from the inexhaustible fountain of the popular bigotry, from Spanish subsidies, and from disturbances stirred up in Paris by the fanatical papal legate, Henry was plunged into another and perhaps a more difficult contest with his own internally distracted party. It was fortunate for him that in the League there was also a division at the same time, and that oligarchical municipal and indeed wild democratical movements existed there together under the form of Catholic unity.

The Huguenots, fully cured of their chimerical hopes of a complete reformation of France, by the religious wars and the revived strength of the Catholic Church, soon recognised their new situation, and were filled with the greatest anxiety, when Henry found himself compelled to abjure his religion in order to secure his crown. Those among them who had political insight, saw well enough that as King of France he would have to take a more elevated position, his circle of vision would have to be enlarged, and his party relations to them would have to be merged in those that would embrace the Catholic elements of the kingdom also, and that this would almost necessarily issue in an abjuration. This view is reflected, in its most favorable aspects, in the remark of the Duke of Sully: "Although a Calvinist I was yet firmly convinced, and compelled the most learned of the Reformed ministers to acknowledge, that God may be honored no less in the Catholic Church than in the Protestant." But the darker shades of the picture are exhibited to us in Huguenots, who, from the doctrine advocated by Calvinistic ministers and theologians, that salvation is also to be attained in the Catholic Church, and from the Catholic dogma that there is no salvation out of the Catholic Church, drew the conclusion: that one should unconditionally prefer that which is universally acknowledged, to that which is only in part recognised as certain, and in part disputed. "And this," says d'Aubigné, in his Confession of Lord de Sancy, "was the breach that made the King and many others ready to surrender." He expresses this still more strongly in the words ascribed to this apostate. "The King apostatized to save a State (état), and I did it to save my State." The abjuration took place in the most solemn manner on the 25th of July, 1593, in the church of St. Denis.

The events connected with the edict of Nantes (1598) and the difficulties which it encountered from all sides, are too manifold to be here portrayed, and belong properly to political history. They are fully and most accurately described by Ranke in his Hist. of France, Vol. II., p. 42, etc. We will, therefore, content ourselves with giving a brief description of the main contents of the edict itself.—It contains 92 articles, followed by 56 special or secret articles (articles particuliers), and two "Brevets," as explanations, &c. They grant to all subjects of the 'so-called Reformed religion' (Religion prétendue Réformée) freedom of conscience. But freedom of worship is circumscribed by many conditions, based partly upon the previous edicts of pacification, and partly upon the then existing circumstances. This latter condition shows how power took the lead of right, since even the new law was compelled to accommodate itself to it, as the right was again allowed in those cases where there was power to maintain it. Thus religious worship was allowed the Reformed in those places where they possessed it in 1596 and 1597, i. e., in those places where they were the most powerful; whereas in those places where the Holy League was predominant, they did not obtain this liberty. Whatever disadvantage might have occurred to the Catholic religion from these grants of rights to the Reformed, was fully neutralized, however, by the circumstances, that the former was acknowledged as everywhere established, and the latter as only tolerated in certain localities. As in the earlier edicts, especially that of Amboise, so in this there was granted to the nobles having high jurisdiction, the right of public worship, to the remaining nobles only that of family-worship, and to those Reformed living amid a prevailing Catholic population there was granted in every judicial district (Bailliage, Senechaussée et Gouvernement tenant lieu de Bailliage), a locality or village where they might worship. For judicial investigations of disputes between the adherents of the two religions, and for the interpretation of the edict, there was established for the districts of the Parliaments of Paris, Normandy, and Brittany, a joint "Chamber of the Edict" (Chambre de l'Edict), composed mainly of Catholic members; in the Parliaments of Grenoble, Bordeaux, &c., the before-mentioned so-called "half and half chambers" (Chambre mi-partie); composed of Presidents and members equally from the two Confessions. By the acknowledgment of the Catholic religion as the ruling and established one, it was of course made the duty of the Reformed to observe the Catholic holidays by cessation from labor, to contribute the tenth to the support of the Catholic clergy, &c. In consideration of the last-mentioned obligation, it was ordered, that there should be contributed for the support of the Reformed ministers, and other necessary Church expenses, the sum of 135,000 francs per annum, from the State treasury. In those places where the royal officers or Commissioners could not designate any suitable places of burial, the Calvinists should, for the time being, be allowed the joint use of the Catholic cemeteries. They were declared eligible to all court, state, and civil offices, allowed to establish high-schools, and gymnasia, as well as to enjoy the use of the public schools. The most important, however, of the concessions made the Reformed, were the numerous, so-called, cities of security, for eight years. As they already were in possession of them in fact, and would hardly have been willing to surrender them after the abjuration of the King, this concession proves more than any other, how precarious and dangerous was their situation and that of the State.

This condition of things, however, proves that as the edict accomplished all that was possible (a solution for which streams of blood had been shed in vain), it could be neither a complete nor a permanent one, and that the adoption of the edict as "an eternal and irresistible" law of the State, was at best an Idolum Fori. How was it possible that a law should be eternal and irresistible, which not only did not repeal an older and incompatible law, recognised by the great majority of the nation and sealed by their blood, but which in its third Art. formally recognises the "Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman religion" as the established religion of the realm? To notice only the Art. relating to the burial of Protestants in Catholic cemeteries — the cause of so many disputes for centuries — how could it be expected that this Art. could endure after so many interdicts with reference to "burying heretics in consecrated ground?"

Second Period. — The French-Reformed Ch. as a "State within a State." (From the Edict of Nantes to the "Grace-Edict of Nismes," 1598–1629).

Although the abjuration of Henry IV. robbed the Reformed of their nominal protector, and the King gave them many grounds of mistrust and rightful complaint, they yet became conscious, very soon after his murder by Ravallac (1610), that they had lost their real protector and their best friend. This murder not only swept them into the stream of feverish intrigues on the part of the nobles, but made them a prey to their own perversity, according to which, with the usual French impetuosity, their nobles again took up the plan suppressed in his time by Henry, of a Huguenotic free and confederate State (under a foreign protectorate too!) — an idea the more chimerical, as the Reformed nobles were divided in their interests, and between them and the Consistorialists there was not such a union as would justify so great an undertaking. The breach was widened by such men as Sully and Duplessis, the former skilfully representing the political, the latter the religious principle. The Reformed, now fully organized as a "Huguenotic League," at first exhibited great moderation, and successfully withstood solicitations to a revolt organized by the active Catholic Prince of Condé against the Queen-mother. But when the youthful King, Louis XIII., by force of arms, had restored the mass in the province of Bearn, and initiated a formal counter-reformation (1620), there was enkindled another religious and civil war. In the meantime Cardinal Richelieu took the helm of State, with a determination to re-establish an unlimited monarchy, in place of the proud and obstinate aristocracy, and upon the ruins of the Calvinistic confederacy. In consequence of this, the concessions made to the Calvinists in the peace of Montpellier (1622) were not fulfilled, and the Huguenots were incited to another war, more just than the preceding, and one promising a more successful issue, by reason of a League made with England. This war was more especially undertaken to maintain and defend the city of Rochelle, a bulwark of Calvinism, the centre especially of democratic and municipal Calvinism, and because of its historical development and intimate commercial union with the enfranchised Netherlands, the focus of confederate-republican ideas and hopes. The league with England (which country had in the Duke of Buckingham a weak and unfortunate rival of Richelieu) only accelerated the fall of the proud city; inasmuch as the English fleet, instead of rendering them assistance, departed again after having been furnished by the citizens with provisions, and in consequence gave the city so much the earlier a prey to the most terrible want, and many of its inhabitants, indeed, to absolute death by famine. This terrible famine alone caused the capitulation of Rochelle (1628). JOHN GUITON, Mayor of the city, who may be regarded as the last representative of republican Calvinism, addressed the Cardinal upon his entrance into the fated city, now inhabited only by scarcely-living skeletons, with these words: "It is better to surrender Rochelle to a King who knows how to take it, than to a monarch who was not able to render it support." Richelieu took these words in good part, and the defenders of a city whose reduction had taken a whole year, at an expense of more than 40 millions livres, were on the whole treated with kindness and even respect. After an unnatural and ineffectual league with Spain by the Duke of Rohan, he also was compelled in the succeeding year (1629) to yield. In this year the Edict of Nismes was promulgated, in which the French Protestants were again confirmed in the church and civil rights conceded by the Edict of Nantes, but by which they lost all political independence.

Third Period. — There was comparative rest under Richelieu and Mazarin (1629–1661).

Richelieu was opposed to all religious freedom, and especially to Calvinism, and had he lived in the time of the Reformation, he would undoubtedly have carried out against Prot. the formula "Principiis obsta," employed by him against the Jansenists. But that time was now past, and he was soon too deeply involved in greater undertakings and difficulties. Nor was it in accordance with his character to employ low chicanery against a minority, respectable indeed in numbers, but rendered powerless by him. He indeed entertained the thought of reuniting the Reformed with the Cath. religion, and perhaps of elevating himself to the position of Patriarch of France, and thus concentrating the power of the Church and the State in his own hands; and he adopted the principle of conferring high offices in the State, court and army on the Calvinists only in extraordinary cases; but the former thought and the latter principle were made subordinate to his main object of elevating the monarchical principle above all subordinate and secondary forces, and the French monarchy above all foreign States. In this spirit he made use of the warlike-genius and active Calvinism of the Duke of Rohan in the war with Spain. In a like spirit he selected the Reformed Count of Bethune to succeed the French ambassador at the Papal court, for the purpose of announcing categorically to the Pope the invasion of Valtellina by the French troops. Under Richelieu, therefore, the Reformed were able to enjoy a quiet and, indeed, contented existence—even under the shadow of his iron rule, which, on the whole, bore more heavily on the nobles than on them, from whom the higher nobility continued more and more to withdraw themselves. Their ministers and theologians had now leisure more thoroughly to unfold their doctrines and to disseminate them in popular and learned works. In this way, and by the force of their correct lives they won over Catholics and wrought conversions that were at least far more sincere than those of the nobles to the other side, under the influence of the Count and the Cardinal minister. What the Reformed theologians accomplished under such unfavorable circumstances is worthy of all acknowledgment. Their schools in Saumur and Montauban, by reason of their excellent Professors and high standard of morality attracted many Germans of noble families, in preference to the German Universities, and it requires no extensive historical investigation to discover that they were the channel through which Calvinism flowed over into Brandenburg and Prussia.

More favorable still was the position of the Calvinists under Cardinal Mazarine (successor to Richelieu), who was more ready to recognize their quiet civil virtues, and gave proof of this by conferring offices (especially in the department of finance) upon some of them. We see this from his well-known remark: "I have no reason to disquiet myself with respect to this small party; if it does feed upon tares, it, at least, does not do so to excess." Nay, they won the respect even of the court itself, when, in the war of the Fronde, they not only withstood the most pressing overtures from the Prince of Condé (known as the great Condé), but actually took up arms against him, and thus aided to sustain the tottering throne, during the minority of Louis XIV. Their assistance in sustaining the monarchy, on this occasion, although not so signal as in the days of the Holy League, was of scarcely less value in reality. For the watchful Cromwell had actually sent emissaries into Southern France, to sound the disposition of its Protestant inhabitants, but upon receiving information of their faithfulness, had wisely refrained from mixing in the dangerous contest.

Fourth Period. — Chicanery against the Reformed. Persecutions and petty oppressions, until the total destruction of their ecclesiastical and civil existence by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes under Louis XIV. (1661–1685).

Louis XIV., spoilt by a miserable education, though with a natural instinct for greatness and genuine tact, sought to bring his religious standpoint into unison with the political greatness, which he strove to establish for the welfare of his kingdom, torn and distracted at the commencement of his reign by numerous factions. Of this we have authentic evidence in the memoirs composed for the instruction of his son the Dauphin. In these he declares, that, with pain, he always looked upon the large number of his subjects of the supposed Reformed religion, as an evil, and that he had accordingly taken measures against them, which he could not regard as wrong, because under the blessing of God they had been accompanied with many conversions. His plan consisted in this, that he by no means intended to persecute them, nor to compel (presser) them by any new measures of force, but that he was rather inclined to secure to them what they had received from their predecessors; but that he would not yield them anything beyond the same, and would limit, what was conceded them, within the narrowest limits that justice and expediency would allow. Therefore he had ordered commissioners to carry out the Edict of Nantes, and had formed the resolution, and had strictly observed it, to grant the Protestants no favors depending upon himself alone; and this rather from good-will, than from ill-will towards them, in order to bring them from time to time, to consider, voluntarily and without passion, whether they could in justice to themselves, rob themselves of the advantages in which they might participate with all his other subjects. At the same time he had determined to urge the bishops to labor as much as possible for their conversion, and to abate the offences that sometimes repelled them from the Catholics, and also to make advances to those Calvinists who manifested a teachable spirit, even by rewards, etc.

From all this we see clearly, that it was the object of the King to win back the Reformed to the Cath. Church; not to revoke the Edict of Nantes, but to render it unnecessary. To accomplish this he did not wish to employ direct force and persecution, but indirect means. These consisted of investigations (by commissioners) into the title-deeds (based upon the Edict of Nantes), of the Reformed Churches (which investigations almost necessarily led to chicanery); and in the withdrawal and granting of acts of grace.

These are, properly speaking, the foundation of the system of conversion, which, had it not been for a mass of circumstances beyond the intention and even the knowledge of the King, would never have taken such a form as to lead to the formal revocation of the Edict of Nantes. We can cite only a few of these circumstances.

The investigations above mentioned took at once the character of a most petty and hateful chicanery. The commissioners, impelled by the clergy and their own wishes, and the approbation of the court, readily found the rights of many churches to be defective, and decreed, in some cases after long and tiresome litigation, the closing and sometimes the demolition of the temples. The influence of the court also affected many Calvinists, and brought back the stray sheep to the fold of their proper shepherds, for such the local bishops and priests, according to the territorial system of the Edict of Nantes itself, always regarded themselves de jure. And what the influence of the court could not accomplish, was effected by numberless vexations, to which the Calvinists were daily subjected. The Intendants, under the same influence of the court, had nothing more opportune to do, than to send lists of the new converts to the court, which naturally secured to them many substantial tokens of regard, as encouragements in the pious and holy work. The bishops were even less idle—in pious exhortations, controversial sermons, church visitations in their dioceses (of which the Calvinists were also members), pastoral letters, popular and learned works, etc. The great Arnauld wrote his work: De la perpétuité de la Foi; Bossuet his: Exposition de la doctrine de l'Eglise Catholique; Nicole his: Prejugés légitimes contre les Calvinistes, &c. The King's Council and the Parliaments kept pace with the clergy and the commissioners in their zeal for conversions, and poured forth a stream of arrêts, declarations, edicts, charters, ordinances, and lettres de cachet. The work of conversion was even carried forward by means of dragoons and money. The former method was superintended by Louvois Rath, Minister of War, who found it quite natural to relieve the obedient Catholics by quartering the dragoons at the expense of the Calvinists. The King also thought this quite natural, and had no knowledge of the secret order of his minister, to let loose the reins of the soldiery, and to permit them, horses and men, to live at discretion upon the Calvinistic population. The latter were indeed spared their lives, according to the loudly professed principle, Ecclesia abhorret a sanguine; but they were worried by the healthy tortures of hunger and thirst, beatings, daily and nightly rolling of drums, &c., until their hard hearts were softened, and they were made willing to sign a formula of faith, from which their large-hearted convertors (convertisseurs), sometimes were willing to take its dogmatic edge (see Art. Calas). The money conversions were reduced to a regular system by the academician Pellisson (himself formerly a Calvinist), who stood at the head of the administration of the fund of conversion, formed from the economists or incomes of vacant livings. "This golden eloquence," the pious courtiers exclaimed, "was not so learned, but far more convincing than that of Bossuet." Conversions by dragoons, and the commerce in souls, as the Calvinists termed it, found defenders among the learned and unlearned. As love demands that the erring "should be saved from eternal pain by the help of healthy tortures," so duty required "that the pathway to truth should be strewn with flowers." The Saviour himself had fed his hungry hearers with bread and fishes; the father had embraced and rewarded the prodigal son on his return, etc. They relied upon the authority of Augustine. A work appeared, entitled, Conformité de la conduite de l'Eglise de France, pour ramener les Protestants, avec celle de l'Eglise d'Afrique, pour ramener les Donatistes à l'Eglise Catholique. The whole of France was gradually drawn into this system of conversion as into a whirlpool, to keep aloof from which was difficult, and in the case of officers unwise. The Coun. of State and the Parliaments also partook of the general madness of the hour; so that they issued the most wilful and irrational orders; as, for instance, that all temples, in which Catholics had attended the Reformed worship, should be pulled down; that the ministers should change every three years; that children of seven years of age should be capable of choosing the Cath. religion, and that they should be encouraged in these divine impulses by a formal reception into the Church;

that the backs of the seats in the Reformed Churches should be taken down, etc. The most splendid reports of the success of the work reached Louis XIV., and became to him so many sources of intoxicating praise, which, with the arguments of Jesuitical court theologians, externalized and perverted in him the internal influences of the Holy Spirit, after a life full of sin and adultery. The proofs of this are contained in a historical State document which Rulhière composed at the request of the minister Breteuil, in 1788, entitled, Eclaircissements historiques sur les causes de la révocation de l'Edit de Nantes et sur l'état des Protestants. With truly terrific truth wrote the Duke of St. Simon, himself a Cath. and no friend of Calvinism, in view of an intimate and personal knowledge of this perversion, "The King wished to become pious, and as he had no knowledge of religion, he sought and found peace in doing penance upon the backs of the Huguenots and Jansenists" (Mém. T. XIV., p. 77).

Although abjuration of the religion of their fathers seemed to become daily more and more prevalent among the Reformed, it was yet far from being so universal as was stated in these reports, and as it was the interest of the clergy to make the King believe, in order to bring him to the fatal step. In order, therefore, to open his eyes with respect to their numerical strength and their zeal for their religion, and to keep him back from further persecutions, the Calvinists, in some provinces, namely in Poitou and Lower Languedoc, resolved to assemble themselves for public worship on the same day and at the same hour, at the ruins of their temples. This demonstration, not ill-contrived, was spoiled by a lack of proper concert and order, and its result was to cast still further suspicion upon the Reformed as disturbers of the peace.

But Louis still hesitated to put the final stroke of destruction upon the work of his grandfather, the greatest and best of the French Kings. This indecision was shared by his Council, especially with reference to the carrying out of the undertaking that had long since been determined upon. Grave difficulties were in the way. They knew not what to do with the Reformed ministers, who, by their moral lives, and their theological and practical education, formed a very respectable body. To condemn them to a life-long imprisonment was difficult, in consequence of their great number, and the danger of having in the midst of France such a material for constant excitement. To banish them, and thus scatter them through the various Protestant lands, to whose public opinion it was necessary to have regard from political motives, was a grave step. Finally, the latter alternative was determined upon, and carried out with great severity and many petty vexations.

The Edict of Revocation was at last drawn up, and after the dying Chancellor Letellier, father of the minister of war, had affixed the seal of State to the document, he exclaimed, in the words of Simeon: "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." "He justly recognizes," says the Jesuit d'Avrigny, from whom we quote this, "this last act of his as the most fortunate and most splendid of his whole life."

Clouds of incense flowed from all sides towards Versailles, to the "author of this great work," the "new Constantine the Great," the "most perfect and most august of all Kings," who, "although his great deeds have long since carried his name to the extreme ends of the earth, and will make him renowned to the latest generation, has by this last act elevated it to the heavens, and has won for himself a fame that shall endure beyond the destruction of the world." But not only was this great work speedily followed by destruction at the hands of an unknown youth (see Art. Court), but history has elsewhere recorded quite a contrary judgment. For it soon became plain, that what was regarded by the ruling Church at least as materia peccans in the body of France, to be expelled even by the shedding of blood, was in truth a healthy counterpoise. "So long as our religion stood upon a secure footing in France, and our Claudes, Daillés, and Drélincourts, could make themselves heard," wrote a French Calvinist, a half century later, in defending the freedom of religion against the Bishop of Agen, "what brilliant spirits the Catholics had to oppose to them? But since they have no longer such powerful opponents, can we not affirm that the Gallic Church has seen its glory passing away? Where now are the Bourdalouses, Marsillons, Fléchiers, Mascarons, Bossuets, Arnaulds, and so many others, who conferred honor upon it? In a century so enlightened, in which all other departments are perfecting themselves, the study of theology is almost abandoned, the pulpits are miserably filled, and whatever lights there be, must be sought for in a despised party." The final judgment of history is clearly this, that after France had cast forth and excluded from itself the salt contained in Calvinism, it fell through its Catholic sons, Voltaire, Diderot, d'Alembert, Helvetius, and Lamettrie, into that state of moral and religious putrefaction, which allowed its philosophical century to reach a very unphilosophical end. With reference to the period from 1700 to 1789, we refer to the Articles Brousson, Camisardes, Calas, Court, and French Lutheran and Reformed Church in the 19th century. This period (1700-1789), is appropriately divided into two portions, of which the one (1700-1715, which we may call the fifth period), is the age of fanaticism; the other (1715-1789, which may be regarded as our sixth period), is the age of the regeneration of the Churches in the wilderness, until they were, in religious and civil respects, placed on an equal footing with the Catholic Church by the National Assembly.

Sources.—These are so numerous, that besides those already mentioned, we can name but a few. Chief among them is the work ascribed to Beza, Histoire ecclésiastique des églises réformées du royaume de France (properly speaking, more a chronicle of the several decrees of the Parliaments, than a history). In German works this history is so poor, that if we would merely mention the before-quoted work of Soldan, we would by no means give it the position it deserves in historical literature, by reason of its thorough study of the sources, its critical investigations, and its style. As it extends only to the death of Charles IX., we must refer to Hist. des Protestants de France, depuis l'origine de la Réformation, jusqu'au temps présent, par G. D. Félice: Paris, 1850; of the second edition (Paris, 1851), an excellent translation (by Pabst, Leipsic, 1855), has appeared. Der bedruckte Palm-Baum Christlicher Wahrheit: Cologne on the Spree, 1687, is antiquated, but still valuable. Important information with respect to the history and present condition of the French-Ref. Church, we find in Christianity in France, by Reuchlin: Hamburg, 1837; and The Prot. Church of France, edited by Gieseler, 2 vols., Leips. 1848. It is to be regretted that Germany and the Huguenots, by Berthold, 1st vol. Bremen, 1848, was not continued. Berthold has compiled of many monographs in the Hist. Taschenbuch, which cast much light on this as yet little known portion of history. Hist. des Réfugiés Prot. de France, par Weiss: Paris, 1853, is distinguished for thoroughness, critical investigations, and a very laborious study of sources extending to almost all lands whither the French Ref. emigrated. Popular and edifying is the work, The Power of Faith, or Memorabilia from the lives of the earlier heroes of the Protestant Church, especially that of France, by Wenz, with an introduction by Dr. Sack: Bonn, 1834. Finally, we must mention the Bulletin de la Société de l'Histoire du Protestantisme Français; and La France Protestante, par M. M. Haag (embracing in alphabetical order the lives of distinguished French Protestants), as an encouraging sign of the activity now existing in France in the study of the sources, and the interest that prevails in this hitherto neglected part of its history.

V. POLENZ.—J. H. Good.

French Reformed and Lutheran Church in the 19th cent.—(See MÄDER, a Ref. clergyman of Strasburg, d. prot. K. Frankr. von 1787–1846, published by Gieseler, 2 vols.: Leipzig, 1848, a valuable work; de FÉLICE, Prof. in Montauban, hist. des Prot. (réformés) de France: Paris, 1850, impartial but too concise. VINCENT, vues sur les Prot. en France, 2 vols.: Nîmes, 1829. BOST Memoires, &c., 2 vols.: Paris, 1854, valuable for its accounts of the origin of the division).

I. External relations and constitution.—After the National Assembly, Aug. 21, 1789, affirmed the equal rights of all citizens, and on Dec. 10, 1790, excepted the property of the Protestant Church of Elsass and the possessions in Montbéliard, referred to in the preceding article, from the sale of national property, a season of sore trial fell upon all the religious societies. Public worship was stopped in the evangelical Churches also, churches were used for profane purposes, the sacred vessels were melted up, clergymen were required to abjure their faith, and, if they refused, imprisoned. In the year III. (1795), it was enacted that no one should be hindered in practising his religious convictions, no one compelled to support public worship, and that the Republic would not pay for its support.

Anarchy prevailed; each congregation was sovereign; peace and order were not restored until the decree of April 7, 1802 (18. Germinal X. — When Napoleon opened negotiations with the Pope for the arrangement of the affairs of the Rom. Cath. Church, it was first intended to meddle with the Evan. Confessions no further than to extend over them the protection of the State. But Providence had ordered otherwise. By Napoleon's direction the clergy of both (Ref. and Luth.) Confessions were paid out of the State treasury, and to the Evan. Churches themselves a new constitution was granted (de Félice, p. 572). Its main features are the following: the lowest judicatory for both Churches is the consistory; each consistory to have charge of 6000 souls, whether these belonged to one or more congregations. It was composed of the minister of the parish, and 6–12 laymen. The laymen were, in the first instance, chosen from 25 of the wealthiest married persons. A biennial election was thereafter held, of persons (the wealthiest again), nominated by the consistory and 12 other laymen, whom it associated with itself for this purpose. The oldest minister presided. From this point the government of the two Churches differed. In the Ref. Church the consistories are under a provincial synod. Five consistorial districts form one synodical district. The synod is constituted of one minister, and one elder from each congregation, the elder chosen each time by his consistory. The synod elects its own president. It can be held only by permission of the government, continue in session not more than six days, and transact only such business as has been previously fixed upon in the presence of the Prefect, or his delegate. — In the Luth. Church the consistories are under an assembly of inspectors, who appoint a clerical inspector for life, with two lay adjuncts, and these have the right of visitation. This assembly of inspectors, again, is subject to the General Consistory, a sort of central synod. The General Consistory is composed of a lay-president and two clerical inspectors appointed for life, by the government, and of one lay-deputy chosen for life by each Inspection. — As there were six Inspections, the Gen. Cons. was composed of nine members, including two clergymen. This Cons. was subject to the same rules as the Synods. During the interval between the sessions of these bodies, the affairs of the Church were managed by a Directory, consisting of the President, the oldest of the two Inspectors, two lay-members appointed by the assembly, and a government commissary appointed by the chief magistrate. — Two Luth. and one Ref. seminaries were to be established for the training of ministers. There was, however, but one Luth. seminary opened, that at Strasburg. The Ref. institution was first located at Geneva. Afterwards another was opened at Montauban; and when France lost Geneva, that at Montauban stood alone. A Ref. chair, however, was founded in Strasburg. — In each congregation the minister was elected by the consistory.

This law, we see, to a certain degree retained, for the Ref. Church, the early Calvinistic, Presbyterian, and Synodal system, and formed the government of the Luth. Church by amalgamating the Presbyterial, Episcopal, and Consistorial (in the German Luth. sense of the term) elements.—The defects of this organization are obvious. In neither Church were the rights of the single congregations duly secured. In the Ref. Church, besides, the key-stone of its organization, the National Synod, was wanting. The qualification for eligibility is especially objectionable. In the Luth. Church one is surprised at the small number composing the higher courts, their appointment for life, the inequality in the clerical and secular elements, and the interference of the government in the appointments. The limitations imposed upon the assemblies also seem unjust; and the vagueness of the law, and its failure to define the duties of each office, led to endless diversities of opinion.—At first this law was thought highly advantageous. But its defects soon became manifest. Besides its inherent defects others appeared. The Ref. Provincial Assemblies never met; and it was disputed whether the Luth. Assemblies of Inspectors were really consulting bodies, or mere election machines. But the want of Presbyterial Councils was so deeply felt, that, despite the violence of the law, such were soon organized; in the Ref. Church under the name of consistoires sectionnaires, in the Lutheran, conseils presbytéraux. The manner of election varied. In larger Ref. congregations deacons were also chosen. In 1854 the Luth. congregation in Colmar imitated this example. The congregations, likewise, desired to have a voice in the choice of pastors; but instead of succeeding in this, the elective prerogative of the consistories was restricted, after 1806, so that their choice was limited to one of four candidates proposed by the Director. Under the Emperor and the Restoration no improvement of the law could be hoped for; the former was too despotic, the latter too unfavorable to Protestantism. But from 1830 the opposition to it made itself felt in the Chambers. In 1831 the Luth. Directory appointed a commission of ministers and laymen to draft a new law. This was submitted to the consistories, and then was laid before the Gen. Cons. (1833), which rejected its leading items. In 1838 the Gen. Cons. again met, and drew up a series of resolutions relating to the presbyterial councillors and the duties of the several boards. The government, however, did not decide upon them, and thus the dissatisfaction increased. — At length in 1840 the government felt compelled to satisfy the demands made, and began with the Ref. Church. The Minister of religious affairs, Teste, had an ordinance drafted for the completion of the organic law. In this way, it was hoped, the inconvenience of a discussion in the Chambers on a new law might be avoided. The draft invested the presbyterial councillors with full rights, defined the prerogatives of the several boards, but again said nothing of a National Synod. On this account, already, the new provisions were unacceptable. But when, by amendments made in the Council of State, the Church was made more dependent on the State, a general outcry was raised against the law. In 1844 it was the turn of the Luth. Church; but after several conferences between Teste and the Inspectors, matters remained as before.

Meanwhile a party arose which proposed radical measures for the cure of all these evils. The Evan. Society of France (see below), had established several independent Churches, and allowed them to continue in this form. Through the influence of the distinguished Vinet, this casual independence of the State was defended as a fundamental Gospel principle. This view was also advocated by an excellent periodical, Le Semeur; but it found favor only in the Ref. Church. — Under these circumstances the revolution of 1848 broke out, and all were intent on securing their own wishes. This was the case with both the Evan. Churches and the dissenters. The Churches desired an amendment of the organic law, and that the independence of the Church, in its relation to the State, should be secured. The dissenters wished to break up the hated union of the Church and State.—As early as Feb. 24, placards were put up at the corners of all the streets, in which the separation of Church and State was decreed to be the wish of the people, although these never troubled themselves about this theological question. Some Rom. Catholics, also, joined in this demand. But the movement failed. — Then the Lutheran Church made an attempt. Its Directory had become unpopular. On the 9th of March, the work of revolution commenced. Two directors had died; the remaining three were compelled to resign. The municipal board hastily called a tumultuous assembly which granted the Church a previously prepared provisional directorial commission. Notwithstanding its objectionable features, it was received. This commission issued a circular in which it proclaimed the right of general suffrage, and that of each Church to choose its own pastor. Then, having obtained ministerial permission, it called an assembly of delegates from the different consistories, one clergyman to two laymen, to meet in Strasburg in September, to consult upon a law to be then presented. It deserves credit for having thus turned things into an orderly channel. — Meanwhile pastoral conferences, partly composed of laymen also, were held, and pamphlets were printed in anticipation of the new constitution. Almost the universal opinion favored the preservation of the connection between Church and State. Many even expressed a desire for a union with the Ref. Church.—In the Ref. Church, the democratic tendencies of which were often complained of, matters proceeded in an honorable and orderly manner. No violent measures were adopted. It also talked of union. In May, an unofficial preparatory Synod met, at the invitation of the Paris Consistory, to devise means for holding a National Synod. This latter met at the same time with the Strasburg delegate assembly, and also issued a draft of a law.—Both drafts proposed, first of all, the proper organization of the congregations and their Presbyterial Councils, and upon the basis of universal suffrage, with due limitations; the number of members of the Council to be proportioned to the population. —

The consistories were to be chosen from the Presbyterial Councils, and to elect their own president. The Luth. draft, besides, proposed an enlarged Gen. Cons. and Directory, subject to renewal, and to be appointed by the Church alone; only the president of the Directory should be appointed by the government. The Inspectors were retained, but were not to be appointed for life. Thus an approximation was made to the pure synodal form, and the liberty of the Church was preserved in its connection with the State.—The Ref. draft restored the National Synod without a permanent committee.—The Luth. pastors were to be appointed by the local consistories and the half of the Presbyterial Council of each congregation; the Ref. were to be nominated by the presbytery, and appointed by the consistory. Both parties approached nearer each other than in the law of Germinal 18, and both assemblies expressed the hope of a future union, though the Lutheran coldly.

Louis Napoleon now became President of the Republic, and his government forthwith sought to remove all traces of the revolution. So, also, in the Luth. Church. At the close of 1850 he appointed, according to the law of 1802, three members of a new directory, and convened a Gen. Cons. in order to have the directory filled, and to deliberate upon the project of a delegate assembly. But before any results were reached, the coup d'état of Dec. 2, 1851, occurred. For four months, Napoleon exercised dictatorial powers, and on March 26, a few days before the dictatorship expired, he astonished the nation by issuing a "décret portant réorganisation des églises Protestantes," which completed and confirmed the Germinal law, in every article not expressly abolished. This decree gave the two Churches a constitution wholly different from their respective drafts.—The Presbyterial Councils, elected by general suffrage, were allowed to both Churches; the consistories are chosen from the Councils, and elect their own (clerical) presidents, who are confirmed by the government.—Then 1) over the Ref. Church is set a "conseil central," the members of which were to be appointed the first time by the chief magistrate; of subsequent appointments nothing was said. Pastors were to be elected as arranged in the September law. 2) In the Luth. Church, inspectors are appointed for life by the government; they all belong to the General Consistory, now the Upper Cons., the president of which, and one more member, are appointed by the government. The Church elects two lay deputies to each Inspection, and a deputy of the seminary, who serve for life. The old Directory remains, with the exclusive right of appointing pastors.—This scheme called loud complaints from both Churches; but it is still in force. Time will prove its defects or merits.—Soon after the decree of March 26, a new division was made of the consistories of both Churches, and of the Inspections of the Luth. Church, and their number increased. This arrangement is very advantageous, especially to the Reformed Church. Now there is a consistory for each department, whether there be Protestants in it or not. But dissenters from the Ref. and Luth. Churches are excluded from privileges granted to these.

The charte of 1814 (Art. 6), occasioned much annoyance to Protestants, by making the Rom. Cath. the State religion. But the July revolution struck out the clause concerning the State religion, and simply declared that Rom. Catholics were in the majority. The Republican Constitution of 1848, and the Imperial one of 1852, say nothing about this. But much more perilous to Religious freedom, are Arts. 291, 292, 294, of the penal code of Napoleon. These forbid the regular meeting of every association of more than 20 persons, for religious, political, literary, or any other purpose, unless by special permission from the authorities. The question arose, whether congregations for worship were associations, &c. Under Louis Philip, the matter was not decided. Under the Republic, the articles were declared not to apply to meetings for public worship. But on March 25, 1852, the day before the "décret portant réorganisation," &c., another decree appeared which referred those articles to all réunions publiques. Many Ref. consistories have protested against this, but without effect.

The relations between Protestants and Rom. Catholics in France, have been unhappily hostile. Sometimes the animosity has shown itself in open violence; as in Nismes in 1815, when the Protestants had to bar their churches, and Gen. Laycorde was shot down (Nov. 12), in the defence of one (See LAUZE DE PÉRET, causes et précis des troubles, etc., dans le dépt. du Gard, etc., en 1815, 1816). For the most part, however, the weapons of controversy were the tongue and the pen. By these the interior of France is kept in constant agitation.—In some instances union churches and literary institutions have occasioned strife (See ILLOEN's Ztschr. &c., 1843, II. 3. Notice sur les fondations administrées par le séminaire Prot. de Strasbourg; Strasb., 1854; and, on the other side, Revendication par la ville de Strasb., &c.: Strasb. 1855).

II. Inner life.—After the revolution the Protestants of France fell into a deep slumber. Religious truth exerted but little influence. The forms of worship were maintained, but all was cold and dead. About 35 years ago, however, the churches were revived. The first instruments of this happy change were persons who had imbibed the spirit of true piety from the Moravians in Germany. But subsequently Methodists (both Wesleyan and Whitefield), went over from England, and contributed chiefly to the work of revival. Although some fanatical disorders attended their movements, the result, in the main, has been decidedly good (See in favor of the Methodist influence: VINCENT, l. c. II., 265–290; against it: DAVERN (Ch. Coquerel?) lettres Méthodistes: Paris, 1833; MME. DE GASPARDIN, Quelque défauts des Chrétiens d'aujourd'hui, 2 ed.: Paris, 1855.—Opposed to this order of things are the Rationalists. Those clergy who favor Methodism (especially the Reformed), are supra-naturalistic; and they designate their system l'orthodoxie moderne, and christianisme expérimental (see works with these titles of ATHAN. COQUEREL). Rationalism found more favor, for a time, in the Luth. Church, in which, also, rigid Lutheranism has recently been revived, with Horning (senior), of Strasb., at its head. This latter movement has but few adherents, but they boldly assail the Reformed Church and the Union.—In regard to this entire revival, it is to be lamented that it at once became associated with Dissenters. Meetings were established, at which all the ordinances of religion were administered; then congregations were organized. Often uneducated men, not ordained, took charge of these. The "Evan. Society," founded in 1833, operated, according to its charter, with, without, and against the consistories, among Catholics and Protestants. Then arose the question of the separation of the Church from the State. In the next place it is to be regretted that the spirit of intolerant exclusion was indulged. In 1842 the "Soc. d. intérêts généraux du Prot. français" was founded, from which all non-Methodists were excluded. This excited violent opposition. After the Revolution of 1848, the society was dissolved.—The Synod of 1848 led to a final rupture. At the commencement of its session, Fred. Monod, of Paris, withdrew from it, because of its refusal to adopt a doctrinal basis. Sustained by Count Agénor de Gasparin, who was prominent at the founding of the "Soc. d. intérêts généraux," and followed by a few other clergymen, Monod founded a chapel, and set about establishing the "Union d. églises évangel. de France." If the name "Free Church," claimed by the other party, involves a charge of servility against the State Church, the term "évangeliques" contains an insinuation of a departure from the Gospel, on the part of the "Free Church." This Union was organized at a General Synod in August, 1849, which prepared a confession of faith, and a discipline. Thus the most of the single dissenting congregations were united. Henceforth the "Evan. Soc. of France," labored in the interest of the Dissenters, and the pecuniary means for carrying forward its work were first obtained from England and Scotland, which countries Monod visited on a collecting tour.

In the operations of the free religious societies, existing within the evangelical Churches, Lutherans, Reformed, and Dissenters participate.—The Bible societies of Strasburg (1816), and Paris (1818), were started with the revival, and through the influence of the Brit. and For. Soc. A few years after the founding of the "Soc. Bibl. Prot. de Paris," the "française de étrangère" separated from it because it would not labor among Catholics. All three societies have numerous auxiliaries, and the Brit. Soc. has, besides, its direct agents. The "Evan. Soc. of France," has already been named. Subsequently clergymen and laymen of the National Church, founded societies in Nîmes, Bordeaux, Strasb., &c., for the evangelization of scattered Protestants. These (that of Strasb. excepted), unite in the "Prot. Central Soc." in Paris. This soc. has an ally in the "Soc. to encourage primary instruction among the Protestants of France." A want often felt, has been met by the institutions of Deaconesses in Paris and Strasb.; the parties of Coquerel and Fr. Monod have united in opposition to these (See Mme. DE GASPARIN, les corporations MONASTIQUES au sein du Prot., 2 vols. 8vo.: Paris, 1855). The "Agricultural Colony at St. Foix," for youthful culprits, founded by the decayed "Soc. of the general interests of Protestants," is an important institution. There are also institutions for friendless children; and a Soc. at Paris aims at establishing Sunday schools in all parts of the country. Besides these there is a "Soc. des traités relig." at Paris, and a "Soc. pour l'impression des livres religieux," in Toulouse. There are other societies in Paris, Lyons, Marseilles, &c., which operate among the Germans in those large cities, and one in Strasb. for Algiers. Thus every branch of Home Missions has been provided for.—Neither are the heathen or Israelites forgotten. The happy results of the labors of the Paris Missionary Soc. in South Africa, are generally known; and the "Soc. of the Friends of Israel," has led many to embrace Christianity. These societies are all sustained by voluntary contributions, collections, sales, lotteries, &c. To secure more general aid the "Soc. du sou Prot." (members paying at least 5 centimes (1 sou), weekly), was founded. It divides its funds annually among the various societies; but as an appropriation is also made to the "Soc. évan. de France," many opponents of the Dissenters have withdrawn their names. In several places independent son societies exist, which distribute their income at pleasure among the National Church institutions.¹—To these must be added the funds for the relief of the widows of clergymen, and for disabled ministers; and the "Soc. de l'histoire du Prot. français," in Paris, which publishes an annual bulletin.

The voluntary "Clerical Conferences" have been exerting a most happy influence in all parts of France. There are two such in Paris, a general one, and one of the clergy of the State Churches. They have served to bring the various parties together, and to assuage jealousies. Questions affecting the interests of the Church are freely discussed, and with happy results. The Strasb. Conf. has published a Catechism, a general Prayer-book, a Hymn and note-book, which are being substituted for the many different books of devotion in use; unity is thus promoted. This Conf. exerts great influence. It and that of Paris, hold their annual meetings simultaneously with the anniversaries of the several societies. The anniversary week in Paris occurs in May, that of Strasb. in June, and that of Basel, which is visited by many persons from Elsass, in July.—Of the many religious periodicals published, we will name merely the leading organs of each party or system. The "Archives du Christian. au 19^{me} siècle," ed. by Rev. Fr. Monod. This was formerly the organ of Dissent, but it now adve-

¹ The sums collected in 1853, were:—

For the three Bible Soc.	137,987 francs
For the Prot. Central Soc.:
The Strasb. Evang. Soc., and.....	111,470 "
The Soc. for Primary Instruc.....
For the Evang. Soc. of France.....	150,202 "
For the Religious Tract and Book Soc.,	104,136 "
For the two Deaconness Institut.....	94,877 "
For the Miss. Societies.....	88,974 "
The sou Prot.....	12,222 "

ates the union of the Evang. Churches. It violently opposes the State Churches, Romanism, and latitudinarianism. The "Espérance," ed. by Rev. Grandpierre (who left the Dissenters for the National Church), represents the orthodox tendency of the Nat. Church; its opposition to Rationalism is moderate. "Le Lien," ed. by Athan. Coquerel (the son), the organ of the Rationalists, is more moderate now than formerly, strictly national, but in favor of the largest religious liberty.—The "journal d. missions évang.," is an interesting paper. The "petits écrits pour le temps," ed. by Rev. Puaux, is apologetical, and harshly polemical. The "la voix nouvelle," ed. by Rev. Boucher, was started in the last days of the July regime, as a Prot. political paper; but many thought it too radical, and it was stopped. There was a German Prot. Church and school paper for Elsass. In 1848 it perished, and now the only German periodicals published are the "Missionsfreund" of Rev. Kuntz, and the "Archiv d. Strasb. Pastoralconf."—Until recently theol. science was in a sad condition in France. Various attempts to establish theol. journals failed. VINCENT's "mélanges de morale, de religion et de critique sacrée;" the "essais et fragmens de théologie," ed. by the faculty of Strasb.; the "revue de théologie" of the faculty of Montauban, lasted but a short time. The "revue de théologie et de philosophie chrétienne" of COLANI, lic. of theol. in Strasb., started in 1850, seems to be sustained; Edm. Scherer, formerly Prof. in the independent theol. school at Geneva, but whose views were changed through the influence of Schleiermacher, Neander, and Vinet, is a prominent contributor to Colani's review.—A number of valuable works in the history of French Protestantism, and Church History in general, have appeared, as well as translations of German works, during late years (see Theol. Stud. u. Krit., 1844, H. 2. "Beiträge d. theol. Gesellsch. v. Strasb.," vol. 1, 1855). Recently the "revue chrétienne" was started by Edm. de Pressensé, a Dissenter preacher in Paris, of the latitudinarian school; it is designed for the clergy and laity.—The theol. institution at Strasburg has from the first been pervaded by German learning, which it spread among the clergy of Elsass; its tendency is rationalistic, but of late it has taken a more positive character. In the faculty of Montauban orthodoxy preponderates, but it has not contributed much to science. Several attempts have been made to remove the institution of Montauban to Paris, or to start a third one here; but Montauban and Strasburg both opposed the project, and it was dropped. It is proposed, however, to enlarge the Strasb. instit. by adding a seminary for preachers, like that at Wittenberg. The term seminary as now used in Strasb. denotes a scientific institution connected with the faculty, and which has a residence or boarding-house for students belonging to it.

The worship of the French Church is exceedingly simple: first a hymn is sung, having reference to the sermon, then prayer, then the sermon, another prayer, singing, and the benediction. In the Reformed Church the ten commandments, Matt. 22 : 37–40, the Apostles' creed, and sometimes a portion of Scripture, are also used; Marol's versification of David's Psalms is used in singing. In the Luth. Church the old and four new series of Gospels are preached upon in the morning. In the Ref. Church free texts are used. The Upper Consistory of the Luth. Church has prepared a new liturgy with responses.—The Prot. Church of France has always had distinguished pulpit orators, both in French and German.

DR. KIENLEN.*

Freylinghausen, John Anastasius, one of the principal leaders of the Pietistic movement in its early stage, labored, in connection with Spener and Francke, for the revival of practical piety in the Protestant churches of Germany, and occupies at the same time a prominent rank among the sacred poets and hymnologists. He was born Dec. 2, 1670, at Gandersheim, near Wolfenbüttel, received from his mother a strictly pious, though legalistic education, studied theology at Jena, 1689, became acquainted with Augustus Hermann Francke, the founder of the famous Orphan House at Halle, accompanied him to Halle, assisted him in his labors, married his only daughter, Anastasia, and succeeded him, in 1727, as director of his benevolent institutions. He died, twelve years afterwards, Feb. 12, 1739, a pious and peaceful death, and was buried at the side of his intimate friend.—He combined the activity of an academic teacher, pastor, and superintendent of the benevolent institutions at Halle, and exerted a very salutary influence upon the rising generation. His theological works, of which the "Fundamental Theology" (Grundlegung der Theologie, 1703) deserves to be mentioned, are not distinguished for any vigor or depth of thought, but for their piety and practical tendency in opposition to the dry and cold scholasticism which then prevailed in the German Universities. His most valuable and lasting productions are his hymns, above forty in number, pregnant with Scripture truth and fervent love to the Saviour. Some of them have passed into common use and found a place in every good German hymn-book, as "Wer ist wohl wie du, Jesu, süsse Ruh;" "Jesus ist kommen, Grund ewiger Freuden;" "Mein Herz, gieb dich zufrieden," etc. (see translations of his hymns in Miss Cath. Winkworth's Lyra Germanica, first and second series). Freylinghausen published also one of the best German hymn-books, in two vols., Halle, 1704, and 1713 (and often since) under the title: "Geistreiches Gesangbuch, den Kern alter und neuer Lieder, wie auch die Noten der unbekannten Melodeyen enthaltend." The historical significance of this collection consists in its pietistic spirit, and the introduction of the element of subjective devotion, as a supplement to the older, more objective and churchly hymns of the 16th and 17th centuries.

Literature: FREYLINGHAUSEN'S Ehrengedächtniss: Halle, 1740. Francke's Stiftungen, a Journal ed. by Schulze, Knapp, and Niemeyer, Vol. 2, 1794. H. DÖRING, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, I., 439, sq. WETZEL, Lebensbeschreibungen der berühmtesten Liederdichter.

IV., 145. Also the larger hymnological works sub Freylinghausen, especially Koch, Geschichte des Kirchenlieds, p. 235 (1st ed.).

PALMER. — Dr. Schaff.

Fridolin, St. — The biography of St. F., by Walter, a monk in Sädingen, is unreliable. It is even uncertain whether he lived under Chlodwig I. or II.; the former died in 511, the latter did not become ruler of the entire Frankish empire until 656. St. F. was of noble Celtic origin. It is said he fled from the praises his sermons in the British isles called forth, to Gallia. He then devoted himself to a revival of the veneration of St. Hilary, seeking to found monasteries in his honor in different places. On an island in the Rhine, between Schaffhausen and Basel, he founded a church dedicated to St. H., and the Sädingen nunnery, where he died Nov. 6, which is observed as his anniversary at that church. — (See RETTBERG, K.-gesch. Deutschl. II., 30, &c. HEFELE, Gesch. d. Einführung d. Chr. im Südwestl. Deutschl., &c.: Tüb., 1837, p. 243, &c. BLUMHARDT, Versuch einer allg. Missions-gesch., &c.: Basel, 1832, II., 2, p. 382).

REUCHLIN.*

Friesland, or the country of the Frisons, comprises, in its extended sense, the entire coast of Northwestern Germany. Originally, however, the name was applied only to the country lying between the mouth of the Weser and the Schelde. It is divided by lake Flevum or Fly (since the breaking of the dykes called Zuider-Zee), into East and West Friesland. The former embraces the province of F. and Gröningen, now under the realm of Holland; and East F. proper, which, in 1815, was ceded to the kingdom of Hanover. History also mentions North F., which embraced the islands of Helgoland, Föhr, and Sylt. — Friesland deserves a place in this work in regard to the introduction of Christianity and the Reformation. The first missionary who visited (626) F. was B. Amandus (see Art.), followed (641) by Eligius, afterwards B. of Noyon; neither of whom met with expected success. In the winter of 677–78, Wilfried, Archb. of York, having been shipwrecked upon the shores of F., was kindly received by Aldegild, the King, and allowed to preach Christianity. The fruits of his labors were blighted by the persecuting spirit of Radbod, successor of A. But these reverses were only calculated to kindle the zeal and devotion of the pious Anglo-Saxons, who never relinquished their purpose of Christianizing Friesland. Egbert (see Art.) solemnly vowed to devote himself to the preaching of the gospel on the continent. Prevented by shipwreck from entering the field, he afterwards dispatched several pious monks. The first was Wigbert, who met with a favorable reception from the King, and preached for the space of two years, but without effecting much; whereupon he returned to Ireland. The next missionary was Willibrord, the proper founder of the church in Friesland, accompanied by eleven fellow-laborers; previously, however, Wulfram, the Bishop of Neustria, is said to have preached there, and to have almost succeeded in persuading Radbod to receive baptism. — When Willibrord arrived in

F. the country was, in part, subdued by the Franks (689), and to this portion of F. his labors were chiefly confined: for, where Radbod's power had full sway, no good results could be expected. In 714, when the conflict between the Franks and the Frieslanders was renewed, Willibrord was forced to retire even from those districts which the former had conquered, and sought shelter in the monastery of Epternach. After the death of R. he resumed his missionary labors, and continued in the prosecution of his great work until his death (Nov. 6, 730). The beginning of his success may be dated from the year 696, when he returned from a visit to Rome with plenary power to act as missionary, and distinguished by Pope Sergius with episcopal honors. According to Bede, Pepin assigned to him the bishopric of Utrecht, which city he also selected as the place of his future residence. At the time of W.'s death, only the southern part of Friesland, the vicinity of the mouth of the Schelde, the Zealand isles, and the country as far as Fly was secured to Christianity. His successor in office, Abbot Gregor, and assistant of Boniface, succeeded in converting the inhabitants of the district between the Fly and the Lauwers. He also founded and conducted a school which produced a number of German bishops and teachers. — As his assistants we may mention Lebuin and Willihad: the former the builder of the churches¹ in Wulpen and Deventer, the latter subsequent B. of Bremen. Liudger, a native of F., and pupil of the school founded by Gregor, also rendered effective service to Willihad in his labors. After seven years uninterrupted toil an insurrection took place, which, however, was speedily suppressed, and the work of Christianizing F. soon completed. In 785 Liudger obtained episcopal authority over the five districts lying between the Lauwers and the Ems, which he retained when subsequently called to the diocese of Münster. — The conversion of the Frieslanders was now considered as completed, although traces of heathenism were plainly visible as late as the middle ages.

The Reformation was introduced (1524–35) in F. by Edzard I. and his son Enno. Edzard formed an acquaintance with Luther's writings as early as 1519, and after comparing the same carefully with what his opponents had written, he decided in L.'s favor. Henry Brun and John Stevens were the first preachers of "the new doctrine," but the principal Reformer of F. was Jörgen (Magister Aportanus), a former pupil of the school of the Fratres comm. vitæ, at Zwollen, who had been called by the Count to the school at Aurich as teacher, where he became a disci-

¹ During the conversion of the Frieslanders the following ecclesiastical establishments arose: —

1. In Utrecht, the churches of St. Salvator and St. Martin, the latter of which a cathedral.
2. Five churches (Flardinghe, Kirkwerke, Velsenburgh, Heilegelo, and Pethem), which were presented to the Abbey of Epternach.
3. Gertruidenburg, on the South side of the Maas.
4. Elft, on the Bethue, near the division of the Rhine and Waal.
5. Another church edifice at Wichmund, near Zutphen, on the Yssel.

ple of the Saxon Reformer. Under the auspices of the Count he commenced preaching at Emden; and when excluded from the pulpits by the opposing clergy, he preached in the open fields. Being forcibly led by his adherents into the cathedral of Emden, an officer was sent there with a guard in order to prevent either party from committing violence. Seeing the movement increasing, and receiving no support from the civil authorities, the Romish clergy withdrew from the contest, but were permitted to continue their mode of worship unmolested. After Edzard's death (1528), the work of Reformation was prosecuted by more forcible means. E.'s successor (Enno) commenced to abolish the monasteries, and to deprive the churches of their treasures. In the meantime differences arose among the Reformers themselves in regard to the doctrine of the sacraments, which caused great perplexity to the Count and his counselors. The matter was referred to Bugenhagen, of Hamburg, for decision, who, not knowing whether he should visit F. in person or send a deputation, finally determined (1529) to send Pelt and Tilemann. The difficulties in F. were further increased by Anabaptist exiles, among whom was Carlstadt. Many of the Frieslanders had already been led by them to neglect baptism. The Lord's Supper was administered in a disorderly manner. The Sabbath and festival days were disregarded, and marriages were contracted without the sanction of the Church. This was the state of affairs in F. when the deputation arrived; and yet without the least effort to reconcile contending parties, they expected the people to adopt the fixed Lutheran view on all mooted points, and that without any modification whatever. The people at Emden and Aurich listened quietly to their preaching, until Tilemann, in his fourth sermon, boldly upheld the Lutheran view on the Lord's Supper. The audience became infuriated, T. was pulled down from the pulpit, and with great difficulty the public officers succeeded in locking him up in the sacristy, in order to protect him against open violence. The Count, considering any decisive measures at this juncture as premature, anxiously awaited the completion of the new ritual, which the ministry of Bremen were to compose for East F., on the basis of the united forms of concord, as adopted by the convocation at Marburg. This ritual was submitted Dec. 12th, 1529, and its general introduction ordered by the Count. After a stated period all Anabaptists were compelled to leave the country. On the 15th of Jan., 1530, the Count convoked the evangelical clergy at Emden, to hear the new church service read, and to pledge its willing adoption. This pledge they all gave, begging the Count henceforth not to encumber them with the subject of corporeal presence, but to permit God and his Word to govern them in such matters. In regard to the doctrine of the sacrament the Count himself was, as yet, undecided; at first he seemed to favor Luther's view, but subsequently adopted that of the Reformed, yet granting to each party perfect liberty.

This state of comparative peace was soon interrupted. One of his chiefs, Balthasar, declared war against the Count. Victorious at the beginning, Enno was overpowered after the forces of the Catholic Carl, Duke of Geldern, had joined B.'s army, and had to submit to a disadvantageous treaty. Carl insisted on the re-establishment of the old Church order, but contented himself, finally, with the introduction of the Augsburg Conf. and the Saxon ritual. In compliance with the treaty, Enno issued a decree that all "sacramentarian preachers" should leave the country; whilst, on the contrary, two Luth. ministers were called from Lüneburg, to establish Lutheranism — the doctrine of the corporeal presence, with the use of candles at communion, and the white surplice. The effort met with great opposition. Many of the clergy remonstrated against it; and others, who persistingly refused to submit, were deposed, and their places supplied by Luth. ministers. In spite of all these efforts and the closest surveillance of a board of visitors, expressly created for this purpose, the Reformed system continued to prevail, and after the death of the Catholic Duke Carl (1538) supplanted entirely that of Lutheranism. Enno died a few years later. Countess Anna, who had now in the name of the minor heir, Edgard II., to assume the reins of government, appointed John a Lasco, a Polish nobleman and distinguished theologian, general-superintendent of the Church of F. Lasco introduced the Calvinistic institution of elders, appointed, during the summer season, a weekly clerical meeting (the cætus of Ems), and established order in the churches in Friesland. When subsequently the Interim appeared, and its adoption was demanded also of F., the Countess became greatly embarrassed, especially on account of the absence of Lasco, her spiritual adviser, who had been called by Edward VI. to assist in organizing the Church of England. At the request of the government, Chancellor Westen drew up a modified form of the Interim, according to which existing doctrines were to remain unchanged, but the use of the surplice at the Lord's Supper and vespers to be restored. These changes, although greatly modified, caused general dissatisfaction. Many churches where their pastors refused to observe the Interim were closed. Meanwhile Lasco returned from England, not less dissatisfied with the Interim than the rest. Count John, brother of the deceased Enno, who assisted the Countess in managing the affairs of the government, tried in vain to enforce the new formulary, it had to be laid aside. Lasco resumed the duties of his previous office, and gathered around him a large number of German, English, and French refugees, so that the church at Emden, received the honorary title, "Home of the oppressed and banished people of God." Ere long the old difficulties between the Lutherans and the Reformed were revived. At the instigation of the Catholic Mary of England, and the Lutheran King of Denmark, the Countess dismissed Lasco, but the proposed plan to call Melancthon as general-superintendent, was never executed; and the Reformed system and church-order, as introduced by Lasco, again prevailed. Disputes between the Lutherans and Reformed, as well as unsuccessful attempts at union, subsequently occurred, but no general movement of any importance.—(See T. D. WIARDA, Ostfr. Gesch. 9. Bde.: Aurich, 1791–98, especially Bd., 1–3. C. A. CORNELIUS, Der Antheil Ostfr. an d. Reform. his z. Jahr., 1535: Münster, 1852. RETTBERG, K.-gesch. Deutschl., 2 Bde.: Göttingen, 1848. CLEMENT, Lebens- u. Leidensgesch. d. Friesen.: Kiel., 1845) KLÜPFEL. — Gehr.

Fructuosus, B. of Tarragona, and martyr.—Of his earlier doings we have no account. His martyrdom occurred in 259 under Valerian and Gallienus. Jan. 21 is his anniversary. The deacons, Augurius and Eulogius, were imprisoned with F. All three stood firm before Æmilianus, the president of the court; they were then led to the amphitheatre, ascended the pyre praying, and it is said that their spirits were seen ascending out of the flames to heaven. (See AUGUSTINE, serm. 273 de diversis, and the 6th Hymn of Prudent., in the book περὶ στυφάνων. BOLL., ad 21, Jan.). DR. PRESSEL.*

Fructuosus, Archb. of Braga, was of royal descent, but early inclined to a contemplative retirement. After passing through the clerical school of the B. of Palencia, he sold his property and devoted the proceeds to the poor, and to the founding of monasteries. About 647 he had founded seven. But instead of presiding over them, he retired into the most desert places, where his disciples of the monastery at Complutum, in Lusitania, sought and found him, and compelled him to take charge of their monastery. The monastery then became so thronged that the King had to interfere, lest men would be wanting for the army. F. then prepared two rules for monks. The first contains 25 sections, in which their duties, manner of life, diet, and devotions, are most minutely prescribed. Everything, even the very motions of their bodies, were reduced to a mechanism. The penalties of violating these precepts were very severe; in some cases the offender was chained and imprisoned for six months. They were not allowed even to cut their nails, or pull out a thorn, without special permission from their superiors. In the second, regula communis, F. prescribes the conditions on which married persons, with their children, might safely live in monasteries.—All conversation with females was strictly prohibited.—F. was meditating a departure to the East, when he was elected B. of Duma, in Galicia; in 656 the Synod of Toledo elevated him to the Archb. of Braccara (Braga). He died in 675. To the last he labored to multiply monasteries and churches, sometimes working at them himself, by night.—(See MABILL., Annal. Ord. S. Bened., I., 437. SCHRÖCKH, K.-Gesch. Bd. 20, p. 24–30. Conc. Tol. X., p. 984; ap. Hard. T. III.). DR. PRESSEL.*

Fry, Elizabeth, the third of twelve children of John Gurney and Cath. Bell, was born at Norwich, May 21, 1780. Her parents were "Friends." After the death of her pious mother in 1791, she passed through many temptations and trials, arising out of the political and religious agitations of the times. In her 17th year, then already a shining light in the society, she wrote in her diary: "I am in doubt of everything. Unless a miracle be wrought on me, my talents will be devoured by moth and rust." Soon afterwards the counsel of a Friend of great religious experience helped her to solve the difficulty. She derived advantage also from intercourse with Friends in London, where, in 1799, after a long struggle, she embraced Quakerism from full inward conviction. Her marriage to Joseph Fry (1810) led her to reside in London. There she moved among Friends of the strictest sort. Now also she had abundant means for developing her talents. Until 1816 she confined herself chiefly to her family. She trained her eleven children to assist her in her labors at home and abroad. Her 25 grand-children were enlisted in like manner. Indeed her influence reached to every member of the family. Her distinguished brother, John Joseph Gurney, and her equally distinguished brother-in-law, Thomas F. Buxton, labored zealously for the emancipation of slaves. The kindness of Elizabeth showed itself in her childhood, in attempts to relieve the poor. At her father's residence, Plashet House, she established a school for girls, clothed and fed hundreds, and helped the wretched Irish who lived near by, and gypsies; to all she gave religious tracts, and such counsel as they needed. At the grave of her father, falling on her knees, that power of prayer first descended upon her, by which she afterwards moved so many hearts. Soon afterwards the Society of Friends acknowledged her as a divinely gifted witness of the truth. Called out in this way she gradually overcame her timidity, and was drawn into that sphere of public benevolent operations by which she accomplished so much good. She delivered addresses before large assemblies, her first at the Bible Soc. anniversary at Norwich, 1811. The Rev. Mr. Hughes, then of Norwich, says of her public addresses: "If the first feeling, on hearing her, is one of surprise, this is soon followed by a pious awe, and by the ardor of devotion."—A new chapter in her life opened with her visit to Newgate in 1816. The wretched condition of the 300 female convicts there, so affected her that she at once set to work for their improvement. For this purpose she formed a society of 12 women to visit those convicts, and she speedily saw the happiest results. The movement was started when, after Howard had been nearly forgotten, general attention was directed, in England, to prison-improvement. The Duke of Gloucester, Hoare, Buxton, and other men of influence, were at the head of the movement. Soon all eyes were turned to the efforts of the women at Newgate; the fruits of their labors proved their value. Inquiries came in from all quarters, from persons desirous of following the example. Mrs. Fry was invited to visit the interior of England, Scotland, and at last Ireland. Not only women and private persons, but men in civil stations, even Parliamentary committees, applied to her for her views on the subject of prison-reform. Thus she spent 21 years (to 1837) in this work. Wheresoever she came prisons were opened to her, committees of women were formed to visit prisoners, and improvements suggested by her faith, wisdom, and love were introduced.

—The chief thing with her was to apply the Word of God directly to the hearts of the prisoners. The happy effects of this means seemed to her to furnish the strongest proof of the truth of revelation. As the commingling of men and women in some prisons was a source of evil, she succeeded in having them kept separate, and for the women female overseers. Suitable employment was assigned to them, and prison schools were started. Above all the inmates were to be visited by committees of women appointed for the purpose.—In order to appreciate this movement the miserable condition of English prisons at the beginning of this century must be considered. At the same time the readiness with which Mrs. Fry's measures were seconded by the public authorities deserves mention. Female prison societies were started on all sides, even in France, Italy, Switzerland, Russia, Denmark, Holland, and Germany.

It was natural for those most interested in these operations, to look beyond their immediate sphere, to the prevention of crime, and the future welfare of discharged convicts. To this latter class Mrs. Fry early gave attention. Those sentenced for transportation also became objects of her tender concern. Like a mother and a sister of these unfortunate beings, she accompanied them to the transport-ships as early as 1818, and sought in every way to benefit them. Thus she was instrumental in directing the attention of the government to this matter also, and in 1834 Lord Melbourne ordered those then awaiting transportation to be assembled in Milbank, to be prepared for their voyage by proper instructions. Subsequently female overseers were sent along with the convicts; thus these bedlams were converted into Bethels. One result of Mrs. Fry's labors is seen in the fact that from 1818–1822 the number of relapsed convicts in Newgate had decreased 40 per cent.—But she by no means limited her sympathies to prisoners, but extended them to all classes; the poor herdsmen of Salisbury, the poor sailors at Cromer, servants, the suffering during years of scarcity, the inmates of almshouses, the insane, all shared her beneficent pity. She was particularly active also, in the circulation of the Bible and religious books, not only throughout England, but on the Continent. On the coasts of England there are about 500 stations of watchmen, located at the most dangerous points. These isolated people, and their families, were exposed to great bodily and spiritual perils. But no one cared for them, until they attracted Mrs. Fry's attention. By her efforts they were visited, and supplied, at her own expense, with good books. Thus the attention of the government was turned towards these neglected people.

Meanwhile correspondence with the continent had so greatly increased, that a special committee had to be appointed to answer them. It seemed desirable, therefore, that she should visit the continent, and personally explain her measures. Accordingly from 1837–43, she visited it five times, impelled by that ardor of charity which irresistibly inflamed all others with whom she came in contact. During these tours she untiringly prosecuted her great work of love.

Everywhere she was welcomed, and mostly received special invitations from the rulers of the different countries, before she reached them. From the palace of kings she went to the prisons, dispensing the same word of truth to all she met there, whether Protestants, Rom. Catholics, or of any other persuasion. She as firmly proclaimed the message of justification by faith in an assembly of nuns, or before the prelates of Belgium, as anywhere else. During her stay in Copenhagen, at the royal court, she succeeded in procuring the liberty of Baptist preachers who had been imprisoned there.—At Berlin, William IV. was most favorably impressed with her Christian spirit and zeal; and when he subsequently visited London, he accompanied her to Newgate, and there bowed with her in prayer before the Lord of lords.—She continued these labors until her 64th year, when sore bodily and mental afflictions overtook her. She died in 1845, aged 65 years. The blessings of thousands rested upon her. Her often repeated saying, "Charity to the soul is the soul of charity," here indicates the most prominent characteristic of her beneficent career, and furnished a proper aim to many of the recent benevolent movements of the Continent, especially in Germany. (See "Memoirs of the life of Elizabeth Fry," 2 vols. 2d ed.: London, 1848. "Visit to female prisoners, &c.," by M. WRENCH: London, 1852).

WICHERN.*

Fulbert of Chartres, one of the chief promoters of that revival of science, which in the course of the next hundred years developed scholasticism, was probably born in Italy, but received his education in the school of Gerbert at Rheims. About 990 he opened the school at Chartres, which soon acquired such distinction that it was frequented by pupils from distant countries. Fulbert's cotemporaries surnamed him Socrates, and his school produced such men as Berengar of Tours. In 1007 he was chosen B. of Chartres, and became the oracle of the bishops and abbots of France; but he still continued his school. His fame reached to the utmost limit of the Christian world; and when he began the rebuilding of the Cathedral of Chartres, the princes of the distant North and South aided him. He died April 11, 1029, and was canonized soon after. His works first appeared in Paris, 1585, 8vo., ed. Papir. Masson; then enlarged, but defective and corrupted:¹ Paris, 1608, 8vo. ed. Charles Villiers, and since then in the Bibl. max. patr., T. XVIII. They consist of 138 letters (some spurious), sermons, hymns, and some less important articles. The first letter is the most valuable. It is properly a treatise upon the Trinity, Baptism, and the Eucharist. It undoubtedly advocates transubstantiation, a doctrine defended by Gerbert already. Thus in ep. 2, p. 6, he says: panis ab episcopo consecratus, et panis a presbytero sanctificatus in unum et idem corpus transfunditur, propter secretam unius operantis potentie virtutem. His sermons exhibit an extraordinary veneration for Mary. That upon her ascension was long thought the production of St. Augustine, and parts of it were copied in the Roman breviary. The celebrated prayer: Sancta Maria, succurre miseris, etc., is also attributed to F. — (See Hist. liter. de la France, T. VII., p. 265, &c).

¹ Shröckh, K.-gesch., vol. 23, p. 506, has the following note. Among F.'s works there is a collection of passages from the Church Fathers upon the Lord's Supper, and among these, upon the words of Christ: "If ye eat not the flesh of the Son of man, &c.," this remark of Augustine: "here a crime seems to be enjoined; but it is a figure, which commands us to participate in the sufferings of our Lord; that is, to remember that his flesh was wounded and crucified for us."—Now lest the expression figura ergo est might prove prejudicial to the Romish dogma, the editor, a Paris Dr. of Divinity, added: dicet hæreticus. But finding afterwards that he had thus made St. Augustine a heretic, he placed these interpolated words among the errata, with the remark that the whole passage was mystical. Of course his ed. was suspected of containing other corruptions.

HUNDESHAGEN.*

Fulcher (Fulcard) of Chartres, was chaplain to Baldwin, 2d King of Jerusalem, and wrote a valuable history of the Crusaders: Gesta peregrinantium Francorum, cum armis Hierusalem pergentium, reaching to 1127. See it in DUCHESNE, hist. Franc. T. IV., 816, &c.

HUNDESHAGEN.*

Fulda, the monastery of, was founded, c. 744, by Boniface (Winfried), and his pupil Sturm, a youth of a noble family in Noricum. Sturm having resolved to devote himself to a strictly ascetic life in some desert place, acquainted Boniface with his purpose, who the more readily approved of it, as he himself had thought of founding a monastery on the borders of France, in a place secure against the inroads of the Saxons. Accordingly B. sent Sturm and two companions to search out a spot in the forest of Buchonia. They selected the ground on which the tower and monastery of Hersfeld was afterwards reared, and there built a few huts. But B. disapproved of the place, as being too near the Saxons. After wandering a long time in the forest, Sturm at length found a spot in the district of Grabfeld, on the banks of the Fulda, which had many attractions. He quickly reported his success to B., who approved of the place, and at once applied to Duke Karlmann, to whom it belonged, for the grant of it. Karlmann cheerfully complied, and gave them full titles to the ground. In Jan. 744, Sturm and seven companions took solemn possession of the territory. Under B.'s direction they immediately began to build, and to cultivate the ground; in these labors they made rapid progress. Before adopting rules for the government of the monastery, some of the brethren were sent to examine the arrangements of other monasteries; Sturm, and two others, went to Italy, and visited Monto Cassino, then revived under Abbot Petronax. After his return he completed the internal arrangement of Fulda after the rule of St. Benedict, and became its abbot. Lullus, also a pupil of B., notified Pope Zachariah of the establishment of the monastery, who confirmed the institution; and by a deed of Nov. 4, 751, granted it exemption from episcopal jurisdiction. Popes Stephan and Pepin ratified this exemption in 754. Boniface (see Art.), maintained intimate relations with the monastery, and became its patron. It now began to flourish. Before Sturm's death (779), the inmates numbered 400. Its prosperity increased under his successor Baugulf. By new grants of land, its territory, under Pepin and Charlemagne, included 15,000 hides (not less than 900,000 acres). The advantages of cultivating the soil spread through all the adjacent districts, and the literary culture of Fulda reached to the utmost parts of Germany. Its school became a nursery of theological learning; it bloomed most under Rhabanus Maurus, who presided over it for many years, and then became Abbot of Fulda. Iraban, born in Mayence, c. 776, was another of its distinguished teachers. There were 12 sub-instructors, called seniors. The branches taught were Grammar, Rhetoric, Dialectics, Arithmetic, Geometry, Nat. Phil. and Astronomy, Theology, and the German language. Others besides candidates for the Church, were taught there. It produced many noted scholars. There were so many applicants for admission, that only a small proportion could be received. Fulda also possessed a considerable library for that period, founded by Charlemagne. Rhabanus greatly increased it. He boasts of its including all the religious and literary works ever written. He added some works of his own; other monks contributed commentaries on the Bible, &c. Rhabanus also favored the cultivation of the fine arts, especially for the adornment of churches. The monks Isambert, Rudolph, Candidus, and Hatto, are commended as artists. The mechanical arts were also attended to; tailors, weavers, tanners, cabinet-makers, &c., were trained there. In 838 the monastery of Hirsau, in Suabia, obtained its first monks and abbot from Fulda. Rhabanus was its abbot from 822–842. After he left Fulda its literary fame declined. But it acquired increased influence and wealth. Under Abbot Werner (968–82), Fulda obtained the primacy among the abbeys of Germany and Gallia, and Otto I. made its abbots arch-chancellors of the Empire, a dignity ratified by Charles IV. At the beginning of the 11th cent., its discipline had so declined that a total reform was necessary. In 1331 an assault was made upon the abbey by the burghers of Fulda, under Duke John of Ziegenhein. Some mischief was done, but the assailants were ultimately overpowered, and their leaders put to death. In 1513 the abbey of Hersfeld was joined to that of Fulda. Later, the abbots had some trouble in keeping the ideas of the Reformation out of their institution. In 1573, however, Abbot Balthasar succeeded in effectually counteracting the influence of evangelical doctrines. During the 30 years' war the Protestants had several times almost gained possession of Fulda. The Landgrave of Hesse, William IV., by his treaty with Gustavus Adolphus, August 12, 1631, obtained Fulda as a Swedish fief, and endeavored to introduce Protestantism into the district. But after the defeat at Nördlingen he had to surrender it, and Rom. Cath. abbots were again restored. In 1732 Benedict XIV. raised the abbey to a bishopric. In 1803 Fulda was conveyed as a temporal principality to the Prince of Orange, but in 1809 Napoleon incorporated it with the grandduchy of Frankfort. In 1815 Prussia took possession of it, and attached it to the electorate of Hesse-Cassel, to which it now belongs. —(BROWER, Antiq. Fuld., libri IV.: Antw. 1617. SEITERS, Bonif., Ap. d. Deutschen.: Mainz. 1845. KUNSTMANN, Herabanus Maurus.: Mainz. 1841. RETTBERG, K.-gesch. &c., Bd. 1, 2: Gött. 1846. NIEDNERS Ztschr. f. hist. Theol. 1846).

KLÜPFEL.*

Fulgentius Ferrandus, Deacon at Carthage in the 6th cent., the friend and pupil of Fulg. of Ruspe, whose banishment he shared, and with whom he lived in the monastery of St. Saturninus, returned to Africa in 523, and became deacon there. He died 550. — His works are Vita Fulg. Rusp.; de duabus in Christo naturis; a fragment of a letter to Eugippius on the Trinity; de septem regulis innocentie; Breviatio canonum ecclesiasticorum, an important source for canon law; and Epistola pro tribus capitulis adv. Acephalos. — His works were first published in part by Achill. Tatius, 1518. The Breviatio first by Pithöus: Paris, 1588, and often afterwards. His complete works by P. F. Chifflet: Dijon, 1649. — (See CAVE, hist. lit. I., 514. DUPIN, nouv. Bibl. V., 29. General Church Histories.)

WAGENMANN*.

Fulgentius of Ruspe, a Bishop and writer of the 6th cent., born in 478 in Telepte, North Africa, was carefully educated by his widowed mother, and other competent teachers. On account of his learning and good character, he was early chosen procurator of his native town, but, contrary to his mother's desire, he entered the monastery at Byzacene, and there practised the severest austerities. The persecutions of the Catholics in North Africa compelled him to seek another monastery, and afterwards to go to Sicily, Rome, &c. Having returned to Africa, founded a new monastery, and taken priestly orders, he was chosen B. of Ruspe, in the province of Byzacene. He had scarcely entered upon his duties when he, and 60 other Catholic Bishops of North Africa, were banished by the Arian Trasimund, King of the Vandals. In company with a number of the exiles he went to the Island of Sardinia, and there began to exert himself for the good of the inhabitants. He founded a monastery there. It was in Sardinia that he became acquainted with the work of Faustus of Riez: de gratia Dei et lib. arbitrio, which, at the urgent solicitation of the Scythian monks, and a Sardinian Synod, he refuted in his three books, de veritate prædestinationis et gratie Dei, and seven (lost) books, de gratia et lib. arbitrio responsiones, and this gave a new turn to the Semi-Pelagian controversy. After 12 years' exile, he was allowed to return to Carthage, on account of the mildness with which he had written upon the disputed points; but upon the accusations of some Arian bishops he was banished a second time, and did not return again until after Trasimund's death, in 523, when his congregation in Ruspe received him with great joy. He died Jan. 1, 533, at the island monastery of Circina. — The writings of F., of which we have only fragments, are mostly controversial—directed against later Arianism and Semi-Pelagianism. To the former class belong contra objectiones Arian. l. III.; de S. Trinitate; de process. SS.; to the latter: ad Monimum. l. III.; de fide ad Petrum; de remiss. peccat. l. II.; de veritate prædest. et grat. Dei. l. III.; de gratia et lib. arbitr. responsiones; 18 epist.; ten strictly Augustinian sermons. F. was called the Augustine of his age ("in conf. fuit clarus, in script. divinis copiose eruditus, in loquendo dulcis, in docendo et disserendo subtilis," ISIDOR.). An old biogr. of F. was probably written by his pupil, Fulg. Ferr. — (Editions of F.'s remains by SIRMOND: Paris, 1623, fol.; RAYNAUD: Lyons, 1633, fol.; the most complete by MANGEANT: Paris, 1684, 4to. — See Acta Sanct. Jan. T. I., 32. CAVE hist. lib. script. eccl. I., 1373. The Church Histories of Gieseler, Neander, &c. BÄHR, Gesch. d. r. Litt. Suppl. III., § 184. WIGGERS, Aug. u. Pel. II., 369, &c.).

WAGENMANN*.

Funeral Addresses. — In some places great importance is attached to this part of funeral solemnities; in others (as in Rom. Catholic Churches), nothing but the liturgical service is allowed; in others there is an address at the grave besides the sermon in the church; in still others a printed sermon is read; and in others there is simply an address at the house, and a short prayer offered at the grave. — The primitive Christians had special solemnities (Acts 8: 2), but only of a liturgical character (Constit. Apost., l. 8, c. 41, 42. Celebretur dies tertius in psalmis, lectionibus et precibus, ob eum, qui tertia die resurrexit; item dies nonus, etc.); but these were not limited to the time of burial, which, it is well known, was not delayed in the East until the third day. An address was not a part of these solemnities, until the influence of Greek elocution reached to Christian preaching in Basil, the two Gregories and Chrysostom. The heathen origin of these funeral addresses is betrayed by their eulogistic character. This became prominent, subsequently, in the funeral sermons of Bossuet, &c., under Louis XIV. — In the middle ages sermones de sanctis were preached; but there were more important duties to be performed for the dead than to eulogize them. The Reformation abolished masses for the dead; it lifted up, instead, the standard of the Word of God at the grave. PALMER*.

Furseus, a missionary and abbot among the East Angles, on the British Isles, and founder of the monastery Lagny near Paris, was born in Ireland. From Ireland he went to the East Angles, and erected the Abbey of Knobbersburg, which he soon gave in charge of his brother Foillan, that he might retire into solitude with another brother, Ultan. When Penda, King of Mercia, persecuted the Christians in E. Angles, F. fled to France. He died between 650–4. He attracted attention by his visions and spasms, during which he professed to see angels. — (See BOLL. in vita S. Fursei ad., 16 Jan. MABILL. Acta SS. Ord. S. B. I., ad. a. 650. Annal. MABILL. I., catol. gen. p. 731. BEDA, hist. gent. Angl. eccl. 2, 19–23. PALMER*.

G.

Gabriel (= man of God), the name of an angel. In Dan. 8:16, and 9:21, he is mentioned as sent by God to Daniel to explain a vision and communicate a prophecy; in Luke 1:19, 26, as sent to Zachariah and Mary to announce the birth of John and of Christ. In each case he makes known important divine purposes relating either to Christ or the anti-Christ (Antioch. Epiph.). Besides Gabriel, Michael is the only angel named in the Bible (Dan. 10:13, 21; 12:1. Jude 9. Rev. 12:7). It is significant that the N. T. allusions to both confirm the character they wear in Daniel; Gabriel being always associated with the Messiah; and Michael appearing as the champion of the people and cause of God; G. as the proclaimer of God's purposes; M. as their executor. If angels are the creature instruments of the acts and revelations (miracles and prophecy) of God among men, we may regard these two named angels, as chief representatives of the business of angels. M. is the angel who executes divine acts; G. the angel of the word. M. is called an archangel (Jude 9; cf. Dan. 10:13; 12:1). It is a question whether Gabriel is also one, though not expressly called such. In Luke 1:19, he calls himself ὁ πρεσβυτέρω ἐν ὀνόματι τοῦ θεοῦ, which reminds us of the seven angels in Rev. 8:2, of whom G. was probably one, and whom Bengel, de Wette, &c., suppose are archangels. In the rabbinical and apocryphal theology, G. is always called an archangel (Tobit 12:15. The number and names of archangels are variously given (see Angels). — (See G. L. HAHN, Theol. d. N. T. I., 286, &c. HOFFMANN, Schriftbeweis I., 293, &c.).

AUBERLEN.*

Gad (= fortune), was the first son of Jacob by Zilpah (Gen. 30:9, &c.). The tribe of which he was the progenitor numbered, at the Exodus, 45,650 warriors, but at the end of the journey only 40,500. Its position in the camp was with Reuben and Simeon, on the S. of the tabernacle (Numb. 2:14; cf. 10:17, &c.). The tribe was divided into seven families (Gen. 46:16; Numb. 26:15, &c. 1 Chron. 5:11, &c., mentions four main branches with seven offshoots). To the tribe of Gad an abode was assigned on the E. side of the Jordan, in Bashan and Gilead, a part of the modern Belka (BURCKHARDT, Reisen in Syrien, II., 598, &c., 628); it had Reuben on the S. and Manasseh on the N., and stretched in a narrow strip along the Jordan to the lake of Gennesareth (Deut. 3:12, 16), and was separated from Ammon on the E. by Jabbok (Josh. 13:24, &c.). The Ammonites were defeated by the Gadites under Jephthah (Judges 11:13, &c.; BERTHEAU, Comm. z. d. B. d. Richt. 158, &c.) The powerful Ephraimites, also, had to flee before them (Judges 10:8, 17; 11:4, &c.; 12). Gad had conquered its territory, which was chiefly suited to pasturage, in company with Reuben and the half tribe of Manasseh, hence their common interest in certain fortified cities in that district (Numb. 32:34, &c.); and hence their conjoint erection of the altar in Josh. 22. As a nomade tribe we find them going beyond their proper limits in search of pasturage; hence the indefiniteness of the boundaries of the tribes on the E. of the Jordan. The Gadites were warlike, and engaged in many conflicts. Thus they acquired a reputation for heroism (1 Chron. 12:8, &c. Cf. Gen. 49:19; Deut. 33:20, &c.). Under Saul, Gad and Reuben extended their borders toward Arabia (1 Chron. 5:18, &c. Cf. Deut. 33:20). When the Gadites were led, with Reuben and Manasseh, captives to Assyria by Phul and Tiglath-Pileser, the Ammonites retook their land (2 Kings 15:29; 1 Chron. 5:26; Jer. 49:1). In the new ideal theocracy, Ezekiel (48:27, &c.), assigns Gad a place in the extreme S. on this side of the Jordan. By the river of Gad, 2 Sam. 24:5, doubtless the Jabbok is meant (Judges 11:33; Josh. 13:25; Is. 17:2. — See RELAND, Palest.; LENCERKE, Kanaan; EWALD, Gesch. Isr.; WINER, R. W. B.). — 2) Gad was also the name of a prophet (1 Sam. 22:5; 2 Sam. 24:11, &c.). 3) The name of a Chaldean deity worshipped by idolatrous Israelites (Is. 65:11). Rabbinical tradition makes it the planet Jupiter (according to the astrological character of the later Chaldean religion) as the star of good fortune (cf. BUXTORF, lex. talm., p. 1034. Pococke, specim. hist. arab., p. 130). It seems to be identical with Bel, and to have been worshipped in Syria; hence the name Baal-Gad (Josh. 11:17; 12:7; 13:5, &c. See Baal).

RÜETSCHL.*

Gadara was the fortified metropolis of Peræa (Jos. Ant., 13, 13, 3; B. J., 4, 7, 3; POLYB. 5, 71, 3), and lay on a hill S. of the river Hieronax (Yarmūk), S. E. of the southern extremity of the sea of Galilee, and 60 stadia from Tiberias (Jos. vita. § 65). At this city, which the Jews had destroyed, but Pompey restored (Jos. Ant., 14, 4, 4; B. J., 1, 7, 7), and of which there are still many coins which reckon years from that restoration, the highroads from Tiberias and Scythopolis, to the interior of Peræa and to Damascus, met. The inhabitants were mostly heathen (Jos. Ant., 17, 11, 4). Augustus gave it to Herod, after whose death it was attached to the province of Syria (Jos. Ant., 15, 7, 3; B. J., 2, 6, 3). It was reckoned with Decapolis (Matt. 4:25, &c. STEPH. BYZ., s. v.; PLIN., H. N., 5, 16), and became the seat of a Christian bishop. The place was discovered by SEETZEN (see Zach's monatl. Corresp. XVIII., 417, &c.), and BURCKHARDT (I., 434, 539), as also the anciently celebrated adjacent sulphur springs.—In consequence of various readings it is uncertain whether it was near this city that the demoniacs (Matt. 8:28, &c.; Mark 5:1;

Luke 8:26, &c.) were cured; the preponderance of the evidence, however, is in favor of the vicinity of Gadara (see GRIESBACH, comm. crit. in text. græc. N. T. I., 90, &c. LIGHTFOOT, centur. chorogr. ad Matt., c. 75; decas chorogr. ad Mark, c. 7; hor. hebr. ad Mark, 5:1; RE-LAND, Palæst., p. 203, &c.; RITTER's Erdk. XV., 2; RAUMER's Paläst., 240, &c. (2 Ausg.); WINER R. W. B. RÜETSCHL.*

Galatia or Gallogræcia, a country in Asia Minor, bounded N. by Paphlagonia, E. by Pontus and Cappadocia, S. by Phrygia, and W. by Bythynia. From the time of Augustus its metropolis was Ancyra; but Favium and Pessinus flourished through commerce. It derived its name from its inhabitants, Γαλάται (= Κέλται. Pausan. 1, 3, 5). For the Trocmi, Tolistoboji and Tectosages, which were Gallic or Celtic tribes, entered Asia, c. 276, B. C. (Liv., 38, 16, &c.; Flor., 2, 11), and obtained land, as pay for military service, from the Bythynian King Nicomedes, which they gradually extended, until Attalus, King of Pergamus, 240 B. C., confined them to the fertile banks of the Halys (Pausan. 1, 4, 5; 1, 8, 2). Brave, and lovers of freedom, this people were often employed by neighboring cities and kings, so that the fame of their arms reached even down to Babylonia and Egypt (Justin. 27, 3; 25, 2; Polyb. 5, 53; 2 Macc. 8:20). Finally the Roman Consul, Cn. Manlius Vulso, conquered them, 189 B. C. (Livy. 38, 12; 20, &c.; 1 Macc. 8:2), but were long allowed to retain their language (which Jerome, on Gal. 1:2, compares to that spoken around Treves), and hereditary district government under their own tetrarchs (Strabo, 12, 541, 567, &c.), who were subsequently called kings (Cic. pro rege Dejot.; Veiej., 2, 84; Plut. Anton. c. 61). By the favor of Augustus and Antony, its last king, Amyntas, added Pisidia and several districts of Lycaonia and Pamphylia to his domains (Dio Cass., 49, 32), but after his murder (26 B. C.), the entire kingdom became a Roman Province, and had a governor placed over it and Lycaonia (Dio C., 53, 26). At length Emperor Valens divided it into Gal. prima, under a consul, and G. sec. s. salutaris, under a president. As the people assumed the Greek language and manners in their new home, the country acquired the name of Gallogræcia (see WERNSDORF, de republ. Galatr., 1743; RITTER, Gesch. d. Gallier, II.; THIERRY, hist. des Gaulois, I.; DIEFENBACH, Celtica II.; Pauly's Realencycl. III., 604, &c.).

Paul himself introduced the Gospel into G. c. 52, A. D.; he visited it on his second and third missionary tour (Acts 16:6; 18:23; Gal. 1:6; 4:13, &c.), although his labors are not reported in Acts. The congregations of G. chiefly, though not exclusively composed of heathen (Gal. 4:8, &c.; 5:2; 6:12), are mentioned in 1 Cor. 16:1; 2 Tim. 4:10; 1 Peter 1:1. Disturbances caused by Judaizing teachers, called forth Paul's ep. to the Gal., after he had failed, during his second visit (Acts 18:23; Gal. 4:13, 16; 1:9), fully to allay the strife (see Paul). The ep. was addressed to the Churches in Gal. proper, not to those in the previously enlarged domains of Amyntas (Acts 14:6, 24; 15:38; cf. 16:6; and Plin. H. N. 5, 25.—(See RÜCKERT's Mag. f.

Exeg. u. Theol. d. N. T. I., 1, p. 98, &c.; introductions to comm. on the ep. to the Gal.; WINER, R. W. B.). RÜETSCHL.*

Galbanum is mentioned in Exodus 30:34 (cf. Wisdom 24:21), as one of the ingredients of temple incense, which the Israelites were forbidden, on pain of death, to use for any other purpose. It is the gum of a shrub which grows in Abyssinia, Arabia, and Syria, which Pliny, 12, 56, calls Stragonitis, and Sprengel supposes to be Bubon Galbanum L., but which Don thinks is the Galb. officinale. The gum is obtained by making incisions in the bark; it is rich, adhesive, bitter and astringent, at first white, but when older yellow with white spots; when burning it emits an offensive vapor with which serpents and bugs are driven off. Pliny says, 13, 2, that resina or gummi was mixed with ointments ad continendum odorem in corpore; and hence Winer thinks that Galb. was mixed with incense to retain the odor, or to increase it. But it is more probable that it was designed to symbolize the bitterness of sorrow for sin, as a necessary ingredient of all true prayer.

PRESSEL.*

Galfried of Monmouth, Galfredus Monumontensis, Jeffrey ap Arthur, born in Monmouth, was, first, archdeacon there, and 1152 became B. of St. Asaph. During the political disturbance in Wales he left his post, and was kindly received by Henry II., and entrusted with the management of the Abingdon monastery. When the Archb. of Cant., at the instance of a Synod at London, 1175, directed G. to return to his see, G. resigned the see, and soon after the abbey was taken from him. He then wrote, in the best Latin of his age, a history of the Britons, consisting of a mixture of facts and fables. Besides this he wrote: de exilio ecclesiasticorum; de corpore et sanguine Dom.; carmina diversi generis; comm. in proph. Merlini, and a biogr. of Merlinus.—(See PARKER's script. rer. brit.).

DR. PRESSEL.*

Galileans.—The inhabitants of Galilee (see Palestine), were partly heathen. This mixture seems to have had a modifying influence upon their religious views, so as to render them more susceptible of the truths proclaimed by Christ, than the more bigoted Israelites of Judea. Josephus describes them as an industrious, spirited, brave people (Ant., 13, 5, 6; B. J., 3, 3, 1. Though adhering firmly to Judaism, they were less prejudiced than their brethren in Judea, and persevering in whatever they embraced; hence they were readily incited to insurrections (Acts 5:37; cf. Luke 13:1, &c.) The other Jews despised the Galileans, partly because they were thought not to be Jews of pure blood, partly because they were suspected of holding erroneous doctrines, partly for their broad dialect (John 7:52; Acts 2:7; Matt. 26:73; Mark 14:70; Luke 22:59). It is probable that the contempt in which they were held, led the Saviour to regard them with compassion, and to prefer them as the foundation of his kingdom (John 2:24, 25; Matt. 11:25, &c.). VAHINGER.*

Gall, St. (the monk), properly Gallon, Gallun, or Gilian, was born about 560, in Ireland, of respectable parents. He was early sent to the monastery of Bangor, to be educated by Colum-

ban. With his teacher and six other monks of Bangor he left his country in 590, in order to preach to the heathens in the far east; but they stopped among the Franks and Burgundians, and Columban commenced at Luxeuil extensive monastic operations. This was interrupted in 610 by the intrigues of Queen Brunhild; but C. found in Neustria an honorable reception and liberty to missionate. Thence he went among the Alps. G. had never left his teacher and abbot; but on this missionary tour he stepped forward more prominently, and even eclipsed the other; for Columban was ignorant of the native language, of which G. soon became so thoroughly master, that he could preach to the natives. The first aim of C. was always to found colonies of Irish monks under his direction; G., though he also could not renounce his monkish tendency nor his relation to his abbot, had chiefly in view the conversion of the people and their connection with the Rom. Church. After the bold and eloquent G. had preached, chiefly in the company of C., in Tuggen, Arbon, and Bregenz, the two separated; for C., in 613, thought it necessary to leave Franconia, and went into Lombardy. As heretofore, G. was to accompany him; but G. was sick and remained. C. did not believe that G. was detained by sickness; but supposed, no doubt correctly, that he wished on this occasion to become independent and commence for himself: he therefore used his authority as abbot to forbid him ever to read mass during C.'s life. G. remained at Arbon until he was restored to health; then he sought a suitable site for a cell, to be the germ of a future monastery. They found such a place near the brook of Steinach. Here G. erected a cross and fastened to it the relics which he had with him. He next built a chapel, which subsequently became the most esteemed sanctuary of the Allemanic race, and from which arose the large, wealthy, and princely abbey of St. Gall (see Art.). The founding took place in 614. Monks soon gathered around G., who, according to an old monkish tradition, united only 12 under his guidance, and bound them under the strictest observance of the rule of Columban. G. was himself the strictest observer of the rule. Some incidents are told of G. concerning which we can arrive at no historical certainty; nor is their credibility strengthened by the miracles connected with them. Thus, e. g., G. was persecuted by a certain Count Gunzo. The latter had a daughter, Fridiburg, espoused to King Siegbert, but possessed of an evil spirit, which would yield only to G. Gunzo now anxiously sought for G. who had fled to a place of safety. G. finally, by prayer and exorcism, restored Fridiburg, who, though sent to Metz to be married to the King, chose the veil and became abbess of St. Peter's, at Metz. Siegbert confirmed to G. the unencumbered possession of his settlement in the mountains, and commanded the Duke to protect him. This story is probably no more than a fable, intended to invest the monastery with remote royal favor and franchises. For history nothing is more available of this fable, than that Siegbert III., King of Austrasia (from 638), may have favored the monastery; and that G.

may have performed the above cure. Some other feature of the story, viz.: that Ganzo had richly rewarded G., enlarged his cell, and offered to him the previously promised bishopric of Constance, which, however, G. refused on the plea that the canons allowed no foreigner to be ordained as Bishop, and that Columban had laid the above-mentioned prohibition upon him—are subject to just historical doubts. The whole account seems to have been amplified, changed or invented to account for the fact, that the highly esteemed G. had never been Bishop; and also to combat the pretensions of the bishopric of Constance to supremacy over the abbey of St. Gall. It is also narrated that G. was called to the important and honorable office of abbot of Luxeuil, the model monastery of Columbans, and most celebrated and influential one in all Franconia; but G. refused to forsake Helvetia. Soon after this, G. died in his 95th year, at Arbon, whither he had gone at the request of Willimar to preach once more. His age rests upon credible tradition; but the year of his death is variously given; 655, as given by Rettberg, seems most probable. On Oct. 16, the Church celebrates the anniversary of his death.—The life of St. G., written by Walafried Strabo (Mabillon. Acta SS. O. S. B. sec. II., p. 227, sq.), is only an alteration of an older work, probably written by Winithar about 766. This older work, with various prose and poetical transformations and continuations, was published by v. ARX in the Monum. Germ., II., p. 5, sq. See also PERTZ, Archiv IV., p. 328, sq. Acta SS. Bolland. Oct. VII., p. 860, sq.; and especially RETTBERG, observat. ad vit. S. Galli spectantes: Marb., 1842, 4to.; and K.-Gesch. Deutschl., II., 40–48.

ALBRECHT VOGEL. — Reinecke.

Gall, Nicholas, properly Hahn, but commonly called Gallus, one of the most zealous adherents of Flacianism, a violent Lutheran and actor in the controversies and struggles against the Ratisbon Interim and its adherents, a bitter enemy of Osiandrist and Majorism, was born in 1516 at Köthen. Little is known of his early education. At Wittenberg, where he finished his studies, he read philosophy under Melanchthon, and theology under Luther. He very soon attached himself closely to these leaders of the Germ. Reformation, and manifested a lively zeal in the spread of the evangelical doctrines and Church. He preached at Mansfeld, where he became also rector of a school. Subsequently he, with Jerome Nopus, was sent by Luther as preacher to Ratisbon, when, in 1542, this city had adopted the evangelical doctrines. He labored here without much note for several years. Shortly after Luther's death the Smalcald war arose, the disastrous issue of which, together with the controversies caused by the Interims of Augsburg and Leipsic, brought the Prot. Church into the greatest danger. Gall now moved to Wittenberg, where for a time he supplied the place of Cruciger at the Schlosschurch. Here the Interim placed him in conflict with Melanchthon. The Elector Maurice had caused his theologians so to modify the Augsb. Interim, that the essentials of the Luth. doctrines remained in connection with the Cath.

organization and liturgy. This modified Interim stirred up the orthodox zeal of the strict Lutherans even more than the Augsb. Interim, and the controversies which now arose were the cause of the first schism in the new school. The rage of the zealots was disgorged especially against Wittenberg, most of all against Melancthon. Flacius became their chief, with whom Gall took an active part in the controversies. In 1550 Gall removed to Magdeburg, the Luth. Zion of that age, and which afforded an asylum to the zealots, who had been elsewhere banished for their turbulence. Here he became preacher, and subsequently superintendent. After the treaty of Passau he was again called to Ratisbon. Here he superintended the religious affairs of the city with diligence and zeal, and aided in extending the Evang. Church into Steiermark and Austria. He was actively engaged at the same time in new controversies stirred up by Osiander and Major. Though Albert, Duke of Prussia, had forbidden these controversies, Gall and Flacius published violent pamphlets, a catalogue of which is given by Salig, Vollst. Hist. d. Augsb. Conf., II., p. 1008. A second decree of Aug. 11, 1555, shared the same fate. In consequence of the Leipsic Interim G. Major was attacked by Amsdorf, and afterwards by Gall. The latter demanded of the churches of Magdeburg, Hamburg, Lübeck, and Lüneburg, that they should condemn the new heresy of Major. They did so in the manner desired, and G. with Flacius published their declaration. In order to lay aside their controversies, Christopher, Duke of Würtemberg, sought (1556) to effect a compromise with Frederick II., Elector Palatine. Though he failed in this, he made a second effort; and for this purpose assembled the Elector Palatine, the Landgrave of Hesse, the Counts of Simmern, Zweibrücken, Nassau, and several others, and deputies from the imperial cities of Upper Germany, at Frankford (June, 1557). Gall appeared as deputy from Ratisbon. His subsequent works were all calculated to continue the dissensions of the Church. He died, 1570, at Celler-Bade.—(See UNSEN, Leb. d. berühmten K.-lehrer, etc.: Lpz., 1710.—BECKMANN, Hist. d. Fürstenth. Anhalt, VII., ch. 3, p. 339). NEUDECKER.—Reinecke.

Gall, St., former Benedictine monastery.—Of all the religious institutions of Switzerland, none ever attained to such celebrity and importance as St. Gall, and but few monasteries of Europe can compare with it in the cultivation of intellectual pursuits. It arose at the beginning of the 7th cent. The legend concerning it tells us that St. Gall, the founder, having selected a site, ate his evening meal and laid down to repose. On awakening, having devoutly prayed, he saw a bear devouring the remnants of the meal. He commanded the bear to gather wood for the fire, and afterwards to return to the mountains and nevermore to injure either man or beast; all which was done. Hence it was that St. Gall was depicted with a bear carrying wood at his side, and that the monastery up to its dissolution had this device stamped upon its coin. A building, mostly of wood, was soon erected in the inhospitable valley, and kindred minds soon flocked to the cell of the pious man.

The country around was rapidly cleared; other buildings arose; and Gall, with his disciples, Mang and Theodore, applied himself untiringly to the work of Christianization. In 640 he ended his noble career, but his active and pious spirit survived him. Numerous pilgrimages were made to his grave, and thus it happened that the solitary cell of St. Gall gradually became an important institution; for the monastery held property not only at home, but also in the interior of Switzerland, in Breisgau, Suabia, Franconia, and even in Lombardy.—Among the successors of St. Gall, Othmar deserves special mention. He governed the monastery from 720–760, and is regarded as its first abbot. During his time the wealth of the monastery had increased so much, that a larger number of devotees could be admitted, and new buildings, partly for dwellings and partly for entertaining guests, had to be erected. Othmar had often to defend himself against the neighboring Bishop of Constance, and other powerful lords; for the latter, charging him with a heavy crime, appropriated to themselves the property of the monastery. He died in exile; but his body was brought back to St. Gall, and he himself, as martyr, was subsequently canonized. At that time already a hospital for lepers was connected with the monastery. Its origin is due to Othmar, who himself performed the most menial offices in it. His successors also found violent opponents in the Bishops of Constance, who sought to deprive them of the free election of their abbots, and of the management of their possessions. The monastery seems, indeed, to have suffered such heavy losses at this time, that its own inmates declared it the poorest in the entire Frankish empire. Its condition, however, improved again; its possessions, or equivalents, were restored; nor do these reverses seem to have cooled in the least the zeal of the brothers, for the founders of the abbey of Tegernsee obtained their first monks from St. G., and the schools, which dated from an early period, became real models at this time. In fact St. G. became more and more a seat of science, to which end a distinguished abbot, Gozbert (from 816–837), assisted materially. His election had been once more a free one, since Louis the Pious had renewed to St. G. a charter of Charlemagne, which authorized it to elect its own superiors.—A plan for a large Benedictine cloister, dating from the time of Gozbert, is still existing. According to it the monastery was to form a parallelogram 430 feet in length and 300 feet in width. It presents the appearance of a town regularly laid off in squares, and includes a botanical and vegetable garden. The burial ground, also laid off and shaded with fruit and ornamental trees, but without gravestones or even crosses, has the appearance of a park. From this plan, prepared perhaps by an Italian, Gozbert adopted whatever suited the locality and the pecuniary resources of St. Gall. The building commenced with was the church. It was completed in seven years, and was regarded as fine an edifice as it was costly. After this the monastery was rebuilt with almost royal munificence. The vastness and populousness of the monastery appears from the fact, that in the bakery there was an oven in which one thousand loaves could be baked at once, and that the mill needed annually ten new millstones.—The monastic school became more and more flourishing. It was divided into a general one, and one for such as wished to become monks. Emperors and kings obtained their private secretaries from this seat of science. Gozbert was also active in gathering literary treasures. Up to his time the monastery possessed only a small store of them; but his efforts laid the foundation to that remarkable collection of books, for which even now St. G. is famous in the kingdom of science. This success was due to various causes. For, on the one hand, St. G. stood from the time of its founder, in connection with Bobbio and other Italian monasteries; on the other hand it had a powerful patron in Charles the Fat, who, with his Queen, made frequent use of the library. After having been abbot 21 years, Gozbert retired; St. Gall, however, continued to be distinguished for its intellectual activity.—Grimald, the third successor of Gozbert, and a very learned man, was careful of the reputation of St. Gall, and was in correspondence with many of his most distinguished contemporaries. Solomon (abbot from 899–919) possessed the highest administrative talents, and was at the same time abbot of 11 other monasteries and bishop of Constance. He was distinguished alike for extensive erudition, stirring eloquence, diplomatic skill, but also for ambition and love of pomp.—Under such abbots, and successors like them, the monastery could achieve great things; the more so, as among the monks there was always a considerable number, who increased the reputation of St. Gall. The Latin was the language of literature, although the style was not classical. Some of the monks understood the Greek also. The old high German was also cultivated for literary purposes; and only several years ago H. Hattemer published the most important of these old German manuscripts, treating of ascetics, philosophy, lexicography, and natural history. Nor was history neglected, though it consisted mostly in pretty barren annals, martyrologies, and lives of saints. One of the monks wrote a life of Charlemagne. Pertz, in Vol. I., of his Monumenta Germaniæ historica, has given a catalogue of all works written on this subject at St. G. Hartmuot, abbot from 872–883, applied himself to geography, and prepared a map of the world. In medicine Iso was distinguished in the 9th, and Notker, called granum piperis for his rigid monastic discipline, in the 10th century. Some abbots and monks wrote hymns, elegies, roundelays, and comedies. The glossæ Salomonis, a kind of encyclopedia named after abbot Salomon, present to us the entire cycle of science in those days. It gives special attention to the interpretation of the Scriptures. Though much of its matter is taken from older works, it has much that is original, and even enters upon philosophical discussions. But all the monks of St. Gall were eclipsed by the fame of Notker (labeo), † 1022, who was at once a divine, mathematician, astronomer, German author, poet, translator, and musician.—Under such circumstances the monastic library could only increase. At St.

Gall all kinds of works were copied; the S. Scriptures, liturgies, sermons, Church Fathers, Greek and Latin classics, grammars, sacred and profane histories, works on medicine, and even collections of law. An accurate catalogue of them still exists. The manuscripts were written on parchment prepared in the monastery, with fine, often silver or golden, ink, and in a style of beauty which excited general admiration.—The schools were still places of genuine education, and continued to be divided into a schola interior et exterior. In both schools the rod was used to punish inattention and idleness of the mostly noble scholars. St. Gall also furnished other institutions with teachers. Among its most distinguished teachers were Engelbert, Hartmann, Marcell, Ratpert, Notker, the stammerer, Reginbert, Bishop Salomon, Sigihart, Tuotilo, Waltram, Wikram, and Iso.—But St. Gall was no less distinguished in the chief monastic arts—music and singing, which found there enthusiastic followers. Notker, the stammerer, not only supplied texts to melodies found in an antiphonary brought to St. Gall in the age of Charlemagne; but also composed music, in which other monks of St. Gall imitated him. The celebrated hymns, named sequences, were perfected by him, and found a wide favor in Germany, France, and England. Two of Notker's sequences, Grates nunc omnes reddamus, and Media vita in morte sumus, were translated by Luther into German, and have been a source of edification in the German Prot. Church to the present day. Tuotilo, the friend of N., gained as performer the admiration of all his hearers. He was able to perform on all known wind and stringed instruments. Musical instruction was also given in the monastery to those people who had a talent for it. The other plastic arts were equally cultivated in St. Gall. Tuotilo executed sculptures and works in demi-relief on all kinds of metal. He was, besides, painter and architect. Abbot Immo wrought a golden plate for the high altar, and prepared purple mass vestments on which sacred scenes were embroidered, and also adorned the walls of the minster with scenes from the life of St. Gall. Tancho gained distinction as metal-founder, especially of bells. Art and expense were also employed in ornamenting the church books with gold, gems, and ivory. Particular dwellings were assigned to the mechanics of the monastery, by whom even shields, swords, and glass-ware were made.—During this flourishing period already, the monastery had to endure many assaults from without; one by the Hungarians in 925. With its adjacent buildings it was therefore at that time surrounded with a moat and towers. In the 11th cent. its most troubled times began; its abbots, even, often laid aside their books for the sword. Norbert, Lord of Stoffeln, carried on, in 1067, with Rumold, B. of Constance, his spiritual superior, a private war; and gained thus the unenviable reputation of the first warlike abbot. A still more violent struggle was carried on between the second successor of N., and the abbot of Reichenau, during which the monastery and the city, which had gradually sprang up around it, were twice sacked and plundered.

Amid such circumstances, St. G. necessarily departed from its original purpose; religion and science declined, and its light, which formerly shone far around, became nearly extinct. It is true, the ignis sacer still glowed beneath the ashes, and it must not be forgotten that its literary treasures were preserved from ruin. — Although formerly already violations of morals and monastic discipline had occurred, these had soon been suppressed; the excesses which were practised under the later voluptuous abbots, and amid the ignorance which then prevailed, could not show themselves. Another calamity for the monastery was the elevation, in 1204, of its superiors to the rank of princes, as was done by King Philip the Hohenstaufen; for this encouraged the prevailing warlike spirit, and aided in discouraging literature. This first prince, Ulrich VI., Lord of Hohenau, became so worldly, that two years afterwards on the day of the crucifixion he led an army to the relief of a neighboring besieged castle. Another abbot declared himself to be “a monk in the monastery, but a prince at court.” Some of the later abbots could not even write, and outside of the monastery often appeared in a secular garb. Their own court was often exceedingly expensive. — For a short time the minne-song, which spread in the 13th cent., was productive of good; for the Nibelungenlied, Roland, Titarel, Percival, the Zug nach Troja, &c., were read in the monastery; and one of its abbots even was a minnesinger. About the middle of the 15th cent., the abbey became allied to the Swiss confederacy, and thus gained vastly in political influence. In 1468 it enlarged its territory by the purchase of the county of Toggenburg; a purchase which entailed disastrous consequences both upon the abbey and Switzerland. It was made under prince abbot Ulrich Rösch, who, having arisen to this dignity from a scullion, was as enterprising as he was astute. He once more raised the revenue of the impoverished abbey to 26,000 florins; and, by converting the Latin school into a gymnasium and calling professors from abroad, he endeavored to restore the ancient renown of St. G. For nearly 30 years he presided over the abbey, and directed all his energies to its welfare. He died in 1491. — In the time of his successor, Francis Geisberger, the Reformation took place, and found such favor among the monks, that a minority of them laid aside the monastic garb. Zurich and the city of St. Gall intended immediately after Francis' death to take measures against the abbey, but especially against its supremacy. His death, at Rorschach, March 29, 1529, was hence concealed for six days; whilst those monks who had remained faithful to their vows, most of whom had betaken themselves to Einsiedeln, assembled at Rappersweil, and elected as abbot Kilian German, a man of great energy, who, however, continued in office only one year. After the fatal battle of Kappel (Oct. 11, 1531), the Cath. cantons reinstated German's successor in the abbey and the government of his territories, and the city of St. G. had to indemnify the abbey. — About the middle of the 16th cent., intellectual activity once more flourished in St. G., and ab. Diethelm Blaarer († 1564) is often called, on account of his many services, the third founder of the abbey. Among the abbots of the 17th cent. must be mentioned Pius Reher (1630–1654), who was so given to studies that he often said that he would rather see an incarnate devil in his monastery, than an ignorant monk; and Celestin (1687–1696), a man of great learning, who, by his work against the four articles of the Gallican Church, obtained from Innocent XII. the Cardinal's hat. Many difficulties arose to the abbey from the fact that the Ref. Church had been able to maintain its ground in the county of Toggenburg; the more so, since the inhabitants of the county, a lively, enterprising people, were warmly attached to liberty. Bad feelings sprung up on both sides. The Ref. complained of encroachments on the part of their spiritual superiors; complaints, which at the beginning of the 18th cent. led to an open war. Zurich and Bern took sides with Toggenburg; Luzern, Uri, Schwyz, Unterwalden, and Zug, with the abbey. The latter was unsuccessful, and sustained large pecuniary and literary losses; for the larger part of its library was carried off to Zurich and Bern, part of which, however, was subsequently restored. From this time the abbey declined more and more; first from financial mismanagement, and afterwards from the revolutionary tendencies of the age. It was finally abolished in consequence of a law passed by the Helvetic authorities, Sept. 17, 1798. Its last abbot was Pancratius Verster. Its series of learned men is closed by two of its ex-monks, Ildephons v. Arx, author of a history of the Canton of St. Gall; and Franz Weidmann, the historiographer of the abbey library.

Meyer von Knonau.—Reinecke.

Gallicanism. — By this term we denominate the spirit of the Gallican Church; and also, collectively, its usages, immunities, principles, and views; in themselves, and in their relations to Rome. The Gallican Church is not an antiquity. It is the Frankish Church perpetuated in its peculiar national position. The true Gallicanism is not a national church carried out to independence of Rome, nor an opposition to the papacy bordering on heresy and schism. It is that which from the beginning distinguishes the Cath. Church of France from every other. Its connexion with Irenæus proves that a Gallican ecclesiastical association existed as early as the end of the third cent.; and it claims, not that it was then out of the common order, but that it held the common position of the time, and that this position has been since maintained more purely in France than anywhere else.

It is undeniable that the form which the Gallo-Frankish Church attained under the influence of Charles the Great, and of the bishops, literati and schools of his time, is, as it were, the ideal, followed unanimously by its defenders, patrons, the princes and bishops in later times. Not that the Church had it always in mind; not that the national spirit used it always with the same energy against Rome. In the varying interests of centuries, now the crown swerved, now the episcopate. But with a powerful king, a bishop of free thought, a regular meeting of the representatives of the realm, or an able parliament, that ideal shone forth at once. Thus the grand and courageous position of Hinemar of Rheims is accounted for. Clearer, however, because more equable and mild, is the royal defender of the ideal, Louis IX. But his very mildness and equanimity secured his greater firmness. The true Gallican spirit of Louis appears with the greatest decision from the written ordinances of the years 1229, '39, and '70. The preamble to the first defines the "Libertés et immunités de l'Eglise gallicane." The second restricts excommunication, and subjects the clergy, in civil matters, to the civil courts. The third is the pragmatic sanction. It secures to the crown the right and the acknowledgment of the episcopal supremacy, as the general councils of the church define it. "And this," says Bossuet, "is what we mean by Libertés de l'Eglise gallicane. We wish only common justice, the true basis of all good order for the church, under the administration of the head of each diocese, according to the declarations of the councils and the institutions of the fathers."

Clearer and firmer stood forth this ideal continually. It was prominent in the conflict between Boniface VIII. and Philip IV. (see Art. Boniface VIII.). The weightiest matters were discussed there. For the nation, it was a question of nationality; for Boniface, in revenge on Philip IV., had, in a public address at the ratification of the office of the Roman Emperor Albrecht, placed the nation under the German Emperor. For the King, it was the important question of royal prerogative. For the kingdom, it was the serious question of taxation; since the Annates would require large sums from beyond the Alps. For the Church, it was a matter of deep concern; for its entire position with reference to the papacy was in danger from the new relation which Boniface proposed. And scarcely could a worse time have been chosen for such an aggression, than just when men of great spirit, splendid talents, and superior knowledge, treated everything with a masterly scrutiny, put all rights into definite forms, and insisted, no less perseveringly than clearly, in the lecture room, the pulpit and the council, on the superiority of the general councils over the Roman chair. And yet, resolute as were the French Kings, the Parliaments, the Episcopate, the Universities, and the Sorbonne itself at their head, not to recede from the principles laid down at Pisa, Constance and Basle, which were nothing else than pure Gallicanism, the Roman theologians could not omit any opportunity to commend their own in contrast, and to attempt anew their introduction into France.

Their only success was the famous abolition of the pragmatic sanction in 1516 by the Lateran Synod, with the consent of Francis I., in consequence of the concordat with Leo X. assigning to the crown the nomination of bishops. (See Art. Francis I.) But the causes of this reverse are well known to have been some personal aims of the King, and his chancellor's hope of obtaining the dignity of Cardinal. But the change was, after all, of little consequence. Gallicanism, being more excited, was from that time only the more energetic. The pragmatic sanction was, sure enough, abolished; but the three councils of which it was an epitome, continued to control the opinions of the nation and the position of the clergy. To the earlier decrees of the Church were soon added those of the Council of Trent, the full adoption of which would have been the death of Gallicanism; but France acknowledged only such of them as suited her own maxims of policy, her crown prerogatives, and her Church laws and customs.

The two successive Cardinals and Prime Ministers of Louis XIII. and Louis XIV., Richelieu and Mazarin, maintained the Concordat, like their predecessor Duperron. But how little Gallicanism lost by this, appears from the six famous declarations presented to the King by the Sorbonne on the 8th of May, 1663, of the following import: 1. It is not the doctrine of the faculty, that the Pope has any power over the temporal affairs of the King. 2. It is the doctrine of the faculty that, in temporal matters, the King acknowledges God alone as supreme. 3. It is the doctrine of the faculty that the subjects of the King owe him fealty and obedience, from which they can under no pretence be released. 4. The faculty do not approve certain propositions opposed to the power of the King, and the freedom of the Gallican Church, that the Pope can depose bishops contrary to the decrees of Councils. 5. It is not the doctrine of the Church, that the Pope is superior to an ecumenical Council. 6. It is no doctrine or dogma of the faculty that the Pope is infallible, except with the concurrence of the Church.

Thenceforward only these doctrines could be taught in the high schools, and the "Déclaration du clergé de France," was sent by Bossuet with a letter to the Pope himself. In vain did Alexander VIII. nullify the Declaration, and in a widely circulated letter, try to teach the French clergy better. The clergy persisted, though Louis XIV. descended to a step which was considered a retraction.—We have already said that the same maxims are still the fundamental law of the French Catholic Church, as they are of the French Empire. We only add that if Gallicanism finds itself yet only a minority in opposition to Rome, it is because the early ultramontanism has disappeared entirely from the Roman court. Especially is political ultramontanism totally extinct. Henceforth no reasonable Pontiff will think of claiming superiority to the royal or imperial crown. The pecuniary system is likewise gone; the old taxes will never more be thought of. The hierarchical feature can never disappear. So long as Popery maintains its character, and the French Church is Catholic, so long must the supremacy of the papal chair be upheld. Hence, since the favorite expression, National Church, is correct only in a narrow sense, there is here properly no independent National Church at all. Not even of an independent patriarchate, has Gallicanism said anything except when under high excitement. As for liturgical and even dogmatical ultramontanism, it is complained of in many quarters, in periodicals and pamphlets, nay, even by bishops, and the old Gallicanism invoked against it; but with a concurrence and effect all the less in proportion as people are disposed to agree with Rome in doctrine and liturgy, not to fear her lawless assaults, and to hope for support and authority from this internal unity against external, churchly, and hierarchical independence. On this account, for Gallicanism, as for ultra-montanism, the head is broken. But that the French nation, Church, clergy or worship, can ever become Italian, no one beyond the mountains hopes, and no one on this side fears. What Bossuet wrote to the Cardinal d'Estrées, is still true: "Trois points peuvent blesser les Romains; l'indépendance de la temporalité des rois; la juridiction épiscopale immédiatement de Jésus Christ; et l'autorité des conciles. Vous savez bien que sur ces trois choses on ne braise point en France." This is the genuine Gallicanism. All the rest is of no importance except in the heat of conflict. The principal works are those of Pithou (Pierre); and Dupuy, commentator on Pithou.

MATTER.—Y.

Gallienus (P. Licinius), son and successor of the Emperor Valerian, (A. D., 259–268); a man of by no means small capacity, but not suited to his time. Amidst great disorders in his empire he spent his time in ease and luxury. His government is of marked importance for the Church, from his having ordered free indulgence towards it at the very beginning. He took less interest than Valerian in preserving the established religion, published an edict allowing the Christians the free exercise of their religion, and directed that their burying-grounds and other property which had been confiscated under the previous reign should be restored to them. This edict is recorded by Eusebius VII., 3. Gallienus was murdered by his own soldiers on the 20th of March, 268. The accounts of him are so incomplete, and so much from later writers, that an accurate chronological statement of the events of his reign cannot be given.

DR. PRESSEL.—Y.

Gallium, a district which, according to Is. 10: 30, must have been situated not far from Jerusalem, northward, and on the way of the Assyrians towards the city. RÜRTSCH.—Y.

Gallion (Γαλιών), Gallio, provincial governor of Achaia, residing at Corinth, under the Emperor Claudius, A. D. 53, 54. His proper name was Marcus Annæus Novatus. As adopted child of the orator Junius Gallio, he received the name of Junius Annæus Gallio. In the case of the Apostle Paul, he gave an example of firmness and dignity, in refusing to recognise religious disputes before a secular court. Having voluntarily resigned his place in Achaia, he was put to death at the command of Nero.

VAHINGER.—Y.

Gallus, Vibius Trebonianus, Roman Emperor, A. D. 251–253. On his accession it appeared first as if the Christians, so cruelly persecuted by his predecessor Decius, might expect a season of repose. But a deadly plague, which, having broken out in the preceding reign, gradually spread through the whole empire, and drought and famine in many districts, enraged the populace, as usual, against the Christians. There came out an imperial requisition that all Roman subjects should sacrifice to the gods to procure deliverance. When the Christians refused obedience to this edict, the persecution began. Corbalius, who, at the peril of his life, had accepted the office of bishop in Rome, under Decius, was first proscribed, then condemned to death. Lucius, his successor in the episcopate became soon his successor also in proscription and martyrdom. Gallus was so occupied by wars and insurrections, that he did not push the persecution into all the provinces; and by these tumults, which resulted in his assassination in the summer of 253, the Christians at length obtained universal rest and peace. DR. PRESSEL.—Y.

Gallus.—The man known by this name from the middle of the 8th cent., is properly called Gallon, Gallun, or Gilian. He was born about the year 560, in Ireland, and belonged to a respectable family. He was placed early under the tuition of Columban in the Bangor monastery. With his teacher and eleven other pupils, monks of Bangor, he left his country in 590 to labor for the conversion of the heathen in the distant East. They stopped however among the Franks and Burgundians; and Columban made an effective beginning of his missionary operations. He was interrupted in 610, and went into the region of the Alps. Gallus now became prominent, from being able to preach in the language of the people, which Columban could not do. He labored with great zeal to Christianize the people, and to lead them into the Romish Church. After long and energetic labor in company with Columban, and under his direction, he availed himself of an occasion to separate from his leader, and take his own course. In 614 he founded the monastery of St. Gall (see Art.), which grew to princely wealth and dignity, made the name of its founder illustrious in the following centuries, and did important service to religion and the Church, besides much in memorable ways for the culture of the sciences. He enjoined the strictest monastic discipline on those who placed themselves under his superintendence. Beyond what is mentioned above we have few reliable accounts concerning Gallus; not anything certain even as to the time of his death. Several things are related which are worthy of little credit, as to his working miracles, particularly the healing of his daughter who was possessed of an evil spirit; also concerning his being appointed Bishop of Constance, and the great influence of the See of Constance over the Abbey of St. Gall. There was a life of St. Gallus prepared by Walafred Strabo from an older work, written perhaps by Winithar, A. D. 766. See also Pertz, Archiv. IV., 328, &c.

ALBRECHT VOGEL.—Y.

Gamaliel, an eminent Pharisee, held equally in honor by the Jewish Synagogue and the Christian Church; by the Synagogue, as the worthy grandson of the great Hillel, and as a doctor of the law in highest repute with all the people; by the Church, as the early instructor of the Apostle Paul, and as the author of a prudent decision concerning Christianity (Acts 5: 34–39). So great was his legal eminence, that he received the appellation, "the glory of the law." The title Rabban (our teacher), was first conferred on him. It was committed to him to fix the yearly calendar, the reckoning of feast days, &c., and he is said to have presided over the Sanhedrin, under Tiberius, Caius, and Claudius. The 18th year after the destruction of Jerusalem is mentioned as the year of his death. In the Talmud he is distinguished as "the elder" from his son or grandson. PRESSER.—Y.

Gangra, anciently distinguished as the capital of the Kings of Paphlagonia, and subsequently as an Episcopal See, and especially as the place where the Council against Eustathius, B. of Sebaste (see Art.), was held (c. 362–370). Its canons were important for Protestantism, because they denied justification by works, especially by monastic asceticisms (see WALCH, Luthers sämmtl. Schr., XVI., p. 2533). These canons were twenty in number (see them in MANSI, Sacr. Concil. nova et ampliss. collectio T., II., 1097, &c.; 1101, &c.), in which as many ascetic rules and customs were condemned as fanatical. Among other things Eustathius and his adherents were accused of refusing to pray or to receive the sacrament in the houses of married people, and of affirming that no rich person could get to heaven. The Council condemned E. and his peculiar views. (See SCHLWIG, Exercit. in conc. Gangrense: Danzig, 1721. Chr. W. F. WALCH, Entw. einer vollst. Hist. d. Ketzerien, III.: Lpz., 1766, p. 536–577).

NEUDECKER.*

Gardens (among the Jews) are often mentioned in the Bible, for they were, as elsewhere in the East, much esteemed by the Jews. They were not only connected with the palaces of Kings (Eccles. 2:5; 2 Kings 25:4; Neh. 3:15; Esth. 1:5), but plain citizens also had them connected with houses (Suzan. 4; Luke 13:19), as is known, e. g., there were very many in Babel (Jer. 50:16; Diod. 2, 7; see the Art. Babel), although later none were allowed in Jerusalem (Lightfoot, centur. chorogr., before the horis ad Ec. Matth. cap. 21, et horæ ad Matth. 26:36), but there were many without the gates, especially in the valley of Gihon (Jos. B. J., 5, 2, 2). These gardens (גִּיּוֹן and גִּיּוֹן properly enclosure) were of different kinds; partly vegetable (גִּיּוֹן הַיֵּרֵק), herb, and fruit gardens for the use of man (Deut. 11:10; Jer. 29:5; Amos 4:9; 9:14; 1 Kings 21:2), partly proper pleasure gardens or parks (Suzan. 7; Songs of Sol. 6:2), in which forest-trees and groves of cypress, laurel, pomegranate, fig, nut-trees, etc., alternated with meadows and flower-beds. Such parks, called by the non-Hebrew name גִּיּוֹן, were often very large, and served as a hunting-ground, e. g., for the Persian nobles (Xenoph. Cyrop., 1, 3, 12 (14); Anab., 1, 2, 7; Hellen., 4, 1, 15; see besides, Songs of Sol. 4:13; Eccl. 2:5; Neh. 2:8). The flowers which were cultivated in them, if less various than in our modern gardens, were not small in number or variety, particularly lilies, roses, and all kinds of odoriferous shrubs, as cypress (al-henna, especially native in Egypt, Hitzig, on Songs of Sol. 1:14), nard, balsam, saffron, etc., and some exotic plants (comp. the figure, Jes. 17:8), see Songs of Sol. 4:12, sq.; 5:1; 6:2, 11. In such enclosed pleasure groves there were also baths (Suzan v. 15; comp. 2 Sam. 11:2), and generally great care was taken to have these places well irrigated, either by locating them upon running streams, or by conveying water to and through them by artificial arrangements (Isaiah 1:30; 58:11; Jer. 31:12; Songs of Sol. 4:15; Eccl. 2:6; Deut. 24:6, etc.). Kings and the wealthy made their family vaults in gardens (2 Kings 21:18, 26; Matt. 27:60; John 19:41). The worship of idols was also especially practised in groves and gardens (Isa. 1:29; 57:5; 65:3; 66:17; hence the so frequently recurring remark: they burnt incense under every green tree, 1 Kings 14:23; 2 Kings 16:4, etc.). On the other hand, our Saviour frequently retired for prayer to a garden on the Mount of Olivet, Matt. 26:36; John 18:1. — (See besides, v. Lengerke, Kanaan, I., p. 89, sq.; Winer, Real-Wört.-Buch.; Pauzy's Realencykl., III., p. 1505, sq.; and Tenffel, the same, V., p. 1158, sq.; Tobler, Denkbl. aus Jerus. p. 94, sq. RÜTSCHI. — Heck.

Gardiner, Stephen, the natural son of Lionel Woodville, B. of Salisbury (brother of the wife of Edward IV.), was born in 1483 at St. Edmund's Bury, Suffolk, and, though possessed of no very elevated character, had superior natural talents. He studied at Cambridge, and distinguished himself for his attainments in canon and civil law, and the Greek language and literature, but never excelled in theology. He became the secretary of Cardinal Wolsey, and a member of the commission sent by Henry VIII. to the Pope to negotiate a divorce from Catharine. Gardiner succeeded in having Campeggio sent to England as papal legate, to settle the matter. In 1529, Gardiner, who had returned with Campeggio, was made a member of the King's council, and as such actively labored to bring about the divorce, even forcing Oxford to decide in favor of it. Thus he gained great favor with Henry, who appointed G. as his substitute in the conference between the Pope and the King of France (1533), and then bestowed on him the See of Winchester. G. gratefully became one of the most zealous advocates of the royal supremacy in eccl. affairs, and most active promoters of the schism. Personally, however, he firmly adhered to the Romish C., and even took part in a scheme for retaining old customs and traditions, and resisting innovations. At the same time he continued, by flattery and protestations of fidelity, to hold the favor of Henry. He lay under the reproach of secretly favoring Rome, for he strove to thwart Cromwell's schemes, promoted his downfall, prevented the union of England with the German Protestants, and had his spies out who reported to him secret Protestants, that he might procure their condemnation. In all this he managed to screen himself by making it a rule never to appear as the originator of an eccl. measure, and to do nothing without the King's approval or command. But towards the close of Henry's reign his influence declined. His hostility to Cranmer estranged the King; his participation with London in the overthrow of Cranmer, caused him to fall in the public estimation; his obvious effort to ruin the Queen, offended her husband. The King even erased his name from the list of the commission who were to manage the government during his successor's minority. To the remonstrance of the Rom. Catholics Henry replied: "Gardiner would involve you all in trouble, for he has a restless revengeful spirit."—After Henry's death he zealously resisted the reformatory measures, and was cast into prison for some weeks. His continued opposition led to his deposition and second imprisonment (1551). Under Mary, when Romish Catholicism was restored, he was released, and again became prominent. He regained his See, and was made Chancellor of the realm. Now he took his turn at persecution. But he counselled the Queen to exercise eccl. supremacy for a time, in order more effectually to promote the restoration. Finding that persecution was making him unpopular, he made Bonner his executioner. He had the gratification of surviving the martyrdom of Latimer and Ridley. He died in Oct., 1555.—(See WEBER, Gesch. d. akathol. Kirchen u. Sekten in Grossbritt. 1. Th., 1845; 2. Th., 1853.—Biogr. Britt.) HERZOG.*

Garments and Jewels of the Hebrews.—The collective name for garments in Hebrew is, ser melon. partis pro toto, מִלְּבָשִׁים pl. of מִלְּבָשִׁים = the upper garment, covering, used sometimes for a cover at night (Ex. 22 : 27; Amos 2 : 8, &c.); מִלְּבָשִׁים also designates a garment (Levit. 19 : 8; Ps. 109 : 18, &c.); and in poetry, and of more splendid apparel מִלְּבָשִׁים (Job 24 : 7, 10, &c.; Esther 6 : 9, &c.).

I. In Genesis we learn that in the earliest times, both animal and vegetable materials were used for garments; the former prior to the latter. Wool and goatshair were woven into garments in the age of the patriarchs; flax is first named in the time of Moses (Gen. 31 : 19; 38 : 12, &c.; Exod. 9 : 31). According to 1 Chron. 4 : 21, a family of the tribe of Judah devoted itself to the cultivation of flax (ROSELL, mon. civ., I., 333, q.; WILKINSON, III., 137, &c.), especially to the making of linen. How early cotton was introduced is not ascertained. מִלְּבָשִׁים and מִלְּבָשִׁים

hence byssus), stand promiscuously for linen and cotton; etymologically they designate whiteness (1 Chron. 15 : 27, &c.; Esth. 1 : 6; 8 : 15; 1. Prov. 31 : 22). Their traffic with the Egyptians (see Egypt), renders it likely that the patriarchs indulged variety, not only in jewels, but in garments (Gen. 24 : 22, 30, 53; 37 : 3). Joseph's coat may have excelled not only in colors, but in its cut (מִלְּבָשִׁים פְּסָתָהּ=garment of the ends, reaching to the ends of the arms and legs; extended garments). The Egyptian priests wore fine white linen (or cotton, CHAMOLL, Figéac, Egypte anc., V., 192, &c.) garments (Gen. 41 : 42); they were forbidden to wear wool, or any dress made of animal material (HEROD., II., 37. On the linen worn by Jewish priests see next Art.). In all ages and among all people white garments, on account of their brilliancy and cleanliness, were held in high esteem, and considered emblems of light, fortune, purity, and holiness (cf. Jos. B. J., II., 1). Variegated, purple and red, purple and blue, and scarlet raiment were common among the Sidonians, Phoenicians, Canaanites, Assyrians, Babylonians, and Persians, and were the usual decoration of kings, nobles, and warriors (Judges

5 : 30; 8 : 26; Esther 8 : 15, &c., &c.; cf. ARRIAN, var. hist., 6, 6). Garments ornamented with gold threads are named in Ex. 39 : 3; Ps. 45 : 10, 14, &c.; cf. VING., Aen. I., 646, &c.; XI., 72). Concerning the red and blue purple, and the yellow colors of the Phoenicians (Ezek. 27 : 16, 24; VING., Georg. III., 307; TIB., II., 3, 58; PLIN., XXI., 22), and Lydians (see HARTMANN, Hebräer I., 367, &c.; HEEREN, Ueber d. Kunst d. Buntweberei Id. I., 2, 88, &c.; BOCHART, hieroz., III., 665, &c.; BRAUN, vest. sacr. hebr., § 171–217). Silk is first mentioned in Rev. 18 : 12; some think even in Ezek. 16 : 10, 13. PLINY, H. N., 6, 20, says that half silk garments were brought from E. Asia to Greece, and that there the silk threads were drawn out and woven into entirely silk cloth (SCHRÖDER, vest. mul., 320, &c.). But it is doubtful whether this applies to the time of Ezekiel.—The Mosaic law ordered: 1) that garments of linen and wool mixed (מִלְּבָשִׁים מִלְּבָשִׁים, from the Coptic [so GESENIUS and others] schont-nes = byssus fimbriatus, or from the Semit. (so BOCH., hieroz., I., 486). MEIER, derives it from מִלְּבָשִׁים = to mix) should not be worn (Levit. 19 : 19, &c.; cf. Jos. Ant., IV., 8, 20); not because priests wore such mixed apparel (Jos. Ant., IV., 8, 11), nor as a moral symbol to show that God desired undivided love, and that Israel should not mingle with the heathen, but because all confusion of kinds, all departures from simplicity were evil. 2) Priests should wear linen garments. The colored threads in them were hardly of wool (Jos. Ant., IV., 8, 11), but of flax or cotton (see Ezek. 44 : 17).

II. The form of the garments. 1) Those worn by both sexes differed but little; those worn by women were somewhat longer and more variegated. The prohibition, Deut. 22 : 5, was probably directed against an Egyptian and Cyprian custom, though it is in harmony with the general prohibition of improper mixtures (comp. MAIMON., more neboch., 3, 27; MICHAELIS, Mos. Recht, IV., 349, &c.; PEZOLD, de promiscua vest., &c.: Lips., 1702, in Ugol. thes., XXIX.; CREUZER, Symb. II., 34; MOVERS, Phön., I., 455, &c.).—2) Generally garments are made full in the East, on account of the heat, and this was the style among ancient Hebrews, for 3) in this, as in other respects, custom has undergone but slight changes in the Orient. As we have no reliable Hebrew relics, the best evidence of their mode of dress is obtained from that existing among modern Bedouins. Intercourse with other nations gradually led to ornamental and luxurious additions to the original simplicity of style, especially in the times of the later kings (Is. 3 : 16, &c.; Jer. 4 : 30, &c.). Hence frequent reproofs of extravagance in dress (Is. 50 : 9; 51 : 6, 8, &c.). This was the state of things in the time of Christ and the apostles (1 Tim. 2 : 9; 1 Pet. 3 : 3; James 5 : 2).

III. The various articles of apparel used. The full dress of 1) a man included: a) nether garment מִלְּבָשִׁים, LXX. χιτών, by transposition tunica. It was a sort of shirt made of woollen, linen, or cotton cloth, woven whole, and striped, and worn next to the skin, to which it fitted more closely than the upper garments. At first it was made without arms, but afterwards wider or narrower arms were added; it usually reached to the knees, later, when worn by more notable persons, to the ankles. As the aprons of our first parents were succeeded by garments made of the skins of animals, so this took the place of that simplest of all garbs called, by the Arabs, ihram, and which is still used by them in Hedjas (Niebuhr, Beschr. v. Ar., 364; comp. T. 15, R. I., 268; T. 54, II., 132). As the figures on the ruins of Persepolis attest, the hosen of Dan. 3 : 21, 27, were a Perso-Mede costume (Strabo, XV., 734; Herod., V., 49; Xen., Cyr. VIII., 3, 13).—A girdle fastened the under-dress around the loins. He who only wore the under-dress was said to be γυμνός, John 21 : 7 (see also 1 Sam. 19 : 24; comp. 2 Sam. 6 : 20; Isa. 20 : 2; 58 : 7; Job 22 : 6; 24 : 7, 10). Fine linen shirts were regarded as luxuries by the Philistines (Judges 14 : 12), and afterwards by the Hebrews (Isa. 3 : 23; Prov. 31 : 24). Saalschütz supposes יִרְדָּ—which does not correspond to our shirt, as Schröder tries to show—to denote a fine linen, or woollen garment used as a mantle, which a person threw around him at night, Mark 14 : 51, or for enwrapping corpses, Matt. 27 : 59; Mark 16 : 4, 6; Luke 13 : 53. This gown, without arms, and with an opening at the top for the head, at first worn only by nobles (Job 1 : 20; 2 : 12), by Kings (1 Sam. 15 : 27; 18 : 4; 24 : 5, 12; 1 Chron. 15 : 27; Ezek. 26 : 16), and by priests, became in the time of Jesus a common article of dress, though even then regarded as a luxury (Matt. 10 : 10; Luke 3 : 11); it was the usual costume of Persians and Babylonians, and later borrowed by the Greeks and Romans. Concerning the Ephod, see Art. 6) The upper-dress, a wide cloak with folds, variant in material, color, and figure, originally a mere square piece of cloth about 6 ells long and 3 wide (comp. Shaw, 196; Niebuhr B. 62, R. I., 126, T. 29; Chardin, II., p. 100, T. 64). Its Hebrew name may be found in Gen. 37 : 29; 39 : 12; Gen. 9 : 23; 37, 33; 44 : 13; Jos. 7 : 6; 9 : 5; Exod. 22 : 8; Micha 2 : 8; Deut. 22 : 12. Of large size, it might be wrapped round the body several times (1 Kings 11 : 29; Ps. 104, 2), its two opposite ends hanging over the arms towards the body, and the garment with its two other extremities from the back, or, the cloak being put on the left shoulder, the hindmost end was drawn over the back, and the foremost over the breast and the abdomen; both being tied, or fastened by clasps. The head also might be covered with it, 2 Sam. 15 : 30; 1 Kings 19 : 13; Esth. 6 : 12. As it served for a cover by night, it was not lawful to retain it over night for debt, Deut. 22 : 17, 25; 24 : 12; Exod. 22 : 27; comp. Ruth 3 : 9; Ezek. 16 : 8; 18 : 7, 16; Job 22 : 6; 24 : 7, 10; Amos 2 : 8. The fold on the breast served for a pouch or bag in which were carried grain, bread, meat, Exod. 12 : 34; Ruth 3 : 15; 2 Kings 4 : 39; Hagg. 2 : 12; Luke 6 : 38. When not worn, it was used for a vessel, sack (Prov. 30 : 4; Judges 8 : 25; 1 Sam. 21 : 9), saddle (Matt. 21 : 7), curtain, tent-cover, sail, hammock (2 Kings 9 : 13; Matt. 21 : 8). Laid 24 : 18; Mark 10 : 50; John 13 : 4, 12; Acts 7 : 58; 22 : 23). A particular kind of mantle is denoted by מִטְנֶה, Micah 2 : 8 (see 1 Kings 19 : 13, 19; Zach. 13 : 4; Gen. 25 : 25), originally not so much an ornamental as a plain dress made of skins of animals, but, in the course of time, a highly-wrought fur-cloak worn by Assyrian kings and nobles (Jonah 3 : 6), and Babylonians (Josh. 6 : 21), and in our day by the Orientals (Arvieux, III., 240; Russell, Nat.-G. von Aleppo I., 127; Niebuhr, R. I., 158; II., 235, 317; Rauhwolf, R., 209). The figures on the ruins of Persepolis are clothed with sheep-skin fur, the wool on the outside (Chardin, voy. II., 144 t. 58; comp. III., 245). For Chald. name of mantle see Dan. 3 : 21, and in Esther 8 : 15, for that of a king of the Medes. In the Apoc. and New Test. are mentioned garments used by the Greeks and Romans. The χλαμύς, Greek military cloak, 2 Mucc. 12 : 35, fastened to the breast or right side, and reaching to the knees, the χλαμύς πορφυρή, Matt. 27 : 28, crimson-colored, worn by Roman emperors, generals and officers, and the παλῶνς, 2 Tim. 4 : 13, a travelling cloak, with a cap for the head. Lamprid., Alex. Lev. 27. Sueton. in Cal. 52, Cic. p. Mil. C. 20, Juv., 5, 78. Senec., ep. 87. Hor., ep. 1, 11, 18. Stosch de pallio Pauli : Lugd., 1709.

2) For women a) an under-dress, the כְּתוֹנֶת, Song of Solomon 5 : 3, over which was worn by the more noble "a garment of divers colors," 2 Sam. 13 : 18. b) As upper-garment, besides the common מִטְנֶה, Deut. 21 : 13; 22 : 5, different kinds of mantillas, or styles of that just mentioned, as, e. g., in Isaiah 3 : 22, veils (Isa. 3 : 23) without which ventured in public only slaves, Isa. 47 : 2, common women, professed singers (Niebuhr, R. I., 184; II., 162), and prostitutes. (Not in earlier times, Gen. 38 : 15). According to Oriental custom (Koran 33, 56), in the presence of strangers, the wife also wore a veil in her own house, which was only removed before her nearest relatives with whom marriage was forbidden. The מַעֲלָה, Isa. 3 : 19, = a veil from the head by the temples, leaving room for the eyes; מַעֲלָה, Song of Sol. 4 : 1, 3; 6 : 6; Isa. 47 : 2, = the veil covering breast, neck, and chin, and מַעֲלָה (Gen. 24 : 65; 38 : 14, 19) = a veil covering which, fastened behind the head, fell over the neck and might be thrown around the whole body. As among the ancient Hebrews women enjoyed greater freedom, the custom of the Orientals of our day cannot be taken as a criterion of the styles of veils. Rebecca travelled unveiled, and Tamar veiled herself, not from modesty, but from opposition to the previous practice. The pants of the Eastern women of our day (Niebuhr R. I., 304, 336, T. 59, 64) were unknown to Hebrew antiquity, otherwise they would have been mentioned in Isa. 3 : 16. The מַעֲלָה in Isa. 3 : 23 = vestes pellucidae, which concealed, as it were, the whole body, according to Chald. Vulg. Gesen. and A. Spiegel.

IV. To a full dress, in a wider sense, beonged 1) covering for the head, the turban used by the Orientals of our day as well as by the ancient Hebrews, for men and women, made of different stuff and in various styles, sometimes a mere cloth wrapped round the head, sometimes of very costly and splendidly wrought material, some made high and pointed, others round; called, when highly ornamented, כִּסְיָאֵל (Isa. 3 : 20; 61 : 3, 10; Ezek. 4 : 17, 23). The hooded turbans were tied round the head by means of a clasp fastened at the back part of the head (Exod. 29 : 9; Lev. 1 : 13; Jon. 2 : 6; Ezek. 16 : 10). The present Orientals wind them about with fine muslin (Niebuhr, R. I., T. 14-23). Kings wore the liadem, and warriors the קִבֵּעַ כֹּבֵעַ. It was only in-doors that the turban was taken off. 2) Gloves, an article of luxury, unknown to Hebrew antiquity. The Talmud (Mischn. Chel., 6, 6; 24, 15; 26, 3) mentions כִּסְיָאֵל, worn by laborers, and the Targ. on Ruth

1 : 7, of נִרְתָּק taken off by one who yielded the rights of a brother-in-law. 3) Covering for the feet. The נַעֲלִים, Am. 2 : 6; 8 : 6, נַעֲלוֹת only in Josh. 9 : 5 — like the Greek, πδηματα, sandalia —, were leather soles fastened to the foot by two straps (Gen. 14 : 23; Isa. 5 : 27; Mark 1 : 7; Luke 3 : 16), to be seen on figures of Persepolis (Niebuhr, R. II., 132, T. 23, 6; B. 63, T. 2; Harmar, Beob. III., 304), and still used in the East. The nobles had slaves to put them on and off (Ezek. 24 : 17; Deut. 25 : 9; Isa. 20 : 2; Ruth 4 : 7; Exod. 3 : 5; Josh. 5 : 15), and to carry them (Matt. 23 : 11; Mark 1 : 7; John 1 : 27; Acts 13 : 25). Scholars thought it an honor to do the same offices for their teachers (comp. Talm. kiddusch. 2, 2; Ch. W. Volland, de sandaligerulis Hebr. : Viteb., 1712). On entering a room, and holy places, they were put off, on leaving, put on, Exod. 12 : 11; Acts 12 : 8; Exod. 3 : 5; Josh. 5 : 15. To go bare-footed was a sign of mourning, 2 Sam. 15 : 30; Ezek. 24 : 17, 23; Isa. 60 : 2. The women in particular, frequently ornamented them, Song of Sol. 7 : 1; Judith 10 : 4; 16 : 9. The שַׁחֲמַיִם were, according to Jesen. and others, of seal-leather, still used for shoes by the Arabs. The Phoenicians (Virg. Aen., I., 336), Babylonians, and Persians (Xen. Cyr. 8, 1, 41; Strabo, XV., 734; XVI., 746), after the Greeks and Romans, wore proper shoes with upper leather, also half boots, according to Persian inscrip. (Niebuhr, R. II., 30; T. 22; Rev. Porter, trav. I., T. 39). Shoemakers are mentioned in the Talmud (compare Bynæi, de calceis vet. Hebr. in Ugolini thes., XXIX. Rottböll, de vest. et calceis Isr. : Iafn., 1755). 4) Ornaments, particularly of women. Bracelets worn not only by these, but by men (2 Sam. 1 : 10; Numb. 31 : 50), as marks of distinction, probably on the left arm, Sir. 21 : 23; of various styles, size (often from the wrist to the elbow), cost, and construction (gold, silver, an ivory ring fastened by a buckle of pearls and jewels, or gold chains, Isa. 3 : 19; Schröder, l. c., p. 56), perhaps, as is the case now with the Bedouin tribes, a simple ring of precious metal without a clasp, and so arranged that the ends turned towards each other might be drawn apart. They were also used as amulets (comp. Bartholin, de armillis vet. : Amst., 1626. Niebuhr, R. I., 164). So, too, the ear-rings, as attested by Jonathan on Gen. 35 : 4; Maimonides, idol. 7, 10; Augustin, ep. 73; made (Gen. 35 : 4; Exod. 32 : 2; Judges 8 : 24) of horn or metal, smaller or larger, sometimes one, sometimes several (Mod. Travel. count from 15-20. Arvieux, Nachr. III., 250. Wellsted, R. I., 224. Russegger, II., 2, 180. Niebuhr, R., 164, B. 65), generally worn by women and children, but seldom by men. Strings of pearls were hung from them, Judges 8 : 26; Isa. 3 : 19 (Schröder, l. c., p. 45). Nose-rings, Gen. 24 : 22, 47; Isa. 3 : 21; Ezek. 16 : 12; Prov. 11 : 22, of precious metal or ivory (perhaps, also, worn by men, Job 42 : 11; Ex. 35 : 22; comp. Russegger, II., 2, 180), so constructed as to inclose the mouth. The Talmud allowed women, on the Sabbath, only ear, not nose rings (Arvieux, Nachr. III., 252; Harmar, III., 310; Marili, R., 216; Niebuhr, B., 65; Hartmann, Hebr., II., 166, 292; Schröder, contrary, 187). Finger-rings were worn by Egyptians and Persians (Gen. 41 : 42; Esth. 3 : 10; 8 : 2) as seals (see 1 Mac. 6 : 15; Curtius 10, 5, 4; Jos. Ant., 20, 2, 3), and used by the Hebrews as marks of honor, (Jer. 22 : 24; Hag. 2 : 24; comp. Luke 15 : 23), worn by women (Isa. 3 : 21; M. Schabb. 6, 1, 3; Sola, 1, 6), known in the Patriarchal times (Chardin, IV., 23; V., 454; Robinson, I., 58; G. Longus, de annul. signat. : Mail., 1615). Collars were worn by the Israelites, Exod. 35 : 22, and Midianites, Numb. 31 : 50. For names and styles, see Gen. 41 : 42; Ezek. 16 : 11; Prov. 1 : 9; Song of Sol. 4 : 9; also by camels, Judges 8 : 26; Prov. 25 : 12; Song of Sol. 7 : 2; Hosea 2 : 15. In Prov. 25 : 12, a neck-chain of purest gold. The סְרָסְרָיִם were neck-laces of precious stones, pearls, corals, Song of Sol. 1 : 10, with various ornaments pendant, Isa. 3 : 18; LXX. μνηστροι, lunulae Tertull. cult. fem., 2, 10 (also, on the necks of camels, Judges 8 : 21, 26); also, scent-boxes, olfactoriola, Isa. 3 : 20, amulets in form of small serpents. סְרָסְרָיִם were small suns, Isa. 3 : 18, worn as medallions. Among the Persians and Medes (Xen. Cyr., 1, 3, 2, 2, 4, 6; Anab., 1, 5, 8; Curt., 3, 3, 13; Strabo, 4, 197) nobles and warriors wore necklaces. See Dan. 5 : 7; 16 : 29; comp. Xen. Anab., 1, 2, 27; Cyr., 8, 5, 18. Finally, in the East, both in ancient and modern times, ornaments about the feet were peculiar to women, Isa. 3 : 18; Judges 10 : 3, πεποφύρα, so arranged that, in walking, they made a tinkling sound, the object of which was either to warn off or to attract men, or to accustom the wearer to a graceful gait, or to protect the hymen (see Talm. tr. Sabb. f., 63, 2. MICHAEL. mos. R. II., 156. C. G. Blumberg, de סְרָסְרָיִם : Lips., 1683, in Ugol. thes., XXIX. Schröder, de vest. mul., p. 1-17, 116-130). — The bride decorated herself with these articles of dress (Isa. 61 : 10; Ps. 45 : 10; Esth. 2 : 12); also, prostitutes (Judges 10 : 4; Bar. 6 : 8; comp. Rev. 17 : 4). In mourning all ornaments were laid aside, Exod.

23 : 4; 2 Sam. 1 : 24; Isa. 3 : 17, 24; Ezech. 24 : 17. For further information see Hartmann's Hebräerin am Putztisch.

V. Clothes were made by the women, 1 Sam. 2 : 19; Prov. 31 : 22; Acts 9 : 39, and cleansed by the lye of vegetable or mineral alkali. Tailors first mentioned in Talmud. For purification of infected garments (see Leprosy).

VI. Peculiar customs.—1) To denote intense sorrow, indignation, fright, &c., the upper-dress was torn, Gen. 37 : 29; Lev. 10 : 6; 13 : 45; 21 : 10; Gen. 37 : 29; Judges 11 : 35; 2 Sam. 1 : 2, 11; 3 : 31; 13 : 31; 1 Kings 21 : 27; 2 Kings 5 : 8, &c.; Matt. 26 : 65; Acts 14 : 14—but not by the high-priest, Lev. 21 : 10. The rabb. law (Mischna, moed katon, 3, 7; Schabb., 13, 3) contains minute regulations, see Othon., Lex. rabb., p. 360: laceratio vestium fieri potest excepto pallio extero et interula in omnibus reliquis vestis partibus, etiamsi decem essent, sed vix ultra palmæ longitudinem lacerant. Laceratio, quæ propter parentes fit, nunquam resuitur, quæ autem propter alios, post trigesimum diem. Lepers were required to tear them, Lev. 13 : 45. J. G.

Heidenus, de scissione vestium Ebr. ac gentib. usit.: Jen., 1663. Wichmannshausen, de lacer. vest. ap. Hebr.: Viteb., 1716. 2) Deep mourning was denoted also by the wearing of caaxos (Gen. 37 : 34; 2 Sam. 3 : 31; 1 King 20 : 31, &c.; Matt. 11 : 21; Rev. 6 : 12), shape of a sack, without arms, of coarse stuff and black goat hair (Isa. 50 : 3), a rope round the loins (Isa. 3 : 24; 2 Sam. 3 : 31), worn by both sexes (Joel 1 : 8; 2 Macc. 3 : 15). Widows wore it (Gen. 38 : 14, 19), also prophets (Isa. 20 : 2), and rough, hairy cloaks (1 Kings 19 : 13, 19, &c.; Matt. 3 : 4; 7 : 15; Hebrews 11 : 37) in testimony of the sins of the people. Criminals appeared before court in filthy garbs, Zach. 3 : 3; comp. Isa. 64 : 6. Among the Greeks (Eurip. Alcest., 440; Crest., 458; Helen., 1088) and Romans (Ovid Met., 6, 568; Tac. ann., III., 2) atræ vestes were customary.

3) White garments were worn on festival days (J. Schmidt, de usu vest. alb. in Ugol. thes. XXIX.); and on celebrated occasions, marriages (Matt. 22 : 11), social-banquets, &c. (Olearius, pers. R.-B., IV., 280; Tavernier, I., 207, 272)—rich-apparel (Ezek. 27 : 24), holiday-attire (Isa. 3 : 22), changes of raiment as is still done (2 Kings 5 : 6, 22; Judges 14 : 12, 19; Gen. 45 : 22; Odyss., VIII., 249; XIV., 514). Kings and nobles had a wardrobe of splendid dresses (2 Kings 10 : 22) for presents (Gen. 45 : 22, &c.; Matt. 22 : 11; Luke 15 : 22); clothes were also taken as spoils of war (Judges 5 : 30; 2 Kings 7 : 8), and divided by the victors as gifts (2 Sam. 1 : 24). Such were the garments eaten by the moths, Matt. 6 : 19; James 5 : 2. Bokhteri, a celebrated Arab. poet, had received so many presents of clothing that he left behind him, on his death, 100 whole garments, 200 shirts, and 500 turbans. Frequent changes, and washing, are peculiar to the Orientals (Niebuhr, R. I., 182; Burkhardt, Arab., 272; Harmer, II., 112; III., 447; Rosenm., Morgenl. III., 49)—a custom rendered necessary among the Israelites by the Levitical uncleannesses (Gen. 35 : 2; Exod. 19 : 10, 14, &c.; particularly Zach. 3 : 4). 4) The Orientals were fond of saturating their clothes with sweet smelling oils, incense, and wood (comp. Gen. 27 : 15, 27; Ps. 45 : 9; comp. Plato Symp., I., 6, 1; Odyss., V., 264; XXI., 52. 5) Homage was evinced by the spreading of the upper-garment on the way (2 Kings 9 : 13; Matt. 21 : 8; comp. Talm. Chetub., 66, 2). 6) Religion impressed its marks on clothes. The תפילין (zaphrentes, Matt. 9 : 20; 14 : 36; 23 : 5), were purple-blue fringes by the size of which the Pharisees symbolized the amount of their piety. See Matt. 9 : 20; comp. 14 : 36; Luke 8 : 44 (Hiller, de Hebr. vestib. fimbriatis: Tüb., 1701)¹. The Persians also used them (Niebuhr, R. II., 130, 150, T. 22, 30). 7) The shaking of raiment in one's presence denoted intense aversion, Acts 18 : 6. 8) Changing of clothes with another was a token of great friendship, 1 Sam. 18 : 4. 9) Persons elected to office were invested with the official dress, Gen. 41 : 42; Esth. 8 : 15; Dan. 5 : 29. 10) The cutting of one's garments, denoted great disgrace, 1 Chron. 20 : 4. With the Romans those condemned to death were stripped, the clothes (spolia suntuum) falling to the soldiers who performed the execution, Matt. 27 : 35.

Monographies: SCHRÖDER, Comm. philos. crit. de vest. mulier. hebr. ad Jes., III., 16-24: Lugd. Batav., 1745. A. T. HARTMANN, Hebräerin am Putztische: Amst., 1809, 3 vols. UGOLINO, thesaur. t. XXIX., Archæol., by Jahn, häusl. Alterth., II. p. 61-166. DE WETTE, p. 157-164. SAALSCHÜTZ, I., 3-32. GSENIUS, Comm. zu Jesaj., III., 16, and thesaurus. WINER, Realwörterbuch unter Kleidung, Mantel, Schleier, &c.

LEYRER. — Ermentrout.

Garments, holy, among the Hebrews.—Chief passages, Exod. 28 : 1-53; 39 : 1-31. These will afford us the right point of view from which to contemplate them. They were intended to be a symbolical exhibition of the holiness of Jehovah and his followers, and of his sanctifying influence over the chosen people through the medium of the priests.

I. The official dress of the ordinary priests consisted of four pieces, a coat, a girdle, a bonnet, and breeches for the loins (Exod. 28 : 40-43); four being a holy number, and a symbol of Jehovah's government of the world, must be exhibited by the priests, his mediators. Not one of them could be omitted: cautum est tam de מַחֲזִיקֵי כֹהֲנִים, sive Sacerdote, sive pontifice, cui deficerent vestes præscriptæ, quam de כֹּהֵן בְּרֵרִים eo, cui plures induerentur, quam lex præciperet. Quisquis sive inopia sive abundantia ita peccaret, ejus ministerium illegitimum fuisse ac profanari censebant (Selden, de success. in pontif., 7, Ugol. thes. XII. p. 360. Abraham ben Dav., de vest. sac. C. 1, Ugol., XIII., 8, sq. Braun, vest. sac. hebr., § 30). Hence the oft repeated phrase: "that he die not" (Exod. 28 : 35, 43). The material had to be linen—not wool (comp. Ezek. 44 : 17) which generated sweat, which is a sort of excrement, and so unfit for a priest who was the representative

¹ The Jews of our day wear these fringes on their wide prayer-mantles. JAHN, häusl. Alterth., II., 96. BODENSCHATZ, Kirehl. Verfas. der hentig. Juden, IV., 9-14. He who observes the law of Zizith is to be regarded as having kept the entire law, whilst he who neglects or despises it, falls under the sentence pronounced in Job 38 : 13; comp. Orach. chajim, 25, § 6.

th of moral and Levitical purity (comp. Ewald, Interth., p. 317). As שָׂרָא, רָאָה is made to be synonymous, in Ezek. 44 : 17, with שָׂרָא which is always translated in LXX. by λινον (Exod. 28 : 42 ; 39 : 28 ; Lev. 6 : 3 ; 16 : 4, 23), means, beyond question, linen. As the Egyptian linen was noted for its fineness and dazzling whiteness, we must conclude that to it refers the Hebrew word in Ezek. 9 : 2 ; Dan. 10 : 5. and βυσσος, Luke 16 : 19, and βυσσινον, Lev. 19 : 8, or λινον καθαρον λαμπρον, Rev. 15 : 6. It symbolized that the servants of Him who is clothed in light (Ps. 104 : 2 ; 1 Tim. 6 : 16) are covered with a reflection of it—light being a type of holiness (Job 18 : 5, &c.), of justice (Ps. 7 : 6, &c.), of purity (1 John 1 : 5, 7), as darkness is of malice and wickedness (Isa. 5 : 20 ; Rom. 3 : 12, &c.). Bähr, in his Symb. des mos. Kultus, II., 87, has conclusively pointed out the fallacy of the theory which supposes that the Israelites borrowed the style of these garments from Egyptian priests (for an account of whose dress see Spencer, de leg. Hebr. rit. 1, III., 5 ; Braun, § 10, 85 ; Celsii hierobol., II., 290 ; comp. Hengstenberg, Moses, p. 149). An examination of these four garments will show that they all possessed a symbolical meaning. 1) The coat, as an emblem of righteousness, Isa. 61 : 10 ; 2 : 21 ; Ps. 132 : 9, 16 ; Job 29 : 14. Its white color denoted holiness ; salvation and righteousness were partly typified by the fact of its covering as much as possible the nakedness of the body (reaching down to the feet, Jos. Ant., 3, 2, κοδηγγς), and partly by the fact that, like Christ's garments, John 19 : 23, it was without seam, woven from the top throughout. Whiteness is a symbol of perfection and spiritual soundness. Besides, there were quilted, so to speak, in the coat squares or cubes (v. 16, 20 ; comp. Ps. 45 : 14). The square woven pictures which looked like precious stones, were, perhaps, intended to remind one of the golden fillings of the stones in the breastplate (v. 16, 20), and, as these precious stones were, so to speak, collectors of light, either to exhibit this as an intensified light-dress (Lichtkleid), or, by this shadow of high-priestly splendor, to show that in each priest had to appear some reflection of the glory supposed to dwell in perfection in the high-priest. As precious stones seem to be the glorification, as it were, of the darker nature of earth into that of light, so Israel, as represented by its holy priests, seems to have been elevated above its natural state into that of light and holiness. 2) The girdle (for its spiritual meaning, see Isa. 22 : 21 ; 1 Macc. 10 : 89 ; 11 : 58 ; 14 : 44) only to be worn during the discharge of official duties, 32 ells in length and three fingers in breadth, after having been wrapped round the body several times reached down to the feet (Jos. Ant., III., 7, 2 ; Chemara, mass. Rom. 7 ; Maimon., de vas. sacr., 8) ; it differed from the other articles of dress in having woven into it pictures of purple-blue, purple-red, and crimson ; sometimes ornamented with gold and precious stones. The four holy colors indicated the priests to be servants of the Lord in the sanctuary. According to Bähr (I., 363 ; II., 21, 16, 79) the flowers denoted them as mediators of life. The reason why the girdle was not fastened around the loins, but under the breast, is stated in Ezek. 44 : 18, "they shall not gird themselves in sweating places" (Braun, § 319, tr. massech sevach, II, gloss. Jarch.). 3) The head-dress ; in shape, according to Bähr, II., 64, like the inverted cup of a flower, or a helmet. In favor of the latter supposition, the symbolical meaning of the word (Isa. 59 : 17 ; Eph. 6 : 17 ; 1 Thess. 5 : 8), of the former, the name of the high-priest's diadem, קִטְנִי (see Ps. 132 : 18 ; 92 : 14). The priest was never allowed to appear without this sign of life and salvation (Lev. 10 : 6 ; comp. 21 : 10). As to its form, no reliable information. The Rabbinical accounts (Maimon., de vas. sanct., 8 ; Abrah. ben Dav., de vest. sac., 2) agree in stating that the tiara, both of the priest and high-priest, unrolled, was 16 ells in length, that of the former being lower than that of the latter, and fastened like a hood (Exod. 29 : 9 ; Lev. 8 : 13). (See Van de Wall, de pileis s. tiaris sacerdot. et pontif. Hebr. : Amst., 1714 ; comp. die Monogr. von Töpfer, de tiaris minor. sacerdot. in Ugol. XII., 854). 4) The breeches (Exod. 28 : 42 ; 39 : 28 ; Lev. 16 : 4 ; Ezek. 44 : 18) reaching from the upper part of the loins to the thighs, and covering the privities both back and front (Exod. 28 : 42 ; Lev. 16 : 4), fastened around the body with bands (Braun, § 310–335). Not to be compared with the Persian hose, Dan. 3 : 21 (see previous Art.), but with the linus of the Roman Feciali (Serv. ad Virg. Aen. XII., 120 : linus est vestis, qua ab umbilico usque ad pedes teguntur pudibunda poparum ; comp. Martial., ep., III., 24). According to Exod. 28 : 42, the chief design of this garment was to hide the privities which, so far as infected with sin and death, had to be concealed with special care, in presence of the Holy One, by the priests who were the bearers of life and salvation. Hence, as a garb of which a person had need to feel ashamed, it was not named with the other parts of the priest's dress as לְכָבִיד וּלְתַפְאֶרֶת, but separately from them after the anointing and consecration, and was styled לְכִסוֹת בְּשֵׂד עֲרוֹה.—When officially engaged, the feet of the priests were uncovered. To go barefooted, ἀνυποδησια, though not commanded, was customary at holy places (Exod. 3 : 5 ; Isa. 5 : 15) ; comp. Carpzov., appar. crit., p. 769, discalceatio rel. in loco sacro. Walch, de relig. ἀνυποδησια : Vet. Jen., 1706. Bartenora, ad cod. Schekal., 5, 1. Maimon. Chele hammikd., 7, 14. Braun, § 33. Rosenmüller, Morgenl., I., 193, 261. From India to Rome, among Pythagoreans and Mohammedans, we meet with ἀνυποδησια religiosa ; the Egyptian priests, however, wore papyrus-sandals, Herod., II., 37 ; Schmidt, de sacerdot. Aeg., p. 35 ; contrary, Sil Ital., 3, 28. — As no one was allowed to ascend the mountain of the temple with a staff, shoes, a money-girdle, or with dusty feet (Mischna, Berach., 9, 5), the priests frequently suffered from doloribus colicis. For their benefit was stationed at the temple a medicus viscerum (M. Schekal, 5, 1, also Bartenora, and Kall, de morb. sac., V. Ji. : Hafn., 1745). — From *cum tegens, ducit cordulas sub brachiis, et circumducens per dorsum ante pectus reducit et ligat. Tum ALBA inducitur, caput submittens; deinde manicam dextram brachio dextro, et sinistram sinistro imponens Albam ipsam corpori adaptat, elevat ante et a lateribus, hinc inde, et Cingulo per ministrum a tergo sibi porrecto se cingit. Minister elevat Albam supra singulum circumcirca, ut honeste dependeat, et legat vestes; ac ejus fimbrias diligenter aptat, ut ad latitudinem digiti, vel circiter supra terram æqualiter fluat. Sacerdos accipit Manipulum, osculatur crucem in medio, et imponit brachio sinistro: deinde ambabus manibus accipiens Stolam simili modo deosculatur, et imponit medium ejus collo: ac transversando eam ante pectus in modum crucis, ducit partem se sinistro humero pendentem ad dextram; et partem a dextro humero pendentem ad sinistram; sic que ad sinistram partem stolæ extremitatibus cinguli hinc inde ipsi cingulo conjungit. rubr., 5. Postremo sacerdos accipit Planetam (comp. Gavanti, thesaurus sacrorum rituum, ed. Merati, T. I., p. 135, seq.; Probat, Verwaltung der hochheiligen Eucharistie: Tüb., 1853).—At the consecration of a bishop the paramenta pontificalia consist of sandalia, amictus, alba, cingulum, cruz pectoralis, stola, tunicella, dalmatica, chirothecæ, planeta, mitra auri phrigiata, annulus pontificalis, baculus pastoralis, manipulus, gremiale. A few words about these not mentioned above. Sandalia, as ornaments for the feet since the 8th cent. (Gonz. Tellez., c. 7, de autoritate et usu pallii, Nr. 2; Binterim, die vorzüglich. Denkwürdigk. der christkathol. Kirche, I., 2, 359–361); Cruz pectoralis, time of its use not definitely known (see Thomassin, l. c., P. I., lib. II., cap. LVIII., § IV. V.); Chirothecæ, manicæ, gloves, the origin of them from the Apostles, according to Romish authors (Gonz. T., c. 1, X. I., 15. Nr. 34; comp. Du Fresne, s. h. v.); Mitra, cidaris, bicornis, infula, birretum, originally plain, since the 11th cent. with two horns, mystical sense of which: “utriusque testamenti scientiam significat: nam duo cornua duo sunt testamenta” (Gonz. T., l. c., Nr. 37; Thomassin, l. c., § XI. XII.; A. M. Calcagni, de mitra episcoporum: Venetiis, 1829); Annulus, symbol of dominion, or of the spiritual wedlock between the bishop and the Church; baculus pastoralis, sign of a spiritual shepherd (Gonz. T., l. c., Nr. 39; Thomassin, l. c., § II.; J. A. Schmid, de annulo pastoralis: Helmstadt., 1705, 4to.); Bishop's staff—being curved (incurvatura)—called a crook in distinction from pedum rectum of the Pope (comp. J. H. Bachmer, jus eccl. Protest. lib. III., tit. XX., § XXIV.); the Gremiale is a silken cloth spread over the lap of the bishop, which, on rising up, the deacon removes. Instead of the common superpellicium, the bishop wears the rochetum (Mélanges théologiques . . . par des ecclésiastiques Belges. V. Serie: Liège, 1852, p. 152). The Ritual books contain everything touching the changes of vestments and their colors. At first white was most common. Innocent III. (de sacrificio Missæ, lib. I., cap. 65) distinguished five colors, the white in memory of confessors and virgins; red, of Apostles and martyrs; green, on Sunday and festivals; black, for fasts, celebration of the dead; violet on Sunday Læ-* taro, and the festival of the Innocents (comp. Gavanti, thesaurus, P. I., tit. 18, de coloribus paramentorum, together with Merati, observationes, P. I., p. 162, also Portal, des couleurs symboliques dans l'antiquité, le moyen âge et les temps modernes: Paris, 1857. For consecration of vestments, see Benediction. — The garments of the Greek clergy are, in all essential points, like those of the Roman; the καθμῆς corresponding with the alba, the ζώνη with the cingulum, &c.

Though the Reformation necessarily introduced a great change in the vestments of the clergy, the Evang. Church undertook it neither harmoniously nor contemporaneously. In the Formula Missæ, 1523, Luther says: “Vestes præterivimus. Sed de his ut de aliis ritibus sentimus. Permittamus illis uti libere, modo pompa et luxus absit. Neque enim magis places si in vestibus benedixeris. Nec minus places, si sine vestibus benedixeris. Neque enim vestes etiam nos Deo commendant. Sed nec eas consecrari velim aut benedici, velut sacrum aliquod futura sint præ aliis vestibus, nisi generali illa benedictione, qua per verbum et orationem omnis bona Creatura Dei sanctificari docetur, alioqui mere superstitio et impietas est, per abominationis pontificis introducta, sicut et alia” (Richter, Kirchenordnungen, I., 5). In the German Mass and divine worship of 1526, concerning Sunday service, Luther says: “We will leave remain the mass-vestment, altar and flowers, till they are all used, or change what seemeth fit, but if any wish it otherwise, let it be so.” While the Brandenburg-Nürnberg Church-reg. of 1533 allowed the ancient order, the Wittenberg-C. reg. of 1536 abolished it. To avoid scandal, in Switzerland it was retained (see Berne, Ref. of 1528; comp. Basle, Church-ritual of 1529, l. c., 106, 127). With the attempt to reunite the Evang. Church and Romish Church during the Interim of 1548, the cope was here and there again worn. Through the exertions of John a Lasco, it was determined for the Netherlands, 1550, that the altar . . . vestments, to which something mysterious was attributed, should be removed, and that matters appertaining to this subject should be generally classed among adiapocæ. The Reformed Synod of Berg, 1595, in reply to the question, Whether a preacher might officiate in a little white coat, answered that it could not be tolerated as a necessity, but as an indifferent thing (Jacobson, Gesch. des K.-Rechts von Rheinland-Westph. Urkundenbuch, p. 90). While the Lutheran Church retained some vestments (Richter, l. c., II, 138, 139; C.-Ord. of Waldeck, 1556, &c.) the Reformed Church frequently rejected them all, though not in accordance with the views of Calvin and other esteemed Ref. theol. (comp. Binghami, opera ed. Grischovius, Tom. XI., p. 495). For the black cope was frequently substituted the white casula. White collars (collaria depressa) became quite common (comp. Caspar Calvoes, rituale ecclesiasticum, P. II., p. 515: de vestibus sacerdotum ecclesiæ evangelicæ; also, J. H. Bachmer, jus eccl. Prot. lib. III., tit. XLI., § XLI.). From Spörl's Past. Theol. (Nürnberg, 1714), p. 17, may be inferred that during the 17th and 18th cent., the evang. clergy frequently changed the style. Thus, the Cuburg

Church-ritual of 1626, p. 351, forbade the use of frivolous, cut vestments," and insisted on decorum clericale. The head-covering also changed into a three-cornered hat, cap, &c. See second volume of Sebaldus Nothanker's life and thoughts (Berlin and Stettin, 1775), in which is exhibited the gradual change of the Genevese mantle, that was at last shortened to a simple tripe fastened on the back. In order to establish uniformity, it was ordered by the decrees of March 20, 1811, Oct. 14, 1816, that all should wear the gown, the collar, and cap, and that bishops and superintendents should be distinguished from the other clergy only by a black silk gown, over which the bishops were to have a smooth gold cross fastened to a black silk band round the neck, and hanging to the middle of the breast. Thus, in Prussia. Similar in the Electorate of Hesse, Nassau, Grand-Dukedom Saxony-Weimar (decree of July 3, 1854), in Luth. Church of Russia, 1832. In Sweden, besides the collar and the long mantle, on solemn occasions, in place of the latter, is used a white alb with wide arms, of fine linen, and over it a chasuble of black velvet, without arms, on the front of which a sun set in silver, having in its centre Jehovah in Hebrew letters, and behind, in silver, an image of Christ, or of the cross. Besides these, bishops and archbishops wore a golden cross, and, on solemn occasions, a bishop's mantle, on the back of which a collar of red silk hanging down to the hips, and thick woven with gold (T. W. v. Schubert, Schweden's K.-Verf. Bd. I., p. 373). By the Synod of 1854, was first recommended the use of the Toga in the Ref. Church of the Netherlands.

On the gradual change of clerical vestments and insignia, a work, the beginning of which has just appeared, promises satisfactory results: Fr. Bock, Gesch. der liturgischen Gewänder des Mittelalt. oder Entsteh. und Entwick. d. kirchl. Ornamente und Paramente in Rücksicht auf Stoff, Gewebe, Farbe, Zeichnung, &c., und durch 100 Abbildungen in Farbendruck erläutert, mit einem Vorwort von Bischof Dr. Ger. Müller: Bonn., 2 Bde. (Erste Lieferung, 1856).

H. F. JACOBSEN. — Ermentrout.

Gath, גַּת (wine-press), also גַּת־שֶׁן, גַּת־שֶׁן and גַּת־שֶׁן (Jos.), גַּת (LXX.), גַּת־שֶׁן (Euseb.), the name of four different districts in Palestine.

1.) The most celebrated is the Philistian city Gath (without affix), one of the five chief cities Josh. 13:3; 1 Sam. 6:17), and the home of the giant Goliath (1 Sam. 17:4). The captured ark of the covenant was brought hither from Ashdod, and then to Ekron (1 Sam. 5:8-10). This city was taken by the Jews under Samuel points to an earlier capture and recapture unknown to us), is again, in the time of Saul, the residence of a Philistian King, Achish (1 Sam. 1:10-15; 27:1-7), was captured later by David (1 Chron. 18:1), and remained in possession of Israel under Solomon (1 Kings 2:39 is without doubt to be understood as speaking of Achish as being a vassal of Solomon), under Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:8), and the succeeding Kings of Judah, until under Joash, when it was captured by Hazael (2 Kings 12:17), was recaptured by Joash King of Israel (2 Kings 13:25), fell again into the hands of the Philistines for a short time, from whom it was captured by Uzziah, and added to the kingdom of Judah, who made it an open place by tearing down its walls (2 Chron. 26:6), and thus destroyed its importance. The situation of this Gath was, according to 1 Sam. 5:8-10, in the neighborhood of Ashdod and Ekron; but it does by no means follow from this passage, that it is situated between these two towns, because it was not the geographical relations, but the consultation of the Philistian princes, which decided, whither the ark should be taken from Ashdod; this hasty inference, which even Ewald draws (Ier. Gesch. II., 427), also led Raumer and Stülpnagel astray in their map, and led Robinson to seek, although in vain, for traces of this city in this region. If attention is only given to the statements made by Jerome concerning the location of this city, there need be no doubt about it. He says (on Micha 1): "Geth una est de quinque urbibus Palaestinae, vicina Judaeae confinio, et de Eleutheropoli euntibus Gazam hunc usque vicus vel maximus," and (on Jer. 25): "Geth vicina atque confinis est Azotho;" accordingly Gath was situated 1) near to the confines of Judea; but also 2) very near to Ashdod; therefore between these two, but so, that it was also in the neighborhood of Ekron, with which agrees 3), that it did not lay far from Eleutheropolis; not far from the road from thence to Gaza. The truth therefore is, that we have to seek for the Philistian city Gath where Raumer and Stülpnagel have placed Gath Rimmon; and that Reiland is right, when he (p. 785) expresses the conjecture that the Philistian city and Gath Rimmon are identical, viz., that Gath Rimmon, of which Eusebius says in his Onomast., it is "hunc villa praegrandis in duodecimo milliario Diopolis pergentibus ab ea Eleutheropolin." The affix of Eusebius (Rimmon), is so much the more unimportant, inasmuch as we are certainly allowed to think of the Philistian city Gath as a fortified "eminence" (גַּת־שֶׁן); and this expression is so frequently used concerning such points in Palestine, without it having been added, on this account, from the earliest times, to the name Gath.

1 Sam. 7:14, when the expression גַּת־שֶׁן

2.) A second Gath, which has also the affix גַּת־שֶׁן in the Old Test., was, according to Joshua 19:45, a frontier town of the tribe of Dan, and, according to Joshua 21:24, at the same time a town of the Levites. The location of the second Gath in Onomast., suits this Gath, which Eusebius calls גַּת־שֶׁן, and places between Antipatrus and Iamnia; as also the account of the Dominican Brochard, who (in the 13th cent.), describes it as a parvum casale, four French miles from Jaffa; and the account of Arvieux, who (at the end of the 17th cent.), speaks of a Gath lying on the right of the road from Jaffa to Ramla; the place designated Gath on the map of Berghaus, identical with Githaim on the map of Raumer and Stülpnagel, inhabited by the Benjaminites after the exile, according to Neh. 11:3.

3.) A third Gath, also with the affix גַּת already in the O. T., was, according to Joshua 21 : 25, a Levitical town of the tribe of Manasseh (but not in East Manasseh, as Raumer (in his Palestine, p. 190), affirms against the order of Levitical towns there enumerated). Because the LXX. in Josh. 21 : 25, reads Βαζαῖν instead of Gath Rimmon, and a Gath Rimmon of the Danites is already mentioned in v. 24, Winer (bibl. R. W. B., p. 394), and Welte (Kirchenlex. IV., 312), regard the Gath Rimmon of v. 25 as an erratum; but they are by no means justified in this, but rather to suppose that the LXX. already arbitrarily introduced Βαζαῖν to impose the supposed erratum; because (to conclude according to the comparison with the other Manassean Levitical town, Thanach), this Gath Rimmon was to be sought somewhere in this district.

4.) A fourth Gath, with the affix Hephher (גַּת חֶפְרָה or גַּת חֶפְרָה), is not difficult to locate. It was, according to Joshua 19 : 13, a frontier town of the tribe of Zebulun; according to 2 Kings 14 : 25 the birth-place of the prophet Jonah, and was situated, according to the account of Jerome (Proëmium in Jonam), 2 m. p. from Sepphoris towards Tiberias. The grave of Jonah is shown here in a mosque.

PRESSSEL.—Beck.

Gaudentius, Bishop of Brixia, i. e., Brescia, towards the end of the 4th century. No information concerning his native country, his birth-place and his other relations of life exists. He was made Bishop of Brescia, after the death of Philastrius, by the affection of the people, after he had, in the first place, declined this honor from modesty. Although he entered this office while a youth (about 387), he discharged all the duties of his high calling with faithfulness and prudence, and showed himself worthy of the friendship of an Ambrosius. In 405 he was most zealously engaged in the cause of the banished Chrysostome, as we see from a letter (No. 184) written by the latter to him. He must still have been living about 410, because about this time Rufinus appears to have made the translation of the Recognitiones of Clemens, which he dedicated to Bishop Gaudentius. The year of his death cannot be certainly fixed; Labbi and Ughilli say 427. His remains rest in the Church of St. John the Evangelist, in Brescia. His name is registered in the Roman Cath. Martyrology on the 25th of Oct. Ten festival-sermons (Paschalis decem sermones) bear his name, to which he added four others on the Gospels (called tractatus by him), and a fifth on the martyrdom of the Maccabees. To these must be added similar addresses, among which is one on the life and labors of his predecessor, Philastrius. A treatise: Rhythmus de Philastrio or liber de singularitate clericorum, has been erroneously ascribed to him—it belongs to a later time. — Another Gaudentius, a martyr, is regarded by Roman antiquarians as the architect of the Coliseum.—Comp. Veterum Brixiae Episcoporum, S. Philastrii et s. Gaudentii opera, by GALEARDI; Bähr, Christlich-römische Theologie, p. 164; and Ersch and Gruber, Art. Gaudentius. DR. PRESSSEL.—Beck.

Gaza, גַּזָּא, one of the oldest towns of Palestine, Gen. 10 : 19. It was first inhabited by the Avims, אֲוִיִּם, Deut. 2 : 23; Josh. 13 : 3. The etymology of the name גַּזָּא is Shemitic, and is either the feminine of גַּז, the strong, as most expositors suppose, or, according to Hitzig (Urgesch. der Philistäer, 5 : 3–5), the feminine of גַּז, goat (contra see Stark, Gaza, p. 46–48). At the conquest of Canaan by the Israelites, it is said, Josh. 10 : 41, that Joshua “smote all their kings from Kadesh-barnes even unto Gaza; and 11 : 22, “there was none of the Anakims left in the land of the children of Israel: only in Gaza, in Gath, and in Ashdod, there remained.” From this it may be concluded, that these towns were not conquered by Joshua, but remained in the hands of the original inhabitants. When, on the other hand, Josh. 15 : 46, 47, Ashdod, Ekron, and Gaza, with their towns and villages, unto the river of Egypt and the great sea, are spoken of as belonging to the tribe of Judah, this refers only to the ideal possession, and not to the real possession of them; and when it is said, Judges 1 : 18, that Judah took Gaza, Askelon, and Ekron, with the coasts thereof, this is to be regarded as an interpolation, because it contradicts the following verse, where it is said that Judah drove out the inhabitants of the mountains, but could not drive out the inhabitants of the valleys (comp. Stark, l. c. p. 129). About this period of the Israelitic conquest of the promised land, occurred probably the occupation of the coast-regions by the Philistines (see the Art.), and from this time Gaza becomes prominent as one of the five chief towns of the same. The province of Gaza seems also to have suffered from the destructive expeditions of the Midianites in the time of Gideon, Judges 6 : 4. In Gaza Samson performed one of his mighty deeds, Judges 16 : 1–3, and hither he was brought bound, after the betrayal of Delilah, and met with his death in the temple of Dagon, Judges 16 : 21–31. David, it is true, broke the supremacy of the Philistines over Israel, and brought them into a certain relation of dependence, 2 Sam. 8 : 1, Liv. 47 : 8; he even conquered Gath, 1 Chron. 18 : 1; but they never were subjugated, and Gaza, with the three other chief towns, remained independent. A similar relation seems to have continued to exist under Solomon, 1 Kings 5 : 1, 4; 1 Chron. 9 : 26. After the division of the kingdom, the Philistines became again perfectly independent, and perhaps the old hostilities between them and Israel broke out afresh, at least the prophets repeatedly predict the destruction of Gaza: Amos 1 : 6, 7; Zeph. 2 : 4; Zach. 9 : 5; Jer. 25 : 20; 47, eq. A subjugation of the Philistines and Gaza by Hezekiah is historically reported, 2 Kings 18 : 8; Jos. Ant., V., 2, 4. In the time of Jeremiah, Gaza was conquered by a Pharaoh (Jer. 47 : 2), who is, according to the general opinion, Pharaoh Necho, with which the notice in Herodotus, II., 159, that Necho, after the battle of Magdolos, conquered the great Syrian town Cadytis, agrees, if Cadytis is identical with Gaza, which may be accepted as true, according to the invertigations of Hitzig (De Cadyti urbe Herodotea dissert.: Götting., 1829) and Stark (Gaza, p. 218 sq.). However, this conquest was not of long continuance. The overthrow of Necho at Carkemisch soon followed, and with it the loss of all the conquests of the Pharaohs in Asia (2 Kings 24: 7); Jer. 25: 20 refers to the conquest of Gaza, Askalon, Ekron and Ashdod by Nebuchadnezzar. After the destruction of Babylon, Gaza belonged to the Persian kingdom until Alexander the Great, after a siege of two months, at the end of Nov. 322 A. C., conquered and destroyed it (see Droysen, Leben Alexanders, p. 322; Stark, Gaza, p. 237-244). After the death of Alexander, at the first division of the kingdom under Perdiccas, Gaza, with all Syria, fell to Laomedon; but Ptolemy soon took it from him, and placed a garrison in it. From this time Gaza belonged alternately to the Ptolemies and Seleucids (Stark, p. 349-406), until it became the permanent possession of the Syrian kings by the siege and conquest of Antiochus III., A. C. 200. During the contests of the period of the Maccabees, Gaza was besieged and wasted by Jonathan; and upon the conclusion of a treaty of peace, the sons of the chiefs (ἀρχοντες) were taken to Jerusalem as hostages, 1 Macc. 11: 60 sq.; Jos. Ant., XIII., 5, 5. That the siege of Gaza by Simon Maccabee, mentioned 1 Macc. 13: 43, stands, through a false reading, for that of Gazara, Stark, p. 494 sq. has incontrovertibly proven. Later, Alexander Jannæus besieged Gaza for a year, conquered, burned, and totally destroyed it, Jos. Ant., XIII., 15, 3; B. J., I., 4, 2. The town remained a waste (ἐρημος) until it was founded anew by the proconsul Gabinus, A. C. 58, Jos. Ant., XIV., 1, 3, after it had received, four years before, already, from Pompey the privilege of a free (ἐλευθερία) town, Jos. Ant., XIV., 4, 4; B. J., I., 7, 7; wherefore the Gazians later dated an era from his time on their coin (Stark, p. 514). This new town (ἡ νέα Γάζα) was situated a little south of the ruins of the old (παλαιά Γάζα). The expression Acts 8: 26, αὐτὴ ἐστὶν ἐρημος, also refers to this ἐρημος Γάζα, as Stark, p. 510 sq., has shown; whilst others, as Robinson, Palestine, I., p. 747, and v. Raumer, Beiträge zur bibl. Geogr. p. 78 sq.; Palestine, latest edition, p. 73-6; Winer, Realwörterb., I., p. 395, refer it to the way (ὁδός). At the outbreak of the great Jewish war after the massacre at Cæsarea, Gaza was attacked by the Jews and burned, Jos. B. J., II., 18, 1, 2; but that this was no total destruction, appears even from this, that on the march of Titus from Egypt against Jerusalem, Gaza is called the fifth station, Jos. B. J., IV., 1, 5. Under the Roman emperors the towns of Palestine, especially Gaza, became more and more prominent as depôts for the Indian and East-Arabian trade, chiefly by the favor of Harian, A. D. 129, who established there a slave market, connected with a regular festival (πανηγυρίς Ἀδριανῆς), Stark, p. 550, sq., so that in the 3d cent. Gaza is mentioned among the egregiæ civitates of Palestine, by Ammianus and Marcellinus, XIV., 8, and is called by Jerome Onom. s. v. Gaza) usque hodie insignis civitas, and by Antonius Martyr (Itin., c. 33), at the end of the 6th cent., civitas splendida, deliciosa.

Later tradition (Chron. Pasch., II., p. 129) reports the establishment of a congregation; that Philemon, of whom Paul speaks, was the first B. of Gaza. First, with historical certainty, a B. of Gaza, Silvanus († 285 A. D.), is mentioned during the persecution by Diocletian (Euseb., Hist. Eccl., VIII., 22, 25, and such an one appears also at the Council of Nice. See Reland. Palestine. A few years afterwards, a bishopric was founded at the harbor of Gaza by Constantine (Sozom. Hist. Eccl., V., 3), which continued independent of the one at Gaza. This harbor is first mentioned by Strabo, XVI., p. 759; according to whom it lay 7 stadia, according to Arrian 20 stadia, from Gaza; the name of which, Majamus (Μαίωμα), was changed by Constantine to Constantia, after his son (comp. Ritter, Erdkunde, XVI., 1, p. 60): since Julian it lost its political independence again, see Ritter, l. c., p. 69. In the neighborhood of Gaza Hilarion founded the first hermitage, and from here monkery and the founding of cloisters spread over the whole of Palestine (Hieron. vit. Hilarion, Ep. 56; Sozom. Hist. Eccl., III., 13). But it was also just at Gaza where heathenism maintained itself with the greatest tenacity, and under Julian the inhabitants of Gaza were very zealous in persecuting the Christians. Christianity first gained a complete victory under the Emperor Arcadius, when the Empress Eudoxia, A. D. 401, authorized Bishop Porphyry to destroy the Mararion, the temple of Maraas, the chief divinity of Gaza, and to build in its place a splendid Christian church at her expense. The town remained Christian until (A. D. 634) it was conquered by the Mohammedans, under 'Amr ben el-Ass; and it soon attained to celebrity among them by the tradition that the great-grandfather of Mohammed, Haschem ben 'Abd Monâf, traded and was buried there, see d'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient., under the word Gazza, and the Arabian geographers. In 672 the town was shaken by an earthquake. During the many wars of the Crusades, it seems to have suffered greatly. In 1152 the Crusaders built here a fortress, which was given as fief to the Knight-Templars, who defended it with courage against their enemies (Wilken, Gesch. d. Kreuzzüge, III., 2, p. 10). But in 1170 the town and fortress were burnt down by Saladin (Ibn el Atbir Chron., Vol. XI., ed. Thornberg, p. 240; Wilken, l. c., p. 133); later, the crusaders were twice defeated near Gaza, in 1239 and 1244 (Wilken, VI., p. 580 sq.; 641 sq.). From this time the town is of no more importance in history. It again began to flourish in the middle of the 17th cent., when it became the chief city of Palestine and residence of an Ottoman Pasha, whose rule extended over 160 districts. When Robinson visited it in 1838, it was the residence of a governor or sheik. The present town is situated about 3 miles from the sea, 31° 27' 20" N. L., and 38° 25' 56" E. L. from Paris, upon a round elevation, which is the centre of the town, although only the southern half of the elevation is covered with houses. All traces of the ancient walls and fortifications have disappeared, according to Robinson, though Kinnear (Cairo, Petra and Damascus in 1839: London, 1841, p. 209) believes that they can be traced. The present population is differently estimated; Robinson says about 15,000, with which Dr. Barth agrees (in Ritter, p. 50). The inhabitants live partly by trade, which is conditioned by the position of Gaza as a place of transit for the caravans between Syria, Palestine, Arabia Petra and Egypt, and partly by manufactures, especially cotton goods and soaps, partly by horticulture and agriculture.

Comp. RELAND, Paläst., p. 787-800. ROSEN-MÜLLER, Bibl. Alterthumsk., II., 1, p. 384-390. Histoire des Sultans Mamelouks de l'Égypte écrite en Arabe par Takî-Eddin-Ahmed-Makrizî, traduite en français, etc., par QATREMER: Paris, 1837, Tom. I., Append., p. 228-239. ROBINSON, Palestine, II., p. 634-648. RITTER, Erdkunde, XVI., 1., p. 45-64. Concerning the ancient history until the conquest by the Mohammedans, consult STARK, Forschungen zur Gesch. u. Alterthumsk. des hellenischen Orients. Gaza u. die philistäische Küste, eine Monographie: Jena, 1852, 8. A fine view of Gaza is found in DAVID ROBERT'S Vues et Monuments de la Sainte Terre: Bruxelles, 1845, fol. Livr. VIII., no. 45.

ARNOLD—Beck.

Gazelle, גַּזֵּל, gazelle, is an animal whose genus falls between the deer and the goat, of which there are several kinds. The Gazelle of Syria and Arabia (Antilope dorcas) is 2½ feet high, and about 16 inches long, has a brown-red back and white belly, black horns, which it lays back on its shoulders when running, ears 6 inches long and tail about 8 inches, on each knee a small tuft of hair, and beautiful, fiery, black eyes. It can leap from 2 to 3 ells, and walks very fast, whence it is the figure of the agreeably agile, 2 Sam. 2: 18; 1 Chron. 12: 8, of the fleet, Prov. 6: 5, and of the timid, Isaiah 13: 14. It is the image of feminine grace and loveliness to orientals, Song Sol. 2: 7, 9, 17; 3: 5; 4: 5, wherefore its name was sometimes given to females, 2 Kings 12: 1; 2 Chron. 24: 1; Acts 9: 36. This animal belongs to the clean animals, and its savory meat appeared regularly upon the table of Solomon, 1 Kings 4: 23.

VAHINGER—Beck.

Geba or Gaba, גֶּבָא (height), LXX Γαβᾶ, Josephus Γαβᾶ, a town of the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. 18: 24), given to the Levites; David smote the Philistines from Geba to Gazer (2 Sam. 5: 25); the army of the Assyrians passed through Geba (Isaiah 10: 29); King Aza built Geba and Mizpah with the stones and timber of Ramah (1 Kings 15: 22); and from this time Geba was the northern frontier town of the kingdom of Judah (2 Kings 23: 8); in the counting of those who returned from the Babylonish captivity, the citizens of Geba and of Ramah are counted together (Ezra 2: 26; Neh. 7: 30). Geba is to be distinguished from the different Gibeas, from Gebim, and from Gibeon; neither the etymological affinity, nor the geographical nearness, nor yet the variable appellations of Eusebius (see Art. Gibea), furnish any valid reason to suppose that such a change of names also exists in the text of the Old Test., and that Geba was to be confounded with these places. According to the above passages, Geba is close by Ramah, on the road from Ai and Mich-

mas to Jerusalem, about one German mile northeast of Gibea-Saul. It is called by the present Arabs Djeba, to distinguish it from El Djib (Gibeon) and from Tell-el-Ful (Gibea-Saul), see Robinson. PASSER—Beck.

Gebal, the name 1) of a tribe in Arabia Petra (according to Ps. 83: 6, גִּבְלִי, and 2) a Phœnician sea-town (according to Ezek. 27: 9). The latter was celebrated for its carpenters, whom Solomon already employed in building the temple (1 Kings 5: 32), and by whom the ships of the rich traders in Tyre were also built (Ezek. 27: 9). According to these statements, we cannot find ancient Gebal in the neighborhood of Laodicea (Abulf., Syr., p. 109, 59), but recognize it in the well-known Byblos, the seat of a worship of Adonis (Strabo, 16, 755), not far from the Mediterranean Sea, 24 miles from Berytus, between Sidon and the cape des apaches (Plin., 5, 17; Mel., 1, 12; Eustath. ad Dion. perieg. 912), according to Ptolemy (5, 15, 4) 67° 40' and 33° 56'.

The tribe Gebal appears in the above-named passage from the Ps. as the ally of the Edomites and Israelites, of the Moabites and Hagarites, of the Ammonites and Amalekites, etc., against the people of God. If we compare with this 2 Kings 14: 7; 2 Chron. 25: 11, it appears already that the Gebalites must have lived with or among the Edomites, although not as one and the same tribe. Herewith agree the accounts concerning Edom and Seir, in Gen. 36: 20; 23: 29, where, it is true, no tribe Gebal is named, but a son of Seir, named Sobal (סוּבַל), and a son of this Sobal, named Ebal (עִיבָל).

A Syrian Sobal is therefore also mentioned, Judith 3: 1, according to the text of the Vulgate, with Syria, Mesopotamia, Libya, and Cilicia; in the histories of the crusaders, the same name appears often as a province in the south of Palestine, constituting a part of Arabia Petra (Guilielm., Tyr., p. 781, 812, 834). The children of the Horite Seir, however, were the aborigines of the land of Edom, and were conquered by the Edomites, although not entirely dispossessed (Gen. 12: 6; 36: 25; Deut. 2: 12). Conquered and conquerors now lived together, and they were finally commingled in fact as well as in name, so that not only Edom and Seir are frequently used as synonymous, but, pars pro toto, Gebal also. Josephus calls an Idumean district Γοβαίτης, Eusebius (in Onom., under Idumea) Γεβαίτην (comp. also Steph. Byz., p. 251, 265); Euseb. limits the name to the environs of Petra, as there is still at the present day a district there, which is separated from the district Kerek by the valley El Ahsa, called Dcbetel (Seetzen, XVIII., 390; Burkh. R., II., 674, 675, and thereon Geogr. Ann., p. 1066; Robinson, III., p. 103 sq. 806); notwithstanding, it appears that Eusebius already used the word Gebalene for Idumea in general (comp. Reland, p. 84); wherefore the Targ. Jonath. always substitutes גִּבְלָא for גִּבְעָר (comp. Gen. 14: 6; 33: 16; 36: 8; Num. 24: 18; Deut. 1: 2; 2: 1), likewise the Targ. hieros. and Targ.

Chron., finally also the Samaritan version (Dent. 1: 2; 2: 1; 33: 2; Gen. 32: 3; 33: 14, 16; 36: 8, 9). PRESSEI.—Beck.

Gebhard II., Truchsess, Archb. and Elector of Cologne, of the noble family of Truchsessi of Waldenburg, son of William of Waldenburg and Johanna of Fürstenberg, rendered himself noted by his transition to the Evang. Church, and connection with the Duchess Agnes of Mansfeld. Born Nov. 10, 1547. Influenced by his uncle, Cardinal and Bishop Otto, of Augsburg, to devote himself to the Church, he studied at Ingolstadt, Dillingen, Bourges, Bologna, and Rome. In the 15th year of his age (1562) became canon at Augsburg; 1567, at Strasburg; 1570, at Cologne; in 1574, dean of Strasb., and 1576 provost of Augsburg. On Dec. 5, 1577, he was elected Archbishop of Cologne, in place of Count Sulentin, who had resigned. Though accused of leaning towards Protestantism, Pope Gregory XIII. confirmed his nomination, and on Aug. 24, 1578, at his consecration in Coblentz, he subscribed the oath of allegiance to the Pope. During the latter half of 1579, Gebhard became acquainted at Cologne with Duchess Agnes, whose beauty attracted universal admiration. Some have it that he had known her previously in the cloister of Gerisheim, Brugs, Hist. de 5 Papes, Tom. V., p. 39: "Il visitoit si souvent un convent de religieuse (Gerisheim), sous prétexte d'y faire les fonctions d'un bon Pasteur, qu'il avient éperdument amoureux d'une Chanoinesse de ce monastère, nommée Agnes de Mansfeld." Her brothers, greatly exasperated at his conduct, demanded that he should marry her, which, indeed, he did, after having joined the Evang. Church in 1582. The ceremony was performed by the well-known Zacharias Ursinus. He was deprived of his archiepiscopal dignity; and on April 1, 1583, was issued against him the Papal bull of excommunication, in opposition to which appeared: In anathematismum, cui Gregorius XIII. P.P. Romanus illustriss. principum Gebhardum, etc., damnavit, Leonhardi Wamundi, Thuringi, admonitio etc.: Lugd. Bat., 1583. The cathedral-chapter elected archbishop May 23, 1583) Duke Ernst of Bavaria. Now ensued a conflict of arms, which decided the controversy between him and G., who had undertaken the defence of his rights. Yielding to the force of circumstances, G. withdrew to Strasburg, where he discharged the office of dean, and died May 21, 1601, without leaving any issue. Agnes survived him; the time of her death is unknown. — (Comp. JOH. DAV. KÖLER, Diss. de actis et fatis Gebhardi, Truchsessi Archiepiscopi et Electoris Coloniensis, infaustis variis: Altdorf, 1723; BARTHOLD, im Histor. Taschenbuch von Raumer, Neue Folge, 1. Jahrg.: Leipzig, 1840. NEUDECKER—Ermentrout.

Gedaliah, born of a noble family in Jerusalem for his father (see 2 Kings 22: 12; Jer. 6: 24; comp. v. 16), was placed by Nebuchadnezzar, after the sack of this city, governor over that portion of the people whom he had not carried off to Babylon (Hitzig, on Jer. 40: 7). He resided with a small garrison of Chaldeans at Mizpa, in the neighborhood of Jerusalem (Jer. 1: 8; 40: 7; 2 Kings 25: 22). His reign was of short duration. At the expiration of two months, influenced by enmity to G., on account of his friendship for the Chaldeans, Ishmael devised a conspiracy which resulted in his death, and that of the Chaldeans and Jews who lived with him at Mizpa (Jer. 41: 1; 2 Kings 25: 25). He was a tool in the hands of the Ammonite kings, who hated the Jews, and were glad to be rid of the Chaldeans. Afraid of the vengeance of the Chaldeans, those who survived the slaughter fled to Egypt. For the remembrance of the death of Gedal. see Art. on Jewish Festivals.

OEHLER—Ermentrout.

Gehenna (Γέεννα), one of the two expressions of the New Test. for hell, viz.: Matt. 5: 29, 30; 10: 28; 18: 9; 23: 15; Mark 9: 43, 45; Luke 12: 5; James 3: 6, and only employed, in distinction from ἄδης, to indicate one of the leading torments of hell, or the disposition of a hellish tormentor. The above-cited passages of the New Test. show plainly that it was a national expression for hell, which Christ and his Apostles adopted; but to conclude from this, that no real state of the damned in the sense of Christ and the Apostles lay at the foundation of this image, is by no means allowable. This Chaldean and Greek word originated from the Hebrew גֵּי בֶן-הֲנוּם (Josh. 15: 8), in full גֵּי בֶן-הֲנוּם, or in Chetib גֵּי בֶן־הֲנוּם (2 Kings 23: 10), the name of a very beautiful and fruitful valley southwest and south of Jerusalem, which, at the time when the Jews were addicted to the worship of Moloch, was used for this purpose (2 Kings 23: 10; Jer. 7: 31; 19: 5, 6; 32: 35). This beautiful region became, on this account, so abhorred, that those who returned from Babylon threw corpses and foul things of all kinds into it, and in order to burn them, a constant fire was kept up (to which refer the words, "and the fire is not quenched"). The situation of this valley was placed at first southeast of Jerusalem (so still Gesen., Lex., Art. גֵּי, and in the appendix to the Art. גֵּי בֶן־הֲנוּם); or the southeastern low country of Kidron was reckoned to it (so Cotovicus, in his itiner. hierosol., et syr., p. 260, also Sieber, on his map of Jerusalem); the valley of Rephaim has also been confounded with it, in that it has been allowed to begin south of Zion (comp. the map of Grimm), whilst this valley running from Bethlehem from south to north, only runs into the valley of Hinnom opposite to Zion, and according to Josh. 15: 8; 18: 16, it appears that the same mountain which limited the valley of Hinnom in the west, limited the valley of Rephaim in the north. According to Jer. 19: 2, it lay before the east gate; according to Josh. 18: 16; 15: 8, the borders of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin ran through the valley of Hinnom; according to Neh. 11: 30, Beersheba and the valley of Hinnom were the bounds of the tribe of Judah (see Wilk., Tyr., 8, 2, in Gest. Franc., Korte, Trav., 161, 186; Brocke, II., 38; and comp. Reland, Paläst. 353). The beginning of the depression of the valley of Hinnom is west of Jerusalem, south from the road to Joppa; its southern direction, however, turns at the western angle of Zion towards the east, and declines into the lower valley of Kidron not far from the tombs of the kings (Robinson, II., p. 38, sq). The portion of the valley of Hinnom made notorious by the worship of Moloch (which Josias defiled, 2 Kings 23 : 10; Jer. 7 : 31; 19 : 6; 13 : 14; comp. Isaiah 30 : 33), was called Tophet (תֹּפֶת, Tophēd, Tophā, Taphēd) from the Chaldean ܬܦܬ = to vomit (comp. Böttch. de infernis, I., p. 80, 85), and it is just this extreme point (described by Robinson, I., 365, 366, as a chasm filled with gardens and groves), where the valley of Hinnom descends into that of Kidron. Jerome says (ad Jer., 7, 31): Illum locum significat, qui Siloe fontibus irrigatur et est amœnus atque nemorosus hodieque hortorum præbet delicias. Eusebius says (Onom., under Θαπέδ): Εν προαγείοις Αιλίας ἔτι νῦν δείκνται ὁ τόπος οὕτω καλε- μένος, ὃ παράκειται ἡ καλυμμένη τε κρυφίως καὶ ὁ ἀγρὸς τε περαμίως, ἢ τὸ Ἀχιλδαμάχ χωρίον. Concerning this parallel, comp. the Art. Aceldama. PRESSER—Beck.

Geiler, of Kaisersberg. — The latter part of the 15th century is important for the history of homiletics. The pulpit strives to free itself from the yoke of scholasticism, and to gain a fresher life. This advance is due less to the revival of classical studies, than to a desire generally felt, and increased by the invention of printing, to come nearer to the apprehension of the laity, and thus to exert a stronger influence upon them than hitherto. In order to do this, the preacher had to accommodate himself to the views of the people, use their language, renounce the stiff rules of scholastic homiletics, and speak with more liveliness and ease. Such popular preachers arose contemporaneously in France, Italy, and Germany. Their works abound in expressions and images, which offend our more refined taste, but were then necessary to popular eloquence. Use has at times been made of these phenomena, to establish a special class of grotesque and burlesque preachers, whose sorties of wit have excited merriment, and who have received more attention in comic than in theological literature. But it has been forgotten that this very return to the imaginative and often uncouth language of the people, this exodus from the terminology and method of scholasticism, was an advance which deserved far more serious consideration. In Germany Geiler was the most eminent of these popular preachers. He was born at Schaffhausen, March 16, 1445. In his third year he lost his father, but was educated by his grandfather, a wealthy citizen of Kaisersberg. In 1460 he visited the University of Freiburg, where, in three years afterwards, he became doctor artium. In 1465 he lectured on the commentaries of Alexander of Hales, the sentences of P. Lombard, and several books of Aristotle. In 1469 he became dean of the facultas artium. He does not seem at this time as yet to have purposed to enter the priesthood; to this purpose he was led by the reading of mystical books, especially those of Gerson. In order to study these, he went, in 1471, to Basle, where also he lectured on philosophy, and in 1474 became Decanus artium. In the same year he was made Baccalaureus, and in 1475 Doctor of Theology. In 1476 he was called to Freiburg as Professor of Theology; shortly after he was elected rector of the University. But the entire constitution of his mind qualified him more for the office of preacher than of professor; when, therefore, he was called as preacher to Würzburg, he did not hesitate to accept the call. When he was about to remove to this new sphere, he was prevailed upon by P. Schott, bailiff at Strasburg, to choose the latter city as the sphere of his labors. At Strasburg there was at that time a want of pious and qualified preachers. Protracted quarrels between the begging friars and the clergy had done great injury to religion, especially in the congregation of the minster. To prevent further disturbances, the authorities had even taken down the pulpit of the minster. But the first movements of a better spirit brought effectual help. Schott established from his own income an endowment to support a preacher, who was to be a D. D., and to belong to no order. Geiler was the first one called to this endowment. He followed the call, and, from 1478 to his death, labored at Strasburg with a zeal which has brought his memory down to the present time. One of his first sermons was on the death of Bishop Robert. April 18, 1482, he opened a Synod at Strasburg with a sermon on the degeneracy of the clergy, especially the higher; and the necessity to restore purer morals. Bishop Albrecht, though little inclined to adopt Geiler's counsels, nevertheless instituted a visitation of his diocese, by which many abuses were brought to light. In 1485 Geiler was urgently invited by Frederick, Bishop of Augsburg, to become his chaplain; and if not this, at least to spend a year at Augsburg, in order to be a model to his clergy and a teacher to his people. In 1488 Geiler satisfied this wish; he delivered at Augsburg a series of sermons, which was afterwards printed. The Bishop with difficulty allowed him to return to Strasburg; but Geiler again visited the city the year after. At the same time Basle made him a brilliant offer. Philip, Archbishop of Cologne, also wished to secure him; but the requests of his friends detained him at Strasburg. Here he was so popular, that the chapel in which he preached soon became too small, and the wardens of the minster created for him in the nave of the church a beautiful pulpit, which is still an object of admiration. The Emperor Maximilian, who often visited Strasburg, also formed an attachment for Geiler, attended his preaching at every visit, and created him imperial chaplain. In 1503 he invited Geiler to visit him, and sent to him 50 florins for his traveling expenses. Geiler was also highly esteemed by the authorities, who listened respectfully to his proposals for the elevation of morals, and the improvement of the Church. Nor did he enjoy in a less degree the confidence of the people, to serve whom was his constant aim. He strove above all to establish a public Latin gymnasium, and a higher school for theology and canonical law. Though he did not succeed in this, a Latin school was nevertheless established in connection with the minster; and, at Geiler's suggestion, a distinguished humanist from the school at Schlettstadt placed at its head. He urged, moreover, the abolition of the rack, a more humane treatment of prisoners, the erection of a public charity fund, in order to stop street-begging, and that the sacraments should be allowed to criminals condemned to death. At the election to supply a successor to Bishop Albrecht, deceased, he exhorted the chapter to have in view the good of the Church alone. He died March 10, 1510, universally lamented by the people, who loved him for his benevolence, gentleness, independence and purity. Brant, Rhenanus, Reuchlin, and some younger humanists, among whom was Melanchthon, wrote elegies and epitaphs upon him. The monks of St. John, at Strasburg, erected in their church a tablet to his memory. By his will G. devised his excellent library to remain in the minster parsonage for the use of his successors. His other property he devised to his relatives, the poor, the hospital at Colmar, and various churches. — In theology Geiler was a mystic, though of the French school. He therefore condemned not only those who wished to become too ecstatic in their contemplation, those of the free spirit, but even said of Tauler that he could be followed only when properly understood. His favorites were St. Bernard and Gerson; to the latter of whom he showed a remarkable similarity of mind and labor. On a journey to Marseilles in order to visit the grave of M. Magdalene, he stopped at Lyons to visit Gerson's grave and obtain copies of some of his works. Some of the Chancellor's works he translated and published with a preface from his own pen; others he explained in his sermons. At the same time, however, Geiler moved yet wholly within the sphere of scholasticism; for although at times he denounced useless discussions and subtleties, he nevertheless wished the scholastics to be used in the schools; and when the war against them commenced, he urged Wimpfeling to defend the "disputations theologians." He rejoiced in the revival of classical studies, but this only to a certain extent; for although he had been classically educated, although intimate with Reuchlin, Wimpfeling, Rhenanus, Brant, and other humanists; he nevertheless feared with some of the latter, that these revived studies would injure the "noble and subtle dialectics" of the middle ages, and that the reading of the heathen poets would taint the morals of the young. His reformatory tendencies have been set at too high an estimate. It is true, he preached against the degeneracy of the clergy and the worldliness of the monasteries; he complained that there were so many theologi, but so few theophili; he expressed some few evangelical ideas; nevertheless all his labors have in view the reformation of life, and not the purity of doctrine. Although attacked by immoral monks and ignorant priests he still regarded the Church as the highest authority in matters of faith. He preached "that the Scriptures must not be interpreted according to private judgment" as is done by those of the Free Spirit; nor according to the text, as the Hussites; but we must understand the text as the holy teachers have interpreted it. He believed in astrology, witches, and ghosts; outward works were not without value; and although he urged the removal of indecent customs and noisy displays in worship, sought to lighten the penitential code, and refused to countenance the preachers of indulgences; he yet on the other hand insisted upon other exercises and customs, which are peculiar to Catholic piety. Besides the pilgrimage to the grave of St. Magdalene, he made frequent others to a hermitage in Upper Alsace; and one, at the head of numerous citizens of Strasburg, to Maria Einsiedeln. He loved the monastic life, and often retired to the monasteries of the Carthusians and of St. John. In his earlier life, the dissuasions of others had prevented him from becoming a hermit; in his later years, amid the battle between the new regeneration and the defenders of the middle ages, he often longed to retire into solitude. He warned against the delusion of those, who hoped for a restoration of the Church according to the model of the first centuries; and advised all to attend to their own souls, and commend themselves to God. — As to his sermons, preached at various places, he published few of them himself. They were preached from sketches previously prepared. In his earlier years his sermons, according to the prevailing custom, were very lengthy; but he soon saw the inutility of this, and confined himself to a more reasonable time. Some of his hearers wrote them down as he preached them; many of them were translated into Latin for the benefit of other preachers. J. Other, of Speier; P. Wickgram, and J. Biethen, of Reichenweier, formed collections of them. Some of these Latin editions were afterwards again translated, with more or less freedom, into the German. But most of Geiler's sermons were published in German contemporaneously with the Latin. The latter generally give a shorter text, omitting mostly the "accidens facietia." But in all these collections the same spirit, style, and language prevail. — Geiler did not always take his text from the Bible; nor was his matter always original, for many of his sermons are derived from theological works at his command. In this way he made use of the works of Gerson, Albert the Great, the Dominican Humbertus, St. Bernard, Nicholas of Dinkelsbühl, Chrysostom, and others. But he did not use theological works only; it was quite consonant to his free and popular manner to make use of other works also, especially such as exposed the follies and vices of the age. His themes were often taken from particular circumstances, events, and occasions. His exegesis is allegorical throughout; his analogies, though striking at times, are often very far-fetched; his allegories are often carried out to the minutest particulars. But the chief characteristic of his sermons is his return to the language of the people. The language of the pulpit at that time was an unintelligible medley of Latin and German: Geiler was one of the first to condemn this, and to use in his sermons the German only. With a living language he combined an outspoken earnestness against the follies and sins of all ranks, a deep knowledge of life in its minutest particulars, and a lively sympathy with the views of the people in his age. Besides contemporary poets, jurists and theologians, he quotes heathen philosophers and historians, the Church Fathers and scholastics, of whom, perhaps, his hearers knew little; but narratives, anecdotes, proverbs, analogies from nature, or from men and animals, all these render his discourses exceedingly popular, forcible and clear. His humor, which in conversation with friends found vent in sportive sallies, was not wanting in his sermons. Such facetiae, having always a moral bearing, were several times collected into a volume. G., however, always avoided any violation of the pious sense. It is true that he uses expressions, plays upon words, and comparisons, which offend our taste; but our taste is not that of the 16th century. Even if Geiler at times excited the laughter of his hearers, and joined in it himself, this did not in those times injure his usefulness. Only by this racy, popular style he could gain that influence of which his contemporaries speak. In this way he also prepared the way for the Reformation, especially in Strasburg. For the perfection of the German language he did important service, as he tried to remedy its poverty in theological and philosophical terms. — The various editions of G.'s sermons have become scarce: the following catalogue, though as perfect as possible, is confined to the most necessary data. — I. Das irrig Schaf, etc.: Strasb., 4to., 1514. Der Seelen Paradis, etc.: Strasb., 1510, fol. These were collected or revised by Geiler. — II. Sermons published by unknown persons: Predigen teutsch und viel gutter leeren: Augsb., 1508 and 1510, fol., published without Geiler's knowledge. Das Buch Granatapfel, etc.: Augsb., 1510, fol.; Strasb., 1511, 1516, fol. Das buoch arbore humana: Strasb. 1510, 1518, 1521, fol. Von den dry Marien: Strasb., 1520, fol. Das buoch der sünden des munda: Strasb., 1518, fol. Fier predig von U. L. F. himelfart u. empfangnis: Strasb., 1512, fol. — III. Sermons published by J. Othet: Navicula sive Speculum fatuorum: Strasb., 1510, 1511, 1513, 4to. Christenlioh fol. Navicula poenitentiae: Augsb., 1511, fol.; bilgerschaft zum ew. vaterland: Strasb., 1512, Strasb., 1512, 1513, 1517, 1519, 4to. Fragmenta passionis dom. nostr. J. C., sub typo placenta melleae: Strasb., 1507, 1508, 1511, 4to. Sermones de orat. domin.: Stras., 1509, 1510, 1515, 4to. — IV. Sermons published by J. Pauli: Das Evangelibuch: Strasb., 1515, fol.; Basle, 1522, fol. Her der Kunig ich diene gern.: Strasb., 1516, 1517, 1520, fol. Die Emeis, das buch von der Omeissen: Strasb., 1516, 1517, fol. Die brüsamlin ufgelesen von F. J. Paulin: Strasb., 1517, fol. — V. By H. H. Wessmer: Postill über die fyer Evangelia durchs johr: Strasb., 1522, fol. — VI. By P. Wickgram: Sermones et varii tractatus, Strasb., 1518, fol.; 1519, 4to. The Predigen von den Stufen-psalmen: Strasb., 1515, fol., mentioned by Oberlin, are unknown to me. Some other works by Geiler are mentioned by Trithemius in his Catalog. illustr. vir. Germ., written in 1495. — See concerning Geiler, the brief biographies by Wimpfeling and Rhenanus. — RIEGGER, Amoenit. literar. Frib.: Ulm, 1775; Fascic., I. p. 54, etc. OBERLIN, D. Joh. Geileri script. german.: Strasb., 1786, 4to. Jörden's Lexik. deutscher Dicht. u. Prosaisten: Leipz., 1807, Vol. II., p. 589, and Vol. VI., 383. AMMON, Geiler's Leben, Lehren und Predigten: Erlang., 1826. AUG. STORBER, Essai hist. et littér. sur la vie et les serm. D. G.: Strasb., 1834, 4to. C. SCHMIDT. — Reinecke.

Gelasius I., Pope from 492–496, was one of those occupants of the Roman See who aimed at the enlargement of the papal prerogatives. Claiming for it the highest judicial authority and supervision over the orthodoxy and execution of ecclesiastical laws in entire Christendom, on the ground of the primacy transmitted by Peter and exercised by him in conjunction with Paul, he wrote in a letter to Faustus (MANSI, Sacrorum Concil. nova et ampliss. collectio, T. VIII., p. 19): Quantum ad religionem pertinet, non nisi apostolicæ sedi juxta canones debetur summa judicii totius. Greater than the authority of Councils was that of the Papal See, as we read in his Decretum de libris recipiendis et non recipiendis (in MANSI, l. c., p. 157): Sancta Romana ecclesia nullio synodico constitutio ceteris ecclesiis prælata est, sed evangelica voce Domini et Salvatoris nostri Primatum obtinuit: Tu es Petrus, etc. An appeal from the Roman chair he held to be inadmissible. The so-called Decretum Gelasii de libris recip., &c., incorrectly ascribed to one Gel., it having received its present form, in all probability, in the 6th cent. The De duabus in Christo naturis adversus Eutychen et Nestorium, liber sacramentorum, and several other less important works, were composed by him. His letters, of most consequence. Numbered among the saints of the Romish Church, his memory celebrated on Nov. 18. — (Comp. MANSI, l. c.; SCHRÖCKH, K.-Gesch., XVII., p. 181; REGENBRECHT, de canonibus Apostolorum et codice Eccl. hispanæ Diss. Vratisl., 1828, particularly in relation to Decretum Gelas. — II., Pope, before John of Gaeta, of noble family, educated at Monte Casino by Abbot Oderisius, made Chancellor by Pope Urban II., Cardinal-deacon by Pope Paschal II., after whose death, elected Pope Jan. 18, 1118, by the party opposed to Emperor Henry V., and consecrated at Gaeta, Feb. 24. Forced by his opposition to the claim of the Emperor to investiture, he fled to Gaeta. The Emperor having set up an anti-Pope at Rome (March 14, 1118) Gel. went to Capua, convened a Council and issued a bull against him and Greg. VIII. Having wandered a fugitive, he finally arrived in France and died in the monastery Clugny, Jan. 29, 1119. — (See Vita Gelasii, by Pandulph of Pisa, in Muratorii, Scriptores Rerum Italicarum, III., p. 367; MANSI, l. c., XXI., p. 162, 166; SCHLOSSER's Weltgesch., III., 1, p. 239.

NEUDECKER. — Ermentrout.

Gelasius, of Cysicus, in the Propontis, the son of a presbyter, and himself a clergyman. Whether a bishop in Cæsarea and Palestine, is more than doubtful. Chiefly known as the author of a work: Συντάγμα τῶν κατὰ τὴν ἐν Νιζαία ἀγίαν οὐνοῦ προχθιῶν, in three parts, the first treating of the conflict between Constantine and Maxentius, and the victory of the former over Licinius; the second, of the ground and spread of Arianism, the debates between the Arians and the orthodox; the third, of its history to the death of Constantine. So full of errors that Cave characterizes it: sed ut verum fatear, prolixæ istæ disputationes ex ipsius Gellertii, saltem antiquissimi codicis ab eo usurpati auctoris cerebro mihi fluxisse videntur. More severely Elias Dupin: "mauvais compilateur" who "a recueilli sans jugement ce qu'il a trouvé de bon et de mauvais sur le concile de Nicée, sans examiner si cela était vrai ou faux." — (Comp. according to Bähr, 476, first publ. in Lutet., 1599, then 1604. To be found in collections of Councils, and in German in G. D. Fuch's Bibliothek der K.-versammlung (Leipzig, 1780), I., p. 416; comp. Cave, hist. lit. scr. eccles., I., p. 454; Du Pin, nouvelle bibl. des aut. eccl., IV., p. 280; Schröckh, K.-gesch., V., p. 354 and 386). DR. PRESSEL.—Ermentrout.

Gellert, Christian Fürchtegott, born in 1715 at Haynichen, a small town in Saxony, was the third son of a clergyman. His earliest education he obtained at the school of his native town. He showed an early fondness for versification, in which he was encouraged to persevere by a successful poem on the birthday of his father. He continued his studies at Meissen, and after 1734 studied theology at Leipsic. Mosheim and Ernesti were his theological ideals. After four years of study, he ventured for the first time, though with much diffidence, to preach in his native town. In his 15th year, in making an address at the funeral of a child, he had broken down. This misfortune seems to have decided his future career. His timidity never forsook him; his memory also was treacherous: so that with all his other qualifications for the pulpit, the latter was not destined to be his sphere. Providence, however, opened another sphere of usefulness for him. At first he was entrusted with the education of the two young lords of Löttichau; afterwards he prepared a nephew for the university (of Leipsic), and in 1741 accompanied him thither. Here he in a manner studied a second time; and, in order to gain a subsistence, gave instruction to youths. About this time he first appeared as author by publishing several of his fables, narratives, and poems. Somewhat later he published, in connection with some friends, especially J. E. Schlegel and brothers, the "Vermischten Beiträge." Having in 1744 become A. M., he now appeared as docent, and also published at short intervals his fables and narratives, comic and pastoral plays, his romance called the "Swedish Countess," his spiritual odes and hymns, besides miscellaneous in prose and verse. This is not the place to examine G.'s services in the sphere of literature. But that the same man who, as a writer of fables, deeply affected the life of the German people, especially its middle classes, "who wrote verses and plays," should also create an epoch as a writer of hymns, and by his character give an edifying testimony in favor of the practical effects of Christianity, at a time when the latter was suffering severe attacks from Deism, which was just spreading in Germany, this secures for him no insignificant position in the history of the Church, or rather, of religious life in Germany. In 1751 G. became Prof. Extr. of poetry and rhetoric at Leipsic. His lectures, at first on literature and afterwards on ethics, were so crowded that the lecture-room became too small.

From all sides, too, he received the most touching proofs of love and respect. With what scrupulous conscientiousness he sought to restrain the students from excesses, and to imbue them with a love for religion and virtue, of this Gæthe has given testimony, though not without a taint of irony. That the vein of hypochondria which appears in G.'s life gave to his lectures a lachrymose cast, and to his ethics a penal irksomeness, which forms a strange contrast with the sprightliness and sportive mischief of his writings, may readily be granted; although it would be exceedingly unjust to ascribe this disposition of his mind to Christianity. It is well known how highly Frederick the Great esteemed him. He wished to enlist G. in the service of Prussia; but G. preferred to remain at Leipsic, where, after much bodily and mental suffering, but nevertheless in a joyful trust in the help of God and the mercy of his Savior, he died Dec. 13, 1769. — G. was long admired as a hymnic poet; and although this former unbounded applause has considerably lessened, yet the most unsparing criticism would not succeed in ejecting the poet from the hearts of the people, or his hymns from the Church. On their first appearance (1757), several of them were immediately introduced into newly published hymn-books. They found favor even in the Romish Church. Their success in his own and later ages, is due to G.'s hearty piety, which was the truest and most faithful expression of his life.—The publication of his hymns, according to Cramer, his biographer, was to him the most solemn and important labor of his life. He never worked upon it, without striving with all the earnestness of his soul to experience the same emotions which they were intended to express. He generally devoted to it his serenest moments; and often paused in order to allow the disposition, which he wished to arouse in his Christian brethren, to gain strength in his own heart. This reveals to us the secret of the power of G.'s hymns. Objective criticism may discover in them many violations of taste, and doctrinal inaccuracy. Many of them are not properly Church-hymns; others possess the true characteristics of the hymn, besides a certain lyrical elevation; so that they may, though bearing the impress of their age, be used as witnesses of their age along with the best of ancient and modern hymns. The poet's own pious subjectivity is the keynote of his hymns; a subjectivity, however, which has found an echo in thousands of hearts, and has thus become truly objective. G.'s odes and hymns were translated into the French, Danish, Russian, and Dutch, and were furnished with music by various composers.—G.'s prose writings also exerted a salutary influence upon the religious mind of their age, although they do not, as regards distinctness of ethical and dogmatic ideas, satisfy the strict demands of science. The specifically Christian is often confounded with the merely religious; and the latter, again, with the moral. But in judging him, we must not forget his age—the transition from a worn-out orthodoxy to a still groping and uncertain illumination. He always seeks to rescue the positive doctrines of Christianity as sacred mysteries.—(See his biography by J. A. Cramer, 1774. His complete works were published, Leips. 1766, 1769, and often reprinted. The latest ed. is that of Weidmann, Leips. 1839, 10 vols. 8vo, with portrait.—See also the Histories of Literature, by Gelzer, Gervinus, and Vilmar; A. Koch, Gesch. des K.-Lieds, III., p. 22.—Gellertbuch von F. Naumann, Dresden, 1854.) HAGENBACH.—Reinecke.

Genealogical Registers are the simplest, most primitive styles of history, whether oral or written; and, when containing births and ages (as in Exod. 5 and 11), are of great service in the department of chronology. They are history in its most general outlines, as consisting of names and dates which, among a people like the Orientals, who were beginning to elevate themselves above the mere consciousness of nature to that of history, were always connected with recollections ever fresh, and oral narratives (comp. Gen. 5 : 22–24).—In this form was composed Genesis—the first historical book of the Israelites—which, containing the rise of the holy people from the family, and going back to the beginning of humanity itself, starts with the generations. But as in Abraham all the nations were to be blessed (Gen. 12 : 3), and, as through revelation the people were led to look beyond themselves to God, and so to man as such, there arose a universal consciousness, and with it the writing of history proper. Hence were carefully preserved the primitive, pre-Israelitish traditions (Gen. 1–11), in which were interwoven genealogical registers of the whole human family (Gen. 10). Genealogy thus became Ethnography, and Ethnography History (comp. Acts 17 : 26). But as the Messiah, in capacity of ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, had necessarily to be of the nature and race of man, out of this general genealogy emerged the Messianic, or, to speak more correctly, the former grew out of the latter.

As the Messianic genealogy formed the central-point of the Jewish economy, those races only are mentioned in the sacred records which stand more or less directly connected with it. Thus, in the time before the deluge, the Sethitic genealogy (Gen. 5) is minutely stated, while but few of the Canaanite stem are mentioned; and the order interrupted the moment it reached, in the person of Lamech and his family, a certain height of wickedness (Gen. 4 : 17–24). The same relation obtained between the genealogy already mentioned and the Shemitic genealogy (Gen. 11 : 10). The former are continued only to a certain point (see Baumgarten's Theol. Comment. on Pentateuch, I., p. 134), while the latter progresses from the new humanity in Noah to the beginning of God's people in Abraham, from whose time onward, in place of mere genealogy, we find in Genesis detailed family histories, and the lateral branches only of the holy family given genealogically, as Nahors, 22 : 20–24; Keturah, 25 : 1–4; Esau, chap. 36. When Jacob went to Egypt, in order to show the continuance of the chosen race, a careful genealogical enumeration of its members is given in c. 46 : 8–27. This Egyptian sojourn over, his family had become so numerous that the Scriptures only mention the twelve chiefs of the tribes (Exod. 1 : 1–7), the genealogy of Moses and Aaron excepted, which are given more in detail

(Exod. 6 : 14–27). From this time the rule was to state the more immediate descent of the leaders in Israel (Exod. 35 : 30–34; 1 Sam. 1 : 1; 9 : 1; Zeph. 1 : 1; Zach. 1 : 1). When the Israelites were called upon to conquer the promised land, a roll of their fighting men was drawn up (Numb. 1), and a catalogue of the people on the plains of Moab (Numb. 26). In the course of time, the dying Jacob having already designated Judah the Messianic stem (Gen. 49 : 8–12), the Messianic family began to be distinguished from among the people generally. The design of the book of Ruth being to point out the descent of David, it concludes with a genealogical register which runs from Judah to David (4 : 12, 17–22). From David onward to the Babylonian exile, his dynasty was the bearer of the Messianic lineage, while, during this period, a census of the people was taken (2 Sam. 24 : 1), and, no doubt, the old registers continued or new ones begun (perhaps referred to 1 Chron. 9). After the exile, we find in the Chronicles a general history of the people, from the theocratic point of view, to their captivity in Babylon. They contain, on the one hand, the Davidico-Messianic conception, and, on the other, a reference to the institutions of the priesthood and of the sanctuary. The narrative proper begins with Saul's death and David's reign (1 Chron. 10), the earlier history being represented by genealogical registers which, running from Adam to some point in the prophetic period, fills up the first third of the first book. They include also the Messianic genealogy with its lateral branches; Adam to Abraham and Israel, chap. 1, Israel and Judah to David, chap. 2, David to beyond Serubabel, chap. 3; to which are added the descendants of Judah and the remaining tribes, Sebulon and Dan omitted, while Levi is treated of in detail (5 : 27–6, 66, comp. chap. 23–26). In Ezra and Nehemiah, a genealogical register (Neh. 7 : 5) of the Jews who returned with Serubabel from exile (Ezra 2; Neh. 7), in Ezra, of those that came back with him (8 : 1–14), and a list of priests and Levites who had married foreign wives (10 : 18–43). See also Neh. c. 11, and 12 : 1–26.

In the New Test. is continued the Messianic genealogy, by Matthew and Luke; the former, designing to show for the benefit of the Jews that the Messiah was the son of David and Abraham (1 : 1), begins with the rise of the chosen people in Abraham, and, through forty-two generations, descends to Jesus (v. 2–17); while the latter, who wrote for the Gentiles, and wished to prove that Jesus was not only the Messiah of the Jews, but the Saviour of the whole world, does not trace the genealogy to Jesus, but starting from Him runs it backward not only to Abraham, but to Adam and God. For the difficulties connected with these genealogies, see Comment., part. Wieseler in the Studien u. Krit., 1845, II.; Ebrard, wissenschaftl. Krit. der ev. Gesch., 2 Aufl., p. 188; Riggenbach in the Stud. u. Krit., 1855, p. 575, who agree with Lightfoot, Bengel, Paulus, Olshausen, Lange, &c., in the conclusion—no doubt the most correct one—that Matthew, in order to prove Jesus to be the legitimate heir of David's throne, gave the genealogy of Joseph, and Luke that of Mary, to prove that he stood in blood-relationship with humanity.—With the death and resurrection of Jesus, terminates the significance of genealogy. For, as He was not only κατὰ σάρκα, the son of Abraham and Adam, but κατὰ πνεῦμα, the Son of God (Rom. 1:4; 9:5), in which latter aspect Melchizedec was his type as ἀγενεαλόγητος (Heb. 7:3); so, having elevated, through death, his flesh to a life-giving spirit, He begat "a new humanity of heavenly seed, and removed the significance of natural generation." — (Nagelsbach, der Gottmensch, I., p. 366.)

AUBERLEN.—Ermentrout.

General-Vicar (vicarius, officialis generalis).

—As the Bishops were not able to discharge in propria persona all the duties devolving upon them, it soon became customary to appoint assistants, the first of whom were the Archdeacons (see Arts. Archdeacon, Bishop, Coadjutor, &c.), who were clothed with a portion of their jurisdiction. As these, however, soon became too independent of the B., from the 13th cent. they were superseded by Vicars. For districts foras sedem episcopalem, vicarii foranei were appointed, and as proper representative of the B. a vicarius generalis, principalis, in spiritualibus (see note to c. 2; Clem. de rescriptis, I., 2).

The General-Vicar was selected either by the B., or by the Apost. Chair (Ferraris, biblioth. can. s. v. Vicarius gen., Art. I., nro. 6, 7). Qualified for this office any clergyman who, besides being 25 years old, possessed the requisite knowledge of canonical law (Conc. Trid. sess. XXIV., cap. 16, de reform.). A member of his Chapter generally chosen by the B., but not a Pœnitentiarius (Ferraris, l. c., Art. I., nro. 36), nor one who had curam animarum (see Congreg. Trid. of 1685, in Richter's Ausg. der Tridentin. zur sess. XXIV., cap. 12, de reform., nro. 31, page 354), who also fixed the sphere of his duties. He was allowed to discharge all those episcopal acts for which no mandatum speciale was required; not the jura ordinis of the B., nor the jura jurisdictionis episcopalis which were based on Papal delegation, nor those that flowed from the lex diœcesana, nor the more important Jurisdictionalia, such as the bestowal of Benefices, visitation of the Diocese, nor dispensations from irregularities and suspension from ordo on account of some crime in foro conscientie (Conc. Trid. sess. XXIV., cap. 6, de reform. "per vicarium ad id specialiter deputandum." Comp. Ferraris, l. c., Art. II., nro. 19–83, Benedict XIV., de synodo diœcesana, lib. II., cap. VIII.). Canonists have frequently disputed whether the jurisdiction of the General-Vicar be ordinary or delegated (see Art. Jurisdiction). As his authority, though resting on the episcopal decree, was legally bound to his office as a jurisdictio ordinaria, making him thus to represent the B., and to exercise the same judgment (idem auditorium utriusque—unum et idem consistorium sive auditorium consendum, c. 2, de consuetudine in VI.^o, c. 3, de appellationibus in VI.^o), it would seem that no appeal could be carried from him to the B., but to his superiors, those instances excepted which were assigned him by a special mandate (comp. Ferraris, l. c., Art. 41, nro. 41–43, and s. v. jurisdictio, nro. 15, Gonzalez Telles, on c. 5, X., de officio vicarii, I., 28), as was always the case with the vicarius foraneus. Among other official rights, the General-Vicar was entitled to compensation. The office ceases either by the recalling of the appointment, or by the death or removal of the B. The see becoming vacant, it is filled by the Vicar appointed by the Chapter (Conc. Trident. sess., XXIV., cap. 16, de ref.).—If the extent or duties of a diocese demand it, several Vicars are appointed. More recent regulations place by the side of the General-Vicar a College, of which he is president. Besides this, also, a special Consistory, &c. These together constitute the Ordinariat.

See Kober über den Ursprung u., die rechtl. Stellung der Gen.-Vic., in der Tübing. theol. Quartalschr. von Kuhn, u. A. 1853, Heft IV., p. 535–590. H. T. JACOBSON.—Ermentrout.

Genesis, see Pentateuch.

Genesius.—For an account of the wonderful conversion of this man, see Vita Sancti ad diem XXV. Aug., by L. Surius; Acta Martyr. Amstelod., 1713, fol., p. 269, by Th. Ruinart; Act. SS., Antwerp, August, T. V., p. 122, by W. Cuper; Gesch. der Relig. Jesu Christe, 9 Bd., p. 353, by Fr. L. Stolberg. Its genuineness has been doubted. The story runs in this wise: At a farce performed in obedience to the orders of the Emp. Diocletian, the object of which was to ridicule the Christians, Genesius plays the part of a drunken candidate for baptism, who, this sacrament received, wishes to die a Christian. Two other actors now appear, the one as priest, the other as exorcist. In reply to the question why they were called in, Gen., not hypocritically, but sincerely answers: "Because I wish to receive the grace of Christ, and, through it, to be delivered from my sins." Baptized and clothed in white, the soldiers conduct him before the Emperor, who was amazed at hearing from Gen. the reality of his conversion. Neither the scourge nor the rack could alienate him from the faith, and he was beheaded on Aug. 25, 290, on which day the Church celebrates his memory. As there seems to be some chronological error connected with this legend, the Bollandists date his conversion from the end of the 3d, or the beginning of the 4th cent.

DR. PRESSEL.—Ermentrout.

Gennesaret, Lake of.—The deep interest which this beautiful mountain lake with the country around it, as being the chief scene of the earthly life of the Saviour, and the home of several of his apostles, possesses to every Christian, justifies us in giving a detailed account of it. This lake of N. Palestine was anciently called ים כנרת, or כִּינֶרֶת, Numb. 31:11; Deut. 3:17; Josh. 11:2; 12:3; 13:27. It shared this name, derived according to the most probable etymology from כנרת (Lute), with a town and its territory situated on its N. W. coast, and belonging to the tribe of Naphtali (Josh. 19:35; 1 Kings 15:20). Once, Isa. 9:1, it is called simply the sea, the connection leaving no doubt what sea was meant. In the New Test. it is called λίμνη Γεννησαρίτ, Luke 5:1; comp. ὄθρον Γεννησαίρ, 1 Macc. 11:67; Jos. Ant., 13, 5, 7; λ. Γεννησαρίτ, ib. 18:2, 1, and under this name it is also best known to the Greeks (Strab., 16, p. 755) and Romans (Plin. H. N., 5, 15), as also the Targumists. This name is derived from a small district on the W. coast of the sea, which is mentioned, Matt. 14 : 34 ; Mark 6 : 53, as the land of Gennesaret ; and is described, Jos. B. J., 3, 10, 8, in such glowing colors. From these data, Robinson (Pal., III., p. 535, etc.) thought that he had found this district in the modern el-Ghuweis, as laid down on Kiepert's map. Lightfoot, centur. chorogr. (hor. ad Math.) cap. 70, supposes Gennesaret to be a later corruption of "Chinnereth." In the time of Christ the sea was very commonly called the "sea of Galilee" (Matt. 4 : 18 ; 15 : 29 ; Mark 7 : 31 ; John 6 : 1), from its situation in the contemporaneous Galilee (for before that time only a single district of this northern country was called גליל, see Gesenius, Is. 1, p. 350), to which, of course, only its western shore belonged. Another common name was "the sea of Tiberias" (John 6 : 1 ; 21 : 1 ; comp. λίμνη Τιβερις, Paus., 5, 7, 3) from the chief city of Galilee ; this name became the prevalent one among the Arabs, and has continued to the present day (Bahr-Tubarigeh). — Surrounded by the territories of Naphtali and Zebulon on the west (Matt. 4 : 13), and of Gad on the east, the lake has a nearly oval-shape. The accounts concerning its dimensions vary very much, since accurate measurements have not yet been taken. Jos. B. J., 3, 10, 7, gives the length at 140 stadia, and the breadth at 40 stadia, with which Pliny, H. N., 5, 15, agrees very nearly. In 1847, Lieut. Molineux traversed the entire length and breadth of it in a boat, and estimates its length at about 18 miles, and its breadth at 8–9 miles. De Bertou, who, in 1839, sailed around the lake, gives it a circumference of about 9 Germ. miles. Robinson (Pal., III., 573) estimates the length of the sea at about 12 miles, and its breadth at about 6 miles. There is a similar difference in the estimates of the altitude of its surface, compared with that of the Mediterranean ; it seems certain, however, that the former is at least several hundred feet below the latter. The depth of the water, according to Molineux, is about from 120–156 feet. In ancient times the sea was traversed by numerous ships ; Vespasian, indeed, gave a battle upon it (see Jos. B. J., 3, 10, 1, 5, 6, 9). In our own century, Burkhardt saw only a single, half-rotten boat upon it. — The water of the sea is clear, cool, sweet and wholesome (Jos. B. J., 3, 10, 7). Besides sweet-water snails, of the same kinds as those of the lower Jordan (Schubert, Reise, III., p. 238), many and excellent fish are found in it, for which it was also distinguished in the time of Christ and his apostles, Luke 5 : 4 ; and which seems to be indicated by the names of towns along the coast, as Bethsaida = Fishham, and Tarichæ = Pickle-town. It is remarkable, but observed already by Josephus (B. J., 3, 10, 8), and verified by subsequent travellers, that in the fountain at Capernaum the same fish are found as in the Nile. The fishery at present is a farmed monopoly, and is carried on only along the shores, though even now it might become very profitable. Water-fowls also, the pelican among others, frequent it (Wilson, the Lands of the Bible, II., pp. 113, 134). Since the Jordan traverses it, though not, as is sometimes asserted, without mingling its waters with those of the sea, it is not improbable that at certain places a movement of the water may be observed (Irby and Mangle's Trav., p. 295 ; Robinson, III., p. 567). During the rainy season the sea rises 3–4 feet above its usual level (Burkhardt, II., p. 577). Being closed in by high mountains, it is at times exposed to violent gusts of wind, which are dangerous to the fisheries ; Matt. 8 : 24–27 ; 14 : 24, etc. ; Luke 8 : 23 ; John 6 : 18. Russogazn, Reisen III., p. 136. — As regards the scenery along the shores, the reports of travellers have differed, owing to the different seasons in which the sea was visited. Its sacred associations, indeed, never lose their interest (Robinson, III., p. 500 ; Schubert, III., p. 231) ; and yet there is no picturesque charm ; no green meadows, shaded groves, or majestic peaks. Only bleak cliffs and mountain declivities without trees and sparsely covered with withered grass surround the sea, which is enlivened by not a solitary sail or bark. In its own time, the first months of spring, when the scorching sun has not yet destroyed all verdure, it is not wholly devoid of beauty. If we remember that the shores of this sea were once thickly populated and crowded with towns and villages ; whilst at present the chief places have been converted by earthquakes and human vandalism into heaps of ruins ; the entire eastern side the avoided home of the Bedouin robbers ; the western side an almost total solitude ; we can readily understand that the description given in Jos. B. J., 3, 10, 8, of the beauty and fertility of the shore of the sea, and the mildness of its air, was once strictly true. He speaks with admiration of its trees of many species, walnuts, palms, figs, olives, and grapes. Almost throughout the entire year the orchards yielded the most excellent fruits, for the different mountain elevations afforded a variety of climates, as also shelter. At the present time, the nakedness of the scenery makes a sad impression. The shores are sandy, shut in by steep, often precipitous, and naked mountains, which on the eastern side of the sea rise to 800 or 1000 feet, but are rather lower on the western side. But although almost wholly neglected by its indolent inhabitants, the nature of the soil has not changed. The shelter afforded by the mountains favors the growth of nearly all the tropical plants ; dates, citrons, oranges, indigo, rice, and sugar-cane grow almost in spite of the indolence of the inhabitants, who mostly cultivate only wheat, barley, tobacco, cotton, and excellent melons. The temperature of elevated places is moderate ; the neighboring, high plateaus are in winter covered with snow ; whilst in the lowlands snow is very unfrequent, the climate hot and unhealthy, since the unchecked access of the warm south winds, together with the abundant irrigation of the snowy region of Mt. Hermon, is very favorable to vegetation, but also in summer withers it almost entirely. In spring, on the other hand, hills, valleys, mountains and precipices are clothed in the most luxuriant verdure (see Sectæen, Burkhardt, Schubert, III., p. 232; Robinson, III., pp. 514, 540).—The basin of the sea of Galilee belongs geologically to the formation of the valley of the Jordan, and the Dead Sea to the gulf of Ailah on the Red Sea, and is evidently of volcanic origin. This is evident from the already mentioned depression of the level of the sea beneath that of the Mediterranean; from the geognostic formation of the surrounding mountains, which in the East are prevailingly basaltic, but belong in the West rather to the Jura-system, though also interrupted by veins of basalt. See Seetzen, p. 353; Schubert, III., p. 237; especially Russeger, III., pp. 134, 258; from the springs containing sulphur and common salt, with a temperature of $+46-49\frac{1}{2}^{\circ}$ Réaum.; and from the frequency of earthquakes in this entire region.—(See also RELAND, Palest., p. 258; HAMELSVELD, Bibl. Geogr., I., p. 476; v. LENGERKE, Kanaan, I., p. 43; WINER's R.W.B.; and especially RITTER, Erdkunde, XV., I., p. 281.

RÜTSCHE. — Reinecke.

Geneva Consensus and Catechism, see Calvin.

Gennadius, Presbyter at Marseille towards the close of 5th cent. († after 495), continued Jerome's work, de viris illustribus, to his own time (—495); (frequently published, e.g., Basle, 1529; best by I. A. Fabricius in the bibl. eccles.: Hamburg, 1718; and the treatise de fide in the Maur. edit. of August. (t. VIII.), and ed. Elmenhorst: Hamb., 1614), to the end of which he himself added eight books against all heresies, six against Nestorius, three against Pelagius, a tract, de mille annis et de Apocalypsi b. Joannis, and an epistola de fide mea ad Gelasium Urb. Rom. Ep. sive de dogmatibus eccles.; the first and last of which writings alone survived. Offended by Augustin's doctrine on predestination, he attached himself to the Semi-pelagian school that flourished in his day in the South of France (see Fabricius, l. c.; Neander, C. H., Vol. II., p. 647; Wigger's Aug. u. Pelag., II., p. 150; Bähr, chr. Dicht. u. Geschsch.). — Gennadius, Patriarch of Constantinople, theol. and philos. author of the 15th century. He was present at the conference (1438-39) between Pope Eugene IV. and the Greek Emperor, John VIII., Palæologus and the Patr. Joasaph, held at Ferrara and Florence for the purpose of effecting a union between the Greek and Rom. Churches, and frequently spoke in favor of a reconciliation. Finding, on his return home, that the people were opposed to the union which had with great pains been brought to pass, he changed his position and waged war against it.—Constant. having been taken by the Turks, 1453, Mohammed II. ordered the vacant Patriarch. see to be filled, and Gennadius—previously known by the name of Georgius Scholarius—was selected for that post.—As an author he was uncommonly prolific; as a theologian, able and erudite. His most important works: 1) Professio fidei, ὁμολογία περὶ τῆς ὁρθῆς καὶ ἀληθοῦς πίστεως τῶν Χριστιανῶν, a Conf. of Faith for the Sultan, frequently published in various languages—translated into Turkish and Arabic. 2) De via salutis, περὶ τῆς ὁδοῦ τῆς σωτηρίας ἀνθρώπων. 3) contra Automatas et Hellenistas, κατὰ Ἀντοματιστῶν καὶ Ἑλληνιστῶν. 4) De providentia et prædestinatione, περὶ προορισμοῦ. Also, a large number of homilies (e.g., de eucharistia, ed. Renandot: Paris, 1704), hymns, philos. and theol. essays.—(See Gass, Gennad. u. Pletho, Aristotel. u. Platonis, in d. gr. Kirche: Breslau, 1844).

WAGENMANN. — Ermentrout.

Genoveve, a saint of the Romish Church and patroness of Paris—her festival day on Jan. 3,—was born 424 or 425 at Nanterre, near Paris, according to some at Montrieux. Influenced by Bishop Germain of Auxerre, she took the vow of eternal chastity and virginity. Her austere life, however, failed to shield her against the charge of hypocrisy. The success of Aetius who defeated Atila near Chalons (451) was attributed to the prayers of Gen., whose reputation for sanctity was heightened by the miracles reported to have been done by her, such as restoring the blind and lame, &c. Died, 500, or, as some have it, 512, and was buried in the church she had built, 460, near Chastevil, over the graves of St. Dionysius and Eleutherius. Chlodwig erected a chapel for the preservation of her bones, which bore her name and remained to 1809. Under Louis XVIII. the Pantheon was called after her. In the 16th cent. miracles were still attributed to her remains, which were carried in procession and exposed to veneration when St. Anthony's fire raged among the inhabitants of Paris. Father Charpentier has written her biog., Paris, 1687.

NEUDECKER. — Ermentrout.

Genovevans (or canons of St. Genoveve), the name of an order instituted, 1614, by the monk Carl Faure, of the Abbey of St. Vincent, at Senlis. Occasioned by rules drawn up for the reformation of his order, the excellency of which caused their adoption by other monasteries. Cardinal Rochefoucault even availed himself of his services to reform the Abbey of St. Genoveve, and the Chancellor of the Sorbonne was a member of his establishment. Died 1644. To a general was entrusted the government of the order. The religious were obligated to give instruction, to hold divine service, to attend hospitals, to go to church at eight o'clock in the evening, and to fast every Friday.

The sisters of this order — Genovevaneses — daughters of St. Gen., now commonly called Miramionens, were established, 1636, by the piety of a woman, by name Blusset. In the year 1633 they were combined with a cloister, which had been founded, 1630, by Marie Bonneau de Rubelle Beaubarnois de Miramion, who became Superior. At her death (1694), her institute had reached a wide extension. Its members were bound to works of love, to the care of the sick and poor, the gratuitous education of children, to the daily recital of the office of Mary, to spend one hour each day and night in mental prayer, to serve a two years' noviciate, and to take the simple vows.

NEUDECKER. — Ermentrout.

Gentile, Joh. Valentin (see Antitrinitarians).

Gentillet, Innocens. But little is known of this distinguished Protestant jurist; not even the day of his birth and death. Born at Vienne, in Dauphiné. From Geneva, after the peace of 1576, he removed to Dié, as chief of the council, and soon after was made President of the Parliament of Grenoble, of which position he was deprived by an edict of 1585, and compelled to quit the country. Senebier (Histoire littéraire de Genève, II., 116) attributes to him several works, some of which were not composed by him. Of those known to be his, two, 1574 and 1576, discuss political subjects; a third is a translation of the Swiss Repub. by Simler. Also, Apologia pro Christianis. Gallis religionis evangelicæ seu reformatæ (according to Seneb., pub. 1558, but from the dedication to King of Navarra, Feb. 15, 1578, pub. 1578; ten years later a second edition, revised by Gentillet, Geneva, 1588, 8vo.; French, 1584, 1588, 8vo.), one of the best vindications of the Ref.; and Le bureau du concile de Trente, auquel est monstré qu'en plusieurs poincts iceluy concile est contraire aux anciens conciles et canons et à l'autorité du roy, ded. to the King of Navarra, Geneva, 1586, 8vo.; Latin, Examen concilii Tridentini, Gen. 1586, 8vo.; German, Basle, 1587, 8vo., one of the most thorough refutations of Trid. Conc.—See the Biographie Universelle and the France Protestante.

SCHMID. — Ermentrout.

Geography, Biblical, is that part of Biblical Archæology which treats of the knowledge of the earth, as far as it comes into view in the books of the Bible, and hence describes the ideas which the Hebrews had of the earth in general, as well as of the nations, countries, and cities which were known to them. (See Art. Arabia.) Their ideas of Mathematical and Physical Geography, like those of most of the nations of antiquity, are only popular ones, such as are derived from mere appearances. To the Hebrew, the earth is the centre of the Universe. For a light to it, the sun, moon, and stars, the greater and lesser lights in the firmament, are created. These are to give it light, warmth, and make it fruitful, and determine the division of time. (Gen. 1:14-18; Psal. 74:16; 136:7-9.) The sun moves around the earth from east to west, from one end of heaven to another, where it has its tent in which to rest over night from the labors of the day (Psal. 19:4-6; Eccl. 1:5). It may be miraculously arrested in its course at the command of God (Josh. 10:12, &c.), and may even be made to turn back (2 Kings 20:9, &c.; Isa. 38:8, &c.). Concerning the views of old Hebrews as to the form of the earth, nothing definite is recorded. From some poetical representations it may be assumed that their views on this point were middling confused, and far removed from all pretensions to scientific accuracy. To reproach the Bible on this account is just as unreasonable as to attempt, whilst professing faith in the same, to show, against the results of science, its conceptions on this subject to be the only true ones; for, on the one hand, the Bible is no text-book on Astronomy, Geography, and Natural Sciences, and its truths belong to an entirely different sphere; and, on the other hand, Divine Revelation, in order to be at all accessible to men, had to be clothed in the conceptions of those times in which it was given, otherwise it would not have been understood, and would at once have been rejected. Hence this one truth, often enough repeated in the Bible, is incontestably certain: God has created heaven and earth, and is their Lord. All beyond is merely human, imperfect, and partly even false conception. Such is the conception that God raised the earth from the surrounding water, and set bounds to this, which it cannot pass (Gen. 1:9; Job 38:8-11). The heavens are spread out over the earth as a brazen arch (עֲרֹכֶיץ), or as a tent or a curtain (Gen. 1:6; Isa. 40:22; 51:13). According to Job 26:7, the earth "is hung upon nothing," that is, floats freely in space; according to Psal. 136:6, it is founded upon the water. Of the founding of the earth as firm and immovable, Psal. 75:3, 104:5, also speak; hence also the foundations of the earth were laid by God (Prov. 8:29; Job 38:6). These foundations are the same as the "pillars" of the earth (Job 9:6; Psal. 75:3). According to Micah 6:2; comp. Prov. 8:25, the mountains are the foundations of the earth, the scaffolding upon which the earth rests. Whether this is an idea different from that of Job 26:7, where the earth is represented as "hung upon nothing," or whether, as Hirzel thinks (Comment. on this passage), they may be reconciled by supposing the writer to conceive the disk of the earth to be resting upon the foundations of the mountains; but these, instead of being laid upon a firm basis, as a building, resting themselves in the air, is not very clear. This latter view is, however, not necessary, if we will only distinguish properly between the poetical and popular conception, and the true knowledge. It is certain, however, that the writer of the book of Job regarded the subsistence of the earth, how founded, and how it was in void, as a Divine mystery (ch. 38:6). The ancient Hebrews, as well as the Greeks, seem to have conceived of the form of the earth as of a disk; at least such passages as the "circle (חֶגְגִּל) of the earth" (Isa. 40:22), and passages such as Prov. 8:27, Job 26:10, lead to this conclusion. The (four) "corners of the earth," כְּנָפֹת חֲאָרֶץ (Isa. 24:16; 41:12; Job 37:3; Ezek. 7:2), the "ends of the earth," קְצוֹת חֲאָרֶץ (Isaiah 40:28; Job 28:24; comp. the "four ends of heaven," Jer. 49:36), or the uttermost parts of the earth, יְרֵכָתִי חֲאָרֶץ (Jer. 6:22; 25:32), do not refer to a quadrangular form of the earth, but only to the four known regions of the earth. The Hebrews usually call these: the East, rising of the Sun, מוֹצֵא (Psal. 75:7), usually מִזְרָח, see Lexicon, or that which is before, the foreside עַל-פָּנֵי קֶדֶם (Gen. 16:12; 23:19; 1 Kings 9:7, &c.), because the oriental, in describing the regions of the heavens, turns his face towards the rising of the Sun. Hence, West is behind him אַחֲרָי (Job 23:8; Isaiah 9:11); South to his right יָמִין (Psal. 89:13; Job 23:9), תֵּימָן (Josh. 12:3; Job 9:9; Isaiah 43:6); North to his left שְׂמֹאל (Job 23:9; Gen. 14:15). For West, we also have: Setting of the Sun שֶׁשׁ שָׁמַיִם (Psal.

1: 1; 113: 3; Joshua 1: 7); or "the sea," namely, the great Mediterranean, because West of Palestine, יָם (Exod. 10: 19; 27: 12); יָם toward the West, (Gen. 28: 14; Exod. 26: 22; Num. 2: 18, &c.); for North, צָפוֹן (Exod. 6: 35; Num. 34: 7, &c.), i. e., the hidden, ark region, because the North was regarded as the land of darkness. On the contrary, the South is called קֶרֶן (Deut. 33: 23; Eccl. 1: 6; Ezek. 21: 2); i. e., the light region. So the South is also called נֶגֶב (Josh. 15: 4; 18: 19; Kings 7: 39, &c.), i. e., the dry, arid region.

Passing now to the biblical representation of the surface of the earth, as inhabited by man, we leave out of view whatever of mythical geography is contained in the description of Paradise (Gen. 2: 8-14), as this has been attended to in the article Eden (see Art.). Perhaps the oldest document of the geographical knowledge of the Hebrews we have, is the register of nations attached to the history of the flood (Gen. 10). As the waters of the flood began to disappear, Noah's ark rested upon the Armenian mountain group of the large and little Ararat (Gen. 8: 4). From here, Noah and his three sons, and other inhabitants of the ark, descended upon the earth, now dry; and from here the new human race spread abroad over the whole earth. The author of Gen. so describes this spreading abroad (ch. 10), as to derive all nations known to him, in three great groups, from the three sons of Noah, inasmuch as he represents the relations of nations under the figure of personal descent. This would furnish us with appropriate data as to the geographical horizon of the ancient Hebrews, and with a good foundation for our representation of biblical geography, were it not that this genealogical table is constructed more from an ethnological, than from a geographical point of view (Knobel, die Völkertafel der Genesis, s. 15), and, therefore, for our purpose, of less use. In addition to this, the table in question represents only the geographical knowledge of a certain period, which itself is not yet determined beyond all controversy; so that the later developments of geographical knowledge would require to be completed and added. For the purpose of a representation of Biblical geography, we must start with our knowledge of the countries here coming to view, and show how far these are known in the Bible. Of course, we can here only give an abstract in general outlines, as a detailed description is not the purpose of this article. We start, first of all, with Palestine—not as though we shared the views of the later Jews and the oriental Christians, that the Bible itself regards this land as the centre of the earth; a view which the rabbinical expositors deduce from Ezek. 38: 12 (see Buxtorf, Lex. Chald. col. 854, and יִרְמְיָהוּ), and Christian expositors from Ezek. 5: 5 (see Rosenmüller, bibl. Alterth. I. 1, p. 150, &c.). The latter passage rests certainly not upon a geographico-physical, but upon an ethical idea. We begin with Palestine, partly because it is the centre of biblical history; partly because the geographical knowledge of this land stands before us in the clearest light, whilst that of other lands grows faint as they are removed from this, until darkness covers the "ends of the earth."—The importance of Palestine demands a separate article, to which we refer. If we pass from Palestine over the countries east of the Jordan, eastward, we first come to the Great Desert of desolate Arabia (see Art.), in whose northern part, in an oasis, Tadmor, built by Solomon, lies (תַּדְמוֹר or תַּמָּר, 1 Kings 9: 18; 2 Chron. 8: 4), the Palmyra of the Greeks and Romans. This desert separates Palestine from Mesopotamia, which, as אֲרָם, or אֲרָם נַהֲרַיִם, constitutes a part of Aram, (see Article), which again includes Syria and Mesopotamia. Mesopotamia (Acts 2: 9) is the country between the rivers Euphrates and Tigris, in the northern part of which (Ur of the Chaldees and Haran) dwelt the ancestors of the Hebrews, with which they afterwards also continued their connection. Beside these cities of Northern Mesopotamia, the Bible mentions: Tel Abib, תֵּל אַבִּיב, on the Chebar, where dwelt a colony of exiled Jews, to whom the prophet Ezekiel went (Ezek. 3: 15); Carchemish, כַּרְכַּמִּישׁ, (Isa. 10: 9; Jer. 46: 2; 2 Chron. 35: 20), a fortified city on the Euphrates, where Pharaoh Necho was conquered by Nebuchadnezzar; Hena, הֵנָּה, Ivob, עֵוֹב, and Sepharvaim, סַפְרַיִם, cities or small territories in Mesopotamia, which were subjugated by the Assyrians (2 Kings 17: 24; 18: 34; 19: 13; Isa. 36: 19; 37: 13)—the latter being probably the Σιπάρρα of Ptolemy (v. 8), and Σιππαρηών of Abydenus in Eusebius (præp. evang. IX. 41), on the eastern shore of the Euphrates. Thelasar, תֵּל אֶשָׁר, (2 Kings 19: 12), or תֵּל אֶשָׁר, (Isa. 37: 12), is probably also situated in Mesopotamia, and perhaps the same as Ellasar, אֶלְסָר, of Gen. (14: 1, 9). Immediately to the north of Mesopotamia, on the east side of the Tigris, lies Assyria proper, containing the cities of Nineveh, Keilah (Josh. 15: 44), Resen, and Rehoboth Ir, concerning which see art. Nineveh. Middle or Southern Mesopotamia included the land of Shinar שִׁנְעָר; the first dominions of Nimrod (Gen. 10: 10; see Nimrod), containing the cities of Babel, Erech, Accab, and Calneh, and, in a wider sense, also the later Babylonia (see Article), which extended to the Persian Gulf. Adjoining Southern Babylonia on the east, lay Elam, עֵלָם, Ἐλαμίς, separated from the Persian Susiana by the river Ulai (אֵלַי, Dan. 8: 2), or, according to the Greek, Euläus.

Beyond the lowlands of the Euphrates and Tigris, upon the Iramian (Persian) high tablelands, and south of the Caspian sea, Media (מִדְיָן) is situated, containing the ancient city of Rages (Ῥάγα, Ῥάγαι, Tob. 1: 16; 3: 7; 4: 21), and Ecbatana (עֲבָתָנָא, Esr. 6 : 2, ἐκβαρανα; 2 Macc. 9 : 3; Judith 1 : 1, &c.; Tob.

5 : 9). Persia, adjoining Media on the south, is first mentioned during the exile, and after the exile, as פָּרֶס (Ezek. 27 : 10; 38 : 5; 2 Chron.
36 : 20, 22; Esr. 4 : 5, &c.), together with the summer residence Susa (שֹׁשַׁן), in the province Susiana (Elam in the more extended sense, Dan. 8 : 2; see Article). The capital properly, Persepolis, is mentioned in 2 Macc.
9 : 2, in place of Ἐλυμαίς, 1 Macc. 6 : 2, although Persepolis had then long been destroyed by Alexander. To the northeast of Media is the province of Parthia, the Παρθία of Ptolemæus, whose inhabitants, the Parthians (Παρθοί, Acts 2 : 9), founded upon the ruins of the Persian Empire, in Middle Asia, a great empire. The geographical knowledge of the Hebrews extends no further eastward. India seems only to have been known to them in name, as הִינד (Esth. 1 : 1; 8 : 9), as well as χώρα ἡ Ἰνδία (1 Macc. 8 : 8), if the reading and sense be correct, only shows the entire ignorance of the author concerning the country. Only indirectly is India mentioned (1 Macc. 6 : 37), as the native land of the war elephants in the army of Antiochus. Whether the land of gold (חֵילָה, Gen. 2 : 11) points to India, depends upon the interpretation given to the river of Paradise, Pison, concerning which see Eden; and just as uncertain is it to interpret Ophir (see Art.) of India.

Adjoining Palestine on the south, is the peninsula of Sinai, the stony Arabia (see Article), called, by the Hebrews, the Wilderness (מִדְבָּרָה, zar' 'elozhar), in which they wandered about for 40 years (see Art. Wilderness—Arabic). Southeast of Palestine lies the large Arabian peninsula עֲרַב, whose principal tribes were well known to the Hebrews, as the register of nations, Gen. 10 : 7 : 25–30, and the genealogies in Gen. 25 : 1–6, 12–18, sufficiently show (see Art. Arabia, &c.). The Red Sea (Schilfmeer, יַם סוּף, see Art. Sea, Red) separates Arabia from Africa, with which it is united only by the narrow Isthmus of Suez. With the Hebrew, Africa passes for the country inhabited by the descendants of Ham, as being the inhabitants of the Southern Zone (Tuch, Comment. on Gen., p. 202, &c.), or as being the dark-colored race (Knobel, Völkertafel, p. 11, &c.; p.

239, &c.). The southernmost people known to the ancients are the Ethiopians, Αἰθίοπες, who inhabit the country of Egypt, Nubia, and Abyssinia, and are designated in the Bible by the name Cush, כּוּשׁ. In a wider sense this name denotes, in general, all the dark-colored inhabitants of the southern borders of the known earth; and hence Ethiopians may be shown to exist in all southern Assyria. The word bears this sense in the Pentateuch, in poets, and later authors.
In its narrower sense, the word denotes the inhabitants of Nubia and Abyssinia, bearing this sense ever since Ethiopia appears in history as an organized state, and has conquered a part of Egypt and entered into various connections with Asiatic states; thus Isa. 11 : 11; 18 : 1; 20 : 3; 2 Kings 19 : 9; Ps. 68 : 31, &c.; see Art.

Abyssinia; Knobel, Völkertafel, § 27; Tuch, Comment., p. 219, &c. As sons of Cush, that is, descendants of Ethiopians, are mentioned in the national register (Gen. 10 : 7, 8): 1) Seba, שֶׁבָּא, the ancient Meroë, an island of Ethiopia formed by two arms of the Nile, the Astaboras (Atbara, Tacazza) and the Astagus (Bohr el Azrak), mentioned also in Isa. 43 : 3; 45 : 14; Ps. 72 : 10 (שֶׁבָּא). 2) Havilah, חַוִּילָה, Αἰ-λίτης, on the African coast, near Bab-el-Mandel (Arrian, Peripl., p. 5, 6), different from the Jek-tan Havilah of Gen. 10 : 29. 3) Sabta, סַבְתָּה,
i. e., Sabotah, in southern Arabia. 4) Raama, רַעְמָה, with his sons Sheba שֶׁבָּא and Dedan דִּדָן, are all to be found in southern Arabia, and are derived in other passages from a different ancestry (see Art. Arabia). 5) Sabtecha, סַבְתְּכָה, on the eastern side of the Persian Gulf, in Carmania. 6) As last son of Cush, Nimrod is mentioned Gen. 10 : 8, who established his empire in Mesopotamia. For his connection with the Cushites, see Art. Nimrod. North of the Ethiopians dwelt the Egyptians. Mizraim, מִצְרַיִם, from whom are the Egyptians (Gen.
10 : 12), is mentioned (v. 7) as the second son of Ham; concerning him, his sons (v. 12, &c.), sufficient has been said above (see Abyssinia, &c.). His third son, also mentioned in the catalogue of nations, was Phut, פּוּט, from whom an African people, the Libyans, are descended, who dwelt westward from Egypt, through the whole of northern Africa, and are the ancestors of the Berber tribes—not to be confounded with the Egyptian Libyans, לִיבְיִים or לִיבְיָיִם, who constitute only a part of the Libyan nation.

To the west Palestine is bordered by the Mediterranean Sea, the great sea, יַם הַיָּבֵשׁ, (Deut. 34 : 6, &c.; Josh. 1 : 4; Ezek. 47 : 10);
also called the hinder, i. e., Western sea, יַם הַיָּבֵשׁ הַחֲדָרִי, (Deut. 11 : 24; Zach. 14 : 8); sea of the Philistines, יַם הַפְּלִשְׁתִּים, (Exod.
23 : 31); also, merely the sea, יָם, (Josh.
19 : 26), as in the Apocrypha and the New Test. ἡ θάλασσα (1 Macc. 14 : 34; 15 : 11; Acts 10 : 6, 32. Of its several divisions, the Adriatic sea, ὁ Ἀδριακός, alone is named (Acts 27 : 27).
Of the islands of the Mediterranean, designated by the general name: "Islands of the Sea" יְהִי יָם, νησοὶ τῆς θαλάσσης (Isa. 11 : 11;
1 Macc. 6 : 29, 15); "islands of the heathen" יְהִי יָם (Gen. 10 : 15; Zeph. 2 : 11) are especially named: Samothrace (Acts 16 : 11); Patmos (Rev. 1 : 9); Lesbos (Acts 20 : 14);
Chios (Acts 20 : 15); Samos (1 Macc. 15 : 23; Acts 20 : 15); Delos (1 Macc. 15 : 23); Kos
(1 Macc. 15 : 23; Acts 21 : 1); Rhodes (1 Macc.
15 : 23; Acts 21 : 1); Crete (1 Macc. 10 : 67; 15 : 23; Acts 27 : 12; Tit. 1 : 5), at the southern point of which was situated the little island Κλαύδη, mentioned in Acts 27 : 16; Malta, Μελίτη, Acts 28 : 1, and Sicily, or at least its capital Syracuse, Acts 28 : 12. Of the countries of Western Europe, whose mention is next connected with that of the Mediterranean sea, the ancient Hebrews had an imperfect idea. In the register of nations (Gen. 10) we find the natives which inhabited the אִיֵּי הַגִּימָּוֹת, v. 5 (islands of the Gimmims) there recorded as the descendants of Japheth, 2-4. The proper exposition of these names is still involved in much uncertainty, the most light having lately been thrown on the subject by Tuch, and especially Knobel's ingenious investigations. As the first son of Japheth, 1) Gomer גֹּמֶר is indicated, i. e., according to the general acceptation, the Κυμμέριαι in the Black sea and the sea of Azoph, from whence they were driven further westward by the Scythians, and they appear next upon the British peninsula in North-Germany and North-Ireland, as the Κίμβροι, Cimbri (see Art. Cimbri). Gomers descendants are a) Ashkenas אֲשְׁכְנַז, whom Knobel recognizes the ancient Germans, the race of the Asi or Asæ, divinities (אֲשֵׁנָה, As god). אֲשֵׁנָה gens, genus), but Tuch, because in Jer. 51 : 27, they seem to be connected with Ararat and Minni, finds in them a people dwelling near Armenia, on the borders of the Black and the Caspian seas. Notwithstanding the dazzling glitter of Knobel's supposition, I feel inclined to adopt the other view; for such an accurate and detailed knowledge of the European races, as Knobel here takes for granted, in the author of the Register of races (Gen. 10), seems scarcely admissible, and that in the explanation of these names we are not directed merely to Europe and Northern Asia, is sufficiently clear from the names Togarmah and Madai. b) Riphat רִפְתָּ, reminding one of the Ῥίφα Ῥίφα, Riphæi montes, which, in the geography of the ancients, bordered the northern rim of the earth and extended from the West of Europe over the Caspian sea into Asia; Knobel refers especially to the Celts, who immigrated over the Carpathian mountains into Western Europe. c) Togarmah, תֹּגַרְמָה, the Armenians (comp. Ezek. 27 : 14; 28 : 6), and, according to Knobel, connected with the Phrygians. 2) Magog, מָגוֹג, is the second son of Japheth, the ancestor of the Scythians (see Art. Gog and Magog); 3) Javan יָוָן, the Greeks, Ionians, Ἰάονες. The sons of Javan are a) Elishah אֵלִישָׁה, according to Tuch the Greeks of Europe, as the name would remind of Hellas or Elis; according to Knobel, the Aeolians. b) Tarshish תַּרְשִׁישׁ, according to Tuch, Tartessus, the distant land of the West; according to Knobel the Tyrrhenians Τυρρῆναι, Τυρῆναι or Etruscans. c) Kittim כִּיִּתִּים, according to Tuch the Cyprians (see Article Cyprians), according to Knobel the Libyans on the islands between Greece and Asia. d) Dodanim דּוֹדָנִים, according to Tuch, in accordance with the reading of 1 Chron. 1 : 7, דּוֹדָנִים, the Rhodians; according to Knobel the Dardanians, as the representatives of the Illyrians, of the whole North-Grecian race (see Dodanim). The fourth and fifth sons of Japheth, Tubal, תּוֹבַל, and Meshech, מֶשֶׁח, occur almost exclusively in connection; they are the Tibarenians and Muscovians, who appear, according to Knobel, in Western Europe, as the Iberians and Ligurians. 6) Tiras, תִּירָס, finally, indicates, according to usual acceptation, which Knobel here also follows, the Thracians, and, according to Tuch, the Tyrrhenians. — Whilst thus ancient times afford us only that which is most general, and that in uncertain outlines and confused conceptions, isolated countries of the West, and above all Greece, rise before us in clear light. To the ancients the Greeks are known only in general as Ionians, and these at most in individual tribes, and as a commercial people (Isa. 66 : 19; Ezek. 27 : 13; Joel 3 : 4). Only after the captivity were the Greeks known to the Hebrews, especially after Alexander the Great secured the closer contact of the Occident with the Orient. He is that "King of Grecia" מֶלֶךְ יוֹן (Dan. 8 : 21), who brought the Persian monarchy to an end, (1 Macc. 1 : 1-8; 6 : 2; comp. Dan. 2 : 32, 33; 7 : 7, &c., and who, on his march to or from Egypt, came to Jerusalem and treated the Jews in an honorable manner (Jos. Ant., XI., 8, 5). Under his successors, the Ptolomies of Egypt and Seleucidæ of Syria, the Jews were brought into continually closer contact with Greeks, so that the influence of Grecian affairs even threatened, for a time, the entire suppression of the patriarchal faith and customs; as a reaction against which tendency the Maccabees arose. Hence the Greeks first appear under their own proper name Ἕλληνες in the Apocryphal books (1 Macc. 8 : 18; 2 Macc. 4 : 36, and so in the New Testament, in Acts 18 : 17; 19 : 17; Romans 1 : 14; 1 Cor. 1 : 24; Galatians 3 : 28; Col. 3 : 11, where they mostly appear over against the Jews and Barbarians, as the representatives of refined heathenism. Of the isolated portions of Greece named in the Bible, are 1) Illyricum, west of Macedonia, Rom. 15 : 19; 2) Macedonia, Rom. 15 : 26; 2 Cor. 9 : 2; 1 Thes. 1 : 8, where Paul planted Christianity, Acts 16 : 9; 20 : 1; comp. 1 Cor. 16 : 5; 2 Cor. 1 : 16, &c.; with the cities of Philippi, Acts 16 : 12, &c.; 1 Thes. 2 : 2; Philip. 1 : 7, &c.; Neapolis, Acts 16 : 11; Apollonia, Acts 17 : 1; and Berea, Acts 17 : 10. Greece proper, Ἑλλάς, is distinguished, Acts 20 : 1, 2, from Macedonia. Achaia, including Hellas and the Peloponnessus, is mentioned, Acts 18 : 12; 19 : 21; Rom. 15 : 26; 1 Thes. 1 : 7; 2 Cor. 9 : 2; see Part I., p. 95. Of Greek cities are mentioned, Athens, 2 Macc. 9 : 15; Acts 17 : 16; 1 Thes. 3 : 1; Corinth, Acts 18 : 1, and in the Epistle to the Cor.; Sicyon, 1 Macc. 15 : 23; Sparta or Lacedæmon, 1 Macc. 12 : 6, 8; 14 : 6; 2 Macc. 5 : 9. Italy is mentioned in the accounts of Paul's travels, Acts 18 : 2; 27 : 1, 6; and in Heb. 13 : 24. Rome and the Romans are mentioned first in 1 Macc. 8 : 1, &c. (see Art. Rome). Of Italian cities, Paul touched on his way to Rome (Acts 28), at Rhegium, Puteoli, Apii Forum (see respect. Arts.), and Tres Tabernæ (three taverns); also at the islands of Malta and Sicily, with its capital, Syracuse. Further westward, the Bible only mentions Tarshish, תַּרְשִׁישׁ, Tartessus of the Greeks, the southwestern portion of the Pyrenees peninsula, as the farthest, rather indistinct land of the West (see Art.).

To the North, Phœnicia and Syria border on Palestine, the latter being sometimes included under the name Aram (see Article Aram). Northeast of Syrian Aram, beyond Assyria, on the southern declivity of the Gordisean mountains, we have the ancient Arphaxad, the proper domicile of the Hebrews (see Art. Arphaxad); adjoining which we have, on the north, the highland of Armenia, which, however, never appears in the Bible under its own proper name, its different parts only being named. These are thes. and the word itself, p. 1493. Rosenmüller, Altherthumsk. I., 1, p. 252. 2) Ararat אַרְרָט (2 Kings 19 : 37; Isa. 37 : 38; Jer. 51 : 27), which is central Armenia, upon whose mountains, אַרְרָטִי, the Ark rested (Gen. 8 : 4).

1) Togarmah, תֹּגַרְמָה (Gen. 10 : 3; 1 Chron. 1 : 6; Ezek. 27 : 14; 38 : 6). The interpretation of this of Armenia is confirmed by the native tradition of the Armenians and Georgians, according to which they trace their descent from Thorgom as their ancestor, and call themselves the "house of Thorgom," precisely as בֵּית תֹּרְגֹמָה, Ezek., and other places. See Gesen.

3) Minni, מִנִּי, stands, in Jer. 51 : 27, in connection with Ararat, and is the country Minnæ of Nicol. Damasc., Joseph. Ant. I., 3, 6.—Westward of Aram is Asia Minor, which comes to view less in the Heb. O. T. than in the apocryphal books and in the N. T. In the former it appears at most as the abode of several tribes belonging to the Japhetite race, as the Phrygians, whom Knobel understands under Togarmah; the Asiatic Greeks, included under יָוָן; the Carians (כָּרִי), and others. In the N. T.,

Asia Minor is simply designated as Asia (Acts 2 : 9; 6 : 9; 1 Cor. 16 : 19; 1 Pet. 1 : 1; Rev. 1 : 4, 11), which name has a more extended significance in the Macc., since there it denotes the whole Syro-Seleucidian kingdom (1 Macc. 8 : 6, 8; 12 : 39; 2 Macc. 3 : 3; 11 : 13). The Greeks divide Asia Minor into different provinces, which are also mostly mentioned in the Bible. On the Black Sea is 1) Pontus (Acts 2 : 9; 1 Pet. 1 : 1), the native country of Aquila (Acts 18 : 2; see Art. Aquila), containing the city Σαυδάκη, or Σαυδάμη, (1 Macc. 15 : 23). 2) Paphlagonia. 3) Bithynia (Acts 16 : 7; see Art. Bithynia). In the west, on the Ægean Sea, is: 4) Mysia (Acts 16 : 7, &c.), with the cities of Troas (Acts 16 : 8, 11; 20 : 5; 2 Cor. 2 : 12; 2 Tim. 4 : 13), Assos (Acts 20 : 13, 14), Pergamos (Rev. 1 : 11; 2 : 12); 5) Lydia (1 Macc. 8 : 8), whose inhabitants are perhaps the לֵדִי of Gen. 10 : 22, with the cities: Thyatira (Acts 16 : 14; Rev. 1 : 11, &c.), Sardis, the capital (Rev. 1 : 11; 3 : 1-6), and Philadelphia (Rev. 1 : 11; 3 : 7, &c.); 6) Ionia (1 Macc. 8 : 8), with the cities, Smyrna (Rev. 1 : 11), Ephesus (Acts 18 : 19-21; 19 : 1; 1 Tim. 1 : 3; Epistle to the Ephesians; Rev. 1 : 11; 2 : 1-7; see Article Ephesus), Trogylium (Acts 20 : 15), Miletus (Acts 20 : 15, 17; 2 Tim. 4 : 20). On the south-western point of Asia Minor is situated 7) Caria, with its capital, Halicarnassus (1 Macc. 15 : 23). Three provinces are situated on the southern coast: 8) Lycia (1 Macc. 15 : 23; Acts 27 : 5), with the cities: Putara (Acts 21 : 1), Myra (Acts 27 : 5), Phaselis (1 Macc. 15 : 23); 9) Pamphylia (Acts 2 : 10; 14 : 24, &c.), with the cities: Attalia (Acts 14 : 25), Perga (Acts 13 : 13; 14 : 25), and Side (Σίδη), (1 Macc. 15 : 23); 10) Cilicia (Jadith 2 : 25; 1 Macc. 11 : 14; 2 Macc. 4 : 30, &c.; Acts 15 : 23, 41; 27 : 5; Gal. 1 : 21; see Art. Cilicia), with its capital, Tarsus, the birthplace of the Apostle Paul (Acts 9 : 11; 11 : 25, &c.), and Mallos (2 Macc. 4 : 30). In the interior are situated, north of Pamphylia: 11) Pisidia, with the city of Antioch (Acts 13 : 14, &c.; 14 : 24, 2 Tim. 3 : 11); 12) Cappadocia, between Cilicia and Pontus (1 Pet. 1 : 1); 13) Lycaonia, east of Cappadocia (Acts 14 : 11), with the capital, Iconium (Acts 13 : 51; 14 : 1), Lystra and Derbe (Acts 14 : 6; 16 : 1, 2; 2 Tim. 3 : 11); 14) Phrygia, eastward from Mysia and Lydia (Acts 16 : 6; 18 : 23), with the cities of Hierapolis (Col. 4 : 13), Colossa (Epistle to the Col.), and Laodicea (1 Tim. 6 : 22; Rev. 1 : 11; 3 : 14); 15) Galatia, between Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Bithynia, and Phrygia (Acts 16 : 6; 18 : 23; 1 Pet. 1 : 1; 1 Cor. 16 : 1; 2 Tim. 4 : 10; Epist. to Gal.). The proper North of the Bible, whose name צָפוֹן (see above), already indicates the limited knowledge the Hebrews had of it, is inhabited by nations which likewise belong to the Japhetite tribe, and with whose names we have already become familiar, as Riphat, Gomer, Ashkenas, Gog and Magog (the Scythians, Col. 3 : 11), Meshech, and Tubal. Add to this, Rosh רֹשׁ (Ezekiel 38 : 2, 3; 39 : 1), a people of the North under the dominion of Gog, which is named besides Meshech and Tubal, and which are perhaps the ancestors of the Russians (see Gesen. thesaur., and the word, p. 1253). Most of these people dwell along the Black Sea and the Caucasus. That the North, being so little known, should also be regarded as the land of Wonders, is easily conceivable; and upon this principle it is to be explained. The Godhead is described as appearing in the North (Ezek. 1 : 4; Job 37 : 22); as also Isaiah 14 : 13, reminds of the mountain of the gods, which, according to ancient oriental conceptions, existed in the North (comp. Gesenius Von dem Götterberg im Norden, nach den Mythen der asiatischen Völker, first supplement to his Comm. on Isaiah, Part II., p. 316, &c.). In answer to the inquiry whence the Israelites had this geographical knowledge, it may be said, that they derived it partly from their own observation and contact with other nations, partly, especially concerning distant lands, with which an immediate contact was not easily posible, from the Phœnicians and also from the Egyptians (compare Delitzsch, Comment. on Gen., p. 282).

Among the works treating especially of biblical geography, exclusive of works on biblical archæology in general, and hence also treating of biblical geography (see Art. Archæology), and exclusive of works on Palestine itself, and which will be mentioned more fully in the Art. under that head, we mention the following: Eusebii monasticum urbium et locorum SS. græce cum lat. vers. Hieron. op. Jac. Bonfrerii (Par. 1659, fol.) rec. et. animadverss. suis auxit Jo. Clericus: Amstel. 1707, fol. (also in Ugolini thesaur. antiquit. sacrr. Tom. V.). The same work constitutes one volume of: N. Sanson, Geographia Sacra ex V. et N. T. desumpta et in tabl. 4 concinnata: Amstel. 1704, &c. fol. — Sam. Bochart, Geographia Sacra cujus P. I. Phaleg dispersione gentium et terrar. divis.; P. 2. Canaan de coloniis et sermone Phœnicum agit. Cadom. 1646, fol.: Lugd. Bat. 1692, 1707, fol.: Francof. ad M. 1674, 4to. As supplementary are to be considered: J. D. Michaelis, Spicilegium geographiæ Hebræorum exteræ post Bochartum: Gotting. 1769–70, 2 Tom., and J. Reinhold Forster, Epistolæ ad J. D. Michaelis, hujus spicil. geogr. Hebræor. exteræ jam confirmantes jam castigantes (ed. J. D. Michaelis), Gotting. 1772, 4to. Bochart's work is, in its first part, properly only a commentary on the ethnological tables (Gen. 10), to which we here add the later treatises on this important chapter: Beke, Origines bibliæ, or Researches in Primeval History: London, 1834. Feldhoff, die Völkertafel der Genesis in ihrer universalhist. Bedeutung: Elberfeld, 1837, 8vo. Krücke, Erklärung der Völkertafel im ersten Buch Moses: Bonn, 1837. Joseph v. Görres, die Japhetiden und ihr Auszug aus Armenien: München, 1845. Knobel, die Völkertafel der Genesis. Ethnographische Untersuchungen: Giessen, 1850, 8vo.; which last work, together with the researches of Tuch, in his: Kommentar über die Genesis: Halle, 1838, eclipses all former attempts at interpretation. F. Spanheim, introduct. ad. geogr. sacram, patriarchalem israeliticam et christianam: Lugd. Bat. 1679, 8vo.: Francof. 1698, 4to. Jac. Schmidt, Biblischer Geographus, 1740. Ed. Well, Sacred Geography: London, 1708, 12mo. 5 vols., new ed. Lond. 1811, 4 vols. 8vo., in 1817, 3 vols. 8vo. Translation of the last, by Panzer: Nürnberg. 1765, 4 vols. 8vo. Ysbrand van Hamelsfeld, Aardrijkkunde des Bijbels: Amster. 1790, 8vo. German: Y. v. H., Biblische Geographie, übers. mit Ammerk. von R. Jänisch, Hamb. 1793–96, 3 vols. 8vo. (not completed). Mansford, Dictionary of the Biblical Geography: Lond. 1829. More popular treatises are those of Frege, geogr. Handbuch bei Lesung der heil. Schrift: Gotha, 1788–89, 2 vols.; Löwisohn, Bibl. Geographie: Wien, 1823; Hornung, Handbuch zur Erläuterung der bibl. Gesch. und Geogr., 2 Aufl.: Lpz., 1826. Chartographical representations we have in the English Bible-Atlas of Palmer, published in London by Weiland, elucidated by Ackermann: Weimar, 1832; and Kiepert, Berlin, 2d edition, 1854.—For the purposes of biblical geography, as far as it constitutes a part of the ancient geography of the Greeks and Romans, use may be made, in the corresponding parts, of Cellarii, Notitia orbis antiqui s. geographia plenior. (Lips., 1701, 3 Tom. 4), c. observ. J. Chr. Schwarzii: Lips., 1731, 2 Tom. 4to., together with Append. triplex: Lips., 1776, 4to.; Mannert, Geographie der Griechen und Römer: Nürnberg, 1788, &c., 8vo., Pt. I., 3te Aufl.: Leipz., 1829; the last vol., Pt. X., appeared Leipz., 1824. Here belong especially: Pts. IV.–VIII., X.—Handbuch der alten Erdbeschreibung, nach Anleitung der d'Anvillischen Landkarten: Nürnberg, 1785, &c. New improved edition by Heeren, Hummel, Brunn, and Paulus: Nürnberg, 1796–1800, 6 Bde.—Forbiger, Alte Geographie, 3 Bde.: Leipzig, 1842–48.

ARNOLD. — J. H. Derr.

George, St.—The legend in Metaphrastes tells us, that he was from a high family of Cappadocia. Having entered the Roman army, he arose under Diocletian to high honors; but resigned them when the emperor persecuted the Christians, protesting otherwise, also, against such injustice: wherefore he was beheaded Apr. 23 (?), about A. D. 303 (?), near Nicomedia (?). It is certain that very early veneration was paid, and chapels dedicated to him; this appears, as regards Gaul, from Gregory of Tours, and from the fact that Gregory the Great rebuilt a church which had been dedicated to him. After this simple, antique, and unique little church, the St. Giorgio in velabro, one of the cardinals is still named. A church in Constantinople, situated near the sea, gave the name "arm of St. George" to the Hellespont. The belief that St. G. was fighting for them, led the Crusaders, especially under Richard Cœur de Lion, to victory. The National Council of Oxford, in 1222, elevated his anniversary to an English national one. Under his patronage the Order of the Garter was instituted in 1330. He was represented in mail, and was regarded as the patron of the entire knighthood, especially of the Suabian and Venitian.—The acts of his life and martyrdom are evidently fictitious, for which Baronius makes the Arians in part responsible. Calvin denies the personal reality of St. G.; and there really are considerations in explanation of the myth. The dragon which he slays is regarded as a symbol of heathenism. But since the veneration of St. G. came twice from the East to the Germanic West, he may have originated from Mithras, the first light-spirit of Ormuzd, who slays the dragon of darkness. It is remarkable here, that Constantine the Great was a special patron of his worship: since he, even as Christian, venerated the sun, or light, as God, Christianizing thus the Mithras-mysteries of the Romans. This may have been the way in which the worship of the militant light-genius passed over from the Persians to their kindred, the knightly Germans. His early and deep veneration by the Armenians, Georgians, and Genoese, who carried on with the former nations an exclusive trade, also agrees with this supposition. REUCHLIN—Reinecke.

George, of Trapezus, was born in 1396, in Crete. He adopted this surname, because he supposed his family to have come from this city of Cappadocia; and perhaps, also, because he feared that the surname of Cretan would afford a poor antecedent for literary respectability. In 1420 he came to Italy, and was teacher of rhetoric first at Venice, and afterwards at Rome. In opposition to the prevailing tendency, he adhered as warmly and decidedly to the Aristotelian philosophy, as he was passionately blinded against the Platonic; and was drawn in this way into a violent dispute with Bessarion, Pletho, and other learned Greeks, which degenerated into the most offensive personalities. By this course he lost the favor of P. Nicholas V., and would thus have been reduced to the utmost necessity, if King Alphonsus had not, through compassion, granted him a pension. A very doubtful tradition says that G., in the hope of a rich reward, had given to the Pope several important documents; but that, having received only 100 ducats, he had thrown the money into the Tiber, and become very sick through anger, from which he passed into a state of childishness. It is certain, however, that in old age he entirely lost his memory, and became childish. He died in 1486. Although extensive erudition and great skill in writing cannot be denied to G., it must nevertheless be admitted that in his translations of Greek authors, he was neither accurate nor faithful; in that of Eusebius he is guilty not only of interpolations, but also of gross distortions and perversions. His character was thoroughly disfigured with envenomed passions and bitter pride. By his disposition to traduce and depreciate others, he injured both himself and his friends. He was especially bitter against T. Gaza, who, like him, had translated into Latin the N. H. of Aristotle. Bessarion wrote his "contra calumniatorem Platonis" against him. His two works against the Greeks, on the procession of the H. S., are printed in the 1st vol. of the Græcia orthodoxa of Allatius. —(See BRUCKER, hist. crit. philos., IV., p. 65.)

DR. PRESSEL—Reinecke.

George III., Prince of Anhalt, surnamed the Godly, is representative of a very important but not duly considered interest of the Reformation, viz., its ecclesiastical organization. He belonged to the line of Dessau, and was born at Dessau, Aug. 13, 1507. In his ninth year he lost his father, Prince Ernst, but his pious mother, Margaret, a duchess of Münsterberg, still survived until 1530, a blessing to him, his two brothers, and the entire province. In 1518, G. was appointed canon at Merseburg. In 1519, he visited the University of Leipzig, in order to study the civil and canonical law. M. Geo. Helt, of Pforzheim, was his teacher. In 1524, he was consecrated priest by his cousin Adolph, B. of Merseburg, and in 1525, he became subdeacon. In 1526 he was appointed by Albrecht, elector of Mayence, as Archb. of Magdeburg, provost at the cathedral of Magdeburg; he was also employed as counsellor by the officers of the cathedral, for which reason he abode for a time with the elector in the Moritzburg at Halle. Up to this time he had held with the utmost tenacity to the Rom. Church, and had zealously opposed the innovations of the Reformers. In order to fortify himself still more against the "new doctrine," he gave a thorough study to Ch. history and the Scriptures. But his studies only served to convince him that the doctrine of Luther was Scriptural. Of this he gives an account in his defence, contained in his "Anzeigung an Herz. Georg v. Sachsen," and in the preface to his sermons on the false prophets. When, therefore, in 1530, his cousin, Wolfgang von Anhalt, subscribed the Augsb. Confession, G. hesitated no longer; his two brothers followed his example, and in 1534, the whole of Anhalt became Lutheran. Soon afterwards the Reformation found its way into the see of Merseburg; when, therefore, in 1544, its B. died, Maurice Duke of Saxony seized the occasion, as ruler of the country, to establish the proper distinction between the spiritual and secular government, as the two sides of one see. On June 24, 1544, George, at the request of Maurice, accepted the office of spiritual coadjutor of the see, whereas its secular administration was entrusted to Augustus, the brother of Maurice. But this was a mere temporary arrangement. As, in 1542, Nich. v. Amsdorf had been ordained by Luther as Bishop of Naumburg, so, in the present case, G. was ordained, Aug. 2, 1545, in the cathedral of Merseburg, by Luther, assisted by Melancthon and other clergymen, as bishop of the see. The secular authority having thus been separated from the episcopate, the latter became once more spiritual; and the two powers entered again upon their just relations, as the two arms of one body. In order to portray G. justly, it must be mentioned that at first he desired episcopal ordination from a bishop of the old kind, and had selected for this purpose Matthias v. Jagow, B. of Brandenburg, who in 1539 already had espoused the Reformation. But M. had died, and the bishops of Prussia were too far off. Under such circumstances he submitted at last, but with full confidence, to receive episcopal ordination from Luther, whom he called a true bishop, who truly fed the Church of God. A further consequence of this new arrangement was an evangelical consistorium, appointed by the secular administrator, but presided over by the bishop. The latter discharged his spiritual functions faithfully, and as a true priest; for he preached frequently, not only within his own see, but also in the territory of Anhalt. He submitted himself most conscientiously to the church visitations which he had instituted, as also to the synods which he convoked twice each year in his cathedral. Nor was he wanting in earnest exhortations and exhortations to his clergy. He was, besides, a zealous student of theological science, and was thoroughly acquainted with the Hebrew and Greek. He was fond of conversing with divines concerning single passages of the Scriptures, and their meaning, according to the original. At table, also, some portion of the Scriptures was always read aloud. His life accorded with these studies; he never forgot to do good, and to help others (Heb. 13:16). During the Smalcald war, George for a time maintained himself in Merseburg. But after the battle of Mühlberg he was driven out of his office by Michael Helding, or Sidonius, the newly-appointed R. C. bishop. In 1548-9 he attended the conferences of Jüterbog, Torgau, and Grimma, concerning the Augsb. Interim. Like Melancthon, he rejected

; for he preferred an honest, open war, to a elusive peace. He appealed also to the words of Christ: "I came not to send peace, but the word." And yet he was desirous of peace on proper terms, and therefore, with Melancthon, took a leading part in the Leipsic Interim. For this reason he was charged, though too hastily, with papist sympathies. But his days were ended. He died, in the midst of the adiaphoristic controversies, Oct. 17th, 1553, at the palace of Dessau. He had never married. Melancthon and Geo. Mejer preached his funeral discourses. Of his works, Camerarius published in 1555 his Synodical addresses in Latin, and Melancthon his German works. In 1741 these had reached the 7th edition. See: Georg, der frommselige, Fürst zu Anhalt. Eine Charakterchild. aus dem Zeitalt. d. Reform. von JOACH. CAMERARIUS; publ. in Lat. and Germ., with historical notes and explanations by W. SCHÜTZERT, 1854. BECKMANN'S Hist. des Fürstenth. Anhalt (Tom. V., p. 153-170; VI., p. 54-58), gives a full account of this princely bishop. D. I. A. ERHARD, Ueberliefer. vaterl. Gesch., 1827. The letters of Luther to G., given in the Erlangen ed. of Luther's works.

GÖSCHEL. — Reinecke.

George v. Polenz was the first ordained Catholic bishop who espoused the evangelical cause. He descended from a noble family of Meissen, and was born in 1478. He studied, and became a licentiate of theology. At Rome he became private secretary of Julius II. He served Emperor Maximilian, also, on important embassies. Having entered the Order of Germ. Knights, he went to Prussia. When, in 1518, the Sambian bishopric became vacant, he was nominated to this see by the Grand Master, Albert, Margrave of Brandenburg, and regularly elected, confirmed, and instituted. His see was the first to adopt universally the Reformation. Already, in 1523, G. Schmidt, one of his canons, publicly preached evangelical doctrines. Soon after, J. Brisemann, a disciple of Luther and former Franciscan, was called from Wittenberg to Prussia; and preached, Sept. 24, 1523, the first evangelical sermon at Königsberg, where the bishop had opened to him his cathedral. The effect was surprising. Before the end of 1523, the bishop came publicly forward in the same sense. The stir was great. Jan. 15, 1524, the bishop issued for all the churches of Prussia the order, that hereafter the preaching and baptisms should be in the native language; and recommended, at the same time, Luther's Bible and writings. He promised, moreover, that thorough instructions should in future be given in the Lithuanian, Old Prussian, and Polish languages (see edict, in Luther's Works, ed. of Jena, IV., 62). Pope Clement IV. issued, Dec. 1, 1524, a mandate against him; whilst Luther wrote, Feb. 1, to the palatin: Episcopus tandem unus Christo nomen dedit et evangelizat in Prussia, nempe Samiensis. In 1525 Luther dedicated to him—vere episcopo Samiensis ecclesie—his commentary on Deuteronomy.—In 1525, also, after the Grand Master, Albert, had been recognized by the peace of Cracow as hereditary Duke of Prussia, George voluntarily renounced the secular government of his diocese. He was imitated by Erhard von

Vol. II.—25

Queiss, B. of Pomosania, the second evangelical Bishop. After this, G. resided at the palace of Balga, and was married. He died April 28, 1550, after a long life of usefulness. Several of his sermons are yet extant in print; others are preserved in MS. in the Archives of Königsberg. For a full account of him and the evangelical bishopric in the Duchy of Prussia, see NICOLOVIVS, die bishöfl. Würde in Preuss. ev. Kirche; Dr. J. FR. JACOBSON, Gesch. der Quellen des ev. K.-Rechts der Prov. Preussen u. Posen; JOH. VOIGT, Gesch. Preuss. v. d. ältest. Zeit. bis zum Unterg. der Herrsch. d. deutschen Ritt.-Ord., 1827-39. GÖSCHEL.—Reinecke.

George, Margrave of Brandenburg, was one of the first confessors of the evangelical truth in the earliest times of the Reformation; whence, also, history has surnamed him the Confessor, or the Pious. He was the son of Margr. Frederick, the Elder, and was born at Onolzbach, March 4, 1484. As early as 1524 he avowed the Reformation of Luther, with whom he had a conversation in the following year at Wittenberg. In 1529, he attended the Diet of Spire; and boldly signed, April 19, the celebrated protest against the resolution of the majority. In 1530, he attended the Diet of Augsburg; was present, June 25, at the reading of the evangelical confession, which, also, he subscribed. On this occasion, also, he protested against participating in the festival of Corpus Christi, declaring to the emperor that he would rather lose his head, than deny his faith.—G. rendered meritorious services, also, in fully establishing in his country the Ch. constitution published by his brother Casimir in 1526; for, as he said to King Ferdinand, "since the bishops did not satisfy the demands of their office, it was incumbent upon him, as a Christian prince who was responsible for the temporal and eternal welfare of his subjects, to make provision for this interest." Thus originated the Brandenburg-Nuremberg Church constitution, and the liturgy belonging to it.—It is also said of G., that in regard to the name of Lutheran, applied in contempt to the adherents of the Augsburg Confession, he had remarked as follows: "I am not baptized in the name of Luther; I do not believe in him, and shall not be saved by him: in this sense I am not Lutheran. But if I am asked whether I with heart and lips confess the doctrine which God has restored to us by his instrument, Dr. Luther, I have no hesitation or fear to say, I am a Lutheran."—George died at Onolzbach, Dec. 17, 1543. For more extended information concerning his life and labors, see Dr. C. FR. PAULI, Allgem. Preuss. Staats-Gesch., Vol. III., p. 457-476.—Also, BUCHHOLZ, Gesch. der Kurmark Brandenb., Vol. III., pp. 217, 276, 296, 305-309; Luther's letters to him, as given in the Erlangen edition of L.'s works.

GÖSCHEL.—Reinecke.

George, Duke of Saxony, born Aug. 4, 1471, is known in the history of the Saxon Reformation as a violent opponent of Luther and the evangelical doctrines. He also oppressed and persecuted his own Protestant subjects. Seckendorf, in his History of Lutheranism, has collected many instances in which a confession of Protestantism was punished with imprisonment and exile. G. was tenacious of old and established usages; but he esteemed everything as old and established, which in the course of ages had collected around the old. In the restoration of the really ancient truth, which was active in the Reformation, he therefore saw only an innovation; between revolution and reaction he could not distinguish—a difference which is unknown to many of our own age. Of what importance the religious movement of his age was to him, is shown by his zealous interference in it. In 1519 he attended the Leipsic discussion between Dr. Eck and Carlstadt, and afterwards that between Eck and Luther. With this discussion the long-continued quarrel between G. and Luther commenced. We may see from it, how easily sin mixes up with the most righteous struggle. G. often complained against Luther to his cousin, the Elector of Saxony. The letter of Luther to the Elector, John the Constant, written July 29, 1531, is indicative of the position of these three men. Luther writes: "My dear Lord and friend, Dr. Brück, chancellor, has suggested in the name of His Highness, that I should hereafter, as far as conscience and doctrine permits, abstain from sharp words, especially as regards Duke G., in order that peace and concord may not be injured. I do not deny that Duke G. has occasion to complain; but that he may see that I too desire peace, and do not write my wicked books from mere presumption, I will give up and forget all, if Duke G. also hereafter leaves me at peace and furnishes no new offence; with this further condition, that I am free to resist if other papists do not keep peace with me," etc.—The bearing of this letter comes down to our own time and beyond it. Its inmost meaning is, that not the Reformation, but the wrong course of those who would neither themselves follow it, nor allow others to do so, caused the separation; of which, however, those complain most who will not see the still remaining elements of union. This was the position of G. with regard to the Reformation, on which account, partly, he has been unjustly defamed.—G.'s life was often deeply affected by successive deaths in his family, and these belong properly to a just portrayal of his character. Dec. 14, 1510, his brother Frederick died. This loss affected him sorely, as the brothers had loved each other most tenderly. Jan. 27, 1534, he lost his daughter Margaret; and Feb. 15, his beloved wife, Barbara of Poland. From this time he suffered his beard to grow, and is hence called the Bearded. Jan. 11, 1537, he lost John, his oldest son. The father comforted the dying son with the merits of Christ, to whom alone he should look; not to his own merits, nor to those of the saints. But when Elizabeth, the wife of John, asked, "My dear father, why do you not suffer this to be preached?" G. replied, "My dear daughter, this comfort must be offered only to the dying; for if the common people knew that we are saved by Christ alone, they would become too wicked, and entirely forgetful of good works." Feb. 26, 1539, he lost Frederick, his second son. George himself died April 17, following. The priest exhorted him to lay hold of Christ by faith alone; his dying words were, "Help me then, thou faithful Saviour, Jesus Christ; have mercy upon me, and save me by thy bitter sufferings and death!"—With G.'s death, the Papacy also expired in his country; for Henry, his brother and successor, favored the Reformation. In the ducal library at Gotha there is in MS. a life of G. by Spalatin. A full account of him is given in "Sächsische Merkwürdigkeiten:" Leips., 1724, p. 681–704. See also, Gottfr. Arnold, Kirch.-u. Ketz. hist. Th. 2, B. XVI., ch. 7, § 2; ch. 8, § 23, 24; Ch. G. Heinrich mit K. H. L. Pölitz: Handb. der Sächs. Gesch., 1812 (Vol. II., p. 303–310). Also, Luther's letters to the duke, in the Erlangen ed. of L.'s works. Göschel.—Reinecke.

Georgius, R. of Laodicea, in Phrygia, born, educated, and admitted to the clergy at Alexandria, took part in the controversy which his Bishop, Alexander of Alexandria, had with the Arians; but shared the fate of all mediators between conflicting views—to be attacked by both parties. Having been excommunicated by Alexander for his leaning to Arianism, he was made Bishop by the Arians of Laodicea. Nor could he long be satisfied with the consequences of Arianism; hence, with Basil, Bishop of Ancyra, he established the party of 'Ὁμοούσιον, Semiariani, who adopted the definitions already used by the Eusebians, that the Son was similar in essence to the Father. These party heads, with other bishops, assembled, about Easter, 358, in synod at Ancyra, published a full dogmatic-polemical writing, with the express design of establishing the essential similarity of the Son with the Father, as the specific Church doctrine concerning the Trinity. They affirm their desire for peace; but since Satan was always instigating innovations in the faith of the Church, they thought it necessary to define more closely the Catholic doctrine of the Holy Trinity, as expounded at Antioch, Sardica, and Sirmium. Since they deduced, from the idea of the Father and Son, and of their relation to each other, the essential similarity of the Son to the Father, they rejected all Arian positions which asserted the similarity to be merely in a moral, not physical sense, and, instead of a similarity, taught the very opposite. But, on the other hand, they set the idea of similarity in opposition with the Nicene homousia, since identity could not be deduced from similarity. They therefore expressly condemn as heretics, those who call the Father father of the Son in virtue of his power and essence, and at the same time say of the Son, that he is 'ὁμοούσιος and ταυτοούσιος with the Father.—The Emp. Constantius was afterwards gained in favor of these resolutions; and at a third Synod of Sirmium (358), the creed of the second Synod was condemned, and the anathemas of Ancyra subscribed. Thus the rupture between Arians and Semiarrians was completed.—Besides minor essays and sermons mentioned by ancient authors, G. wrote a work against the Manichæans, and a life of Eusebius of Emesa.—(See NEANDER, Ch. H., I., 35, 60, 399; GIESLER, Eccl. H., I., § 81; MÜNSCHER, v. Köln, p. 222; BAUR, Trinitätslehre, I., p. 471).

Dr. Pressel.—Reinecke.

Gerar, in ancient times, capitol of a Philistine kingdom (Gen. 20 : 2; 26 : 1, 26), and situated on the southern border of Canaan (Gen.

10:19), not far from Kadesh, (Gen. 20:1; see 10:19; 2 Chron. 14:12). A watered valley in the neighborhood (Gen. 26:17) was known to Sozom., H. E., 6, 32; 9, 17, according to whom a very important monastery stood there, and among the signatures of the Council of Chalcedon, 451, p. 6, is found that of a Bishop of Gerar. The place must have been of considerable consequence, as it gave to the whole neighborhood the name of "Geraritica," "Saltus Gerariticus" (Theodoret. quæst., 1, in II., Paralip.); Robinson (Pal. I., p. 312; II., p. 647), was not able to find it, and regards the name as lost. Rowland first discovered, ten miles south by south-east from Gaza, in the present Djurf el Gerâr, a wide and deep Wady which runs from the south-east, and about the upper part of Gerar (now Kirbet-el-Gerar) receives the Wady es-Scheria from the west, the name and situation of the ancient town (see Tuch, in l. Zeitschr. d. deutsch-morgenländ. Gesellsch., I., p. 175; Knobel, Völkertaf. d. Genes., p. 216; Ritter, Erdkunde, XIV., p. 107, 915, 1084). With this agrees Euseb., who locates Gerar 25 Roman miles from Eleutheropolis, and, to some extent, Jerome ad Gen. 22:3—three days' journey from Mount Sion. Cyrill (Comm. in Ann., p. 299) erroneously identifies it with Beer-sheba; and Synkell. (Chronogr., p. 100), and the Versio Samarit., by a still greater mistake with Ascalon. RÜETSCH. — Ermentrout.

Gerhard, St., was born about 890 at Staves, diocese of Namur, of rich and noble parents, related to Hagano, Duke of Lower Austrasia. In his youth he served under Berengar, count of Namur. Whilst hunting with the latter, he retired for prayer to the chapel at Brogne, situated upon a rock near the village of St. Gerhard. Being weary, he fell asleep in it, and thought that he saw the apostles around him, and that St. Peter conducted him through the chapel. Having asked what all this meant, Peter told him that on the site of the chapel he should build a larger church in honor of St. Peter and Eugene the martyr, and that he should bring thither the bones of the latter. Gerhard obeyed, and built a church, and near it a monastery (918). Shortly afterwards Berengar sent him on business to Count Robert at Paris. Having accomplished his mission at Paris, he obtained permission from the Count and from Stephan, Bishop of Tongers, to become monk in the abbey of St. Denys. Having, in 928, become presbyter, he returned to Brogne in order to replace the secular clergy with Benedictine monks, of whom he was the superior. He carried with him the relics of Eugene and many other saints, which were given him at St. Denys. Soon the report spread of numerous miracles achieved at Brogne by the relics of St. Eugene, and Gerhard, in order to escape the large crowds of visitors, shut himself up in a cell near the church, in order to close his days here in quiet prayer. But he was often drawn out from this seclusion to reform monasteries. He was sent for to Flanders, to heal Count Arnulph of gravel. Duke Gisbert charged him with the introduction of the rule of Benedict into the degenerated monastery of St. Gislanus. He reformed besides this some eighteen other monasteries. Having labored in this way for 22 years with untiring diligence and without fear of man, and being held in the highest estimation among the monks, he went to Rome to obtain the papal blessing for his institutions and franchises for Brogne. Having returned, he once more performed a general visitation of his monasteries, appointed competent superiors, and died; accounts say, Oct. 3, 957. Many miracles are reported of his body. He was canonized by Innocent II. — (See BOLLAND., ad 3 Oct.; MABILL., Acta ss. ord. s. Bened., V., p. 248, seq.).

DR. PRESSEL. — Reinecke.

Gerhard, John, the most learned among the heroes of Luth. orthodoxy, and, as regards his religious character, the most amiable among learned men, was born in the district of Quedlinburg, Oct. 17, 1582. In his 15th year he was taken with a severe illness, connected with deep melancholy; but he enjoyed at the time the spiritual aid of John Arndt, who induced him to promise that, in case of recovery, he would devote himself to the ministry. In 1599 he visited the univ. of Wittenberg. Being as yet undecided as to the department of science which he should choose, he prosecuted at first the preparatory philosophical course, attending at the same time a few theological lectures. A relative of his, Rauchbar, prochancellor of Saxony, persuaded him to study medicine, which he did for two years; but after the death of the former, he once more returned to the studies of his earlier vows. He now went to Jena, having obtained from his friend Arndt a course of theological studies. Here he made no particular use of the public theological lectures, but privately studied the Scriptures, the Fathers, and the Hebrew. Having obtained the degree of Mag. Philos., he commenced at once to give private lectures on the branches mentioned; and, by special permission of the theological faculty, on theology also. At this time a severe sickness brought him to the verge of the grave; his will, written in 1503, evidences the humble piety which animated him at the time. He next visited Marburg, the theological faculty of which stood pre-eminent at the beginning of the 17th century. Here, it seems, he was first deeply influenced by theological teachers. Winckelmann and Mentzer were the chief celebrities of the then Lutheran Marburg. Gerhard not only heard their lectures, but enjoyed their hospitality and friendship, especially that of Mentzer. But after Landgrave Maurice had introduced the Reformed doctrines into Hesse-Cassel, and these teachers had removed to Hesse-Darmstadt, he became desirous of visiting another school. He preferred Rostock or Tübingen; but yielding to the wishes of his mother, he went to Jena, where he commenced to give theological lectures with much success. He left Jena reluctantly to accept the superintendency of Heldburg, to which he was urgently invited by Casimir, Duke of Coburg. Thus the great theologian was only in his 24th year, when he was vested with this clerical office, which was regarded as higher and more important than an academical professorship. Before he entered upon it, he also received the D. D. — The gifts which Gerhard had already displayed in his theoretical labors, characterized his more practical ones also. A church-visitation accomplished under his direction is especially praised; a consequence of it was the church-constitution promulged in 1615. And yet he still entertained a lively desire for an academical situation. Two calls to Jena in 1610 and 1611, and one to Wittenberg in 1613, he had declined at the request of Casimir. But when in 1615 the seniorate of the faculty of Jena was once more vacant, the petition of the senate of Jena was so strongly enforced by George I., Elector of Saxony, that Casimir at last consented to dismiss Gerhard, with the expressed condition, however, that the latter should still give aid and council to the Church of Coburg. — Thus the great theologian found himself at last in the position which alone he regarded as his calling; and he devoted himself laboriously and untiringly to the duties of his office. But Gerhard's labors during this period extended also to the Church, and even to the State. The clergy of electoral and ducal Saxony had instituted ecclesiastical conferences, which, it was hoped, would in time become a supreme authoritative tribunal for the Lutheran Church. One of these was held in Jena, 1621; another in Leipsic, 1624; another in 1630. In all these the first voice was conceded to Gerhard. To many princes he was the oracle in matters the most diverse, both ecclesiastical and secular (see Tholuck, Vorgeschichte des Rationalismus, I., p. 66). His constitution was at the same time rather weak, and was further reduced by his numerous business journeys. He succumbed in the end, Aug. 20, 1637, in his 55th year; after he had accomplished an amount of work, for which in our own age two lives would scarcely suffice. — From his life, works, and correspondence, G. appears as a man of an unaffected, touching simplicity; of a warm affection, and a trust in God unshaken by even the fiercest trials; but also somewhat too cautious and fond of peace, so that at times he purchased peace at the expense of truth, and covered over sores of the Church which demanded the cautery. — As regards his services to theological science, there are, in the department of doctrine, two works, which have rendered his name immortal. The first is the "Confessio catholica," the design of which is expressed by its title: Doctrina catholica et evangelica, quam ecclesiæ Augustanæ confessioni addictæ profitentur ex R. C. scriptorum suffragiis confirmata, 1634, 37; some theologians regard this as Gerhard's best work. The second, and which chiefly established his fame as a theologian, is his "loci communes theologici." Some leading points in theology he treated more explicitly in his "exegesis sive uberior explicatio articulorum," etc., 1625. The proper position of this work with reference to its predecessors and successors has been pointed out by Gass in his Gesch. der prot. Dogmat., I. p. 261 (see also Tholuck, Geist der Wittenb. Theolog., p. 253). Gerhard's advance beyond Chemnitz and Hutter consists not so much in a more systematic arrangement, nor in a deeper speculative basis for his doctrines, or a more subtle formal development of them; as in an erudite thoroughness, transparent clearness and comprehensiveness. His exegetical expositions are of special importance. This work gained admirers even among Catholics and Reformed. The latter reprinted it in folio, Geneva, 1639. An excellent, enlarged edition is that of Cotta, Tübing., 1762, in 22 vols. 4to. — But Gerhard's exegetical services are also very important. Their special merit consists in their patristic references, doctrinal precision, and generally lengthy exegetical tact. Here must be mentioned his "Comm. in Harmon. hist. ev. de pass. et resurr. Chr.," 1617, a continuation of the Harm. ev. commenced by M. Chemnitz, and continued by P. Lyser, and undertaken by Gerhard at the request of the clerical convention of Jena in 1621. The three works were then published as one, Hamburg, 1652, 3 vols., fol.; it is up to the present time the only complete commentary to the synoptic gospels. His other commentaries are less known, since they appeared posthumously and are somewhat meagre. In 1637 appeared his Comm. in Genesis; in 1658, in Deuteronomium; that on the Epistles of Peter (publ. in 1641) is very valuable for its erudition. At the desire of Duke Ernest, the Pious, he edited also the "Weimar Bibelwerk," a commentary for the laity, and contributed to it the parts on Genesis, Daniel, and the Apocalypse. — In Isagogics to theology his methodus stud. theol., publ. in 1620, holds an important place. In the prominence which he assigns to the study of the Scriptures, he shows himself yet a disciple of the old theology of the Reformation. He also urges the necessity of a hearty piety, as also the practical nature of theological studies. — Among his devotional works, his meditationes sacræ, composed as student in 1606, has gained most favor. It is composed after Augustine, Bernard, and Luther, and has passed through innumerable editions. His sermons are free from the doctrinal subtleties and violations of taste which belong to his times; but are still too didactic and devoid of passion and enthusiasm, to make a lasting impression. — (See via Joa. Gerhardi, by Erdm. Rud. Fischer, 1723, a work which, as regards care and the employment of original sources, leaves little to be desired. Tholuck. — Reinecke.)

Gerhardt, Paul, was born about 1606, or 1607, at Grafenhainichen, in the electorate of Saxony, and died in 1676 as arch-deacon at Lubben, in the same country. We may safely call him the most gifted of all the Christian poets, who have ever been given to the Church; as the one in whom the poetic faculty is not merely one in connection with a number of others; but whose entire calling of the Head of the Church was, to teach the Church to sing the sweetest hymns. In Gerhardt, more than in any one else, all the requisites of this calling are found united; he is firmly rooted in objective Christian truth, the creed of the Church; has a genuine, but undistorted sympathy for everything purely human; depth of Christian feeling and suggestive thoughts; a fresh, healthy poetic glance into the life of nature no less than into the life of spirit; as also beauty of form, of which he is so thoroughly master, that whatever he says and however he says it, seems to every one as the most natural, popular and striking expression of the thought; and imresses itself upon the memory, whilst at the same time the laws of art, metre, and rhythm are observed with a fine tact. But though he did not discard recognized rules, he was yet independent and original; and it is due to the fresh fountain of poetry, which poured with original force from his bosom, that he was classed with none of the existing schools of poetry, but has been regarded as the head of a new class of poets, and the originator of an epoch in the history of Church hymns. For with Gerhardts spiritual poetry assumed a more subjective character, which subsequently degenerated into mysticism and rationalism, and became anti-churchly but with him remained in complete and undisturbed harmony with the subjective creed and doctrine of the Church. It is characteristic in this respect, that of his 120 hymns no less than 16 commence with "I;" and that 60 others refer only to God and the individual heart, among which however there are ten, which, as paraphrases of Psalms, are justified in maintaining this subjective tone. Many of his hymns, indeed, are designed to instruct and awaken; but even these turn as often to the human heart, as to the Church, or the world. In Gerhardts hymns, therefore, subjectivism is decidedly prevalent. But their subjectivism is only the concrete form in which the Christian faith, feelings and life express themselves through the individual; which form, however, must be and is common to all Christians in so far as they are a Church of Christ, a people of God. Hence what Gerhardtspeaks flows from his own heart and experience. There is another difference which separates him from both the poets of the Reformation, and from the later mystics and rationalists. Wackernagel finds it in their popular element; we would rather call it, notwithstanding the vagueness of the expression, the human in general, for which indeed Luther, like Gerhardts, had the same open, healthy sense; but which he, confining himself to the great deeds of God and the distresses and hopes of the Church, would not serve as poet. For even when Luther writes an infant hymn, his poetry pours from his bosom like the sounds of a trumpet. Gerhardts sings also of summer, harvest, journeys, marriage, the "gifted nightingale," the bees, the deer, the fawn, etc.; his heart and poetic sense embraced all with love and fervor. His views of nature, however, especially in its union with religious life, are thoroughly novel; injustice is done to neither side, and the religious element stands in most beautiful harmony with the natural; whilst the rationalists or semirationalists spoil the one by means of the other.—As regards metre Gerhardts generally adopted such as were already in use in the Church, though he seems also to be the author of several new ones. His versifications of Psalms are of inferior merit. He followed in them the Reformed, who merely reduced the Psalms to metre; whilst Luther made the substance of them his own, and then reproduced them in an entirely new form. Nor did Gerhardts, notwithstanding his fine æsthetic sense, escape entirely the bad taste of his age. Some of his interminable hymns, alliterative repetitions of words, etc., we would ascribe to the taste of a past generation. The taste of a later age was not satisfied with amending real defects; but with the vandalism of illumination it trod down the most beautiful, delicate and fragrant flowers in Gerhardts garden, and substituted for them—dandelions. Our own age has shown its better historical sense in returning to Gerhardts unadulterated.—We must yet regard Gerhardts as a theologian. He did not, indeed, produce a system of theology; and yet the history of his dismissal from office at Berlin has reference to the theologian, and not to the poet. In the controversies with the Reformed, which occasioned this catastrophe, Gerhardts frequently published theses, rejoinders, etc.; which show him at home in theology, and skilled in answering objections, and in the use of controversial weapons. That these transactions were exceedingly unedifying, was not his fault; but it would seem unaccountable that he, the poet with the rich, pure mind, whose religion did not, like that of many before and after him, consist in doctrinal forms, not only did not abstain from those disputes, but was even one of the most uncompromising enemies of the Reformed. The Elector of Brandenburg had demanded nothing of the clergy, except that they would sign a pledge that they would discontinue their scurrilous attacks upon each other; all controversy was not forbidden, but only moderation and courtesy demanded. But even in this an exception was made in favor of Gerhardts; for it was signified to him merely in words, that it was hoped that he would of his own accord act according to the edicts. Notwithstanding all this, Gerhardts resigned his office, supposing that by observing even this slight restriction he would violate his conscience. To us in our day it seems that the edicts restricted Gerhardts freedom of preaching no more than was already done by the natural decorum of the pulpit. It is clear that it was with G. an extreme conscientiousness, which made him tremble at every mere seeming approach towards the Reformed system. His age did not yet understand that in order to judge the position of others correctly, we must place ourselves upon it; this would have been regarded as indifferentism, if not a surrender of positive truth. But in his hymns Gerhardts held himself quite aloof from these matters; whence they had been received in the Reformed Church also with the greatest favor. There is only a single hymn in which one verse merely touches the doctrine of the Lord's Supper.

Of his personal career otherwise, we can only mention that in consequence of the wars he received his first appointment as late as 1651, his 45th year, as minister at Mittenwalde. In this year also he was married. In 1657 he was called to the church of St. Nicolai, at Berlin. In 1667 he was dismissed; and though this dismissal was taken back, he could not, on account of the above-mentioned demand of the Elector, make up his mind to return. He remained for a year at Berlin without employment; was then called as arch-deacon to Lübben, where he died in his 70th year. For other facts we must refer to his biographies.—Gerhardts published no complete edition of his hymns. After 1649 they gradually found their way into Protestant hymn books. J. G. Ebeling, music-director in Gerhardt's church at Berlin, published them in 1667 with music composed by himself. Other editions followed by B. Förtsch: Berlin, 1676; Feuerlein: Nuremberg, 1682; Feustking: Zerbst, 1707; Treuner: Augsb., 1708. After this there were no complete editions published until 1821, by Olshausen, in Erlangen with Lancizolle in Berlin. They underwent many changes. A critically restored text has been published by Schulz and Langbecker, and lately by Wackernagel (Stuttg., 1843, '49, '55).—(See ROTH, P. Gerhardt, etc.: Lpz., 1829; LANGBECKER, Leb. u. Lied. von P. G.; Berl., 1841; OTTO SCHULZ, P. G.'s geistl. Andachten, etc.). PALMER.—Reinecke.

Gerhoch.—Born in Polling, near Weilheim, in the western part of Old Bavaria, towards the close of 11th cent.; studied at Polling, Mosburg, and Freysing; is said to have spent three years in finishing his education at Hildesheim, where, mixing in the controversy between Henry V. and Paschal II., he imbibed ultra-montane views. Leaving Augsburg, where Bishop Herrmann had made him cath. canon and teacher, on account of what he supposed to be simony and schism on the part of the Bishop, he retired to a cloister of Augustine canons in Raitenbuch. Peace concluded between Henry V. and Calixtus II., 1122, he again became in Augsburg Magister scholarum and Doctor juvenum. Desirous of leading a canonical life, and finding no place to practise it in, he paid a visit to Pope Honorius II., 1125 or 1126, to induce him to force those of Raitenbuch to observe the rules of Augustine. Bishop Kuno, of Regensburg, himself inclined to asceticism, elevated him to the priesthood, and placed him over the parish Cham. His enemies, however, frustrated his plans in this district; and his friend, the Archbishop Conrad I., of Salzburg, made him (1132) provost of the prebend St. Michael, in Reichersberg. Here he remained to the day of his death, nearly 38 years. His ultra-montanism, rigorism, and orthodoxy, brought him into perpetual collisions. He laid great stress on the Vita canonica clericorum; and deeply lamented that, through schismatic priests, consciences were disturbed, and honest souls deceived. In his opinion, such could not effectively dispense nor administer the Holy Communion. Theological controversies, however, called his energies into more active play. Educated in the post-carolinian mode of thought—that of Greg. the Great—he had no sympathy with Aristotle, and grieved to find himself surrounded with young men who were infected with the itch of disputation, ridiculed tradition, and were unwilling to rest on the authority of the Fathers. Fortified with the condemnation pronounced by the Church against Peter Abelard and Gilbert de la Porrée, he was bold enough to accuse of heresy the Magister Sententiarum. In his opposition to Adoptianism and Nestorianism, which sought to insinuate their poison into Rome and the Bavarian dioceses, he went so far as to affirm, in a Eutychian sense, the oneness and identity of the two natures in Christ, and to utter expressions such as: in vero agno caput cum pedibus, Divi- nitas videlicet cum tota humanitate voratur. His enemies increased from day to day; but when the Pope issued a decree, 1164, against the neology of France, Gerhoch may be said to have achieved a triumph. He was a welcome visitor at the Papal court, which regarded him as a pillar to the Papal, orthodox party in southern Germany. Most celebrated is his reply to St. Bernard's work, de consideratione. To Eugene III. he dedicated an exposition of Ps. 64. Died 1169.—His writings, mentioned in the pref. to his Comment. on Psalms, pub. by B. Pez, as fifth part of Thesaurus Anecdotorum, 1728.

ALBRECHT VOGEL.—Ermentrout.

Gerizim (גֵּרִיזִים), the name of the highest peak (Jos., Ant., 11, 8, 2) of the mountains of Ephraim. It rises perpendicularly about 800 feet out of the valley of Sichem, opposite to Mt. Ebal, between which two, in a valley about 1600 feet wide, lies the town of Sichem, the present Nâbulus (see the Art.; comp. Judges 9: 7; Jos., Ant., 11, 8, 6). Gerizim, according to Shubert (Reise in's Morgenld., III., p. 146) 2500, more exactly according to Lynch (Expedition to the Jordan, etc.) 2398 feet above the Mediterranean Sea, became important in the history of Israel, because, according to the arrangement, Deut. 11: 29, sq.; 27: 11–13, the blessing was pronounced upon the people from it, after the entrance into the promised land; whilst from the opposite, Ebal, the curse was thundered against all transgressors (Josh. 8: 30, sq.; Jos., Ant., 4, 8, 44). The reason why the blessing and the curse were thus distributed, is scarcely to be found in the superior natural advantages which Gerizim had above Ebal (Hamelveld, Bibl. Geogr., I., p. 371, sq.); for, according to the testimony of Robinson (Pales., II., 275–80), both mountains are naked and unfruitful (comp. also Maundrell's Travels, p. 82). The reason of that arrangement lay rather in the condition of the camp, and the position of the 10 tribes at this time: at Ebal a copy of the law (Deut. 4–26), engraved on limestone tables, was erected in the valley, and an altar raised to commemorate the renewal of the covenant between Jehovah and Israel, and to receive the first thank-offering for the occupation of the land of promise; the priests stood at the altar, with their faces towards the East (Jos., Ant., 4, 8, 44); on the left of these, at Ebal, six of the tribes; on the right, at Gerizim, the other six, and these evidently the most important and favored; these last, as standing on the favored right side of the altar, responded to the blessings spoken from the altar with amen, whilst the first six tribes answered and affirmed the curses (comp. Keil, Comm. on Joshua, p. 150, sq.). That a greater holiness did not at this time already attach to Gerizim above Ebal, is evident from this, that the altar was erected at Ebal (Deut. 27: 4, sq.), and not at Gerizim; and the curse was not pronounced upon the mountain, or upon those standing upon it, but upon transgressors of the law. But after the exile the Samaritans built a temple upon Gerizim, and established there a peculiar worship, for which they appealed to the ancient position of Sichem (see the Art.), especially to Deut. 11: 29; 27: 4, in which last pas-age their version of the Pentateuch, through undeniable corruption, confounds Ebal with Jerizim, see Gesenius, de Pentat. Samarit., p. 61. It may be, that already earlier a certain religious importance was attached to this mountain by the popular faith, which occasioned its selection by the Samaritans, even before they received the Pentateuch from the Jews at Jerusalem, which they then conformed to their faith and their customs (see 2 Macc. 6 : 2; Jos., Ant., 11, 1, 2; 12, 5, 5; 13, 3, 4. Meanwhile, before 300 years passed away, this temple was destroyed by John Hyrcan, A. C. 129 (Jos., Ant., 13, 9, 1; 9. J., 1, 2, 6); however, the mountain remained afterwards as before the holy place of worship for the Samaritans (John 4 : 20; Jos., Ant., 18, 1, 1; B. J., 3, 7, 32); and still at the present day, the few remnants of this sect still living at Nâbulus, visit the holy mountain at the 4 yearly festivals, when not prevented by Turkish fanaticism. Robinson, who among others ascended his mountain, now called Djebel-el-Zôr, found the ruins of an enormous building, which the present Samaritans call el-Kûlah, the castle. Robinson ascribes these ruins to the Emperor Justinian.

Comp. the Art. Samaritans; Reland, dissert. miscell., I., no. 3; Lightfoot, disquis. chorogr. ante ev. John, cap. IV., § 3; v. Lengerke, Kanaan, p. 38, 641, sq.; Ewald, Gesch. Isr., III., 2, p. 243, sq.; Ritter's, Erdkunde, XVI., p. 638 sq.

RÜETSCH.—Beck.

Gerlach, Otto Von.—Born 1801, in Berlin, of a noble Reformed family; having finished the study of law, he returned to his native city (1820), where, making the acquaintance of a circle of pious friends, his early religious impressions bloomed forth into rich fruit, and he again began his academic pursuits with the view of devoting himself to the Church. His practical bent not allowing him to rest satisfied as private tutor in Berlin—a situation the earnest solicitations of his friends induced him to accept (1828)—he became Pastor of the small church of St. Elizabeth. Here he devoted himself to the saving of souls with an energy so comprehensive, and a love so inventive in the art of doing good, that he deserves to be held forth a model for all preachers. Under his fostering care sprang into life missions in the family and in the Church, pastoral visits and prayers with the members, distribution of books, institutions for women and workingmen, service for children, private confession. In the midst of all these labors, he found time to participate in the Berlin mission. institutes for the heathen and other societies, in the interpretation of Scripture, and in literary enterprises.—G. nourished his soul by the perusal of Zinzendorf's and Spangenberg's lives, and the devotional works of Count Lynar and v. Bretschneider—books which at this period were in the hands of everybody. His early acquaintance, also, with English literature, added strength to his naturally active, practical spirit, and he may justly be called the Wesley of the Berlin Church. His first theological work was a translation of Wesley's sermon on "Awake, thou that sleepest, and Christ shall give thee light." He also had Richard Baxter's works published in German, and paid great attention to missionary operations. Inheriting from his father a love of history, he took interest in every portion of the Church, and every phenomenon that befell her. Church government, also, enlisted his intensest energies, as is proved by his essay in Tholuck's liter. Anzeiger, 1832, "die Bearbeit. des K.-R. in der ev. K. mit besond. Rücks. auf K. F. Eichhorn's Grunds. des K.-R.," and a treatise, "K.-Rechtl. Unters. der Frage: Welches ist die Lehre u. das Recht der evang. K. in Bezug auf Ehescheid. Erl., 1839."—The great work of his life was the increase of the means of grace by which the Church is first brought to the people. To effect his object, the plans projected by the English and Scotch Churches offered him valuable auxiliaries; and he was sent to England by the reigning monarch, in the year 1842, to investigate them. This journey formed an epoch in his life. On his return, he published the "amtliche Bericht über die Entstehung u. Einricht. vieler neuer Kirch-und Pfarrsysteme in England mit Rücks. auf unsere kirchl. Zustände," "der amtl. Bericht über den Zustand der anglikan. K. in ihren verschiedenen Gliederungen im Jahre 1842," and the exceedingly practical and valuable treatise, "die Kirchliche Armenpflege," from the English of Dr. Chalmers, 1847.

Ger. had to endure the opposition of a spiritual bureaucracy, which regarded every deviation from ecclesiastical routine as a blow at Church order. One of the chief causes of offence was his refusal to marry such as had been illegally divorced.—His merit, hitherto obscured, was recognized by the present monarch. He was made a member of the Council in 1847, court and cathedral preacher, and Prof. honorarius. His days, however, were numbered. On his return from a tour for his health to Silesia, 1849, he ascended the pulpit contrary to the advice of his physician, and died three days after, Oct. 29, in the 49th year of his age.

Outside of Berlin, Ger. is best known by his "vollständige Auswahl der Hauptschriften Luthers mit histor. Anmerk., Einleitungen u. Register," 2. A. 24 Bände. 1848; and by his "h. S. nach Luther's Übersetz. mit Einleit. u. erklärend. Anmerk." Neue A. 6 B., 1847–53. The last work, the 4 vols. of Old Test. by Dr. Schmieder, in Wittenberg, is intended for the use of educated persons. In a work of such solid value, one cannot but regret that the style is not more animated, and better adapted to the capacity of the people—a fault, indeed, which the modest author acknowledges in his preface.

Sources: Evang. K.-Zeit., 1849, nro. 101; Schmieder in der Forts. des Bibelwerks 4. Bd. 1. Abth.; Seegemund, Vorrede zu den Predigten von O. v. Gerlach, 1850.

THOLUCK.—Ermentrout.

Germain St. en Laye, the place where was concluded, August 8, 1570, the third religious peace with the Huguenots. Though they had sustained a defeat at the bloody battle near Moncontour (Oct. 3, 1569), the king determined on peace. The "eternal and irrevocable" decree of St. Germain contains the following Art.: "The Reformed shall enjoy perfect religious freedom, and have two places for Divine service in each government, which is forbidden, however, at the court and six miles from it, at the Prévôté of Paris, and thirty miles round about this city. Nobles, to whom jurisdiction belongs, may have Reformed worship in their castles, with their families and subjects. The Hug. shall be eligible to office, nor burdened more heavily with taxes than the Catholics, and shall have, as places of refuge, the four towns La Rochelle, Montauban, Cognac and La Charité." To say that this peace was concluded only that at some future time the Hug. might be the more thoroughly annihilated, would be doing injustice to the parties concerned; though, when we take into consideration the hatred, the blood-thirstiness, and faithlessness of the king and queen, we cannot find fault with those evangelicals who distrusted it. Two years after, and the massacre of St. Bartholomew astonished the world (Aug. 24, 1572).—Comp. Soldan, Gesch. des Prot. in Frankr. II., p. 395; Raumer, Gesch. Europ., Vol. II.; Capefigue, la réforme et la ligue (Paris, 1843), p. 308–313.

DR. PRESSEL.—Ermentrout.

Germanus, St., von Auxerre, born of a noble family, 380, at Auxerre, in Roman Gaul, studied law and rhetoric, and became a military commander-in-chief. The people and clergy selected him as successor of Bishop Amator, and he was consecrated July 7, 418. He now led a strictly ascetic life: rye bread was his food, and ashes, which he also sprinkled over the board of his bed. By his sermons, debates, and miracles, he achieved a victory over the Pelagians, who had infested the orthodox Church of England, while his military genius, aided by the Hallelujah of the Britons, repelled an invasion of the Picts and Scots. Having restored a dead person to life in Ravenna, he died in this city July 31, 448. His faith in relics was glorified by the great veneration paid his body, which was taken to Auxerre. The Church celebrates his memory July 26. From the tower of the very old church St. Germain l'Auxerrois, in Paris, which was profaned by a mob, 1831, was given the signal of Bartholomew's night.

REUCHLIN.—Ermentrout.

Germanus, St., of Paris, born about 496, near Autun, in Upper Burgundy, at first Abbot in this place, then Bishop of Paris. His asceticism of life was only equalled by his hospitality towards the poor, and his zeal in wresting from slavery prisoners taken in war. Distinguished also for his gift of prophecy. Aided by King Childebert, whom he miraculously delivered from a severe sickness, and by a Council at Paris, 557, he enforced strict discipline in the country, and extirpated many remains of heathenism. Against Charibert, the Frankish coregent in Paris, who had rejected his wife, and, during her life, married again, Germ. issued a bull of excommunication. He died May 28, 576, and was buried in St. Vincent's Church, which, re-consecrated (1163) after having been burnt by the Normans, and became celebrated under the name St. Germain des Pres. The cloister founded by him exercised civil authority till 17th cent., over that district of Paris called St. Germain.

REUCHLIN.—Ermentrout.

Gerrhenians (Γερρηνοί), mentioned in 2 Macc. 13 : 24, as residing opposite Ptolemais, yet as near as not to be very remote from it. With this corresponds the situation of Γέρρα, in Arabia Felix, on the Persian Sea; also that of a Γέρρα which Ptol. (5, 15, 26) locates in Batanæa. More correct, however, the τὰ Γέρρα (Strabo 16, 1760) of Grotius and Winer, between Pelusium and Rhinocolura. According to Diod. Sic., 3, 42; Strabo, 16, 766, it was built by Babylonian exiles.

PRESSEL.—Ermentrout.

Gerson, Jean Charlier, called Gerson from his birth-place, a village in the diocese of Rheims, was born Dec. 14, 1363. His parents, who seem to have been wealthy country-people, gave their children a pious education. Four of his sisters and three of his brothers entered the service of the Church. He, the eldest, destined for the priesthood was sent, in 1377, to Paris, to the famous College of Navarre. After becoming a licentiate of arts in 1381, he pursued the study of theology for ten years under Peter d'Ailly and Gillas Deschamps. The great papal schism had already begun in 1378, and the general excitement extended to the younger clergy. While yet in his 19th year, he is said to have delivered a discourse on spiritual jurisdiction, in order to prove that he who exercised his office to the injury of those under his care, should be compelled to lay it down (De jurisdict. spirituali, 1382, Vol. II., P. II., p. 261, ed. of Dupin). In 1383 and 1384 Gerson was procurator of the Gallic nation at the University. His knowledge and talent had gained him so much respect, that, in 1387, he was added, although only a bachelor of theology, to the embassy, which the University sent to Avignon, in order to procure from Clement VII. a decision against John of Montson, who, because he rejected the dogma of the immaculate conception had been condemned by the Parisian doctors, and now appealed to the Pope. What Gerson saw at the papal court strengthened the deep impression, which the protracted confusion in the Church, and especially the wretched state of things in France, had made upon him; he gave free utterance to his sorrow in discourses delivered before the University after his return to Paris. In 1392 he was made Doctor of Theology, and succeeded d'Ailly as Chancellor of the Parisian University and Church. Soon after he obtained, through the favor of the Duke of Burgundy, the diaconate of Bruges in Flanders.

One main object of his life seems to have been the reformation of theology and morals. Preferring the mystic to the scholastic system in a Baccalaureate, 1388 (Vol. III., p. 1029), he insisted on an abandonment of the fine-spun theories of the latter, and, April 1, 1400 (Vol. I. pt. I., p. 120), inscribed to d'Ailly a circular, de reformatione theologiae, in which he lamented the degeneracy of the clergy and the lax discipline among the students whose morals were corrupted by the foul novels of the day (see his Tractatus contra romantium de rosa, May, 1402, Vol. III., p. 297). To the students of the college of Navarre he directed two letters on the best method of studying theology, on the choice of authors, and the worthlessness of scholastic disputations (Vol. I., pt. I., p. 106), and, 1402, delivered several lectures against vana curiositas in negotio fidei. Although a nominalist and belonging rather to those who affirmed the Universalia in re than to those who placed them post rem, he sought to effect a reconciliation between the two parties. His system of mysticism was intended to supplant the dry book-knowledge of his time. Neither identifying the intelligence with the absolute Spirit, nor revelling in fanatical feelings, he never overstepped the boundary that divides the uncreated from the finite, and made use of the understanding to work into a scientific theory the experiences of the soul. Scholasticism was to be thus the form of mysticism, the object being, to use his own language, "concordare theologiam mysticam cum nostra scholastica." His system consists of two parts, the one, de mystica theologia speculativa, having to do with the capacities of the spirit in its relation to the mystic states, the other de mystica theologia practica, with the means to elevate oneself to contemplation. The first principle of his psychology was the nominalist maxim that the powers of the soul are simply different names of one and the same substance, distinct non re sed nomine, and may be reduced to two original capabilities, the vis cognitiva and the vis affectiva, the former of which divides itself into 1) intelligentia simplex, which receives immediately from God a certain, natural light and, by intuition, perceives as true the original principles; 2) ratio, the understanding in the modern sense; 3) vis cognitiva sensualis, the knowledge of senses, and the latter into 1) Synæresis, a natural, God-given impulse to the good; 2) appetitus, rationalis, will, freedom, desire, passion; 3) appetitus sensualis, excited by appeals, or representations to the senses. Sin has destroyed the harmony that originally obtained among all these powers; the object of mystic theology is to restore it. After the manner of Richard of St. Victor (de contemplatione) Gerson distinguishes three stages in the operation of the two capabilities above-mentioned: in the vis cognitiva, 1) the cogitatio, spontaneous direction of the soul to sensual objects; 2) meditatio, designed to attempt to investigate truth; 3) contemplatio, free gaze upon divine things; in the vis affectiva, 1) libido, desire; 2) devotio, piety; 3) dilectio, ecstasica and anagogica, love that aspires upward. In this contemplation of love consists mystical theology. Love is "experimentalis Dei perceptio," through it the eternal word is born in the soul and union with God effected. Gerson made it an essential point never to identify the Creator and the creature, and stood opposed to the Pantheism of Ambrich of Bena and his school, and of Ruysbrök (Epistola ad Fr. Bartholomæum Carthusianum, super tertia parte libri J. Ruysbr. de ornatu spirit. nupt.). The means for attaining to dilectio are ascetic. He laid little stress on visions. He wrote several treatises on the criteria of the ecstatic state: de distinctione verarum visionum a falsis (1398, Vol. I., Pt. I., p. 43), de probatione spirituum (1415, Vol. I., Pt. I., p. 37). Also, on the mystic life and contemplation, one of the most important, de monte contemplationis (Vol. III., Pt. II., p. 541). — He took as much interest in the improvement of ecclesiastical order as in that of theology, as his conduct during the schism attests. Though at first disposed to regard as premature the action of the French National Synod, 1398, against Benedict XIII., he at last coincided with it; for, in his protestatio super statum ecclesiæ (about 1395), and de modo habendi se tempore schismatis (Vol. II., Pt. I., p. 1), he declared it better to resist both Popes than by excommunication to force the people to submit to one or the other (so, also, de schismate, 1396, and de subtractione schismatis, Vol. II., Pt. I., p. 7). The solicitations of friends restrained him from resigning his chancellorship (see causæ propter quas cancellariam dimittere volebat, Vol. IV., Pt. II., p. 725). After the flight of Benedict (March, 1403), he published de schismate (Vol. II., Pt. I., p. 17), and de concilio generali unius obedientiæ, in which he tried to prove that such a council had no authority to judge Benedict (Vol. II., Pt. I., p. 24; also considerationes de restitutione obedientiæ Benedicto, ib. p. 32). Benedict was again recognised by France, May, 1403. In the year 1407, he was appointed to the embassy to the two Popes, the object of which was to effect a reconciliation between them. Meanwhile he published several smaller treatises in which he called upon the clergy to be true to their duties, and advocated the necessity of an Œcumenical Council.—Appointed March, 1408, pastor of S. Jean en Grève, in Paris, he exercised his eminent eloquence and Christian charity in the delivery of sermons full of evangelical truth and devotion. Nor did he spare the vices of the court, but called upon the King to practise righteousness. At the Provincial Synod of Rheims, 1407, he enforced upon the clergy their duties, and upon bishops the necessity of frequent visitations (Vol. II., Pt. IV., 542).

On March 25, 1409, the Council of Pisa opened its sessions. Gerson and D'Ailly were the most important members of the commission sent by the University. G. had two months previously, in his de unitate ecclesiæ, stated his views touching the supremacy of Councils (B. II., Th. I., p. 113). The true head of the Church is Christ; the Pope is His vicar only in so far as he worthily represents the Church; the proper representative of the Church is a general Council, which, independent of the Pope, can depose him when unity demands such action. The Council, in fact, had to depose them both. The result was three Popes.—On his return to Paris he came into collision with the Mendicant monks, who had been favored with a Bull by Alexander V., and, at the same time, published several treatises on morals and psychology, of which may be mentioned de vita spirituali animæ (Vol. III., Pt. I., p. 1), de passionibus animæ (ib., p. 128), definitiones terminorum ad theologiam moralem pertinentium (ib., p. 107). Worthy of special notice is his de modis uniendi ac reformandi Ecclesiam in concilio generali, 1410, in the way of reply to de difficultate reformationis in concilio universali, by d'Ailly. In this treatise he places the Church above the Pope; in the former he distinguishes a general, spiritual Church, of which Christ is the sole head, and in which a person can be saved who holds neither of the contending Popes to be the true one, and the latter, being a peccator et peccabilis, subject to the Divine law as any other Christian. Remarkable are these words: "papatus non est sanctitas, nec facit hominem sanctum; locus non sanctificat hominem, sed homo locum; nec ornamenta papalia eum sanctum faciunt; imo tanto magis eum vituperant, quanto ejus vita mala apud homines est magis nota. . . . Ridiculum enim est dicere, quod unus homo mortalis dicat se potestatem habere in cælo et in terra ligandi et solvendi a peccatis, et quod ille sit filius perditionis, simoniacus, avarus, exactor, mendax, fornicator, superbus, pomposus, et peior quam diabolus." He suggested three methods for healing the schism: via cessionis et renunciationis, via ejectionis et privationis, via coercionis. If the three Popes yield not to the two first, "tunc dolis, fraudibus, armis, violentia, potentia, promissionibus, donis et pecuniis, tandem carceribus, mortibus convenit sanctissimam unionem Ecclesiæ et conjunctionem quomodolibet procurare." In this tract is not only defended the older Gallican system, but a thorough reform urged upon the next Council.

The Council at length convened at Constance, Nov. 5, 1414. Its history is not in place here. Nothing special to record of the numerous speeches he delivered. We direct attention to his de auferibilitate papæ ab Ecclesia, in which G. shows that, though the idea of the Church as a hierarchy forbids the annihilation of the Papacy, a general Council can depose a Pope, and that it is the duty of every Christian to resist him when his commands contravene sound doctrine and justice, and to his de potestate ecclesiastica et de origine juris et legum (Feb. 6, 1417), and to tractatus quomodo et an liceat in causis fidei a summo Pontifice appellare seu ejus judicium declinare (1418), in which is affirmed that, as the Pope is not infallible, an appeal can be made, in matters of faith, to a general Council. —He protested against doctrines which came into conflict with the orthodox faith, as well as against immoral teachings. In several treatises denied the right of interpreting Scripture when not called to it by the Church; to which, indeed, he assigns the sole privilege of defining its meaning: propositiones de sensu literalis sacre Scripturæ et de causis errantium, 1413, Tractatus de protestatione circa materiam fidei contra hæreses, diversas, Veritates quæ credendæ sint de necessitate salutis, and the twelve signa pertinaciæ hæreticæ. In his contra hæresim de communione laicorum sub utraque specie (Aug. 20, 1417), he justifies the exclusion of the laity from the cup, and summons the civil authorities against all innovators. To the Council he submitted 19 articles, extracted from de ecclesia of Huss, which he declared hæretici et ut tales judicialiter condemnandi. Although a Catholic, G. condemned many abuses of mediæval piety, such as the frequent canonization of saints (de probat. spirituum, Vol. I., Pt. I., p. 37), the fanaticism of the Flagellantes (contra sectam Flagell., etc., and Epist. ad Vinc., Fer. Vol. II., Pt. IV., p. 658). During his exile, occasioned by the hatred of the Duke of Burgundy, G. composed four books, de consolatione theologiæ (Vol. I., Pt. I., p. 125), which discuss the four-fold comfort theology affords: "per spem in contemplatione divini judicii, per scripturam in revelatione regiminis mundi, per patientiam in zeli moderatione, per doctrinam in conscientie serenatione," a sort of Evang. Harmony, Monotessaron sive unum ex quatuor Evangeliiis, Meditat. on passages from Mk, the poem Josephinus, in honor of St. Joseph (Vol. IV., Pt. II., p. 743). In order to spread more widely the festival of Joseph, he wrote several treatises concerning it (1413, 1416; ib., p. 729).—After the assassination of the Duke of Burgundy (Sept. 10, 1419), G. returned to France, and settled in Lyons, where his brother officiated as Prior of the Celestines. The number of his writings, during his residence here, attests both his erudition and piety. Not necessary to mention all of them. Among the most important of his last works are those in which he recommends to the monks literary labors (Vol. III., Pt. V., p. 693), Dialogus sophiæ et naturæ super celibatu sine castitate ecclesiasticorum (Vol. II., Pt. IV., p. 617), de concordia metaphysicæ cum logica (1426, Vol. IV., Pt. II., p. 821), Collectorium super Magnificat (1427, Vol. IV., Pt. I., p. 231), an allegory on the Song of Solomon (1429, Vol. IV., Pt. I., p. 27), and de parvulis ad Christum trahendis.—At St. Paul's cloister, where the venerable chancellor spent his last days, he frequently assembled little children to instruct them in Christian doctrine and morals. At the approach of death, he gathered them around him once more, that they might pray with him: God of compassion, have pity on thy poor servant. He died July 12, 1429, in the 66th year of his age. So great was the veneration in which he was held, that the people dreamed of miracles done at his grave, and the French literati called him Doctor Christianissimus.

Editions of G.'s works: Cologne, 1483, 4 vols. fol.; Strasburg, 1488, 3 vols. fol., and 1489, 4to., by Geiler of Kaisersberg; a 4th vol., cont. sermons, added by Wimpfeling, 1502; the three first vol., also Basle, 1494, fol. These edit. very incomplete; also, that of Paris, 1521. Better that by E. Richer, Paris, 1606, 3 vols. fol. The most complete by Dupin, Antwerp, 1706, 5 vols. fol. On Gerson see: Vita Gersonii, in first vol. of Dupin's ed.—Gersonis Vita, in Hardt's Hist. Conc. Const., Vol. I., Pt. IV., p. 26; de Joh. Gersono, von Launoi, in his Hist. Gymn. Navarre, Vol. IV. of his works, p. 514; Ant. Pereira, Compendio da Vida de J. Gerson: Lisbon, 1769, 2 vols. 12mo.; Lécuy, Essai sur la vie de Gerson: Paris, 1835, 2 vols. 8vo.; Prosper Faugère, Eloge de Gerson: Paris, 1838, 8vo.; C. Schmidt, Essai sur Gerson: Strasburg, 1839, 8vo.; Thomassy, Jean Gerson: Paris, 1843, 12mo.—On his mysticism: Engelhardt, de Gersonio mystico, 2 Pt.: Erlangen, 1823, 4to.; Hundeshausen, in der Zeits. für hist. Theol., 1834, p. 79; Liebnér, in den Studien u. Krit., 1835, p. 277; Jourdain, Doctrina Gersonii de theol. myst.: Paris, 1838, 8vo. C. SCHMIDT.—Ermentrout.

Geshuri, the name of three countries mentioned in the Old Test. 1) A province situated towards Egypt (Josh. 13 : 2), connected with Philistia; in 1 Sam. 27 : 8, with Amalekites. 2) A province in the country east of the Jordan (see Deut. 3 : 14; Josh. 13 : 11), in the time of the Romans called Isurea, in our day Dschedur in northern Persia and, according to Burckhard, a part of that table-land which spreads from the base of the most southern part of the Dchebel el Scheikh and includes Gaulanitis and Auranitis. 3) A province in Syria, whose king gave a daughter in marriage to David (2 Sam. 3 : 3 ; 13 : 37 ; 15 : 8). PRESSEL. — Ermentrout.

Gethsemane (the best MSS. read Γεθσημανε'), near the Mount of Olives (Matt. 26 : 30 ; Luke 22 : 39), where our Lord prayed and was taken captive (Matt. 26 : 36 ; Mark 14 : 32). The name, most probably, means oil-press, גֶּתְשֶׁמַנִּי (the Chaldaic from נִמְשָׁן, usually given on account of the ending נ, being incorrect, as the former word is not Aramaic). For other derivations, see Reland, p. 857. A tradition which reaches back to the time of Helena (mentioned by Robinson, I., 234) locates it on the west side of Olives, where, near the first bridge crossing the Cedron on the way from Stephen's-gate to the mountain, is an almost square piece of land enclosed by a common, low stone wall, within which stand eight very old olive-trees. In the south-eastern corner of the garden is still shown the stone at which Judas kissed our Saviour (see Tischendorf, Reise, II., p. 76). It is certain that in this neighborhood our Lord underwent his passion.

ARNOLD. — Ermentrout.

Gezer, a Canaanitish royal city (Josh. 10 : 33 ; 12 : 12), between Bethoron and the Mediterranean (16 : 3), on the south-western border of the tribe of Ephraim (1 Chron. 7 : 28), where the Canaanites maintained for a long time an independent kingdom between Israel and the Philistines (Josh. 16 : 10 ; Judges 1 : 29 ; Studer, p. 50 ; 1 Kings 9 : 16 ; 2 Sam. 5 : 25 ; comp. Ewald, Gesch. Isr., II., 1, pp. 322, 561). Solomon, on obtaining possession of it through his Egyptian wife, whose father had burned it, rebuilt it, and, as its situation made it a principal fortress of the land (Jos. Ant., 8, 6, 1 ; 1 Kings 9 : 15-17), fortified it. Named by Jos. Ant., 5, 1, 22, in the Aramaic form, Γάζα, 8, 6, 1 ; 7, 4, 1 ; 7, 12, 2, Γάζα. According to Ensebius it lay about four Roman miles from Nikopolis, — Emmaus — modern Amwās (see Article Emmaus ; Robinson, II., 30, 232, and on Gezer, Reland, Pal., p. 492, 809), about six miles northwest from Gibeon. — It must not be confounded with Yazûr (Robinson, II., 34) situated three miles east of Joppa, which is called Γάζα in Macc. (1 Macc. 4 : 17 ; 7 : 45) ; mentioned (1 Macc. 14 : 34 ; 15 : 28, 35) with Joppa, and located by Strabo, 16, p. 759, near the Mediterranean, between Joppa and Jamnia. Bakchides fortified it (1 Macc. 9 : 52), John Hyrcanus resided there (13 : 53). Simon, after having conquered it and cleansed from heathenism (14 : 7 ; 15 : 28 ; 16 : 1 ; 13 : 43 ; where, with Jos. Ant., 13, 6, 7, Γάζα is to be read in place of Γάζα ; see Ewald, Gesch. Isr., III., 2, p. 385 ; GRIMM, ad 1 Macc. p. 203, and ad 1 Macc. 4 : 15). Judas Macc. is said to have stormed it after a four days' siege (2 Macc. 10 : 32). — (See RELAND, Paläst., p. 778, 867 ; ROBINSON ; and RITTER, Erdk. XVI., p. 127, who, however, is wrong in identifying it with 'Aṣṣ). RÜETSCHI. — Ermentrout.

Gibeah.—1) A town in the tribe of Benjamin (Judges 19 : 14 ; Hosea 5 : 8), birth-place and residence of Saul (1 Sam. 10 : 26 ; 15 : 34 ; 23 : 19 ; 26 : 1) ; according to Jos. Ant., V., 2, 8, or B. J., VI., 2, 1, twenty or thirty stadia from Jerusalem, and burnt on occasion of being attacked by the other tribes (Judges 20 : 40). The hill near Gibeah a holy place, because of an altar (1 Sam. 10 : 5 ; comp. 2 Sam. 21 : 6). 2) A town in the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15 : 57).

HERZOG. — Ermentrout.

Gibeon, one of the most important places inhabited by the Hivites (Josh. 9 : 7 ; 10 : 2 ; 11 : 19 ; see Lengerke, Canaan, I., p. 193), and head of a confederacy composed of four cities (Gibeon, Chephirah, Beeroth, and Kirjathjearim). For having obtained through craft a league with Israel (Josh. 9 : 1 ; c. 10 and 11), its inhabitants were condemned to be hewers of wood and drawers of water. As they may have been mingled with others belonging to the temple, no further mention is made of them (1 Chron. 9 : 2 ; Ezra 2 : 70 ; 8 : 17, 20 ; Neh. 7 : 73, 60 ; comp. 1 Kings 9 : 20 ; Movers, Phönikier, II., 1, p. 517). Five Amorite kings having undertaken to chastise them for their defection from the common cause, they met with a defeat at the hands of Joshua (Josh. c. 10). Later, out of zeal for national purity Saul enacted a massacre among them (Deut. 7 : 2, 24 ; Numb. 35 : 31), in atonement for which David had to hand over seven sons and uncles of Saul for crucifixion (2 Sam. 21 : 1). Near a ditch (Jer. 41 : 12) in the neighborhood of Gibeon took place a battle between David and Ishbosheth that resulted in the route of the latter (2 Sam. 2 : 12). For some time Gibeon, situate in the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8 : 29 ; Josh. 21 : 17), was the principal seat of worship where, even in David's time (1 Chron. 16 : 39 ; 21 : 29), were found the holy tabernacle and the altar of burnt-offering, and where the ark of the covenant had been transferred (Thenius on 1 Kings 1 : 33 ; Bertheau on 1 Chron. 5 : 30 ; 16 : 39).—According to Robinson, I., 454-7, it is identical with the modern village el Djib, about eight miles northwest from Jerusalem. There, too, is the ditch above-mentioned, 120 feet long and 100 broad. (See BOHÄDDIN, Vita Salad., p. 243.) Though the ancient accounts do not exactly harmonize, yet there is little doubt of this being the Gibeon of the Old Test. — (See RELAND, Pal., pp. 345, 491, 502, 446, 618, 811 ; RITTER's Erdk., XVI., p. 104 ; XV., 1, p. 112 ; EWALD, Gesch. Isr. I., 281 ; II., p. 251 ; v. LENGERKE, Ken. I., p. 642).

RÜETSCHI. — Ermentrout.

Gideon, son of Joash of Ophrah, of the tribe of Manasseh (Judges 6 : 11, 24 ; comp. 34), was one of the most distinguished judges Israel possessed. The great lesson taught by his history is that God makes use of the humblest instruments for the welfare of his people to the end that the glory and grace of the work may be ascribed to him alone. A miraculous sign overcame the modesty of Gideon, who was chosen to be the deliverer of Israel (Judges 6 : 25 ; comp. Lev. 9 : 24). In remembrance of this event, he built an altar, and, in obedience to the divine command, overthrew that of Baal. For the name Jerubbaal, as connected with that of G. (see Judges 6:32: 1 Sam. 12:11). On Rochar's (Opp. tom. 1, p. 774) combination of this word with ἱερόμπαλος (EUSEB., præp. evang., I., 9) see HENGSTENBERG, Beitr., II., p. 213; MOYER'S Phönicien, I., p. 128. — In opposition to the Midianites who again encamped in the plain Jesreel, in number, according to Judges 8:10, 135,000 men there gathered around Gideon his own family, his whole tribe Manasseh, and Asser, Sebulon, and Naphtali. For the meaning of the miracle which assured Gideon, see EWALD, Gesch. Isr., II., p. 387, first edition. In order to show forth the power of God but 300 men were selected for the fight, who, breaking in upon the camp of the Midianites with trumpets and lights in pitchers (7:16), inflicted upon them a defeat (comp. 2 Chron. 20:23; Hagg. 2:22). (A monograph on Judges 7:16–20, — exercitatio philol. theol. de artibus, quibus Gideon in debellandis hostibus est usus, by J. G. Michaelis, in Symb. litt. Brem., III., p. 249.) Two of the Midianite kings were slain, and the rest taken captive. — Touching the subsequent forty years of Gideon's judgeship, we have only a brief account. The royal dignity offered him by the people he declined, but established in Ophra a particular cultus which became a snare to his family and people. By the ephod, which Gideon made, is meant a sacerdotal gown (HENGSTENBERG, Beitr., III., p. 97, and BERTHEAU, p. 133), adorned with much gold (Exod. 28:6; 39:2). Whether worn by Gideon, or merely exhibited for veneration, not known, probably the former. His sin consisted in having thus paved the way for an apostasy from the lawful sanctuary and worship, and for the breaking up of the theocratic unity which, after his death, facilitated a return to the idolatry of Baal (8:33). It was revenged on his own house by the strangulation of his sons by their step-brother, Abimelech (Judges c. 9; comp. BERTHEAU, p. 106 and 136; see also Art. Abimelech).

OEHLEK. — Ermentrout.

Gieseler, John Charles Ludwig, one of the fathers of modern Protestant Church history, and of our Theol. Encyclop., was born, March 3, 1793, at Petershagen, near Minden; in 10th year of his age enjoyed the tuition of Chancellor Niemeyer (see Art.), in the orphan-asylum of Halle. The war, in which he enlisted, Oct. 1813, having been concluded by the peace of 1815, he resumed the office of teacher at Halle; in 1817 was honored as Doctor of Phil. and Co-rector of the Gymnasium at Minden; in 1818, Director of Gymnasium at Cleve, and, after having been made, in April of the year following, Theol. Doct., Professor Ordinarius in the newly-established University of Bonn; from whence, after a service of 12 years, he removed to Göttingen, where he died, July 8, 1854. From his father—a man endowed with a mind of singular peculiarity—he acquired the habit of independent research and self-reliance. No mere book-worm, he applied himself with commendable diligence to the practical interests of life. As proof of this, it is only necessary to state that, together with Lücke, he superintended the theological Ephorate, and was a member of the Acad. of Sciences, and Curator of the orphan-house at Göttingen, where he established an asylum for released criminals.—His lectures and works on Church history have secured him a lasting fame. His first labors were expended on the Apostolic period: A historico-critical treatise on the rise and earliest fortunes of the written Gospels, in which he utterly annihilated the theory of a Proto-Gospel, and several essays in second volume of Rosenmüller's Repertorium. The age immediately succeeding the Apostles next claimed his attention: On the Nazarenes and Ebionites in Stäudlin and Tschirner's Archive, Vol. 4, Pt. 2, and a Review of Neander's genetic development of Gnosticism, in the Literaturzeitung of Halle, 1823. Passionately fond of the Greek Church, he published a valuable programme of the doctrines of the Alexandrian teachers, Clemens and Origen, concerning the body of the Lord and Monophysitism. His treatises on the Paulicians, and the Manichæans by Petrus Siculus, and the 23 Titles of Panoplia by Euthymius Zygadenus, increased his merits. The last of his minor works in this department, is a review of Herzog's treatise on the Romanic Waldenses in the Anzeigen of Göttingen (April, 1854). His essays on the prophecy of Lehnin, and his Irenæus on the Cologne affair, his work (pub. 1840) on the disturbances in the Church of the Netherlands, and in 1848 the book by Mäder on Hist. of Prot. Church of France, from 1787–1846—these afford a fair exhibition of the impartiality and comprehensiveness of judgment which he passed upon the phenomena of his own age. In his General Church History, the reader will find displayed the same healthy historical taste, independent research, and ingenious power of combination, which characterizes the compositions above mentioned. The chief merit of this gigantic product of German industry, consists in the collection of sources and archives of literature it contains. Whilst we may regret the brevity of the text itself, to deny to it all value would be an error. Though not represented with the plastic talent of a Hase, it has nevertheless some striking characteristics. In affirming the superiority of its representation of the first age of Catholicism over that by Neander—who, strange to say, throws no light upon the origin of the Catholic Church—we do not intend to disparage the merit of this historian, whose greatness cannot be diminished by partial defects. More apt in grouping, Gieseler, obedient to the law of objectiveness in delineating history, allows his divisions to grow out of the particular character of the period treated of, whilst Neander subjects all ages alike to the same general rubrics (Spread, Government, Doctrine, &c.), without giving due preference to the main-spring, in each period, of the facts that distinguish it. G.'s manner of depicting the Middle Age is worthy of commendation. The poetical halo which had been thrown around some of its facts disappears, and the sad, naked truth, is seen. The history of the sects engaged his special attention, upon the obscure factions of which he has shed a clear light. Exceedingly rich is the description of the age preceding that of the Reformation, giving in minute detail an account of the growing corruption on the one hand, and on the other, of the growing opposi-

ion against Rome. Of more than ordinary excellency is the 2d Part of Vol. III., which develops the progress of doctrines in the Ref. period, down to the peace of Westphalia. The history of the Modern Period, from 1814 to the present, confirms the remark of the author himself, p. 1, that to write a correct and impartial account of a contemporaneous period, is an exceedingly difficult task. His theological bias sometimes exercised an unhappy influence on his judgment of historical facts. See on this whole work the Protest. Kirchenzeitung, 1854, No. 30. We append a synopsis of what has been published: Vol. I., Div. 1, to the year 324, 4 ed., 1844; Vol. I., Div. 2, 324-726, 4 ed., 1845; Vol. II., Div. 1, 726-1073, 4 ed., 1846; Vol. II., Div. 2, 1073-1305, 4 ed., 1848; Vol. II., Div. 3, 1305-1409, 2 ed., 1849; Vol. II., Div. 4, 1409-1517, 1835; Vol. III., 1517-1648, Div. 1, 1840; Div. 2, 1853; Vol. V., 1814 to the present time. Of his literary remains published by Redepenning, 1855, Vol. VI. of Dog. Hist., 1856. Vol. IV., containing Church History, 1648-1814, appeared in 1856. The whole has been pub. in Bonn. See particularly G.'s Life and Works, by Redepenning, in Vol. V. of Church History.

HERZOG.—Ermentrout.

Gihon, LXX Γέων, Vulg. Gehon, in Genesis 2: 13; on the contrary, LXX Γών and Γέων, Vulg. Gihon, in 1 Kings 1: 33, 38, 45; 2 Chron. 32: 30; 33: 14, both, however, from גִּיּוֹן.

to break forth (comp. Job 40: 23), hence denoting water that bursts forth from subterranean passages, or from defiles, and so prefixed to several Asiatic streams, as Dschichun el Ras, Aroxes; Dsch. Kank, Ganges; Dsch. Atel, Volga, and Dschichun without any addition for two streams: the Oxus and the valley-fountain on the west side of Jerusalem. In the above quoted passages of Scripture, Gihon is used to denote the second river of Paradise, and this valley-fountain, of which we shall now treat.

1) According to 1 Kings and 2 Chron., Solomon was anointed king at Gihon; here, too, Hezekiah constructed a strong aqueduct, and Manasseh buildings for a strong wall around Jerusalem. The valley was situate in the western part of the city. In the Old Test., it is designated Hinnom (see Gehenna), the name of its lower half. Only in our day is Gihon used to mark the ridge of the hill that slightly overtops the city, and separates the valley from Jerusalem. Beginning with a depression in the middle part of this hill, the valley runs east by southeast towards the gate of Jaffa, declines thence southward and towards the southwestern side of Sion (Valley of Hinnom), and then eastward, until it unites itself with Cedron. Between the first depression of the valley and its decline near the Jaffa gate, lies the so-called Upper Pool, now Birket el Mamilla; from west to southeast it is 316 feet long, 200 broad, 18-20 deep; its walls of small mortared stones (comp. Robinson, I., 239-345; Tobler, im Ausl., 1849, nr. 20, p. 78). Troilo (p. 354) tells us of a well before the city, the broken pipes of which may still be seen, that in all probability conducted the water into the Upper Pool. Tobler also discovered an aqueduct of the canal which carried the water from the upper pool into the city, first by the Jaffa gate, then southward into Jerusalem. This does not justify the opinion of Quaresmius (II., 717), that the pond situate within the Jaffa gate, formerly called Piscina sancti sepulcri, now Birket Hammam el Batrak, is the one made by Hezekiah to deprive Sennacherib of water. Though Ritter ignores every connection between the Upper and Lower Pools and the old and new Gihon-pool of Hezekiah, we believe it not an impossibility to discover a point of union with the so-called Lower Gihon-pool of our day, situated below the Jaffa gate (comp. Robinson, Krafft, Topogr., p. 185), and called by the natives Birket es Sultan. The lower pool is larger than the upper, its walls being for the most part the rocks of the valley, the upper one of which is crossed by an arched stone bridge, the lower, by the street from Bethlehem (comp. Wilson, Lands of the Bible; Tobler, im Ausl., 1848, nr. 19, p. 73). If we dare assume that the city wall, which Manasseh built, was the completion of the one begun by his father for a defence against Sennacherib, traces of which are still found at the farthest northwest end, where a wall terminates the ditches between them and the inner wall (Ritter, p. 376), and where may also be seen remains of an aqueduct leading from the north southward into the city, this lower pool must have been within the city. If we connect it with this aqueduct, then this last must have been conducted between "those two walls" for the benefit of the western half of the city, the eastern drawing its supplies from the wells of Tyropæon. The Gihon of Kings 1, this being, on our supposition, the lower pool, was situated within the bounds of Zion; while the great aqueduct bridge of Solomon, which crossed it, was no doubt included by Hezekiah in the city wall.

2) Concerning the Gihon of Paradise the principal views are a) that it is the Nile; so Josephus (Ant. 1, 1, 3), some Church Fathers,¹ and Mohammedans (Fundgruben des Orients, I., 304). Besides, the Septuagint has Γέων for the Hebrew name of the Nile (Jer. 2: 18), and places Γέων in parallelism with the Nile (Sir. 24: 27). In modern times, Schulthess (Parad. 70) and Gesenius (Thesaur., 1, 282), favor the same view. b) According to the usus loquendi of the East, Gihon or Dschichum is the Grecian and Roman Oxus.² So, J. D. Michaelis, Lassen (Jüdische Alterthumskunde, I., 528). Knobel (Genes., p. 27, and Völkert., p. 248, 270); also Hammer (Wiener Jahrb. d. Lit., 1820, IX., 21), who finds Paradise on the Bactrian table-land, the Pischon in the Sihon or Jaxartes, and expresses the felicitous thought that Gihon might be identified with Hinducush, Hartmann (Aufkl. über Asien, I., 249) who locates Paradise in the valley of Cashmire; Rosenmüller (Alterth., I., 1, 184), and the master of geography Ritter (Th. II., der 1. Ausg., vorzügl. p. 542). *V. Rau-*mer, also, incidentally mentions the Oxus as Gihon (im Anhang zu Palästina). d) According to Ewald (Israel. Gesch., I., 331, 1. Ausg.) and Buttmann (Aelt. Erdkunde des Morgenlands: Berlin, 1803, also in his Mythologus, I., 63), Gihon was the modern Ganges. e) By Gihon is to be understood that side-stream of the Kur, called by Xenophon (Anab. IV., c. 6, p. 233), and many ancients, Phasis, by Herodotus and Strabo, Araxes (see Ritter, II., 1. Ausg., p. 807), but in our day Aras. This view is espoused by *Re-*land (Diss. misc., I., 1, also in Ugolini thes. VII.) and by Calmet. e) Link (Urwelt, I., 307, 1. Aufl.) supposes Cush to be the land around Caucasus, and that the Kur is Gihon, and the table-land of Armenia and Georgia, Paradise. f) Verbrugge, who also seeks for Paradise in Armenia, but for Gihon in Gyndes (Herod. 1, 189) which, as he supposes, formed the boundary between Armenia and Matiana. g) Clericus (ad Gen. 2), understood by Cush Cassiotis in Syria (Mons Casius near Seleucia, Strab., 16, 750), and by Gihon the Orontes, Eden being in Syria (see Art. Eden). Thus, G. Kohlreif (Üb. Damascus: Lüb., 1737) and Lukenmacher who supposed the Pischon to be Jordan (Observ. philol., V., 195). h) Calvin (Comm. in Gen.), Huetius (de situ Parad. terr. in Ugolini thes. VII.), Bochart (Opp., II., 29), Steph. Morinus, J. Vorst (Ug. th. VII.), supposed the division of one river into four to be the flowing of two northward and two southward, Pischon and Gihon being the two main mouths of the Schat el Arab; the former, the western, the latter, the eastern; Kusch being the modern Persian Chusistan, Chavila, in adjacent Arabia, and Eden in the neighborhood of Kornn (31° 0', 28'' N. Lat. 47° 29', 18'' 6, L. from Greenwich). This is a very unnatural interpretation of Scripture. So, too, i) that of Hopkinson (descr. Parad.: Leyden, 1593) who, instead of two mouths calls in to his aid the two canals of the Euphrates; the eastern — Nahar Malca — being the Pischon, the western — Nahar Maarsares — the Gihon; Kusch being located in Arabia, and Susianna made to be Chavila. j) Harduin (de situ Par. terr. exc., on Pliny II. Nat., lib. 6, Tom. I., p. 359) found Paradise in Galilee, the main river in the Jordan, the Gihon in the flumen salsum, the Pischon in flumen Achena (Achanum Plin., 6. 32) in Arabia. k) Sickler (in Augusti, theol. Monatschrift, I., p. 1, 75) regards the Caspian sea as an immense stream from the East, supposes the Pischon as having surrounded the entire of the then known earth from the East to the Nile, the Gihon to be the Phasis, Black, Mediterranean and Atlantic seas, surrounding the earth from the West to the Nile, and the Euphrates and Tigris to be put with these ocean streams! We conclude l) with the words of Herder (Ideen zur Philos. der Menschheit, II., B., p. 333): "As an impartial glance at the map of the world teaches us that nowhere on earth could the Euphrates with three other streams issue from one source, it is utterly useless to put to the rack the names of the streams. This tradition, however, has basis in physics, as, without mountains our earth would have no water, and, as the map shows, all the streams of Asia flow from these. The account, which we are explaining, rejecting everything fabulous, makes mention of four of the most widely known streams which run down from the mountains of Asia. They do not, indeed, issue from one source, and the modern compiler of these traditions must be satisfied with using them to designate the original abode of man in some part of the Orient."

¹ Most original the view of Ephrem, the Syrian, who thus solves the difficulty of a common origin of the four נָחַר from one נָחַר: "Paradies procul in editissimo loco situs est. Inde ergo delapsi circa ipsum paradisum cuniculis recepti se conduunt continuoque cursu velut e sublimi scatebra mare emeuntes perque ejus fundum transvecti distinctis fontibus tandem prociunt Chyson primus ad occasum (Danube, in his opinion), alter Geon ad austrum (Nile) et boream versus Euphrates et Tigris."

² In the middle ages by Oxus was understood Pischon: 1307, Haithon in Hist. Or., c. 7, p. 11.

PRESSEL. — Ermentrout.

Gilbert, de la Porrée (Porreianus), born at Poitiers, a student of Bernhard, of Chartres, in philosophy, teacher of theol. and philosophy at Chartres, Paris, and Poitiers, where he became Bishop, 1142; though practising an ascetic life he was mild and courteous towards others. The obscurity of his explanations of Plato, Aristotle, and Boethius induced Prior Walther of St. Victor to class him among the four labyrinths of France; Abelard, Peter of Poitiers, and Petrus Lombardus, being the other three. His commentary — the most important of his works in our possession — on Boethius de trinitate (edition of B.'s work, Basel, 1570), occasioned charges of heresy against him by two of his clergy, which were investigated before two Councils, one in Paris (1147), the other at Rheims, (1148). These were embodied in four propositions: — 1) The substance of God is not God, the divine nature or Godhead is other than God, being the form in God, through which God is, but which is not God; 2) When it is said of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, that they are one, it is only meant that they are one in virtue of the one Divinity, it being impossible to affirm that Father, Son and Holy Ghost are one God, one substance, or something that is one; 3) That what constitutes the three persons three, is three onenesses, three particular properties, not the persons themselves numerically distinct from each other and from the divine substance; 4) The Divine nature did not become flesh, nor did it assume human nature. Bernhard of Clairvaux, the head of the party that opposed Gilbert, thought it to be his duty to defend the Christian interests supposed to be endangered in this controversy. At Rheims, the vote was divided, some of the cardinals espousing the side of Gilbert. The four propositions which Bernhard vindicated against the errors of Gilbert, though approved by the Pope, were not confirmed by a special decree. Gilbert, though subscribing the papal judgment, returned to his See with his honors unturned, whilst Pope Eugenius merely pronounced the general decision, that in theology, nature, and person, God and Godhead were not to be sundered. His patience conquered his enemies, and he lived in peace till death overtook him, 1154. — (Comp. Neander, Ch. Hist.; Baur, Lehre v. d. Dreieinig., II., p. 509–519; Ritter, Gesch. d. Philos., VII., p. 437–74. DR. PRESSEL. — Ermentrout.

Gilboa, a mountain belonging to the original domain of Issachar, or rather the series of hills which cross from Zer'in, the southeastern part of the level Jisrael. They are neither interesting nor high; but little pasturage, no agricul-are, nor woods; in the time of Joshua a forest, in which the Canaanites maintained their position, the Israelites only succeeding in making them tributaries (comp. Judges 1: 27; Josh. 7: 11). Here Israel encamped (1 Sam. 28: 4). And, when beaten on the plain by the Philistines, retreated to it (31: 1); here Saul and his sons were slain (2 Sam. 1: 6, 21; 21: 12). Several villages may be found on this mountain and its heights: Fukû'a and Djelbôn. Its name, signifying etymologically "gushing well," seems to have been derived from a well at its northern base, the situation of which admirably qualified it for encampments of armies. — (See Ireland, Paläst., p. 344. Schubert, Reise. III., p. 164. Robinson, I., 316–17, 325. Wilson, Lands of the Bible, II., p. 85. Ritter, Erdk., IV., 1, p. 408, 416; XVI., p. 691.

RÜETSCH. — Ermentrout.

Gildas Cormac, born 516, was student of the British Abbot Illut and monk of Bangor. His principal work, Liber querulus de excidio Britanniae (560), to which must be added an epistle, 47, full of complaints over the moral and ecclesiastical corruption of his native country and his age: both to be found in GALE, script. hist. rit. (Oxoniae, 1691), and in BERTRAMI, brit. sentium script. (Havniæ, 1758). Galfried of Monmouth mentions a larger historical work, of which we know nothing. Lappenberg (Gesch. England, I., 135) thus characterizes him: Gildas must certainly be regarded as one of the most distinguished men of his age. Though his style be bombastic, and his representation of history indefinite and unmarked by dates, he is nevertheless a very learned authority for the facts of his time which, without the light shed upon them by him, would be still more obscure than they now are. We may safely regard him as the representative of the more earnest Britons of his day, and of their Christian-British-Roman culture. Gildas viewed the invasion of the Anglo-Saxons in the light of a Divine judgment, whom he called "nefandi nominis Saxonia, leo hominibusque invisus."

DR. PRESSEL. — Ermentrout.

Gilgal (Sept. גלגל = a circle). — 1) A place between the Jordan and Jericho, where the Israelites encamped (Josh. 4: 19), opposite Ab el Schittim (Jos. Ant., 5, 10), 50 stadia from Jordan, and 10 from Jericho. When it is said in Josh. 5: 9, that its name was derived from the reproach of the Egyptians having been rolled away, it is to be understood as a play on words. From thence were directed the campaigns against the Canaanites (Josh. 9: 6; 10: 6); here, too, was the tabernacle with the sacrificial services, after the conquest removed to Shiloh (Josh. 8: 1). It was regarded as a holy place in consequence of this first abode of the people and the keeping of the twelve stones of the Jordan. Here Samuel made offerings, &c. (1 Sam. 10: 8; 1: 14; 15: 21, 33; 1 Sam. 7: 16). If we suppose that the tabernacle abode at Gibeon during the latter days of David's reign (1 Chron. 17: 39; 2: 29), and the time of Solomon (2 Chron. 3: 3; 1 Kings 3: 4), it may be presumed that it was taken by Samuel to Gilgal, and by David first to the neighborhood of the capital, Gihon being only 50 stadia or 1½ geog. miles from Jerusalem. — Touching the question whether this Gilgal became in after times the chief seat of the idolatrous worship of the ten tribes, if we reflect on the ancient holiness of the place, we might be tempted, with Ewald (Isr. Gesch. II., 243, 254, 261), to answer affirmatively, or, with Winer, to incline towards that opinion. But we do not know whether Gilgal situated in the south of Benjamin's home, belonged to the ten tribes. There was, however, 2) another Gilgal in the tribe of Ephraim (2 Kings 2: 2), to which men journeyed from Bethel. Robinson discovered (II., 266) a village, Jijûleh, west from Bethel, and Schwarz (Paläst., p. 64) speaks of a village of this name, 10 miles northeast from Jaffa, evidently the same, and according to the site of 2 Kings 2: 1, 2. Now, it may have happened that after Jeroboam's time the holiness of southern Gilgal was transferred to the northern one. The passages (Hos. 4: 15; 9: 15; 12: 12; Amos 4: 4; 5: 5) refer to this upper Gilgal, unquestionably also designated in Deut. 11: 30, as situated near the mountains Gerizim and Ebal. There is a third Gilgal mentioned, a Canaanitish royal city (Josh. 12: 23), six miles north from Antipatris in Galgula, in Robinson II., Jijûleh. If it be presumed that there גלגל = גלגל we would then have the first mention of the Galilee of the Gentiles (Isaiah 8: 23), and the origin of this name. Light would also be thrown on 1 Mac. 9: 2, Michaelis having already decided in favor of the version of Josephus (Ant., 12, 11, 1), Γαλαλία. It is still possible, however, that this Canaanitish king had his abode in the Gilgal bordering on or belonging to Galilee.

VAHINGER. — Ermentrout.

Giraldus (Silvester) of Cambria, Archdeacon of Brechene, Bishop elect of Menevia, was born, 1146, near Pembroch in Cambria, of noble family, and finished his education at Paris. Appointed, 1175, by Archb. Richard of Canterbury, archiepisc. legate for Wales, soon after archd. of Brech., and, in the following year, B. of Menevia, but not acknowledged by Henry II. He returned to Paris to study civil and canon law, where, according to his "de rebus a se gestis," he was esteemed the first jurist in the city; in 1184, called by Henry to be one of his court-preachers, and, 1188, accompanied Archbishop Baldwin of Canterbury through Wales, many of whose inhabitants his eloquence persuaded to bear the cross. King Richard I. made him legate over Wales. He was again elected B. of Men., but not confirmed. The year of his death unknown. He was a prolific author; his writings, however, betray great vanity and much superstition. These are: 1) Topographia Hiberniae, and 2) Expugnatio Hiberniae; 3) Itinerarium Cambriae; 4) Descriptio Cambriae; 5) Descriptio Walliae; 6) De rebus a se gestis libri tres; 7) De vita Galfredi Eboracensis archiepiscopi Legenda Sti. Remigii, Legenda Sti. Aethelberti, orientalium Saxonum regis; 8) De jure et statu Menevensis ecclesiae; 9) Gemma ecclesiastica, in which are treated de Sacramentis magis necessarius, and de clericali honestate et continentia; 10) Speculum ecclesiae sive de monasticis ordinibus; 11) Symbolum Electorum, seu episto- lae variae a semet ipso collectae; 12) De principis instructione.—(Comp. WHARTON, Anglia Sacra, II., 374, 457; OUDINI, comment. de script. eccles., II., 1631-1645. DR. PRESSEL.—Ermentrout.)

Girdle, among the Hebrews. Of great value, as may be seen by reference to 2 Sam. 18 : 11; Prov. 31 : 24. Of various kinds: poor, pious people, and ascetic prophets, wore one of leather, about 6 inches in breadth (2 Kings 1 : 8; Matt. 3 : 4); the rich and the noble, one of linen (Jer. 13 : 1), only four fingers wide, ornamented with gold, precious stones, &c. (Dan. 10 : 5; comp. Xenoph., Anab., 1, 49. A principal article of female luxury (Jer. 2 : 32; Isa. 2 : 24; 49, 18; comp. Hartmann, die Hebräerin am Putztische, II., p. 299; Niebuhr, Reisebeschr., II., p. 184; Taf. 27, p. 326; Taf. 64), worn by them long and loose, that of the men being clasped round the loins (1 Kings 2 : 5; 18 : 46; Jer. 13 : 11), and of the priests (Exod. 28 : 39; Levit. 16 : 4) higher up, towards the breast (Jos., Ant., 3, 7, 2; comp. Apoc. 1 : 13; 15 : 6).—It served not only to bind together the under-dress, but to keep it from separating so as to impede walking (2 Sam. 6 : 14); and, the under-dress drawn under and over it, a sort of purse (πολυκος) was made for money (Matt. 10 : 9; ibique Lightfoot; Mark 6, 8; comp. Horat. Epp., II., 2, 40); also for carrying a sword (2 Sam. 20 : 8; 25 : 13; Judges 3 : 16), and writing materials (Ezek. 9 : 2). Easy to understand now why it should have been considered a token of friendship (1 Sam. 18 : 4), and sign of appointment to office (Isai. 22 : 21). With the girdles must not be confounded the clasps (ἡ κόρπη) which fastened the upper-dress to the breast or to the shoulder (see 1 Macc. 10 : 89; 11 : 58; 14 : 44); distributed as rewards of valor (cf. Liv., 39, 31; comp. Cavieuz, merkwürd. Nachr., III., p. 241; Shaw, Travels, p. 99; Jahn, biibl. Archäol., I., 2, p. 82; Winer, R. W. B.; Planck, in Pauly's Realencykl., VI., 2, p. 2881. RÜETSCHL.—Ermentrout.)

Girgasites (Sept. Γεργασαῖοι), a Canaanite tribe (Gen. 10 : 16; see also Gen. 15 : 21; Deut. 7 : 1; Josh. 3 : 10; Neh. 9 : 8); according to Josh. 24 : 11, they dwelt this side of Jordan. The use of the name in the time of Jesus (Matt. 8 : 28), even though, according to Luke 8 : 26; Mark 5 : 1, to be read Gadarenes, proves that they had their earlier abode around the Sea of Tiberias, which, in this event, must be sought for not on this, but the other side of Jordan. On a second consideration of the passage in Joshua, it might be inferred that a portion of these people were tolerated by Israel in the country on the other side of Jordan, whither they had taken refuge, settled here and gave this name to it. Ewald, Isr. Gesch., I., 278, places them this side of Jordan; but as, according to Euseb., Onom., Γεργασα was a locality on a mountain near the Sea of Galilee, he had in his mind the Canaanitan Chassor, capital of Girgasites. VAHINGER.—Ermentrout.)

Girzites.—Only mentioned along with the Geshurites and Amalekites, in 1 Sam. 27 : 8. As David never fought against the confederates of his people, we cannot think, with Winer, of the Levite town Geser, whence came descendants to settle here. We may suppose with Ewald, Isr. Geschichte, II., 561; III., 19, that, as the Seventy omit in their translation this name, Γεσπὶ rather seeming to them the corresponding term for גִּרְזִי, both refer to the small Canaanitish Gaser or Geschur, or that the Seventy did not translate it, because it was not known.

VAHINGER.—Ermentrout.)

Glareanus (Henry Loriti), humanist, poet, musician, and scholar, the friend of Erasmus and Zwingli, born June, 1488, in Mollis, in the Swiss canton Glarus; taught the rudiments by Michael Rubellus, who trained his Latin style and musical talent; continued his studies at Cologne, receiving the title Magist. Philos. 1510, he applied himself to theology; crowned with laurel by the hands of Maximilian I., to whom he had dedicated a poem, he now paid almost exclusive court to the Muse; entered into correspondence with Zwingli, and, after having espoused the cause of Reuchlin in the contest with the "Obscurantists," a change of views induced him to quit the high-school of Cologne, and to go to Basel (1514), where he became a friend to Erasmus, and where the young Swiss, charmed by his bold opposition to the pedantry of the schools, soon gathered round him.¹ He visited Italy in the spring of 1515, and in 1517, with recommendations from Erasmus, Paris. There, environed by young scholars, he devoted himself almost wholly to the classics (particularly Cæsar, de bello gallico, Livy and Homer), and attempted to restore the very forms of antiquity. He studied Greek with John Lascaris, and gave himself also to mathematics and music. His ambition was wounded by Erasmus, who took the glory of certain literary services which he claimed for himself. This cooled their friendship, and he transferred his affections to Myconius, with whom and Zwingli he carried on a lively correspondence.² At first inclined to the Reformation, he soon espoused the cause of its opponents. In 1522, married the daughter of Herrmann Offenburger, a citizen of Basel, renewed his friendship with Erasmus, with whose position touching the Reformation he sympathized, though at first he favored Zwingli, and expected great good from the conference at Zurich, 1523. His antagonism to the Ref. became very decided, and the persecution of the English Protestants by Mary he welcomed as a cheering omen. He died March 28, 1563, aged 75 years.—(Comp. Monog., by Dr. Henry Schreiber: Freiburg, 1837, 4to.; on p. viii. the sources of his biography, and p. 118 a complete catalogue of his works.)

HAGENBACH.—Ermentrout.)

Glassius, Salomo, one of those theologians who mediated the transition to the Spenerian system, was born in Sondershausen, 1593; in his early days enjoyed the tuition of the distinguished teacher Andreas Wilke, and, after having spent 3 years at Jena in the study of philosophy, went to Wittenberg, where he became a student of Hutter, Baldwin, Franz, and Meisner; from thence back to Jena, where he studied

¹ Glareanus, on being refused a seat with the professors at the academic celebrations, rode into the hall seated on an ass.

² Comp. the very interesting letters of G. to Zwingli from Paris (Opp. VII., ed. Schulth.).

ive years under the celebrated Gerhard. In 1619, he was nominated Adjunct Prof. of Phil.; and the chair of Hebrew being vacant, was elevated to it. On becoming Superintendent in Sonnershausen, 1625, the Doctorate, which his great modesty had previously declined, was conferred on him; and after the death of Gerhard, who recommended him as his successor, was elected to fill his place. His services in this capacity were of short duration. Duke Ernst needed a man to aid him in introducing and carrying out the ecclesiastical changes he designed to make, and G. removed from Jena, 1640, to be his counsellor. Glassius thus speaks of this prince, the most distinguished of all the Lutheran rulers of his day: "How he thanked God for having thought him worthy of serving his Church under Ernst, who not only himself worshipped God in holy sincerity, but, like another Josiah and Josaphat, sought to establish Divine service, to perpetuate the truth of Heaven, and to bring salvation to his subjects." Under his direction were made a visitation of the University of Jena, and three general visitations of the whole country. He zealously undertook catechetical and academic instructions, and personally taught religion to the higher classes of the Gotha'schen Gymnasium. To him was confided the directorship of the Weimar Bible work, in which are explained by him the poetical books of the Old Testament. Died 1653, aged 63.

His philologia sacra, 1625, constitutes the chief claim G. has upon the veneration of posterity. The first and second books treat of philolog. in specie, de integritate et de stylo S. Scr.; the third and fourth, of grammatica; the fifth, of rhetorica sacra, to which was added, 1705, from MSS. by Olearius of Arnstadt, a logica sacra. Nullum usquam scrupulum, says Mich. Walther, cum aliqua difficultate conjunctum et scripturis utriusque instrumenti moveri et ostendi posse autumo, cui averruncando et e medio auferendo non præclare satis fuerit factum. Even to modern times it has preserved its standard character. In 1776, Dathe published the grammatica and rhetorica in an editio his temporibus accommodata; to which Lorenz Bauer added a critica N. T., 1795, and a hermeneutica sacra, 1797. The work certainly evidences a thorough acquaintance with Hebrew, Rabbinical, and scriptural literature, and contains a valuable collection of examples, and many delicate observations on language; but its critico-biblical views belong to the illiberal stand-point of his age; the rhetorical are for the most part formalistic; the explanations of language are based not so much on the genius of language, as on mechanically logical and often arbitrary theories.—(Sources: M. WALTHER, a Trenologia de artu, vita, studiis scriptis, obitu Glassii, in Wittem's memoria theologorum decas, IX. A biog. in the "Unschuldigen Nachrichten, 1720.") Glosses (biblical), the word derived from the Greek, in which, γλῶσσα means not only tongue and language, but particular words and modes of speech which needed to be explained, as obsolete expressions, provincialisms, foreign words. For γλῶσσαι were also used γλωσσήματα, λίξεις, γλωσσηματισαί, interpreted by Quintilian (I., 8, p. 63) by voces minus usitatae. For particulars, see Bleek's Abh. on γλ. λαλῶν, Studien u. Kr., 1829, p. 32.—As, in the ancient Greek sense, each word was a gloss, the study of this subject first assumed the form of lexicography. It must be observed that the ancients did not arrange their matter alphabetically, but confined themselves to categories of glosses; whilst the mediæval authors of dictionaries gathered it not so much from language in abstracto, as from desultory reading, so that their lexicons were collections of interpretations of a greater or lesser number of valuable works, combined with historical, geographical, and such like notices, and without any mention of the derivation and forms of words. To the labor of gathering the glosses and scholia on the Greek Bible, by the Glossographers of the Middle Ages, the Dutch philol. of 18th cent., J. Alberti, L. Casp. Valckenner, &c.; the German, J. Ch. Gli. Ernesti, who published an ed. of "Glossis sacris" from Hesychius, Suidas, Phavorinus: Lps., 1785, 2 Pt.; J. F. Schleusner, in 4 programmas, 1809; F. W. Sturz, from Zonaras, 1818, devoted themselves. For partic., see Fabricii, bibl. græca, IV., 540, in Rosenmüller's hist. interpr., IV., 356, and Reuss, Gesch. d. N. T., § 530. These Glossæ Sacræ are valuable, because they chiefly contain excerpts from the more ancient theological writers, some of whose compositions have been lost.—While the Greeks meant by γλῶσσα the word to be explained, the Latins meant the exegesis given. In this latter sense, the Christian Middle Ages and modern criticism recognise glosses of various kinds. Only Biblical Glosses are to be considered in this article.—As the Bible was most frequently read by persons who either needed instruction, or thought themselves qualified to give it, the ancient practice of writing notes on the margin of books was very often exercised upon it. Margin-glosses of a very early date are to be found in Bible MSS; in ancient times, they were very short, often but a single word; very seldom an entire sentence. That such Gl. were appended to the Hebrew text of the Old Test., is an undoubted fact. Thus, kri is, in many instances, a gloss for ketib. So frequent were they in the LXX, that the ancients thought of revising it, e.g. Origen, Lucian, Hesychius (see Art. Bible-text). As later transcribers joined together the margin-gl. and the text-gl., they seemed to be, in some cases, a double translation. Jerome (Ep. ad Suniam Opp., III., 58 Francf.) complained of this mistake: Si quid pro studio ex latere additum est non debet poni in corpore. So, too, with the Greek N. T.; so that one chief duty of criticism has been to separate the real text from additions by the copyist, who either incorporated with it the marginal interpretations, or superseded the genuine reading by putting in its place an exegetical version. There are more of the former than the latter, as may be seen by a reference to Griesbach and Tischendorf. For examples in unpublished text-documents, see editions of New Test. with complete critical apparatus; in pub., Reuss, N. T., 3 ed., § 399; Theoretic Monograph, § 359.—As it was supposed that the text contained a meaning underneath that upon its surface, the necessity for explanations seemed to be more indispensable. But the means for writing becoming more expensive, the liberty of independent investigation more contracted, and the veneration for more ancient exegetists more unlimited, it became customary in the middle ages to write manuscripts laden with explanatory remarks on the margin; and these, though very far beyond mere expositions of words, were called glosses, and a collection of them, a gloss. Not commentaries, in our sense; scholia rather, in character mystical, historical, scholastic. The most celebrated collection of these Glossæ Marginales, in the 9th cent., by Walafriid (Strabus), Abbot of Reichenau; the vade mecum of succeeding generations. Of the Glossæ interlineares—having to do merely with single words—there were two kinds: the theologico-mystical, which arranged the best devotional exegeses of the times in alphabetic order, e. g. the gloss of Anselm of Laon, beginning of the 12th century, and the purely philosophical, which, as the Latin language began to be less studied, had to do with unknown words. These last-mentioned glosses are only important as they serve to indicate the science of the age; though, in modern times, the attention of German theology has been arrested by the fact that, in the Carolingian period, glosses in German were appended to the Latin Bible. The libraries of St. Gall, Munich, Vienna, &c., possess not a few of such MSS. See Rud. v. Raumer's Werk, Einwirk. d. Christenth. auf d. althochdeut. Sprache, p. 81.

THEOLUCK.—Ermentrout.

From this time onward, glossa was the standing expression both for the exegesis of single texts, and a collection of such exeg. on a particular book, e. g. the Bible. Owing to this close connection between the gloss and the text, it often happened that a section of the latter was made to follow the former, without a note of distinction or transition. So, too, with translations into the vernacular, which were executed in this way, in France, to 1523. In modern times, also, mention is sometimes made of glossed Bibles, e. g. the old Weimar Bible, often published from 1641 onward. Still the name has been dropped, though the thing itself remained still a necessity.

ED. REUSS.—Ermentrout.

Glosses and Glossarists of Roman and Canonical Law. The law-school at Bologna, founded towards the close of the 11th, or about the 12th cent., by Irnerius, became the centre of the newly-awakened study of Roman jurisprudence. Its teachers were called Glossarists, because they added to the Corpus juris, glosses which consisted in part of brief explanations of single words or expressions, and, in part, of more minute expositions, written sometimes between the lines, sometimes on the margin. They composed besides, summæ, summaries of the contents of a book, casus, true or supposed law-cases for the elucidation of single passages in connection with quæstiones and distinctiones; also, brocarda, or brocardica (see Art.), etc. Comp. Savigny, Gesch. des Röm. R. im Mittelalter, Bd. 3, p. 537–574, 2 Ausg. They occasioned the establishment of a school of Canonists, Decretists.—Gratian, author of the Decretum, the first part of the Corpus juris canonici, delivered lectures on it in the cloister St. Felix, at Bologna. Several of his students, after the manner of the Glossarists, arranged this Decretum; the oldest of these, Paucopalea, Omni-bonus († 1185). Sicardus of Cremona, who composed his summa canonum, 1160, at Mayence (comp. Phillips, K.-Recht., vol. 4, p. 168, 169). Besides these, Ansaldo, Ursio, Anselmus, and Butirus. Of the 12th and 13th cent., to be mentioned Rufinus—author of a summa de Decretis—John Faventinus, John and Peter Hispanus, Hugo or Hugucio of Pisa, Johannes de Deo, Benincasa Senensis, Laurentius Hispanus, etc.—John Teutonicus composed, about 1212, from the glosses of his predecessors, a continuous commentary on the Decretum, which, improved, 1236, by Bartholomæus of Brescia, became the Glossa ordinaria used by the school.—Glosses and apparatus to the collect. of Decret. by Greg. IX., were written by Vincentius Hispanus (about 1240), Goffredus Tranensis († 1245), and Sinibaldus Fliscus, who became Pope Innocent IV., 1243–54. From these, Bernard de Botone, of Parma († 1266), composed an Apparatus, used as Glossa ordinaria. As Glossarists of Liber Sextus (see Canon Law). Johannes Monachus († 1313), Guido de Baysio, and Johannes Andreæ († 1348), deserve naming. That of the last mentioned, improved and enlarged, became the Glossa ordinaria in MSS. and printed. He also comp. the first Gl. to the Clementines (see Canon Law); used as Glossa ordinaria. Besides him, as Glossar. of this collect.: Tenzelinus de Cassanis, John de Lignano, Petrus de Ancharano, Franciscus Taberella († 1417), &c. The extraraganti were partly glossed by Johannes Monachus, partly by Guilelmus de monte Lauduno; those of Pope John XXII., by Tenzelinus de Cassanis.—Of importance for history of literature, even in our day, is the gloss. On history of Glossarists, comp. particularly Sarti, De claris archigymnasii Bonon. professoribus, T. I., Pt. I., II., Bonon., 1769, fol.

WASSERSCHLEBEN.—Ermentrout.

Gnosis, Gnosticism, Gnostics.—The great object of Christianity is the recovery of man from his fallen condition to a state of reconciliation with God. The Christian revelation took place accordingly, not as a form of knowledge, but as the fact of an actual redemption. By the reception of this fact into consciousness, the life of religion and morality assumed in its fundamental relations to God a new character, and out of such right posture of immediate feeling was gradually unfolded an intellectual apprehension of the constituents of the fact singly considered and their inward connection. Even the Apostles themselves advanced only by degrees in the deeper knowledge of Christ and his work, and much more still was this the case with the Christian congregations. For having been gathered mainly out of the more uncultivated orders of society, they had but small preparation or need comparatively for theoretical exposition, and it was slow work with them, therefore, to develop the germs of apostolic doctrine. All deeper insight into the truths of revelation was named, by a term borrowed from the usage of the time, Gnosis (γνῶσις), and its capacity for it was considered to be one of the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit (1 Cor. 13 : 2)

Afterwards, however, this term was employed also to designate a style of religious speculation, which it was intended at the same time to censure as false and wrong. The tendency embraced a number of parties and systems, which betrayed their heathenish spirit at once in the fact, that they placed the essence of Christianity on knowledge, and made no account of its general practical ground. With their large infusion of heathen ideas, indeed, they are to be regarded as mongrel or mixed systems, holding on the confines of Christianity and Paganism, just as the Ebionites characterize the same sort of border life on the side toward Judaism; while between these two extremes, the proper life of the Church is seen to pursue its onward course, bearing along with it the purer and better doctrine of the Apostles as something intrinsically different from both.

As the significance of Christianity came increasingly into view, it drew upon itself more and more the attention of philosophically educated men. From different heathen and Jewish regions they approached the new revelation, and propounded to it questions of religious speculation, partly such as had exercised their minds before, and partly new ones to which they were led by Christianity itself. They were touched by Christianity, attracted toward it, but not brought always under its full power. Such a posture was favored by the eclectic character which distinguished the prevailing knowledge of the time. These transitional thinkers did not construct their systems from the distinguishing principles of Christianity; their place was rather to combine Christian and foreign elements, in all manner of variations and proportions.

If we look then to the different constituents that were thus joined with Christian ideas, we find among the philosophical systems of Greece the influence of Platonism especially prominent—sometimes in its older character, and then again more in those later eclectic, mystical, pantheistic forms which belong to new Platonism. The conception of a God whom only a small elect number are able to know—of a God, hidden in himself, who proceeds from abstract undistinguishable unity into revelation by the intervention of the Nus; the conception of Hyle, and its variously sketched dualistic relations to God; the imagination of an ideal world in the higher sphere, which mirrors itself in the phenomenal world; that of the fall of rational beings from the divine sphere into the sphere of matter and sense; the derivation of sin from the material element; such are the leading views which passed from Platonism over into Gnosticism. It borrowed something besides from the physics and ethics of Stoicism, and from the doctrine of numbers in the Pythagorean system raised again to new life, but to such less extent; single ideas also, as of a God, who, himself unmoved, moves all, may have been derived from the Peripatetic school. But it was not only the Grecian systems of philosophy that contributed to the formation of this Gnosis; it owed much likewise to the Oriental systems, which in this period of religious interest were quickened into new action, and by the grandeur of their forms, by the reach of their aspirations, and by their dualism especially, carried with them a strong attraction for inquiring minds. We may see this influence in the mystical and fanciful character of the Gnostic speculation, to which for this reason the name theosophy has been applied. For the representations of the Gnosis move less in conceptional and dialectic forms, after the Greek order, than in the poetical description of persons and actions. It is a philosophizing mythology—a collection of poems, which embrace the history of God and creation, set forth in the full luxuriance of Oriental fancy. To the East belongs also especially the view, that the rational world proceeds by emanation from the divine source, as we find it adopted in most of the Gnostic systems. Parsism developed in distinct form the idea that the essence of God is light, and offered thus to Gnosticism that apprehension of the divine substance, which by its position between the material and the spiritual it was specially fitted to receive. The dualism of God and the world was rendered still more sharp here, by the conception of an aggressive force in matter threatening the divine light. In its most decided form, this opposition between the principle of good and the power of darkness, both left to themselves, might be considered the strongest expression of a consciousness, which felt itself in irreconcilable variance with God. Along with these theoretic influences was mingled the power of a positively monistic theosophy, Buddhism, which had made its way unquestionably, even in the time of Christ, as far as Western Asia. The distinctionless unity of the divine essence from which it draws its scheme of development, is much of one sort with the unity which new Platonism places at the beginning; and it is often hard to say from which side a Gnostic system may have derived its full abstract conception of the nature of God. The earthly lower sphere has sprung, according to Buddhism, from the breaking of the original unity, and its being made to fall asunder thus into multiplicity of existence. As the unity in this view is the essential and divine, which stands behind appearances, the present world is turned by it into mere shadow and show, birth becomes sin, and life puts on the form of a penance, the perfection of which is the utmost possible abstraction from matter, by ascetic discipline and the sinking of the soul through contemplation into the unity of the absolute. We find much in Gnosticism which is of one sound with this, especially where it has to do with the ascetic interest. The working not only of Parsism, but of Buddhism also (as Dr. Baur has shown in his work on the subject), comes most clearly into view in the Manichaean system.

With philosophical ideas the Gnostic thinkers combined also elements taken from the popular mythology. They pursued, however, in the application of them, the usual manner of the Platonic and Stoic philosophers, who converted the mythological figures into symbols of their ideas. The Gnostics find in their own dreams the true sense of the heathen myths.

The speculative spirit of Gnosticism is foreign from Judaism in its original practical character, and there appears everywhere a certain opposition between them, more or less marked. But notwithstanding this, the Gnosis took in a large amount also of Jewish material; for which the way was opened by those forms of theological speculation which were employed among the Jews themselves, to clothe their doctrines with a philosophical sense. In Palestine, a very old mixture of Jewish and Oriental heathen elements prevailed in the form of Essenism. The first beginnings of the cabbala also reach perhaps back into the Gnostic period. The Christian Gnosis found its most distinct anticipation, however, in the Jewish religious philosophy of Alexandria, of which we have the fullest exposition in the writings of Philo. This combination of Old Testament truths with heathen philosophical ideas, passing over into the sphere of Christian development, might either root itself in the essential ground of Christianity — in which form it led to the religious philosophy of the Alexandrian Church Fathers; or else it yielded the preponderance to the influences of heathen speculation, and gave rise thus to particular phases of the heretical Gnosis. The most important affinities of Philo with Gnosticism are brought together by Neander, in the introduction to his Genetic Development of the principal Gnostic Systems, 1818. They are, in connection with the common idealism pervading both, the supposition of an abstract divine unity, the hidden being of God, and the revelation of God in distinction from this in the Logos, who brings into opposition the divine ideas; the doctrine of angels, formed after the Jewish and general Oriental pattern, and then made to flow together again with Plato's theory of ideas; the particular notion moreover, that the angelic revelations of the Old Testament took place in appearance only, and not in real bodily forms and actions, in which we have a trace of Docetism; the distinction made between such as cleave to outward form and letter, the νῶι τοῦ λόγου, and those who raise themselves to the spiritual standpoint where they see God himself, the νῶι τοῦ ὁυτος; finally, the allegorical method of interpreting the Scriptures, which employed itself in referring the literal text always to a higher speculative sense.

A comparison of the Philonian ideas with those that come up regularly in the Gnostic systems, shows clearly that certain modes of thinking which prevailed before Christianity were drawn into their service. The views ascribed to the followers of John the Baptist, as they were called, go also to confirm this. The heathen speculations furnished in like manner their methods and schemes. Especially thus in places where Christianity came into more active contact with the Jewish and heathen forms of thought, and where the existing culture was favorable to speculation, these older forces were sure to make themselves felt, bringing in Gnostic medleys in profusion. So in Syria, Alexandria, and Asia Minor. Rome, a new world in itself, had representations of all parties.

The first traces of the heretical Gnosis appear in the New Testament period itself. It is characteristic that we meet with a Simon Magus in Samaria, whom for this very reason we have the less cause to suspect of being a myth. On this soil, open to Jewish, Pagan, and Christian elements, Gnostic speculation first appeared in connection with Christianity. For what is related of Simon, that he pretended to be the manifestation of the highest power proceeding from God, refers with certainty to views of the Gnostic order. Irenæus (adv. hæc., I., 23), and more fully though confusedly Hippolytus (ἐκτελεστος, VI., 1), and others after them, mention a sect of Simonians, which in all probability stands historically connected with Simon, although the document ἀποκάλυψις is ascribed to it by them falsely. The next kindred movement meets us at Colosse, in the time of St. Paul. His opponents there appear to have sprung from an Essenian or Alexandrian degenerated Judaism, having adopted as their ascetic notions simply dualistic views, and holding that God reveals himself through a series of angelic natures. The idealism and angelology of Gnosticism, in its incipient stage, are referred to also in the Epistles to Timothy. The first Epistle of St. John rebukes the docetic tendency which denied the reality of Christ's appearance in the flesh. The Nicolaitans of the Apocalypse, and the false teachers mentioned in the Epistle of St. Jude, seem to have deduced an immoral antinomianism from Gnostic speculations; the last, by referring the Jewish law to a revelation of bad angels. At the close of the age Cerinthus became active within the circle of St. John's labors in Lesser Asia; a Jewish Christian, who unfolded somewhat further the Gnostic ideas, but always still in narrow compass, and probably with no small amount of inconsistency (in regard to him consult especially Hippolyt., 7, 33). On into the first part of the 2d century, a strong barrier to the spread of such Gnosis was created, partly by the influence of the Apostles, and partly by the predominant, even indeed one-sided, practical posture of the Church itself, whose whole force was directed toward the extension of Christianity in the form of actual life. Then came, however, the confessed need of theoretical knowledge, and along with this grew the number and influence of the Gnostics. A younger cotemporary of Cerinthus was Basilides (Hippol., 7, 20, sq.), who lived in Alexandria, and according to some sprang from Syria, and whose son Isidorus made a name for himself afterwards in his school. To the same period belong Carpocrates, from Egypt (Iren., I., 25; Clem. Alexand., Strom., IV., p. 428-430, ed. Cologne), and his son Epiphaneus; also the Syrian Saturninus (Iren., I., 24). Even among the Gnostics of this generation, with whom the productive period of the Gnosis begins, great discrepancies appear, which increase more still in the period following. In Valentinus (Iren., I.; Hippol., VI., 21, sq.), who betook himself from Egypt to Rome, the speculative culture and poetical power of the Gnosis attained their highest point. His school, falling into two branches, an Eastern (ἀνατολική) and an Italian, included many able men: Heracleon (comp. Origen's Commentary on the Gospel of St. John directed against him); Plotinus (against whom Irenæus in his polemical work, Vol. I., and Epiphanius, hæc. 33 contend); Marcus (Iren., I., 8, sq.; Hippol., 6, 39; Epiph., I., 34); Bardesanes, an Armenian, who lived for long time in Edessa (Hippol., 7, 31; Euseb., Cræp. evang., 6, 10). The hymns of Ephr. Syrus., Moses Choreneus, Hist. of Armenia, II., 6: Ven. 1843. Schaharistani, translated by Jarbrücker. A. Hahn, Bardesanes gnosticus (yr. princ. hymnology, 1819). Cotemporary with Valentinus, taught the Syrian Cerdon (Hippol., 7, 37), and his disciple Marcion, of Sinope, in Pontus, one of the most Christian-minded Gnostics, who with all his vagaries stood near to Protestantism (Tertul. adv. Marc. ren., I., 27; Hipp., 7, 29; Epiph., h., 42; Hahn's Gosp. of Marcion, 1823); whose disciples a part came still nearer the true Christian standpoint, as is shown by Apelles (Euseb., H. E., 5, 13; Hipp., 7, 38), and others later Pseudo-Origenes dial. de recta in Deum fide). To this time belongs also the restless Tatian, whose various religious changes landed him finally in Gnosticism (Daniel, Tatian der Apog., 1837). Some relationship to these severe ascetics, at single points, appears among the cotemporary Encratites. The many-branched sect of the Ophites is also to be placed in the second century, although nothing further is known of its author or origin. Hippolytus throws some light on its various shades. Here are to be reckoned the Ophites of Irenæus (I., 10, 2, 34) the Naassenes (Ophites) of Hippolytus, the Sethites, the Cainites, the Peratics, and a certain Justin with his followers (comp. Mosheim, Gench. d. Schlangenbrüder). To this century belongs also unquestionably the Arabian Gnostic, Monoïmos (Menahem), mentioned by Hippolytus. The Gnostic parties were affected in their inward development, of course, by their conflicts with the Catholic Church; it may have been owing to this opposition, that the dualistic principle seemed to gather strength generally with their progress. They wrought upon one another also among themselves. But such outward influences must not be put too high, over against the arbitrariness and conceit of their different schools. There was no such regularity here, by any means, as in the formation of the doctrinal system of the Church, or in the carrying out of systems even in the Grecian philosophy. We have, accordingly, but few sure traces of the relations of the Gnostics among themselves. The hard dualism of Marcion was resisted on the part of the Valentinians; Bardesanes contended with the Marcionite Prepon on the same subject, as also on the question of separation from the Church. The disciples of Valentinus himself had much controversy with one another on their different apprehensions of Christ's person. In the third century, Gnosticism relaxed its activity; the Church gradually triumphed over it, by means of its far more sound and satisfying views. The Manichæan system, toward the close of the third century, was the last great product of the Gnostic tendency. Its after-workings, however, more particularly in Marcionitism and Manichæan shape, continue through the following centuries deep into the middle ages, and form through the Paulicians a connection with the dualistic sects of the 12th and 13th centuries.

It is very difficult to arrange the Gnostic systems into classes. Their visionary, arbitrary character seems to defy any general principle of division. Gieseler's classification (Kirchengesch., I., p. 179, sq., 4th ed.) has found much favor. He divides them into Alexandrian, in which Platonism and the emanation doctrine prevail; and Syrian, bearing the stamp of Parsism and dualism. Dualism and emanation are indeed important features in the construction of the systems; but still they do not answer fully for a ground of division. Both belong especially to the Orient; so that the emanation scheme, in its wider form, does not belong with inward necessity by any means to the Platonizing systems, but is for them rather something accidental. We find with the Syrian Saturninus strong dualism and a long series of intermediate beings; so, too, with the later Basilidians, who had their origin from Alexandria; among the grossly dualistic Sethite all divine creation was conceived of under the form of a genetic emanation; Carpocrates joins with the probably Platonistic ground of his scheme, as it would appear, no emanation theory; and that Marcion does not suit his rule here, is allowed by Gieseler himself. There would remain thus as a mark of distinction only Platonism and Parsism, a difference which is not sufficient for the classification. Hase, in his Church History, divides the Gnostics into Oriental, Hellenistic, Christian, and Jewish. These very general titles, which leave out of view all peculiarity of structure, are the less reliable for the purposes of division, as it is often hard to say, from the mixture of elements, which form of them is to be considered predominant. The term "Christian" may be used rightly enough in the case, as aside from Christianity altogether there could be no room to speak of a Gnosis at all in the strict sense; but just for this reason it is not suited to designate a distinction within the Gnosis itself, over against Hellenic, Oriental, and Jewish systems. Even the qualification "mainly Christian" is not found to hold properly. The system of Valentinus contains as many Christian elements as that of Bardesanes; and yet they are sundered in spite of their many affinities, while Bardesanes is joined with Marcion, to whom he bears no resemblance whatever. The division of Neander works better, based on the relation which the systems make Christianity, the revelation of the supreme God, bear to nature and previous history. The characteristic form here is simply the figure of the demiurge, or maker of the world, as it returns upon us in all the Gnostic systems, who is at the same time the God of the Jews, determining their relation to the rest of mankind. He represents the constitution of nature and the sense of previous history, showing their relation to the supreme God. Where a system is concerned to maintain a correspondence between Christianity and what went before it, the dualism between God and nature falls with it also more into the background; in this case, the demiurge is indeed deficient in power and knowledge, but still not hostile to God, and being made acquainted with the divine purposes in the work of redemption, he serves them willingly. Where, on the other hand, stress is laid on the ungodly character of what went before Christianity, Judaism, being in nearest relation to it, is rejected as wholly or almost wholly opposed to God: and so the demiurge, here also, becomes a being at war with God, who is forced to serve him against his own will. Hence the dualism between God and the creation comes out also more sharply defined. As the relation of Judaism to Christianity forms the main distinction, the two classes are designated briefly as judaistic and anti-judaistic Gnostics. To the first class belong Cerinthus, Basilides, Valentinus and his school, Bardesanes. In the second class the relation to Christianity is made a subordinate ground of distinction, which in connection with the other division may be here allowed. For it is of weight certainly, whether Judaism be sundered from Christianity out of a one-sided regard to the Christian interest itself as such, or be pronounced ungodly through the force of heathen views hostile to the one, and subversive of the other. The anti-judaistic Gnostics fall thus into two classes. First, such as lean toward heathenism: the Ophites, Pseudo-Basilidians, Cainites, Sethites, Carpocratæ, the Nicolaitans, the Simonians, and some others of smaller influence. Secondly, such as allow to Christianity its proper independence: Saturninus, Tatian, the Encratites, Marcion. It might be better indeed, on the whole, according to what we have before said, if those systems in which all specifically Christian ideas lose themselves in pantheism, dualism, and their results, and where consequently we have only the matter of heathenism itself under abused Christian terms and forms, were distinguished from the Gnosis proper, and placed in a separate category, as Gnosticizing Paganism, on the outmost border of the Christian schemes. We should then have fully within the heathen sphere Plotinus, for example, an opponent of the Gnostics, and yet a continuation in fact of their false thinking. In the case of Manichæism, such exclusion is owned on all sides to be right. Why such bodies as the Carpocratians, Cainites, Pseudo-Basilidians, and Nicolaitans, should be considered more within the Christian sphere, either theoretically or practically, it is not easy certainly to see. Niedner's somewhat complicated method of division leads to nearly the same result with that of Neander. That of Baur, which has gained much credit, will be noticed farther on.

We give now a sketch of the principal thoughts that entered into these systems. The hidden first ground of all spiritual existence is the eternal divine Light-Essence, infinitely exalted above all that belongs to earth, incomprehensible and shut up in its own nature. In one view it stands unapproachably far off from the finite, in another it is the last ground of all laws in the finite world. Between these two conceptions, the representation varies. Basilides does not venture to affirm even existence of God, the Unutterable, but styles him the Non-existent; the Valentinians and Ophites allow their fancy more play, and make him the archetype of the human nature. He is called by them Bythos, as being the depth of all perfection. In this character they assign to him the predicates grace and love, under which he is apprehended also especially by Marcion, who names him on this account the Good. Over against the divine nature stands the un-divine but equally eternal hyle or matter. The dualism thus constituted runs through all gradations. Hellenistic and biblical influences, with Basilides and many of the Valentinians, reduced it to almost nothing. Here matter is the formless, with Basilides the confusion of a yet undeveloped state, with the Valentinians an undigested mass, which still cleaves to the spiritual world and is to be separated from it, or it may be the dark void simply that bounds the divine kingdom of light. With the Ophites and Marcion, the hyle becomes more substantial and active; while it comes nearest to Parsism, and reaches its most aggressive form, in Manes. Under all manifestations, however, and especially where the ethical interest comes in, it is looked upon as the kingdom of Satan and his demons.

In order now to explain the mixture of higher and lower life in the present world, as also to hold God pure from contact with matter, the Gnostics bring in commonly a series of intermediate beings, whom they are accustomed to denominate æons, eternities, that is, spirits of the eternal, super-terrestrial kingdom. Only Marcion, who acknowledges no divine factor in the life of the world before Christ, discards the idea of all such serial mediation; and contents himself with placing the Son in a subordinate connection with God, which he leaves without further explanation. The origin of the æons is referred in some systems to the process of physical necessity; so with the consistent pantheists; to which Manichæism adds the view, that the kingdom of light needed to have its defenders against the assaults of darkness; the highest conception is that of Valentinus, according to whom God created the spirits out of condescending love, limiting his own infinitude in order to confer on them an independent existence. Basilides derives the beginning of things, according to biblical precedent, from the creative word of God. Fastening on the conception of a spoken word, others also, especially Marcus, represent the series of æons as a succession of sounds, dying away in the distance with varied force and sense. Everywhere, with the exception of Basilides, the higher spirits are held to proceed from the divine nature, and from one another, by an emanation which is often conceived of in a very physical way. Hence the widely-diffused analogy of generation, with sexual relations ascribed to the æons, and their arrangement into syzygies or couples. Frequently astronomical numbers are brought in as a regulating law for the process. As emanation favors the idea of a descending scale of being, the lower orders are looked upon as being weaker reflections always of the higher. So the laws grounded in God work down into this lower world. The æons collectively, made at times to be innumerable, form the kingdom of light, called by the Valentinians pleroma, the fulness of divine life, which stands opposed the dark, waste kingdom of matter, the kenoma. Of these beings of light now, in which the divine fulness is revealed a part, in some way, fall under the power of matter. It is an apostasy, in which Valentinus recognizes something of free act, but which to a certain extent even with him, and still more with others, rests on the impotence of the weakened life which is the subject of it. With Valentinus it is a passionate, inordinate effort of the part of the æons, Sophia, to comprehend the infinite, which includes in itself the fall. This causa, foreign from the divine rest, something material in its nature, is sundered from her, and continues its existence afterwards as the lower Sophia or Achamoth (Wisdom), on the outside of the pleroma. In another view, a portion of the light-nature wells over and mixes itself with the ocean of matter; so according to the Ophites. Or else, as in Manichæism, the powers of darkness capture it by force. Or finally, the lower angels form a world, and in it the figure of a humanity, which God then, out of compassion, endows with the light of reason—the representation of Saturninus. The problem then is to free the light, thus bound and oppressed by matter, and to restore it to the heavenly kingdom. In general the creation of this world is itself the commencement of redemption, inasmuch as law and organization begin to prevail, and the light is brought in the human consciousness, the summit of the whole process, to its greatest concentration, preparing it to ascend to the higher sphere. The immediate cause of the creation is a being, the demiurge, whose existence is drawn mainly from the Old Testament, which it serves at the same time to disparage. The impression of newness and greatness made by Christianity was so powerful, that the God of the Old Testament appeared to be not only different from the God revealed in the New, but much inferior, imperfect being.

He is not of divine race, not of pneumatic constitution, but his nature corresponds with the lower soul; he is from beneath, psychic. He has therefore neither divine knowledge nor divine love. High-minded narrowness, by which, not knowing himself, he holds himself to be the supreme God, and rigorous, severe justice, form his character. Here now comes in the difference already noted, that he either yields himself with increasing voluntariness to the divine plan—attracted first unconsciously by its latent glory, then with fuller insight hailing it in its true character; or that, being of Satanic spirit, he continues perseveringly hostile to God, and must therefore be brought under by force. Such is the Jaldabaoth (son of chaos) of the Ophites, and the demiurge of Marcion, whom he opposes as a mercilessly just and bloodthirsty ruler to the God of love, in the coarsest style. Under the demiurge stand always the sidereal spirits. He reigns in the planetary heaven, and receives from above, without knowing it, the impulses that govern his demiurgic work. Basilides has the notion of a higher and a lower archon or ruler of this sphere. To the province of the demiurge, as conducting the affairs of the world, belong the influences usually attributed to astrology; he is lord of the time and the hour, but is also only under higher supervision. Only with Marcion he moves independently of God both in creating and ruling, as being in his own domain; for he has formed both the world and man with the help of matter alone. Hence God breaks in upon his work in the end suddenly.

To the position of man in the general system of the universe, the Gnostics assign high significance. He stands in the centre of it, binding together the higher region and the earthly, as image of God and as microcosm. This holds indeed, however, only of the highest of the three classes into which the race is divided—the pneumatic. In the pneumatic man alone is the spark of divine light and life, by which he rises above all that is earthly. He is capable of divine knowledge and a holy life. This is the nature which distinguishes the Gnostic from the psychic and the hylic classes. The psychic man has the outward forms of righteousness, but without any higher inward impulse. His consciousness binds him down to the letter and the external regularities of a legal, practical life; for the speculative knowledge of divine mysteries he has no spiritual organ. In this distinction the aristocratic intellectualism of the Gnosis, derived from heathenism, comes into view. It holds itself, with its gift of speculation, so high above the stand-point of the common Christian and Jewish multitude, who are possessed only of faith and law, that these are considered by it to be lower natures, beyond the pale of redemption and salvation in the full sense. It is easy to see how much the opposition established in Paganism and Judaism between the lower and higher orders, favored the rise of Gnosticism. The lowest division included the hylic or cholic class, fleshly men ruled by blind passion, in whom matter and animal feeling have reached human form, and who are destined to share the fate of matter in the end. The heathen masses, led by sensuality, and serving idols considered frequently to be demons, are regarded especially as of this order. The psychic class before the time of Christ are particularly the Jews; who for this reason have been chosen by the psychic demiurge, are provided by him with a law of promises and threatenings, and have the hope that he will send them a Messiah who is to secure for them the supremacy over the heathen world. Still there are among the heathen psychic men, and among the Jews hylic men; the Judaistic Gnostics allow the existence also of pneumatic men among both the heathen and the Jews. The Ophites limit this sometimes to very few cases, and sometimes again, with heathenish feeling, make it reach in the world of heathenism very far. Some, as the Cainites, hold as pneumatic in their sense those whom the Scriptures have branded as transgressors of the divine law, such as Cain and Judas. Marcion, on the other hand, set aside the distinction of natures, allowed only that of will to hold even in the time before Christ, and denied to this all participation of divine life, whether natural or of grace. The Gnostics of more historical feeling recognized the utterances of a pneumatic life before Christ, in the prophets both of Judaism and heathenism. They distinguish in them predictions that came to them from the demiurge; and others, of more spiritual import, which they receive from the pleroma. We have here the germs of a free theory of inspiration. By the revelations of the prophets, the pneumatic men are stirred to presentiments of their higher destination, longing is awakened in their breasts, the creature groans after redemption. The insufficiency of the state before Christ, involved as it was in nature, sin, and error, was by the nobler spirits among the Gnostics well understood. They describe it as the ban of the demiurge and the planetary powers, lying as a dull, heavy weight upon the soul. Or as the sighing of Achamoth, made to wail beneath the burden of matter. The hymns of the Ophites and Valentinians were filled with this feeling, and with such images. The book Pistis Sophia (that is, Sophia fallen from the state of vision into that of faith), recently made known, and in the interest mainly of the Valentinians, contains their penitential and plaintive songs, compiled out of passages from the Psalms (Pistis Sophia, opus gnosticum e cod. coptico descriptum lat. vertit M. G. Schwarze, ed. J. H. Petermann, 1853; comp. Kæstlin on the P. S. in the Theol. Jahrb. of Baur and Zeller, 1854).

The redemption of the pneumatic class cannot be accomplished through a Messiah sent by the demiurge. Their deliverance, however, is the grand need. Hence the most perfect of the æons descends through the series of heavens, draws off everywhere from the sidereal powers the pneuma which they hold in their possession, and appears for the same purpose also upon the earth. As he may not come into contact with the material nature of the human body, the Redeemer is scarcely ever conceived of as fully human; the dualistic, idealistic way of thinking brings in docetism, but this of very various shades, in the apprehension of Christ's person. An exception is found in the Messiah of Basilides, in whom all human constituents are joined with the powers of the ethereal pneuma. The outward nature of the connection between the heavenly and the earthly in Christ expresses itself in this also, that many make the æon descend upon the human person first at his baptism. Valentinus brought forward the Messiah of the demiurge in the first place; but even he was too exalted for matter, and bore a body of psychic character, which imitated the appearance of one in the flesh. With this Messiah, then, the highest æon joined itself in the act of baptism. The bodily appearance is resolved wholly into show by Marcion, as he introduces the Son of God into the world also without any sort of human intervention or preparation. Still less can the heavenly æon take part in the passion. It is either all show, as the outward in Christ generally, or else the æon quits the human person at this point. The passion thus can have no great significance in the process of redemption. With Valentinus it is a symbol; Marcion attaches much weight to it, but he does so inconsistently; according to Basilides every man suffers, and Christ also, for his own sins. With this, indeed, cosmical references are often joined. The elements of the all are brought together in Christ, and by his death are dissolved. The redemption works from this out as a world-arranging force, bringing everything to its place. The process begins in creation, and reaches its last result in redemption, called by Basilides apokatastasis. The main thing in the redemptive life of Christ, is the communication of the Gnosis to a narrow, qualified circle, from which it passes onward among the initiated. It is easily seen how much this idealism generalizes the specific value of redemption, and how much the intellectualism narrows at the same time its efficiency. Few set aside the necessity of the coming of Christ altogether. It was required, to waken the pneuma to a sense of its destination, and to show it how this was to be reached. With the Valentinians, even the better sort of psychic men were provided with an inferior sort of salvation. The demiurge was in this case also rewarded, as having aided the work of redemption according to his ability. Where he strives against it throughout, his power over the pneuma is forever taken away; either matter is annihilated, or it remains in its pristine state, only impotent against the light, and given over to chaotic discord within itself.

The ethics of the Gnostics depended partly on the existing amount of moral earnestness among them, and partly on their dualistic assumptions. These lead to the idea of a strife against matter; it must be conquered, that the soul may give itself without hindrance to Gnostic contemplation. With the first Gnostics this took place by asceticism, which was milder or more rigid according to the dualism. Basilides and Isidorus enjoined battle against the demoniacal workings of the lower life still cleaving to the spirit; but marriage was allowed. The Valentinians also did not carry their asceticism to the highest point; marriage here was even a law for the spiritual. In the severe schemes of Saturninus, Marcion, Manes, it was rejected altogether. The Manichæans of the higher class might not partake of anything out of the animal kingdom, nor so much as wound a plant. They lived on fruits, which others plucked for their use. With another class of gross, heathen-minded dualists, however, this war with matter took just an opposite course. They pretended to conquer it by turning it as far as possible to their own use. They asserted their freedom by transgressing all the restraints of law. The ocean of pneumatic virtue which was in them, they said, could not be rendered impure by any drops of matter (D. Erdmann, de notionibus ethicis gnosticorum, Berol., 1847).

The Gnostics differed materially from the Catholic Church in their authorities and sources of knowledge. Their highest rule was tradition; not the common ecclesiastical tradition, however, which they left to the multitude as poor and unphilosophical; but a secret system handed down among such as themselves. Marcion, who placed the essence of Christianity in faith, held the doctrine of his sect open for all. He, and the other decided anti-judaists, Saturninus and Manes, rejected the Old Testament altogether as a source of divine knowledge; its more moderate opposers, Basilides, the Valentinians, and among them particularly Ptolomæus, made a distinction between the pneumatic, psychic, and hylic parts of it. In the New Testament also, they gave some writings a preference over others. Marcion allowed the authority of an apostle to Paul only; and held his writings and the gospel of Luke for normative, after expunging all Jewish references (Hahn, Ev. des Marcion. Ritschl, on the contrary, held Luke's gospel to be the later work). They had besides commonly particular, often apocryphal documents, from which they drew; Basilides, for instance, the predictions of a pretended prophet Barkoph; the Gnostic Justin, a book of Baruch. For the Manichæans, the writings of Manes, especially his book Erteng, were the highest authority. Others carried the use of heathen poets and philosophers to a great length. As the allegorical method of interpretation was in full force among them, it was easy for them to find their own ideas everywhere. Not only the Old and New Testaments, not only poets like Homer, were construed in this fantastic style; the Ophites, whom Hippolytus calls Naassenes, found even in the drinking songs of Anacreon unutterable Gnostic mysteries. Among all the Gnostics, Marcion alone made use of literal interpretation. All the rest hold it for a defect, belonging to the psychic stand-point, or that of faith.

Of the worship of the Gnostics little is known, since they made it an interest to keep the most important part of it secret. We may perceive a two-fold consequence of their idealism. Some require the highest simplicity, that the spirit may not be disturbed by outward things. Marcion demanded a return to apostolical plainness, which seemed to him to be disappearing from the Church. The most of them, however, were disposed by their fancy to a pompous worship. They multiplied symbols for their ideas. This is known of the followers of Marcus, and may be inferred in the case of others from their hymns. The Basilidians celebrated, even in the 2d cent., the festival of Epiphany. The Manichæans had a special festival in honor of the martyrdom of their founder. Of the Simonians and Carpocratians, it is known that they used images of their religious heroes in their worship, with heathenish mystical rites and ceremonies (comp. Neander, Ch. Hist., I., 476-478, on the cultus of the Gnostics).

Many Gnostics gave themselves to magic. They imitated in this the countless impostors and philosophers of their time, who pretended to possess not only divine knowledge, but also higher powers, exhibiting in proof their magical arts. Hippolytus, in the fourth book of his κρυπτός, gives many examples of these heathen and Gnostic deceptions. They were introduced by some into their worship, as by the Marcionians in the Eucharist. The later Basilidians also lay under this charge.

Considering the talent of many of the Gnostics, and the religious depth of single persons among them, and looking at the vast commotion they caused in the Church for more than a century, it is not to be doubted but that by their errors and truths, negatively and positively, they exercised a very great influence on the course of Christianity. When the Church was in danger of losing herself in form and letter, and falling into a Jewish spirit, their idealistic speculation gave her an impulse to spiritual reflection and doctrinal investigation. General and particular movements were powerfully affected by this. It was not without reference to the rationalizing tendency, that Montanism assumed its realistic, practical, and supernatural shape, and won influence accordingly. The Alexandrian Christian theology stands, through opposition and affinity, still more directly under the influence of the Gnosis. The distinctive principles of Christianity came to be better understood, its relations to Paganism and Judaism more thoroughly explored. Marcion called to mind its original form, which was beginning at many points to be darkened. A multitude of doctrinal problems were brought before the Church; in some of their solutions the Gnostics were in advance of their time; most of them were successfully controverted; but all contributed to a clearer and fuller development of Church doctrine. The apologetic interest made new progress. Greater attention was given to exegesis. The higher art which the Gnostics applied to worship, their poetry in particular, was not without its effect. In all these relations, however, the Church was only led to feel and affirm more and more her own distinction, as the true and only proper bearer of the life which had come down to her from the Apostles. She would own no common interest with the Gnostics whatever.

It may not be presumed, therefore, that the Church teachers who stood in immediate conflict with the Gnosis, were able to do full justice to a phenomenon which, by its strange, fantastic forms, and confused mass of meaning, has been found so very difficult of comprehension in all times. They saw in it, for the most part, nothing but error and folly, proceeding from enmity toward the Church, and conditioned by other immoral interests. This appears in the first traces of controversy which we find in the Epistles of Ignatius and the writings of Justin, but more especially in the earliest full disputation which has come down to us, the κρυπτός τῆς ψευδοπίστεως of Irenæus. Neither with him, nor with later polemics and historians down to modern times, do we find any attempt at inward classification; all goes by outward, more or less accidental, relations and distinctions. Hippolytus, in his κρυπτός κατὰ πασῶν αἰρέσεων (published as a work of Origen by Miller, Oxf., 1851), followed in the footsteps of his teacher Irenæus, but carried out thoroughly the notion that the heresies sprang from an imitation of the heathen philosophy. The knowledge of which they boasted was there, he maintained, in a better form. To confute the Gnostic tenets, he thinks it sufficient to refer them back thus to their philosophical source. His method, for this reason, is the less mixed with his own thinking; and as he generally gives original extracts, he is particularly important for the knowledge of his opponents. Tertullian carried on the controversy with still more passion, especially against Marcion. With the Alexandrians we find more acknowledgment of the speculative need which is involved in the Gnosis, also more frequent attempts to separate between the true and the false in their theorems; still, opposition is by far the most predominant here also. Origen holds Basilides, Valentinus, and Marcion for the "gates of hell," which seek to swallow up the Church. Eusebius in his Church History, Epiphanius in his principal controversial work, Theodoret in his book against the fables of the heretics, are valuable as additional sources of knowledge, but show themselves no less exclusive in their ecclesiastical stand-point. The middle ages inherit from these fathers their severe judgment, with less knowledge of the party condemned. Even the Reformation did not lead at once to any better understanding of the case. Later interests first led here to more exact inquiry, and finally to more just opinion. Gottfried Arnold, who had himself suffered much villification from the dominant Church party, entered the more readily thus into fellowship with the old oppressed sects. If he did not understand the nature of the Gnosis, he yet hesitated to accept the judgment of their opponents. Their reports were uncertain, they had not conferred with the obnoxious parties themselves, it had been the fashion to denounce them in the popular interest. Arnold's so-called "Impartial History" has the merit in general, of having turned more attention to the heretical sects. The Gnostics came thus, among others, to be more thoroughly studied. Buddeus investigated the Valentinian system, and derived it from the Cabbala, on the ground of many real coincidences discovered by him—which, however, show rather the derivation of both from a common source. Massuet, in opposition to Buddeus, resolved all into Platonism. Both failed, in looking at the Gnosis only under its Valentinian form. Beausobre, on the other hand, in his History of Manichæism, was led from this system into an inquiry concerning the older Gnostics, which in addition to its great learning, is distinguished for the view that the main source of the Gnosis is to be found in Oriental ideas. The great point with him is the dualistic doctrine, which, in Gnostic form, had found adherents even before the time of Christ, and by Simon Magus—as portrayed in the Clementine Recognitions—was introduced into the Church. These vague surmises were by Mosheim (commentarii de reb. Chr. ante Const. Mag., p. 333) brought into more definite shape. Having, with sure tact, discerned the Oriental nature of the Gnosis, he undertook to point out the elements themselves which it had borrowed from the East. But as he also was but imperfectly acquainted with the Asiatic religions, he could only employ the circle of abstracting what was common to the Gnostic systems, and making this then to be the supposed Oriental Philosophy from which the Gnosis sprang (comp. H. Rosset's critical history of the investigations concerning Gnosticism, from the Reformation to Mosheim, in his theol. Schriften: Berl., 1847, p. 177). The hint furnished by Mosheim, so suggestive in spite of its own shortcomings, with its particular specimens of unprejudiced, purely historical investigation, contributed materially to more thorough views of the whole subject. Still, we do not find with him a proper insight into the constitution of the Gnostic systems, or an acknowledgment of their relative historical justification. This required wider general developments in theology and philosophy, and the waking of a more active sense for the different forms of Christian life, and for the manifold wants or needs which lie at the ground of them, especially the demand for a speculative knowledge of the truth. It is the grand merit of Neander's work, "Genetic Sketches of the principal Gnostic Systems: 1818," that, coming to the subject with such qualification, it sought out the different sources and precedents of the Gnosis, distributed it into a circle of kindred groups, distinguished the systems according to their inward character, and so by a happy division proceeding from the most essential points brought light into the chaos, while it unfolded the Christian and philosophical wants which proclaimed themselves in the strange phenomena, by referring them to more general and familiar forms. When once the peculiar signification of these ideas, the depth of spiritual meaning which lay involved in such great errors, had been thus disclosed, it became easier to understand also the influence they had exerted for so long a period, as well as to estimate the period itself in its proper light. At the same time appeared the Prolegomena to a work on the Gnostics by Lewald (de doctrina gnostica: 1818), which the modest author himself, however, held to be superfluous after the performance of Neander. Möhler, in his Essay on the Rise of Gnosticism, excludes Platonism altogether as a source, and derives it from Paganism, under the influence more particularly of the gross dualism of the East. The proper principle of it, however, he finds to be a mistaken Christian interest. Taking up again the notion of the ancients, that the Gnosis sprang from an inquiry into the origin of evil, he thinks that there lay at the bottom of it an overstrained sense of sin, which led to a diabolization of nature. In this view, limited to a single aspect of the subject only, it is sought to make Gnosticism a forerunner of Protestantism, in which the author tries to prove the presence of a like principle. J. Matter's histoire critique du gnosticisme: 1828, 2d ed., 1843, is an elegantly written work, which goes with extensive knowledge into the origin of Gnosticism and its several systems, but labors under the fault of having no adequate principle of division. The highly intellectual and learned work of Baur, on the Christian Gnosis, 1835, opens a new view of the whole subject. He considers it a philosophy of religion, representing the conception of the absolute religion in the different moving forces of its progressive development. Religion and its forces are apprehended by it, however, not according to abstract idea, but under the concrete figures and positive forms in which they had made themselves historically objective, at the time when Christianity appeared. It follows the development, accordingly, in the relations of Heathenism, Judaism, and Christianity, which are represented in hyle, the demiurge, and Christ—or under an anthropological view, in the hyleic, psychic, and pneumatic classes of men. Hence the division of the systems into, 1st, such as join Christianity with Heathenism and Judaism (Basilides, Valentinus, the Ophites); 2d, such as oppose Christianity to Judaism and Heathenism (Marcion); 3d, such as identify Christianity with Judaism, in opposition to Heathenism. Here Baur, as Hase likewise, reckons the Clementine homilies, which ought rather to be characterized, however, as Ebionitism, with a mixture of Gnostic elements. Baur hopes to render the conception of the Gnosis more clearly definite in this way. But these sharp distinctions would seem to wrong its actual historical constitution, which was notoriously of a somewhat flowing character. The representation is too much a matter of reflection, its forms are too modern, it is in too close analogy with the problem and terms of the recent comparative philosophy of religion. What is observable at other points, that single aspects of Gnostic thinking are made to pass for the whole idea, holds true at once of the ground hypothesis—the comparison of religions. The problem of the relation which Christianity sustains to previous history, is indeed one of the questions—one, too, of wide influence—with which the Gnostic systems are employed; but it is going quite too far, to think of deriving from this all their other ideas. The Gnosis is an eclectic religious philosophy, in which the comparison of religions takes an important place; but it is no comparative philosophy of religion. The work of Rossel, already mentioned, handles single inquiries, in a fragmentary manner, with great force and effect. Ritter's History of Philosophy also, in its own province, has some instructive disquisitions on the principal Gnostic systems (comp. Articles Basilides, Valentinus, Ophites, Marcion).

JACOBI.—Nevin.

Goar, St., a Romanian hermit, from Aquinania, who settled in the 6th cent. on the left bank of the Rhine, at a place called after him, St. Goar, between Bingen and Coblenz, in the Prussian Rhine province. Here, though not connected with any cloister or bishopric, he lived the life of a hermit, and, by self-denial and preaching of the Gospel, labored for the spread of Christianity. His lonely cell, situate in the most lovely valley of the Rhine, became thus a new refuge for our holy religion. When he lived and died cannot be definitely determined. From an inscription on the Church of St. Goar, he died 611. During his journey to the Bishop Justicus of Trier, who distrusted his evangelical freedom and independence, he performed such miracles that the Bishop grew ashamed of himself, and the people venerated him as a confessor. An arch was soon made to surmount his grave, upon which was built the cloister-church, which was constructed in its present form, 1444–1469, and remodelled, 1843.—At the diet in Lippsprunge, 782, Charlemagne declared the property of the empire, and gave it to the abbacy of Prüm.—St. Goar was the first town on the Rhine, and on its left bank, where was introduced, by order of Landgrave Philip of Hesse, the Reformation; and that, too, after the vangel. Reformed style. The Reformed faith maintained its ground, although later (since 1626) a Lutheran Church was instituted, and in 1629 a Roman Catholic, the altar of which was sacked by the sword of Gustavus Adolphus (1631), who re-established the evangelical worship. The transition of the Landgrave Ernst of Hesse-Rheinfels to the Catholic Church (1652), though it occasioned (1654) the founding of a Catholic congregation in the town, did not annihilate the evangelical doctrine (comp. Gesch. St. Goar, by A. Grebel: St. Goar, 1848, though it betrays partiality to Rome; so also the K.-G.

Deutschl. by Retberg: Göttingen, 1846, I., § 80–84).

M. GÜBEL.—Ermentrout.

Goch, John von, properly John Pupper, born the beginning of the 15th century, belonged to that class of contemplative men who, dissatisfied with the Church of Rome, desired a reformation, insisted on a free use of the Scriptures, and unfurled the banner of Christian freedom. We have very little certain knowledge of his external life. In the year 1451, he established an Order of Canonesses in Mechlin, and endeavored to reform the cloisters of this place. For 24 years he acted as Rector, or Father-Confessor, of his house of deaconesses at Thabor. Died March 28, 1475.—Ullmann thus characterizes him: "Goch was a man of great depth and acuteness, of living piety, combined with convincing logic. Though more inclined to quiet meditation than to outward activity, the freely out-spoken results of his thinking operated powerfully on practical life. Not so learned and comprehensive, less active and reformatory than his friend Wessel, he was more profound and inward. Though not so mystical as Thomas à Kempis, he was more logical and scientific, better versed in theology, and more decided in his zeal for the direct reformation of religion and the Church."—(Comp. Dr. C. Ullmann's Reformatoren vor der Reformation, Vol. I., p. 17–174).

K. SUDHOFF.—Ermentrout.

God is—God. Theology might rest satisfied with this definition, as against the unwarranted demands of science, were it not still necessary to give account to itself of the reasons of such a sublime tautology. Accordingly, it must express itself concerning the capability of knowing, concerning the idea and concerning the attributes of God, upon the basis of the Scriptures.

I. The capability of knowing God.—The above applied tautology secures this much, that although it is impossible to comprehend, it is not absolutely impossible to know God. Even Atheology must be able to say what we are to understand by the something which exists in the understanding and in language. Or at least, to say that God cannot be known involves His unreality; because if it is admitted or proven that God is, it cannot remain absolutely unknown what or how He is. The knowledge of existence and the form of existence mutually condition each other. All the proofs for the existence of God have their point of departure, contents, and end, in some divine form of existence (power, wisdom, justice, goodness). See Nitzsch's system der christl. Lehre, 1851, p. 16; Ritter, über die Erkenntnis Gottes in der Welt, 1856, p. 232.

With regard to the invisibility, inexpressibility, incapacity of knowing, inscrutability, and incomprehensibility of God, it is to be remarked first of all, that not each of these negatives involves every other, especially that incomprehensibility does not involve incapacity of knowing; and then, that none of them are used in the service of unbelief or of doubt, but in order to give more room to the claims of revelation or to the rights of faith. The latter is the case especially in the passages John 1:18, "No man hath seen God at any time;" 1 John 4:12, and 1 Tim. 6:16. God is only revealed in Christ, viz.: to faith and through love, which is his essence, or generally only in his works. The Lord has certainly given manifestations of his glory, but these only through a mediation, by means of a reflection (Ex. 33 : 20). Faith, not sight, belongs to the present stage of existence and of knowledge (2 Cor. 5 : 7 ; 1 Cor. 13 : 12). Therefore, God is to be known, but only in so far as he makes himself known, and in so far as the passive or active human receptivity extends. Literally to see God would be fatal to a created, sinful being (Judges 6 : 22 ; Isaiah 6 : 5). On the other hand, in contrast with the dead and perverted knowledge of God (Rom. 1 : 21 ; 3 John 11 ; James 2 : 19), a seeing, beholding, is allowed to living knowledge, with which are connected the ways of knowing God opened by mystic theology. Science also trusts in the innate laws of the understanding as instruments to attain to knowledge of the truth. To know the truth, the reason, and object of phenomena in their connection, in their unity, is a process which leads from every point to the knowledge of the perfect and real being. Every science which perceives something true and good in the world, in nature and reason, perceives thereby a power of wisdom and goodness, and, as this is not to be viewed abstractly, God from eternity (Ritter, l. c., p. 472 sq. ; Suabedissen, Metaphysic, 1836, p. 143). But it is religion which decides and defines everything for men, and therefore it is that which is immediately felt and known before all reflection and speculation. The mind is able to anticipate the knowledge of God from without. Knowledge and will, intention and impulse, are so rooted in the mind, that the one conditions the other. Sin is therefore repugnance to the truth, and knowledge is a moral act. God can alone be rightly taught, named, and comprehended in Christ; but the contents of revelation do not become ours when we have merely appropriated the dead letter by faith. The receptivity for divine illumination first begins after the perfected introversion of man. The man, emptied of himself by spiritual discipline and denial of the world, perceives the light and love of God more and more, until he is transformed to the divine image, and wills and thinks of God by God. The original and typical lowly life and sufferings of Christ must repeat themselves in him who comes to God by Him, and in whom God is to reveal Himself. But as the way of science leads to excess, so also the way of mysticism. By the former, the thinker imagines that the more he has separated himself from historical and moral conditions, and depends upon himself alone, the more certainly he is able to attain to absolute knowledge of the absolute, of God; by the latter, the created life is mingled, as a drop in the sea of theopantism. Only the faith of the Church moderates both tendencies, compels them mutually to test each other, and insisted from the beginning to the present time on this, that there is only, κατὰ τὸ ἐπειρόν, a real and objective knowledge of God through his revelation. The incomprehensibility of the divine Being is not only a fixed postulate, but also this, that every advancement in the knowledge of God is also an advancement in the knowledge of the incomprehensibility of God. The religion or monotheistic fanaticism (in Judaism and Islamism) has, according to experience, provoked the most crass pantheism, whilst all the imperfections and dangers connected with the worship of the extra and supramundane God, were overcome by the apparent tritheism of Christianity.—(Compare Nitzsch's Syst. d. christl. Lehre, 1851, p. 188.)

II. The idea of God and the divine name.—God can certainly be named and distinguished by language from every other object; still, the name, which absolutely expresses his essence, is not to be found, and is a deep mystery. Further, we are certainly able to determine in thought the essence and life of God known to us, over against our consciousness of the world, of nature, or of self; but we are not able adequately and correctly to define the contents of the conception, God. Christian theologians, from the time of Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. V. Pott., p. 251 sq.) to the Protestant scholastics, agree in these negations and affirmations. (See Twisten, Vorlesungen über die Dogmatik. 2 Bd., 1 Abth., p. 7, and the works on Christian dogmatics by Bretschneider, Klein, Hase, and Schmid.) The same is meant when the distinction is made, in this case, between definition and description, real and nominal definition. Clement already gave the reasons for the impossibility of a more perfect definition, in a manner similar to, but more complete than ex. gr. Gerhard: "How is it possible to express or explain in words, what is neither species, nor member of an antithesis, nor quality, nor atom, nor number, and is also nothing contingent nor subject to accident. Also, the all would not be a proper designation, for God is the father of the all. Just as little is He a part, for the unit is indivisible and again eternal, because it can neither be penetrated nor limited." Notwithstanding we apply the category of being or essence as that which, in a measure, is most common and simple to the Deity and the creature, in order to make a beginning in describing the contents of the idea of God, ex. gr. ens, essentia, substantia (vita?), well knowing that all this said concerning God is valid in a different sense than when said concerning the world. This is so to such an extent, that philosophers and theologians have not been wanting, who, in view of the finite, contingent, and mutable existence of things, have not hesitated to begin with the non-existence of God as the rudimental germ of the idea. Or, it is said, God is super-substantial. Meanwhile, however, the language of the schools has always returned to the being as the first position; and even the ancient metaphysical usage of the terms, the first, first essence (Holluz), first mover, have not been rejected, because it is not possible at present to think of God otherwise than in ordine ad res creatas. And yet the so-called ens primum cannot be established in this way, because, on account of the reference to the creature, the question is not at all concerning mere number or order, but concerning absolute causality, and concerning the perfection of the being; therefore concerning the self-dependent, infinite, but all-embracing essence. This also does not consist altogether in this, that it causes and effects something, for it is an εἰς αὐτὸν, ἔξ αὐτοῦ, ἀπὸ αὐτοῦ. And hence it is, that in Protestant confessions of faith, the definition is immediately connected with a predicate of being or essence, as infinitum, necessarium. Lately the predicate absolutum is used instead of every other. If, now, we were to add the ἔξ αὐτοῦ and εἰς αὐτόν to the idea of causality and final end as embraced in the ens absolutum, this idea, as such, would either comprehend love and personality, or contain these as implied elements. Hence, the complete conception of being requires that Spirit and Personality—spiritualis, intelligens—be combined with the definition of absolute existence (Rothe: Natur, Geist, Persönlichkeit Gottes; s. theol. Ethik, in der Grundlegung). In proportion as Pantheism began to be dangerous, was greater stress laid on the idea of Personality (Fichte, Idee der Persönl.; Fischer, Idee der Gottheit). Thus were elaborated logico-metaphysical triads, which sometimes approximated, sometimes receded from the dogma of the Trinity. Though the affirmation of the Divine Personality occasioned the ascription of it by some (as by Swedenborg) to God only as in the Son, or only to the Father, whilst it was denied the Holy Ghost, yet, as the idea itself does not forbid that of three subsistences, modern speculative theology has not hesitated to base it on the analogical explanation of the Trinitarian doctrine (see Twesten, II. Abth., s. 194–216); nor could it perplex those who, pretending to be unable to distinguish Personality from individuality, regarded absolute Personality as a direct contradiction in terms. Through Personality, the subject is separated within itself into thought, knowledge, and will, whilst the relation is still preserved between the Divine life and the human. Though Person and Personality are conceptions not directly expressed in Scriptures, they are contained in such words as Father, Lord, Saviour, etc. The idea of God as love, necessitates that of Personality; we are thus fully justified in connecting the divine perfection in love with that of life (God is spirit), and, in order properly to express the biblical doctrine of the Divine essence, to coin the His Personality by the idea of love (Syst. christl. Lehre, § 61). “Determined is the divine being which determines all,” but to fix and condition everything is to be absolutely good and free; hence, as there cannot be any higher principle of the endless, these constitute the simplest elements of the idea of God. With this accord passages of Scripture, such as: God is a Spirit, love, the Lord.

Before we can decide the question whether God can be named or not (ἀνωρόματος, ἀπρητος), we must reflect on the idea of a name. A name is a designation by means of language of anything that may be thought and represented,—ὄνομα, ἐνδεικτικόν. All languages have, in some sense, the name of God, which does not claim to express absolutely the being of Divinity, but positione. Even Polytheism has a name for the abstract of all its gods which sets forth the ideas of might, power, causality. Philosophic Monotheism aims at the reduction of polytheistic plurality to a concrete unity which, even when fully accomplished, cannot surmount the incomprehensibility of God. In the sphere of Revelation, the only true God names himself. The idea of a name, designating essence and person, now obtains a wider meaning. The entire contents of the self-revelation of God, His Word, together with all memorials and customs, offices and transactions appertaining to it, give God a name, presentiate his existence, mediate his glory, and demand obedience, faith, holiness, and worship. Thus, it is the name of the Lord in the angel accompanying the Israelitish army (Exod. 23); he is blessed that cometh in the name of the Lord (Ps. 118); the name of the Lord is to be hallowed (Matt. 6:9). Jesus alone is the full name of God, the Father (Phil. 2; Col. 3:17). A peculiar (Exod. 3:14; 6:3) name is God of Revelation, which expresses not so much a predicate as the eternal essence of God revealing himself and his kingdom in time (Beck, chr. Lehrwissensch.). For, though the name Jehovah designates in its root being (Seyn), it goes beyond the philosophical idea of absolute existence, and denotes also the progressive revelation of God. He is the First and the Last (Rev. 1:8). The names Father and Saviour (Isa. 63:16; 64:8), set forth new phases of the Divine being, referring, as they do, to the grace and love of God toward his people (Hengstenberg, die Gottesnamen des Pentateuch).

III. The Attributes of God.—Theology never allows these to be regarded as something different from the Divine essence. Appropriately termed by Suabedissen, l. c., p. 150, Conceptions of the idea of God in His relation to the world. In considering them, care must be taken that no single one be separated from the Divine being as a unity, but looked at as always subsisting therein. It must always be borne in mind that no attribute expresses anything of God different or new. The chief question is not how to attain a knowledge of them, whether in the way of negation, climax, or causality; for the knowledge of the Divine essence is the root of that of His attributes, and a mechanical putting together of ideis will not lead to an acquaintanceship with His being. Of as little service, in this respect, is the Gnostic primum ens, which is without predicate. Nor is speculation about the Absolute, the One, the source of the doctrine of the attributes. This is to be found in the fact that the living God is believed and acknowledged according to the degrees in which He reveals himself to our experience, which, as the case requires, must go hand-in-hand with the pious reception of Divine truth. Consequently, what is essential to the doctrine of God must be sought for where the religious life has manifested itself in its original fulness and purity, viz.: in its written records, or in the historical and practical life of Revelation. Theology, therefore, must pay respect to the phenomena of the Bible, to their development as contained in both Testaments, to the qualifying expressions that denote the special way in which, at any particular time, God has made himself known, to the continuity of and connection between His principal works and designs, and to the method of representation by grouping and pairing. Love, Spirit, Life, Light, designate essence or being, following which are Glory and Holiness; in like order, Power and Wisdom, Power and Goodness, Goodness and Wisdom. The ethical character of the Christian doctrine of God requires special attention to be paid to the modis of holy Love — Justice and Truthfulness, Truthfulness and Goodness, finally, to the frequent grouping of Gracious, Merciful, Long-Suffering, Grace and Truth or Faithfulness. Theology has not yet succeeded in the attempt satisfactorily to classify the attributes. For a long time it was content with dividing them into negative and affirmative, active and passive, absolute and relative, natural and moral, communicable and incommunicable. But there seemed to be something deficient about these divisions, e. g., properly speaking, it could not be said that a divine attribute was incommunicable, as, according to the promise, 2 Pet. 1, man was to be made partaker of the Divine nature. The dualism which existed in these was not obviated by the Wolffian theory (e. g. Gruner), which deduced the attributes from the idea of a perfect Spirit, nor by that of Oetinger, who started with God as the absolute unity of natural and spiritual life, nor by that of Henke's infinite goodness. Tieftrunk (Censur des prot. Lehrbegriffes) and Bretschneider (Dogm.) avoided the mixture of the religious element with mere philosophy, by distinguishing in the attributes those which belong to the Divine essence, and those which do not. An advance was made by the Rationalist Böhme (Lehre v. d. göttl. Eigensch. 1821) who distinguished between the Divine perfections belonging to the world in general, and to the moral world in particular. According to Schleiermacher, as our religious feelings have to do either with the special Christian consciousness which is filled with the ideas of redemption, sin, and grace, or with the universal sense of dependence on God, to this latter can be referred the Omnipotence, the Omniscience, the Omnipresence of God; to the former, his Holiness, Justice, Love, and Wisdom. Dissatisfied still, theologians returned to the old scholastic method of division, man being the type, into Being (Leben). Power, Knowledge, Will. As Feeling also became the basis of a division (Hahn, Hase, Lange), it became necessary to point out, e. g., the difference that obtained between the repentance of God and that of man. Hollaz: quæcunque a creaturis transferuntur ad Deum, repurganda sunt prius et tum demum attribuenda. On Anthropopathism, see Augustin's Confess., 4.

An essential improvement on this doctrine was made by Elvert, Tüb. Ztschr., 1830, and particularly by Twisten, Vorles. II., 1, p. 44, who, selecting as the principal attributes Power and Love, ranged the rest beneath them; the former being distinguished as absolute, ruling, from the ruled and from Omnipresence, the latter, in distinction from virtue and happiness, as Holiness and Goodness, from freedom and sin, as Justice and Grace. Similar to this in some points, in others different, the plan pursued by Nitzsch in his System d. Chr. Lehre, who, on the theory that ontological definitions have nothing to do with axiomatic doctrine, affirms that the theologian has only to discover the manifold relation it sustains to the world. A two-fold distinction must now be drawn. On the one hand, the relation to finite being in general, and to finite personality in particular, gives rise to different conceptions of God complementary of each other; whilst, on the other, the Biblical doctrine of God presents two views, one of which places Him beyond the reach of human knowledge and human contingency, the other brings Him into the closest possible proximity to His creatures. This double distinction corresponds in part with the division into natural and moral attributes, and in part with that into unlimited and causal. The unlimited for the cosmical sphere are Eternity and Immensity, the causal, Almightyness, Omniscience, Omnipresence; the unlimited for the ethical, Holiness, Wisdom, Happiness, the causal, Justice and Faithfulness (comp. upon this point, Bruch, Lehre von den göttl. Eigensch. — Though this doctrine has made great progress since the time of the older Theolog., it is still involved in unexplained difficulties which grow out of the metaphysics of time and space, and the effort to conceive of a self-limitation on the part of God which does not detract from His absoluteness. Sound religious feeling, and a deeper insight into Holy Scripture, will enable us to solve all the difficulties that may be inherent in the subject, or be started by speculation. Herein are displayed the Glory and Holiness of His Love, and the idea of Justification by faith, that God, in entering into fellowship with man, should still remain God (System d. christl. Lehre, 6. Ausg., p. 178; Weisse, die Christolog. Luthers und die christol. Aufgabe der Evangel. Theol., 1852 u. 1855). An essential improvement of this doctrine might be made by representing the attributes not only per se, but in their organic connection with the entire dogma of God (his Essence, Persons, Works, and Decrees). The attempt of Thomasius in this direction has not yet been carried forward to a successful result. K. J. NITZSCH.—Beck.

God, Friends of. — This name occurs frequently in the mystical writings of South Germany and Switzerland, during the second half of the 14th century. In the sermons of Tauler, and in some tracts by Suso and others, it very often designates in a general way persons who, in the then existing political and ecclesiastical confusion, and under the calamities with which the nations were visited, found comfort and peace in the love of God, and who called themselves, according to John 15: 15, the Friends of God. Such Friends of God were found in the monasteries, in the castles of the nobility, and among the citizens of the towns. In different places they united together and formed associations, which were connected with each other. Priests and monks preached in these associations, or they preserved and promoted the piety of the members by circulating German writings. To these laborers belongs, among others, Henry von Nördlingen, who labored for a time in Bavaria, Swabia, Switzerland, and Alsace.

But latterly it has appeared that the name was used then in a narrower sense. There existed, namely, a secret league, which, although it did not separate from the Church to connect with the sects (although the Waldenses are sometimes called Friends of God), had, nevertheless, other ends in view, besides securing to members the possibility of a contemplative life. The originator and head of this league was a man whose remarkable character is not sufficiently known. In the manuscript documents which speak of his labors, he is for the most part only designated as "the illuminated man," or "the great friend of God from the highlands;" we believe that we have found his real name only in two places—in the sentence against the friend of God, Martin of Mayence, burned at Cologne, 1393 (according to a Strasburg MS. printed as appendix to the life of Tauler, Hamburg, 1841, p. 239), and in Nider's Formicarius (Strasburg, 1517, 4to., fol. 40); in both places he is called Nicholas of Basle. His story is dark, and mixed with legends, from which it is not easy always to distinguish the truth. He was the son of a rich merchant, with whom he early made long journeys. Educated in the imaginative piety of the Middle Ages, he was accustomed from childhood daily to meditate upon the sufferings of Christ, and the pains of Mary. This, however, did not prevent him, while yet a youth, from connecting himself with the son of a knight, and, after the death of his parents, who left him a large inheritance, from abandoning trade, in order that he might visit castles and tournaments with his knightly friend. He won the love of a noble maiden; but before the day of the betrothal he had a vision, in which he was commanded to abandon his bride and the world. From this time he devoted himself exclusively to mystical contemplation, read German treatises on the lives of the saints, subjected himself to physical penances, until he considered himself able to persevere in divine love without external mortifications. A fanatical desire after direct communion with God, a faith in visions, a constant confounding of imaginations with real objects,—these are the most prominent traits of his character. He held, that absolute internal self-denial led more directly to friendship with God than external abstinence and poverty; that all things are to be viewed only in God, and are indifferent in themselves, but all good in God; that suffering is also a virtue; that the friend of God should not contend against attacks of doubts and unbelief, or even unchaste desires; but rather patiently endure them to the end, for they proceed from grace, with which one ought to be satisfied. Further, renunciation of the world does not consist in withdrawing from it; the friend of God should much rather labor to spread piety more and more; the guardians of the Church have become blind and careless; every one that possesses the spirit of God, be he priest or layman, should therefore take an interest in Christendom, in order to develop in it, by repentance, a new life. Nicholas, filled with these views, early sought to attract to himself persons of the same mind. There are four prominent persons who were successively drawn to him: the knight who was the friend of his youth, a wealthy canon and jurist, a Jew, who after his baptism received the name John; concerning the fourth, little more is known than that his life was an alternating series of "suffering" temptations and "bright" ecstasies. Nicholas lived together with these friends for a long time in a town "of the highlands," which, being about ninety miles from Strasburg, could be no other than Basle. About 1340 he came to Strasburg to instruct Tauler concerning the perfect life, who, after long internal resistance, submitted to Nicholas as to a person in God's stead. He also seems to have influenced other preachers and laymen; the most remarkable among the latter was Rulman Merswin, merchant in Strasburg, whom Nicholas persuaded to buy an old monastery, to convert it into a "house of refuge" for laymen, and finally to give it to the Order of Malta, with the members of which in Strasburg, Nicholas, through the mediation of Merswin, remained in constant correspondence. In 1356, after the earthquake at Basle, he addressed an epistle to all Christians, to move them to repentance, a copy of which he sent to Tauler, whom five years later he once more visited, and saw die.

In 1367, Nicholas and his four associates discovered that it was no longer "comfortable" for them to live in a large city. We pass by the vision and wonders which led them to remove to, and build a house and church upon a mountain in Switzerland, within the province of the Duke of Austria. The period of the most active labors of the Friends of God, began ten years later. After the return of Gregory XI. to Rome from Avignon, they resolved (1377) that Nicholas and the jurist should go to him, to represent to him the condition and the defects of the Church. They went; the Pope at first listened to them with suspicion, then wondered and believed; and dismissed them, after having granted them certain privileges for their house. After the occurrence of the schism, the Friends of God felt themselves called to take a greater part in ecclesiastical affairs. In March, 1379, a conference was held upon a high, thickly-wooded mountain, at which various wonders took place, in order to command the Friends of God to look on merely for another year. At the end of this year, at the same place, thirteen came together, among whom, besides Nicholas and his four associates, were several foreign brethren from Hungary and Italy. Then a letter should have fallen among them from heaven, to inform them that God would grant to Christendom a respite of three years; if it did not improve within this time, then his judgment would come upon it; meanwhile, the Friends of God were "to lock themselves up," but at the end of three years they were "to separate to the five ends of the world," in case it did not improve. After this respite, their traces are lost; probably they went forth to labor as preachers of repentance. From Nider's Formicarius we learn that Nicholas of Basle and two of his associates, John and Jacob, were condemned, by the Inquisition, to be burned at Vienne in Dauphiny; and from a Strasburg MS., that the Benedictine, Martin of Mayence, was burned as a heretic at Cologne, in 1393, because he belonged to the Friends of God, and was obedient to Nicholas. Shortly before this also, Friends of God were burned at Heidelberg. The Knights of St. John, far from regarding them as heretics, made many fruitless attempts, after the death of Merswin, to discover their dwelling place. It is for future investigations to determine whether anything more particular can be discovered, not only concerning the colony of the Friends of God in the highlands, but also concerning the secret plans of a league which had members in Switzerland, in Hungary, and in Italy.

Of the writings of Nicholas the following are yet known: 1) The history of the Rev. Dr. Tauler, found in most of the editions of Tauler's sermons; 2) Rules, in the form of the alphabet, concerning the pious life (Tauler's Life, p. 32, according to a Strasburg Coll.); 3) Five years of his early life, or the two men (two short fragments in the Strasburg Coll.); 4) The epistle written after the earthquake at Basle (after a Basle MS. published at Strasburg, 1840, and as appendix to Tauler's Life, p. 220); 5) The book of the five men, the original MS. of which, in Nicholas' handwriting, exists at Strasburg (from this it is published in the Strasburg Beiträgen zu den theol. Wissenschaften: Jena, 1854, 5 vols.); 6) A number of letters to Rulman Merswin, and to the Strasburg Knights of St. John (in a Strasburg Coll.). C. SCHMIDT.—Beck.

God, peace of (pax Dei, treuga Dei), is the peace produced by the Church for God's sake, by which the use of any kind of violence was forbidden. Ancient law allowed among all nations the choice between vengeance and peaceable agreement in case of injury. What the Mosaic law allows in the principle, an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth, etc. (Lev. 24: 19, 20; Deut. 19: 16), and the Roman law in si membrum rupit, ni cum eo pacit, talio esto (12 tables, tab. VIII., fragm. 2), German law generally allows, inasmuch as it permits the injured person to compound with the injurer for atonement (compositio), or to inflict punishment himself (faida, feud). Very early, however, the state endeavored to limit feuds, and towards the end of the 1st cent. we find that feuds were allowed only in case of a great malicious injury, if the injured person did not prefer to go to law. Later they were only allowed when it was impossible to obtain legal redress, as well in civil as in criminal matters. Definite forms were also prescribed, according to which only any one could be thus proceeded against. Three days before the attack, notice must be given by a challenge; and certain persons and things are also excepted from attack, as the clergy, women in child-bed, very sick persons, pilgrims, merchants with their wares, country people, and others. Only by the general treaty of peace concluded at the Diet of Worms, 1495, were all feuds forbidden under penalty (see the proofs in Eichhorn's deutsche Rechtsgeschichte im Register u. d. kl. Landfrieden; Walter, deutsche Rechtsgeschichte, § 253; v. Wächter, Beiträge zur deutschen Geschichte (Tübingen, 1845), No. II).

From the beginning, the Church supported the state in restraining violence. When, at the beginning of the 11th century, the feuds of the nobles became more frequent, the bishops of Aquitania resolved to beseech God to put an end to this great evil. According to the report of the chroniclers, they were united, by divine inspiration, in this resolution, "ut nemo mortali-um a feriæ quartæ vespera usque secundum feriam, incipiente luce, ausu temerario præsu- meret quippiam alicui hominum per vim auferre, neque ultionis vindictam a quocunque inimico exigere, nec etiam a fidejussore vadimonium sumere. Quod si ab aliquo fieri contigisset, contra hoc decretum publicatum, aut de vita componeret et aut Christianorum consortio expulsus patria pellere-tur. Hoc insuper placuit universis, veluti vulgo dicitur, ut Treuga Domini vocaretur" (Rudolphus Glaber, V., 1, ad a. 1034; Sigebertus Gemblacensis, ad a. 1032; see Du Fresne, Glossar. s. v. Treuga Dei; Datt, de pace publica, lib. I., c. 2). Immediately the bishops of South France and Burgundy followed with similar resolutions, as also by degrees in other countries, at the Synods of Narbonne, 1054, Troyes, 1093, Clermont, 1095, Rouen, 1096, Nordhausen, 1105, Rheims, 1136, the Lateran, 1139 and 1179, and others (Du Fresne and Datt, l. c.). The original limitation, that no feud dare take place from Wednesday evening (feriæ quartæ vespera) to Monday morning, under penalty of the ban, was soon extended to the time from first Advent to Epiphany, from the Sunday before Ash-Wednesday until after the close of Easter week, from the Sunday before Ascension to the end of Whitsuntide week, and on various festivals and their vigils. The prescript of Alexander III., in c. 21 of the third Lateran Council of 1179, which was adopted into the decretals of Gregory IX, c. 1, X. de treuga et pace (l. 34), determines: quarta feria post occasum solis usque ad secundam feriam in ortu solis, ab adventu Domini usque ad octavas Epiphaniæ, et Septuagesima usque ad octavas Paschæ. But, besides the festivals, only the specified week-days were generally observed, as appears from the ancient code of Saxony (Landrecht, Buch II., Art. 66), and of Swabia (Landrecht, Art. 250, ed. Lassberg).

If feuds are allowed on the days not excepted, still even on these the clergy, monks, lay-brethren (conversi), pilgrims (peregrini), merchants, country-people going to and returning from farming, as also the animals which are used in ploughing, &c., were protected. These are personæ miserabiles, whom the Church always especially took care of.

The Peace of God was specially announced by the ringing of the bells. Whoever violated it, fell under the ban, and if he did not liberate himself from this, he was outlawed. Since the general introduction of the treaty of peace, the special peace of God was no longer needed; but even in later times the popes have sought to influence hostile princes to peace, and even claimed the authority to set bounds to their wars (see J. H. Böhmer, jus eccl. Prot. lib. I., tit. XXXIV.

H. F. JACOBSON.—Beck.

Godeau, Anton, born 1605, at Dreux, in the diocese Chartres. Many see in the meetings held in the house of his relative, M. Conrat, by lovers of poetry for the cultivation of this beautiful art, the first beginnings of the French Academy. Godeau was for some time an important personage in that Parisian circle of literati. His having become meanwhile Monsieur l'abbé, did not prevent him from being nain de Julie (d'Angennes, Madame de Rambouillet). He had the good luck to please Cardinal Richelieu with a paraphrase of the psalm Benedicite ia opera Domini Domino, which he had presented him, who wittily replied: Vous me don- Benedicite et je vous donne Grasse. The thus became Abbé Bishop of Grasse. The es de l'église he enriched with 15,000 stan- which told of the memorable events of rich history, and in his "pseaumes de David, uits en vers français," tried to rival, but with- success, the poets of the Ref. C., Marot and odore de Bèze. More important his other lutions: The paraphrases of the Pauline Catholic epistles, The Morale Chrétienne in ls., and Histoire de l'église depuis le com- cement du monde jusqu' à la fin du huitième le, translated by Speroni into Italian, and ard the close of the last into German. As a rch Hist., his chief merit consists in his at- tive method of representation. Desirous of gnizing his services, Pope Innocens X. be- ved upon him the bishopric of Vence, where died, April 21st, 1672. Comp. Histoire de ademie française, 1743, tom. I., pp. 12, 95, , 396. Dupin, Nouv. Biblioth. des auteurs les. tom. XVII., p. 286.

K. SUDHOFF.—Ermentrout.

Godehard, St., Bishop of Hildesheim (1022-9). Principal source of his hist. is his biog. the contemporaneous Wolfherr (first pub- ed, 1518), with the title: Vita sanctissimi tris Godehardi Hildeneshemensis ecclesie au- itis confessorisque, sanctimonia, virtutum ho- late ac miraculis omnigenis clarissimi. To found also in Leibnit. Script. rer. Brunsv. I., 2, and AA. SS. Maji Tom. I., 502). — Born out 960, in Reitenbach, Bavaria, near the ister Nieder-Altaich (comp. Rettberg, K.-gesch. utsch. II., 253), which he entered in the 31st r of his age, and was afterwards made Abbot. reformed the monasteries Hersfeld, Tegern- , and Kremsmünster. Henry II. nominated n Bishop of Hildesheim; a wonderful dream— says his biographer—overcame his reluctance accept the office, and Arilbo, Archb. of Ma- nce, consecrated him, Dec. 1022. — He suc- eded in maintaining the prosperity of the Dio- se, in which his predecessor Bernward left it. e Epiphany Church which he rebuilt (Ann. ld. ad a. 1026), the chapels of St. Bartholo- w, and Andreas and Moritz, attest the good e he made of his revenues. Given to strict- ss of life, he required the same of his clergy; e poor, whom he called his "brethren," he addened with abundant alms. Died on the y before Ascension, on Mount Moritz, May h, 1038.—His biographer, Wolfherr, mentions iracles as having been wrought by him when ive. One hundred years after his death, shop Bernard of Hildesheim, demanded his nonization, which was granted by Innocent I., at the Synod of Rheims, Oct. 29th, 1132 omp. Leibn. Historia canonisat. I., 508; A. SS. l c. p. 521). Bern. founded in his honor e Godehard cloister in Hildesheim, 1133 (comp. auenstein, Hist. diplomatica episcopatus Hilde- ensis I., 276; also Blum, Gesch. des Fürstenth. ildesheim (Wolfenb. 1807), II., 108).

G. UELHORN.—Ermentrout.

Godfrey of Bouillon, was the son of Eus- ce, Count of Boulogne, and Ida, sister of God- ey, Count of Lorraine. His uncle adopted him, and bequeathed to him all his personal es- tate. He received a knightly education, and through his mother's influence was strongly drawn towards spiritual matters. During his youth he lived in retirement on his estates, pro- tected against powerful neighbors by Henry, B. of Liege. Having arrived at maturity he es- poused the cause of Henry IV., and was so gene- rally esteemed, that the banner of the empire was entrusted to him. In the decisive battle of Oct. 15, 1080, he inflicted with the shaft of his banner a fatal wound upon Rodolph. He also accompanied the Emperor in his war against Gregory VII., and was the first to scale the walls of Rome; but his exertions and the warm cli- mate brought upon him a severe fever. The Emperor rewarded him with the county of Ant- werp, and in 1084 with the duchy of Lorraine. The duke soon after had a dispute with a rela- tive involving considerable estates. The judges decreed that it should be settled by a duel, which G., though reluctantly, accepted. God- frey having broken his sword on the shield of his rival, the Emperor offered to mediate. But G. refused to come off with a doubtful reputa- tion, and renewing the battle he dealt with his broken sword such a blow to his rival, that the latter was taken for dead from the lists. These are a few of the more authentic traits, with which legendary story has invested G.'s youth. He was tall, strong and nimble, his face hand- some, his hair blond. When Urban II. preached the 1st Crusade, G. seized the opportunity to fulfil his youthful desire to visit the Holy Land. He pawned his hereditary castle for 1500 silver marks to the B. of Liege, but with a right of redemption to three successors. About the middle of August, 1096, he gathered his army, the strength of which cannot be ascertained, though Anna Connera states it at 70,000 men. Having determined to march to Greece through Germany and Hungary, he was delayed the greater part of September at the Hungarian border in arranging a passage with King Car- loman. On the Greek border he was greeted by an imperial embassy, which promised a kind welcome, and requested a mild treatment of the country passed through. Thus the army ar- rived, Dec. 23, in the best understanding at Constantinople. Tedious negotiations were now opened with mutual distrust; until, April 3, Alexius commenced hostilities by an attack upon some French pilgrims, who had come to buy provisions. The duke at once led his army against the walls of the capital. Alexius, having vainly tried to renew negotiations, or- dered a sally against the Franks, which proved successful. Godfrey now took the oath of vas- salage, and promised to restore all former cities of the empire which might be taken. Hostilities now ceased; G., richly endowed with imperial bounties, showed the utmost attachment to Alexius. At the end of April the armies of Lorraine and Italy left Chalcedon; and, com- manded by Godfrey, Robert of Flanders, and Tancred, marched towards Nicomedia. June 19, it took Nice; June 27th it again marched forward. The battle of Dorglæun, in which G. had the chief command and decided the victory, was very important; for after it Kilidje Arslan

no longer ventured to harass the march of the crusaders through his country. Iconium, Erecli, Armenia and Antioch, were successively taken, and its patriarch restored to the latter city. Disputes among the crusaders delayed the march to Jerusalem until May of the following year. June 13th the first but unsuccessful assault was made. A month later the attack was renewed. In the afternoon, at the same hour, it is said, in which Christ ended his passion, G. brought his tower to the walls, upon which he and Eustace were the first to leap. At the same time Tancred and Robert of Normandy entered the city by a breach near St. Stephan's gate. A frightful carnage ensued. Raymond says, that in the temple of Solomon the blood reached the bits of the horses. It is said, though on unreliable authority, that G. abstained entirely from the slaughter, and hastened to the Holy Sepulchre; where, barefooted, in tears and raptures, he was the first to offer his prayers. Raymond says on the contrary: "it is incredible how much blood Tancred and Godfrey shed on this day." The intoxication of victory among the crusaders was great. Several days passed without adopting a general plan. On the 23d, the princes assembled to devise measures to maintain their conquest, and G. was unanimously elected defender of the Holy Sepulchre. Anthems were hereupon sung in the Church of the Sepulchre; but G. refused to be anointed and crowned, since the place, where the king of heaven had been crowned with thorns, demanded that men should be humble. The crusade had now achieved its object. The hostile powers were broken, and the soil was won on which a Christian state was to be erected. Concerning G.'s government we have very scanty and but legendary accounts. Ekkehard (Col. 524), says that "the duke with small resources undertook great things; he drove out the remaining pagans, built fortresses, restored Joppa and its harbor, supported the church and clergy, made large presents to the monasteries and hospital at Jerusalem, maintained peace for commercial purposes with Ascalon and Damascus, and restrained the excitable jealousy of the German and French knights by a perfect knowledge of both languages. The accounts, which the Assizes of Jerusalem furnish with regard to G.'s administrative talents, are not original documents, though based upon such (see v. Sybel, Gesch. d. 1. Kr. zuges, p. 517). One of the first acts of the new king was to endow a chapter at Jerusalem. But Dagobert the patriarch was not satisfied with the arrangements effected. He asserted that Jerusalem, holy and sacred to the Lord, required a spiritual, but no secular head; that the clergy, even before the conquest, had maintained this; that his own temporal rights were clear and well-founded; that in the times of oppression he had been the sole and undisputed head of the Christian population; that he therefore demanded of the Christian princes the restitution of those rights, which pagan emirs had left inviolate. Godfrey yielded, and surrendered to the patriarch Jerusalem with the tower of David and all its appurtenances. He reserved, however, the revenues of the city until several other cities should be conquered. In case of his death without male heirs, the city should at once be given up to the patriarch. G. took the oath of vassalage to the Holy Sepulchre and the patriarch, and promised to defend the cause of God and of the patriarch with all his might. Thus the spiritual character of the state was established. But the climate and his exertions destroyed G.'s health. He was taken with a quartan ague, and died at Jerusalem, July 18, 1100. He was buried in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, and lamented alike by Franks, Syrians and Greeks. His tomb bears the inscription: "Here lies Godfrey of Bouillon, who won this entire land for Christendom; may his soul repose in Christ."—See H. v. Sybel, Gesch. d. 1. Kreuzzugs (Düsseldorf, 1841); F. Wilken, Gesch. d. Kreuzz., Lpz., 1807-32. Dr. Pressel.—Reinecke.

Goetze, John Melchior, born Oct. 16th, 1717, in Halberstadt, studied at Jena, under Sig. Baumgarten, later at Halle. Having preached nine years as assistant at Aschersleben, he was called to Magdeburg. As first pastor of St. Catherine's, Hamburg, he displayed that activity which inwove his name in the historical work of German Prot. and its literature. A skillful critic awarded him the praise of being a good bibliographer and numismatist. Comp. F. L. Hoffmann, Hamb. Biblioph. IV., Serapeum, 1852. Nro. 21, a. 22. The fact that Lessing, who lived in Hamburg from Easter, 1767, to Easter, 1770, frequently visited him, disproves the judgment passed upon him by the shallow rationalists of his day. A representative of orthodoxy, and zealous Lutheranism, like Böckler—a preacher at St. Jacob who, in his "Von des Herrn Christi hochwürdegem Abendmahl," published 1557 at Michelmas, styles Luther "Holy Father, Holy Dr. Luther, true Prophet," etc.—and the Reformed, "spiritual thievery, robbery, poison and fire,"—he defended his system with a vigorous pen. He combatted the naturalism of Basedow, and published, in opposition to his colleague Schlosser, who inclined to neology, his "Theol. Untersuch. der Sittlichk. der Deuts. Schaubühne," 2d ed., 1770. Foreseeing the disastrous effects of Semler's and Teller's teachings on an inspired Bible and evangel. Prot. he lifted up his voice boldly against the new theology, as well as against the spirit of the age which tended to destroy the doctrines both of the Church and the Bible. The agreement, which down to this period obtained between G. and Lessing, now disrupted. The publication of the "Wolfenbüttler Fragments," occasioned strife between them. Believing that important doctrines were at stake, he entered the lists. It cannot be denied that Lessing's views tended to destroy Christianity as well as Evangel. Prot. for they were based neither on the Bible nor on the facts of the Gospel. G. himself remarked: "Were Lessing to publish a Bible which contained nothing but what he believed, it would certainly be a pocket edition. Only for 'subjective religion,'—to use his own language—not for 'objective religion,' did he consider L.'s opinions dangerous. His object was to protect the mearest of his flock, while L. regarded 'unthinking Christians' as the most contemptible portion of Christendom (comp. Anti-Götze, W. W. Vol. IV., 7). How inferior soever to L. in ability, must be looked upon as a courageous defender of the Evangel. Church in a period of an. He died May 19, 1786, and left behind more than 60 works. His autobiog. was published 1786, 8vo.; Hamburg. Comp. Meusel, IV., ss Gelehrt. Hamb. Deutsch. Biblioth. Vol. I., 615-629. K. SUDHOFF.—Ermentrout.

Gog and Magog.—Thus the nations in the quarters of the earth are called in Rev. 8. The names, etc., are taken from Ezek. 38 and 39, where Gog appears as the prince of a people, who at the head of his subjects, with whom are associated crowds of European, Asiatic and African nations (38:2-6), invade the favored land of Israel, but are destroyed by divine judgments, especially a rain of fire (38:22; 39:6). Farther back (Gen. 10:2), Gog appears as the name of the second son of Ham. From this Magog as the name of a son and country, Ezekiel, as it seems, connected the name of the King Gog, in that he put the Ma as a local prefix, and the Apocalypse connects Gog and Magog, king and subjects, as the designation of the last, and numerous enemies of the kingdom of God, which are to become stationary.—The names Gog and Magog, in Ezekiel, have been understood as referring to the Turks (Luther), or to Antiochus Epiphanes (Grotius), or to the Chaldeans (Cald). On the other hand, Josephus already understands thereby the Scythians (Ant. I., 6, 1), and Jerome, expressing the opinion of the Jews of his day, says: Magog gentes esse Scythicas immanes innumerabiles. This view has been lately defended by Knobel, who identifies the Scythians with the Slaves. In any case, we have to seek Magog in the extreme north of the world known to the ancients, in the countries north of the Caucasus (Ezek. 38:15; 39:2).—The prophecy of Ezekiel concerning Gog is one of the most detailed in the Old Test., whilst, in other cases, the prophetic vision generally extends only to the restoration of Israel, and the conversion of the heathen. Ezekiel foresees in the end, that even the ungodly world would not altogether be conquered, but would once more rise against Israel. Gog, having an eye only for the temporal treasures of Israel, would undertake to plunder it. Ezekiel appends the event to its national and historical side, according to the entire standpoint of the Old Test. (39:9, 10; 21, sq.); although even he intimates, that this is the final judgment on heathenism, the completion of the victory of the kingdom of God over heathenish power" (Havernick), see 38:8, 9, 17; 39:7, 8. The Apocalypse, with its enlarged vision (comp. concerning the difference between the prophecy of the Old and of the New Testament: Der Prophet Daniel, und die Off. Joh., pp. 76, 328, 341), traces the event to a deeper, super-terrestrial basis in the spirit world, and places it in a more comprehensive eschatological connection. It is Satan again unbound, who once more inflames the distant nations of the earth to a last rebellion against the kingdom of God, and the judgment on Gog and Magog is changed into that on the devil and the last great day, with which is connected the new heavens and the new earth. Of old on account of the great power of sin, every period of special divine mercy was closed by an apostasy; the flood, the building of Babel and heathenism, unbelieving Judaism, anti-christianity, etc. Accordingly also the last period, in which God reveals himself most gloriously, the millennium beginning with the restoration of Israel, must end in an apostasy. As opposed to this highest manifestation of the glory of God on earth, the apostasy, which is represented in Gog and Magog, is the deepest and greatest—the final one: it is diabolical, and embraces the most remote ends of the earth, and it must therefore be followed by the final judgment.

Comp. Knobel, die Völkertafel der Genesis, p. 60-70, Havernick, Comm. über Ezekiel, p. 594, sq., Züllig, Off. Joh. II. p. 371, sq., Hofmann, Schriftbeweis II., 2, pp. 536, 656.

AUBERLEN*.

Goliath, the name of the Philistian giant of Gath, who was slain by the youthful David. Having slain him with a sling, David cut his head off with his own sword (cf. Herod. 4, 64), took the spoils of the giant home, and deposited the sword as a trophy in the national sanctuary (1 Sam. 21:10; 22:10; 24:9; comp. Art. Gath). The fortunate duel decided the victory of Israel over the Philistines, whom they pursued to the gates of their cities, and the returning victors were welcomed by the women of Israel with the song: Saul has slain his thousands, but David his tens of thousands—on account of which the envy of the suspicious prince was aroused against his rival (1 Sam. 17:18; 19:5; 21:12; 29:5). With regard to what is said concerning his great size and the weight of his armor, it is not at all necessary to suppose that the statements have been exaggerated by tradition; persons 6 ells and 1 span high, i. e., according to Thenius, 9 feet 2 inches Paris measure, have existed elsewhere, comp. Herod. 1, 68; Pliny, H. N., 7, 16. and the account of a skeleton found at the Himalaya mountains in the Asiatic Journal, Nov. 1838. Goliath wore a brazen helmet, a coat of mail, weighing 5000 shekels of brass (= 142 lb Dresden weight), brazen greaves, and the staff of his spear was like a weaver's beam, the head of which weighed 600 shekels = 17 lb.—To reconcile this account of the death of Goliath with that in 2 Sam. 11:19, where the killing of Goliath is attributed to Elhanan of Bethlehem, a warrior in David's army, it is not necessary to suppose, either that these were two giants of the same name, so that Elhanan killed the one, David the other, both being of Gath, and both having spears like a weaver's beam (Winer, R. W. B. 2 Aufl.), or that the account in 2 Sam. 21, is the older and more original, out of which later tradition embellished a victory of David over another Philistian (Ewald, Gesch. Isr. II., pp. 523, 611). That there were two Goliaths of Gath is very improbable, and the second supposition is inadmissible on this account, because the account of David's contest with Goliath, although made up of two different reports, carries in itself all the marks of historical fidelity. Much rather 1 Chron. 20:5, offers the correct reading, as already Piscator, the English version, Movers and Thenius admit: "Elhanan slew Lahmi, the brother of Goliath the

Gittite, and בֵּית-הַלְחָמִי אֶת-נָלִית, is to be changed to אֶת-הַלְחָמִי אֶת-נָלִית, which is the more allowable, because, as is generally admitted, 2 Sam. 21 : 19 contains other plain errors (יַעֲרִי instead of יַעֲרִי, and the double אֶרְנִים).

David's heroic act is also mentioned in Sirach 47 : 4. In the Koran, 2, 250, sq., Goliath is mentioned under the name جالوت and Abulfida, hist. ante-Islam. p. 176, calls him a king of the Canaanites, and relates that after his death, a colony of his kinsmen went to North Africa and settled in Mauritania. Comp. Herbelot, Bibl. Or., p. 392, s. v. Gialont (ed. Paris, 1697, fol.), see also Ewald, Gesch. Isr. II., p. 521, sq.; Winer's R. W. B.; R. E. Art. David, p. 299.

RÜETSCHI.—Beck.

Gomarus, Francis, born Jan. 30, 1563, at Brügge in Flanders, of wealthy and noble parents, whose ardent attachments to the Reformed faith led them, in order to practise it undisturbed, to emigrate, 1578, to the Reformed Palatinate. The young Gomar, who had finished, in his 15th year, the gymnasium course in his native town, enjoyed in Strasburg the tuition of John Sturm. In 1580 he attended the Reformed school at Neustadt on the Hardt, where Franciscus Junius, Zacharias Ursinus, Jerome Zanchius, and Daniel Tossanus taught. It is worthy of remark that, a brief sojourn at Oxford and Cambridge excepted, he was educated by Heidelberg theologians alone. In 1585 and 1586, he studied theol. at Heidelberg. It cannot be denied that G., in every essential point, showed himself a genuine, faithful disciple of his great teachers, and harmonized, doctrinally, with the Heidelberg school. None but historical scribblers can deny that Olevianus, Tossanus, and Zanchius, were also predestinarians (Urs. Opp. Heid., 1612, T. IV., p. 28). Having officiated in the Reformed Church at Frankfort-on-the-Main, from 1587–1593, G. removed to Leyden, Jan. 26, 1594, as Prof. of Theol. Heidelberg crowned him with the Licentiate and the Doctorate. Here he labored in peace till the advent, 1603, of Jacob Arminius, as the successor of Franciscus Junius, who, though he at first promised to teach nothing opposed to the Confessio belgica and the Heidel. Cat., began, 1604, to deliver exegetical lectures which conflicted with these symbols. To abate the theological strife that now ensued, colloquies were resorted to. Gomarus threw himself into the breach. It is worthy of remark that not only G., but the Synod of Dort—as its acts clearly show—distinctly perceived the radical difference that obtained between the view of A., and the doctrines of the Reformers. Arminius died at Leyden, Oct. 13, 1609. The election of the Socinianizing Conradus Vorstius as his successor, added fuel to the flame. Tired of controversy, G. retired to Middleburg, Seeland, 1611; but in 1614, accepted a call to Saumur, from whence he removed to the University of Gröningen.

At the Synod of Dort which had, in the mean time, been summoned, G. played a prominent

So decided was his opposition against

Remonstrantism, that he waged war against all ambiguous phrases—though not heterodox in themselves—that might serve as a cover for the Armenians. Though all agreed in applying the Reformed interpretation to Ephesians 1, where Christ is named the foundation of election, yet, as the Armenians made use of this expression, in an anti-reformed sense, it is true, to denote Christ as the foundation of the decree of election itself, the propriety of employing it was debated. From the strife that ensued on this point between Gomarus and the Bremen theolog. Martinus, it must not be inferred that the German Reformed doctors were anti-predestinarian; on the contrary, they came to the Synod with strict predestinarian instructions (comp. Schweitzer's Centrald. II., p. 114–141), and subscribed the canones of Dort with the rejectio errorum. Nor is there any historical evidence of a protest, on the part of the Hessian and Bremen theols., against the canones of the election of grace. The difference did not concern the fundamental point.

In the year 1633, G. withdrew to Leyden to take part in the revision of the Holland Bible. Died Jan. 11, 1641, aged 78. Married three times; with the second wife only had he children.

Works.—Erklärungen zu Matthäus, Lukas, Johannes; Analysis et Explicatio epistolarum Pauli; Analysis et Explicatio prophetiarum quarundam, Mosis, de Christo; Analysis Hobadix; Disputationes Theologicae, a work of Dogmatics, in 39 Locis; Explicatio 5 priorum capp. Apocalypses; Tractatus theologici, nempe Conciliatio doctrinae orth. de Providentia Dei; Anticosteri libri III.; Examen controversiarum; Dissert. de Evang. Matthæi, quamam lingua sit scriptum; De Sabbato; Judicium de primo articulo Remonstrantium; De Perseverentia SS.; Davidis Lyra. Published entire, 1645 and 1664, fol.: Amsterdam.—Sources: Vitæ professorum Groningensium: Gron., 1654. Acts of the Synod of Dort, Schweitzer's Centraldogmen, II., p. 31–224.

K. SUDHOFF.—Ermentrout.

Gomer (גֹּמֶר) Sept. Γομῆρ, Vulg. Gomer) the first mentioned son of Japhet in the genealogy, Gen. 10 : 2; and, as he had three children, Askenan, Riphath, and Thogerma, v. 3, one of the most widely spread people of antiquity, and dwelling in the extreme north, Ezek. 38 : 6. That Gomer and the Cimmerians (Κιμῆριοι, Cimmerii. Od. 11, 14), were one and the same people—these latter located, in the time of the Trojan war, in the north-west by the German Orpheus (Argon., 1120), and known to Herodot. (4, 11, comp. 99, 5th cent. B. C.), as dwellers between the rivers Don and Dniester—is clear from the name Kymr, and the exceedingly slight difference between the softer consonant and the obscurer vowel in Hebrew, which no doubt represents the original sound. The Cimmerian Bosporus, the mouth of the Cimm. gulf (Καιτος Κιμῆριος), Herod. 4, 12, 10; Strabo, II., p. 494; Plin. h. nat., 4, 24), called πορθύρια Κιμῆρια, (Herod. 4, 12, 45), and the isthmus there ἰσθμὸς Κιμμεριζός, and the Cimmerian mountain and town on the Taurian peninsula, now the Crimea (Gesenius, Lehrgeb., p. 141); all this proves the original abode and magnitude of this people. Pressed by the Scythians, they migrated under their king, Lygdamis (7th cent. B. C.), to Æolia, Ionia, and Lydia, in Asia Minor, conquered Sardis, and remained here till Alyattes succeeded in expelling them (Bredow, alt. Geschichte, p. 39; Ptol. 5, 9, 5; Plin. h. nat., 6, 6; 5, 32; Ierod. 4, 12). The name given to the wife of Ioseph (1:3), attests their position in Israel. That the Cimbrians known to the Romans were the קמרי = Kymr, of the Hebrews, and the Κιμρῖοι of the Greeks, cannot be disputed. Apart from the fact that the names easily blend, the Greek μεσημβρία derives from μεσημερία, an Hebrew, Αμβρι from Omri or Ambri, and Cimbrod from Nimrod. Besides, the Cimbrians—called by Appian (bell. Mith., 15), Ταῖροι—lived on the Cimm. Bosphorus, and, according to Plutarch (Marius, c. 11), those who had invaded Asia Minor were only a section of the Cimmerians, the largest and bravest part having settled by the North Sea in a country whose thick forests the sun never penetrated, and which stretched to the Hercynian mountains of Germany. With the supposition that the principal portion had migrated towards the north-west before the encounter with the Scythians, the Mosaic geneal. best accords. From the peninsula Jutland—in ancient geog. Χερσόνησος Κυμρική—(Plin. hist. nat., 2, 67; 4, 27; P. Mela. 1, 3; Ptol. 2, 11; 2, 12), the Cimbrians invaded Illyria, 114 B. C., vanquished the Consul Papius Carbo, 113 B. C., marched through Switzerland, across the Rhine, to Gallia, seized on Roman territory, and for five years defeated all the Consuls sent against them. On their return from Spain, whither they went, 104, joining arms with the Teutons, 102, they proceeded towards Italy, but sustained a total defeat at the hands of Marius, near Verona, 101, B. C. Their great military expeditions imply an equally great extension. Indeed, Strabo (7, p. 293), locates them between the Elbe and Rhine, Pliny (4, 28), in the neighborhood of the Rhine towards the north, Cæsar (B. Gall., 2, 29), and Dio Cassius (39, 4), number amongst them the Aduati in Belgium, Appian (Gall. 4), the Nervi. From Belgium, (Cæs., 5, 12; Ammian. Marc., 15, 9), they migrated to Britain, and, even in our day, may be found here and there in the western part of England: proven by the remains of the ancient Cimbrian language, by Wales, which in the Middle Age was called Cambria and Cumbrin, the B being almost suppressed by the shire Cumberland in north-western England, and by the fact that the inhabitants of Wales who still preserve the tradition of their migration, regard themselves Cimbrians, and call themselves Cymri, Cumri (Diefenbach, Celtica 11, 2, p. 125), which identically accords with the Hebrew קמרי.—It is absolutely necessary to consider more closely the descendants of the three sons of Gomer mentioned in Gen. 10:3. As the Teutons, called by the Cimbrians their brothers (Plut. Mar. 24), and so considered by Jewish commentators (see Targ. to Gen. 10:2, and 1 Chron. 1:5, where Gomer is termed Germania)—a relationship indicated besides by their agriculture, figure, language and customs—were a decided German stem, it is particularly important to ascertain what people are meant by the Ashkenaz.

The word קנזשנא—a term more complex than simple—analyzed קנז, to be compared with γένος, lat. gens, genus, goth. kuni, ahd. kunni, chunni, ags. chneov. altn. kind, engl. kin, kind, celt. oinadh (Edwards sur les langues celtiques, p. 282), and means race, stem or stock of a people. But the first inhabitants of Scandinavia of the Germanic stem were the subsequently deified Asen (Edda, Sämund, 77, 865; Ritter, Vorh. europ. Völkergesch., p. 472; Grimm, Gesch. d. deutsch. Sprache 1, 767), who came with Odin from beyond the Don, and from thence, as northern legends mention, three Odins seem to have emigrated, at short intervals, from time immemorial (Geijer, Gesch. v.; Schwed. 1, 19, 27). The similarity between Asen and קנז in the word Ashkenaz is not accidental, but indicates the original name of our great people, the Asen-race, Asenvolksstamm, and the stem which, in south-eastern Europe, was known, 600 B. C.—400 B. C., by the name of Thracians, Geti, and Goths, in the western and north-western, shortly before Cæsar, of Germans (Germania), (Tac. Germ. c. 2, Ceterum Germaniæ vocabulum recens et nuper additum), and, in 9th cent., of Teutsche, Deutsche = German, a name of their own taking. Though these, as all other people of Europe, came from Asia, some still remained there. In 6th cent. (see Jer. 51:27), we find a kingdom, Ashkenaz, next to Armenia and Meni, also in Asia, and later the Greeks and Romans found people with this name beyond the Don. Ptolemaus, 5, 9, 16, mentions the Ασαῖοι in Asiatic Sarmatia, the Uscardei (Pliny, hist. n., 6, 7), and the Asburgians of Strabo, p. 495, 556, on the north-east side of the Black Sea, remind us of the Asen and of Asgardr. That the original home of the people in question was the northern slope of the Caucasus, can also be learned from the Osseti who still occupy the middle of this mountain; called by the Caucassians Osi, Os, by Russians, Jasen, by earlier travellers, As, Aas (Klapr. Asia polyglotta, p. 84; Neumann, Völker d. südl. Russlands, p. 40); by Klaproth and Kohl (Reissen in Südrussland, 2, 193), characterized as of purer, less adulterated blood than the other people of the Caucasus, with European physiognomy, blue eyes, fair reddish hair, in language Indo-Germanic, many words like the German in pronunciation and sound (Kohl und Klapr. kauk. Sprachen, p. 176).

The use of the name in the Trojan era (about 1200, B. C.), Askanius—the Greek word for the Hebrew original—the son of Priam being so called (Apollod. Bibl., 3, 12, 5), also that of Æneas (Liv., 1, 3; Dion. halic., 1, 65), proves that a portion of the Asen-stem must have gone southward across the Caucasus and through Asia Minor, over the Hellespont to Thrace and Germany. There was, too, a country, Ashkania (Il., 2, 862; 13, 719; Plin. h. n., 5, 40), also an Ashkansan Sea, on which was situated Bythinia, capital of Nicæa, and an Ashkanian river (Strabo, 12, p. 565; 14, 681; Plin. 5, 43; Ptol. 5, 1, 4). The Teutones even must have spent some time with these their brethren, before

Troy reached its zenith, in the north-west of Asia Minor; since we find in south-western Mysia a country Teuthrania, where reigned from time immemorial a king Teuthras (Strabo, 12, 572; 586, 615; Plin. 5, 33; Steph. Byz., sub. Τευθρανία). Still more: the name Asia clearly reminds us of the Asen-stem which has permanently stamped its name on this country. If we follow the Asen, Ashkennas, to Europe, we will meet them in the Thracians who are described by Herodotus 5, 3-8, as only Germans could be, and by Tacitus in his Germania really as such. Indeed, Wirth (Gesch. d. Deutschen. I., 206-232), in order to prove that the Thracians were no other but Germans, draws from the figure of their bodies, their military and domestic manners, their language and their religion; an argument so convincing, that the most sceptical must submit to it. As, according to Strabo, (Geogr. 7, ed. Casaub., p. 212), the Thracians, Dacians, and Geti, spoke the same language, these three people, inhabiting the country this side and beyond the Danube, must have belonged to the same stock. Herodotus, I., 4, 93, says expressly that the Geti were a stem of the Thracians (αἱ δὲ Γέται θρηίκων ἰόντες καὶ γερμανότατοι καὶ δακρυότατοι). If, then, it can be shown, that the Geti pertained to the same stem with the Goths, who became known in the 4th cent. after Christ, it follows that the ancient Thracians were Germans, for the Goths spoke, as we learn from Ulfilas's translation of the Bible, Gothic, that is, German. The proofs of the identity of the Goths and Geti may be briefly given, thus: 1) Though from the 5th cent. B. C.—3d A. C., the name Geti was exclusively used, all on a sudden, with 4th cent., in the same countries bordering the Black Sea and the Danube, was introduced the name Goths, the vowel of the one gradually softening, as it were, into that of the other, indicating beyond question the same people. 2) From this time on to the 6th cent., Geti and Goths were used interchangeably, as by Jornandes, a native author, who in his de orig. act. etque Getarum edit. Basileæ, 1532, repeatedly declares that they were the same people (quos Getas jam superiori loco Gothos esse probavimus). So, too, 3) the Greek hist. Procopius (6th cent.), de Bello Gothico, I., 24, says that, in his time, the Goths were called a Getish nation, and in his second book on the Vandal war (Lib. 3), that the Vandals, Gepidi, East and West Goths, were regarded as Getish, because, though variant in name, in all things else alike, all having a white skin, yellow hair, the same laws and language. 4) A striking proof in Ael. Spartianus (4th cent.), a Latin author, who makes Helvius Pertinax say of Caracalla (his life by Spart.), who had marched against the Goths, and had, at the same time, murdered his brother Geta, that he could be called Geticus Maximus, and adds: quod Getam occiderat fratrem et Goti Getæ dicebantur. 5) A contemporary hist. (Jul. Capitolinus, 211-217), in his life of the two Maximins writes: sub Macrino a militia desit Maximinus Thrax in Thracia in vico, ubi genitus erat, possessiones comparavit ac semper cum Gothis commercia exercuit. Amatus est autem unice a Getis, quasi eorum civis,—this passage presupposing that the interchangeable use of the two names was so well known that he did not think it necessary to say they denoted one and the same people.—The identity of the Goths and Geti thus incontestably proved, and these latter of Thracian origin, it follows that the ancient Thracians also were Germans; a conclusion confirmed beyond a doubt by a comparison of the description of Herodotus (Terpsichore) of the T., with that of the G. by Tacitus in his Germania, in both which are given characteristics peculiar to these two people, viz., greatness without national unity, bravery and a natural inclination to war, love of drink, and contempt for agriculture, buying of wives, and, in necessity, selling of children. The Goths, pressed by the Huns, left their homes, 375, and appeared in Italy, 400. When Jornandes narrates an expedition of Goths as having been made before the Trojan war (about 1200 B. C.), from Scandinavia to the countries around the Black Sea, and from thence to Asia, it is to be referred, in all probability, to a return from Scand. to this sea or to Asia Minor, in order to aid their brethren who had settled there long before the war. Hence the probability that the first migration of the Ashkenas to Scand. took place several centuries prior to the Trojan war. Knobel, too, is right in affirming that the Ashkenas of the Bible settled on the lands of the East Sea. Tradition supports this view. Josephus, together with Jerome, in explaining Gen. 10: 3, and other passages, refer יִשְׁכָּנָז to Pyrges, who are none other but a Gothic people living on the East Sea (Tacit. Germ. 43; Procop. Bell. Goth., 2, 14; 3, 2). Scandinavia, therefore, is to be regarded as the chief seat, in the most ancient times, of the Germans. Thence as an officina gentium and vagina rationum marched an army of Goths through Scythia to the Black Sea (Jornand. 1, 4, 17); from this, later, Teutons, Heruli, Longobards, perhaps, also, Gepidi, Vandals and Alani, went southward and westward. Even these from this northern peninsula did not forget their original name Ashkenas. Tacitus (Germ. 3), mentions a place on the Rhine by name Asciburgium, evidently from יִשְׁכָּנָז, ash, a name still retained in Asburg or Asseburg in the dukedom Meura, among the nobility, (Cluver. Germ. ant., p. 414; Beckmann, Hist. d. Fürst. Anhalt, 1, 15), and later, a somewhat similar name of a town on Lower Rhine by Ptol. 2, 11, 28, and Marcian. Heracl., 2, 10. In the same country is situated Duisburg, its name from Tuisco, the progenitor of the German people (Tacitus, Germ. 2, connects Tuisco with Teut); to which must be added, in proof of the wide extension of this people, the name Asciburgis sc. mons—the mountains of the gigantic Asen. Besides, the whole name Ashkenas is to be found in the word Scandinavia, which cannot be otherwise interpreted. Its termination navia—navis, ναῦς, in Pelagian and old German—an island, while the peninsula was simply called Scandia, which, with the rejection of N, is a slight modification of יִשְׁכָּנָז, pronounced Ashkenads or Ask-nads or Askands. Examples of the same law omitting the first letter and Ἰσχυρῆς, Scyth, Itin. Hier., p. 594; from Askalonia, Scangia, du Fresne, Gloss. d. Mittelalt. s. h. v.

Let us now turn our attention to Riphath. The similarity in sound between the montes Rhipaei and Riphaei mentioned in the classics, and the word רִפְיָה, would seem to warrant us locating them there. The ancients were acquainted with a mountain range of this name at the sources of the Don and Volga (Pliny, H. N., 24, 26; 6, 14; Virg. Georg., 1, 240; 3, 381). And here, in all probability, north-east from Gomer, and north from Ashkenas, we must seek the original home of the Celts, Gauls, (Greek, Galatians). Their armies coming from Asia, must have settled at the Carpathian Mountains, also called by the Greeks ὄρη Πίρρα. Now Plutarch (Cam. 15), narrates that the Galatians, having gone in search of new homes, some of them crossed the Rhipaean (Carpathian), to the Northern Ocean, and lived in the furthestmost extremities of Europe, and some settled between the Alps and Pyrenees. This must have taken place before 600 B. C., as, about this time, after having resided in Gaul, they planted colonies in Upper Italy. But the Bastarni and Peucini, according to Polyb., 26, 9; Diod. Sic., 30; Liv., 5, 57; 44, 26, a Celtic nation, dwelt at the Carpathian mountains, whence named Alpes Bastarnicae. Between Upper Weichsel and Oder lived the Gothini, whom Tac., Germ. 43, makes to speak Celtic, and south from the Bastarn., the Leurisci. In the modern Moravia and Bohemia dwelt the Boii; in Pannonia, the Celtic stem Scordisci; in Vindelicia, Celts. The Helvetians were also Celts who, in the course of time, became Germanized.

The chief seat of the southern Celts was Gaul, the Belgians in the north, and the Iberi in Aquania, who, mixing with the C., made the Celtiberi. We find C., also, in the British isles, and in Ireland. The Aestorum gentes on the East Sea, also Celts; perhaps, too, C. in Scandinavia. The old portions of East Zealanders were called Κελτικη. Plut. Mar., 11, and Florus, 3, 3, styles the Cimbri and Teutoni ab extremis Galliae profugi. And when Pythias (Strabo, 1, 63), speaks of Κελτικη as distant only several day's journey from Kent in England, he must have referred to Scandinavia, where he also locates Celts. Finally, according to Polyb. hist., 4, 46, the Celts in Thracia established a βασιλειαν Τυλην; Norway has still the name Thule or Thyle (Münter in Städlin's Arch., 3, 2, 254). If, now, by רִפְיָה in the Mosaic Geneal. but one people is meant; if the otherwise inexplicable names of the mountains Riphaei in Central Europe, viz., the Carpathian, and in Northern Russia at the rise of the Don and Volga, point to this people; if it has been shown that here Celts lived in large numbers who thence spread themselves southward over Europe: these things being so, it seems to us demonstrated beyond a doubt, that the author of the Mosaic Geneal. meant by רִפְיָה no other people than the Celts.

Touching the third son of Gomer — called in Vulg. Thogorma — besides the mention of his name in Gen. 10:3, it occurs but in two other passages of the O. T. From the one (Ezek. 27:14), we learn that the Phoenicians carried on a trade with them in coach and riding horses, and in mules; from the other (Ezek. 38:6), that they were connected with the Scythians and Cimbrians, and must be sought for in the north from the time of the Mosaic Geneal. to the 7th, and beginning of 6th cent. before Christ. Herod. 1, 194, and Strabo 11, 529, narrate of the Armenians that they were renowned for their equestrian abilities, and reared many asses. Not only do ancient authors trace them back to Thogarma (Syncellus 1, 91; Dind. Schol. on Ezek. 38:6), but they themselves derive their descent from Haik, a son of Thorgom, grand-son of Tiras (comp. Gen. 10:2), great-grand-son of Gomer (Gen. 10:2, 3), who was a son of Japhet (Moses Chor. 1, 4, 9–11; Euseb. Chron. Arm., 2, 12; comp. Ritter, Erdkunde 10, 358, 585). Agreeing with the Georgian tradition in Klaproth, Reise in d. Kaukasus, 2, 64, that the Armenians, Georgians, Lezgier, and Mingrelians, descend from Thargames, it is also well known (Ritter, 10, 579; Zeitschr. für Kunde d. Morgenl., 1, 242), that the Armenian language belongs to the Indo-Germanic family (Ritter, 10, 585; Klaproth, Asia polyglotta, p. 97; Cassel, magyarische Alterth., p. 243). The ancient Phrygians must be considered in connection with the Armenians; they are thus viewed by Jos. Ant., 1, 6, 1; Hieron. quest. in Gen. 10:3; Zonaras Ann., 1, 5. Characterized by Homer, Il., 3, 185, as well versed in the equestrian art (Claudian Laus. Ser. 191). The Phrygian language was not only allied to the Greek (Plato Cratyl., p. 410), but — what agrees excellently well with Thogarma as the son of Gomer — nearly all the Phrygian words still surviving (Jablonski opusc., 2, 63), can be traced to the Indo-European family of languages, particularly to the Cimbrian stem (Goschede ariana ling., p. 21; Cassel, Magyar. Alterth., p. 238). Herod., also, 7, 73, says expressly that the Armenians and Phrygians were closely related.

The original seat of the Thogarmathian, i. e., the Armenian-Phrygian people, was Armenia, from whence they sent colonies westward to Asia Minor, of which they had, at one time, nearly entire possession.

Around the Black Sea were thus located the Gomerian people; Gomer himself on the Taurian peninsula (Crimea), and northward from the Black Sea; Ashkenas, at the northern declivity of Caucasus, and farther north between the Black and Caspian Seas; Riphath, at the sources of Don and Volga, between the Rhipaean and Hyperborean Mountains; Thogarma, south of Caucasus on the Black Sea to the Caspian. In Europe, the Cimbrians spread furthest north-west to the peninsula Jütland, from thence south and west; the Asen, from Scandinavia, in every direction; the Celts, from Carpathia, north, east, and west; the Armeno-phrygians, towards Thrace. J. G. VAIBINGER. — Ermentrout.

Gomorrah was one of the chief cities in the vale of Siddim, occupied by a primitive tribe of Canaan (Gen. 10:19); its site is now covered by the southern portion of the Dead Sea. It had its own king, and was involved in the plot against Chedorlaomer (Gen. 13:10; 14). It subsequently shared the fearful doom of Sodom, &c. (Gen. 18:20, &c.; 19:24, &c.). Its wickedness and fate are often held up as a warning (Is. 1:9; Jer. 23:14; Amos 4:11, &c. &c.).—See Lengerke, Kanaan I., 278, &c.

RÜRTSCHL.*

Gonesius, Peter (Conyzy, Goniadzki, Gonionedzki), born c. 1525, in Goniadz, Poland, was one of the first advocates of anti-trinitarianism, and anabaptism, in Poland. He commenced his public life as an opponent of the Reformation. This won for him the favor of Romanists. But their hopes of finding in G. a faithful champion, were frustrated. In 1554, on a tour through Germany and Switzerland, he became acquainted with the doctrines of Servetus, and regarded them favorably. On his return to Poland he rejected the Nicene, Athanasian, and all other creeds, except the Apostles', and openly avowed Unitarianism. At the Synod of Secenium, Jan. 1556, and at that of Brzesk, Dec. 1558, he denounced infant baptism. The influence of his views was so great, that in 1565 the Reformed C. in Poland split into two parties, the Trinitarian and Unitarian.—(See SANDII Biblioth. Antitrin., I., 1, p. 106; 2, p. 1097; Krasinski, Gesch. d. Ref. in Poland (Lpz. 1841); Lukaszewicz, Gesch. d. ref. Kirche in Lithauen).

F. TRESCHEL.*

Gonzalo of Berceo, a Spanish poet of 1168–1268, probably so surnamed from his native town. Though little is known of him personally, he is the first mentioned poet of Spain. His works were printed in 2 vols. from Sanchez's collection. His chief studies, judging from his poems, were the Bible and mystical literature. He translated into verse the Latin Lives of the Saints. Nine of his poems are still extant: three biographies of Saints; a poem on the Mass; one on The Signs of the Judgment; a Eulogy upon the Virgin; an account of her miracles; one of her grief at the Crucifixion; and one on the Martyrdom of St. Laurentius. That on the Mass is of value for Church antiquities, as it describes many obsolete customs. That on the Judgment is the best.—(See CARUS, Darstellung d. Span. Lit. im Mittelalter: Mainz, 1846, I., 229–273, who represents G. as having been no ordinary poet).

DR. PRESSEL.*

Good, the Highest.—Much was done by Schleiermacher to clear up and fix the true force of this important idea. He defines the religious and scientific use of the phrase. If by it, it is intended to designate God as the highest good for man, it is inappropriate; for this should rather be the knowledge or love of God, his providence, his grace, or the mystical enjoyment of him. But it may simply designate him as supreme goodness. In an ethical sense (the finis bonorum of older philosophers) the Highest Good is one of the three fundamental principles of Ethics, the other two being Duty and Virtue. If Duty is the demand of a moral course of action, and Virtue the moral strength and firmness of the subject, the Highest Good is the objective result of moral conduct, the product of all moral activity, which, however, may be assumed as the starting principle of Ethics, so far as it conditions the perception of Duty, and its claim to Virtue. On this basis Schleiermacher built his system of Ethics. In opposition to Kant's and Fichte's treatment of Ethics as the doctrine of duties, or as a mirror of individual virtues, he showed that a system of moral precepts, even if it comprehended man's whole life, was applicable only in single cases; this would cause an utter confusion of life as a totality, and clear ethical definitions would only incidentally appear. But Virtue is the ethical perfection of the subject, who, if we reject the fiction of total isolation, must be regarded as standing alone in but few things, so that Virtue depends upon a condition which could not exist without the co-operation of others. S., therefore, strove to obtain in the Highest Good an objective and systematically comprehensive organic principle of Ethics. This Highest Good was not merely to be referred to the single individual, but was to be seen completely only in the totality of the human race, as the Reason existing in this totality, and under the conditions of our globe. Starting from this principle, with the addition of individual and universal nature, on the one hand the organizing and symbolizing activity of the Reason, on the other the entire sphere of Ethics, may be compassed. S. expressly refers here to the State of Plato, who was the only ancient philosopher who investigated (in his Philebos) the Highest Good, and apprehended it from this general objective standpoint: the exhibition of the spirit, νοῦς (or in the Republic, of righteousness), the authority of Philosophy in individuals and in the world. Aristotle, on the contrary, with whom the idea of virtue predominates, places it in the happiness of the individual, not in the Epicurean sense, but so that it becomes the realization of a perfect life through perfect virtue (ζωὴς τελείας ἐνέργεια κατ' ἀρετὴν τελειωμένη).—In the further progress of the history of Ethics, it is important, in defining the Highest Good, to distinguish: 1) the individual from the general; 2) the subjective from the objective, according to which the Highest Good is sometimes apprehended as a condition of man (Epicurean pleasure, or stoic callousness) or a product of the activity of mankind, as the aim of the race; 3) but this leads to the opposition between the systems of pleasure and activity, according to which the Highest Good is found either in enjoyment or in the results of moral action, whether in or beyond the subject; 4) finally the activity may be regarded as mainly theoretical (Spinoza, Hegel) or as mainly practical (Kant, Fichte).—In Christian theology the Highest Good is the Kingdom of God which comprehends the individual and the general, the theocratic and practical sides, moral activity with its products, activity and enjoyment, way and end. The way is that all together, and each one singly promote the coming of this Kingdom; the end is, that this Kingdom come to them, as the Kingdom of heaven—to the individual as salvation, to mankind as a whole, that God may be all in all.—(See SCHLEIERMACHER, Ethische Abh. (phil. Nachl. II., 12, 13, Kritik d. bish. Sittenl., Ethik von TWISTEN; HEGEL, Gesch. d. Philos. II.). C. BECK.*

Gorgias one of the three generals whom Lysias sent with 40,000 foot, and 7000 horse, against Judea; the other two were Nicanor and Ptolemy. The order in which these are named in 1 and 2 Macc. indicates G.'s inferiority (1 Macc. 3 : 31, &c.; 4 : 1; 2 Macc. 8 : 8, &c.; 12 : 23, &c.). As Judas Macc. lay, with a small force, S. E. of the enemy, Gorgias planned a night attack upon him with 6000 picked men. But Judas Macc. informed of the scheme, quit the place, and fell so unexpectedly and vigorously on the main body of the foe, that they fled south and west. When Gorgias returned and saw his army routed and his encampment in flames, his corps was driven in dismay to the coasts of Philistine (1 Macc. 4 : 1-25). But two years later G. gained a decided victory over the Jews (1 Macc. 5 : 55-60). At Marisa, also, he slew some over zealous priests (1 Macc. 5 : 67; cf. 2 Macc. 12 : 1, &c., which is a different version of the same events).—(See WERNSDORF, de fide Maccab., p. 114, sq. WINER'S Lexicon. EWALD, Jesch. Isr. III., 2, p. 361, Anm. 1. But WELTE K. Lex.) contends that they are narratives of two distinct events). DR. PRESSEL.*

Görres, John Joseph, born Jan. 25, 1776, at Loblentz. Carried away by the political excitement of his day, he established, 1798, under Jacobite auspices, a journal called das "Rothe Blatt." His visit to France—whither he was sent, Nov. 1799, as a member of a deputation whose object was to hand in complaints touching the cruelties practised by the French troops on the Rhine, and, if circumstances favored, to effect a union between the country on its left bank and France,—having convinced him that the liberty of the French revolution was a military despotism, he declared to his companions that his conscience would not allow him to favor any such union. On his return, he published his "Resultat meiner Sendung nach Paris." Having now studied medicine he married, 1801, Catharine of Lassaulx, became Professor of Physics in his native city, and devoted himself to Philos. and Natural Sciences. His Exposition of Physiology, 1805; his aphorisms on art, 1802; his treatise on faith and knowledge, 1805, attracted attention. He went to Heidelberg, 1806, where he delivered lectures on Physics, published, in connection with Brentano, and Achim. Arnim, the "Einsiedlerzeitung," returned to Loblentz in 1808, and published his Mythengesch. der asiatischen Welt (Heidelberg, 1810), and his Einleitung zum Lohengrin, 1813. The war for freedom induced him to issue the Rhine Mercury, the first number of which appeared Jan. 23d, 1814. In point of strength of language, national spirit, and influence, it never had a rival. He won back for his country the Gallicized province of the Rhine, and upreared the old standard of the German empire. The paper was suppressed, Jan. 3, 1816, by the Prussian government. His treatise on Germany, in which he expressed the idea of a restoration of German Imperialism, occasioned his departure from Prussia, and that on Germany and the revolution, 1819, caused his flight to Strasburg, in order to escape imprisonment. In his exile he wrote a larger work on Europe and the revolution: Stuttgart, 1821; and a smaller one on the Congress of Verona: Stuttgart, 1822; and a "Sachen der Rheinprovinzen u. eigener An- gelegenheit:" Stuttgart, 1822. The main idea of all these works was, that as the new order of things established subsequent to the fall of Napoleon, was not based on truth and justice, it could not stand, but would be succeeded by another revolution. Whilst in Strasburg his views approached more and more the theocratic standpoint; he wrote on the Cologne Cathedral, St. Francis, a characteristic of Suso, and edited for some time "der Katholik." Having urged upon King Louis of Bavaria, 1825, the necessity of protecting the interests of the Cath. Church, he was made Prof. of Hist. in the newly-established University of Munich. Here, 1830, he wrote "Ueber die Grundlage, Gliederung u. Zeitensfolge der Welt-Gesch.," in which he dwelt on the providential element of history, and affirmed creation to be a type of the course of history. His work "Ueber die christliche Mystik," 4 vols.: Regensburg, 1836-42, proves that he had now found his spiritual home in the Mediæval Catholicism. His Athanasius, 1837, created great excitement in the Catholic world. In 1838, he published "Die Triarier Leo, Marheinecke, and Bruno Bauer," and gave the first impulse to the Historico-Political papers. The interests of the Cath. Church he again vindicated in his "Kirche u. Staat nach Ablauf der Kölner Irrung:" Weissenburg, 1842; and Wallfahrt nach Trier: Regensburg, 1845. Touching the building of the Cologne Cathedral, he wrote "Der Kölner Dom u. der Strassburger Münster:" Regensb., 1842. Towards the close of his life, he composed two erudite essays for the Academy of Sciences: Ueber die Japhediten u. ihre gemeinsame Heimath Armenien, u. die drei Grundwurzeln des celtischen Stammes in Gallien. Worthy of notice as an expression of his view of history, are the six hist. lectures published in the historico-political papers: Jahrg., 1851, Bd., 28, and a survey of hist. from Christ to the Reformation. The catastrophe subsequent upon the fall of Abel's Ministerium, saddened his soul, dire presentiments beclouded his last days, and he predicted that, before the expiration of five years, a revolution would break out. Died Jan. 27th, 1848.

For G.'s biog., see three sections of his life by his son in the historico-political papers, 1831, vol. 27; I. His Childhood; II. His Education; III. Revolutions of the age, and his own studies. Deutsche Vierteljahrsschr., 1848, Heft 2, p. 126. Der Rheinische Antiquarius. I. Abthlg. Bd. II., pp. 433-509. KLÜPFEL.—Ermentrout.

Goshen, a district in Egypt which was assigned at the request of Joseph to the family of Jacob, and was occupied by his posterity until their departure to Canaan (Gen. 45 : 10, &c.). Its precise locality is not mentioned, but several hints point to the country on the E. side of the Nile, between its Pelusiac branch and Arabia Petra, and stretching S. to Heliopolis, in the present province of Sharkiyeh (see Merasid. I., 330; Muschtar. 149; de Sacy Abdollat., 396, 706; Quatremère Recherches, &c., 183). For: 1) Goshen appears to be on the border towards Palestine (Exod. 13 : 17; cf. Gen. 46 : 28, 29). The assignment of it to the Israelites, because shepherds were an abomination to the Egyptians (Gen. 36 : 34) implies that it was a border district, where the Israelites might live apart from the Egyptians. 2) Neither on their arrival nor departure from Egypt, is any mention made of the Israelites having crossed the Nile. 3) At their departure they have but a short march from Rameses to the Red Sea (Ex. 13 : 20 ; 14 ; Numbers 33 : 6, &c.). 4) The LXX has, Gen. 45 : 10, Γεσὴν Ἀραβίας, which implies a district of Egypt which might be reckoned with Arabia. Ptol., VI., 8, calls it νόμος Ἀραβίας, and Plin., V., 9, Arab. nomus. This is also implied in the LXX translation of "towards Goshen," Gen. 46 : 28, 29, by πρὸς Ἡρώων πόλιν, adding in v. 28, εἰς γῆν Παρισσοῦ. Heroopolis, where Manetho locates the Hyskos (Jos. c. Apion. I., 26. Cf. CHAMPOLL. l'Égypt. II., 87, sqq.) lay, according to Strabo (XVI., 4, 2 ; XVII., 3, 20, p. 552), and Pliny (VII., 33) between the Nile and Red Sea. Saadia and Abn-Said translate Goshen by Sadîr, a region on the way from Palestine to Egypt. (See Merasid., II., 19 ; Muschtar. p. 242). According to Gen. 45 : 10, Goshen must have been near the royal city, Memphis, or more probably Zoan or Tanis (see HENGSTENB., Moses and the Egyptians, 41 ; ROBINSON, I., 52). In either case the locality we have assumed would be confirmed. But G. must have extended to the Nile, or even beyond it ; for the Israelites seem to have always lived among, or beside the Egyptians (cf. Ex. 2 : 3, 5, 8). In Ex. 8 : 26, &c., Moses asked leave to accompany his people three days into the wilderness ; in 11 : 2 ; 12 : 35, 36, the Israelites borrowed from the Egyptians ; in 12 : 22, 23, they sprinkled their door-posts in order to be distinguished from their neighbors ; and in Numbers 11 : 5, the fish were doubtless such as they themselves caught. Ex. 16 : 3 (cf. Numbers 20 : 5), doubtless points to the fertile valley of the Nile. With this must be taken the excellence of the land (Gen. 45 : 18, 20, &c.), which could hardly apply to its mere relative value for grazing. All this applies fully to Sharkiyeh (see ROBINSON, l. c.). In Gen. 47 : 11, the land of Rameses in part parallel with Goshen (cf. LXX. Gen. 46 : 28 ; Judith 1 : 9), because R. was the capital of the district. This Rameses is one of the treasure cities (Ex. 1 : 11) ; that it was the capital follows from Ex. 12 : 37 ; Numb. 33 : 3. Its locality is uncertain. Jablonski (Opusc. II., 135, &c.) thinks it was Heliopolis, against LXX. Ex. 1 : 11. D'Anville, Hengstenberg, and others, suppose it identical with Heroopolis. But this view rests upon a misapprehension of LXX., Gen. 46 : 28. H. is more probably the Bual-zephon of Ex. 14 : 2, 9 ; Numb. 33 : 7 (see GESSEN., Thesaur., 1297). It was most probably situated in the centre of Goshen, between Heliopolis and Heroopolis (see TUCH, Genesis, 537). Pithon is probably the Πάτουμος of Herod. II., 158, on the canal between Bubastis and the Arabian Sea (in Steph. Byzant., 227, 24, ed. Westerm., Πάτουμος Πόλις Ἀραβίας ; comp. above the Γεσὴν Ἀραβ. of the LXX. Gen. 45 : 10). This corresponds with Strabo's ἡ Φιδωνος (according to Larcher on Herod. instead of Φιλωνος) πόλη, XVII., 3, 20, p. 552. In Itinerar. Antonin., p. 163, 170, it is called Thoum (Θοῦμ, or Θου) between Babylon, and Heroopolis.—(See, besides the chief Lexicons—MICHAEL-LIS, Suppl., 371–81. TUCH, l. c. KNOBEL, d. Genesis, 302. HENGSTENB., l. c. ROBINSON, l. c.) 2) Goshen is also the name of a city and district in the mountainous part of Judah (Josh. 10 : 41 ; 11 : 16 ; 15 : 51). ARNOLD.*

Goths, the, are found in the 3d cent., A. D., in the countries of the lower Danube, the former seats of the Getæ. In fact, the two names, as has been shown by J. GRIMM (Gesch. d. deutsch. Sprache, 2 vols., 2d ed. : Lpz., 1853), designate but one and the same nation. We thus obtain important information concerning the religion of the Goths at a time when, until lately, it was involved in obscurity ; and of their deeply rooted predisposition to Christianity. The powerful confederacy of the Getæ founded by Boerebistes soon dissolved : but during the reign of Caracalla the different tribes appear again united, now under the common name of Goths. This restored unity inspired them with greater boldness in attacking the Rom. empire, so that the latter already in the reign of Alex. Severus paid them annual tribute to preserve peace. Maximinus, a Gothic warrior, raised himself in the army to the dignity of imperator. The attitude of the Goths became constantly more threatening, and the issue of the struggle with Decius incited them to new irruptions. Commodian, the contemporary Christian apologist, regarded the Goths as the instruments of the divine judgment preceding the appearance of Anti-christ. According to him the seventh persecution of the Christians ended immediately on the approach of the fearful enemy. In the reign of Valerian and Gallienus they again attacked the empire with still greater impetuosity in three large armies ; and destroyed, among other monuments of antiquity, the temple of Diana at Ephesus. The dangers with which the Goths threatened the empire during the 3d and 4th centuries, were removed by Constantine the Great ; who, after a fierce conflict, concluded a peace with them which continued as long as C.'s family reigned. In the reign of Valerian and Gallienus the Goths had carried off some Christian captives, who became the first heralds of the gospel among them. Sozomenus says : "the clergy among the captives healed the sick and cast out devils by calling on the name of Christ, the Son of God ; besides which they overcame all prejudices against the Christian name by the purity of their life and their virtues. The barbarians, filled with admiration of the life and wonderful deeds of these men, saw that it would be well to gain the favor of the Christian God : and when they sought for it, they were instructed, baptized, and formed into congregations." Philostorgius, the Arian historian, gives a similar account of the planting of Christianity among them. During the reign of Constantine, Athanasius could appeal apologetically, to the triumphs of the gospel over the barbarians, especially the Goths, whose barbarism had been exchanged for civilization. When Church historians connect with the conquest of the Goths by Constantine their submission to the cross, they mean only their compact ecclesiastical organization, which was effected at this time. At the Council of Nice, 325, a Gothic bishop, Theophilus, was present, and subscribed

he decrees. The aim of C. was, to connect the dangerous Goths with the empire by ties stronger than treaties, viz.: by a common worship; and the surest means seemed to be to incorporate them with the empire as a Church province with a Bishop of their own. — The further extension of Christianity among the Goths was the work of Ulfilä (see Art.). He labored, especially after he had become Bishop, 48, with great zeal for the conversion of the Goths: for at this time the number of Christians increased so much, that Athanarich, the heathen king of the Visigoths, waged a bloody persecution against them, which induced Ulfilä to cross with a number of Christians into Roman territory, near Nicopolis, in Moesia. Here Ulfilä labored until 388 for the spread of the gospel among the Goths, even those beyond the Danube. He propagated the Arian doctrine as defined by the Synod of Constantinople in 360. The number of Christians beyond the Danube again increased rapidly, and Athanarich waged a new persecution, in which many suffered martyrdom or exile. The Gothic prince caused an idol to be drawn on a car to the houses of the Christians, with the command that the latter should pray and sacrifice to them; on refusal the houses were burned with their inmates. In the church of a village many men, women, and children were burned to death. Men of low state and men of the highest nobility and influence proved the sincerity of their faith by their constancy under the most cruel tortures (Acta SS., Sept. 15). — About the middle of the 4th cent., Eutyches had labored among the Goths beyond the Danube; hence, along with Arian, we find also Catholic Goths. About this time also, Audius, who had separated from the Syrian Church, arrived among the Goths beyond the Danube, and established monasteries for the converts: for by his doctrine of the corporeality of God he could easily gain the yet heathen Goths, since German heathenism invested the gods with the forms of ideal men. In consequence of the separatism natural to the German character, this separatist tendency could be carried out among the Gothic Audians to greater lengths than in the Syrian Church. They refused even to pray with men of unblemished life, if they held communion with the Church. After the persecution of 370 they vanished. — The persecution of the Gothic churches did not cease until domestic disputes arose among the Goths beyond the Danube, and the noble Frithigern, the adversary of Athanarich, protected the Christians. That F. confessed Arianism, may be owing less to a real understanding of his system, than from considerations of the aid and friendship of Valens. His example was perhaps also decisive for many Goths; but this was merely the completion of a work began by Ulfilä. The latter regarded Arianism as more simple, and therefore more primitive and scriptural, than the Nicene doctrine; and he had disseminated it widely among the Goths, to whose theology it bore a striking resemblance. When after 370 the Goths beyond the Danube were accessible to missionary labor, Ulfilä translated the Scriptures into their language. But it was only a few years that Christianity could spread uninterruptedly among the Goths beyond the Danube. The Huns, who were advancing from Asia in countless hordes, crowded first upon the Ostrogoths, whose old heroic King, Hermanrich, was unable to render effectual resistance. The Visigoths took refuge on Rom. territory south of the Danube. The party led by Athanarich turned to the mountains in the north. A field for missions was again opened among those who had followed Frithigern to Thrace, some of whom were still heathens, and others, though confessing Christianity, still practised heathen customs. The oppression practised upon the Goths in Thrace by the Rom. prefects soon stirred up new troubles, and a fierce war for a time interrupted the missions. Frithigern, to whom the chief command of the combined armies of the Visigoths and Ostrogoths had been assigned, sought to come to terms of peace with Valens; but his proposition was rejected. The ensuing battle, 378, ended in favor of the Goths, who now pressed forward to the very gates of Constantinople, and ravaged all the country along the coast. Theodosius, now elected emperor, undertook to drive back the Goths, in which he was no little aided by the death of Frithigern, and the consequent separation of the tribes. In this time of danger Athanarich once more united them, and threatened the emperor; but the latter opened negotiations with the Gothic prince, and a peace was concluded. Athanarich died soon after. The Visigoths now entered the Rom. service as fœderati. They continued without a common leader, and Theodosius took care to attach them to himself by bounties. This relation of Theodosius to the Arian Goths explains why the emperor, though a strict adherent of the Nicene creed, was nevertheless favorable to efforts of union with the Arians; so that, if that creed should not become the universally accepted symbol, there might be a new one on which all might unite. The Council of Constantinople, 383, led to no result in this direction. A new Council, promised to the Arians in 388, was prevented by the Nicene party. Considerable restrictions were also laid upon the Arians on account of an insurrection stirred up by them in the capital during the emperor's absence. — Near the end of the 4th cent., the question, whether God could be called Father even before the Son existed, gave rise to a controversy among the Arians in the capital. The Goths with Selenas, their bishop, successor to Ulfilä from 388, took side with Marinus, who asserted the affirmative. But a new schism arising in the party of Marinus, many Goths, especially priests, separated from him and united with the Catholic Church. Chrysostom was induced by this defection from Arianism to labor among the Goths in order to their reunion with the Catholic Church. He ordained presbyters, deacons, and lectors, who spoke the Gothic language, and gave them a church in the capital. He himself preached frequently for this church. Many were thus gained for Catholicism. Of the zealous efforts of the Catholic Goths at Constantinople to obtain a more accurate and profound understanding of the Scriptures, their correspondence with Jerome (ep. ad Lunniam et Fre-

lam) is a splendid testimony. Chrysostom extended his efforts also to the Pagan Goths along the Danube. These had, indeed, accepted Arian Christianity; but many of them no doubt differed but little from Pagans. Chrysostom also sent Bishop Unila to the Goths in the Crimea, and established an ecclesiastical connection with them. Gothia, along the Cimmerian Bosphorus, continued during the middle ages, a See of the Byzantine C.; and as late as the 18th cent., the Bishop of Capha bore the surname of Gothia. The Catholic Goths in the Crimea, of whom Busbek had accounts in the 16th cent., disappeared with the surname of the Bishop. The Gothi minores near Nicopolis vanished even earlier. In the 16th cent. they still had a Bishop, although a successor of Selinas is mentioned. They seem to have vanished among the nations which, in the 7th cent. invaded the Danubian countries. The two chief Gothic tribes turned to the West. The Visigoths under Alaric took the lead, when after the death of Theodosius their subsidies were refused them. They ravaged the countries south of the Danube past the capital to the Peloponnesus. The Christian Goths spared even less than their Pagan ancestors the temples and altars of the gods, and destroyed with the sword what Christian emperors had been unable to abolish by laws. The sack of Eleusis abolished the famed mysteries of Ceres. Priests and philosophers, the surviving props of Paganism, were cut down. Alaric next threatened Rome, and forced it to pay tribute. This, after the death of Stilicho, being refused, he appeared in 408 before Rome. The city was in the utmost distress. In vain the gods were invoked; Alaric's demands had to be satisfied. In order to this the statues of the gods were melted down, among them the Virtus Romana. Honorius refusing to ratify the treaty made with the Senate, Alaric in 410 again appeared before Rome, which at once surrendered. Attalus, the prefect of the city, after being baptized, was made emperor. But Alaric seeing that Attalus was not only incapable, but that also the Christian God opposed his government, sent the imperial insignia as an overture of peace to Honorius. The latter continuing inflexible, Alaric appeared a third time before Rome. The Christian apologists regard Alaric as a scourge of God to punish the wicked metropolis. Alaric himself declared that he did not march against Rome of his own will; but that some one was constantly urging him: "Arise and destroy the city." But the city was not to be destroyed; the Christian people of Rome were to be awakened to repentance. The barbarians spared the churches and all who had taken refuge in them, whilst they plundered and destroyed the most admirable monuments of Paganism. The destruction of the city by the Goths was the death blow to Roman paganism. Alaric led his army to southern Italy, where he died in the flower of his life. Athaulf, his brother-in-law, became his successor. He opened negotiations with Honorius, and undertook to restore the Roman power in Gaul and Spain. By his marriage with Galla Placidia, daughter of Theodosius the Great, peace seemed to be fully established. The Gothic king, seeing that his people must first be trained to obey laws, renounced his plan of destroying the Roman empire and converting it into a Gothic one; but labored now to reanimate it with Gothic help. Contemporaries regarded the marriage of Athaulf with Placidia as a fulfilment of Dan. 2: 32, etc. The conquest of Spain, continued in the interest of the emperor by Wallia, was rewarded with permanent seats in Gaul, where the Visigoths (see Art.) founded a kingdom of their own. — The Ostrogoths obtained from the Eastern Empire seats in Pannonia. Made strong by union, they soon again threatened both the Eastern and Western Empire. The East bought peace. After the death of Walmir, his brother Widmir led his hordes into Italy, whence he proceeded to Gaul and united with the Visigoths. But the greater part of the Ostrogoths followed Theodoric into the Eastern Empire, where new seats were granted them. The Emperor Zeno subsequently induced them to remove to Italy, whither in 489 Theodoric departed and founded the Ostrogoth kingdom (see Art.). — See Dr. J. ASCHBACH, Gesch. d. W. Gothen: Frankf. a. M., 1827; K. ZEISS, Die Deutschen u. d. Nachb. stämme: Münch., 1837; KRAFFT, K. Gesch. d. Germ. Völk.: Berl., 1854.

KRAFFT. — Reinecke.

Gottschalk. — This theologian, noted in the controversies of the middle ages, was descended from the family of Count Benno. He was placed in youth at the monastery Fulda, but on reaching maturity became weary of the place, and strove to escape. Subsequently he became a zealous advocate of Augustine's doctrine of predestination, and even went beyond this Church Father, in contending for a predestination to death as well as to life. The persistency with which he advocated his extreme views led to his condemnation by a Synod at Mayence, 848, and by one at Chiersy (Carisiacum) 849. He was scourged, and imprisoned for 21 years. So far from recanting, he continued to write in defence of his views. During his last illness absolution was offered to him if he would recant; but he refused. The offices of religion were denied him after his death; his body was buried in unconsecrated ground. Nevertheless there were some who embraced his views, though without adopting their full consequences (see Predestination). Gottschalk and Hinemar had a controversy, also, about the Trinity, G. accusing H. of Sabellianism, and H. denouncing G. as an Arian. — (See MANGUIN, vell. auct., qui saec. IX., de predest. et gratia scrips. opp. et fragm. USHER'S Gottsch. Hist. CELLOT, opp. misc. ad hist. G. GFRÖRER, Unters. ti. Alter, Ursprung, &c., d. Dekr. d. falschen Iddorus: Freib., 1848, p. 67, &c. HAGENBACH.*

Gottschalk, Prince of the Wends, and Martyr. — For centuries the Slavonian or Wend tribes, settled on German soil between the Baltic, Elbe, Oder, and Saale (the Obotrites, &c.), resisted the introduction of Christianity, and the sway of the Germans. Christianity was made doubly hateful to them by Charlemagne's attempt to force it upon them, and their political antipathies were inflamed by their religious hatred. In the 10th cent. Otto I., after the conquest of the Slavonians, established among them the Sees of Havelberg, 946, of Brandenburg, 949, of Meissen, Oldenburg, Merseburg, Zeitz-Naumburg, and the Archb. of Magdeburg, 949. But in 983, already, under Otto II., the Wends rebelled, and with Mistiwoi for their Prince, put an end to the German rule, and Christianity among them. Mistiwoi, subsequently, indeed, again embraced Christianity; his son Otto rebuilt churches, and had his talented son, Gottschalk (his Slavonian name is not known), educated in St. Michael's monastery at Luneburg. But when G. heard that a Saxon had murdered his father (1032), he forsook the monastery and Christianity, to revenge his father. A bloody war, new devastations, new persecutions of the Christians followed, until the Margrave Bernhard, of Lower Saxony, conquered and captured G., who then ardently embraced Christianity again. Set at liberty, G. went to the court of Canute, spent 10 years in Denmark and England, and returned (c. 1043) with the daughter of a Danish King as his wife. He became Prince of the Obotrites, and then by conquest and voluntary submission, the chief of a great Wend empire. Then he made zealous efforts to Christianize his people, earnestly beseeching them to be baptized. Missionaries were called in. The aid of Archb. Adalbert, of Bremen-Hamburg, was sought. By his assistance G. established two more Sees, Razeburg and Mecklenburg, and monasteries in Lentzen, Oldenburg, Rezeburg, Lübeck, Mecklenburg. G. himself preached, and translated the liturgical forms and the sermons of the German missionaries. — Many were converted, churches were built and adorned, priests multiplied, and schools founded. But a new insurrection broke out under Kruko, Prince of the Rugians, and Pruaso (Blussu) G.'s brother-in-law. On June 7, 1066, G. was murdered, and with him his old teacher, Abbot Eppo (Yppo), at the altar. A general insurrection of the Slavi followed. All Christian institutions were destroyed, and Christians, especially the clergy, were put to death. For ten years Christianity was extinct. In 1105–27, G.'s son, Henry, who, with his mother, had fled to Denmark, restored the Obotrite kingdom, and Christianity in part; but the work of Christianizing and Germanizing those regions was not completed until Albrecht, the Bear (1133), and Henry, the Lion (1142–62), wholly subdued the Wends. The Wend Prince, Niklot, Henry's cotemporary, was, probably, a grandson of the martyred G., who, therefore, was the primogenitor of the house of Mecklenburg. — (See ADAM, Bremen hist. eccl. HELMOLD, Chron. Slav. SPIEKER, K.-u. Ref. Gesch. d. Mark Brandenb.: Berlin, 1839. WIGGER's K.-gesch. Mecklenb.: Parchim, 1840. GIESEBRECHT, Wend. Gesch.: Berlin, 1843. Piper's evang. Kal., 1856, 172, &c.).

WAGENMANN.*

Goudimel, Claude, distinguished for his contributions to the Church music and poetry, was born during the 1st quarter of the 16th cent. in Franche-Comté. His chief work was the composition of music for four voices, to Marot's and Beza's version of the Psalms. Some of these tunes are still used in the Ref. churches of France, Germany, and Switzerland. His other compositions are preserved as Chansons spirituelles, and in the Fleur de Chansons des deux plus excellents musiciens de notre temps (Orlando Lasso, and C. Goudimel). He perished as a Huguenot on St. Bartholomew's eve, at Lyons.

GRÜNEISEN.*

Gozan is mentioned, 2 Kings 19: 12; Isa. 37: 12, along with Haran, Rezep, and Eden, as a country of Mesopotamia subdued by the Assyrians. In Isa. 10: 9, Carchemish is named instead of Gozan, so that it was probably the capital of the district. Ptol., V. 18, mentions Γαζαρίτις as situated between the Chaboras and Caocoras. Shalmaneser led the ten tribes into exile, and located them in Halah, on the Habor, the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes (2 Kings 17: 6; 18: 11. The distinction made between the Habor and the river of Gozan, in 1 Chron. 5: 26, is doubtless an error of the copyists). Various opinions exist about "Habor, the river of G.," some think it identical with the Chebar of Ezekiel (1: 3, &c.), the Chaboras of the Greeks. Then Gozan would be the Γαζαρίτις of Ptol., and the locality of the first exile under the Assyrians would be the same as that of the second under the Chaldeans (Gesenius, Winer, Hitzig, Knobel, Ritter). Others hold that Chebor is the Chaboras, but the Hobar to be an eastern tributary of the Tigris (MERASID., I., 333. Schultens [Ind. geogr.] C. B. Michaelis, Rosenmüller). Others, as Bochart, consider Habor the mountain dividing Assyria from Armenia, the γαζάριας of Ptol., VI., 1, 1. Then Gozan, like Γαζαρία in Ptol., VI., 2, 10, would be taken for a city of Media; but this places it too near the Caspian sea for the Bible notices of it. Gozan must, therefore, be the district through which the Habor passes. Jewish tradition also locates the exile there (see Zeitschr. d. Deutsch-Morgenl. Gesellsch., 1851, 467–82).

ARNOLD.*

Grace. — The grace (gratia, χάρις, ἡ χάρις) of God is the basis, the distinguishing feature, and the essential form of the Christian religion; the idea of it runs through its entire system of doctrines. First it appears in the theological branch, as, in a measure, the crown of God's attributes. It concludes the anthropological branch as the decree of salvation, and the founding of the plan of redemption. In christology it comes forth as the leading characteristic of completed revelation, of Christ and his soteriological work. In Pneumatology it constitutes the order of reconciliation and the kingdom of grace; and it culminates in Eschatology as redemption completed in the bestowal of the reward of grace. — Grace as an attribute of God. God is gracious in hearing prayer (Ex. 22: 27), in staying his wrath (32: 12), in exercising free mercy (33: 19), in showing pity and long-suffering (34: 6), and in causing the light of his countenance to rest upon the just (Numb. 6: 25). His grace accompanies the revelation of himself (Deut. 33: 16). In the Old Test. it is often joined with truth (Ps. 98: 3; 108: 5, &c.); also with justice and the judgment (Hosea 2: 19). In the New Test. St. John (1: 14) describes the revelation in Christ as one of grace and truth; whilst Paul and John call the ground-thought of Christianity, Grace (John 1 : 16 ; Rom. 3 : 24 ; cf. 1 Peter 1 : 13). In Rom. 3 : 24 the nature and operation of grace are stated. Earlier theologians sometimes associated Grace with the love of God, sometimes with his goodness. Calov. and Hollaz describe it as: amor Dei gratuitus, quo complectitur creaturas omnes; Ammon as, bonitatis continuatio erga indignos. But older theologians also describe gratia as, in a wider sense, benignitas. Bretschneider, following Reinhard, teaches that "the goodness of God has different names in the Bible, according to what it refers to: a) Grace (Matt. 5 : 45 ; Rom. 11 : 35 ; Eph. 2 : 5, 8) so far as God bestows all benefits without merit, or in a narrower sense continues them even to the unworthy. b) Mercy, when the miserable and unfortunate are helped (Ps. 25 : 2, &c.). c) Long-suffering, when punishment is delayed to afford sinners time to repent. d) Pity when the severity of the punishment is softened." In some modern theologians Grace is hardly (Marheineke) or nowhere (Martensen) treated as an attribute of God. Schleiermacher calls Grace the power of the divine consciousness in the soul (§ 80); Marheineke: the manifestation of God's goodness towards human unworthiness.

The true nature of Grace must be more clearly determined according to the Scriptures. Primarily we distinguish those attributes of God which refer to the world in general from those referring to individuals, and then note especially those which arise from God's relation to men as sinners (see Lange's posit. Dogm., p. 60, &c.). In the first case the benevolence of God is universal goodness; in the second, love; in the third grace, as the absolute working of the benevolence of God, in removing the guilt of the sinner. Grace is essentially redemptive from sin (Rom. 3 : 4).—It may, indeed, be asked how grace can be an eternal attribute of God, if man's sin first called it into exercise? But the Bible teaches that it was eternally active as the purpose (εὐδοκία) and election (προϋποθέσις) of grace. In this view it is to be regarded as the eternal reciprocal activity of the love and justice of God. For in the operations of grace both these appear. God is to the sinner first a hidden, then a jealous, then a gracious Being. In the first case love is concealed in justice; in the second justice prepares the way for love; in the third justice is revealed as saving, regenerating love, as justifying righteousness. Hence grace does not stand in negation to wrath, but in harmony with it, as the Gospel to the Law. But the relation of mercy to grace, is like that of goodness to love. And both not merely remove but overrule evil for good; grace transmutes guilt into saving righteousness, mercy makes death the destruction of death.—Grace contemplated as love, is more than an attribute of God, it is the substance and soul of revelation itself. The eternal activity of God in relation to the world is called in the Scriptures (Eph. 1) mainly a purpose, an election, a covenant, of grace. Under the first older theologians distinguish: 1) decretum prædestinationis, God's purpose to save men (in a narrower or wider sense) through Christ; 2) decr. gratiæ in a narrower sense, God's purpose to make sinful men able to believe; 3) decr. justificationis, God's purpose to justify those who believe in Christ. But the purpose of justification is involved, already, in that of election; so that of grace. According to Rom. 8 : 29, &c., two divine purposes (and acts) precede calling and justification, viz., election and predestination. God first destines a man to be in Christ, i.e., defines his personality in its eternal relation to Christ as the centre of salvation; only after this can the destination of his temporal allotment, and his entrance into the kingdom of grace come into view (Lange's posit. Dogm., 950, &c.). But if the purpose of grace is taken in its most general sense, everything in the scheme of redemption must be referred to it. In this sense the purpose of God is his eternal will, relatively to the entire plan of the world (see Hahn, Lehrb. d. chr. Glaubens, 197).

Underlying God's decree of grace is the idea that his power surpasses and overcomes man's resistance, not in the form of necessity, but of free love (Rom. 5 : 20, 21). In this view Revelation after the Fall appears as a kingdom of grace, through the covenant of grace. The doctrine of such a covenant of grace has been developed mainly by Reformed theologians, as Cocceius (Summa doctr. de fœd. et testam. Dei: Lugdun. Bat., 1648). He distinguishes between the covenant of works in man's innocence, and that of grace introduced after the fall. The same division, in a modern sense, underlies Schleiermacher's system, and those of others after him. Even Cloggenburg had adopted this distinction before Cocceius (Hahn, p. 83).

In Christ the purpose of grace, which lies at the basis of the Old Test. covenant economy, and even of the law (Gal. 3 : 15) appears in its perfected realization (Tit. 2 : 11 ; 3 : 4). The glory of the only-begotten manifests itself in grace and truth (John 1 : 17). The truth in Christ is revelation completed, or the ideal side of the incarnation; grace is Redemption completed, or the ethic side of the incarnation. Hence the grace of God in Christ is also the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ (2 Cor. 8 : 9), who is essentially grace, as the atonement, the mercy-seat (Rom. 3 : 25). Hence, also, his life is a continuous pouring forth of grace, and power.—This doctrine of grace, therefore, comes first fully into view when we treat of the subjective appropriation of salvation by the Holy Ghost. The Holy Ghost (see Art.) is so much the agent of salvation, and the principle of life in grace, that he has been designated gratia applicatrix (see Schweizer, Glaubensl. d. ev. ref. K., II. 443.—Grace, means of). The gracious operations of the Holy Ghost include, for man's apprehension, all the divine workings of grace. Gratia dei in univrsam, too often confounded with goodness, is distinguished from gratia salutaris, specific grace; and this may be gratia affectiva or beneficentia Dei, and affectiva or beneficentia dei. Gratia effectiva, again, may be general, as in the universal revelation of God in nature and the reason, or special as in the Gospel. Such special grace may be præcurrens, præveniens; operans, convertens; and cooperans (conservans, inhabitans).—The order of the saving operations of grace is (Rom. 8): election, redemption, calling, justification, glorification. These manifest themselves in corresponding states in the subject; from election results the susceptibility for salvation; predestination ranges the allotments of man's life; calling operates conversion, justification, faith; glorification, sanctification. From the combined operation of all these, result man's religious destiny, the pilgrimage, prayer, adoption or peace, and love or godliness. As grace, in its very nature, the victory of divine love over man's opposition, there is no point at which it operates statistically; but none, either, at which it is not the predominant creative life-element, none at which soliciting divine influences do not unite with corresponding human activities.

For the various opinions touching the relation of divine grace to the human will, see Winer's comp. Darstellung, p. 80. The Protestant C. disputes a synergism before conversion, whilst Rom. Catholics, Armenians, and Socinians allow passive synergism. Protestantism seems even not to admit of a synergism in conversion, especially not that the sinner can do good works. It does, however, allow that man may possess iustitia civilis, and this may make a proper use of the means of grace. The more rigid Reformed hold to irresistible grace in the elect, whilst Lutherans maintain that man must be wholly passive. This view has often been proven inadequate (Schenkel's Unionsberuf d. v. Prot., 372, &c.).—After conversion Reformed theologians admit an active co-operation of the regenerated (Conf. Helv., II., IX. So the Lutherans—Winer, 107).—The grace of God in Christ has established a regnum gratiæ, placed between the regnum potentiæ and r. gloriæ. This is the Church itself, in its divine character, as Christ reigns in it by his word and Spirit. Connected with this idea is that of a season of grace, in a wider and narrower sense. The time of grace for the world is limited by the final judgment; but how with that of each individual? Quakers speak of a day of visitation (Winer, 87). The Protestant view is by no means fixed by the denial of a purgatory, and the assumption of a purgatory involves only a seemingly more liberal view, since it relieves believers alone, or applies to such as, according to the Protestant dogma, are included in a general pardon. The Bible limits each one's day of grace by his self-hardening. The death of the impenitent may also be considered a judgment for them, though not to the exclusion of the final judgment. But the end of grace is the perfection of man; his transformation into a child of God, after the image of Christ, in the kingdom of heaven. If the reward there bestowed on him, is called the reward of grace, it must not be identified with justification; this rests on faith alone, that on the works of faith. But it must be understood that the believer obtains this reward on the basis of grace, through the means and Spirit of grace, and from the hand of grace. LANGE.*

Grace, Means of.—In this article we shall only consider the means of grace in general, their idea and contents, then their value and necessity, or their relation to divine grace and the salvation of man, and finally their efficacy and conditions. Evangelical Protestantism teaches, that the ordinary means of grace are only the word of God and the sacraments by Christ.

The starting point for this doctrine is contained in the 5th Art. of the Augsburg Confession. Grace, in the form of justification by faith, is presupposed. The ministry was instituted to preach the gospel and administer the sacraments, in order to produce this faith. "Nam per verbum et sacramenta, tamquam per instrumenta donatur Spiritus sanctus, qui fidem afficit, ubi et quando visum est deo in iis, qui audiunt Evangelium," etc.—This definition is connected with this addition: "damnant Anabaptistas et alios, qui sentiunt, spiritum sanctum contingere sine verbo externo hominibus per ipsorum præparationes ad opera." The Heidelberg Catechism gives the same definition, Question 65: "Whence does this (saving) faith proceed? From the Holy Ghost, who works faith in our hearts by the preaching of the gospel, and confirms it by the use of the sacraments." (For the other most important passages of the symbolical book, see Apolog. IV., p. 153; Art. Smalc. Pars., II., 2, 8; Catechism. maj. Præceptum, III., p. 426; Symbol. Apost., p. 502; Formul. conc. Epitome: de lib. arbitr. Negativa VI., Solid. decl., pp. 655, 669, 828; Conf. Helv., II., c. I.; Conf. Gall., art. 25, 35; Conf. Belg., art. 24).—The connection between word and sacrament, consequently the idea of the means of grace, is not so clearly defined by Reformed as by Lutheran theology. The latter always connects word and sacrament, not so the former. The Conf. Helv. treats of the Word of God in chap. 1, of the sacraments chap. 19. The reason of this is, that the Holy Scriptures as the Word of God was to be the beginning of the system. It does, however, at another place, combine them together: prædicationi verbi sui adjunxit deus mox ab initio in ecclesia sua sacramenta, vel signa sacramentalia. We have seen how the Heidelberg Catechism combines the two. The unity of the idea, means of grace, is not regarded by evangelical theology as a formal, human, theological connexion of the Word of God, Baptism and the Lord's Supper, but as the sequence of a divine fact, of the founding of the Church and of the ministry. The means of grace are not merely discursive possessions of the Church, but they constitute inalienable fundamental characteristics of the Church itself, which are mutually related. The Church is called into life by the Word of God, it becomes visible as a congregation of believers, by Baptism and the Lord's Supper (Conf. Aug., Art. VII.). The unity of the means of grace, briefly expressed, consists in this, that they constitute the real Church as the organ for the mediation of grace, of the Holy Spirit for the world needing salvation. The internal side of their unity is the grace, which they mediate, the external side is the ministerium, the office instituted by Christ, which has to administer them.

This brings us to the value and necessity of the means of grace, or to the doctrines of the Evangelical Church on these points in opposition to the Rom. Catholic doctrines on the one hand, and the views of Protestant sects on the other. The first point of difference exists in the different view concerning the bearer of the means of grace, of the spiritual office. Both parties regard the ministry as of divine institution, but, according to the Protestants, a ministerium, which can be regarded as a constant Christian activity of the Church in word and sacrament, according to the Rom. Catholics the sacerdotium, which, as the proper, fundamental mean of grace, itself creatively increases the means of grace, according to the features of apostolic tradition (Dieringer, Lehrbuch der Kath. Dogmatik, p. 512). Even if the sacerdotium is regarded as conditioned by the Scriptures and by tradition, it still appears again as an element of tradition, and obtains, in this position, creative superiority over the means of grace. The power to lessen them has sufficiently manifested itself in the prohibition of the Bible, the withdrawal of the cup, and similar things; the power to increase them in ecclesiastical legislation, and in the multiplication of the sacraments; the power to modify them, in the relation of the doctrines of the Church to the Scriptures, in the doctrine of the sacrifice of the mass and others. The Protestant doctrine concerning the means of grace is related, in the first place, to the Rom. Catholic negatively, in that it substitutes the ministerium in the stead of the sacerdotium. Then in the way and manner in which it fixes the organism of the means of grace. Here it is, first the word which mediates grace, then the sacrament, there the sacrament first, then the word in an accessory way. See "Inwiefern den Katholiken die Sakramente mehr gelten als das Wort," Nitzsch in den Studien, 1834, IV., 851." (A Protestant reply, &c., p. 149); also Schenkel, der Unionsberuf des ev. Protestantismus, p. 139. — As to the Word of God, it is, for Protestants, contained purely in the Holy Scriptures, as explained and applied by the preaching of the gospel, whilst Rom. Catholicism understands by it simply the prædicatio verbi (Winer, p. 115). Compare the Arts. on the Word of God and on the Sacraments. The third difference between Prot. and Rom. Cath. appears in the way and manner in which the means of grace themselves are determined in relation to grace and to salvation. According to Concil. Trident. Sess. 7, the sacraments act ex opere operato; the Conf. Aug. (Art. XIII.) rejects this doctrine. As to the true meaning of the opus operatum consult Bellarmin, Sacr. II., 1, according to whom, the objective and active effect of the sacrament is meant by it, which is to be received in a purely passive way.

Against the Rom. Cath. doctrine the Evangelical Church maintains the distinction between grace and the means of grace; against separatists, the appointed and legitimate connection between the two. We must, however, distinguish such separatists who generally reject the necessity and order of the means of grace, and such as find them alone in the Word of God, and not in the sacraments. The former were represented, at the time of the Reformation, by the Anabaptists, and the definitions of the symbolical books are made against these; later they are represented by the Quakers. They are of the opinion, "that the Holy Spirit, without the Word, immediately enlightens every man (on his appointed day of visitation), and he becomes hereby first able to understand the Word of God" (Barclay, Apol. thes., 7, 3. Winer, p. 86). It would, however, be doing injustice both to the Quaker and to the Anabaptist, to suppose that he altogether rejected the idea of the means of grace. The Quaker especially is distinguished for diligent use of the Scriptures. However, he will not acknowledge any divinely appointed specific means of grace in the Church. Socinians and Mennonites, on the other hand, regard the Scriptures as an objective means of grace in a limited sense, whilst the former see mere signs of the Christian confession (cerimoniae) in the sacraments, the latter, at all events, regard them also as objective signs of the effect of grace, working in the soul of the believer (Ris, Conf. Art. 30; comp. Winer, p. 122, sq.). In the latter case, the objective seal is also wanting. This, however, is accepted by the Armenians, Conf. Remonstrant., 23, 1. It is proper here to remember the restoration-doctrine of the Anabaptists, the doctrine of the Quakers concerning the general government of the Spirit of revelation (deus spiritus revelatione se ipsum semper filiis hominum patefacit; Barclay, Apol. Theol., II.), and the Socinian view of an extraordinary influence of the Spirit upon single individuals together with his ordinary influence through the gospel (Ostorodt, Unterricht K., 34). The Protestant Church possesses, in the doctrine of gratia præveniens, a theory upon which it can acknowledge the limited correctness of the latter views, and nevertheless still hold fast continually to the necessity of the means of grace. The sphere of gratia præveniens extends, even according to the Scriptures, beyond the circle of theocratic revelation. The Spirit dwells where he will, the Logos shines into all human souls; the gratia præveniens is active in all receptive souls. But those thus prepared first attain to experience of salvation only within the circle of revelation, to certainly of salvation first through the appointed means of grace. From this view of the necessity of the means of grace, the difference between the Lutheran and Reformed doctrine concerning the means of grace, must appear, so far as such difference really exists. The possibility of the enlightenment of single individuals within the Church, sine externo ministerio, is acknowledged by the Conf. Helv., II., cap. 1. The article, however, declares it to be the divine plan, that enlightenment is mediated by the usitata ratio instituendi homines. The prædicatio dei verbi is more strongly emphasized as necessary, to which then must be added the interna spiritus illuminatio and the theocratic or ecclesiastical sphere seems to be presupposed in every case. The necessity, however, is defined as a necessitas præcepti, non absoluta, i. e. God, in saving man, is not bound to this mediation, as is shown by prophecy and revelation, but, in condescension to the weakness of our nature, he has appointed these means (Schweizer, die Glaubenslehre der ev. ref. Kirche II., p. 561). Luther, on the contrary, "even refers the inspiration of the prophets to the verbum vocale" (Art. Smalk., p. 333). A second

ference is, that, in Lutheran theology, word and sacrament are more closely connected with each other, and that Reformed theology, on the contrary, emphasizes the value of the word of God as the causa instrumentalis (see Ebrard, Christliche Dogmatik, p. 578). In this connection is to be considered also more particularly, the connection between grace and the means of grace. Lutheran theology most evidently teaches a more decided self-limitation of the Holy Spirit through the means, the Reformed a free administration of the same beyond the means, the former an organic interpenetration of grace and the means of grace, which, however, does not extend to identity, the latter an economic connection, which, however, excludes irregularity and contingency. As regards the Word of God, its efficacia is more strongly affirmed by Lutheran theology, and Calovius and Quenstedt speak of an unio mystica gratiæ sive virtutis divinæ cum verbo (Hahn, Lehrbuch, p. 549). The connection of the Spirit with the word, is, according to the Reformed, conditioned by the circle of the elect within the circle of the non-elect, therefore it is represented in the predestinarian confessions as simultaneity, whilst the Heidelberg Catechism gives prominence to the interpenetration of both: the Holy Spirit works faith in our hearts by the preaching of the gospel. The difference becomes still greater in the doctrine concerning the sacraments, which we will not anticipate here. According to Nitzsch the unity of the confessional differences on this point lies in the idea of the pignus (System, 168; comp. also Winer, p. 121, the note). We will only remark yet, that the necessity of baptism is not so strongly urged by the Reformed as by the Lutherans. The Confessio Scotica, p. 127, rejects with horror the Rom. Cath. dogma, that unbaptized children as such are lost. Also Calvin, instit., IV. 16, 26. As regards the change effected by baptism in relation to regeneration, the 27th Art. of the Conf. Anglio. rightly understood is an irenical type: baptism is signum regenerationis, per quod recte baptismum suscipiunt ecclesiis inseruntur. That is, ecclesiastical, social regeneration is effected, individual spiritual regeneration is thereby made perceptible to the senses and sacramentally guaranteed. Concerning the Lord's Supper compare the Article.

With reference, finally, to the effect and the conditions of the means of grace, the above-mentioned differences of the various confessions appear again. Whilst the Evangelical Church teaches, that the sacraments act savingly, upon the condition of faith (for even infant baptism presupposes faith in some form), to confirm and perfect faith, the Roman Catholic Church teaches that the sacraments are real factors of faith, which presuppose nothing but faith in authority, and can be made inefficient only by mortal sins.

Finally, the proper dogmatic idea of the means of grace is yet to be stated. They represent, without doubt, the eternal presence of Christ in the congregation, or the ideal Church, which exists for the real Church, and through it for the world. Christ unites himself with his institutions in the Holy Spirit, and gives his salvation to the world in eternal presentiality. But especially is the Word of God the Church, which proceeds from Christ. The sacraments then constitute the realization of the Church; baptism, the Church coming into existence; the Lord's Supper, the Church coming to clear manifestation in the celebration of its faith. Word and sacrament are thereby indissolubly connected together: the word is fully realized and sealed in the sacrament, the sacrament finds its light and life in the creative effect of the word. If the means of grace in union with the Holy Spirit, prove the entire saving power of Christ's life to be appropriations of salvation, then they are, according to their nature, as much conditioned by faith, as Christ conditioned his personal presence on earth by faith. He demands a perfect faith beforehand just as little as he constrains to faith. To him that asketh shall be given.

LANGE.—Beck.

Gradual—in the mass—is chiefly some verses of a Psalm, or other Scripture, sung between the Epistle and Gospel. Formerly it was called Antiphonarium, responsorium, cantus resp., Responsum (Ord. Rom., I. n. 10), and Psalmus resp. (Greg. of Tours), because sung by the precentor and choir. Its present more exclusive sense is derived from the elevation (gradibus, the Ambon, choir, altar) on which it was sung. It is now sung whilst the deacon, having read the Epistle, still occupies the steps of the altar, or ascends them to chant the Gospel. During Lent, when hallelujahs are forbidden, the choir sings the tractus instead of the Gradual. In Augustine's time in Africa a whole Psalm, and at Antioch one after each of the three lessons, was sung; the Gradual, whose author is unknown, was adopted in the place of this custom. Ambrose and Gregory M. are mentioned as composers of the Graduals, and Celestine I. is said to have ordered them to be sung at Mass.

K. SUDHOFF.*

Grâl, St.—The legend of the sacred Grâl, in its origin from Pagan, Moorish, Christian, orthodox, heretical, Nestorian, and Gnostic elements, its successive development and transformations in different ages and countries, as also its substance and meaning, is of more than generally acknowledged importance for the history of the Christian Church and doctrine. The first tidings of it seem to have come during the crusades from the East to France, Spain, and England; and reached a luxuriant growth especially in Provence and Bretagne. Besides a MS. of Toledo and a chronicle of Anjou, of which accounts only remain, Flegetanis, Kiot of Provence, Chretien de Troyes, Gautiers de Denet, Gerbers, and Manessier, are mentioned as authors; to which must be added the Mabinogia of Wales and Bretagne, among which especially the Welsh Mabinogian, Peredur ab Efrawc, in the red book of Hergert preserved at Oxford, gives an account of the Grâl, and Parcival, the last Grâl-King. Most important for us is the German form of the legend in the 13th century, as found in Parcival and in two fragments of the Titurel of Walfram of Eschenbach, and the younger Titurel of Albrecht of Scharfenberg.—The legend begins with the expulsion of the fallen angels from heaven, in which a precious gem, the only one that had remained untarnished, fell from the crown of Lucifer, and was ever since carried by angels between heaven and earth, until in the fulfilment of time, it came down to the earth. Of this gem the vessel called Gräl was formed. It was designed to serve the Saviour and his disciples at the last Passover. Thence it passed into the hands of Joseph of Arimathea, who caught up in it the water and blood from the side of the Saviour. It continued thence the symbol of salvation really accomplished on earth, and was entrusted by God to a King Titirel, and to such of his descendants whose names might at any time appear on its edge. The last Gräl-King of the West was Parcival. The Gräl was kept in the chapel of a temple standing on a high mountain (Mt. Salvat) in a deep forest (Floresta Salvat) inaccessible to the uncalled, in the land of Salvaterra. This temple-mountain with its sacred deposit was afterwards removed by the prayer of faith from Spain to India. After Parcival had reigned here for many centuries, he was succeeded by a priest-King, named John, whose name passes, in evident opposition to the Papacy, through all centuries. This legend deserves the minutest attention. The very name, Saint Gräl, has been variously interpreted, derived (as from קֶרֶן, prepuce, referring to the blood of circumcision as typifying the blood of Christ) and modified. It is certain, however, that Gräl means a vessel, saucer, or cup. Such a precious vessel was really found in the first crusade at Caesarea and brought to Genoa, where it was for many centuries kept and venerated in the church of St. Lawrence, until in recent times it had to travel to Paris.—As the name Gräl was applied to the holy vessel at Genoa, so also the name Templeises seems to have reference to the Templars, who were organized to afford a real, as the Gräl a legendary aid, but also counterpoise, to the clerical office. It seems probable also that the mythic-mystical kingdom of John, which attached itself to the Gräl legend, had some connection with the still surviving Gnostic sect of Disciples of St. John.—More important than this is the traditional use and purpose of the Gräl. On every Good Friday a wafer is laid into it from above as food for many: hence it seems a continuation of the miraculous feeding of the thousands; it affords sufficient food and drink to all its own, but is visible only to the elect, not to the uninitiated and unbaptized. Nor can it be reached by force or the understanding; it is imparted only through grace by calling and election; only that the offered grace is accepted by faith, and not lost by apathy or guilt. The inmost meaning of the legend clusters around the mystery of the sacrament, in the form of a real presence of Christ. The Gräl serves the water of holy baptism and the elements of the Lord's Supper. As the vessel of the sacraments, it is also the central and culminating point of the Church; which, like it, visible and invisible, gathers and instructs the race, and organizes it into different offices and estates, according to the various gifts and powers. Hence it is the Church which advances and cherishes faith, and defines and determines it according to the Scriptures to prevent error. By its wanderings, also, the Gräl reminds the Church of its mission among unbelievers.—Psychologically viewed, the legend seems to embody the indestructible effort of the Christian to comprehend the incomprehensible; to retain the past in the present, in order to be the more certain of its historical reality.—BUSHING, der heil. G. u. seine Hüter (Alt-deutsches Mus., Bd. 1: Berl., 1809); BOISSERÉE, üb. die Beschreib. d. h. G. (Münch., 1834); LACHMANN, Wolfram v. Eschenbach (Berl., 1854, 2d ed.); SAN MARTE, (Schulz), Die Sage von h. G. (Leb. u. Dicht. Wolfr. v. Eschenb., Bd. 2, 1841); SIMROCK, Parcival u. Titirel. Uebers. (Stuttg. u. Tüb., 1842); GÖSCHEL, die Sage vom Parciv. u. vom Gräl, nach Wolfr. v. Eschenb. (Berl., 1855).

C. F. GÖSCHEL. — Reinecke.

Grandmont, the Order of, was founded by Stephan of Tigerno (1073–83) whose biography by Gerhard, 7th prior of G., is found in MARTENE ET DURAND, ampliss. collectio, VI., p. 1050. He was born in 1046 at the castle of Thiers in Auvergne, and educated and ordained to various clerical offices by Milo, B. of Benevento. From the 24th to the 28th year of his age he abode at Rome. His request to be allowed to found an order according to the rule of the Calabrian monks, was refused on account of his youth, by Alexander II., but granted in 1073 by Gregory VII. Returning to France, he built in the solitude of Muret, near Limoges, a hut of interwoven twigs, and ordered his life according to the rule of the Calabrian hermits. At first his rigor found few imitators; but the fame of his sanctity gradually attracted many, who submitted to his guidance. He refused the name of master or abbot, and allowed only that of corrector. He died Feb. 8, 1124, aged nearly 80 years. Both the Augustine and Benedictine monks asserted that S. had adopted their rule; he himself always evaded a direct answer with regard to it. The bull of Gregory VII. authorized him only to found an order of the rule of Benedict; but he might have added to his rule whatever he found worthy of imitation in others. After his death the Augustinians of Ambazoc claimed Muret as their property, and took the name of Grandmontensians. His second successor, Stephan of Lisiac, gathered the rules of the order, which latter numbered already 60 colonies. The first monastery of the order built in France was that at Vincennes, which was founded in 1164 by Louis VII. Ademar of Friac, the 8th prior, framed new and very severe rules, which were confirmed by Innocent III. The predominance of lay over clerical brethren caused many domestic disputes, which were with difficulty suppressed by successive Popes. In this way the order degenerated more and more, and its subsequent history consists merely of idle quarrels. Their dress was a coat, scapulary and peaked cowl. The order became extinct in the storms of the first French revolution.—MABILLON, Anal. ord. s. bened. V., p. 99, sq.; HELYOT, Gesch. d. Klost.- u. Ritterorden, VII., 480–93.

DR. PRESSEL. — Reinecke.

Gratian, Emperor of Rome (375–383) the son and successor of Valentinian I. He associated his brother, Valentinian II., with him self. He was active in the suppression of heathenism. He resigned the office of Pontifex Max., had the altar of Victory removed from the Senate-Hall, abolished Vestalium virginum prerogativas, Sacerdotii immunitatem, confiscated the revenues of the temple, and refused the Vestals and priests victum modicum iustaque privilegia (SYMMACH., X., Ep. 61; AMBROS., Ep., 17), although he had to endure the sacrifices in Rome, for a season. Q. Aur. Symmachus, the Prefect of the city, in vain petitioned (382) Gratian to retract these measures. The edict of 383 was naturally regarded by the heathen as a punishment sent by the gods for the suppression of their religion.—At the request of a Roman Council Gratian was led (378 or 81) to enact a law, giving the Bishop of Rome the right of decision in a final appeal, in cases of schism originating in Rome, but without interfering upon the authority of provincial Metropolitan. The most important act of his reign was the investment of the youthful Theodosius with the Empire of the East. DR. PRESSEL.*

Greek and Greek-Russian Church (and theology).—This name embraces not only the Greek National Church, but in general the Church which originated in the old Greek Church, gradually formed with the Oriental Church an integral whole, and, in distinction from the Roman and afterwards from the Protestant, continued its existence without great revolutions and reforms. Its seat is Greece, Asia Minor, Egypt and Eastern Europe; its history rich in remarkable phenomena, its mission peculiar, its extent greater than its present force and efficiency.—The Greeks were no longer a nation when Christianity reached them; but they lent to it their language and the wide arena of their civilization; their conversion to it decided its universal mission. Greeks are found among the immediate disciples of the Apostles. Among the Greeks of Hellas, Macedonia, and Asia M., Pauline Christianity grew up and gained strength. Greek cities became centres of Christian missions. A new life arose on the soil of classical literature, to advance which the latter very soon proved itself very faithful. Was it not a grand victory of the gospel, that it so quickly made subservient to itself the Greek mind, which was so remote and foreign to itself? How numerous the facts and relations, which can be explained only from the position which Græcism occupied abroad partly with reference to Judaism, and partly to the other then known world. We mention only the fact, that the oldest Christian literature could connect itself directly, in its own language, with the Scriptures. Next in succession to the New Test. canon are mostly Greek works; in these the tendencies of Jewish and Oriental piety are brought together, and in this way they are conveyed to the West. The first defence of the Christian faith, and the first exposition of Christian doctrine, was made in the Greek. In Greek forms of thought, also, was clothed a large portion of the old Gnosis; which, without this means, could not have expressed its manifold elements. Greek treatises formed a bulwark for Christian knowledge against Greek philosophy, but also a bridge to it and a medium for a long continued and fruitful reciprocal influence. There was, therefore, a respectable Christian literature before the Latin Church had anything original. The importance of the Greek language and civilization was twofold: it furnished the remote parts of the Church with a common middle ground for communication and exchange; and modified, also, in various ways the spirit of the old Christian doctrine.—Geographically, also, we may characterize the position of the old Greek Church as a middle and connective one. She embraces Hellas, Macedonia, and the provinces of Asia M., which latter, however, were strongly mingled with Jewish elements. Hence it lay between Syria and Palestine on the one side, and Italy and Africa on the other. Indeed for a time it was doubtful to which section of the Church it would belong.—Of the churches of Greece and Asia M. we can trace a large number into the dim age of the 2d century: e. g., Corinth through the epistles of Clement, and of the later Dionysius; Ephesus through the Ignatian epistles; Smyrna and Philippi through Polycarp and Ignatius; Hierapolis through Appollinaris. Laodicea occurs in the paschal controversy; Sardes in Lydia is mentioned by Melito. Quadratus and Publius are mentioned by Dionysius (Euseb. IV., 23) as Bishops of Athens. Melito (Euseb. IV., 26) speaks of persecutions by Antoninus against Larissa, Athens, and Thessalonica. Athenagoras, the apologist, was a native of Athens. Subsequently Greece proper and its capital, though long the seat of the celebrated school of philosophy, visited even by the teachers of the Church, withdrew from the main current of Church movements; whilst other sections maintained their place, and especially Ephesus and Thessalonica became important for the future. In the churches of Asia Minor Christian life struggled with heathen and Jewish movements, since these latter endeavored to obtain ecclesiastical sanction. Here, perhaps, the first collections of the New Test. canon were made. But that from these struggles a prevalently practical realist tendency and an ethical-ascetic movement unfolded themselves, is proven from the simple gnosis of Marcion, the controversy concerning the true paschal festival, and by Phrygian Montanism. The resemblance of this spirit with the mind of the Latin Church cannot be denied. Hence Irenæus, though a citizen of Asia Minor, could, with his theology, which, though sharply defined and presented in universal outlines, rested nevertheless throughout upon authority and positivity, obtain a place as a distinguished representative of the Catholicism just arising in the West. Another and more original Greek phase of religion was to arise in Alexandria, the importance of which city Eusebius already admits (H. E., II., 24; III., 21) by enumerating the names of its bishops. At Alexandria Christian Græcism understood itself, and its natural mission as assigned to it by its earlier history and scientific position. Gnostic aberrations came first; then followed a churchly gnosis, the first theology in its narrower sense. The Alexandrians united love of learning and of exegetical investigation with free, vigorous thought; and elevated themselves to a bold speculation without forsaking the Church basis. The labors of Origen satisfied the majority, and attained to general acceptance in the 3d century. His school, as the example of Dionysius of Alexandria proves, was not so one-sidedly erudite, that it neglected practical affairs. The spiritual cast of the Greek theology can now already be discerned. It was always inclined to trace spiritual things in the letter and sensuous forms; always sought the chief importance of the Christian faith in speculative theorems and in the metaphysics of the doctrines of God, the Logos, and the incarnation: and always retained the conviction that man, notwithstanding his fall and sensual degradation, still possessed moral freedom and capacity. But from the intellectual versatility of the Greeks, this general doctrinal character was capable of various modifications and applications, so that it became in turn rigidly dogmatic, or philosophical, or mystical; for all which the germs were already present at this time. The ethical position of the Greeks is psychologically important: they cannot be charged with neglecting the moral; against this their inclination to asceticism and their care for Church discipline would be decisive. But since they found the means of reformation and approximation to God in the elevation of the spirit above the earthly and sensuous, they did not sufficiently distinguish between the moral and intellectual difficulty of human sanctification. The good, according to their view, was too vague and too little obligatory; hence they fell short of the stricter conscientiousness and sense of duty which belonged to Latin Christendom. — The second period embraces the 4th cent., and those next succeeding. After the Greek Church of the first age had participated in all the variations of Christian life and suffering, and had taken precedence in some of them, she was now to unfold in the sphere of doctrine a still more lively and more one-sided activity. The Roman empire, now reconciled to Christianity, established a new centre of power at Constantinople, and thus rescued the East from the disasters to which the West was soon to succumb. Since the Church in its territorial divisions had adopted the division of the Rom. empire into dioceses, it was natural that the political division into the East and West should also become an ecclesiastical one. Doctrinal disputes also assisted to loosen existing ties, and occasioned in the 5th cent. already a temporary schism. The patriarchates of Byzantium, Alexandria, Antioch, Cæsarea, and Ephesus became more closely connected, whilst Rome stood isolated in the West. The elevation of Constantinople did not destroy the independence of the other patriarchates, for they maintained a thoroughly free and co-ordinate position for a long time after: but it did give to Eastern Christendom an episcopal seat, which claimed an equal dignity with the Roman. A Greek papacy was impossible for many reasons: but the dignity of Constantinople and the extent of its diocese occasioned a bipartite division of the Church, which prevented the more remote East from forming a third independent organization, and led it to attach itself to the Greek Church. This close connection of the Greek-Oriental Church was encouraged by doctrinal movements, as a mere glance at their arena and connections will show. The Arian controversy commenced in Egypt, passed over to Asia Minor, Palestine and Syria, and in the West to Illyria and Thrace, but less to Italy: it was decided in the Greek empire; Asia Minor and Byzantium furnishing the most important forces. In the christological controversies, Ephesus, Alexandria, and Constantinople took the lead; the doctrine assumed an Alexandrian and an Antiochian aspect. No party gained a decisive victory: the higher union of the two views which was at last achieved, was maintained only at the price of the Nestorian, Monophysite and Monotheletic schisms; so that Church unity was not fully maintained in the East. What part the Emperors played in these and later transactions, is known. Thus much had been settled, with the rather feeble aid of the West, upon Greek-Oriental territory; for Rome and the Orientals, having little doctrinal productiveness, assisted only by successful interferences and by drawing practical consequences. On the other hand, Augustinism and Pelagianism were phenomena and opposites peculiar to the West, to which we find no complete analogies among the Greeks. Both parties learned from each other, though in an unequal measure; the Romans appropriating far more from the Greeks, than the reverse. Even if a few men, such as Jerome and Rufinus, evince to us this commerce between the two sections of the Church; we are even in them reminded of its inequality. Rufinus translated Origen and Eusebius into the Latin: but who at that time translated Latin works into Greek? — Greek Church literature had flourished during this time with an extraordinary exuberance. Its interior circle was composed of works specially doctrinal: but what a contrast between the hard zealous dogmatism of Epiphanius, and the poetic-speculative views of Synesius or the philosophy of religion of Nemesius and Æneas of Gaza: between the sober common sense of Theodoretus and the mystic transcendentalism of Pseudo-Dionysius! The old Christian Platonism had been suppressed, at times even to make room for Aristotle; but reappeared at times in isolated individuals. The defects of the earlier exegesis were most successfully removed by the Antiochian school. If we add yet the works on Church history, the homilies and sermons of Chrysostom and the Cappadocians, the liturgical productions which under the name of James, Basilides, and Chrysostom, attached themselves to the Apostolical Constitutions, the Catecheses of Cyril, of Jerusalem, the monastic rules and contributions to spiritual poetry and hymnology; we must be surprised at the productiveness of the Greeks. In the 6th and 7th centuries the Greek mind had become impoverished; doctrinal theology was reduced to barren dogmatic forms, and yet the literary inheritance was sufficiently great to give plenty of work to John of Damascus. — In the third period we embrace the entire Byzantine middle ages of the Greek Church. Thus far she had still held communion with the West; but now important circumstances arose, to confine her more decidedly to herself. The resolutions of the Concilium Quini- extum, 692, arose from a desire for ecclesiastical independence. In the image controversies (726-842) the strong inclination of the Greeks to religious symbols, and the power of the monks with their half sensuous and superstitious, and half supersensuous devotion, manifested itself. The West, more calm and sober, although it did not agree with the enemies of images, could not approve of the enthusiasm of their friends. The West was still less affected by the wars against the Paulician and Bogomil heretics. When Chosroes II. attacked the Eastern empire; when the Muslims had conquered Syria, and the Arabians the Persian empire, Egypt and N. Africa; the Byzantine dominions were robbed of several provinces, and the patriarchates of Alexandria, Antioch and Jerusalem were temporarily suspended; all these losses also threatened more directly Eastern Christendom only. The Greek Church had its own peculiar history, dangers, cares and struggles; nor did the arbitrary and despotic interference of the Emperors in its domestic government make it more inclined to draw closer to the West. This is one reason of the increasing alienation: another one is the growing centralization of the Western Church under Roman supremacy. The occasions of the actual rupture, which Roman authors, as Maimbourg, have very unjustly called an apostasy of the Greeks from Rome, are well known. Photius (see Art.) succumbed, it is true, in the patriarchal controversy of the 9th century; but he betrayed for the first time a specific anti-Roman spirit and zeal, and referred to controversies as yet unappealed to. The same violent zeal led, under Gerularius (see Art.) to mutual anathemas: on his side were the three other patriarchates. It was soon an essential part of Greek orthodoxy to condemn certain points of the Latin doctrines and ritual, and to confirm at the same time the principle of Chalcedon, that the patriarchs of Rome and Constantinople were equal in rank and dignity.—To explain and decide upon the quarrel, at least in its main features, is no longer difficult. It was not chiefly of a political kind, for the Emperors often wished to avoid it, and remove it: nor was it purely doctrinal. The disputes concerning the word filioque touched, indeed, an essential doctrine: but whatever weight was attached to it by Synods and wild controversial writers, neither it, nor other partly very trivial liturgical and disciplinarian divergences, would have formed an irreconcilable difference. But these single divergences rested upon a difference in spirit and history, which had grown up gradually and been confirmed by centuries. The two ecclesiastical roads were divergent; and even grand movements like the crusades, all absorbing in force and of universal Christian interest, could not reunite them, but brought the inward hostility into clearer light. Their past gave to the Greeks a most enacious feeling of their superiority, and the proudest consciousness of the antiquity, genuineness and dignity of their Church. Possessing the older hierarchical organization and ritual, as also some minor doctrinal points, they resisted the advance of the more recent monarchical principle of the West, and regarded the peculiarities of the Latin Church as unapostolical innovations. The papacy is the wall of separation: this and its measures the Greek Church resisted, and would not become subordinate to it.—Amid the inert stability of the Byzantine Church, we can merely point out the threads, which for centuries guided its existence so strangely uniform, self-sufficient and opposed to foreign influence. In 1204 the Latins expelled the hereditary Emperors from Byzantium to Nicæa, and called into existence several small Greek sovereignties at Trapezus, Rhodes, and Epirus. The Greek worship was suppressed by the Roman prelates and bishops with brute violence, and Constantinople had to accept a Latin patriarch. Almost against his will Innocent III. became the head of both churches—a forced union and productive of the worst fruits. The Emperors, even the better ones, seldom served the Church in the right way; many, by their hyperchurchly zeal, favoritism and partisanship, only injured it (see Art. Constantinople). The Church enlarged its territory by the final acquisition of Bulgaria, the contemporary conversion of the Mainottes, the acquisition of S. Slavonians in Bohemia and Moravia, which in the 10th cent., however, went over to the Roman Church, and the founding of the Russian Church under Wladimir the Great (980); but it lost by the conquests of the Latins and Turks. The Slavonian element coalesced in some regions with the Greek. Among cities, Constantinople continued the most important ecclesiastical seat. Thessalonica, Trapezus and Chonæ also deserve distinction; Athens in a less degree, since it had suffered fearfully in the M. A., first from the Slavonians, and afterwards (1205) from the Latin conquest, which destroyed for a long time all civil and ecclesiastical freedom.—If we look at the literature and science of the Church, we see generally that the traditional tenacity of Byzantinism enabled it to retain, at least outwardly, its inheritance; but also that the Byzantians had neither the desire nor power to learn new things, and were therefore left behind by the more acquisitive West. If the Emperors or other circumstances were favorable, there would at times be a faint rise in spiritual culture; never a high degree of it. When in the 9th and 10th centuries all higher culture in the West lay prostrate, science was still fostered among the Greeks. The Comneni intended well. A better state existed to the end of the 12th century; but after the restoration of the empire the moral and mental degeneracy was all the more fearful, and only the Arsenian schism (1266-1312) and the Hesychast controversy (1341-50) could produce any kind of life. Of particular productions, the following are worthy of mention: 1. The exegetical labors of the Byzantians, such as the Comm. of Oecumenius, Theophylact, and Euthymius Zigabenus. They are important; for philological knowledge and aptness, fostered by the study of the Old Greek literature, had maintained among them an exegetical tact, which had long before vanished among the Latin scholastics. 2. The collectanea of Photius with his scholiasts Balsamon and Zonaras, of the somewhat later Suidas and S. Metaphrastes, embraced sacred and profane history, literature, canon law, and antiquities; their fruits have become indispensable to modern literature. 3. The collecting and amassing of materials present are the chief importance of the doctrinal polemical works of Euthymius and Nicetas Choniates. They use the method of J. Damascenus in a deteriorated way, but complete the polemical apparatus by controverting new heresies. The mysteries of the Trinity and the incarnation, together with the synergistic doctrines of freedom and sin, were still the favorite themes of Greek theologians. They became more skilful and zealous when, though not without many historical inaccuracies, they controverted Islam as monolatry and fatalism. Christian apologetics thus received a new impulse and employed many, even imperial pens (see Gass, Gennadius and Pletho, I., p. 106). 4. More original than the above was, in the 12th cent., Nicholas of Methone, who in his refutation of Proclus displays a deep knowledge of Christian Platonism. Michael Psellus, the younger, was more of an Aristotelian and expounder of Aristotle. Indeed the Peripatetic logic had already been applied to theology by J. Philoponus, and partly by J. Damascenus. Perhaps, though it is as yet unproven, both philosophical tendencies existed contemporaneously; although for a time Aristotelianism must have prevailed in the schools, since Platonism in the 15th cent. asserted itself very strongly, as if after a long neglect. In the age of the Empress Anna we find the germs of a scholastic dialectics; and even of certain scholastic opposites, which may be compared to those of realism and nominalism: but these germs, as generally among the Greeks, were not developed to clearly apprehended and defined principles. 5. Greek mysticism had its chief source and food in the works of the pseudo Dionysius and the explanations of Pachymeres and Maximus, the monk. The Byzantines also retained a mystical vein, which attached itself to their taste for art, for symbolism and typical combinations; but was never in opposition to their forms of doctrine. Related to this mysticism are the expositions of the liturgy. In these the communication of the divine to the Church through the cultus and the sacrament seems to be half materialized and made sensuous, and half idealized. What Cyril had commenced in his mystagogic catecheses, found an artistic development in the liturgical works of Maximus, Sophronius, and Simon of Thessalonica; and the mystical view of transubstantiation prevalent among the Byzantines strengthened this tendency. Not only the mysterious act itself, but also its entire ceremonial, the utensils and furniture of the Church, the sacerdotal robes, the altar and temple around it, became objects of interpretation, leading them at one time into sublime speculation, at another into vague transcendental mysticism. We cannot deny to these liturgical phantasies a high degree of that meditative depth peculiar to Greeks; but they set aside too much the practical common sense and moral nerve; nor, since they directed the mind so constantly to the miraculous in forms and effects, must we be surprised to find the devotions of the people to be a stupid, passive amazement. This inclination to mysticism encouraged monasticism also; which played no unimportant part in the separate civil-ecclesiastical embroilments; but it never occupied a position sufficiently noble and imposing, to exert a moral influence upon either high or low. 6. The Byzantine literature is also rich in rhetorical works, eulogies, funeral discourses, monodies, etc., often very adulatory. They are the special models of the current style; thus also the letters, of which we have a large number, both printed and unprinted. As the Byzant. historians move slowly along in cumbrous periods, so this rhetoric presents a strange mixture of redundancy, pomp, choice imagery and polish. But a noble disposition and true piety have also manifested themselves in it. We mention the excellent Eustathius of Thessalonica, Michael Acunatos of Chona, and the Archb. of Athens, brother of Nicetas the historian. 7. We must yet notice the fact, that the ecclesiastical authorship of that time did not confine itself to its special theological field, but also exercised itself upon history and philology, which is one of its peculiar characteristics. Historians, like Anna Comnena and Nicephorus Gregoras, make lengthy doctrinal digressions; whilst bishops and theologians prosecute tedious classical studies. Even pulpit oratory often shows a recollection of ancestral fame and an afflatus of old Greek inspiration: and although orthodoxy was the most indispensable requisite of laity and clergy, yet with these labors amid the ancient classics a very unchurchly mind was often found connected.

The relations to the Roman Church continued generally hostile. At the same time the decline of the empire under the Palæologi, the fall of the christian sovereignty in Palestine, and the growing danger from the Turks, repeatedly urged a nearer union with the West. The theologians, however, continued to reproach the Latins with a host of abuses, as the use of unleavened bread, eating things strangled, fasting on Saturday, single immersion in baptism, priestly celibacy and sharing of the bread, the incorrect mode of making the sign of the cross, confirmation by bishops only, the engaging of the clergy in wars, the excessive elevation of the papal power, and, besides many other things, the filioque. Party rancor seemed to become more bitter, as the points of difference were less important. Some, as Theophylact and Peter of Antioch, were more reasonable, and reduced the controversy to a few main points. We may readily expect, then, that a union party favorable to the Latins and the imperial negotiations always existed. Nich. Blemmidas, J. Bekkus, Man. Kalkas, and Demetr. Cydonius are memorable as latinizing teachers, and Marcus Egenicus, Archb. of Ephesus, as orthodox. To understand the conflict of these tendencies, we must remember that the Greeks, notwithstanding their disdainful aloofness, could not entirely resist Latin influence. Thus in literature we possess Greek translations of passages from Augustine, Th. Aquinas, and Anselm. Demetr. Cydonius, a skilful writer of the 14th cent., furnished several such translations. An acquaintance with certain Latin scholastic doc rial forms, as Anselm's theory of redemption, & betrayed even among members of the anti-Roman party. Perhaps the similarity in the sacramental doctrine also belongs to this connection. For how happened it, that after J. Damascenus and others after him taught variously two, three, and six sacraments, the number seven at last prevailed even among the opponents of Rome? Did the Greek system lead to this conclusion, or was it the general influence of the Latin doctrines? However this may be, what has thus been said explains in a general way both the protracted and often resumed negotiations for union, and the fate of the synods of Lyons (1274), and Florence (1439), and the later efforts of Gregory XIII. and Clement II. — A fourth period we date from the fall of Constantinople to the founding of the modern Greek Church, during which the latter was forced from its isolation into a certain degree of contact and commerce with the West. Fear of the conquerors drove many humanists, such as Chalcondylas, Chrysoloras, Pletho, M. Apostolius, Theodore Gaza, and George of Trapezus, to Italy. The knowledge and culture which they brought with them, were to flourish in their new home, and produce important fruits for the future. Pletho published an unchurchly but religiously inspired Platonism; the controversy between him and Gennadius Scholarius, and other adherents of Aristotle, was carried on on both sides with excess of passion; it is like a reaction of the ancient Hellenist and also universal-religious consciousness, and can be understood as such. Bessarion took a conciliatory position between the Aristotelians and Platonists, as also between the two churches. If the Greeks had produced the revival of letters in the West, and thus opened the way for the spiritual revolution of the following age; it became a question of interest what position the Greek Church would take with regard to the reformation. The eyes of the reformers turned anxiously in this direction; for they saw in Greek Christendom a great organization furnished with the marks of an apostolical age, and yet independent of Roman supremacy; a palpable evidence that to be a church no papal guardianship was needed. The Protestants turned back to the original of the New Test., and also held the Greek Church Fathers in high estimation. Luther's Smaller Catechism and the Augsb. Confession were translated into Greek; D. Chytræus and M. Crusius gave special attention to the affairs of the Greek Church. In one chief and several minor points the Evan. Church felt its oneness with the Greek; ought they not to enter into a closer union? Several efforts were made to this end, but in vain. Neither the negotiations of the Tübingen Lutherans with Patriarch Jeremias (ab. 1575), nor the Calvinizing patriarch, Cyrillus Lucaris, accomplished anything. No mere doctrine, but a practical principle decided the question: for when the patriarch named insisted upon the seven sacraments, the necessity of good works, monasticism and an energetic doctrine of freedom, he showed himself nearer to the Rom. Cath. doctrines than to the Protestant. In the 17th cent. also the intercourse was merely casual and through individuals.

Rome, on the other hand, succeeded in stirring up partisan feelings in its favor, and also in gaining some leading minds from the Greek Church. Distinguished among these was the celebrated scholar and librarian of the Vatican, Leo Allatius (ab. 1650); who, though highly meritorious as an author, was a bad unionist, since he Romanized his church and spent infinite labor in trying to show an agreement between the two forms of Catholicism, which did not exist in reality. In 1566 a college was established at Rome for Greek teachers; many Greeks studied at Padua; and Jesuits, as Passevin, made efforts to gather union circles in various sections, and to proselyte the Oriental sects, such as the Maronites.—Except these individual movements, however, the Greek Church, even during this period which shook every thing, continued in its old position. She discarded the Reformation, and consequently, to guard herself against former foreign influences, she had to resort to a restoration. Here begins the fifth period, that of the modern Greek, Oriental, or Anatolian Church. Constantinople was too powerless at the time to give an impulse to the movement, and its patriarch could only accede to the confession (Ορθόδοξος ὁμολογία &c.), published, 1643, by Peter Mogilas, metropolitan of Kiew, and approved of by the patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Moscow. Besides this, a more extensive symbolical apparatus grew up from the confession of Gennadius against Islam (1453), the declarations of the Synod of Jerusalem (1672), the confessions of Metrophanes, Critopulus, Cyril, Lucaris, Dositheus, the acts of the Wurtemberg negotiation, and some other documents. A symbolism might easily be constructed from these documents, if it should have reference merely to the most common doctrinal materials; but it would be very difficult if it should consult the more remote and ancient literature, and enter upon complicated liturgical, practical, and sacramental questions. These confessions are simple in doctrine and artless in style. They are decisive wherever they rest upon the old symbols; but in anthropology and soteriology, as opposed to the Protestant doctrines, they become vague and undetermined, and could have been satisfactory only with a living theology to accompany them. The Church does not surmount the catechetical position, since it merely details the requirements and elements of Christian life, without uniting them in a deeper principial union. Faith comes first; a participation in the divine is effected through an orthodox confession and the sacraments. Then, under the name of love, follow good works, as the second indispensable factor: the link between the two is hope, to which is joined the exposition of prayer and the beatitudes. Tradition is co-ordinate to the Scriptures; of the councils of the ancient Church, the eighth (879–80) also is regarded as oecumenical, and several Greek Synods are regarded as authoritative.—We will now endeavor to give a general description of the modern Greek Church, as it has maintained itself with tolerable uniformity on the basis of the above named resolutions and confessions. In all its parts it shows a most intimate unity; and yet we can trace the part performed by different ages in its development, and distinguish between the ancient Church and later Byzantine additions, as also changes of later centuries. Its constitution was from an early age aristocratic and representative; hence it was possible to establish a permanent Synod co-ordinate to the patriarch, which took place first at Constantinople under Turkish supremacy. The inferior clergy was graded downward to the hypodiaconus, lector, cantor, and liturgist. They were obliged to marry, but only once; since a prejudice rested upon a second marriage, and a fourth one was forbidden even to the laity. The higher clergy enjoyed greater consideration, especially whilst they were yet in part administrators of civil justice. They were mostly taken from the monasteries; and monasticism, partly regular and partly a free eremitism, was, and is even now, yet viewed by the people as the highest and almost supernatural form of piety. Besides the clergy there were other officers to administer the secular affairs of the Church. We possess several catalogues of these semi-clerical officials. Codinus Curopalata, de offic. eccl. (Codini Excerpta de antiq. Const. Venet., 1729) enumerates no less than 45 of such officials; other catalogues mention fewer. Leo Allatius (see Codin., 1 c. p. 8) evidently has in view the later period of the 16–17th century. According to his statements the lower and higher officers are divided into two groups; the choir to the right, and that to the left. The right and superior choir is divided into three orders of five persons each. Its members, whose duties, however, are uncertain, are: 1, ὁ μέγας αἰκόνομος, supreme warden of Church property, deacon at mass, and assessor of the ecclesiastical court; 2, ὁ μέγας σακελλάριος, chief director of monasteries; 3, ὁ σκευοφύλαξ, warden of the sacristy, the implements and vessels of the Church; 4, ὁ χαρτοφύλαξ, chancellor, warden of the legal documents of the Church, judge in matrimonial affairs; but also with the Bishop the highest tribunal in clerical trials, and keeper of the protocols; 5, ὁ τοῦ σακελλίου, inspector of nunneries; 6, ὁ πρωτονοτάριος, framer of missives, contracts and arrangements; 7, ὁ λογαδίτης, accountant, keeper of the seal and member of the court of justice; 8, ὁ πανστρίσιος, bearer of the censor and incense; 9, ὁ ῥεφερενδάριος, clerical charge d'affaires, who received messages to the superior, etc.; 10, ὁ υπομνημογράφων, clerk and keeper of minutes; 11, πρωτεύδικος, president of a tribunal for minor cases, intrusted also with the care of prisoners; 12, ὁ ιερομνήμων, receiver of petitions, keeper of the Church record, representative of the Bishop at Church dedications and in other affairs; 13, ὁ ἐπὶ τῶν γονάτων, who tied the Bishop's girdle cloth and assisted at mass; 14, ὁ ὑπομνήσμων, receiver of petitions and messages to the court; 15, ὁ διδάσκαλος, expounder of the gospel at mass. Thus far the catalogues agree very nearly; although with the last two, Codinus mentions ὁ ἐπὶ τῶν σεπρέτων, a secretary and superior in judicial transactions; and ὁ ἐπὶ τῆς ἱερᾶς καταστάσεως, an officer for the maintenance of order in Church. In the following series there are great divergencies, which, however, we cannot state. According to

Leo Allatius the left choir was as follows: ὁ πρωτοπαπᾶς, first ministrant at mass; ὁ δευτερεύων, second ministrant; ὁ ἄρχων τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν, superior of the Church; ὁ ἐξαρχος, Church visitor; ὁ κατηχητής, teacher who prepared proselytes from other sects for baptism; ὁ περιοδεύτης, travelling priest; ὁ βορτιστής, assistant at baptism; αἱ δύο ἐκδικος, attorneys of the Church; αἱ δύο δομειστικοί, leaders in singing; αἱ δύο λαοσυγκληταί, who called the deacons and the congregation together, and assisted in singing; αἱ δύο πριμμήριοι, properly superiors, here in singing and the lesson; ὁ πρωτοψάλτης; ὁ πρῶξιμος, master of the chapel; ὁ δεπότατος, who preceded the Bishop to open the way; θύριοι, guards of the Church; ὁ ἐπὶ τῆς εὐταξίας, a kind of master of ceremonies; ὁ καταγοριάρχης, sweeper; ὁ κομβοκλήτης, chamberlain; ὁ δεκανός, who paid the perquisites to the priests; αἱ λαμπαδάριοι, lamp cleaners; ὁ περιεισερχόμενος, who placed the candles on the altar; βασταγάριος, bearer of the images; μυροδότης, who was entrusted with the holy myron (see Comm. in Codin., 1, c., p. 9, sqq.; Du Fresne, Lexic. et Suiceri Thes.). We need only to glance at this catalogue to see the circumstantiality and pedantry of the Greek organization. Most of these offices, however, have been discontinued in more recent times, or exist merely in name.—In the cultus many things show the highest antiquity, such as trine immersion in baptism; turning toward the East in prayer, the text of the forms and hymns. Bells are found but seldom; organs not at all; and it is remarkable that the ancient Greek prejudice against the use of musical instruments in worship (Pseudojust. Quæst. ad Orthod., 107) has continued so stubborn down to the present times. A Greek Church or chapel, with its single and stationary altar, its curtain and sacred door, the reading desks, the nave without seats, has much resemblance to a temple. The mystery also does not transpire before those present, but the curtain opens and closes significantly. The position of the congregation, too, is peculiar; it is separated according to sexes, and stands; the liturgical recitations and Bible lessons are interrupted only by the singing of the choir. This latter varies from a very low to a higher degree of excellency. Paintings and Mosaics have their place according to fixed rules. Preaching is even less prominent than in the Rom. Cath. Church. The ceremonial is elaborately complete, especially the mass service according to the order of Basil and Chrysostom. The manner in which the priest cuts off with the lance a piece of the leavened bread, the position of his fingers in pronouncing the blessing, the manner of making the sign of the cross, elevating the candles, and swinging the censor, are all accurately prescribed. The Greek cultus, though in some things almost the same with the Roman, deviates widely in other things: for among the Greeks the elements are borne about without a special elevation and veneration of the host; it is not consecrated in the presence of the people; the Lord's Supper is administered in both kinds, and what remains of the consecrated bread is distributed. We have not the space to describe the consecration of the altar and the holy water, which, however, is not put into basins in the Church, the anointing in baptism, extreme unction, which is applied to the sick in general, the processions and feet washing. In general the Greek service is kindred to the Roman, and is no less productive of superstition and Jewish legalism. The Greeks, indeed, have no masses for the departed in the Rom. sense, and no purgatory: but image and relic worship, liturgical pomp and strict fasts mislead them to a like, perhaps even a higher degree of religious formalism, and the reproach of Judaism made against the Latins rebounds against themselves. That they did not hurl anathemas and excommunications so liberally, may result from the fact that there was no Pope to wield these weapons. — So much in general. We are here met by three forms or branches of the Greek Church: 1, that in Turkey; 2, in Russia; 3, in liberated Greece. These may also be distinguished as: 1, the Greek Church in its greatest isolation and traditional uniformity; 2, its close connection with the State and the Slavonic nationality; 3, the renewal of a national Church life. — 1. After the capture of Constantinople the Osman dominion extended after various fluctuations over Greece, Trapezus, Epirus, the Danubian countries, the Greek isles, Syria, Palestine, and Egypt, and hence included Greek, Slavonian, Armenian, Jewish, and mixed nationalities. The Turkish sovereignty displayed in the course of centuries all the attributes of an Asiatic despotism and the horrors of tyranny. But they never, at least where they were in secure possession, exercised tyranny over conscience. The Christians generally, though for heavy sacrifices, enjoyed religious liberty. From the first the higher clerical offices depended on bribes and the will of the sovereign. The better churches were seized by the conquerors; the rest became impoverished, and were suffered neither to be enlarged nor restored. The conquered nations were exhausted by numerous tributes: their character also degenerated, since the Greeks had to limit their labors to monetary and commercial interests. Science and education declined, or were fostered at most in a few cloisters. If any moral one still survived, it was due partly to the Church and the administration of justice by the clergy, and partly to the congregational administration still in the hands of the people. The practice of religion was not disturbed, and to the higher clergy the Turks did not refuse all respect. The Greeks accommodated themselves to their proud lords, and even invoked their aid at times against the Romish emissaries. The aid of the West against Turkish oppression was but seldom sought; as happened in 1734, when the archimandrite, Dorostamus, visited Germany to solicit contributions for the ransom of Christian captives taken in the conquest of Morea (see Elssner, Neueste Beschreib. der gr. Chr.: Berl., 1737). Surrounded by a hostile population, the Greeks still retain their ancient hatred of Romanists and their writings, and their isolation from Protestants; and they still occupy the hard, unyielding soil of their orthodoxy. Of late, however, they show some longings for deliverance, to come from the West through the agency of the “Franks.” But few of them have apostatized to Islamism. The well known Hattischerif of Gülhane (1839), which made the Christians and Moslems equal at law, has vastly improved the condition of the Greeks, which has been still more alleviated by the present reigning Sultan. — The following statistics are given by Klose. The diocese of Constantinople (see Art.) embraces European Turkey, Asia M. and the islands; and contains above 80 metropolitan seats, whilst the Synod of Antioch contains only 18, and the Synod of Jerusalem only 8. The Patriarch of Alexandria has subordinate to him only the Bishop of Lybia. Prominent in Macedonia are the Archbishopric of Salonica and the monk republic of Athos (see Art.); in Thessaly, Larissa; in Bulgaria, Varna, Widdin, Silistria; in Bosnia, Belgrade. In Bulgaria, after numerous apostacies, Islam has become predominant; in Turkish Croatia, the Latin Church; in Herzegovina, Montenegro, and the isles of Candia and Cyprus, the Greek Church. The Greek Christians of Moldavia are subject to the Metropolitan of Jassy; those of Wallachia, to the Metropolitan of Bucharet. In all these countries there is no want of churches, priests and monks, nor of respect for them; but of cultivation, manners and education; Protestant efforts in this direction are regarded but little, Catholic ones are hated. The support of the clergy is very unequal, dependent at times on the mere perquisites. The monks are most respected. Popular piety is in some provinces mixed up with the wildest superstition: talismans and charms are used; the corpse of an excommunicated person is supposed never to decay. In Asia Minor the metropolitan seats of Smyrna, Ephesus, and Nicomedia are of some importance; here, however, the clergy and religion are sunken even more deeply, and the Armenian churches stand higher than the Greek. In other Asiatic countries the orthodox Church has had to yield to the Nestorians, Maronites, and Jacobites; in Syria it exists along with the united Church; in Jerusalem with the greatest mixture of religions. In all Egypt there are only about 8000 orthodox Greeks; in Arabia almost none at all. In Hungary, Galicia, Austria, Transylvania, and Dalmatia there are scattered orthodox Greek churches with strict forms of worship, but having little connection with the Church at large. In Hungary, where in the 17th century, already numerous Greek Christians from Moldavia and Wallachia had settled, their Church affairs were ordered at several Synods, especially at the Diet of 1791. The united Greeks, or those who have submitted to Roman supremacy, have a few congregations in the Turkish dominions; more numerous ones in Hungary, Transylvania, Italy, and Austria. They have their own Bishops, liturgy, and discipline; but have accepted the Roman doctrines of the Trinity and purgatory. — 2. In no country was the Turkish sovereignty more oppressive than in Greece itself; where, in servile dependence, a new Greek people with a new language gradually arose. This state of things continued through the last century, though love of liberty had never perished altogether. For thirty years the Greeks endured the tyranny of Ali Pasha of Janini, 1786–1821; and the revolts of the Suliotes terminated in the slaughter of thousands. The Bishops had long already fostered the national spirit; religion sanctified the war of liberation; and the bloody tyranny of the Turks against the clergy, the execution of the patriarchs and many Bishops, inflamed the enthusiasm of the oppressed. After Greece had become independent (1827) and the new kingdom established (1833), the question arose whether the Church also should take part in the revolution. After the revolt the connection with the œcumenical patriarch had become looser; the tributes were withheld, and the priests sent to Greece were refused. Count Capodistrias approved of the separation, and appointed a commission which temporarily organized the Church. At the instance of 36 metropolitans, assembled at Nauplia, the regency declared, July 23, 1833, the "orthodox Oriental Church of Greece" independent of every foreign authority; that Christ was their only head; that she was capable of self-government; but that this separation from the patriarchate should not affect the common doctrine. The same act established a permanent Synod as the supreme authority of the Church, which was to act independently in all purely inward affairs of the Church; but with governmental and royal supervision and co-operation in all external and mixed affairs. The Synod consisted of five clerical members, appointed annually by the King, and two royal officers. The result was that the hitherto clerical part of jurisdiction became secularized. The monasteries were also reduced from 400 to 82, and the nunneries abolished except three; the means thus obtained were applied to Church and school purposes. The first president of the Synod was Cyril, Metropolitan of Corinth. Corresponding with the political division, the country was divided into ten Sees, and the chief city of each See became an episcopal seat. To gratify aspirants, some provisory bishoprics were also established. A theological faculty and seminary were instituted subsequently. This Church organization has been deprecated by Roman authors as a poor imitation of the Russian, and the permanent Synod as a feeble counterpart of the Protestant consistory. It is true, the framers of it had reference to Russia; and the composition of the Synod of members chosen annually by the King was certainly a mistaken and highly restrictive measure. But this disadvantage was counterbalanced by the exodus from Byzantine thralldom, and it could be expected that a Greek national Church would not shut itself up like the Russian against Western cultivation and religion. Since 1843-44 the Church has become more independent of the State. It was natural that a State-church government, administered so one-sidedly, should not please all. Public opinion, so far as there was any, fluctuated; and a hierarchic party made efforts, in 1839, to reunite with Constantinople. Nor did the patriarch of this city acknowledge the ecclesiastical independence of the new State until 1850. But the religious mind which was just springing up was subjected to various influences. On national ground arose, in 1837, the University of Athens and an improved school system;

whilst Protestantism, even from America, sought access through translations of the Bible and missions. The Rom. C. also continued its efforts; but, as Pius IX. showed, with the smallest results. The Archbishop of Attica, in 1836, excommunicated all parents who sent their children to English or American mission schools. Strict science and literature, but thinly represented at the end of the last century by men of classical education, received now a new impulse from the questions of the day. What has become known of the controversial writings of Germanos, Oiconomos, Pharmakides, Bembas, and some journals, betrays in part an exceedingly narrow, traditional spirit and zeal. Oiconomos deprecates the study of the Hebrew Bible, asserts that the Septuagint is the only authoritative version, and that the modern Greek versions are useless and delusive. Mixed marriages are warned against, and a return to the supremacy of Constantinople recommended as the means to ecclesiastical freedom. But there are also evangelical sympathies and a party of progress. Good results have flowed from exegetical and patristic publications, and the study of the ancient canons. Among devotional works we find a translation of Baxter's "Saints' Rest." — 3. The Russian Church is generally regarded as a younger daughter of the Byzantine, and similar to it in spirit and character. But however undoubted the kindred, we must not overlook the differences between them. In doctrine, cultus, and organization the Russian Church was always receptive with reference to the Greek, and obtained from it the principle of an immobile uniformity. But it did not carry forward everything received with the same zeal; for it became less theoretical than practical, popular, and productive of a piety which corresponded to the national mind. Like the Byzantine Church it readily attaches itself to the secular government, and encourages religious and civil submission. But whilst the former suffers from a feeble and ineffectual oscillation between the hierarchic and political powers, the latter presents decidedly and strongly marked conditions at first of hierarchic independence and afterwards of organic submission to the secular ruler. The Russian Christians suffered also from the Tartars as the Greeks from the Turks; but they threw off earlier and more completely this foreign barbarism and tyranny. — Russian Church historians trace back the origin of their Church to a pretended journey of the Apostle Andrew to Cherson and the Dnieper (A. D. 33). But it cannot have been earlier than the 9th cent., when, according to doubtful accounts, the Russians attacked the Bosphorus under Photius, and soon afterwards became acquainted with the Gospel. Under Oleg and Igor small bands of Christians are said to have existed; in 955 Olga was baptized at Constantinople. Vladimir's government was decisive, for he destroyed the heathen cultus, and by his marriage with Anna, sister of the Emperor Basilus, confirmed the ecclesiastical bond. After Kiew, in 1051, had become the supreme national bishopric, the patriarch exercised his supremacy in appointing the metropolitans, sometimes with the oppo-

tion of the sovereign. In the following age the Church was in an active development. Kiew, Nowgorod and Rostow became ecclesiastical centres; and monasteries, especially the one at Kiew, were flourishing. Civil justice was administered by the Bishops according to the Greek Monocanon. The ecclesiastical relation with Constantinople is at times interrupted by the sovereigns, or by a leaning towards Rome: nevertheless Innocent IV. tried in vain, about 1246, to bring Alex. Newsky over to the Roman communion. Whilst the Greek cultus spread through Lithuania and Poland, but in the latter was opposed by the Roman, it suffered from the violence of the Tartars. The authority of the clergy and monks was steadily increasing; they were even respected by the Tartars and secured by laws. Some of the higher clergy even settled the quarrels of princes, laid penances upon them, and thus prepared them as heroes or patient sufferers to enter the growing list of saints. The monasteries were houses of refuge even to the great, or the gates to a blessed death.—A second period dates from the end of the 16th century. The Roman Church having after the fall of Constantinople become more independent, and the Metropolitan of Kiew having crowned Iwan Wassiljewitsch, Jeremiah I. resolved to grant them a native patriarchate. With the consent of Alexandria and Jerusalem, Job, the metropolitan, became the first Russian Patriarch, the fifth in rank. Subsequently the right of electing their patriarch was also conceded to the Roman clergy. In this way Russia had become an independent province of Greek Christendom, and now made rapid advances. In the 17th century its domestic organization became complete. It resisted the efforts of Rome and the Jesuits, who, in Little Russia only, succeeded in establishing a United Roman majority. In 1643 it adopted, from Peter Magilas, its own fundamental creed, sanctioned by the orthodox Greeks and Orientals. The institution of Greek and Latin schools, the purification of church music and the cultus, the improvement of sacred literature, and important synods, elevated the people to a higher stage of intelligence. In the life of Patr. Nikon, of Nowgorod, all the tendencies and labors of his age are found united.—Thus far the Church had reigned in Russia alongside of the divided but afterwards united and growing, sovereign power. But when through Peter the Great Russia became a Grand Power, the Church also had to give up a part of its independence and hierarchical power.—This brings us to a third period, that of its independence of the secular head. In 1702 Peter left the patriarchate vacant, and entrusted its administration temporarily to an exarchate of Riasan with very limited powers. After 1701 he made many changes, diminished the jurisdiction of the clergy, made laws for the monasteries, determined the number of priests, and other clergy for each cathedral; and, in 1721, placed the general administration in the hands of a permanent "holy Synod." With this thorough measure even the Patr. of Constantinople had to comply, and in 1723 he gave to the Synod the title of patriarchal. It consisted of 12 members, was connected with the crown through a procurator, its supreme head was the Emperor himself, its seat at first Moscow, but afterwards St. Petersburg. To the monarch belonged the administration of Church estates, and the appointment of the Bishops from two candidates presented. He could not, however, decide theological questions. Thus originated a State-churchdom, such as modern Christendom knows no second one; a Cæsaropapism, which is alleviated only by the fact that the nation endures it willingly and has adopted it into its national and religious consciousness. In consequence of it the Emperor must be a member of the Church and orthodox; political dangers are often regarded as also ecclesiastical ones, and other denominations are regarded and treated upon political and police principles. The principles of Peter passed over to Catharine II., but were applied in a more noble way by succeeding Emperors. The State enriched itself from the property of the monasteries, and lessened the revenues of the clergy; but increased the number of schools and seminaries, provided for the spread of Christianity in Siberia, and gave security to the scattered Greek churches beyond the empire. The liberty of conscience which Peter had given to Lutherans and Catholics, was restricted by political interests. Conquests also left their influence upon the Church. The Roman United Christians of the Polish provinces submitted to an absorption with the established Church; and the churches of Lithuania and White Russia were brought back by their clergy to the orthodox Synod, to which they had belonged up to the end of the 16th century.—The inward development of the Russian Church presents to us a remarkable sect system. Heresies, properly speaking, could not arise in a Church without theological spirit or religious mobility. Liturgical affairs, however, and questions of Church polity gave rise, in the middle ages, already to wild and incurable discord. In 1375 Karp Strigolnik at Nowgorod protested against the manner of confessing to the priest and against payment for ordination. Among the malcontents he found a party, called Strigolniks, which long continued in spite of persecution and the removal of their grievances. Another so-called Jewish sect led to a kind of Mosaism, and set aside the entire Church creed. The origin of the Raskolniks is connected with the improvement of the Church books. The Russians at a very early date had their biblical and mass books in the Slavonic language, but in the most imperfect form. Their gradual improvement required centuries. Great efforts were made at the time when Russia became politically one, to remove these literary corruptions and to introduce learning: the greatest and most effectual of which were made by Patr. Nikon and the council of 1654. This aroused prejudices, which saw in the progress of learning nothing but innovation. They combined in the sect of the Raskolniks (apostates), or Staroverzes (adherents of the old creed) as they called themselves, a multiform fanatical and antihierarchical spirit. Some of them rejected the entire priesthood, and differed from the Church on ritual and liturgical trifles. Bloody scenes, executions, persecution, flight, offers of peace by the Emperors, but nowhere doctrinal discussions, characterize the history of these as also of other sometimes wildly mystical sects, such as the Duchoborzes, Pomoranes, and Kapitonians.—The creed and learning of the Russian Church have not been able in modern times to resist effectually all modern influence. The Emperor Alexander, zealous in behalf of civilization, granted in 1813 the institution of a Bible Society at St. Petersburg; which, however, was abolished again in 1826, after it had printed and widely circulated Russian Bibles. Learning made rapid progress at the academies of Moscow and St. Petersburg. Scholastic subtilities had formerly flourished at Kiew: more liberal studies, extending even to German theology, were now prosecuted at Moscow and St. Petersburg. The representatives of Romanizing tendencies, such as Steph. Jaworski, a pupil of the Jesuits, are very few. At the end of the last cent., Platon, Archb. and Prof. at the Acad. of St. Petersburg, became by his writings and instruction the leader of a milder tendency, less opposed to Protestant views. Philaret, Metrop. of Moscow, represented the same tendency. The pupils of these men attentively followed Germ. Protestant literature. A. v. Stourdza, although strongly opposed to Rome, did not manifest the former rigor against other doctrinal and confessional differences. But these quiet movements have thus far been without practical results. Neither the religious mind of the nation, nor the spirit of the hierarchy, allows a general approximation to what is foreign. The encyclical letter of Pius IX. (1848) to the entire Greek clergy, inviting to a reunion with Rome, met in Russia also the former opposition. The Protestant citizens of the empire enjoy the promised toleration, but are subject to the strictest surveillance, to tricks and annoyances of proselyters.—A few remarks yet on the present condition of the Russian Church. The entire empire is divided into 52 eparchies, and has 24 such episcopal sees with which the archiepiscopal dignity can be connected. Kiew, St. Petersburg, Nowgorod, Kasan, and Tobolsk are metropolitan sees. The Synod of St. Petersburg has also chambers at Moscow and Tiflis. The lower, married clergy, formerly mostly coarse, illiterate and despised, have for some decades been rising in popular estimation; the higher clergy, especially the metropolitans, enjoy the highest public honors. Since generally only the sons of priests become priests, the lower clergy form a compact caste. Alexander exempted the clergy from corporal punishment. The monasteries do not stand in mediæval opposition to the world, but in lively intercourse with it. In 1842 there were 439 monasteries and 113 nunneries, most of which are found in Middle Russia. The schools for the education of the clergy are far more numerous than those for the laity; there are parochial and central schools, besides the theological academies of St. Petersburg, Moscow, Kiew, and Kasan. Every one, even the frivolous and unbelieving of the higher classes, is a member of the Church, and takes parts in its services; for the same bonds of religious patriotism and patriotic churchdom unites all, and have undoubtedly been a source of moral power to the nation. When on Sunday the mass, without difference of rank, fills the Church, kisses the floor, bows to the priest, and after the service crowds to the chief image to kiss it; when at Easter the people suddenly pass from the earnest mortifications of the holy week to a tumultuous joy, in which high and low, lords and servants, embrace each other, and are thus elevated to the feeling of a universal, Christian, fraternal love; when also the celebration of the imperial birth-day bears the impress of strict religious submissions, we see here the Roman Church in all its peculiarity. Profound reverence, a strong feeling of dependence on the divine power, and eager efforts to gain it by works and saving ordinances, a proud consciousness that here alone the doctrines and form of Christianity have been preserved unchanged, are the leading traits of the prevailing piety, which is always tending, however, to servile devotion, legal sanctity, and superstition. This disposition is fostered by the view of numerous churches, chapels, and crosses; by the custom of frequently making the sign of the cross, and by daily intercourse with sacred images. Few know anything about doctrines. The impression made by the tripartite mass, with its pathetic pomp and monotone recitations in the old Slavonic language depends pretty much upon the appearance and bearing of the gorgeously robed and bearded priest. Cultus and churches differ but little from the Greek; only that pictures and music receive special attention. The preparation of pictures is an important branch of industry. The people regard them with awe, in so far as they bring before the eye the holy original, and are therefore no mere handiwork, but a product of a higher inspiration or secret tradition. Such supposed likenesses, mostly unhandsome and rigid physiognomies, are alone valued by adherents of the old. Impressions on paper are valued only when they bear the name of some noted miraculous picture. But there is also a growing party which desires that these pictures, which are indispensable both to public and private devotion, should be executed according to the rules of taste and art. The same difference is arising in liturgical singing. This latter was brought to Russia from Greece in the 11th cent., and was, therefore, according to the Greek system: but it gradually accommodated itself to the ear and taste of the people, and suffered changes also from the reforms of Nikon, without, however, entirely losing its old character. In this way arose the different styles of singing, such as that of Kiew, the old Greek, Bulgarian, and common Russian. According to these styles the singing is slow and prolonged, figurate and redundant, but always solemnly earnest even to the melancholic. In the style of the Starowerzes the prevalence of nasal sounds is offensive to European ears.—In conclusion, we cannot deny a future to a Church, which Providence has spared so wonderfully. May it be a future different from the last thousand years of its existence.—Sources, 1. General ones—LEO ALLATIUS, De eccl. occid. et orient. perp. consens.: Colon., 1648; Ejusd.

Græc. orthod., 1652; LE QUIEN, Oriens Christ., 3 vols.: Par., 1740; DAV. CHYTRÆI, Orat. de stat. ecclesias. hoc temp. in Gr., etc.: Rostoch., 1569; EL. VEJELII, Exercit. de eccl. gr. hod. Argentor., 1666; M. HEINECCIUS, Abbild. der alt. u. neu. gr. Kirche: Lpg., 1711; J. FECHT, Kurze Nachr. v. d. Relig. der heut. Griechen: Rost., 1711; E. MIRUS, Kurze Vorstell. der gr. Kirche: Lpg., 1752; TH. SMITHI, Epist. de gr. eccl. hod. statu: Lond., 1678. — 2. Gr. Church in Turkey; M. CRUSII, Turco-Græc., libri VIII.: Bas., 1584; BICAUT, Hist. de l'état prés. de l'égl. gr. et de l'égl. armén.: Mittelb., 1692; DE LA CROIX, Etat prés. des nations et des égl. gr., armén. et maron. en Turq.: Par., 1695; J. ELSSNER, Neuest. Besch. der gr. Christ. in d. Turk., etc.: Berl., 1737; GEIB, Darstellg. d. Rechtszust. in Gr. and währ. der türk. Herrsch.: Hdlb., 1835; A. BOUÉ, La Turq. d'Eur., 4 vols.: Par., 1840; much information in RHEINWALDS u. BRUNS Repert.; KLOSE, Die Christ. in d. Türkei, in VIEDNER'S Ztschr., 1850. — 3. Modern Greek Church: v. MAURER, Das gr. Volk in öffentl. kirchl. u. priv. rechtl. Bezieh.: Hdlb., 1835; I. J. SCHMITT, Krit. Gesch. der neugr. u. d. russ. Kirche: Mainz, 1840; J. WENGER, Beitr. zur Kenntn. des gegenw. Geistes d. gr. K., etc.: Berl. 1839. — 4. Russian Church: KING, The rites of the Greek Church in Russia: Lond., 1722; PINKERTON, Russia: Lond., 1833; II. J. SCHMITT, Die morgenl. gr. russ. K.: Mainz, 1826; P. STRAHL, Beitr. zur russ. K. G., Th. 1: Halle, 1827; the same, Gesch. d. russ. K., Th. 2: Halle, 1830; H. WIMMER, Die gr. K. in Russl.: Dresd. u. Lpg., 1848; WIGGERS kirchl. statist., Bd. 1, p. 212; KLOSE, Russl. kirchl. statist. in REUTER'S Repert., 1850; HAXTHAUSEN, Etude sur la situation . . . de la Russie, Vol. II., p. 92. GASS. — Reinecke.

Supplementary Note.—The reading of the Bible was never prohibited in the Greek, as it was in the Rom. Church. Hence in the reign of Alexander a Russian Bible Society could be formed, to circulate the Bible in the Russian vernacular. The clergy, however, became alarmed, and Nicholas, in 1826, abolished the Society. The English agents of the Prot. Bible Society continued zealously the work of spreading Russ. Bibles, wherefore the government forbade them to issue a new edition of it. The agents now purchased the depositories on hand among the priests. In the Slavonic, or Russ. holy language, the Bible is still circulated in Russia. But as few people can understand this, and the popes sell even such Bibles only to those whose orthodoxy is above suspicion, the circulation of the Bible is but little advanced. The most extensive acquaintance with the Bible is found among the spiritualistic-mystical Duchoborzes. Nor was the reading of the Bible prohibited in the other sections of the Greek Church.

THE EDITOR. — Reinecke.

Greenland, an Arctic country of North America, belonging to Denmark, in form, as far as known, a peninsula, stretching south to 59° North lat., was the outermost colony of the Norwegian race. Towards the close of the 9th century, Guunbjorn, a Norwegian, discovered a group of islands between Iceland and Greenland, and called them Guunbjorn's shears, after his own name; they were visited, about the middle of the 10th century, by a second Norwegian explorer, who was murdered while there by his own companions; at a later period Eric, the Red, having been outlawed in Iceland, undertook an expedition to the same islands, but instead of finding them, came to Greenland. In this way the country was discovered. Eric hastened back to Iceland, collected a number of colonists, and with them returned to Greenland (which euphonious name he gave to the country in order to entice new colonists to its shores), and began a permanent settlement in the year 985. He found no signs of inhabitants, except a few Esquimaux. Among his colonists were single Christians who lived unmolested in the midst of the heathens, but not without taking part in their religious and superstitious customs. It was not until King Olaf Trygvason (see Art.), the founder of Christianity in Norway, Iceland, the Orkney and Farø Islands, gave the impulse, that Christianity prevailed in Greenland; and even then it consisted only in the acceptance of baptism by the few colonists who were there. Eric's son, Leif by name, was the agent whom the king employed in this mission. Leif had become well disposed towards Christianity while on the Hebrides, where he fell in love with Torgunna, who was reputed to have a knowledge of sorcery, but, at the same time, to be a good Christian. In the year 999 he went from the Hebrides, or, according to another record, from Greenland, which country he had visited, to Norway in order to present himself to the King at Druntheim. The latter preached the gospel to all his heathen subjects who had come to meet him there; and was so successful, in the case of Leif, that the man was baptized together with his entire ship's company, and remained at court, for the winter, in high favor with the King. Afterwards he was sent by Olaf to Greenland, in order to proclaim Christianity there. Several ordained priests were commissioned to accompany him. When the King first spoke of the enterprise, Leif expressed his fears that it would not succeed; but the monarch declared that he knew of no man better qualified to carry it out than he, and that prosperity would attend him. In fact, it appears that Leif was the evangelist and preacher; the priests merely administering the sacraments. Arrived in Greenland, he was well received by all the colonists, and soon began to preach Christianity, making known the message of Olaf Trygvason, and setting forth the pomp and glory which would accompany the new faith. Eric, who had remained in Greenland, was baptized amongst others, but continued a half-heathen. His wife, Thjodhild, on the contrary, became a jealous Christian, and caused a church to be built near her house, where she and all those who had embraced Christianity, were accustomed to pray. Since that time Leif was called the Happy. But Christianity had by no means gained a complete victory over heathenism outwardly, much less inwardly. In the 11th century individual heathens continued to serve their gods openly and unopposed. Even in the case of baptized colonists, remnants of their former religion subsisted, side by side, with their new faith; so that, according to circumstances, sometimes the one and sometimes the other was in the ascendancy. Hence the fact that messengers came from Greenland and the Orkney Islands, to Archbishop Adam of Hamburg (1043-1072), requesting him to send German missionaries to those shores, will excite no surprise; nor the circumstance that Adam of Bremen believed the Greenlanders to have been converted in his time. (Adam, Br. III., c. 23; IV., 36, ad eos etiam sermo est nuper Christianitatem pervenisse). In the year 1122 a separate Greenland bishopric was organized, whose See was near Gardar, on the east coast; subsequently it was transferred to the Archbishop of Drontheim. Seventeen Greenland Bishops are mentioned, up to 1408. For a long period the settlements flourished. There were, on the east coast, 190 farms and villages, constituting 12 parishes, and embracing the Episcopal See and two monasteries; on the west coast, the farms numbered between 90 and 110, and formed four parishes. After the union of Norway with Denmark, in the year 1387, intercourse with Greenland ceased; and this country begins to disappear from the page of history. Some suppose that the black death (1348-1350) raged on these distant coasts also; and that, in consequence, the northern savages, who had appeared among the Norwegians in the middle of the 14th century, and had had contentions with them, advanced more and more, and overwhelmed the remnant of the colonists. Others believe that owing to a vast accumulation of ice, all connection with the mother country was cut off, and the settlers deprived of the necessary support. The ruins of churches and other buildings found on the west coast indisputably prove the existence of former Christian settlements. Repeated attempts have been made by the Kings of Denmark to recolonize the country. The last expedition proceeded from Bergen in 1674.

Concerning the Protestant missions in Greenland, since the beginning of the 18th century, see the Articles Egede and Missions, Protestant. Comp. Maurer, die Bekehrung des norwegischen Stammes zum Christenthume, Vol. I.: Munich, 1855. Münter, Kirchengeschichte von Dänemark und Norwegen, 1823, Part I., p. 555. Die Missionen der evangelischen Brüder in Grönland und Labrador: Gnadau, 1831. [The Moravians in Greenland: Edinburgh, 1835; and especially Crantz's History of Greenland and the Moravian Missions there, translated from the German: London, 1767.]

HERZOG.—De Schreinitz.

Gregory I. — The Catholic Church calls him "the Great," and numbers him with Ambrose, Augustine, and Jerome as the "fourth Doctor ecclesiæ." He was born in Rome, c. 540, of a high and pious family. In his youth he gained the affections of his fellow-citizens as Prætor urbanus. But his own inclinations and the spirit of the age led him to enter a monastery. He sold all and founded seven cloisters, one of them, St. Andrew's, in Rome, for his own residence. This life he loved, and pursued it with so strict an ascetical course, that his health suffered. He wished to go as a missionary to the Anglo-Saxons (see Art.), but Pelagius II. made him a deacon, and in 578 or 579, he sent him to Constantinople as an Apo-risiarius (see Art.), where Emperors became his friends, and Leander, Bishop of Hispalis (Sevilla), in Spain, induced him to write his Moralia. He succeeded in reconciling the Emperor to Pelagius II., who had been ordained as Pope without imperial consent, and also received promises of aid against the Lombards. In 585 or 586 he returned, and as Abbot of St. Andrews he gained credit by his strictness and by his diplomatic capacities. When Pelagius died in 590, the Senate, the clergy, and the people unanimously elected him as successor. Vainly he tried to escape from this office by sending a secret letter to the Emperor, requesting him to withhold his consent, and afterward even by flight. The letter was intercepted, his flight detected, and on Sept. 3d, 595, he was ordained.

As a Pope he proved himself very efficient. The Roman Church then was in a very critical position. Rome itself was a dependency of the Byzantine Emperors, who looked upon Church and clergy as political instruments, and failed to protect it against the Lombards, their political and ecclesiastical enemies. Protracted wars had nearly ruined the Church in Italy, the church edifices were plundered, the priests expelled, captive or demoralized, the congregations disorganized, and the morals of the people severely affected. The Roman Patriarchal See disturbed by the Istrian schism, the Donatists reviving in Africa, Gaul in confusion under Fredegunda and Brunhilda, Ireland and Great Britain, as far as they were Christianized, disconnected from Rome and overrun with heathen Anglo-Saxons. Spain only presented a hopeful appearance since the conversion of the West Goth king, Reccared, in 589. Indeed, these circumstances called for an extraordinary man, and such was Gregory.

The first sparks of his genius shone in his Synodica, the customary inaugural, where he explains the duties of a Bishop, and binds himself to the four Gospels, the four oecumenical Synods, and even to the anathemata of the fifth. Soon after he published earnest exhortations to the clergy in a book: De cura pastoralis, and illustrated them by his own conduct. He preached often and lived like a monk, he allowed no luxury and no lay-persons in his household, and spent all his income in benevolence. His efforts to stop the incursions of the Lombards, and to make peace with them, were not quite successful (cf. Gfrörer, K.-G., II., 2, 1061-63; Lau, Gregor. I., 59-67, 138-142), but he succeeded in repairing his churches, and especially in restoring discipline. He took care to have all vacant bishoprics filled with worthy men, and forbade their demanding any payment for consecrations, marriages, baptisms, etc. He refused all presents, and at the Roman Synod, in 595, he had even the customary present for the pallium abrogated. He tried to raise a pious clergy in the monasteries and exhorted them to conduct themselves in a becoming manner, to be diligent, affable, strict, benevolent; not to be absent from their parishes, to abstain from secular pursuits, and not to submit to secular jurisdiction. He favored celibacy; but the subdeacons, upon whom this rule had been enjoined by Pelagius II., he freed from it, if they would give up their priestly character, retaining only the functions of a notary. He strengthened his authority in his own diocese, and in the metropolitan dioceses, subject to him by appointing stewards of the Roman patrimonies (rectores patrim.), Roman deacons and subdeacons, and official attorneys of the Roman possessions (defensores), whom he employed as the agents. In thus favoring hierarchical institutions he erred, but not from any ambitious motives. It was the spirit of the age, to pay less regard to personal piety than to the organic development of the Church.

He was a great friend to monastic institutions. He loved to build and to endow cloisters, and to watch over their purity. No youths under 18 years of age, no untried strangers, no husbands applying without their wives' permission, no secular officers without an honorable dismissal were to be received. The novitiate was to last two years, for soldiers three. Monastic discipline was upheld even by force. Monks elected to the ministry must leave the cloister, priests must never enter a cloister except for ministerial functions, lest the quietude of the monks should be broken. When some cloisters were abused by violent and rapacious bishops, he granted first a special, and finally, at the 3d Lateran Synod, a general exemption of all monasteries from their episcopal government. Here it was decreed, that no Bishop has any right to the property of cloisters, that all difficulties between cloisters and churches are to be settled by their abbots, all the abbots are to be elected by their own congregations, etc. The Bishops have only the right of installation and of a general superintendency. (Opera Gr. d. Bened. II., App. 1294, ep. 8, 15, 34). Gieseler, I., 2, 426. Gfrörer, Kirchengesch., 1087-1088. Schröckh, Kircheng., 17, 299. Lau I., c. 128-31, 240.

His care for the monks gave rise to his surname, Pater Monachorum, his care for ceremonies, Pater Ceremoniarum. But as his liturgical works are lost in the original, it becomes difficult to ascertain which of the liturgical forms ascribed to him, really owe their origin to him. So much is certain, that he forbade the use of any other but the Latin language. In restoring and correcting the Gelasian Sacramentarium, he followed in the footsteps of Leo I. and Gelasius I. The canon missæ in its present form owes its origin mostly to him (Opp. III., 1-5). The antiphones, sung at mass, were also collected by him (Joh. diac. I., c. 2, 6). His authorship of the Liber responsalis is doubtful. Contemporaneous with his liturgical institutions we find the cantus firmus or planus, slow singing instead of the rhythmical, metrical cantus figuratus. He is also said to have added the four Plagalian tones to the four Ambrosian ones, and to have changed the musical characters. Finally, he founded the Orphanotrophium, an institution in which orphans were educated for church-music. (Cf. Forkel, Gesch. d. Music, I., 164-186. Antony, Lehrbuch d. greg. Kirchenges.: Münster, 1829. Lau I. c. 244-298).

Upon the estates belonging to his See (Patrimonium S. Petri) he bestowed much care, and had them administered in a spirit of justice as well as mildness (cf. Ep. 1, 44. Gfrörer, l. c. 1093. Neander, l. c. 138).

Besides the Roman diocese his patriarchal See comprised the metropolitan bishoprics of Ravenna, Aquileja, Milan, Valentia, Thessaly, Macedonia, Epirus, and the so-called Justiniana prima Achaia. These he ruled in the same manner. These Bishops had to respect his vicars, to appear at his Synods and to reside in their dioceses. True, he respected their rights, but he also enforced his own authority, especially the right of appealing to Rome. In demanding all appeals to be conducted at Rome instead of in their own dioceses, he even overstepped his predecessors' assumptions. How well he understood to subdue all opponents, he showed in the case of Maximus, who had been elected Bishop of Solona against his papal will. Although Maximus at first tore to pieces his mandate, he had finally to do public penance. Gregory felt convinced that he had the right to superintend the whole Church, and of course also the Greek Church (Ep., 9, 12), and expressed himself concerning a Constantinopolitan Synod, that sine apostolicæ sedis auctoritate nulla quæque acta fuerint vires habent (Ep. 9, 68). When the Constant. patriarch, John, deposed two presbyters who appealed to Rome, he had the matter inquired into at a Roman Synod. But it remains uncertain how far he succeeded in this movement. Of more importance is his dispute with the same Patriarch about the title Episcopus Universalis, adopted by the latter. He demanded that this title should not be used, and broke off all intercourse with him. When the Emperor advised peace, he yielded only so far as to make the same demand in milder terms (Ep. 5, 19). To assume such a title, he said, would be to imitate the devil's high aimed ambition (Ep. 5, 18). Although the Chalcedonian Council¹ had offered the same title to the Roman Bishops, these, he said, had never accepted of the honor. At the same time he tried to persuade the Emperor (Ep. 5, 20) and the Patriarchs, Eulogius of Alexandria and Anastasius of Antiochia, of the justice of his course (Ep. 5, 43; 9, 68). But having received no satisfactory answers, the difficulties continued even after the death of John (595) with his successor Cyrinus. The Emperor now advised Gregory to receive the bearer of Cyrinus' Synodica in a friendly manner, and the Pope yielded, though reluctantly, so far as to admit the delegate to his own mass (Ep. 7, 33), but continued forbidding his apocrisarius to attend the Patriarch's mass, and as late as 599 he exhorted several Bishops, invited to attend a Synod at Constantinople, in no way to acknowledge that title (Ep. 9, 68). After the death of the Emperor Mauritius (602) these negotiations were renewed with Phocas, his successor, who is said finally to have divested Cyriac of the title, and to have transferred it to Boniface, the Roman Bishop. Gregory's obstinacy about a simple title was but partly the result of his conviction, that so ambitious a title did not become a Bishop, he preferred to assume the title, Servus Servorum Dei, and when the former title was offered him, he declined it. But undoubtedly his chief motive was to gain the confidence of the other Bishops, and thus to prevent the Byzantine Patriarch from receiving a title, which, in future time, might form a basis to more substantial claims (Gfrörer, l. c., 1046-50; Schröckh, l. c., 79-82, is partial against Gregory; Neander, l. c., 160, sqq.).—In secular matters he acknowledged the Emperor as sovereign. True, in the political troubles of Italy, he sometimes took an independent course, but in that he was justified by circumstances, and when he, in some cases, corrected the imperial officers, he acted only as the patron of the oppressed. In defending the independency of the Church, he often came in conflict with the Emperor and his officials, who were not accustomed, in Greece, to respect the rights of the Church. In such cases he chose to take a mild or a violent course, according to circumstances. Generally his language towards the Emperor was very humble, sometimes servile, as in the case of Phocas, who murdered Mauritius, and having ascended the throne, was addressed by Gregory in such language: "Glory be to God on high, who rules the ages and transfers empires! who put an end to oppression and filled with joy many mourning souls," etc. (Ep. 13, 31). And to the Empress he writes (Ep. 13, 39): "Praise be to the Creator in heaven, and to all the glorious choirs of the angels, and thanks from all mankind, that the commonwealth has found consolation and aid." This joyful flattering language may be explained by the fact, that his relations to Mauritius had not been friendly, because the Emperor did not always yield to his claims, and failed to protect Italy against the Lombards; but this explanation is no justification (cf. Pfahler, Gregor u. s. Zeit, p. 49).

¹ This statement is erroneous (cf. WIGGERS, de Gr. M., 21-23; Gieseler, K. G., 1, 2, 228).

We now turn to the Occident, to see what Gregory did for upholding Catholicism against schisms and heresies, for the spread of the Christian religion, and for the development of the Papal supremacy.

The Istrian schism, which his successor had commenced to heal, continued to claim his attention. He obtained an order from Mauritius, the Emperor, summoning the Istrians to a council in Rome. But they objected, and owing to the Lombard wars, nothing further could be done. The King of the Lombards was, through his wife Theodolinda, a Bavarian princess, converted to the Roman faith, but few of his people followed him. In Spain, however, Arianism was suppressed. The Donatists in Africa had been living in peace with the Catholics at the time of Gregory's ascent; they were admitted to the ministry, to bishoprics, and even to the metropolitan See. Gregory succeeded in expelling them gradually from all offices, in reviving the former persecutions, and almost extinguishing the sect. In effecting these and other conversions he employed mildness as well as severity (cf. Neander, l. c., 17, &c.; Marggraff, de vita Gr., 41, sqq.). Against heretics he employed secular powers as much as possible. The Manicheans in Sicily were to be forced into the Roman Church by continued persecution (summopere persequi, ep. 5, 8). Paganism yet existed in Great Britain, in France, even in Sicily, Corsica, Campania, and especially in Sardinia. Here Paganism was even on the increase, the Bishops and the secular government tolerating it in consideration of a fine or tax. Pagan peasants were found even on papal patrimonies. Gregory succeeded in suppressing Paganism in Sicily, the Pagans were loaded with heavy taxes (Ep. 4, 26), punished corporeally and imprisoned (Ep. 9, 55, 8, 18). The Jews were treated less severely, sometimes even protected; yet he was not opposed to forced conversions in an indirect way, hoping that their children thus would at least grow up good Christians.

He laid the foundation to the restoration of the Roman supremacy in the Occident, which had been interrupted by the Fall of the Occidental Roman Empire, by the migration of nations, and by the use of various heresies. He brought Spain under Roman influence. The Catholic Bishops in Africa were connected more firmly with Rome by their common warfare against the Donatists. His connections with Gaul, through their Queen, Brunhilda, served to make him less dependent on the Lombards, and on the Byzantine Emperors. By converting England he did not only gain new territory for the Church, but was also enabled to subject the ancient Britannic Church, and to increase his authority in other directions. In Gaul the King, Childebert, requested him to appoint the Bishop Vigilius, of Arles, as his vicar, and through him Gregory tried to put a stop to simony, and to the Episcopal consecration of laymen. Soon after he commenced addressing Brunhilda, the influential Queen, in letters repulsively flattering. He also granted exemptions to several cloisters, especially to the one at Autun (cf. Neander, l. c., 127, sqq. Lau, l. c., 179, sqq. Gfrörer, l. c., 1063, sqq.).

Gregory died March 12, 604, having been Pope thirteen and a half years. He was canonized, and his festival day was celebrated with great pomp even in Greece. His miracles are of later legendary origin. The chief traits of his character are: common sense, constancy, prudence, cunning, unremitting care for the welfare of the Church, justice, clemency, benevolence. His piety was a strange mixture of living faith and purity of heart, with much superstition and formalism. His learning was praised exorbitantly by the ancient Church, yet he knew neither Greek nor Hebrew. The classic literature, speculative and systematic sciences, were foreign to his practical mind. His theological standpoint is that of Augustine, though leaning to Semipelagianism. He represents original man as of a weaker nature than Augustine does. Consequently his fall appears in a milder light; fallen human nature is not dead, as with Augustine, but sick; free-will, not lost, but weakened, able either to accept or to reject and resist grace. Predestination is based upon prescience—there is no decretum absolutum, no certainty of salvation for man (Neander, l. c., 202; Lau l. c., 493). Christ's death does not extinguish the human debt of sin, but serve only to pay the ransom due to the devil, and his incarnation served to deceive the devil (cf. Baur, Geschichte der Versöhnungslehre, p. 68, &c.; Lau, l. c., 447). Man's happiness corresponds with his acts. Penance and good works console his spirit. Sometimes grace is mentioned, but it is represented as rather unsafe ground. There is a difference between commandments and evangelical advice, therefore pious people may do better than is necessary, and thus gain an extra reward available for others. Saints, relics, masses are very efficient. Thus Gregory laid much to lay the foundation for the penal asceticism, for justification by works and other superstitions of latter ages (cf. Ep. 9, 52, 122; Ep. 3, 33; Ep. 4, 30). The doctrines of transubstantiation, of purgatory, of repeated sacrifices in mass, of masses availing for dead people, were planted and fostered by him. His ethics were unobjectionable, except that he lacks the evangelical view of Christian life and sanctification.

Gregory's literary works: 1) Expositio in Iobum s. Moraliū, I., XXXV., contains no treasures of philology or historical interpretation: Gregory believes a threefold sense of Scripture language. His allegorical interpretations are airy. 2) 40 Homiliae in Evangelia. 3) Homiliae in Ezechielem, more of an edifying character than deep or eloquent. 4) Regulae (curae) pastoralis liber, a purely practical exposition of pastoral duties, which has for centuries been a standard work, translated into most European languages. 5) Dialogorum libri IV, de vita et miraculis patrum Italicorum et de aeternitate animi. A rich fountain of superstition and miracles, it was early translated into the Greek and the Arabic. 6) Registri Epistolarum libri 4, contain nearly 900 very important Letters of Gregory. 7) Liturgical works passing under his name—liber sacramentorum; Benedictionale; liber Antiphonarius; liber responsalis; cf. Bähr, l. c., 450–453. Finally his Hymns, 8 of which are generally ascribed to him (cf. Bähr, die christl. Dichter und Geschichtschreiber Roms: Karlsruhe, 1836, p. 79 (N. B. Bähr's remark, that the hymns are wanting in the Benedict. edition, is erroneous, they are found Tom. III., 177).—The last edition of Gregory's works is: S. Gregorii I. M. Opera omnia, studio et labore monachorum ordinis St. Benedicti e congreg. S. Mauri: Paris, 1705, Vol. 4, fol.—His life was early written by Paulus Diac., the historian of the Lombards, † 799, and by John Diac., a monk at Cassinum, in the 9th cent. (Gregorii opera ed. Bened., Tom. IV.). Concerning later biographies by Maimburg, Denys de St. Marthe, Bayle, Dupin, and others; cf. Bähr, l. c., 38, and Schröckh, K. G., 17, 353–361; Neander, l. H., I., 11, &c., and Memorials of Chr. life (Bohn's ed.), p. 386, &c. Modern biographies are: Wiggers, de Gr. M. ejusque placitis anthropologicis, comment: Rostock, 1838–40. Gfrörer, K. G., II., 2, 1051–1100. Margraff, de Greg. I., vita dissertatio historica: Berolini, 1845. Lau, Gregor. I., nach seinem Leben u. Lehre: Leipzig, 1845. Pfahler, Greg. M. u. s. Zeit: Frankfurt. M., 1832, I. Bd. (not finished).—KLAIBER.—II., May 19, 715—Feb. 10, 731.—His former name was Sergius, he was a Roman by birth and a Benedictine monk. He persuaded the Lombard King, Liutprand, who had already advanced as far as the Tiber, to return: tradition even affirms, that the King on his knees begged his pardon. He was the first Pope who asked for the assistance of the Franks against the Lombards. Though unsuccessful in this movement, he kept his eyes on the Eastern Empires. He subjected to himself the newly founded Church in Germany through Boniface (see Art.) and strengthened the papal influence in Ireland and England. His canonization is probably owing to his zeal for the worship of images (see Art.). The 13th of Feb. bears his name.—(JAFFÉ, Regesta Pontif. Rom.; Vita Greg. II. in VIGNOLII Lib. Pont. II.; BARONIUS, Annal. ad. h. a. PAGI, Breviar. Pont. Rom. I.—III. (Feb. 11, 731—Nov. 28, 741) a Syrian by birth, in all respects a successor of Greg. II., e. g. in his opposition against the Byzantine courts, and its course against images. His Roman Council, in 732, solemnly sanctioned the idolatry of the Occident. He also went to the victor of Tours for assistance against Liutprand, sending him the keys of the tomb of St. Peter, with some relics and titles. Boniface was by him made Archbishop (see Art.). His work, written by him, according to Anastasius, in defence of the worship of images, seems lost.—Sources as above.—IV. (827—Jan. 844), though elected by the clergy and by the people, was not consecrated before his election was sanctioned by the Emp. of the Franks, whose empire soon after fell to pieces. In 833 he went to France to settle the quarrels of Louis the Pious with his sons, but deceived by Lothar, he earned distrust and hatred, and excited a spirit of insubordination in the French Bishops, which finally led to the downfall of the Franco-Papal Theocracy. Ansgar was by him appointed legate of the North, and the Episcopal See of Hamburg was established.—(JAFFÉ, l. c. Vita Gregorii IV., in VIGNOLII Libr. Pont. III.; BARONIUS, PAGI, II., c. c.; GFRÖRER's and FUNK's works on the Hist. of the Franks.—V., his former name was Bruno, a chaplain and near relative of King Otto III., was, at his peremptory advice, April, 996, elected Pope by the clergy and the people. He was a son of Otto, Duke of Carinthia, only 24 years of age, full of reformatory and ambitious ideas. But as soon as the Emperor, after having been crowned by him, had departed, the Roman nobility expelled him (Sept. 996) and elected John XVI. in his place. The Emperor returned victorious. John was, in punishment, lead through the streets of Rome on an ass, and then incarcerated in a cloister. Crescentius, the chief of the rebellious nobility was beheaded; German strength prevailed. Nevertheless Gregory V. displayed a papal spirit even in Germany; he ordered Robert, King of France, to do penance, because, in his marriage with Bertha, he violated the canonical inabilities. Although he could not annul the marriage, he subdued the French clergy. In three Councils he tried strictly to follow the footsteps of Nicholas I. He freed the bishoprics and the abbeys of Italy from burdensome encumbrances. He died suddenly in Rome, Feb. 18, 999, rumor says, poisoned through the hatred of the people.

(JARRÉ, l. c.; Höfler, d. deutschen Päbste, I., p. 195, &c.; Giesebrecht, Gesch. d. deutschen Kaiserzeit, I., p. 761, &c. — VI. (antipope), elected to this office by a party of the Roman nobility against Benedict VIII. (see Art.); but not being recognized by Henry II., it seems he resigned and died unknown. — (Only source, TRIETMARI, Merseb. Chron. in Monu. Germ. Script., III., p. 835. — VOIGT. — VI., 1044–1046, his former name was Job. Gratian, he was an honest priest at Rome, greatly honored by the people because such were scarce. Thus he became rich, and bought out Benedict IX. (see Art.), who had become tired of the hatred of the Romans. He governed wisely and successfully for one year and a half, but the Roman nobility did not like this, and recalled Benedict. Henry III., being called, came to Sutri, where a Synod was held. Here Gregory acknowledged his sin, to have bought the papal chair, excusing his conduct with the necessity of the times, resigned and went with the Emperor to Germany. He died in 1048 in Cologne. H. FLORO. — Ruetenick.

Gregory VII., 1073 to 1085, or Hildebrand, was born of plebeian parents; but it is uncertain whether at Siena or Rome. It seems certain that he was at Rome from childhood, was chaplain to Gregory VI., and accompanied him to Cologne. After Gregory's death he became monk of Clugny, but was brought back to Rome, about 1049, by Leo IX., who made him subdeacon and cardinal. — The reformation of the Church, and the emancipation of the papacy from the secular power, are his work, although he did not live to see the issue of his undertakings. — 1. He destroyed the influence of the Rom. nobility upon the papal elections. After the death of Stephen X. (1058), the Roman nobility had elected Benedict X. against the will of the Cardinals. H. and the cardinals had, with the consent of Empress Agnes, elected Nicholas II. He placed Nicholas on his chair by bribes and arms; and, to put an end to the intrigues of the nobles, he framed the law of Nicholas concerning papal elections, ordering that in future the cardinals (with the Emperor) should have the first vote in them. To break down the castles of the nobles, he invoked the aid of the Normans of S. Italy, and induced their two chiefs, Richard of Capua and Robert Guiscard, to become vassals of the Pope. He thus secured for the papal seat an independent and commanding position in Italy. Nicholas made him archdeacon of the Roman Church. — 2. He destroyed the influence of the German court on the papal elections, in which he was remarkably favored by circumstances. In 1061 Nicholas had been deposed by Agnes (mother of Henry IV.), and had died before the matter had been settled. The party crushed by H. now sent the papal insignia to Agnes, requesting the appointment of a new Pope. She chose, Oct. 28, 1061, Cadalus, Bishop of Parma. The cardinals and H. had elected, Oct. 1061, Alexander II. Cadalus approached Rome with an army, and would have prevailed if Agnes had continued in power. But many German princes had conspired to deprive her of the regency; they carried off Henry IV., and Hanno, Archb. of Cologne, who had assumed the regency of the empire, confirmed Alexander at the council of Augsburg (Oct. 1062) and Mantua (May, 1064). The party of Cadalus maintained itself in Rome until 1066, when it yielded. Thus H. had achieved the reign of a Pope elected by the cardinals against the will of the German court. — H., also, became Pope without the consent of King Henry. Alexander, shortly before his death, had excommunicated several of the King's counsellors, and requested their removal from the court. Before the matter had been settled A. died (April 22, 1073); and Hildebrand, who on the same day was elected Pope by the clergy and people, and called Gregory VII., took up the quarrel, demanding that Henry should yield to the Apostolic chair. The revolt of the Saxon princes (1073) forced Henry to write an humble letter to G., and on Easter, 1074, to do penance before his mother and two cardinal bishops for his connection with the excommunicated counsellors. Nor did G. ask Henry's consent to his election; and from this time the papal election was exclusively in the hands of the cardinals. — 3. Gregory endeavored to abolish the marriage of priests. From the time of Leo IX. former laws prohibiting the marriage of priests had been renewed, but the Bishops had not enforced them. The means to be used in order to carry through his law of celibacy, G. first discovered at Milan. In this city some fanatical priest had, 1057, incited the populace to compel the clergy to dismiss their wives. In 1074, G. commanded the laity to refuse the sacraments at the hands of married priests, and to compel the latter to dismiss their wives. The command was gladly obeyed: knights and rabble rejoiced that they could safely vent their rage upon the clergy, whose consequent sufferings were indescribable. Burning hatred of the Pope filled the secular clergy; and the bishops complained bitterly that their jurisdiction over canons and priests had been transferred to the rabble. They invoked Henry's aid against the Pope (1075). — 4. G.'s grand effort was to restore the freedom of the Church in the investiture of bishops and abbots. He objected to the "execrable custom," as he called the customary investiture, because it was a desecration of the ring and crosier, the official insignia of bishops and abbots, to receive them from the Emperor: an injustice and disgrace that bishops and abbots were mostly appointed arbitrarily by the Emperor, without the consent of the clergy and the people; and that bishops and abbots were thus instituted, who were totally unacquainted with their flock. He thought also that so long as this custom existed, simony could never be extirpated. — His idea was that clergy and people should elect their bishop, and the monks their abbot, with full liberty, and regardless of all except the competency and worthiness of the candidate. The Archbishop was then to invest and ordain the Bishop elect, and the Bishop the abbot elect. Merely this was G.'s idea of the freedom of the Church (Ep. an alle Gläub. aus Salerno, 1084, in Hugo von Flavigny, II.). — This matter had, no doubt, been for a long time discussed in the Lateran: but G. did not announce his law of investiture until the spring Synod of 1075. It provided that no clergyman should thereafter

cept any clerical office from a layman; nor could any layman present a clerical office. But he did not proclaim this law until 1078. It seems that he wished to confer previously with Henry concerning it. He regarded this law as the cause of all his subsequent conflicts with Henry (Ep. Quum veritas. Mansi, XX., 381). It must not be overlooked, however, that G. did not intend by this law to abolish the feudal service which bishops and abbots owed the King (p. to the Church of Aquileja, Sept. 17, 1077). Gregory entertained some other schemes; which, though sufficiently remarkable, were without results. He sought to reduce nearly all countries of Christendom to fiefs of the apost. St. Peter. He asserted direct claims to Spain, Corsica, Sardinia, and Hungary. An exiled Russian prince received from him Russia as a fief. He challenged the Kings of Denmark and England to take the oath of fealty. Some Spanish granees, counts of Provence, Savoy, and Arrelat, all took the oath. William of England refused in pretty short words. Gregory asserted that Charlemagne had conquered Saxony for St. Peter; but he did not found any claims on this, since at this time (1081) he already claimed the entire German empire as a papal fief.—He was also busily occupied (1074) with a scheme of a crusade to deliver the holy pulchre, and with another to reunite the Greeks and Armenians with the Cath. Church. At this time also he threatened to deprive Philip of France of his crown.—But all these schemes were forgotten in his great struggle with Henry V. of Germany, which broke out in the beginning of 1076. Agnes, the King's mother, who, since 1065, had resided at Rome, and Beatrice of Tuscany had made, since 1073, incessant efforts to preserve peace between the Pope and the King. But there were powerful men in Germany, who hated the Pope and desired his degradation. There were also sufficient materials for quarrels. G. had become Pope without the King's consent; he had with his strange prohibition of lay-investiture interfered when the King, according to ancient custom, had rewarded his adherents with the domains of imperial abbays; and he had reduced Upper Italy to deep distress by exciting the rabble to excesses against the clergy. Since 1075, Godfrey, the powerful, wise and just, Duke of Lower Lorraine, had stood high in favor with Henry, and he hated the Pope bitterly; for his wife, Matilda, refused to remain in Germany and returned to her mother, Beatrice of Tuscany. The cause of his troubles he found in the Pope; and not unjustly, for Gregory wished to retain his former influence over Matilda, and strove with all his might to confirm her in her ascetical tendencies. The calumnies concerning his amatory intrigues with her, do not deserve refutation.—Meantime the occurrences at Milan, in 1075, made the rupture inevitable. After the death of Archb. Guido (1071), Henry had appointed Godfrey, a priest of Milan, Archbishop, whom, in 1073, the Lombard bishops had ordained. Alexander II. refused and excommunicated him. The rabble, on the other hand, the partizans of the Pope, had elected a priest named Hatto. But neither of the two met with general favor. Godfrey had retired to an archiep. palace, and Hatto had been in Rome since 1073, where he was confirmed by Gregory. The Pope had often remonstrated with Henry, who had also promised to yield. But the troubles at Milan were such, that peace could be restored only by a conference of the King and Pope. During the summer of 1075 the better citizens of Milan determined to put an end to the disturbances of the rabble. They accordingly slew their leader, a certain knight, Herlembald, and begged the King to restore the glory of the Church of Ambrose, by giving it a worthy Archbishop. Henry appointed a Milanese priest, named Tedald. There were now three Archbishops of Milan, two of them appointed by the King. Gregory was justly highly incensed.—In Nov., 1076, two messages reached Gregory; one from the King, whose object was probably a request to be crowned Emperor; the other from the rebel Saxon princes, charging the King with receiving his excommunicated counsellors at court, and with being guilty of unparalleled vices. The latter were calumnies to which Gregory never attached any credit subsequently, but for the present he did not reject them. He wrote, probably Dec. 8, 1075, an angry letter to Tedald, and despatched the embassy which brought on the outburst of the rupture. The embassy consisted of papal legates bearing Gregory's last letter to Henry (Reg. III., 10, Dec. 8), and the three servants of the King, who brought his letter to the Pope, and were now sent back with a verbal reply. They were to remonstrate, as Gregory tells us (in Ep. Andin. quoad.), with Henry on account of his vices; for the Pope wished unjustly to use those calumnies against the King. The three servants were charged to tell their master that the Pope would deprive him of his kingdom and salvation.—When the embassy arrived at Goslar, Jan. 1, 1076, H. committed the imprudence of deposing Gregory, and thus giving every advantage into his hands. The decree of deposition, assented to by a large portion of the German bishops (Worms, Jan. 24), and subscribed at Piacenza by the Lombard bishops, was answered by Gregory with the anathema. In July already G. was victor. Henry's party was nearly dissolved; Duke Godfrey had been assassinated in February; and the Saxons and S. Germans, who wished to reduce the royal authority, declared that H. should render satisfaction to the Pope. They requested the Pope to be present, Feb. 2, 1077, at Augsburg, where H. was to be tried. The King himself was forced to consent to this.—Gregory started on his journey in December, rejoiced to act as arbiter between the King and the German princes; a position never before occupied by a Pope. In the beginning of January he reached the Po, but heard with terror that H. was in Italy. For H., determined to prevent the meeting at Augsburg, had, in December, secretly crossed the Alps, and was now among the Lombards, who rejoiced in his arrival, hoping that he would put an end to the reign of the hated Pope. But H. had the affairs of Germany in view; and came, therefore, to be absolved from his excommunication in order to remove every pretence of proceedings against him. He fol lowed Gregory to Canossa, where he spent three days in a penitent's garb. The Pope would assuredly not have absolved him, if Matilda and other princes had not vehemently urged him. For it was of great importance to him to be arbiter between the King and the Germ. princes; and he knew that he should enrage the latter if he should absolve the King, and thus expose them to his mercy. In this dilemma he concluded to absolve the King, but also to insist upon a diet, where affairs should be finally settled. Henry was now absolved; but he was fully determined that the diet should never assemble.—The German princes, enraged that Gregory had absolved the King, and fearing that H. would call them to account, elected, March 15, 1077, a rival King in Rudolph of Suabia. Henry now returned to Germany, assembled his adherents, and made war upon the rebels until 1080. During all this time Gregory endeavored to bring about a diet, in which his legates were to settle affairs. Both parties, meantime, joined in preventing it. Seeing this, Gregory in the spring of 1080 again excommunicated H., and recognized his rival. The King's party heard the news with derision. During the summer H. appointed Clemens III., a rival Pope, a man whose excellent qualities Gregory had always praised. The rival King was killed, Oct. 15, in battle, and in the spring of 1081 H. was advancing against Rome.—The Romans promised fidelity to Gregory. In June, 1080, he had absolved Rob. Guiscard from his long excommunication, but received from him no effectual aid. Jordan of Capua, the other Norman prince, was Gregory's enemy. Matilda aided G. with money; but her knights declared resistance to the King to be madness. Meantime the army of the King was small, so that only after a siege of three years he could take a part of the city. March 21, 1084, he installed the rival Pope in the Lateran: G. had taken refuge in the castle of St. Angelo, refusing the requests and unheeding the threats of the Romans. In 1083 Rob. Guiscard brought aid to the Pope. Henry, hearing of the vast army which was advancing with the Duke, evacuated Rome, May 21, 1084. In June Robert entered the city, and carried off Gregory to Salerno. Gregory once more called upon all the faithful to come to his relief; but in vain. After he had spent eleven months at Salerno, he died there, May 25, 1085.—Gregory was undoubtedly a great man. His plans were not executed until after his death; and yet for the history of the West, they opened entirely new channels, and they continue to operate to the present time. In preparing the accomplishment of his designs, he took very skilful advantage of the favorable circumstances of the times, and used means which cannot always be defended, though they accomplished his purpose. He sincerely believed, too, that his plans were for the good of Christendom. Whether they really were so, may well be doubted. He made the papacy independent of the imperial authority, and laid the foundation for its later omnipotence; but this very omnipotence accomplished its fall. He prohibited the marriage of the clergy; and the consequences were such that we dare not describe them. The view of some, that without celibacy the clergy would have become a cast, is a mere hypothesis; facts prove that married priests formed a noble, dignified class; and that the enforcement of celibacy has for the most part demoralized the clergy. By the prohibition of lay investiture he wished to secure the freedom of clerical elections; but more widely than ever before the door was opened to bribes and intrigues.—(STENZEL, Gesch. d. fränk. Kaiser, 1827; VOIGT, Hilke, als P. Greg. VII., 2 Aufl., 1846; SÖTL, Greg. VII., 1847; FLORO, Kais. Heinr. IV., u. s. Zeitalt., 2 vols., 1855–56.—VIII., anti-Pope, elevated March 8, 1118, by Henry V., maintained himself with German aid against Paschal II., but was degraded by Calixtus II., and died in 1125 in a dungeon.—(VIT. BURDINIUS, BALUZZ. Miscell. III.; JAFFÉ, Regesta Pontif..)—VIII., a pious man, of whom great things were expected, was elected Oct. 21, 1187, at Ferrara, but died Dec. 17, after having paved the way for a new crusade.—(BARONIUS, Annal. ad an., 1187; JAFFÉ, l. c.; BOWER, History of the Popes of Rome).—IX., a nephew of Innocent III., and inheritor of his ideas and firmness, was an experienced and meritorious old man when, March 20, 1227, he became Pope. During a cardinalship of twenty-eight years he had seen various phases of the great struggle of the papacy with the Hohenstaufens, and with his own hand had crowned Frederick II. The latter, before his conflict with the Pope, had called him a man of unblemished character, of distinguished piety, learning, and eloquence. He showed to his death an uncommon resoluteness in action. He has often been charged with pertinacity and priestly pride; but the charge is more just against the struggling hierarchy, than his person. Of the mildness of his predecessor, he possessed, of course, nothing.—Soon after his coronation he sent a menacing admonition to the Emperor to undertake his promised crusade. Frederick embarked, but after three days returned on account of sickness. The Pope, regarding this as a mere pretence, excommunicated him on St. Martin's, 1227, absolved his Apulian subjects from their allegiance, and twice renewed the anathema and interdict, although, expelled from Rome by the Ghibellines, he had to fly to Viterbo and thence to Perugia. Frederick, notwithstanding the threefold anathema, now started on his crusade, Aug. 11, 1228; found the templars and knights of St. John, the Syrian clergy and patriarch of Jerusalem highly embittered against him by papal missals, but crowned himself in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, and by a treaty with the Saracens reopened Jerusalem, Bethlehem, and Nazareth to pilgrims. Hearing that Gregory had excited the Lombard cities against him, and sent marauding soldiers into his kingdom in Lower Italy, he returned to Europe, drove the hirelings from his dominions, but was again excommunicated. Hermann of Salza, master of the German knights, now effected a peace between the heads of Christendom, and they had a conference at Anagni, Sept. 1, 1230. But this proved a mere truce; the conflict of prin-

les urged on the catastrophe. When Frederick with success, but also with fearful rigor, punished the rebel towns of Lombardy, over whose rights Gregory claimed the office of arbiter; when he made his son, Enzo, King of Saragines, which Gregory regarded as an apost. fief; he was excommunicated, Palm Sunday, 1239, for the fifth time, and the quarrel now became one for life and death. Frederick caused his orthodoxy to be proven at Padua by Peter of Vinea, advanced against Rome, drove the papal army into the city, and everywhere inflicted punishment, often cruelly and with scornful hatred of priests. Shut up in Rome, Gregory died Aug. 31, 1241, from the effects of grief and the great heat, aged nearly one hundred years, but preserving to the last the freedom of the Church. — There remain of him five books of decretals, gathered and arranged by Raymond le Pennafort. He canonized SS. Elizabeth, Dominic, Francis, Anthony of Padua, and others (see notes). — (MURAT., Script. T., III., pts. I., II.; LAYNARD, Annal.; BÖHMER, die Regest. d. Kais. reichs unt. Phil., Otto IV., u. Friedr., II.; v. LAUMER, Gesch. d. Hohenst., Bd. 3, 4; HÖFLER, L. Friedr., II.) — X. was elected by a commission of cardinals, Sept. 1, 1271, when the papal chair, owing to the quarrels of the Italian and French cardinals, had been vacant three years. In order to a crusade he strove to reconcile the Guelfs and Ghibellines, and at the 2d Council at Lyons he sought, though vainly, to reunite the Greek with the Roman Church. In Germany he won high praises by aiding in the election of Hapsburg emperor. He died, highly esteemed, at Arezzo, Jan. 10, 1276. — (MURAT., Script., T. II., P. I. II.; v. BONACCI, Roma, 1711; BÖHMER, Regest. Imp. inde ab a. 1256–1313; BOWER, list. of the Popes, VIII., p. 145). — XI. was elected Dec. 30, 1370, at Avignon. He was made cardinal in his 17th year, and was nepotistic like his uncle, Clemens VI. His efforts to reunite the Greek and Roman Church, and to make war against the Turks, were without results. A skilful canonist and theologian, he violently controverted the Wickliffite doctrines. Urged by the prayers of the Romans, and the arguments of St. Catharine of Siena, he entered Rome Jan. 27, 1377, amid the acclamations of the people. He died March 28, 1378. — (FILLIP. Aven. ed. BALUZ., I.; BOWER, Hist. of the P.) — XII. was elected Nov. 30, 1406, by the Rom. cardinals; and, like his Avignonian rival, Benedict XIII., held on to his schismatic dignity, with an odious astuteness and pertinacity. He was forsaken by even those cardinals who had elected him. His degradation by the Council of Pisa he answered with an anathema. At Constance, however, he voluntarily laid aside the papal robes, and lived two years yet in honor as card. bishop of Porto. He died Oct. 8, 1417, aged 90 years (for sources, see Art. Constance, Council of). — XIII. had, for eight years, taught canonical law at Bologna, and was an active, lively, jovial man. Before entering the clergy he had an illegitimate son. His learning and activity at the Council of Trent gained for him the Cardinalship. He became pope, May 13, 1572, through the agency of Granveilla. The rigor and fiery energy of the Catholic reaction now gave such an elevation to his life and character, that he was a pattern to his court. His world-wide labors corresponded with the extensive aims, which the youthful vigor of the Jesuits pointed out to the Church. The latter was arraying its forces against Protestantism. Gregory signalized the massacre of St. Bartholomew's with processions and medals, and zealously supported Henry III. against the Huguenots, but could not subvert the liberties of the Gallican Church. The Spanish armada gave him strong hopes of the extirpation of the Anglican heresy, but he did not live to see the issue. — In other quarters he gathered forces more successfully; for he instituted 22 Jesuit Colleges, and spent two millions scudi in educating young men. Whilst adorning Rome with magnificent churches, he sent Possevin to Russia to effect a reunion of the Greek with the Roman Church, and sent missionaries to India and Japan. As cardinal already he had labored in the correction of the decretum Gratianum; in 1582 the new folio edition of the corpus juris canonici was issued. So he also effected the improvement of the Julian calendar. But through all these expenses the papal finances became involved; and his judicial measures incited the barons of the Church States to robberies, which he could not suppress. He died April 10, 1585, aged 83 years. — (See his works in Ecc's Pontif. doct.; Lives by CIAPPI, 1591; BOMPLANI, 1685; MAFFEI, 1742; BOWER u. RAMBACH, Hist. d. röm. Päbste, Th. X., P. 1, p. 225; RANKE, die röm. Päbste, Bd. 1, p. 419). — XIV., from Dec. 5, 1590 to Oct. 15, 1591, elected to end the party rancor dividing the conclave, was pious and moral, but very insignificant, and wholly in the hands of the Spanish and leaguists of France, which latter he aided with money and troops. His anathema against Henry IV., aided no little in bringing the latter back to the Cath. Church. — (See his bulls in Bullar. Magn., ed. CHERUBINI, T. II.; his Biogr. by CICARELLA, in the successive editions of PLATINA; RANKE, die röm. Päbste, Vol. II., p. 221). — XV., Feb. 9, 1621–July 18, 1623, was a sickly, feeble old man when he became Pope. But his nephew, Ludovico, acted for him, which he did so entirely in the world-embracing sense of Gregory XIII., or rather of Jesuitism, that his short pontificate achieved unparalleled results. The Catholic reaction gained the most brilliant triumphs in Bohemia, Austria, and Hungary. Ferdinand II. and Maximilian of Bavaria were led by the Jesuits. In France, even in the Netherlands, and at the English court, the restoration of Catholicism advanced rapidly. The founding of the Congr. de propag. fid. gave immense energy to foreign missions. Gregory also gave to the conclave its present organization: the secret scrutinium was wholly new. — (See bulls in Bullar. Magn. ed. CHERUB., T. III.; RANKE, ut supr., II. p. 454). — XVI. — If the Popes of recent times may be classified as Popes of the Church or Popes of Italy, according as the idea of the head of the Catholic Church, or an Italian prince predominated in their labors, Gregory XVI. belongs undoubtedly to the former class. In times as dangerous as those which followed the French Revolution of July, 1830, none of the statesmen in the Cardinals' College would accept the pontificate. It was accepted Feb. 2, 1831, by Mauro Cappellari, an aged monk, general of the Camaldulensians; and the name Gregory, which he assumed, gave promise of a strictly churchly, and not Italian pontificate. This was fulfilled to such a degree, that during his reign of 15 years the Church-State was reduced by neglect and disorder to almost insupportable distress; though at the same time the Cath. Church achieved elsewhere very important advantages. He was born Sept. 18, 1765, at Belluno; entered in his 18th year the Camaldulensian monastery of St. Michael, near Venice; and was sent, after 12 years, to Rome as companion of the Procurator-General of his Order. At Rome he wrote, in 1799, his work: "The triumph of the holy chair and the Church, a refutation of the attacks of innovators with their own weapons" (Ital., Rome, 1799; Germ., 2d ed., 1848). In 1800 he became member of the academia ecclesiastica at Rome; 1801 abbot of S. Gregorio, the monastery of the order at Rome; 1815, consultant to several of the most important congregations, the inquisition, index, etc.; 1823, general of his order; 1826, cardinal and prefect of the propaganda. The duties which the latter office imposed upon him he discharged as Pope, and namesake of the founder of the propaganda, with such extreme fidelity, that in this sense he has often been called, perhaps too early, the last of the Popes. — The beginning of his reign was calculated to confirm him in this direction. The entire Church-State was deeply agitated; Bologna, Spoleto, and Ancona had renounced their allegiance. In Feb., 1831, more than a million had declared themselves independent. But the insurgents had not sufficient soldiers and arms; many were intimidated by the resolute conduct of some prelates; Austrian troops also were sent to the rescue: this, with promises of a reformation in the administration, the shutting up of the investitures for the space of a year, and numerous imprisonments, restored a certain degree of quiet. But in 1832 the disturbances again broke forth so violently in the north, in Forli, Bologna, etc., that they could be quelled only by Austrian and French intervention. Apparent quiet and insurrections, short amnesties and measures of violence, alternated with each other for some time. At the end of the pontificate there were 2000 political prisoners and convicts. The finances were in the most distressed condition: the public debt amounted to 38 million scudi, with a yearly deficit of half a million. All branches of industry were at a low ebb; and whilst the attention of the police was only directed to political delinquents, public security was wholly neglected. — But though indifferent to this distress, Gregory with his secretaries was very active in the great and general affairs of the Catholic Church. Perhaps no other Pope did so much in founding new bishoprics and apost. vicariates. A statistical report, published by the propaganda in 1843, gives, from 1800–43, 34 newly erected apost. vicariates, 32 of them erected by Gregory; 40 new bishoprics, 27 of them erected by G. (several years later, the Dizionario of MONORI, enumerates only 15 missionary bishop. founded by G.); 43 colleges and orders were occupied in training and sending missionaries. The College urbanum de propag. f. was transferred by Gregory, in 1836, to the Jesuits. These missions were very liberally supported by independent associations. The French Assoc. de la fa alone had a revenue in 1843 of 3,562,088 francs. In the same statistical report the entire Catholic population of the world is stated to be 160,842,424; of which 155,748,540 were subject to the completely organized hierarchy, and 5,093,884 to apost. vicariates and prefectures. For this community Gregory did not fail to issue regulations of unequal value; such as the prohibition of the slave-trade, of Bible dissemination, and Bible societies. He also appointed more than 80 cardinals. In almost every country the position of the papacy became very advantageous. Even outside of Europe the Cath. Church gained large increase by new dioceses and vicariates in America and Asia, especially in China, and some also in Africa and Australia. In European countries the same Church was found, of course, in somewhat dissimilar relations. In Portugal in the conflict between the brothers Don Pedro and Don Miguel, G. had recognized the latter as King, because he sought to maintain himself by the more churchly party. After 1841 G. inclined more to the party of Queen Dona Maria da Gloria, daughter of Don Pedro; for he sent to her the Golden Rose, and stood sponsor for her son. Affairs were similar in Spain: in the civil war which arose after the death of Ferdinand II., because the latter had abrogated the salic law in favor of his daughter Isabella to the prejudice of his brother Carlos, the regent and her advisors made considerable encroachments upon the revenues of the Church, whilst Don Carlos declared the holy Virgin the patroness and generalissima of his army, and thus gained the favor of the clergy and the churchly party. Gregory also declared in Carlos' favor; and in his allocution of Feb., 1841, declared the abolition of monasteries and sale of their property; the restrictions of the bishops in filling church offices; and the law concerning the salaries of the clergy, as null and void. After 1845 affairs took another course, and the Pope before his death had the pleasure of seeing this old Catholic country returning to obedience. In France Louis Philippe, like Napoleon, sought to secure his reign by attaching himself closely to the Pope and favoring the hierarchy in France, but left it to fight its own battles with its enemies, who also were tolerated. The charter of 1830 secured freedom and protection to all religions; but it also said that the Catholic religion being the religion of the great majority of the French, had a special right to this liberty and protection. The four articles of the Gallican Church liberties were no longer insisted upon by the bishops, and were even attacked by men of talent; as in 1844 by Count Montalembert. The public recognition of the Jesuits, of whom there were already 200 in the country, was also demanded, though at this time without success. In England nothing new was undertaken against the government; but the experiments ventured upon by Pius IX.

were made possible by the extraordinary increase of the Catholic population in the three British kingdoms, under Gregory. According to the statistics of the propaganda, there were 65,030 Catholics in London in 1843, and during the last four years the number had increased by 26,236. In 1840 four new apostolical vicariates had been established. In 1849 there were in England alone 622 Catholic churches, 11 colleges, 8 monasteries, 34 nunneries, and 818 priests, whilst in 1792 there had been in England and Wales only 35 small chapels. The Catholic population in England and Scotland, which, in 1821, had been 500,000, increased under Gregory to nearly four millions; in 1842 there were 2,500,000; and in 1845, 3,380,000. — Even in Denmark, where, as late as 1827, conversions to the Catholic Church had been punished with exile, the native Catholics, about 1000, received somewhat more liberty. — In Austria the Church was still subordinate to the State, and free communication with Rome forbidden, according to the statutes of Emperor Joseph. Bavaria, from the 16th century, the most faithfully papal of German countries, became under Gregory for a time the centre of a theological and historical school, which was widely influential through its courage, zeal, talent, and learning; and which disseminated far and wide the idea of a Church government administered by a powerful spiritual sword and emancipated as much as possible from all secular authorities; and which, finally, commended a willing subserviency to the Pope. — In Prussia the differences of the government with its Catholic Bishops and the Pope led only to further concessions and liberties in favor of the Catholics. In Russia alone the papal measures were without results. A Synod of Feb. 24, 1839, had proclaimed the reunion of the united Greeks in Russia; in consequence of which 1600 priests and monks, and several millions of laymen, united with the Russian Church. At an allocution of Nov. 22, 1839, Gregory could utter only ineffectual complaints concerning this, which were answered by Russia with stringent prohibitions of proselytism to the Roman Church. In his last years G. sought to obtain greater concessions from the Emperor Nicholas personally, when the latter, in Dec. of 1845, visited the Pope at Rome. The Emperor is said to have answered favorably. The Pope died half a year thereafter, June 1, 1846. His effects were so poor, that the designation of apostolical poverty is not inapplicable in his case. — (See MORONI's Dizionario di erudiz. storico-ecclesiast., 32d vol.; O. MEYER, die Propaganda, etc.: Gött. u. Lpz., 1853, 2 vols.; L. C. FARINI, lo stato Rom. dell' anno 1815, al anno 1850: Turin, 1841, 3 vols.)

HENKE. — Reinecke.

Gregory, of Heimbürg, was born of a noble family at Würzburg, at the beginning of the 15th cent., where he also studied law, and was made L.L.D. about 1430. We meet him first as a public character at the Council of Basle, where he became connected with Æneas Sylvius (afterwards Pope Pius II.), who availed himself of Gregory's learning and eloquence by appointing him his secretary, and with him energetically resisted the encroachments of the papacy on the civil power. Heimbürg, however, could not maintain his position, and he therefore went to Nuremberg, where he was made syndic, and soon gained so great a reputation as jurist, that he was consulted in all the important civil and ecclesiastical questions of his time. In 1446 he was sent as the chief of a commission, which was appointed by the German electors, to Rome, to protest against the deposition of the Archbishops Theodoric of Cologne and James of Treves, to insist upon a legitimate Council, and the abolition of all innovations (see Müller, Reichstagstheatrum, I., p. 278). The Pope, Eugene IV., gave the commission no satisfactory reply, and soon after its return to Frankfort, Gregory wrote one of his most remarkable treatises against the papacy, bearing the title: Admonitio de injustis usurpationibus Paparum Rom. ad imperatorum, reges et principes Christianos, sive Confutatio Primatus Papæ (Goldast, Monarchia S. Rom. Imperii, T. I., p. 557). He now entered the service of the Archduke Sigmund of Austria, and continued his attacks on the papacy—immediately on Pius II., his former friend. This Pope convened an assembly of the princes at Mantua, to bring to pass a crusade in Germany. He appeared here as the ambassador of Sigmund, and successfully opposed the design of Pius, for which the latter determined to avenge himself. An opportunity soon presented itself. Cardinal Nicholas of Cusa, a former friend of Heimbürg, was made Bishop of Brixen against the will of Sigmund, who finally imprisoned him. For this act Pius II. excommunicated the Archduke (June 1, 1460); he appealed, through Gregory, to a general council (Aug. 13, 1460; Goldast, l. c., T. II., p. 1576), and had the appeal nailed to the church-doors of many cities in Italy. Gregory nailed it on the church-door of Florence, for which Pius now also laid him under the ban. Gregory opposed the ban with an appeal to a future council (Goldast, l. c., p. 1592), in which he exhibits the abuse of papal power, and defends the position that the council is superior to the Pope; that, therefore, the appeal to a general council was justified. The apostolic referendary and bishop of Feltri, Theodore Lilius, it is true, replied to this appeal (Goldast, l. c., p. 1595), but he was powerfully refuted by Gregory in his Apologia contra detractiones et blasphemias Theod. Lælii (Goldast, l. c., p. 1461). Gregory also wrote a treatise against Nicholas of Cusa, Invectiva in Rever. Patrem, Dom. Nicolaum de Cusa (Goldast, l. c., p. 1626), and in defence of Archbishop Diether of Mayence, whom Pius arbitrarily deposed. Not long after this, he was forsaken on all sides; Sigmund was reconciled with and absolved by Pius (1464), and Diether succumbed and resigned his archbishopric. Gregory now went to Bohemia, and carried on his attacks on the papacy under the protection of King George Podiebrad (see Eschenlör, Geschichte von Breslau, herausg. von Kunisch. Breslau, 1827). He took up his residence at Dresden, and after the death of Pius, obtained absolution from Sixtus IV., through the mediation of Duke Albert (1472). He died shortly after this (Aug., 1472) in Dresden, and was buried in the church of St. Sophia. His writings appeared under the title: Scripta nervosa justitiæque plena, ex manuscriptis nunc primum eruta: Freft., 1608. Comp. Hagen, in der Zeitschrift Bragn: Heidelberg, 1839, II., p. 414, sq.; Ullmann, Reformatoren vor der Reformation I.: Hamb., 1841, p. 212, sq.

NEUDECKER. — Beck.

Gregory, called, by the Armenians, Lusakoritsch, the illuminator, the founder of Christianity in Armenia, was the son of the Parthian prince, Anacus. He was born c. 257, and received a Christian education at Cæsarea in Cappadocia. He it was who converted the King Tiridates to Christianity, whose example was followed by the nobles and a great part of the people. Gregory proceeded in this with great wisdom and judgment. He allowed the heathen priests their former income. At his suggestion schools and cloisters were founded in all the towns of Armenia. In these schools he received the sons and relatives of the heathen priests, and sought to win them to Christianity. In 302 he was consecrated patriarch of the Armenian Church at Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, by Bishop Leontius. Gregory was married and had several sons, of whom Aristax was the most distinguished. Towards the close of his life, Gregory transferred his office to Aristax, and retired to a mountain-cave in the province of Darnalia, where he also died (Moses Choren., II., c. 88). — Gregory was not only the founder of the Armenian Church, he was also a writer. Of his writings there is yet preserved: Sacred sermons or homilies, first published at Constantinople, 1737; in a larger work titled, Haschachapadum, i. e., stromata, lately, according to the Greek translation, by the Mechitarists at San Lazaro, near Venice, 1837. See Catalogue des livres de l'imprimerie Arménienne de S. Lazare, Venise, 1848. It is questionable whether these homilies are genuine. Several prayers in the Armenian breviary are also attributed, and several canons of the Armenian Church discipline (comp. Neumann, Geschichte der armenischen Literatur: Lpz., 1836; Moses Chorenensis, historiae Armenicæ, libri III.: London, 1736).

HERZOG. — Beck.

Gregory, of Nazianzus, one of the three distinguished Cappadocians, who represent the Greek theology towards the end of the 4th century, was born about 330 (according to other reckonings 326–29), either at Nazianzus, or in the neighboring town of Arianzus. His mother, Nonna, was a very pious woman and zealous deaconess. Young Gregory, being early inclined and devoted to the ministry, strove after a thorough theological and scientific education. He visited Cæsarea in Syria and in Palestine, then Alexandria, and finally Athens. At this latter place, he with his friend Basil (see the Art.), devoted himself for years to the study of grammar, mathematics, rhetoric and philosophy. At 30 years of age (360) he, with his brother, Cæsarius, left Athens, and returned to Cappadocia. He was now baptized; and the way to ecclesiastical honors was opened to him, but his natural disposition held him back. He accepted an invitation from Basil to an asylum in Pontus, in order that, with him, he might find the highest contentment in religious seclusion, pious self-examination and scientific reading. A fruit of their joint labors is the collection of extracts from the writings of Origen, which we still possess under the title of Philocalia. The next following period of his life was not so tranquil. Gregory had long ago, perhaps during his residence at Alexandria, come to a decision on the religious questions of his day. Although an admirer of Origen, he, in a measure, accepted the views of Athanasius. When, therefore, the semi-Arian views were favored and spread in Cappadocia by the Emperor Constantius, he went there (perhaps 361), received consecration as presbyter from his father at Nazianzus (who was Bishop here), and devoted himself for a time to his office. Basil also came to Cappadocia and was made presbyter of Cæsarea; his friend supported him and amicably settled a difficulty between him and his Bishop, and also secured the election of Basil to the bishopric of the same city. On the other hand, by the management of Basil, the bishopric of Sosima was offered to and almost forced upon Gregory. He at first declined it, fled to the wilderness, and only at the request of his aged father did he return to Nazianzus, where he administered the bishopric as vicar until the death of his father, 374. We omit here several minor events, which are found in Ullman's monograph. The frequent alternations of official labors and monkish seclusion, threw a light upon his character. His education and disposition, as well as the ecclesiastical party distractions of his times, disposed him to a retired religious life. On the other hand, however, he was too vain and ambitious, to renounce ecclesiastical honors once for all. His whole life was distracted by these diverse tendencies.—Meanwhile, Providence destined him for the first work among the early champions of the Church, in the latter part of his life.—At Constantinople, at this time, those who accepted the doctrines of the Council of Nice, were few in number and oppressed, being surrounded by all other factions of the Macedonians, Apollinarians, Novatians, and Eunomians. This oppressed party called Gregory to their defence. He came, and the Church of Anastasia soon became the scene of his eloquence and the centre of dogmatic agitation. The result of his sermons was great, the more so, perhaps, because no one expected much from the little, sickly-looking man. Even heathens heard him gladly, and churchmen, such as Jerome and Evagrius sat at his feet. He met the mockery of his enemies with mildness, and manifested a pacific spirit amid the scandals of the Meletian schism. In 380 the Emperor Theodosius defeated the Arians, and Gregory was permitted to enter the first Church of the metropolis as victor. His zeal, however, soon abated, and his old love for solitude revived. He could not, it is true, after the second oecumenical synod (381) decline the nomination to the bishopric of Constantinople, and was therefore consecrated to it by Meletius; but he soon after resigned it. After 381 we find him again at home, first at Nazianzus, where he still participated in ecclesiastical matters, then in rural seclusion, engaged in personal affairs. He died about 389 or 390. — Gregory is author or theologian deserves yet a brief notice. In all his sermons, letters, and poems we find the same versatile and eloquent writer and practised thinker; his language is glowing and figurative, his feeling warm and lively. His rhetorical gifts never forsake him, but they should have been oftener more discreetly applied. His numerous letters to Basil, Gregory of Nyssa, Eusebius, Cæsarius, Sophronius, et. al., are full of sentences, points (τὸ μὴ ὁμολογεῖν τὴν φιλοσοφίαν σφοδρὸν φιλοσοφόν, — οὐ δόκιμον τὸ ἀπειρασθόν, τὸ δὲ βασανισθὲν ἐν τοῖς πράγμασι δοκιμώτατον, Epist. 121, 215, Bill.), and are often cheerful and ironical. None of Gregory's poems attained to ecclesiastical use; they betray generally the high age and the decreasing freshness of their author, and where he relates his life in extenso (Carmen de vita sua), or runs into reflections, his poetry is worthless. Nevertheless, we possess from him several beautiful hymns, many striking epigrams, and short poetic apophthegms. The worthless dramatic production Χριστὸς πάσχων, was not written by Gregory. His sermons, however, deserve the first rank, and were already in antiquity expounded by Elias Cretensis, Nicetas and Psellus, and partly translated into Latin by Rufinus; only a few of the latter (especially Tractatus de fide Nicena Opp. I., p. 869, Ben.) do not with certainty proceed from Gregory. The first 45 sermons treat on various subjects, the memory of distinguished martyrs, commemoration of friends and relatives, of his father and brother, ecclesiastical festivals, etc. — they contain very little that is scriptural and exegetical. The glory of monastic life (Epist. 76), the nature of the ministry and the difficulties of pastoral duties, are subjects which he frequently treats of. But deserving of special distinction are the five sermons (Orat. XXVII.—XXXI., Ben., also in Biblioth. dogm. ed. Thilo, II., p. 348) defending the doctrines of the Council of Nice, which obtained for Gregory the honorary title, the Theologian. They contain the development of the idea of the one and consubstantial deity, which carries in itself the hypostatic difference of the unbegotten or causative, of the begotten and proceeded, together with a description of this three-fold hypostatic peculiarity. In reply to the objection, that by the distinction of these divine subjects God is resolved into an abstract idea; Gregory replies, that the unity of the divine essence is concrete and real; but he does not inquire further, whether and how his substantial μία ὁρμή again leads back to the personal image of the εἰς θεός. As regards his christological views Gregory opposed the Apollinarians, and asserted the completeness of the human nature of the son of God (Epistolæ ad Cledonium; also in Bibl. dogm., l. c., p. 538). His anthropological views move altogether in the sphere of Greek theology, and betray the influence of Origen. As Gregory held the view of creationism in regard to the propagation of souls, so he beheld in the union of the physical and spiritual that which is properly wonderful in human nature, which also, at the same time, furnishes the true explanation of the moral frailty of man (Orat. II., p. 49–54, Ben.). Besides he also taught plainly the doctrine of original sin, and derived from the fall the morality of the race, and even a darkening of the understanding (comp. especially Orat. X., ab init. XXXVIII., p. 670; XLIV., § 4, Ben.). However, he neither gives the doctrine a precise, theoretic form, nor does he seek to harmonize it with his other anthropological views. He certainly wished to think of the need of salvation only synergistically, and therefore did not deny even to the sinful man the power of choice and ability to do good. It is remarkable, however, that G. reckoned the unequal distribution of earthly lots, the disproportions of riches and poverty, as well as of servitude and freedom, among the consequences of the first sin (Orat. XIV., p. 275, Ben.; XVI., p. 256, Bill.). His views on Baptism and the Lord's Supper finally, are entitled to consideration.

Among the more ancient editions of his works, the most important is that of Jac. Billius, Paris, 1609, 1611 (the first by Joh. Hervagius appeared at Basle, 1550), then aucta ex interpretatione Morelli: Par., 1630, II., Tomi. His poems appeared separated first in the remarkable edition Venetis ex Aldi acad., 1504, then greatly enlarged, cum notis J. Tullii Traject. ad Rhen., 1696, and again enriched in Muratorii, Anecdota Gr. Pat., 1709. The Benedictine edition is based on these previous editions. The first collected volume of sermons of this edition was published, after the death of several co-laborers, by Ch. Clemencet, Par., 1778, fol. The completion of the second was delayed by the French Revolution. The genuine Maurinian MS. seems to have been lost, and was found only long afterwards, so that it could finally appear in print Post operam et studium Monachorum O. s. B. edente et accurate D. A. B. Caillau Par. curis et sumptibus Parent Debarres, 1840. This volume contains the most complete collection of the letters and poems according to Paris MSS., with explanatory remarks and extracts from the commentaries of Nicetas, Elias, and Psellus.—(Comp. besides, Fabric., Bibl. Gr., ed. Harl., VIII., p. 383, sq.; Clemencet, Vita S. Gregor. Opp., I. I.; Baur, die Lehre von der Dreieinigkeit, I., p. 648; Dorner, Lehre von der Person Christi, I., p. 904, 1016, and especially Ullmann's Monograph: Gregorius von Nazianz, der Theologe: Darmst., 1825. Gass.—Beck.

Gregory, of Nyssa, a younger brother of Basil the Great (see Art.), to whom, chiefly, he owed his education (Ep. X., in Zach.; Socr., H. E.; cf. Opp., II., 192). Of his youth nothing is known. He first comes into notice as one who, being an Anagnost, followed a disreputable calling, then abandoned the office, and wished rather to be called a rhetorician than a Christian (GREG., Theol. ep., 37). Through the reproofs and urgent appeals of Gregory of Naz., Gregory was led to resume his ecclesiastical profession; and in 371 or 372 Basil consecrated him, against his will, B. of Nyssa (Opp. GREG., Naz. or. 6, p. 136; BASIL, ep., 225). His controversial rather than administrative talents may have led to this appointment; and his marriage with Theosebia (GREG., Naz., ep. 95; GREG., Nyssa de virg., 3) seemed no hindrance. When he became Bishop the hostilities of Va-lens against the Nicene party had already commenced. In Cappadocia, indeed, Basil had hitherto frustrated the attempts of Valens. But now the governor of Pontus, Demetrius, became a ready tool of the Emperor's plans. He accused Gregory at a Synod in Galatia (375) of official improprieties, and banished him. G. escaped from the escort of soldiers to a place of retirement. Hence, probably, the allusions in Ep. 6, in Zac., which Roman Catholics consider proofs of his having been an anchorite. Basil appealed to Demetrius in vain on his brother's behalf (ep. Bas., 237). Gregory continued in exile, harassed by the heretics, who were allured from their hiding places by imperial favor (Gr., Nas., 34, 35; Opp. II., 192). At the death of Valens, 378, matters changed, and Gregory returned to his See (Ep. 3, in Zac.). In 379 the death of Basil deeply afflicted him. In the fall of 379 he attended a Synod at Antioch, where he witnessed the death of his sister Makrina (see his de vita Makr., opp. II., 177, &c., and de anima et resurr., opp. III., 181, &c.). At the second general Council Gregory was prominent, even though he did not draw up the changes and additions to the Nicene creed, as Niceph. Coll. XIII., 13, reports. His influence at that time appears from the position assigned him by the Council of Constantinople (can. 2), and a law of Theodosius (Cod. Theod., I, XVI., t. I., 1, 3; cf. Soz., H. E., 7, 6; Socr., H. E., 5, 8, and G.'s opp. III., 645, &c.). G. hardly attended the Council of Constantinople in 382, having then most probably gone to Arabia on an ecclesiastical mission, during which he visited Jerusalem. This led to his Ep. de euntibus Hierosol., in which he warns against the moral dangers of pilgrims. In Jerusalem he tried to adjust Church dissensions, but had his own views assailed (Ep. ad Eustathiam Ambrosiam et Basilissam ed. Casaub.: Lut., 1606). In 383 he seems to have returned to Constantinople, and delivered his discourse de deitate fil. et sp. s. (III., 494, &c.); and he there also preached, 385, the funeral sermons of Pulcheria, and of the Empress Placilla. Thenceforth dates are wanting until 394, when we meet him for the last time at a Council in Constantinople, in attendance at the consecration of the Church of the Apostles in Chalcedon, and probably preached the sermon falsely entitled (Opp. II., 40, &c.) εἰς τὴν ἑαυτοῦ χριστονομίαν. — Both in a religious and a speculative view G. was fitted to be a pillar of the mysteries of the Trinity and the incarnation. He saw well, with Athanasius, that the Nicene creed avows the absoluteness of salvation in the divinity of the Son. Whatever other traces of Origenism his system may betray, he decidedly adopts the Christian idea of the Godhead and redemption (c. Eun. Opp. II., 320, 390, 455, 473, 624; Serm. de spir. adv. Maced., p. 18 in Maj. cf. ep. 2, op. Zac., 360). — His works, exegetical, homilies, &c., were edited by Front. Duc., 2 Tom., Paris, 1615, with an appendix by J. Gretser, 1618. A later, but very defective, edition is that of Paris, 1638, 3 Tom., fol. The antirrheticus adv. Appollin., and the testim. adv. Judæos (falsely ascribed to Gregory, and previously known only in a Latin translation) are found in ZACAGNI, Collect. Monum. vet. eccl. græc. Rom., 1698. These and seven other letters and smaller writings (first edition by Carraciolus, Florence, 1731) in GALLANDII, Bibl. vet. patr. t. VI. Subsequently were added the sermo adv. Arium et Sabell., and the de spir. s. adv. Maced. which A. Maius appended, with Cyril's writings, to t. VII. Scriptor. vet. nova coll., then published in the Nova Patr. Bibl., t. IV.: Rom., 1847, with a Latin translation. — Good critical editions: KRABINGER, dial. de an. et res.: Lips., 1837; orat. catech. acced. orat. funebr. in Meld. (1835), Monach. (1838); de precatone (orat. domi.) orr. V., Landish. (1840). A critical edition of his entire works is still wanting. — (See TILLEMONT, Mémoires, t. IX., 561, &c. FABRICIUS, Bibl. gr., t. VIII., ed. Harl., t. IX. SCHRÖCKH, K.-G., Th. XIV., 1-147. RUFF, Gr. d. B. von Nyssa, &c.: Lpz., 1834. HEYNS, disput. histor.-theol. de Gr. Nyss.: Ludg. Bat., 1835. MÖLLER, Gr. Nyss. doctr. de hom. natura et illustravit et cum Orig. comparavit: Halis, 1854). W. MÖLLER.*

Gregory, Thaumaturgus, was born in Neocæsarea, Pontus, of noble and wealthy heathen parents. His original name was Theodorus. Having, in his 14th year, lost his father, he embraced Christianity. He resolved to study law at Rome, but domestic events led him to Cæsarea, where Origen then was. Captivated by Origen's teaching he remained at Cæsarea, and became an ardent advocate of his doctrines. In 235 he went with Origen to Alexandria, there under him to prosecute his studies. In 239 he parted from Origen at Cæsarea, after having first pronounced a eulogy (still extant) upon him, in his presence. Gregory thought of living as an anchorite in Pontus. But Phædimus, B. of Amisus in Pontus, consecrated him B. of Neocæsarea (244), where there were then but 17 Christians; at Gregory's death (270) there were but 17 heathen. It is said that he was instructed for this office in a vision by the Apostle John, at the command of the mother of Christ, and that he at once wrote down the instructions, which are found in Gregory's writings as his confession. The confession refers to the doctrine of the Trinity. Gregory of Nyssa says he saw the original in Neocæsarea, but additions seem to have been made to it during the Arian controversies. The same writer relates many wonders performed by Gregory, especially in subduing demons. Hence his surname. He well nigh annihilated heathenism in that region. He fled from the Decian persecution. Afterwards he instituted a general festival of the Martyrs, at which he allowed all manner of heathen amusements, in the hope of thus leading more persons to embrace Christianity. The effect was bad, for on the invasion of (probably) the Goths (262), the inhabitants seem to have rivalled the barbarians, in cruelty and rapacity towards their fellow believers, as the canonical epistle of Gregory, presented at the Council of Constantinople, reports. A plague, foretold by Gregory, which broke out in that region, was stayed by his intercession, and those who embraced the faith, were healed. Numbers were thus added to the Church. He earnestly combated the views of the heretic Paul of Samosata; but Gregory himself was afterwards accused of Sabellianism, because he did not use the expressions which were subsequently established as orthodox.—We have, alas, but little information of Gregory's life, the panegyric of Gregory of Nyssa not being reliable. He endeavored to secure currency for Origen's views, in a practical form, in the regions of Pontus and Cappadocia.—(His works were published by G. Vossius, Mogunt., 1604, 4to. They are also in Biblioth. Gallandii, T. 3. The Paneg. ad Orig. was issued by Bengel, Stuttg., 1722, 8vo. There is a biogr. of Gregory by Nic. M. PALLAVICINI, Rome, 1644, 8vo., and J. L. BOYE, Diss. de Greg. Thaum.: Jen. 1703, 4to.).

KLOSE.*

Gregory, Bishop of Tours, was born c. 540, at Averna (Clermont), in Auvergne, of a distinguished family. His original name, Georgius Florentius, was exchanged in honor of his maternal grandfather, B. Gregory of Langres. His father died young, and he was educated by his uncle, B. Gallus of Clermont. His restoration from a dangerous sickness led him to devote himself to the Church. Whilst still a youth his uncle also died, and his mother went to live with relatives in Burgundy. He was placed under one Austin, in Averna, a priest well versed in the Scriptures. Another illness (c. 563) led him to visit the grave of St. Martin in Tours, where he was restored. King Sigibert inducted him into the See of Tours (c. 573) after his election by the clergy. He not only discharged his episcopal duties with zeal, but actively promoted the political interests of the city. This service was rendered the more difficult by the war between Sigibert and his brother, Chilperich, which afterward involved the possession of Tours. By favoring the friends of Sigibert at a time when Chilperich held the city, Gregory excited the enmity of the other party. One of these, Ludast, to avenge himself upon Gregory for having had him deposed from the office of a Count of Tours, accused Gregory of slandering the Queen. Gregory was cited for trial, and purged himself by an oath of the accusation, and so impressed Chilperich that he sought to conciliate him. But Gregory would not yield. After C.'s death his brother Guntram, until then King of Burgundy, seized Tours, and gave Gregory new proofs of his confidence. Guntram, however, did not become the heir of Sigibert, but the son of Chilperich, who, with his mother, Brunhild, held Gregory in high esteem, and often called him to the court for counsel. Gregory died Nov. 17, 594.—His first work was a history of the miracles of S. Martin, in 4 books (written 576–94). Then followed a Hist. of Saints; the Miracles wrought at the grave of St. Julian; the Renown of the Martyrs; Lives of the Fathers; the Renown of Confessions; Biographies of 23 distinguished Gallic priests. These would probably all have been forgotten had he not added—Ten books of Frankish history, which are the chief source for that period. This work was first printed in Paris, 1511–12. In 1599 Ruinart published a critical edition. In 1610 it was translated into French by Claude Bonnet, and subsequently by others. It appeared, 1847–49, in a German translation in Würzburg, and, in 1851, in a collection of early histories, faithfully translated by Wm. Giesebrecht, with a full introduction. Gregory's material has been well worked up by Aug. Thierry in his Recits des temps merovingiens: Paris, 1840.—(See LÖBEL, Gr. v. Tours u. seine Zeit: Lpz., 1839). KLÜPFEL.*

Gregory, of Utrecht, a pupil of Boniface, after whose death Gregory took charge of the See of Utrecht, without being Bishop. He descended from the royal Merovingian house, and was born c. 707; his father's name was Albricius, his mother Wastrade. He had several brothers, two of whom were murdered by robbers. His grandmother, Addula, was prioress of Pfalz, where, c. 722, he attracted the attention of Boniface, and in turn became so attached to the strange preacher that he resolved to join him on foot if his grandmother refused him a horse. Thenceforth he untiringly followed B. After the martyrdom of B. and Bishop Eoban, the See of Utrecht remained vacant for a time, and Gregory took charge, with the approbation of Stephan II. and Pipin, of the Friesland mission. He had an English priest, Alubert, ordained to perform episcopal functions. He established a school in Utrecht, which was attended by youth of all the adjacent tribes, and yielded many able teachers and bishops for the German Church. Gregory died in 781. In 778 his left side was disabled by paralysis, but he continued his labors in the school. He breathed his last in Salvator's Church, where, probably, he was buried. His nephew, Alberich, was his successor.—Liudger, his pupil, wrote an affectionate biography of Gregory, which, however, tells us more of Boniface than of Gregory.—(Cf. BROWER, sidera illustrium et sanctorum virorum, qui Germ. ornarunt. Mogunt., 1616. MABILLON, Acta S. B., III., 2, p. 319. Act. S. Boll. Aug. V., p. 252. RETTBERG, K.-G. Deutschl., II., 531–4. NEANDER, Ch. H.).

DR. PRESSER.*

Grotius (Hugo de Groot).—This renowned Dutch statesman, philologist, and jurist, was born at Delft, April 10, 1583. His father was Burgomaster at Delft, and a curator of the University of Leyden. He gave early proofs of superior talents; in his 16th year published an edition of Marcianus Capella. The Remonstrant Uytenbogaard was his religious instructor, Francis Junius and Jos. Scaliger his tutors in the sciences. The great statesman, Oldenbarneveld, took Grotius with him, 1598, on his embassy to France, where Henry IV. honored him with a gift of his portrait and a gold chain. Subsequently James I., of England, received him kindly. Grotius especially distinguished himself as a jurist, and was early appointed to high offices of State. But he soon became involved in the theological disputes of his country, taking sides with the Arminians (see Art.). After the victory of the Gomarists at the Synod of Dort (see Art.) Grotius was sentenced to imprisonment for life in the castle of Lowenstein (1519). The ingenuity of his wife effected his escape thence in a book-chest (1521). He travelled in disguise to Franco, where Louis XIII. welcomed him, and bestowed on him a pension of 3000 livres. But in France also he suffered from the hatred of the Calvinists. The church at Charenton refused fellowship with him. On the contrary learned Romanists in Paris treated him with great kindness. Before long, however, Richelieu became offended at Grotius' refusal to engage fully in the service of France, and had him dismissed. Grotius returned to Holland, trusting to the influence of the new regent, Henry Frederick, but the Gomarists compelled him to leave again. At the solicitation of Christina of Sweden he went, 1634, to Stockholm, where he was appointed counsellor of State and ambassador to the French court, where he remained ten years. Returning to Sweden by way of Holland, he was honorably received at Amsterdam. Party animosity had abated, and amends were made for previous wrongs. Grotius resolved to spend his last days in his native land. Accordingly, after rendering an account of his mission at the Swedish court, he begged and obtained leave to retire. But exposure during a shipwreck on his way home brought on sickness, and he died at Rostock, Aug. 28, 1645. His corpse was taken to Delft, and interred in the family vault.—The theological merits of Grotius (which alone we can notice here) are considerable. Especially deserving mention are his exegetical contributions. His Annotationes in libros evangeliorum, &c. (Amst., 1641, fol.); Annot. in Ep. ad Philemon. (ib. 1642, 8vo.; 1646, 8vo.); Annot. in Vet. T. (Paris, 1664, III., fol.), and Annot. in N. T. (Paris, 1644, II.), were long shunned by Calvinists. G. J. L. VOGEL and J. C. DÜDERLEIN, first drew them from their obscurity. They proved acceptable for their liberality, and philologico historical method, in which latter respect G. was the forerunner of Ernesti (see Art.). His de veritate relig. chr., 1627, and often afterwards, found most favor with all parties, it was translated even into Arabic, Chinese, Malay (see Apologists). Some of his historical works are valuable sources for Eccl. History (as the Hist. Gothorum, Vandal. et Longob., 1655, and the Annales et hist. de rebus Belg. ab obitu Philippi, &c.), and he discussed some questions in canon law (de imperio summarum potestatum circa sacra. Comm. posth. Opp. theol., III., 201, &c.). His theological works were collected and published under the title: Opera theologica: Amst., 1679, III., fol.; and Basil, 1731., IV., fol.—(See BAYLE, Dict. and Bibl. univers. BOUGINÉ, Handb. d. Lit.-Gesch., II., 375, &c. SCHRÖCKE, K.-G., V., 246, &c. BRANDT, Hist. van het Leven d. Heeren Huig de Groot: Amst., 1732, II. BUTLER, Life of Grotius: Lond., 1827. II. LUDEN, Hugo Gr., &c.: Berlin, 1806).

HAGENBACH.*

Grynæus.—The distinguished theologians of this name were of Suabian origin, but natives of Basel.—1. Simon Grynæus, born at Vehrigen, 1493, was the son of Jacob Gryner (Latinized into Grynæus.—Cf. Virgil, Aen., IV., 345; Ecl., VI., 72). Having early exhibited fine talents, he was placed in the renowned school of Simler and Gerbel, in Pforzheim, then entered the University of Vienna, where he graduated with credit as M. A. From Vienna he went to Buda and taught school. But his leaning to the views of Reuchlin and Erasmus soon roused the Dominicans there against him. From 1524–29 he was Professor of Greek at Heidelberg, where he lived in straightened circumstances, and excited the enmity of the other professors by his attachment to the sacramental doctrine of Zwingli. In 1529 he went to Spire to meet Melancthon at the Diet, and obtain another situation. There Dr. J. Faber had almost effected his imprisonment; his escape was thought very providential (Melan. on Dan. 10; Camerar. Biog. of Melan.). In 1529 he was called to Basel, through Burgom. J. Meyer, and Oecolamp. (Herzog, Oecolamp., II., 176), to take the place of Erasmus. The agitations of the times gave him an opportunity of visiting England, where he was requested to prepare the opinion of the Reformed theologians in the matter of the divorce of Henry VIII. He prepared this paper after his return to Basel. At first he coincided with the Swiss theologians in favor of the divorce, but afterwards changed his views, through Bucer's influence. During the eventful year, 1531, Grynæus witnessed the death of Oecolamp., whose successor in office he would have been, but for his unwillingness to compete with Myconius. In 1534 Ulrich of Würtemberg sought his assistance in introducing the Reformation in his country; unhappily his labors there were hindered by Schnepf. G. took an active part in the first Helvetic (2d Basel) Conf. (see Art.), and in the Conferences held to induce the Swiss to accept the Wittenberg Concord of 1536. His last public service, worthy of mention, was his participation, as the only Swiss delegate, in the Conference of Worms, 1540. He died of the plague in 1541, deeply lamented. As a Greek scholar he had few equals, and in character he was modest, courteous, and peaceable. He sustained intimate relations with all the leading men of his day, and was a bosom friend of Bucer. He was the shining star of his family, which flourished in Basil for three centuries (cf. Six. Gr., clarissimi quondam academice Basil. theol. et philol., Epistolæ. Accedit index auctorum ejusdem Gr. Opp. et studio edit. Coll. et ed. GUIL. THEOD. STREUBER, Basil. 1847. A biogr. sketch by Streuber in the Basil. Taschenb., 1853. MELANCHTHON in the Corpus Ref., T. IV., No. 2418–19; JOACH. CAMERARIUS in the pref. to Theophrasti opp.: Basil, 1541).—2) John Jacob Grynæus, son of Simon's nephew Thomas, born Oct. 1, 1540, at Berne, where his father was professor of theology. In 1546 the family removed to Basel, where John was persuaded by Simon Sulzer to embrace the Lutheran view of the Lord's Supper. After occupying other stations he became, 1575, Prof. of the Old Test. at Basel, having become convinced of the error of the ubiquitarian dogma. His situation in Basel having become unpleasant through the animosity of Sulzer and others, he gladly accepted a call, 1584, from John Casimir of the Palat. to Heidelberg. In Jan. 1586, after Sulzer's death, he returned to Basel, and became Antistes of the church there. His activity in this, and the offices therewith connected, was highly commended. In 1588 he attended the disputation at Berne, as the delegate from Basel. In 1612 he became blind. He died Aug. 13, 1617. He was the author of several exegetical works on the Old and New Test., and many smaller theological treatises (cf. Athenæ Ravennæ, p. 33. Ochs, VI., 449. J. J. Gr. vita et mors, &c., ed. a JOH. JAC. ET HIERON. A BRUNN: Basil, 1618. Epistolæ familiares, &c., ed. Apinus: Norimb. et Altorf., 1720).—3) John Grynæus, born 1705, † 1744, a distinguished Orientalist, and co-founder of the Free Grynæan Institute in Basel.—4) Simon Grynæus, born 1725, † 1799, the last of the family, and known as the translator of several French and English antideistic works. STREUBER.*

Gualbert (Giovanni) of Pistoja, founder of the Coenobite order of Vallombrosa, in the Apennines, near Florence, lived in the 11th century. He entered the monastery of St. Minias, and took orders in 1038. But desirous of living by a more rigid rule he went to Vallombrosa, 1039, and became an anchorite. Others soon joined him, and an order was founded, consisting of religious, serving brethren, and laymen. This introduction of the last class, designed to relieve the religious from all secular cares, was among the earliest instances of the kind. Other monasteries adopted G.'s plan, and joined Vallombrosa under Gualbert as abbot. He died 1093, and was canonized by Celestine III. in 1193. The order never spread extensively, having numbered but 50 monasteries in Italy, and scarcely found entrance into France. The original dress was gray—hence the members were called Gray Friars. Under Abbot Blasius of Milan, 1500, they assumed a brown dress, and in 1662 they united with the Silvestrians and wore a black garb. In 1681 they again separated from the Silvestrians.—(See Joan. G. vita in Mabill. Acta SS., II., 273. HURTER, Gesch. Pabst Innoc. III., Th. IV., 133, &c.). NEUDECKER.*

Guardian, the name of the superior of a Franciscan monastery. In mediæval Latin the word signifies custos, from guardia, warda. As the Franciscans humbly assumed the name of fratres minores, so they declined high-titled offices, such as abbot, prior (see Du Cange, s. v.). HERZOG.*

Guibert.—After the death of Victor II. the Empress Agnes appointed Guibert, a talented and influential priest in Parma, Chancellor of the kingdom of Italy. His first business was to assert the King's rights in the election of Nicholas II. (Dec., 1058), who was under Hildebrand's control. This placed Guibert in bitter antagonism to Hildebrand. Guibert succeeded in having the law of election so framed, that the King's consent was necessary; but at the next election, Alex. II. was chosen without regard to Henry II. or Agnes, and inducted by the Normans. Guibert now sought to withstand this, by taking advantage of the hatred which prevailed in all upper Italy against the rigoristic party, and thus inciting the Lombards to demand a Pope approved by the King and Upper Italy. Cardinal Hugo the Wise, and Prefect Cencius opposed Hildebrand's Pope. Thus it happened that Cadalus was chosen Pope at Basel (Oct. 1061), and invested with the crozier by the King, as Honorius II. Subsequently his election was annulled, and Guibert was deprived of his office. But after the death of Honorius (1069) he again came forth and succeeded in being chosen the Archb. of Ravenna, partly through Agnes, who then had influence at Rome. This See was regarded as a step towards the pontificate. Perhaps it was thought at Rome that such a favor would most effectually conquer Guibert's hostility. Guibert indeed feigned submission to Alexander II. (who did not trust him), and took the oath of allegiance. But whether he did this in the hope of thus securing further advancement, and so the ultimate success of the principle for which he had been contending, or from a real change of sentiment, cannot be decided. If the former motive predominated, it was unfortunate for his scheme that Alexander died so soon after Guibert's consecration (April 12, 1073), and during his absence from Rome. Hildebrand did not refuse the tiara himself. Guibert returned to Rome, and acknowledged Gregory VII. His only chance now was to succeed Gregory. But his impatience found early occasion to excite the Lombards against the Pope, who was seized with a dangerous illness. Had Gregory died then, his scheme would have perished, and Guibert would have introduced his measures. But the Pope recovered, summoned Guibert to a Synod (Lent, 1075) to answer for his course, and on his not appearing suspended him. The enemies of the Pope now gathered around Guibert. In 1080 thirty bishops met at Brixen and elected him Pope; in 1084 a Synod convoked at Rome by Henry IV. confirmed this choice. He was consecrated as Clement III. The goal of his ambition was now reached, but at the same time he excited the implacable hatred of Gregory and his party. Gregory's death, in 1085, did not avail him now; he never had peace in Rome. Anathema after anathema was hurled against him. In 1089 he was compelled to leave Rome under a promise never to resume the papal chair. Still we often find him visiting the city, and the Emperor remained true to him. In 1099 Paschal II. drove him from his refuge at Alba. Clement fled to a castle and died in Sept. 1100. He was buried in Ravenna, but to put an end to wonders said to occur at his grave Paschal ordered his corpse to be dug up and cast into a stream.—(See STENZEL'S Gesch. Deutschl., &c. JAFFÉ'S Regesta pontif. Rom., 443–7). A. VOGEL.*

Guido, of Arezzo, a Benedictine monk who flourished under John XIX. (1024–33), who invited him to Rome on account of his skill as a musician. But the climate disagreeing with him, he returned to the monastery of Pomposa, whence envious monks had expelled him, and remained there until his death (c. 1050). His celebrity as a musician rested upon his supposed contribution to the science—the invention of notes, of different parts, of pianos; but these are of an earlier or later date (FORKEL, Gesch. d. Musik.: Lpz., 1801). His real merits consist in his having reduced existing materials to a practical method.—(See GERBERT, de cantu et musica sacra, T. II., 42, &c. BUSBY, History of Music. BRENDL, Gesch. d. M., &c.: Lpz., 1855). PALMER.*

Guido (Guy, Wido), des Bres, the evangelist and martyr of the Holland Walloon Church, was born c. 1540, at Mons, in Hennegau, and trained in the Roman Church, until by reading the Scriptures he learned evangelical truth. Persecuted at home he fled to London, and joined the Walloon Church established there. Thence he returned home to labor as an itinerant evangelist, preaching wherever he could find hearers, especially in Lisle. When the congregation there was exterminated, Guido fled to Ghent, and there published "le bâton de la foi," a polemic work gathered from the C. Fathers. In order to prosecute classical studies he went to Geneva, and became a decided adherent of Calvin's doctrine. Returning home again he resumed his former labors, and established several congregations. After the conquest of Geneva (1667) Guy was taken captive in flight, and after seven weeks imprisonment was put to death. He met his end with Christian fortitude, and even joy. La Grange, who had been captured with him was his companion in martyrdom.—Guy's prophecy, that his blood would water the seed of truth sown, was largely fulfilled. The gospel was indeed suppressed in his native land, but the scattered witnesses of it spread it in other countries.—(See Histoire d. Martyrs: Gen., 1617. LE LONG, Kort hist. Verhaal v. d. oorsprong d. nederl. gereform. Kerken, &c.: Amst., 1741, 4to. G. BRANDT, Hist. d. reform. in en ontrent d. Nederl.: Amst., 1671. YPEY EN DERMOUT, Geschiedenis d. Nederl. Hervormde Kerk: Breda, 1818, sq. Especially the reply to this last: VAN D. KEMP, de Eere d. nederl. hervormde Kerk: Rotterd., 1830. The histories of the Netherland Evang. Church by JACOBSON, and M. GOEBEL. M. GOEBEL.*

Guilbert, St. (born 1083), founder of the order of Guilbertines, was the son of Josselin, lord of Sempringham and Tyrington, of which, after completing his theological studies, he took charge. He built a house designed for seven young women, resolved to remain virgins, where they lived in the strictest seclusion. Other similar houses having been established, Guilbert besought Pope Eugene to place them under the Cistercians. Eugene refused, and Guilbert wishing to provide other means for managing his institutions, established houses for canons, but strictly separated from the others. The women lived according to St. Benedict's rule, the men after St. Augustine's. The society soon numbered 2200 men and several thousand women. Asylums for the poor, sick, infirm, and for widows and orphans were added. G. died in 1189. Innocent III. canonized him in 1202. At the Reformation the order embraced 21 houses, and 11 double-monasteries. But it did not spread beyond England.—(HURTER, Innocent III., &c.; IV., 230). HERZOG.*

Gundulf, the originator of what was condemned as a heretical movement, c. 1080–1130, in the dioceses of Cambrai and Arras, and of Liege. Of Gundulf himself nothing is known but that he was an Italian, and moved to Upper Italy probably to find work at his trade, weaving. The followers whom he succeeded in winning over to his views declared, on being summoned before the Bishop of Liege, that they were disciples of Gundulf, but held no doctrines at variance with the Church. On being summoned before Bishop Gerhard of Cambrai, however, they were accused of teaching flagrant heresies, denouncing the visible Church, its sacraments, and all the peculiarities of the Roman Church, especially infant baptism, marriage, the priesthood, &c. They did not attempt to refute these charges, but recanted, and so were released.—(See D'ACHERY, Spicil. ed. II., T. I., 607–24. MANSI, Concilia, T. XIX., 423, &c. HAHN's Gesch. d. Ketzers im Mittelalter, I., 39, &c.). A. VOGEL.*

Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, and the preserver of Protestantism in Germany (born Dec. 9, 1594, at Stockholm, and reigned from 1611 to 1632), was the son of Charles I., whose grandfather, Gustavus Vasa, had established the Reformation in Sweden, and Christina, a princess of Holstein-Gottorp. He had natural abilities of a high order, and received a careful education. In military affairs especially he took a deep interest; so that when only 15 years of age, he begged his father, but without gaining his point, to give him the chief command in the war with Russia (1610). However in 1611 he took part in the campaign, and successfully carried out several expeditions. His father died in the same year (Oct. 30), and Gustavus Adolphus assumed the government of Sweden, having been declared of age by the Diet. He brought the wars which his father had commenced to a more or less successful termination; the war with Denmark in 1613; that with Russia in 1617, after gaining considerable advantages by the peace of Stolbowa; and that with Poland, through the intervention of France, in 1629, having made extensive conquests in Prussian-Poland. In the management of the internal affairs of his kingdom, he earned for himself the reputation of a wise and energetic ruler, in spite of his many wars. He had the good fortune to be assisted by the judicious counsel of his chancellor, Axel Oxenstiern, a distinguished statesman, who served him with self-denying faithfulness. The ecclesiastical importance of Gustavus Adolphus rests on the part which he took in the 'Thirty Years' War. Of late years much has been written concerning the motives which induced him to engage in this war, and his plans connected with it; and the views on this subject have undergone essential changes. It was customary, formerly, among Protestant historians, to magnify Gustavus Adolphus with undue partiality and great naivete, as the champion of Protestant faith, who had come to Germany solely and alone in order to save the evangelical cause from destruction; now men like Gfrörer, Leo, and Barthold, conceive him to have been an ambitious conqueror, who hypocritically had assumed a religious mask, and as a foreigner forcing his way into Germany, deserves to be put on a level with the French. These new views, as is generally the case, have been carried to extremes. Taking into consideration the antecedents of Gustavus Adolphus; remembering that he was continually engaged in wars and conquests; that he strove to gain the Polish crown, the dignity of Russian czar, the Danish kingdom; and that the great end of his ambition was to secure for Sweden the position of a first class

European power — it cannot be denied that his participation in the German war must likewise appear in the light of the policy of a conqueror. It was, however, no sudden resolution which induced him to take this step; but a purpose that gradually ripened and attained its maturity on occasion of the siege of Stralsund. In May, 1628, Gustavus Adolphus sent ammunition to this city, and offered further assistance; in June he entered into an offensive treaty with the burghers, and detailed many of his soldiers to their aid, who remained in Stralsund after the siege had been raised. From this time on he took an active part in the war. As early as the month of January, 1628, he had prepared his Diet for such an event; in the summer of 1629 he took counsel with Oxenstiern in reference to it, and in October formally laid the subject before the Diet, which at first strongly opposed his plans. But Gustavus Adolphus soon succeeded in gaining over to his views a committee appointed on the occasion, and this committee issued a memorial refuting the objections that had been brought forward against the war. Meanwhile Richelieu had set his eye upon the King of Sweden, as a fit instrument to humble Austria; and hence helped him to conclude the peace with Poland mentioned above. Further negotiations in view of the pecuniary assistance offered by France, were, at this time, without result. But soon the opportunity for carrying his plan into execution, appeared to Gustavus Adolphus to have arrived. The German princes grew more and more dissatisfied with the rule of Wallenstein, and his fall could be foreseen; and so the King, although he did not know in what manner he would be received, left Stockholm (May 19 to 29, 1630), with an army of scarcely 15,000 men, after having solemnly bade farewell to his Diet, and called on God as his witness that he did not engage in this expedition out of love for war, but chiefly in order to free from the papal yoke his oppressed co-religionists. On June 25th he landed on the island of Usedom; near Peenemünde. A pamphlet written by his directions, and circulated in Germany, set forth his motive in undertaking the enterprise. His progress was rapid. The old Duke of Pomerania, Bogislav, was compelled to open to him the gates of Stetin, and to promise his Dukedom in the event of his death. His brother-in-law, the Elector George William of Brandenburg, and the Elector John George of Saxony, hesitated, at first, to aid him, and tried to remain neutral. But having succeeded (Jan., 1631) in effecting a treaty, at Bärwalde, with Charnacé, the French ambassador, according to which France for five years was to pay a subsidy of 400,000 rix dollars, and Sweden to carry on the war against Austria with an army of 16,000 cavalry, and 30,000 infantry, he forced the two Electors to enter into an alliance with him. The Saxon army now joined that of Sweden, and on Sept. 7, 1631, the battle of Leipsic was fought, which, in spite of the shameful flight of the Saxons, resulted in the total defeat of the imperialists. That Gustavus A., after this victory, did not immediately hasten to Vienna, and compel the Emperor to conclude a peace favorable to the Protestants, is regarded by Gfrörer and others as an evidence that the Swedish King was more anxious to secure for himself a fruitful part of Germany, than to save the evangelical cause. Gustavus Adolphus now overran Würzburg, where he established a Swedish government, and in four weeks conquered Aschaffenburg, Frankfurt, and Mayence. Then efforts were made by Brandenburg, Saxony and Hesse, to bring about a peace; but without success. It was at this time that Gustavus A. made certain demands, so it is said, of Bavaria and the Catholic powers of the empire (compare the account of Khevenhüller, Vol. XII., p. 85, 86); declaring, amongst the rest, that since he had saved the German empire from destruction, he ought to be elected Roman King. However, it is highly improbable that Gustavus Adolphus made a declaration of this kind. The only cotemporary historian who mentions the circumstance is Khevenhüller; and he confesses that the demands of which he speaks, had become known merely by common report. In Protestant works there is no intimation corroborating Khevenhüller's account. It is true that Gustavus Adolphus, at an interview with the ambassadors of the city of Nuremberg, expressed himself to the following effect: "What he had conquered, he intended to keep; he would not be satisfied with a few months' pay, like a strolling soldier; and if he returned any part of his conquered possessions, he could claim the same jura superioritatis over them, which the Emperor formerly had; moreover the old constitution of the empire was worthless; the Protestant league ought to separate from the Catholic, and choose a head of its own, especially for the war." The position taken by Gustavus A., as here set forth — provided that his sentiments have been correctly reported — was a necessary consequence of the enterprise which he had commenced, and could not be found fault with in the then state of affairs, especially as there was not a single prince in Germany capable of directing the Protestant party. After having defeated Tilly, on the Lech (April 3, 1632), the King entered Bavaria, caused an oath of allegiance to him and his heir to be taken at Augsburg, and reached Munich, where he made himself very popular. In November of the same year, the command of the imperial army having once more been entrusted to Wallenstein, the celebrated battle of Lützen (in Saxony) was fought. The Swedes were victorious, but Gustavus Adolphus was slain. His death was a great misfortune for the Protestant cause. Dissensions paralyzed the efficiency of the League, and in consequence of the catastrophe it suffered at Nördlingen, the war was protracted for fourteen years longer. Whatever may be thought of the motives which brought Gustavus Adolphus to Germany, it is certain that he was no stranger to religious enthusiasm, that he began his enterprise in a magnanimous spirit, giving by his interference a favorable turn to the evangelical cause, and that the preservation of the Protestant party in Germany has secured the liberty of intellectual development. — Sources for the history of Gustavus Adolphus are: E. G. Geijer, Geschichte Schwedens, Vol. III.: Hamburg, 1836. A.

Gfrörer, Gustav Adolf, Koenig von Schweden u. s. Zeit: Stuttgart, 1837 (3d ed. 1852). H. Leo, Lehrbuch d. Universalgeschichte., Vol. III., 3d revised edition: Halle, 1853. F. W. Barthold, Geschichte d. grossen Deutschen Kriegs: Stuttg., 1842. K. G. Helbig, Gustav Adolf u. d. Kurfuersten v. Sachsen u. Brandenburg: Leipzig, 1854. KLÜPFEL.—De Schreinitz.

Gustavus Adolphus Society.—This is unquestionably one of the most important movements of the modern Evangelical Church. The immediate occasion of it was the assemblage of a vast concourse of people at the Sweden monument at Lützen, the spot where Gustavus Adolphus fell, on Nov. 6, 1832, the 2d centennial anniversary of his heroic death. Schild, a merchant of Leipsic, proposed making a six-penny collection throughout Germany, for the purpose of erecting a suitable memorial of the hero. A committee was appointed with Dr. Grosse mann of Leipsic as chairman. He conceived the plan of the institution as it now exists, desiring that a monument more enduring and appropriate than any of brass or stone might be reared in commemoration of the virtues and services of Gustavus Adolphus. The committee accordingly issued an appeal, Dec. 8, 1832, soliciting six-penny contributions for a society "to aid needy fellow-believers, and relieve Protestant congregations in distress, both at home and in other countries." A similar committee to that in Leipsic was formed in Dresden, with Dr. Käuffer as chairman. Both met and adopted statutes which were sanctioned by the government, Oct. 4, 1834. The management of the institution rested with the societies of those two cities, each presiding in turn, but that at Leipsic administering the funds. Thus the Gustavus Adolphus Society sprang into existence. But it did not meet with expected sympathy. The contributions from Southern Germany were very slender; and although annual reports were published, it was scarcely known beyond Saxony. The Kings of Prussia and Sweden indeed took interest in its success, but on Nov. 6, 1841, its capital amounted to only 12,850 thalers, an insignificant sum in comparison with the wants of the society. Increasing demands for help suggested the necessity of some changes in the statutes. But before these were made Legrand had urged, at a conference of clergymen in Basel, the formation of a society to aid needy Evang. churches; and whilst this matter was agitated, Dr. Zimmermann, court-preacher in Darmstadt, issued an appeal, Oct. 31, 1841, in behalf of a similar object—neither knowing of the earlier movement in Saxony. The appeal of Dr. Zimmermann, which was widely circulated, called forth warm responses both in Germany and Switzerland.—After an understanding between Dr. Zimmermann and the Saxon Society, a general meeting was held in Leipsic in Sept., 1842, when the friends of the new movement and the old society were consolidated into "The Evang. Society of the Gustavus-Adolphus Institution." Its seat of government and central-point should continue in Leipsic. At the second meeting in Sept., 1843, delegates attended from 22 auxiliary societies, and others were present from countries beyond Germany, which wished to unite with the Society, especially from Switzerland, where Legrand's movement had succeeded. At Frankfurt the rules of the Society were discussed and adopted. Its object is stated to be, a union of Protestants to aid their brethren in and beyond Germany, who are unable to provide themselves with the means of grace, and so might be lost to their Church. A Central Board, located in Leipsic, was at the head of the Society. In each country or province a society was established with branches and auxiliaries. The general society hold meetings at least every three years, and at different places, to which national or provincial societies send delegates. Its means consist of the annual income on investments, contributions, bequests, and church collections. Of the receipts of the national society one-third is appropriated by them to needy congregations; one-third either to be sent to the Central Board in Leipsic for congregations in non-Protestant districts, or to be remitted directly to such, by the National Society; one-third to be paid into the treasury of the Central Board, either for investment or disbursement, as the society may desire. The Board makes an annual report on Nov. 6, the anniversary of the death of Gustavus Adolphus.—Thus the old society was merged in this new arrangement, and its funds were accordingly transferred. The society now prospered. The King of Bavaria, indeed, forbade the organization of auxiliaries there, or even the acceptance of aid by any of his subjects (decree of Feb. 10, 1844), and denounced the movement; but the interest of the King of Prussia in the society increased, and he favored the union of the Prussian Soc. with the general Soc., which was effected at Göttingen, in Sept., 1844, when the existence of more than 150 associations was reported.—The first three general meetings were necessarily occupied, mainly, with the constitution of the society. But at that held in Stuttgart, 1845, the wants of suffering brethren claimed more earnest attention. The Central Board reported that 42,000 thalers had been given to 62 congregations.—In Sept., 1846, the society met in Berlin. A period of trial now commenced. Dr. Rupp in Königsberg had left the National Church and organized a free congregation. And yet he attended the Berlin meeting as a delegate from the Königsberg society. It was decided in a preliminary meeting that he could not be allowed a seat. This decision gave rise to a violent controversy. It was denounced as a violation of Christian love. Many left the society, and still continue estranged. But multitudes also joined it in order to oppose Rupp's exclusion. The decision was hailed as an evidence of vigorous life. At Berlin 66,000 thalers were reported as having been appropriated to 134 congregations.—At the next meeting in Darmstadt, 1847, peace was restored. It was resolved that the title of a delegate to a seat should be determined by the assembly. This year 73,000 thalers were reported to have been paid for the maintenance of 169 congregations. During the next two years, however, the zeal of many cooled, and the receipts of the society fell, in 1848, to 37,000 thalers, and in 1849 to 21,000. This discouraging prospect served a good purse. It chastened the rejoicings of the true ends of the cause, and inflamed their zeal.—The 8th general meeting was held in Eisenach, 1850. Although new life inspired the members of the society, more effectual aid was needed; for the applications increased weekly. It was then resolved that this society should cooperate with the work of the Inner Mission, without an amalgamation of the two. The receipts had risen again to 40,000 thalers, and 9 congregations were assisted.—At the 9th meeting in Hamburg, 1851, the society in Old avaria was admitted; 47,000 thalers were received, and 218 congregations aided. In 1852 nine churches built by the society were consecrated. The society that year met in Wiesbaden, and each day's business was preceded by public worship, a rule observed ever since. The receipts were 58,000 thalers, and 236 congregations were aided.—In 1853 the society met at Coburg. A general awakening to the importance of its mission was reported. New societies had been formed in various places, including ladies' societies; 63,000 thalers were received, and 293 congregations aided. A course of prosperity had now opened. At the 13th meeting, at Heidelberg, 1855, the receipts reported were 7,000 thalers, and 290 congregations assisted. During the previous year a Swedish society had been organized at Gothenburg. The speakers, indeed, drew sad pictures of existing destitutions, but the blessing of God was attending the society's efforts.—At present the union consists of 46 main, and 1000 branch societies, and extends its labors to all parts of the world. It has a vested capital of 35,000 thalers.—Besides accomplishing so much in the instances named, this society has aroused evangelical Christians to a sense of their duty to their destitute and suffering brethren, and so given an impulse to other beneficent movements.—In conclusion we mention some of the periodicals published in the interest of the Society.—The "Darmstädter Bote," ed. by Dr. Grossmann, and Dr. Zimmermann. The "Märkische Bote," ed. by Belermann. The "Thüringer Bote," ed. by Schmid. The annual reports of the Society also form a running history of its operations. The Society for the publication of cheap religious works for the people, has issued a history of the Gustavus Adolphus Union; and another by Dr. Zimmermann has appeared. DR. K. ZIMMERMANN.*

Guyon (Guion), Madam, her writings, followers, and confessors, Bertot and Lacombe.—Jeanne Marie Bouviere, (born April 13, 1648, at Montargis in Orleans, † June 9, 1717, in Blois), was the most distinguished among all modern mystics. Her married name was de la Mothe-Guyon. Chiefly through her did the mystic quietism of Molinos (see Art.) spread among the French, Hollanders, English, and Germans, and also into the Evangelical Church. Although she ever remained a strict Rom. Catholic, and wished to be an orthodox one, she seems to have esteemed all who had true Christian love and faith. Her superior talents and deep piety, however, were mixed with the infirmities of her sex and age. The piety of her day and people consisted mainly in an observance of external forms of devotion, and full submission to the directions of confessors of the Roman Church. To become a monk or nun was synonymous with conversion and religiousness. This sort of piety predominated in Mad. Guyon during the first half of her life, as she herself wrote in 1688 (La vie de Mad. de la M.-G., écrite par elle-même: 3 vols., Cologne, 1719).—The wealthy noble parents of Madame Guyon put her, a sickly and much neglected child, in the Ursuline Couvent. There her character was formed under strictly ascetic influences. And yet vanity and coquetry filled her heart. She read romances, the Bible, the Imitat. of Christ, and saints' legends. The life of Francis of Sales (see Art.), and his daughter, the Lady Chantal, made the deepest impression upon her, so that in her twelfth year she sought to imitate that woman in the severest self-inflictions. Having failed in a fraudulent attempt to get into the convent of the Visitation, she attempted to practice ascetic severities upon herself outside of it. Thus she inflicted upon her body the sorest chastisements, and continued this sanguinary discipline even after she had become a beautiful and gifted young woman. In her sixteenth year she married M. Guyon, though without loving him. The misery of this union was aggravated by the bad temper of her mother-in-law. And yet her temptations to vanity and coquetry continued. But after trying, unavailingly, to find peace by outward works, a pious Franciscan directed her to look within, and strive after spiritual communion with God. She did so, and the result was an immediate and thorough "conversion" (1668). Thus she found in mysticism what she had sought in vain before. Now she more decidedly renounced the world and its pleasures, and rejoiced that her beauty was marred by the small-pox. Increasing domestic troubles she bore with meekness, so that her husband thanked her on his death-bed (1676) for her self-sacrificing faithfulness. The young widow, in view of his death, cried out: "O my God, thou hast loosed my bands; I will give thanks unto thee." She immediately resolved never to marry again, although she did not take the monastic vow until 1681.

Her Franciscan counsellor had reluctantly taken the place of her former confessor, who was enraged at her conversion to mysticism. He directed her to the prioress of the Benedictines in Paris, Genevieve Granger, "a most devoted handmaid of the Lord." Following her example and advice, Mad. Guyon had, in 1672, on the anniversary of her "conversion" betrothed herself to Christ as her bridegroom, by signing an agreement, with her own blood. She also, at her friend's suggestion, made Bertot, an enlightened mystic, her confessor. A sacred intimacy sprang up between them, and yet she was in such a state of spiritual gloom from 1673–80, that she could not fully open her heart to him, so that Bertot could never fully understand her case. After his death, 1681, she inherited his spirit, so that she might aid his spiritual children. She edited his mystic writings, in 4 vols.: Le Directeur mystique, containing also twenty letters by herself. Now, too, her darkness was dispelled, and after providing for her two sons, she yielded to a restive missionary impulse, under which her fanaticism reached its height, but which also opened the way for her extraordinary subsequent labors. Primarily she felt herself called to strive to convert Geneva, and secretly fled from Paris in 1681, taking, by the advice of spiritual counselors, her little daughter with her to the newly-erected establishment of converted Catholics at Gex, near Geneva. But she could not rest there, and was, besides, concerned for the health of her child. So she wandered forth for five years, through Savoy, Piedmont, along the Rhone to Marseilles and Genoa, without any definite aim, or apparent outward rest, and yet meanwhile attaining to the highest pinnacle of mystic perfection—to complete inner tranquillity and apathy. Lacombe, the superior of the Barnabites, who was now her spiritual adviser, exercised most influence over her. She had become slightly acquainted with him in 1671, through her brother, the Barnabite, La Mothe, and on meeting him again at Gex felt herself strongly drawn to him. Lacombe was also a disciple of Francis of Sales and Peter Molinos, and well qualified to guide her into the mystical joys of Quietism. Subsequently the pupil set an example to her teacher. Madame Guyon now discovered that her proper work was not the conversion of the Reformed, but to lead those already converted into the mysteries of the inner life. Having seen in a vision the woman mentioned in Rev. 12: 1, 2, she felt that she was to become a mother of believers, and to bring forth spiritual children. This vocation she thenceforth followed under severe outward sufferings, and still more painful inward struggles, during all which she was exposed to the peril of vanity and spiritual pride. During a night prayer at Gex, God revealed to her “that she was Lacombe’s spiritual mother, and he her son,” whereupon she presented herself to him as such. Thenceforth their inward communion was so close, that it operated sympathetically, or magnetically, even when they were far apart. This naturally gave rise to suspicions, although they may have been guilty of no impropriety. She calls their “union an indissoluble unity, in which she can no longer distinguish him from God himself.”

During this fanatical period Madame Guyon also felt herself suddenly impelled to teach others by voice and writings, and this in the manner of all mystics, without premeditation—under the influence of inspiration, or at least of a spiritual intuition. It was thus she composed (1683) that truly poetical work: les Torrens. About the same time she wrote the treatise upon the purification of the soul after death, in which she represents the woe of the damned as caused not by pains inflicted from without, but by an unsatisfied longing after God. “The fire of purgatory is no other than God himself purifying the soul by his divine righteousness.” In 1684 she wrote, in the same transported, almost unconscious magnetic state, her mystical exposition of Canticles and Revelation, and her other explanations of the Scriptures, in which, without touching upon the literal sense, she constantly finds an allegorical mystical meaning. The “Moyen court et très-facile de faire oraison,” which acquired such importance, she had composed previously; it was published in 1684, and, with her “les Torrens,” led to her subsequent persecution. In it she commends the silent prayer of the heart, as the highest form of prayer.—Madame Guyon like her model, Mad. de Chantal, founded, shortly before her return to Paris, a congregation of the “childhood of Jesus,” for which she prepared a special rule. In this rule, also, she exalts the virtue of silent meditative prayer, and requires that man shall in all things become as a child, a holy simpleton. “A truly tranquil person cannot sin, so long as he maintains his tranquillity: for sin is without, not in him,” a declaration which, as was natural, was grossly misinterpreted by many of her adherents. During this period she had many revelations in transports and visions, of which, however, she spoke more cautiously in later life.—After her five years’ wanderings, either circumstances, or her heart, led her to seek L., and to his terror she found him in Vercelli, Piedmont. He accompanied her to Paris, 1686, whither she had been called. Sufferings awaited them both there. In 1687, urged by the French court, the Pope condemned Molinos and the quietistic doctrine, and a persecution of its adherents broke out. Lacombe was seized and kept in various prisons distant from Paris until his death. Madame Guyon, through her enraged brother, La Mothe, was confined, Jan., 1688, in a monastery in Paris, and rigidly examined concerning her doctrines and writings. Although resigned to her doom, and that of Lacombe, with whom she maintained a wonderful spiritual communion, and occupying her time in writing her own biography, &c., she still used all means to regain her liberty, and actually succeeded in 1689, through the influence of Mad. Maintenon. She then lived some years with her unmarried daughter, and by herself in Paris, much respected at the court and by mystical friends, whose increasing number seemed a fulfilment of her prophecy. Among these was Fenelon (see Art., and Bossuet), to whom she addressed, July, 1689, her short treatise: “The way to God and the reunion of the soul with Him.” Meanwhile, in consequence of Bossuet’s strife with Fenelon, a new persecution assailed her; neither could she refrain from efforts to multiply her spiritual family. In vain she vindicated her writings in the “Apologie du moyen court,” etc., 1690, and Justification, 1694. In 1695 she was compelled, before a court of inquiry, to retract thirty quietistic doctrines, and at the end of the year she was again seized and imprisoned for ten years in Vincennes, Vaugirard, and the Bastille. Even the wretched Lacombe was used against her, by getting him to write letters, some expressions of which bore a shameful interpretation against Madame Guyon, and in which he called on her to confess and renounce the mistakes which both had committed. When these were read, she calmly replied that Lacombe must be insane. He really became so soon after, and died in 1699, in the insane house at Charenton. In 1700 Bossuet himself declared that in the whole controversy the consequences of Madame Guyon’s doctrines had nothing to do, she herself having always deprecated them;—hence, after Fénélon's overthrow, 1701, she was released from confinement. But at first she was sent into the country, to her daughter's, and then to Blois, where she spent the rest of her life, in peace and quiet, honored and admired by all around her, for her patience and resignation, and visited often by her son who lived near by, and the Bishop of Blois. No word of reproach against her enemies ever escaped her lips, but she rather vindicated them as having acted according to conviction. She lay most of the time sick, but daily attended mass in her chapel, and every other day took the sacrament. Many friends from France, Germany and England visited her, and she kept up an active correspondence with all.

A collection of her smaller works was published in 1704 by Wetstein, Amsterdam: Opusculæ spirituales, edited perhaps by P. Poiret (see Art.), who, 1713–22, published her entire works in 39 vols., Amst. Most of her works were also translated and published in German. Some of her poems were translated by Cowper.—The circle of her adherents was continued after her death, including persons of rank, some of whom were Germans. Poiret, G. Arnold, and Tersteegen were of the number. Stilling, in his Theobald, describes the great influence of her writings (see also Berleburg-Bible).

M. GOEBEL.*

Gyrovagi were wandering monks, who, unwilling to submit to the restraints of a fixed abode, or to the toil of laboring for their sustenance, travelled around among the monasteries and cells of their more earnest brethren, taking each in rotation (hence their name. Isidore of Sev. calls them circumcelliones, see Donatists). The evils of such a class are obvious. They disturbed the meditative quietness of those on whose hospitality they intruded, and proved a dangerous medium of circulating slanders and heresies. Augustine (de opere monach. c. 28) and Cassian (collatio 18) in vain denounced these vagabond monks. Not until the rule of Benedict, in the 18th cent., became ascendant, was occidental monasticism reduced to cenobite regulations.—Unsettled, roving clergymen are also sometimes called Gyrovagi.—(See MARTENE, Comm. in Regulam S. P. Bened.: Paris, 1690, p. 53, &c.).

A. VOGEL.*

H.

Habakkuk.—In the brief book of this prophet, more than in any other, we find an energetic rebuke of sin, a noble indignation, combined with profound piety and love, at the apostasy of his beloved people. He treats his theme, also, in a manner peculiar to himself, rather placing scenes before us in the outlines of a living reality, than depicting them. In the present he sees only spoiling and violence, "strife and contention." Every sphere of social life is desolate, like a country blasted with the poisonous breath of sin. Peace has fled; anarchy prevails; law is despised; and righteousness has become a mockery (1: 3, &c.). And yet the people stop their ears against the warnings of the prophets. Therefore, the Lord must punish his people in order to break up their hardness of heart. The Chaldeans shall be the rod in his hand; they shall fall upon his people like springing leopards, and devour them like ravaging wolves (1: 8). But it is worthy of notice, that, as the prophet proceeds, he represents God himself as appearing to overthrow the reckless and sacrilegious invaders (1: 12, &c.; 2: 1, &c.). As a forerunner of the apostle he utters that great sentence of humiliation and exaltation: "the just shall live by faith" (2: 4). The condemnation of idolaters is pronounced, and the spread of the glory of God triumphantly proclaimed (2: 5, &c.; 14, &c.). The book closes with "a prayer." But only the 1st verse has the form of a prayer. The rest is intimately connected with the preceding prophecy. The fearfulness of the speedy judgments he invokes upon the Chaldeans, fills his own heart with terror, and he implores the Lord in the midst of wrath to remember mercy. Still he cannot withhold a description of the terrible execution of vengeance. The theophany here exhibited is the most glorious to be found in the Old Test. (3: 3, &c.). And yet Habakkuk closes the scene with words full of hope and comfort (3: 17, &c.).—From the closing words it has been inferred, justly, that Habakkuk was a Levite; a fact which is clear, also, from the lyric tone and form of the last chapter. For H. wears the mantle both of a prophet and a poet; he is at once a Jeremiah and Anaph.—We know no more of him than his name, excepting an uncertain tradition has adorned his life (see DELITZSCH, de H. vita, &c., 1844). Luther gives his name the tender signification of "taking to one's heart," in reference to his cordial concern for his people. There is not even an inscription to indicate under whose reign he prophesied. But whatever may be advanced in favor of another period, it seems most probable, from internal evidence, especially from the great dread expressed of an immediate invasion of the Chaldeans, that Habakkuk prophesied under Jehoiakim.—(See UMBREIT, Einl. zu Hab. 276–7; the commentaries of Ewald, Hitzig, and Delitzsch; and that of Umbreit, or the minor prophets).

UMBREIT.*

Hadad.—1) The eighth of Ishmael's twelve sons, 1 Chron. 30.—2) and 3) The fourth and eighth Kings who reigned in Edom before they had one in Israel; Gen. 36: 35, 36, 39; 1 Chron. 1: 46, 47, 50–51.—4) A prince of Edom who got to Egypt when David exterminated the men of Edom, became the brother-in-law of the King of Egypt, and after David's death attempted to recover Edom, 1 Kings 11: 14-22. — 5) A King of Zoba, surnamed Ezer (excepting in 1 Kings 11: 25). Twice defeated by David, he also involved his auxiliary, Damascus, in ruin, and had to raise the siege of Hamath. The flight of one of his bravest generals, Rezon, by which H.'s force was weakened, nevertheless proved advantageous, for David overcame the fugitives, and Rezon was slain. Hence Hadad was enabled to wage war against Solomon (2 Sam. 8: 3-12; 1 Kings 11: 23-25), having become King of Syria. This is the most natural interpretation of the Hebrew text. DR. PRESSEL.*

Hadad Rimmon, named in Zech. 12: 11, as the place of a great lamentation, over the death of some great person, as the type of the greatest of all lamentations in Jerusalem over its dead. The reference is not, as some say (Hitzig) to the Adonis worship, but to the death, most probably, of King Josiah, who died after the battle of Megiddo. RITTER (Erdk. 2 Aufl. Th. 16, p. 699) says that it cannot be determined whether Hadad Rimmon is identical with Megiddo or Lejjûn, until those districts have been more accurately examined and measured. Robinson and v. Raumer hold opposite opinions on the subject. This variety of opinion is owing mainly to the different distances given by different itineraries.—(See HIERON., ad c. 12, Sach., who says—“Adad Remmon est juxta Jezraelem—hodie vocatur Maximianopolis in campo Mageddon.—RELAND, Palestine. ROBINSON, Palest. Bibl. sacra, Vol. II., 1, p. 220-21. v. RAUMER, Pal. 3 Aufl., 402-3. RITTER, Erdk. 2 Aufl., XI., 552). DR. PRESSEL.*

Hades.—At first, Αἰδης among the Greeks was the name of Pluto, the God of the nether world, but it was afterwards applied to the nether world itself, the abode and estate of the departed, and corresponds to Orcus or the inferna of the Latins, and לֵוְנִשׁ of the Hebrews.

To a greater or less degree it was regarded as a place of final reward and punishment and contained its Elysium and its Tartarus. The life led there was closely analogous to that of the upper world, the only difference being that the inhabitants were shades, forms without substance.

From this heathen view of the future state that of the Old Test. differs less than might be supposed. Life and immortality had not yet been brought to light. לֵוְנִשׁ can scarcely, as some moderns think, come from לָוַשׁ. It is derived rather from לָנִשׁ, to demand, and signified the place that demands all (Prov. 27: 20), the common receptacle of the dead, the righteous as well as the wicked. Gen. 37: 35; 1 Sam. 28; Hab. 2: 5; Ps. 6: 6; 89: 48. In Ps. 94: 17; 115: 17, it is represented as a silent place: in Job 10: 21, as dark; in Numb. 16: 30, 33, and Job 11: 7, 8, as a place of rest, deep down in the earth; in Ps. 6: 5; 89: 48; Is. 38: 18; Eccl. 9: 10; Job 3: 17-19; 14: 7; Is. 14: 9, as without charm, uncomfortable, where all who go thither lead a dull, joyless, shadowy existence. Hence לֵוְנִשׁ is sometimes used as a synonym of לָוְנִשׁ. Meanwhile, as the expectation of a Messiah became more and more clear, hope of an awakening from the slumber of death, of a coming to God, arose (Ps. 17: 15; Eccl. 3: 21; 12: 7; Is. 25: 8; 26: 19; Hosea 13: 14), and Dan. 12: 2, 13 speaks of a resurrection “at the ends of the days,” an awakening of some to everlasting life, and of some to everlasting shame and contempt.

In the Apocrypha the same view prevails. The Book of Sirach shows no advance, and even retrogression (17: 28, 30), whilst 2 Macc. (2: 9 and 12: 43-45) speaks both of the rewarding of the pious dead and of a resurrection. The Book of Wisdom, too, proclaims in animated style the blessedness of the righteous and the punishments of the wicked at “the day of decision” (2: 22; 3: 1, 10, 18; 5: 15, 16; 6: 19). In what relation they stood to αἰδης is not so clear. Still it seems that by αἰδης was meant the whole sphere beyond the grave, and that ἀφθαρσία (Wisdom 6: 19) had much the same meaning as ἀνάστασις (2 Macc. 12: 43). What elucidation, finally, the doctrine of the resurrection received from the school of Pharisees, can be learned in part from Josephus and in part from the New Test.—(Comp. Fr. Böttcher, de inferis rebusque post mortem futuris ex Hebræorum et Græcorum opinionibus: Vol. I., Dresd., 1846).

In the New Test. various terms, borrowed from the language of the age, are used to designate the other world. Their exact meaning is difficult to ascertain. Especially is this the case with αἰδης. Twice it occurs in quotations as a translation of לֵוְנִשׁ (Acts 2: 27; 1 Cor. 15: 55). With the exception of Matt 11: 23, and parallel passages, where the ὡς αἰδης καταβιβάζεσθαι must be understood as referring metonymically to total perdition, it appears throughout in direct connection with θάνατος. Even the πύλαι αἰδου (Matt. 16: 18) can only refer to the annihilating powers of death. We meet the rich man also, after his death, in hades. In Rev. 6: 8 Hades follows Death on the pale horse, showing that death causes a removal into hades. At the final judgment (Rev. 20: 13, 14), the sea, death and hades give up the dead contained in them, whereupon—not the latter, but death and hades will be cast into the lake of fire, i. e., cease to exist. To Christ, the ever-living One, who was dead, Rev. 1: 18, assigns power over death and hades, and his resurrection (Acts 2: 27, 31) is to be regarded as a coming forth of his soul out of hades, or what (according to v. 24) is the same thing, as a loosing of the ωδίνες τοῦ θανάτου. In like manner the resurrection from the dead is styled in 1 Cor. 15: 55, a victory over death and hades.

From all this it is clear, that by αἰδης we must understand the place and condition into which man falls at death, and from which the resurrection and final judgment set him free. Such was the universal idea of the Jews, and the New Test. expressly assigns the soul of Christ, no less than that of the rich man, to hades. Neither φθαρσίς (1 Pet. 3: 19; comp. 11: 6), nor ἀβυσσος

(Rom. 10 : 7) can be distinguished from hades ; and it must not be overlooked that both φυλακή (Rev. 20 : 7) and especially ἀβύσσος (Rev. 20 : 1-3 ; 9 : 2, 11, and probably 17 : 8, and Luke 8 : 31) are applied also to the Satanic region, the place of damnation in the full sense. It is the same likewise with γέεννα. Whilst there is no passage that forbids us from including the place of future punishment, according to the language of our Lord in the three Gospels, under the idea of hades, other passages represent as burning there the everlasting fire (Mark 9 : 43 ; Matt. 18 : 8, 9) prepared for the devil and his angels (Matt. 25 : 41, 46). According to these expressions γέεννα would be synonymous with the κάμινος τοῦ πυρός (Matt. 13 : 42, 50), into which, at the end of the world, the wicked will be cast, to which also reference is made in the phrase σκότος τὸ ἑώτερον. On the other hand, the κόλπος Ἀβραάμ (Luke 16 : 22), according to the prevailing linguistic usage of the Jewish theology, can only exist in hades, although it is separated from the place of torment by an impassable gulf. It forms the sphere reserved for the followers of the faithful Abraham (comp. Matt. 8 : 11 ; Joseph. Macc. 16). And since there is no ground to suppose an internal contradiction between Luke 23 : 43 ; Acts 2 : 31 ; and 1 Pet. 3 : 19, we must include παραδείσος also in hades, and regard it as only another name for κόλπος Ἀβραάμ. Thus it fares with παράδεισος as with φυλακή, ἀβύσσος and γέεννα, since the word, at least in 2 Cor. 12 : 4 (v. 2, ὁ τρίτος οὐρανός), and Rev. 2 : 7, stands for heaven or the place of happiness.

To this result then we come. Ἄλδης in the New Test. is an eschatological name of a very general character, like the phrase other world. Although the idea of place is inseparably connected with it, it is to be considered mainly as the state that follows death, which may be one of happiness or one of misery. A careful analysis shows, however, that the terms used to express this must not be exclusively confined to the time which precedes the second coming of Christ. Indeed, the New Testament does not draw a clear line between the state of individuals before and after the ἐσχάτη ἡμέρα, though it makes everything depend on the decision of the last day. It seeks rather to show men that salvation and perdition are conditioned by a communion of life with Christ Jesus. Doctrinal precision was less necessary in the apostolic age, since the end of all things was supposed to be very near at hand.

A cursory glance at dogmatic history reveals a strange diversity of opinions concerning hades. Regarding it simply as a transient abode of all the departed until the resurrection, the glorified martyrs only excepted, the primitive Church did not succeed in keeping itself free from the current ideas of the heathen world and of later Judaism. The doctrine of the immediate reception of the believers into heaven Justin rejects as heretical (Dial. c. Fr., § 80). Tertullian (de anima, c. 55) attempts to demonstrate that, omnem animam apud inferos sequestrari in diem Domini. It is doubtful, however, whether Cyprian held to the doctrine of a middle state. The Gnostics, since this earth was considered as their nether world, taught that at death the pneumatici were taken up into the πλήρωμα. From the time of Origen, and chiefly through his influence, the view, according to which the devil had by the seduction of man acquired the power of death and with it dominion over the kingdom of the dead, from whose gloomy realms he would not suffer souls to ascend to God, gradually gained ground. Hades comes thus to have much the same meaning as the word hell now. In the Greek Church the view was finally adopted, that by the descent of Christ into hades it was despoiled, and believers removed into Paradise, so that since the coming of Christ the temporary punishment of hades can no longer be distinguished from that which is eternal. In the Western Church the doctrine took another form. As soon as the dogma of purgatory, developed by Gregory the Great, was promulgated, it met with universal approbation. In the midst, between heaven and hell, though nearer the former, were situated two regions, the limbus infantum, and the, now empty, limbus patrum. In the latter, the same as Abraham's bosom, the pious of the Old Testament had, on account of original sin, to undergo the pœna damni, yet without feeling any suffering. The Church of the Reformation at once rejected purgatorial fire and limbus, but holding simply to heaven and hell for the departed of all ages, failed to give satisfaction. Hence in the middle of the 17th cent., and in the course of the 18th cent., the doctrine of a status medius was revived and defended on scriptural grounds by Lightfoot, King, Burnet, and Pearson of England, and later by a number of Pietists, till now it meets with very general favor.

In fact, if evangelical theology teaches, that the completion of the personality of the creature can only take place in the resurrection, it is impossible not to admit a middle state for all who pass out of the present world by death—call that state what we may, Sheol, Hades, Middle Place, Nether World, or Kingdom of the Dead. A correct view of death and the necessary identity of the person both before and in death, renders it clear that the condition of the individual in that world stands in full harmony with his personal worth, measured by the divine standard. For believers this makes the middle state a being with the Lord, a dwelling in the many mansions of the Father, whilst unbelievers only find there the beginning of eternal perdition. Lazarus is carried by angels into Abraham's bosom, and is comforted : the rich man suffers torment in hades.

For a full discussion of the subject, and questions connected with it, see Güder's Lehre v. d. Erscheinen Jesu Christi unter d. Todten: Berne, 1853, where the literature pertaining to it is also given. GÜDER.—Porter.

Hadoram—one of the thirteen sons of Joktan (Gen. 10 : 27), whose descendants migrated to southern Arabia before the Abrahamites (Ewald, Isr. Gesch., I., 337 (1st ed.)). He represents also a tribe of that great Arabic race, which Ptol., 6, 7, 10, 25, 26, and Plin. Hist. Nat. call Adramites. These historians say they dwelt partly adjacent to the Chatrammites or Chatra-motites (Gen. 10 : 26), and partly among them. Eratosthenes calls them the S. E. Arabians, with Sabata for their chief city, and says the Sabeans dwelt 40 days' travel from their borders. According to others their country extends to the Persian gulf.—2) Adoram (2 Sam. 20 : 24 ; in 1 Kings 4 : 6, it is written Adoniram) had charge of the tribute collected from conquered nations. If we assume that he was appointed in the last years of David, these names may easily designate the same person. He lost his life in attempting to quell the rebellion of the ten tribes.

VAHINGER.*

Hadrach (Zech. 9 : 1) was long regarded as the name of a country, lying E. of Damascus. R. Jose, a Damascene, says it was a large city, of which but a small village remains. But this view lacks support. The opinion of Alphees, that the name is associated with that of the Syrian deity Atergatis, Derceto, is more probable. This view approximates that of Gesenius (Thes. I., 449) and Bleek (Ullmann's Stud., 1852, 2, p. 268) that it is the name of an Aramaic King, whom Gesenius connects with Adores (Justin, 36, 2). Kings often took the names of deities (Micah 5 : 5 ; Neh. 9 : 22). — If Hadrach was a Syrian King—which of them was he? We know of 1) Hadadezer, 2 Sam. 8 : 3 ; 2) Rezon, 1 Kings 11 : 23 ; 3) Benhadad I., 1 King 15 : 19 ; 2 Chron. 16 : 1, 2 ; 4) Benhadad II., 1 Kings 20 : 1 ; 2 Kings 6 : 24, &c. ; 5) Hazael, 2 Kings 8 : 9, 12, &c. ; 6) Benhadad III., 2 Kings 13 : 24, c. 839, B. C. After this only Rezin is named, Is. 7 : 1, c. 740, B. C., after whose time no prophecy could have been uttered against Syria, which was absorbed by Assyria (Is. 7 : 8 ; cf. Jer. 49 : 23–27 and Amos 1 : 4) early in the time of Isaiah. Hamath (Zech. 9 : 2) was first united with Assyria under Hezekiah (Is. 36 : 19 ; 37 : 12, 13). And as Zech. 9 : 2 represents it as still flourishing, with Damascus, it must have fallen before the time of Hezekiah, and (v. 10, 13) before the dissolution of the kingdom of the ten tribes. Hadrach, therefore, must have been that Syrian King who reigned between Benh. III. and Rezin, about the time of Uzziah and Jeroboam II.

VAHINGER.*

Hadrian (P. Aelius) Emperor, of Italica in Spain, a relative of Trajan, his ward, brother-in-law, and successor (117–138, A. D.). He found Judea still agitated by the spirit of insurrection, and attempted to put an end to disturbances by forbidding circumcision, and so destroying the nationality of the Jews (SPART., in Hadr., c. 14). Having simultaneously attempted to restore Jerusalem by founding a Roman colony there, under the name of Aelia Capitolina, the Jews rallied under Bar Cochba (see Art.) and inflicted great losses upon the Romans, until they were subdued by Julius Severus (Dio, 12, 14 ; EUSEB., H. E., IV., 6 ; Chron. Pasch., 474, ed. Rom.). On the ruins of Jerusalem arose Aelia Cap., but the Jews were forbidden under penalty of death, to approach it. The prohibition of circumcision was again annulled by Anton. Pius. Hadrian was a zealous worshipper of the sacra of his native land, but adopted, also, the Egyptian cultus, besides that of Rome and Greece. Though the statement of Ael. Lamprid. (Alex. Ser. 43), that Hadrian wished to dedicate temples to Christ in several cities, is not worthy of credit, he treated Christians more favorably than some other Emperors. Under him the people began to demand the execution of Christians at public festivals. The Proconsul of Asia Minor complained of this to Hadrian, who issued a rescript forbidding it, and requiring that all complaints against Christians should be made in legal form. It was rather his love of justice, than regard for Christianity, that prompted this. The edict, however, failed of its object, and the fourth persecution occurred under his reign, though neither Melito, Tertullian, nor Eusebius count him among the persecutors of Christians. On the whole his reign was favorable to Christians. — Hadrian's private character was disfigured by voluptuousness, vanity, and irritability, though he was a liberal patron of learning. He died of consumption and dropsy at Baya, July 10, 138. Antoninus was scarcely able to procure divine honors for him, so insensured were the people and senate at the abomination which he perpetrated at the close of his life.

TH. PRESSER.*

Hadrian.—Popes.—I., 772–95. At the time of his elevation the papacy had succeeded in gaining efficient aid in extension of its power, from the Frankish King ; although it was just then threatened by the Lombards. Pipin le Bref had checked the Lombards, and made the Pope Patricius of the exarchate. They still, however, kept the Pope in terror, and his peril increased when Charlemagne married the daughter of Desiderius, King of the Lombards, and thus the Franks and Lombards were reconciled. The papacy knowing that its interests demanded it, excited hostilities again between the royal houses ; when Desiderius made a new attack on Hadrian I., the latter called Charlemagne to his help, who overthrew the Lombards (774), and not only confirmed the grants of his father, but enlarged the papal domains by adding Ancona and Benevento. Hadrian, in a letter to Charlemagne, calls him "novus Christianissimus Constantinus" (see Cod. Carol. in Murat. Script. Rer. Ital., T. III., Pt. 2, p. 73 ; and Cajet. CENNI, Monum. Daminat. Pontif. : Rom. 1760. I., no. 49). This letter has been erroneously supposed to refer to the Donatio Constant. M., for Hadrian alludes only to the Acta Sylvestri, which first furnished a basis for that Donatio (cf. CENNI Monum., 304). — Hadrian gave a collection of eccl. laws made by Dion. Exiguus (Cod. canonum) to C., to be introduced into the Frankish kingdom (774, cf. J. C. RUDOLPH, Nova comm. de Cod. can., quas Hadr. I. Carolo M. dono dedit : Erlang., 1777 ; and C. obtained for the same purpose the Sacramentarium Greg. M. In 794 Hadrian sent Theophylact and Stephan as legates to the Synod at Frankfort, convoked by C. on account of the Adoptionism controversy. C. presided, and not only had Adoptionism, but the adoration of images rejected, although Hadrian, in a letter to him (MANSI, Concilior. nova et ampliss. Coll. XIII., p. 795), said : si quis sanctas imagines Domini nostri J. C. et ejus genetricis atque omnium sanctorum secundum SS. Patrum doctr. venerari noluerit, anathema sit. — II., 867–72, was animated by the same proud and arrogant spirit which characterized his predecessor, Nicholas I., whose political maxims he adopted, but with less success. He was married before his elevation, and had a daughter. His ambitious political measures offended the public sense of justice, and yet failed to confirm his power. When Charles the Bald divided Lorraine with Lewis of Germany, Hadrian interceded in behalf of Lewis II., declared that he alone was the legitimate King, and threatened him with the bann. Hincmar of Rheims (see Art.) denounced the Pope's interference in secular matters, as inconsistent with his office, and declared that if a Bishop excommunicated a person unlawfully, he lost the power of binding again. The Pope could send no one to perdition. But Hadrian was not the man to be moved by such appeals, or even by the failure of his schemes. He availed himself of the disputes between Charles and his son, Carloman, to oppose Charles anew, though again without effect. His shameful interference in the case of Hincmar of Laon (see Art.) had no better result (see HINCMAR, Opp. II., 701). Now, however, he attempted to assuage the anger of the King by flattery, and thus widened the breach between him and Carloman (MANSI, XV., 857). Meanwhile the pseudo-Isidorian principles increased papal ambition and developed the idea that the supreme administration of the divine law devolved upon the Pope as the universal Bishop of the Church. Hence the application of Lewis II., to be released from an oath which Adalgisus of Benevento had compelled him to take. The strife which led to the separation of the Greek and Latin Churches, occurred under Hadrian's reign (see Photius). It was under him also that the Council of Worms (868) decreed the celibacy of the clergy, and that all who entered monasteries in youth, must remain there for life.—III., reigned scarcely a year, 884-5, when the fearful contentions between the princes of Italy broke out, in which the papacy was only a party tool. Charles the Fat summoned Hadrian to him, to inaugurate his illegitimate son, Bernhard, as heir of the throne.—IV., 1154-9, was an Englishman by birth (Nicholas Breakspeare), entered a monastery, became abbot of St. Rufus, Rome, then cardinal-bishop of Albano, and successor of Anastasius. He opened the bitter struggle of the papacy against the Hohenstaufen. The hierarchy already found a powerful enemy in Arnold of Brescia (see Art.). As Frederick I. had shown his determination to maintain his authority, at the Magdeburg election for Pope, Hadrian readily supposed that he would seize the first favorable opportunity for vindicating it in Italy. This he did on pretence of settling the feuds which were embroiling the Lombard cities. F. subjected them to himself, severely chastising those which resisted. Hadrian became alarmed, but was reassured by the protection which F. afforded him against his foes, especially Arnold of Brescia. Hadrian crowned Frederick, June 18, 1155. These friendly relations were soon disturbed by Hadrian's concluding a peace with William of Sicily, and the breach was widened by an arrogant letter of Hadrian to the German Bishops (MANSI, XXI., 789, &c.), saying: imperialis insigne coronæ libertissime CONFERENS, and that F. had received beneficia de nostra manu. F. was enraged, and appealed to the German Bishops, who accused Hadrian of having invaded the freedom of the German crown (MANSI, XXI., 792), and called on him to compromise with Frederick. Hadrian yielded to this appeal, and offered explanations. F. satisfied with these, went to Italy, held a diet on the fields of Rankal, and made jurists of Bologna define his prerogatives according to Roman law. The sum of them was—that he had the rights of the old commanders, hence, quod Principi placuit, legis habet vigorem. Frederick now strictly prohibited all spiritual investitures, and thus offended both the Bishop and the Pope. Serious charges were made by both parties, when the Pope was strangled at Anagni. Under Hadrian the Cathari were sorely persecuted.—V., Ottoboni Fresco, from July 12, to Aug. 18, 1276, he was a Genoese by birth.—VI., Jan. 9, 1522 to Sept. 14, 1523, was the son of a mechanic in Utrecht, professor at Löwen, and tutor of Charles V. In 1517 he became a cardinal, in 1519 B. of Tortosa, and on Jan. 9, 1522, elected, by 39 cardinals, successor of Leo X. He was distinguished for his knowledge of scholastic theology and canon law, for earnestness and strict morality. The corruptions of the Church were deplored by him, but he was unable to see that they were the natural results of the sacerdotal hierarchy. He was even favorable to reform, but lacked decision of character to begin the work. As he had previously avowed that he thought the Pope fallible, the friends of order expected much from his elevation. But in his bondage to scholastic theology, he supposed the existing evils were but external, and that when these were removed, even Luther would be satisfied. Hence Luther's views seemed to him foolish puerilities, which might be easily refuted (C. BURMANI, Hadr. VI. sive Analecta hist. de Hadr. VI., Traj. ad Rhen., 1727, p. 447). In this view he was confirmed by a letter of Wilibald Pirckheimer (DAN. GERDESII Hist. Evangelii renovati in the Monument. I., 170), which blames the hatred of the Dominicans of all learning, their insolence and frauds, especially with regard to indulgences, as the cause of the disturbances in the Church. Hence Hadrian opposed simony, nepotism, bribery, and the abuse of indulgences. But in this he found decided resistance in the court itself. He desired (Hist. du Conc. de Trente, traduite par P. T. le Courayer. à Basle, 1738, I., 41, &c.) to issue a bull declaring that the efficacy of indulgences depended on personal amendment; but Card. Pucci objected that the revenues would thus be diminished, and the evangelical party strengthened. Card. Soderini further advised him to abstain from all attempts at reform, to win the people by granting indulgences, and to put down the heretics by violence. But Ludov. Vives recommended the calling of a general Council. Hadrian turned to Erasmus, and asked him to write against Luther. Erasmus declined, proposed to submit the points in dispute to impartial umpires, and warned him against the use of harsh means. Still Hadrian thought the German Reformation might be most effectually suppressed by requiring the execution of the edict of Worms, and to this end availed himself of the Diet of Nuremberg, opened Dec. 13, 1522. But before its opening he sent his privy councillor, Rorarius, to Frederic the Wise to admonish him to exert himself in favor of the apostolic chair. F. replied through Melancthon, that he thought it far better to defeat the Reformers by arguments than by violence (Corpus Ref., I., 585, &c.). At the commencement of the diet the legate denounced the evangelical clergymen of Nuremberg, and read a brief (Luth. Opp. Lat. Jen., II., 536) which declared Luther's doctrine not only injurious to the Church, but dangerous to the State. Other briefs were handed to Elector Frederic, Duke Henry of Mecklenburg, and others, in which Hadrian threatened divine vengeance, and the pains of hell to all who would support Luther's cause. This only excited the evangelical party against Chieregati, the legate. Suddenly, at the beginning of 1523 he presented himself with new instructions, which he either received from Rome, or (as many believed), prepared on the spot at the Pope's direction. Luther was compared to Mohammed; the acts of Councils were not to be disputed; and yet the corruptions of the Church, in its head and all its members, were acknowledged, and a promise was given that steps would be taken to secure a thorough reformation—only nothing should be done rashly. At the same time the Council was urged to devise further measures for the suppression of the Lutherans. These proposals only called forth bitter denunciations from both parties. On the part of the evangelical members, the position taken is the more note-worthy, as their opposition now first assumed a corporate form. The legate's rage was unbounded. But the evangelical estates, regardless of his denunciations, prepared a statement of their complaints for the legate. The legate did not wait to receive them. They were sent to Rome, where they were rejected as destitute of an official character. Still the declarations they contained were substantially adopted as the decisions of the diet (March 6, 1523. Walch, XV., 2625, &c.). Hadrian's efforts had failed. Grieved and angry he applied to Charles V. for redress; but Charles was offended that Hadrian was to settle the dispute between him and Francis of France, and did not regard the Pope's complaint.—Hadrian has been denounced more by Romanists than by Protestants. At his death his enemies hung a wreath over the door of his physician with the inscription: the liberator of his country.—(O. WESSENBERG, d. grossen Kirchenvers. d. 15. u. 16. Jahrh., III., 100, &c.). Hadrian's correspondence with Erasmus, is especially remarkable. (See BURMANN, l. c., and DANZ, Analecta critica de Hadr. VI. P. II.: Jene, 1814).

NEUDECKER.*

Hagar (flight) an Egyptian handmaid of Sarah. Sarah, being childless, gave Hagar to Abraham as his concubine (after Eastern custom), that she might adopt the servant's child as her own. Hagar became insolent, and when Sarah chided her, fled into the wilderness of Shur (Dfōjar). There the Lord appeared to her at the well Beer-labai-roi ("the well of the living one who beholds me," EWALD, Gesch. Isr. I., 358; LENGERKE, Ken., I., 274; or "well to the life of seeing," where one sees God, and lives, Tuch), and directed her to return to Sarah (Gen. 16 : 5, &c.). Gen. 21 : 9, &c. (cf. 25 : 6, 11, &c.) further relates that after Ishmael had well grown up (17 : 25; 21 : 8) Abraham sent him and his mother off, because Sarah was unwilling to have the legitimate heir of the house reared with Hagar's son. She wandered in the desert of Beersheba until her bottle of water was exhausted, and then gave up in despair, when an angel came and showed her a fountain. The Arabs still show a well called Muweilih Hadjar, about 15 miles from Kadesh, on the way from Beersheba to Egypt (ROBINSON, Palest.; TUCH, Zeitschr. d. deutsch-morgentl. Ges. I., 175, &c.; RITTER's Erdk. XIV., 1086). The Arabs (see Arabia) claiming descent from Ishmael (see Art.) regard Hagar as Abraham's lawful wife, and suppose she is buried at Mecca (HERBELOT, bibl. Orient. fol. 927, ed. Par. 1697; EWALD, l. c., I., 369; the Comm. of Tuch and Knobel). In Gal. 4 : 24, Hagar and Sarah are employed allegorically to represent the law and the gospel,—probably from the resemblance between the sound of Hagar and that of the Arabic word for "rock."

RÜRTSCHL.*

Hagarites or Hagarenes were (1 Chron. 5 : 10, &c.) Bedouin tribes in Northern Arabia, which, with other Ishmaelitic nations, were conquered by Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh, with the loss of 100,000 men, 50,000 camels, 250,000 sheep, and 2000 asses, and driven from their country. They again appear in the post-exile period as hostile to the Israelites (Ps. 83 : 7; 1 Macc. 5). In Baruch 3 : 23, the "sons of Hagar" are not Hagarites, but Ishmaelites in general. Probably the "son of Hagar," among David's heroes, was a Hagarite (but see 2 Sam. 23 : 36). A Hagarite had charge of David's flocks, (1 Chron. 27 : 31), and an Ishmaelite of his camels, because the animals were pastured in districts where those nomadic people were accustomed to feed their cattle (BERTHEAC on Chron., p. 228). Following the Hebrew traditions concerning Hagar, we may suppose that the Hagarites formerly pastured their flocks in the Arabian desert in the S. of Canaan, towards Egypt, then moved E. and N. E. towards Gilead, and, driven thence, finally settled along the Persian Gulf, where a people of that name still live, and annually sell thousands of camels to Syria (NIEBUHR, Beschr. v. Arab. p. 339). Probably it is the same race which Erastoth. in Strabo, 16. 4, 2, p. 767, and Dionys. perieget., 956, call 'Αγάραιοι, in N. Arabia, and these again seem to be identical with the celebrated Gerhæans on the Persian Gulf.—(EWALD, Gesch. Isr., I., 369; II., 319; WINER, Lex.).

RÜRTSCHL.*

Haggai.—The zeal with which the Jews who returned from exile began to rebuild the temple (Ezra 3 : 10, &c.), soon gave way before continued obstacles; and they became so disheartened that the most pious among them despaired of the fulfilment of the divine promise.

It was then (in the 2d year of Darius Hystapes, 520, B. C.), that Haggai and Zechariah were sent to encourage Zerubbabel, revive zeal in the building of the temple, and hope in the promised salvation. From the sixth month of the year named, Haggai prophesied. Nothing is known certainly of his personal history but what is said in his book, and in Ezra 5 : 1 ; 6 : 14. He may have been one of those old men who had (Hag. 2 : 3) seen the old temple in its glory ; though a later tradition in Dorotheus and Pseudo-Epiphanius represents him as a young man who came from Babylon to Jerusalem. The Talmud calls him a member of the great Synagogue (see Carpzov, introd., III., 423, &c.). His unadorned prophecy is in four parts, c. 1 and 3, 2 and 4, corresponding to each other. In 1 : 1, &c., he reproves the neglect of the work, for which there was no excuse, as the people could build fine houses for themselves ; rather was the prevailing famine a punishment of their remissness. His reproof avails, and he assures them of divine aid. — The 2d address, 2 : 1–9, presupposes that the building of the temple has been resumed, but refers to the despondency of the people in view of the greater glory of the former temple. Hence the prophet seeks to cheer them. — 3d, 2 : 10–19, occasioned, perhaps, by a repeated cessation from the work, enlarges upon the idea of part 1. Part 4, 2 : 20–23, completes part 2, with special reference to Zerubbabel. Haggai is named with Zechariah in the LXX., and in the inscriptions of some Psalms. — (See literature in KEIL's Lehrb. d. hist. Einl. ins A. T., p. 353). OEHLER.*

Hair among the Hebrews. — The hair of the head was worn by men among the ancient Hebrews as an ornament, but they did not allow it to grow very long (2 Sam. 14 : 26) unless under a vow (Numb. 6 : 5, 14 ; see Nazarite). To let the hair and nails grow was a mark of beastliness (Dan. 4 : 30). The plucking and shaving off of the hair (Ezra 9 : 3 ; Esth. 3 : 2 ; Jer. 7 : 29) was a sign of grief and captivity (Is. 7 : 20) ; hence the injunction upon priests, Ezek. 44 : 20. At the same time a certain manner of cutting the hair and beard is forbidden (Levit. 19 : 27 ; see Beard). A bald-head was an object of derision (2 Kings 2 : 23 ; Is. 3 : 17, 24). Young people let their hair grow in curls, or braided it (Cant. 5 : 2, 11 ; Judges 16 : 13, 19). Subsequently this was thought effeminate (1 Cor. 11 : 15). Oil was used to cultivate the hair (Ps. 23 : 5 ; 133 : 2, &c.). In women long hair was thought beautiful (Ezek. 16 : 7 ; 1 Cor. 11 : 15) ; and they usually braided or curled it (Judith 10 : 3 ; 1 Pet. 3 : 3 ; cf. Cant. 4 : 1 ; 6 : 5 ; 7 : 6). "Well set hair," Is. 3 : 24, designates braided and curled locks. To cut off a woman's hair was the greatest reproach, and a sign of slavery (1 Cor. 11 : 6 ; Lev. 14 : 8, 9). Cured lepers cut off their hair (see Leprosy) ; likewise Levites at their consecration (Numb. 8 : 7). — See WINER, Lex. ARNOLD.*

Hales, John, born at Bath, 1584, so early distinguished himself, that in 1605, already, he was admitted to a fellowship in Merton College, and engaged by the learned Warden, Sir Henry Saville, on an edition of Chrysostom, published in 1613 ; the annotations in the 8th vol. of which,

Mosheim ranks with the best on this author. In 1612 he became Prof. of Greek in Oxford, and then a fellow of Eton College. In 1618 he attended Sir Dudley Carleton to the Synod of Dort, to prepare a report of its acts. On the way Sir Dudley told H. that he would be likely to change his Calvinistic views, if not to become entirely an Arminian. Having returned to Eton, he remained there, preaching and writing, for many years, much esteemed, although suspected of a leaning to the Arminians and Socinians. Productions of the Socinians, S. Przypkowski and J. Stegman, however, were erroneously ascribed to him. His view of the Lord's Supper may be gathered from the following statement in his tract on the subject : "the bread and wine are signs indeed, but not of anything there exhibited, but of somewhat given long since. Jesus Christ is eaten at the communion table in no sense, neither spiritually, by virtue of anything done there, nor really ; neither metaphorically nor literally ; the spiritual eating of Christ is common to all places as well as to the Lord's table," as in prayer and the preaching of the Gospel. His "Tract on schism and schismatics, wherein is briefly discovered the original and cause of all schism," written for Chillingworth in 1636, was not printed for several years. His rejection of episcopal assumptions made him somewhat of a favorite with Presbyterians. Archb. Laud, however, endeavored to regain him for the Establishment, and succeeded in persuading him to accept, 1639, the canonry of Windsor, of which he was deprived in 1642. But he adhered to the Episcopal Church to his death. During his later years he suffered want, was compelled to sell his library, and spent part of his time in the house of the widow of a former servant of his. He died in 1656. His works were collected and published in 1659, entitled : "Golden remains of the ever memorable Mr. John Hales, of Eton College." Again, in 1673, by Pearson, B. of Chester. He continues to be esteemed for his independence, candor, and unassuming mildness of character. — (Des Mui-zeaux, an account of the life, &c., of J. Hales, &c. : Lond., 1719, 8vo. J. Halesii hist. conc. Dordr. J. L. MOSHEIM, latine vertit, &c. : Hamb., 1724. Biogr. Britt. J. P. Lawson, The life and times of W. Laud : Lond., 1829, 2 vols., p. 275–83. Watt, Bibl. Brit. : Edinb., 1824, I., 457, e. g., Hales works by Foulis : Glasgow, 1765, 3 vols., 12mo.). HENCKE.*

Halitgar became B. of Cambray, probably, in 817. In 822 Paschal I. appointed him assistant of Archb. Ebo of Rheims, in the northern mission. He seems to have accompanied Ebo to Denmark (LAPPENBERG, Handb. Urkundenb. Nr. 6. LILJEGREN, diplomatarium Suecanum, Nr. 1. ADAM. BREM., gesta Hamb. eccl. pont. I., c. 17, in Pertz, IX., 291). Subsequently he participated in several Frankish Councils, and in 828 the Emperor sent him on a mission to the Byzantine court (Pertz, I., 217). June 25, 831, is usually regarded as the date of his death, although the Annales Vedastini, gives 830 as the year of its occurrence. Additional facts are given by DION. SAMMARTHANUS, Gallia Christiana, III., 10–12 (1725). — Halitgar is best known as author of a penitential (see Art.), prepared at Ebo's solicitation (FLODOARD, hist. Remens. eccl., II., c. 19; Pertz, IX., 416).

K. MAURER.*

Haller, Berthold, although not the first or most powerful Reformer of Berne, still exerted the most enduring influence in carrying out the work of Church improvement there. Born in 1492, at Aldingen, near Rottweil, of parents in limited circumstances, he attended the school of Rubellus in Rottweil, and there found a friend in the chaplain, Aug. Bolster, and faithful schoolmate in Melch. Volmar, the subsequent teacher of Calvin and Beza. After prosecuting his studies under G. Simler in Pforzheim, and forming there a friendship with Melancthon, which lasted during life, he went, in 1510, to the University of Cologne, to prepare for the clerical office, and in 1512 became Baccal. of theology. Then he returned to Rottweil and taught, designing subsequently to complete his course at Freiburg in Baden. Soon he had prospects of support at Freiburg; but another way was designed for him. Rubellus received a call to the celebrated school in Berne, but advised H. to accept the post. When he went to Berne is uncertain, Kirchhofer says in 1513, Kuhn in 1518. No one thought of the consequences of this step, least of all Haller. He seemed to lack all the requisites of a Reformer; his education was defective, he knew neither Hebrew nor Greek, Latin he wrote but poorly, and the character of his theological attainments may be inferred from that of the University. He was indeed conscious of his defects, and diligently tried to remedy them. But his modest and yielding disposition gave little promise of his success as a Reformer; and yet the result proved that these traits were best adapted to the character of the Bernese. By his gentleness, and eloquence, combined with a fine person, he gained favor. He soon became an assistant of Dr. Wittenbach at the cathedral, and lived with him. Doubtless Dr. Wittenbach exerted no small influence upon Haller's views. Through Myconius Haller became acquainted with Zwingli, whom he visited in 1520, and who became his friend and counsellor in every perplexity. Early in 1520 Dr. Wittenbach resigned his post and went to Biel, and Haller was elected (May 18) his successor. He immediately commenced a faithful exposition of the decalogue, and followed this with similar lectures on Matthew, instead of treating the pericopes. A similar course was pursued by Dr. Seb. Meyer, lector of the Barefooted monks, and soon a small but influential circle of friends of evangelical truth was gathered, including Mayor Jacob v. Wattenwyl and his sons, and others (see Berne). Opposition arose, and Haller had almost left the place in despair; but Zwingli persuaded him patiently to persevere. Haller, Meyer, and Wittenbach were summoned before the smaller Council; Haller to answer a charge of having said to the nuns of the island, that if they relied upon the works of their order, they were children of the devil, and that marriage was a divine institution. By the statutes, it was said, they had forfeited their lives, but the Council, in mercy, merely passed sentence of banishment. In the great Council, however, they were allowed to answer their accusers, and as Haller clearly showed that nothing had been said to the nuns repugnant to the word of God, they were dismissed Oct. 23, 1523, with the simple admonition to attend to their pulpits and let the nuns alone. Subsequently Anselm, Seb. Meyer, and John Haller of Amsoldingen, having quit Berne, the whole burden of the evangelical cause, rested upon Haller for two and a half years. The enemies of the Gospel were expecting, also, soon to get rid of him, especially after Wattenwyl's death. A scheme to carry him off by night was frustrated only by the vigilance of friends. The Anabaptists, likewise, caused him much trouble; Zwingli suspected even him of the error. But his moral strength grew with his burdens. Conscious of his perilous, yet important position, his courage and cautiousness increased. Through Zwingli and a commission from Zurich, he was induced, about Christmas, 1525, to cease reading mass, and to devote himself more zealously to his ministerial duties. But everything was tending to a grand stroke. Berne consented, March 28, 1526, to the Conference at Baden (see Art.). Haller and P. Kunz, of Erlenbach, were commanded to attend it, and give account of themselves; a few friends, under Bernh. Tittmann, volunteered to escort them. Haller was naturally diffident, but still discussed the 2d thesis, about the sacrifice of the mass, with ability. He made so good an impression that an honest Rom. Catholic present, said: "If only this man were on our side!" But he seems to have been exposed to danger in Baden. On returning to Berne he was asked whether he would not again read mass, as it was generally declared that the preachers had been suppressed. He decidedly refused, yet said he would rather leave Berne than cause distraction. This noble firmness had its influence. He was confirmed in his office, and well supported. Haller now preached with new zeal and increased success. Happily he obtained an efficient co-worker, early in 1527, in Francis Kolb, who after several years' absence returned to Berne. Various favorable circumstances combined, also, to lead the Council (May 25) to renew the ordinance allowing freedom to preach, even against old customs. This favorable moment was seized by Haller and his friends, to secure a general conference upon the points at issue (see Berne Disput.).—With the introduction of the Reformation in Berne, Haller's proper work was done. And yet aided by clergymen from Zurich, Hoffmeister, Rhellican, Megander, he continued, though sickly, to preach, and teach the less instructed clergy, and to assist in reconstructing, not only the constitution of the Church, but that of the State.—Early in 1530, he spent some weeks in Solothurn, where a portion of the citizens, and more of the country people, were inclined to the Reformation. But the adherents of the old faith became so incensed at him, that he could effect nothing. A disputation held there failed, and the Evang. cause was speedily expelled from the city.—Haller did not expect much from Bucer's attempts at concord. He cordially desired peace, but not at the cost of implicity and truth. He feared the people would be confused by ambiguous terms, and arm ensue to the cause. The Burnese were, accordingly, kept by him from participating in these union movements; and the result rather approves his judgment (Hundeshagen, Conflicte, i. 61, &c.). — During the unfortunate Cappel war, Haller strove to restore peace even to the displeasure of Kolb and Megander. Haller tried in vain to get Bullinger to Berne (see Berne, Synod of). — His last great care was Geneva, as assailed by the Duke of Savoy; he feared a war which would involve both cities, and yet thought it wrong to let Christian brethren suffer. In 1535 his health failed perceptibly. Accumulated labors which fell upon him through Kolb's sickness, prostrated him. The Council diminished his duties, but he preached for the last time on Jan. 17, 1536. He survived the deliverance of Geneva, and died during the night of Feb. 25. The Council and entire congregation followed him to his grave. Though he married in 1526, he left no children. He published nothing, not even thinking his "Rhapsodien" fit for a scholar like Bullinger to read. — (See Haller's letters in Zwingli's works, ed. of Schuler and Schulthess, II. and VIII. FEUSSLIN, Epist. Reform., p. 15, &c., 139, 156. Many are still scattered in MSS.; thus a vol. of his sermons at Zosingen, Archiv. d. hist. Vereins d. Kanton Bern, III., Hft. 1: Bern and Zurich, 1855. M. Kirchhofer, B. Haller, &c.: Zurich, 1828. Kuhn, d. Reform. Berns: Bern, 1828. Ersch and Gruber, Sect. II., Bd. I., p. 304, &c. Vulliemin, le Chroniquer, Lans., 1836, Nro. 6, u. 7. Piper, Evangel. Kalender, 1853, p. 123, &c.).

F. FRECHSEL.*

Haller, Albrecht v., called the Great by his countrymen, deserves a place in a theol. Encyclopedia, since, as a great investigator of nature, and father of physiology, he furnishes, with Newton and Euler, a striking proof that faith in Christianity is not overthrown by the exact sciences, unless it has been previously otherwise undermined. Born in 1708 at Bern of an old patrician family, he manifested an early inclination to a thorough knowledge of Christianity, and in his 9th year already was able to read the New Test. in the Greek. He chose, however, the profession of medicine, which he studied first at Tübingen, and afterwards in Holland under Boerhave. In his 19th year he became M. D.; and after travelling through Holland, England, and France, returned in 1729 to his native city. In 1736 he became Professor at Göttingen, where he founded the reformed congregation. He was elected member of the most celebrated societies of Europe. He afterwards returned to Bern, where he died in 1777 as member of the Larger Council. His Diary (published in 1787 by Heinzmann) gives evidence of his Christian faith; his didactic poems, of his firm conviction of the truth of God and of immortality. His apologetical works and letters (published 1772, 1775) evidence his faith in the positive doctrines of Christianity. — See his Biography by J. R. Wyss, in his edition of Haller's poems, 1828. Biogr. de Alb. I. par l'auteur des soirées de famille: Laus, 1840. U. m. Vorles. üb. K. Gesch. des 18ten Jahrh. 1 Bd., 2 Aufl., p. 330).

HAGENBACH. — Reinecke.

Ham, the youngest son of Noah (Gen. 9: 24). Gen. 10 traces the inhabitants of the southern zone to his four sons Cush, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan, so far as they are implicated with the ancient history of the Israelites. As according to Herod, 1, 1; 7, 89, &c.; and Strabo, I., 42; XVI., 766, 784, the Phœnicians (Canaanites) migrated from along the Euythrean sea, or the Persian gulf, into Palestine, the original abodes of those Hamite tribes were in that district (see Egypt). — The conduct of Noah's sons (Gen. 9: 20, &c.) reveals the inmost character of their descendants, and indicates their destiny. Noah, with a prophetic presentiment foretells their history as in a miniature sketch. Ham's unfilial conduct is avenged in the servitude under which Canaan's posterity shall groan. On the contrary, Jehovah, the God of salvation, is praised as Shem's God; and as Japhet joined Shem in honoring their father, the posterity of both are represented as participants in the common salvation. — Why Canaan, and not Ham directly, was cursed is explained by Hoffmann (Weiss. u. Erfüll. I., 91), "Ham's sin against his father is punished in him as a father; in his youngest son he witnesses the execution of the penalty of the youngest son's guilt." But it is not clear that Canaan was Ham's youngest son (cf. 10: 6, and 12: 1, with 9: 24); and the theological ground of this interpretation is inadmissible. Hengstenberg has answered the question better: "Ham is punished in his sons, because he sinned as a son; and in Canaan, because C. followed most closely in his father's footsteps" (Christol. 2, I., 28). To understand this benediction as a valiciniis post eventum, of the occupancy of Shemitic countries by Japhetic conquerors, is historically impossible and irrational; for to Shem a blessing, not a curse, is foretold; he shall dispense salvation to Japhet, not come under his yoke.

KURTZ.*

Hamath ('Εμάθ, 'Αίμάθ, 'Ημάθ) long one of the most important cities of Syria. Its situation at the foot of Antilibanus (Josh. 13: 5; Judges 3: 3), on the Orontes, near Damascus (i. e., the limits of the two were contiguous, Zech. 9: 2; Jer. 49: 23) and Zobah (1 Chron. 18: 3, 9; 2 Chron. 8: 3) always made it the chief city on the highway from Phœnicia to the Euphrates. Originally it was a Phœnician or Canaanite colony (Gen. 10: 18), but afterwards was taken by the Syrians, and became the metropolis of a kingdom which included a considerable district of surrounding country (2 Kings 23: 33; 25: 21). Its king sustained amicable relations with David (2 Sam. 8: 9, &c.; 1 Chron. 18: 9, &c.; see Ewald, Gesch. Isr., II., 620). It maintained its independence until near Hezekiah's time, when the Assyrians took it (Is. 37: 12, &c.; cf. 2 Kings 15: 19; 18: 34; 19: 13, Is. 10: 9; Am. 6: 2), though its territory may have been previously curtailed (Numb. 13: 22; 34: 8; Am. 6: 14; 1 Chron. 13: 5; 2 Chron. 7: 8; 8: 3; Ezek. 47: 16; 48: 1). — The Assyrians transplanted "people from Hamath" in the depopulated country of the ten tribes, who brought their native deity, Ashima (probably the Phœnician Esmun-Esculapius), with them. Under the Macedonians Hamath was called Epiphaneia (according to Jerome on Am. 6, from Antioch Epiph.), but the natives still retained the old name (Jos. Ant., 1, 6, 2; 1 Macc. 12: 26; Ptol. 5, 15, &c.; Plin., H. N., 5, 19, &c.; Evagr. H. Eccl., 3, 34, mentions a bishop of Epiphania). — In the middle ages Hamath was the capital of a small state, among whose princes is the renowned historian and geographer, Abulfeda (see his tab. Syrice. ed. Köhler, p. 108, &c.; Hertelot, bibl. or., fol. 427, ed. Par., 1697). Hamath is still a large mercantile city of 50,000 inhabitants. — It must not be confounded with Hammath (Josh. 19: 35). — (See MICHAELIS, spicil. geogr. hebr., ext. II., 52, &c. RELAND, Palaest., 119, &c. BURCHARDT, Raisen in Syr., I., 249, &c. ROBINSON, Palest. MOVERS, Phœn., II., 2, p. 161; WINER's Lex. KNOBEL, Völkert., &c., 331, &c. PAULY's Encycl., III., 195. Ersch u. Gruber, Encycl., I., 36, p. 22; 34, p. 16). RÜETSCH.*

Hamburg, Archbishopric and Reformation of. — Although the archbishopric of Hamburg, of such great importance for the spread of Christianity in the North, owes its origin to Lewis the Pious, nevertheless the earliest conception of it is due to Charlemagne; who, after the conquest of the Saxons, wished to Christianize the pagans beyond the Elbe, and for this purpose selected Hamburg as the seat of a new bishopric. For the victorious Emperor had already at this place consecrated, through the agency of Amalarius (see Art.), a church which was independent of the neighboring bishops, and had appointed a presbyter, Heridag, to the See, when his death prevented the formal institution of the latter. The plan itself was so thoroughly forgotten, that Lewis divided North-Albingian Saxony between the Bishops of Bremen and Verden. But when the missions among the Danes and Swedes were so successful that Christianity seemed to have gained a firm footing in the North, the Emperor, advised of his father's plan by some aged men, determined at the Diet of Aix la Chapelle, after having obtained the consent of the Bishops of Bremen and Verden, to establish a new archbishopric at Hamburg, which was to embrace the churches of North-Albingen and the North in general, such as Denmark, Sweden, and the Slavonian countries. Ansgar was appointed first Archbishop, and ordained in 833 either at Ingelheim or Didenhofen by Drogo, Archbishop of Metz, assisted by Archbishops Ebbo of Rheims, Hetti of Trier, Otgar of Mayence, and others. Its charter was given by the Emperor at Aix, May 15, 834, which was ratified by Pope Gregory IV. — For five years Ansgar labored most successfully in his new field: but scarcely had his cathedral been completed, a monastery and school for the education of missionaries been erected near it, a beginning made to gather a library, and the course of affairs brought into an even channel, when H. was surprised, plundered, and mostly reduced to ashes by Norman pirates (837). The Archb. deprived thus of home and shelter, and of all sacred utensils and treasures, wandered with his clergy from place to place; until Ikin, a noble lady, presented him with her country-seat of Ramelsloh, not far from Hamburg, where he founded a monastery. Hamburg was rapidly rebuilt, and A. visited his See very diligently: but in 845 the Normans under Erich again attacked and plundered it. This circumstance, together with the many losses sustained by the See of H. in its domains north of the Elbe, induced Lewis, the German, to endeavor, after the death of Leuderich, Bishop of Bremen, to effect a consolidation of the Sees of Hamburg and Bremen. This purpose, however, was opposed by the neighboring Bishops, especially the B. of Bremen and the Archb. of Cologne; and it conflicted also with the canon which forbade the union of several Sees. Nevertheless the united efforts of Lewis and some prominent churchmen succeeded at last; and the Synod of Mayence, Oct., 847, unanimously resolved that precedents admitted that the present See of Hamburg, which embraced only four churches, and was exposed to the incursions of pagans, should be attached to Ansgar as B. of Bremen: only that the latter should not, to the prejudice of the B. of Verden, retain that portion of the See of H. which formerly belonged to the See of Verden. Ansgar was now solemnly instituted (849) Archb. of Bremen. The sanction of Pope Nicholas I. was given in his bull of May 31, 853. — For some 200 years the successors of Ansgar were mostly excellent men, who labored zealously to carry forward the work begun by him. Among them, Rimbert († 888) and Unni († 936) are distinguished for their zeal in the spread of Christianity in the North. Adalag († 988) laid the foundation for the archiepiscopal supremacy over the united See and the city of Bremen; for, standing high in favor with Emperor Otto I., he obtained a charter securing to himself and his successors all the monasteries and royal domains, with the prerogatives connected with them, which were embraced in the See; as also the jurisdiction over freemen and serfs which had hitherto been exercised by a crown officer; together with many other privileges. In order to give permanency to the results of the missionary labors of his predecessors, A. also used the favor of the Emperor and his victories over the Danes and Slavonians, to establish the bishoprics of Schleswig, Ripen, Aarhus, and Aldenburg, all which were incorporated at his request with the archbishopric. In his time, also, the monasteries of Heslingen and Reepesholt were founded; so that the See counted already seven monasteries. Paganism, however, had not yet been thoroughly eradicated: credible contemporary historians say, that the country people still continued their idolatry in the sacred groves and that Archb. Unwann († 1029) first succeeded in destroying all traces of it by cutting down the groves and erecting churches on the site of them. — After the Archbishops had, for greater security, chosen Bremen as their regular residence, they devoted, indeed, their chief attention to this See, but did not by any means neglect H., visiting it for longer or shorter periods, although it was still annoyed by the Normans and Slavonians. At least this is stated by Adam, of Bremen, concerning Archb. Adalbert († 1072), a man universally admired for beauty of person, prudence, eloquence, and restless activity, who celebrated Easter, Whitsunday, and the festival of the Virgin annually at Hamburg. It is also well known that he for a long time contemplated the erection of a patriarchate for the entire North at Hamburg (see Art. Adalbert). But these immense projects were the very reason why the Church of the North separated entirely from the See of Hamburg. His successor Liemar († 1101) gave up in consequence of this separation the archiepiscopal seat at H., and was the first to assume the title Archb. of Bremen, instead of Archb. of H. and administrator of B.; although the real transfer of the archiepiscopal dignity did not take place until 1223. From this time the chapter of Hamburg labored to make itself more independent of the Archbishop; and the city also used the absence of the latter to enlarge its powers and prerogatives, as also to make itself independent of the chapter. After it had recovered from the repeated losses sustained by the Danes, Normans and Slavonians, it became, in 1215, an imperial city, and in 1241 made a treaty offensive and defensive with Lübeck, by which the foundation of the Hansa league was laid. The Flanders transportation company, founded in 1252, also gave a strong impulse to commerce and manufactures. But with this increase of wealth and prosperity there arose also a desire for greater freedom and higher cultivation. — Prepared in this way, the Reformation found ready access to the free city from the democratic constitution, of which it obtained a character similar to the Swiss Reformation; it being brought about chiefly by colloquies, and resolutions of the council and citizens. Since the Archbishop resided in the remote Bremen, it was the Provost of the cathedral of H., who, as the virtual superior of the churches connected with the See, opposed, though more from selfish considerations than from conviction, the reformation desired by the people. Otto Stimmel, vicar of the cathedral and pastor of St. Catharine's, was the first publicly to oppose (in 1522) the sale of indulgences and other abuses of the Rom. Church, as also the immoral life of the clergy. Being thus exposed to the most violent attacks of the clergy, he retired, in 1524, from the scene; but he continued, nevertheless, to labor zealously, though in retirement, for the reformation of the church at Hamburg, and had the pleasure before his death, in 1551, of seeing the work begun by him advancing prosperously. Not only did a number of the clergy, among which were Fischbeck, Harzwich, and Aldag, follow his example; many respectable citizens also declared themselves openly in favor of the Reformation. Encouraged by such examples, the authorities of the four parishes joined, Sept. 3, 1522, with the citizens and secular authorities against the clergy in a public document, declaring that they would unitedly resist the inhibitions and anathemas of the clergy, their assumption of secular offices, their unfounded prerogative of inducting and removing pastors without the knowledge and against the will of the wardens, the improper demands of the Bishops for consecrating churches, chapels, altars, and cemeteries, and other abuses: and that they would properly organize the Nicholas-school, and establish similar schools in the other parishes also." — How strong at that time already among the citizens was the opposition to Rom. Cath. and the desire for a better system of education, appeared plainly in 1523, when S. Kempe, a Franciscan from Rostock, arrived at Hamburg on business of his order. Happening to preach at Hamburg, his purer views of religion were so acceptable to the people, that they requested him to remain with them and preach to them the Word of God unadulterated with human additions. The number of preachers favoring the Gospel increased now so rapidly in the city, that, although the chapter succeeded in silencing Fischbeck by the offer of a vicariate in the cathedral, the citizens favoring the Reformation were the more determined that the church of St. Nicholas, vacated by the apostasy of Fischbeck, should be filled by a competent man of the evangelical party. John Bugenhagen, of Wittenberg, the intimate friend of Luther and Melancthon, was chosen; and he was already on the eve of starting for his new field, when the council, intimidated, meantime, by the clergy, and become scrupulous on account of B.'s marriage, sent to him their prohibition. Though B. now remained at Wittenberg, he nevertheless rendered essential services in consolidating the Reformation at Hamburg. — The weak vacillation shown by the Council in the call of B., emboldened the Romish party, which had in the meantime gained a new defender in Dr. B. Möller; and it now attacked the evangelical preachers with great violence from the pulpit. But the evangelical party also had gained a bold defender in the appointment of John Zegenhagen, a preacher of Magdeburg, to the church of St. Catharine. Trusting to the justice of their cause, the evangelical preachers now brought their complaints before the Council. The latter, seeing that dangerous turmoils among the citizens were impending, published, Dec. 29, 1526, an order, that all preachers should preach the pure Word of God, should be charitable towards each other, avoid matters of controversy in the pulpit, teach the people to obey the government, and exhort them to abstain from forcible attacks upon the ceremonies of the Church. But the defenders of the Cath. Church, especially H. Rensburg and N. Bustorp, continued their attacks. Bustorp, whilst he defended good works according to the Rom. doctrine, made violent onslaughts on the evang. doctrine of justification, the celebration of the Lord's Supper in both kinds, and the reading of Luther's translation of the New Testament. The Council in vain admonished him to peace, and demanded of him to recant: he continued publicly to assert his doctrines. The three ministers of the churches of St. Catharine, St. Nicholas, and St. James therefore asked him whether he would undertake to defend the doctrines which he preached. After some hesitation he, at the beginning of 1527, replied in a lengthy letter in Latin, addressed to Zegenhagen; and since the tone of this letter was both courteous and friendly, the preachers several times invited him to a friendly conference, which, however, he steadily declined. Incensed at this course of their opponent, the evang. preachers again complained to the Council, which now summoned both parties to the City Hall, in order by a public examination of the controverted points to quiet the controversy. The heads of the Rom. party appeared without exception, whilst of the evangelical party only J. Zegenhagen, S. Kempe, and J. Fritze, chaplain at St. James, were present. Meantime the latter were once more disappointed in their expectations: for even though they gained many new friends and patrons by the manner in which they defended their cause, the controversy between themselves and the Romanists nevertheless still continued, until in April, 1528, an event occurred, which, though it might have become destructive to the city, brought about the triumph of the Reformation. About the middle of this month a happy accident discovered a conspiracy of 68 citizens, who held their meetings with Romish monks in the monastery of St. John, and had devised the plot of firing the city by night at different places, and of killing, during the confusion, the evangelical preachers and their friends. The discovery of this plot induced the Council and the citizens, after the danger had been removed, to invite the most prominent preachers of both parties to a public discussion, to be held on April 28, in order thus to put an end to all controversial preaching and persecution. Since none of the Romish clergy who participated were men of learning and skilled in controversy, and since the evangelical preachers enjoyed, besides, the favor of the people generally, the latter could not fail to gain a decided victory: and accordingly all the citizens, the Franciscans, Dominicans, and the Blue Sisters deserted the Rom. party. Meantime the priests did not yet give up all hope; but, as the only means left them, brought complaint before the imperial chamber, which produced a severe mandate against the city. The Council from this time took a decided stand in favor of the Reformation, entered upon negotiations with the Wittenb. Reformers, and prevailed upon Bugenhagen to visit Hamburg for the purpose of properly organizing the schools and the Church.—Bugenhagen arrived at Hamburg, Oct. 9, 1528, and was most honorably received by citizens of the highest standing. He began his labors by preaching daily, in order to instruct the people in the meaning and spirit of the Reformation. He next informed himself thoroughly of the affairs of the city, in order thus to devise an adequate Church constitution. This was then handed over to the Senate, by whom it was submitted to the people for their sanction. It was unanimously adopted, and subsequently proclaimed and put in force. On the day after its introduction, Bugenhagen, in the name of the city, opened a Latin school in the monastery of St. John, and provided it with competent teachers. He left Hamburg again, June 9, 1529.—Soon after B.'s departure the Council and citizens resolved to abolish all unnecessary festivals, to transfer the Apostledays to the Sundays next following, and to convert the revenues of vicarates and of some other benefices, after the death of the present incumbents, into a fund for the poor. The Catholic worship had been abolished in all the churches, the cathedral excepted. As in the latter it was visited only by a few old people, and as it had been the occasion of repeated disturbances, it was here also abolished by the Council in 1529. In 1530 also, the Council caused the monastery of Harvestehude, situated beyond the city, to be demolished; since its nuns refused the preachers sent to them, and held fast to the Catholic rites in spite of all admonitions. The chapter, indeed, zealously espoused the cause of the ejected nuns, and accordingly brought a new complaint against the Council before the imperial chamber, which, in 1533, ordered the restitution of the monastery; but in 1536 the city joined the Smalcald league, and thus obviated the necessity of obeying the order. After Zegenhagen and Kempe the most distinguished of the evang. preachers, was John Höck, or Aepinus, the pupil and friend of Melancthon, and heretofore rector of the school at Greifswald and Stralsund. In 1532 he was elected superintendent and first preacher of the Church of Hamburg, and in 1533 was made D. D. by the University of Wittenberg.—With the election of Aepinus as superintendent, the Reformation in Hamburg and its territory may be regarded as fully established. But his work: Pinacidion de Rom. eccl. impost. et pap. sutelis, adv. impud. Hamb. Canonic. autonomiam, was the first manifestation of a controversial spirit, which for several centuries found zealous adherents among the clergy of Hamburg, and stirred up many controversies; not, however, without salutary results for the Protestant Church.—Sources:—RIMBERT, vita Anskar. in PERTZ, Mon. Germ. hist., T. II.; ALBERTUS STADENSIS to 1256; ALB. KRANTZ, Saxonia and Metropolis, to 1504; Encyclop. of ERSCH u. GREYER, Vol. 12, pp. 432–449; P. v. KOBBE, Gesch. d. Herzogth. Brem. u. Verden, Vol. 2; N. STAPHORST, Hist. Eccl. Hamb. diplomat., Vol. I.–V.: Hamb., 1723–28; FR. MÜNTER, K.-Gesch. von Dänemark, Vol. 3, pp. 633–671; OTTO KRABBE, Eccl. ev. Hamb. instaurat. Hist.: Hamb., 1840.—See also ADAM BREMENS. I., c. 17, in PERTZ, Mon. Tom., VII.; LAPPENBERG, Hamb. Urkundenb., Bd. 1, p. 10, etc.; RUODOLFI FULDENSIS, Annales; Prudentii Trecentis Annal.; Chron. de gest. Normann.; Annal. Xantenses; Chronic. Aquitan.; Fragment. Chron. Fontanell.; NIT-HARDI, hist., IV., c. 3; Annal. S. Germ. minores; ADEMARI, hist., III., c. 17; KLIPPEL, Leben des Erzb. Ansgar, pp. 213–216.

G. H. KLIPPEL. — Reinecke.

Hamilton, Patrick, the first Protestant martyr in Scotland, descended from a family related to the royal house. He was born in 1503, studied theology at St. Andrew's University, where he acquired liberal views concerning the Church and its doctrines, under John Major, the teacher of Knox and Buchanan. He possessed a natural taste for what was exalted and noble, and for the pleasures to be desired from science, and the study of ancient writers. In his youth, already, James V. made him superior of the Abbey Ferne, in Ross-shire, but he preferred classical and theological studies, and early embraced Luther's views. Partly to promote his studies, partly to eschew the envy of the clergy, he went, 1526, to Wittenberg, Germany, and enjoyed for a time the society of Luther and Melancthon; then he visited Marburg, where he became intimate with Lambert, and studied the principles of the Reformers. Animated with a desire to proclaim these principles in his native land, he resolved to return home. His friends in vain sought to deter him. He was destined to be a martyr for the truth in Scotland. After some attempts to convince the people of the evil of existing customs, he was decoyed to St. Andrews under the pretence of a free discussion with the Dominicans. There he was summoned before an eccl. court under the charge of various heresies, and, in spite of his able defence, condemned to the stake. Futile attempts to get him to recant were made on him in prison. So firm was his faith, that he converted the priest (Alesius) sent to plead with him. He was executed before the gate of St. Salvador College, March 1, 1528. His death was calm; his last words: "Lord Jesus receive my spirit." His accuser, Campbell, died soon after in insanity.—(See McCrie's Sketches of Scottish Ch. Hist. chap. I.). WEBER.*

Hands, Laying on of.—The custom of laying on of hands, as a mystical or symbolical act, is very old. It has for its basis the high significance of the human hand, in the corporeal organism, as also in the moral life of man. The hand is the organ of the physical and moral activity of man, of his power and deed. It is hereby at the start already the symbol of his religious and spiritual activity. We can distinguish in this respect the hand of peace and the hand of war, the helping, joining, and the needy, receiving hand. To touch one with the hand, and to lay the hand on one; to hold the hand over one and to lift the hand to one: hereby the strongest contrasts are expressed. The Greeks were acquainted with the contrast: to hold the hand protectingly over one (χεῖρα υπερίχουσιν), and to lift the hand in supplication to one (χεῖρας παραχρῆν), also the contrast of a divine government and of a needy human supplication. The scriptural custom of laying on of hands is based in general upon the idea, that the hand is the organ of mediation, especially the organ of transferring in the proper, as also in the symbolical sense. This follows from the fact, that the consecrated person not only transferred his blessing to what was consecrated, but that the sinner also transferred his guilt, his curse (Lev. 1: 4; 3: 2; 8: 13, sq.; 16: 21, 24). With regard to this dark, death-propheying form of the laying on of hands in sacrifices, the views of theologians do not agree (consult Bähr, Symbolik des mosaischen Cultus II., 339; Hofmann, Schriftbeweis, II., 1, p. 155; Baumgarten, Commentar zu Pentateuch, 1, 2, p. 180, and Kurtz, das mosaische Opfer, p. 70; Gesch. des A. B., p. 332), but most accept that of transfer. The laying on of hands on the thank-offering presents no difficulty for this view. In this case the thank-offering is made the bearer of the feeling of thanksgiving. This idea of a transfer becomes most prominent in the act of laying on of hands to consecrate and to bless. We are able to distinguish between the Old Test. typical and the New Test. real laying on of hands.

The former again divides into the patriarchal-typical or blessing, the legal symbolical or consecrating, and the prophetic-dynamic or healing laying on of hands. The first (Gen. 48: 14) is a prophecy in the form of the typical transfer; the second (Ex. 29: 10; Numb. 27: 18) a legal-symbolical investiture with official authority and promise of official blessing; the third the dynamic communication of a wonderful power to heal and restore life (2 Kings 4: 34). The laying on of hands in the New Test. is only a special form of the real fulfilment of the Old Test., i. e., it is, regarded in general, the real and actual communication of spirit and life in symbolical form. In its historical development it also passes through the same stages as that of the Old Test., i. e., we distinguish between the spiritual-patriarchal laying on of hands of the Lord and of his Apostles, the spiritual-legal and official of the Church, and the prophetic-blessing. The laying on of hands by our Lord, as it appears in the healing of the sick, completes the prophetic form of the Old Test. He laid his hand on the sick, and healed them all (Luke 4: 41; Mark 6: 5). The communications of corporeal life, however, which He connected with this, are already joined with the germ of spiritual life; He healed on the condition of faith (Mark 6: 5); and the more the people imagined that His healings were bound to the laying on of hands, the more He separated the two (Mark 5: 23; comp. v. 41; 7: 32). But the complete investiture with His Spirit and power, which He communicated to his Apostles, He represented in real symbolism, in that He lifted up his hands over them and blessed them, when He ascended from Mount Olivet (Luke 24: 50). This lifting up of the hands of our Lord in connection with the outpouring of the Holy Ghost, is the source of the apostolic laying on of hands. And this also is originally a living synthesis of symbol and of fulfilment (Acts 8: 17), as also of the communication of corporeal and spiritual life (Acts 9: 17). From this general laying on of hands, by which Christians received the anointing of the Spirit, proceeds the official apostolic laying on of hands (Acts 13: 3; 1 Tim. 4: 14). Meanwhile the example of Cornelius (Acts 10) shows also, that the apostolic communication of the Holy Spirit is not bound to the form of official laying on of hands. It was only with the recession of the Spirit that the ecclesiastico-official laying on of hands was changed into the legal-symbolical form,—ordination. Besides ordination the general laying on of hands also continued in the Rom. Cath. Church. Formerly it was connected with the consecration of catechumens (August. de peccat. merit., 1, 2, 26), and it is still connected with the preparations of baptism and with confirmation. Already in confirmation, it is regarded as constituting a part of the sacrament, with greater certainty, however, in ordination, where it constitutes the visible sign of the sacrament. The Council of Trent determined the sacramental character of ordination (Sessio 23, sacrament. ordi., cp. 3). It also determined, that the Holy Spirit was communicated by ordination, and gave it an indelible character, and distinguished between the consecration of bishops and that of priests (comp. Klee, Kath. Dogmatik, III., 338; Winer, comparat. Darstellung, p. 165).

The Protestant Church did not retain the sacramental character of ordination. The different grades of the clergy were already rejected by the Smalcald Articles (de potestate et jurisdictione episcoporum). The Helvetic Confession acknowledges the divine appointment of ordination, but rejects its sacramental character. The Confessio Anglicana (Art. 36) distinguishes between the consecration of Archbishops and Bishops, and the ordination of presbyters and deacons, and the canons of the Church confine confirmation to the Bishops alone.—The centre of Protestant ordination lies in its fundamental condition. This is an internal and external call to preach the Word of God, and to administer the sacraments rightly. According to the measure of its identity with this fundamental condition, is Protestant and evangelical laying on of hands real, i. e., a dynamic symbolical consecration with the Spirit of Christ; and as this identity recedes so does the legal-symbolical character of the laying on of hands here again become prominent. But the administration of office and the administration of the Spirit never absolutely coincide in the historical progress of the Church. Much rather does also here the prophetic laying on of hands in various corporeal healings and spiritual blessings separate itself from external official tradition, as a free gift of grace for the awakening and edification of the congregation. Thus the gift of working miracles appeared already in the apostolic doctrines. Later also an attempt was again made to regulate it ecclesiastically, by creating the office of exorcists. In our times the laying on of hands for the healing of physical diseases has disappeared from the Church.

As the laying on of hands in general has its history, so also ordination in particular. From Acts 13, we see that originally the congregation participated in official ordination. Ordination as a more limited power developed itself with the development of the Episcopacy. The idea of Ordo in opposition to the Plebs was fixed by Tertullian (de exhort. cast., cp. 7), and the expression ordinatio is used in a technical sense by him also (de præscript. hæret., cp. 41). From him it passed over to Cyprian. And if the original official laying on of hands in the congregation referred back decidedly to the Israelitish laying on of hands, then the present enlarged legal ordination with its technical designations seems to lean towards Græco-Roman political organizations. The word ordinare and ordinatio is a Roman official technical and judicial term, and ἱερωσύνη is also used by the Athenians when speaking of the election and installation to a public office (comp. Augusti, Denkwürdigkeiten aus der christl. Arch., Vol. 9, p. 338, sq.).—As the different clerical grades grew out of the development of the legal episcopacy, so also the different priestly consecrations out of legal ordination. The doctrine concerning ordination must, therefore, treat in the first place of ordination in general, especially of episcopal ordination, and then of the various priestly consecrations. Comp. Binghami Origines, I., p. 156, de præcipuis quibusdam legibus ac ritibus circa episcoporum ordinationem observatis. Augusti, Denkwürdigkeiten, etc., Vol. 9, p. 337. Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten der christkathol. Kirche, Vol. I., part I., p. 257, sq.; part II., p. 121, sq. Augusti, Handbuch der Archæol., III., 222, sq.

LANGÉ.—Beck.

Hannah, a woman's name of frequent occurrence among the Hebrews and Phœnicians (like Anna in Virgil). Three of this name are mentioned in the Bible. 1) The mother of Samuel (1 : 2, 9, &c.; 2 : 1, &c.). 2) The wife of Tobit (Tob. 1 : 9; 2 : 1, 11; 11 : 5). 3) A prophetess (Anna, Luke 2 : 36, &c.), to whose honor it is said that she had remained a widow after her first husband's early death (see Krummacker, in Piper's evang. Jahrb., IV., 43, &c.).

RÜETSCHL.*

Hantwill, John of (Hanwil, Hauterille, d'Alta Villa; Nantwil, Annewil; d'Annarilla, from Anneville, a village in Normandy, where he is said to have been born), was a poet who flourished in the 12th century, known by the name of "Archithrenius" (arch-mourner, after Jeremiah's Lamentations) which he prefixed to his chief work. That he was born in Normandy, not England, is evident from a passage in the prologue (ODIN, Comm. de scriptor. eccl., III., 1621), although he became a Doctor at Oxford, and a Benedictine in St. Albans, in the diocese of London. The work named (9 books) was dedicated to Walter of Constance, Archb. of Rouen, under the title: Joh. Archithrenii Opus. It is a bitter lamentation over the miseries of human life, in all grades. It was published by J. B. Ascensius, Paris, 1517, 4to. This edition has become very rare. Leland pronounces the style elegant for that period, with even brilliant passages. Others pass a different opinion. But all acknowledge originality, the thoughts and vivacity of illustration. Du Boulay (hist. of the University of Paris, p. 458) mentions Hantwill as a teacher there, and dates his death early in the 13th cent.

S.*

Hara, a district in Assyria whither the tribes beyond the Jordan were carried by Phul and his successor (1 Chron 5 : 26). It seems to have become so completely occupied, that it is not named in the subsequent removal of the other tribes by Shalmaneser (2 Kings 17 : 6). Rosenmüller and Gesenius suppose the Persian mountain district Irak is meant. VAHINGER.*

Haran.—1) The name of a city in N. W. Mesopotamia, on the way from Ur of the Chaldeans to Canaan (Gen. 11 : 31, 32). It was the temporary abode of Abraham on his way from Ur, and is therefore to be sought in the N. of Mesopotamia (Knobel, Völkert., 171). As the residence of the oldest patriarchs (Gen. 12 : 5; 27 : 43; 28 : 10; 29 : 4), as homestead of Nahor, Abraham's brother (Gen. 24 : 47), as well as that of Bethuel and Laban, and as the city of Nahor (24 : 10), Haran is otherwise known. Thus, by the Arabs, lying, according to d'Anville, in long. 57° 10' E., and lat. 33° 40' N. It is the Κάρπας of the Greeks and Caræ of the Romans (Herod., 4, 13, 7; Plol., 5, 18, 12; Strabo, 16, 747; Pliny, 5, 21; Lucan., 1, 104), celebrated for the defeat of Cressus (Dio Cass., 40, 25). Ammian Marcellinus calls it a y old town. It must have been an important place in the time of Hezekiah (2 Kings : 12; cf. Is. 37 : 12). It is mentioned in Is. 7 : 2; and by Jos., Ant., 1, 16, 1. It seems to have still flourished under the Arab dominion; Abulfeda (14th cent.) is the first who speaks of it as in ruins (Mesop. 16). It was pointed out to Niebuhr (2, 410) as a small place two days' journey S. E. of Orfa. — Abram first went alone from Haran to Canaan (Gen. 12 : 4, 5; Acts 7 : 4). Probably pursuing a S. W. course he passed Damascus, and there obtained Eliezer (Gen. 15 : 2). — 2) Ezek. : 23, associated with Canneh (Kanē. Peripl. erythr., 15; Ptol., 6, 7, 10; Plin., 6, 26) and Cana, which lay on the south coast of Arabia, and whose traffickers, like those of Haran, are called Sabæans. Haran must have been on the same coast, probably it was founded by a colony from the Haran in Mesopotamia. — 3) The father Lot (Gen. 11 : 26, &c.). — 4) A son of Caleb (Chron. 2 : 46). — 5) A Levite (1 Chron. 23 : 9).

VAHINGER.*

Harmony of the Gospels. — It will be our duty in the present article to answer in a general way the following questions: 1. What are the phenomena of the partial harmony or partial difference of the gospels, as regards the selection of their material and its arrangement, their language and treatment of Old Testament quotations? 2. How can their surprising and often verbal harmony in many points be reconciled with their deviations in others? 3. Can these deviations be explained on the supposition that the four Evangelists are faithful, credible, and truthful reporters; or do they compel us to admit that some or all of them have reported incorrectly. Of course, the answers to these questions cannot be mechanically separated, since they interpenetrate each other. In order to arrive at a clear and practical arrangement, we must first of all briefly review the most essential phenomena which the gospels furnish. — There is above all a thorough difference between the Gospel of St. John and the three others, both as regards the selection of the material — John reports only the festival journeys¹ of Christ to Jerusalem, and but few events in Galilee — and also the character of the material — since in John the sermons of Jesus are distinguished from those in the other gospels by a peculiarly solemn and elevated tone. The first three gospels have hence, since the time of Griesbach, been called the synoptical ones, from their having a close resemblance to each other. — But even these synoptical gospels again deviate variously from each other. Mark reports scarcely any sermons of the Lord. Luke, compared with Matthew, reports many events and sayings peculiar to himself; so also, vice versa, whilst Mark contains very little that may not be found also in Matt. and Luke. Mark has only twenty-four verses containing things peculiar to himself. Matthew reports 16 miracles of Christ; Luke 15, of which 11 are common with those in Matthew. Mark reports 15, of which 12 are the same as in Matthew, and 10 the same as in Luke. — Matthew and Luke, unlike Mark, go back to the infancy of Jesus; and yet in such a manner that they do not report the same events. — The arrangement or sequence (called accolouthia, since Chemnitz) of the events and sermons differs in each of the Synoptists: only towards the end of the public labors of Jesus they all agree. — As regards the expressions used, in their report of the same event or sermon, they often agree remarkably and verbally — even to strange and unfrequent words — whilst at other times they differ both in expression and material, at times even to a seeming contradiction of each other. — It will most assist our purpose first to consider the synoptists separately: 1, What concerns the selection and arrangement of the material; 2, the language; 3, the execution. We will close with their relation to John. — 1. The selection and arrangement of the material in the Synoptists. Even if no traditional patristic accounts concerning the origin of the different gospels had come down to us, an examination of them would lead us to conclude that their authors did not design to furnish us with a complete account of the public labors of Christ, day by day, or week by week consecutively. Such an account must have become very voluminous (John 21 : 25): we find in fact that, what the synoptists relate of the earlier half of the labors of Christ, is confined to a few fragments, which, according to their own data, embraced generally a period of only one or several days. They confess that they have omitted many things. Thus from Matt. 11 : 21, etc., it appears that Christ endeavored by "mighty works" to call Chorazin to repentance: but the synoptists say nothing of the labors of Christ at Chorazin, and hence must have passed over a portion of the history of Jesus in silence. That the synoptists have given us only a selection from the rich materials of the life and labors of Christ, is above doubt, and must also appear natural. Nor does the proem of Luke, when impartially viewed and correctly understood, conflict with this position. For, compared with the sporadic sketches which some Christians of Lower Italy had made, as well as they might, from memory, Luke could very properly call his work "perfect" and "in order," even though it did not pursue the life of Christ from day to day and week to week; but gave, like a true history, what was most important and vital in systematic order.² — But each of the synoptists

¹ A natural consequence of this is, that in John the events are arranged according to the scheme of objective chronology, which is not the case in the others.

² Luke neither praises nor censures the καλλοι (Luke : 1). But he does by his own work set aside their well-meant efforts (πειρασμοι) as objectively unsatisfactory. For these καλλοι (belonging to the circle of his readers in Lower Italy) had endeavored from memory to note down some incidents, which the heralds of the gospel had told them. But when the first heralds had left them, they felt it necessary to assist the memory by writing down what the others had on occasion and sporadically told them. Each one wrote according to his memory. Luke tried to satisfy the necessity which thus manifested itself, but had so far been very unsatisfactorily met: for, in consequence of his abode in Jerusalem (Acts 21 : 15-27, 1,) he had opportunity to obtain "a perfect understanding of all things," and could thus write "in order." For a vindication had nevertheless a plan of his own. Of this there is not the least doubt, although scholars still differ as regards the execution of their plan in each of the synoptists, and the principle according to which they have arranged and grouped the events. There is no doubt that Matthew wished to show to the Jews and Jewish Christians that in Jesus of Nazareth the prophecies concerning the seed of Abraham, or son of David (Matt. 1:1), had been fulfilled. He wishes, therefore, to portray the gospel in its identity with the Old Test. revelation. It is just as plain that Luke, moving in the Pauline sphere of doctrine and labor, has in view the struggle of the morbid, Pharisaic Jewish Christianity (comp. Gal. 1-2 with Acts 15); and — with or without design — communicates of the life and sayings of Jesus, especially that which shows that not all Israel according to the flesh, but that which longed for redemption, and not Israel alone, but all mankind in so far as it desired salvation, had a share in the work of Christ. Hence he portrays Christ as the second Adam (Luke 3:23-8), and in c. 2, v. 2, already refers to the fact that the appearance of Christ in the flesh was contemporaneous with the political subversion of Israel. It is more difficult to find a particular plan in Mark. But the oldest patristic notice (John Presb. in Euseb., 3, 39) tells us that M. had written down from memory, but without a fixed plan, what Peter had occasionally related of the acts and sayings of Jesus.¹ — We cannot, therefore, from what has been said, expect a chronological sequence of events in the synoptists. Even Luke (as Dr. J. Lichtenstein, also, has lately admitted in his "Leb.-Gesch. des Herrn.," p. 73), does not by the word κατά ἐξῆς oppose his work to the fragmentary accounts of the κολλὰι, as one arranged chronologically, but only as one that was connected and arranged systematically. That in his arrangement he followed no merely chronological, but a material principle, is evident from chapt. 10, onward, since from chapt. 10:25, to chapt. 13, only sermons of Christ are given; chapt. 14-16 only parables; chapt. 17 only shorter sayings. In Matthew a division according to matter is just as evident (chapt. 3-4, the beginning of the labors of Christ; 5-7, the fundamental law of the kingdom; 8-9, miracles; 9:36-11, the disciples; 12-13, relation to the Pharisees; 13-14, parables, etc.). — If now this variety in the selection and arrangement of the material in each of the synoptists has its ground in the special plan which each followed, it is evident that this variety, viewed generally, implies no incongruity or disharmony; that much rather the synoptists, notwithstanding this difference of arrangement, may still be in harmony with each other. But the question still remains, whether this harmony can really be traced in particulars. We notice, namely, that the synoptists, although their order in general is not chronological, have nevertheless in many instances connected particular events in an evident temporal sequence (e. g., Matt. 9:27, 32; chapt. 13, 1, etc.; Mark 1:29; Luke 4:38, etc.). Here now it might be possible that in such particular data they would positively contradict each other, since the same events might be variously connected in the different synoptists, and thus transferred to different times. The question whether this is the case, or whether these isolated "acolouthistic" data do not rather harmonize, belongs evidently to the subject of the harmony of the gospels. — In fact, investigations of this kind have been made from an early date. At first, however, this was done in the practical interest of giving a harmony of the gospels rather than in the more scientific one of giving a chronology of events in the life of Christ. Prominent among those who have occupied themselves with the subject, are Gerson, Calvin, L. Osiander, Chemnitz, and Bengel. Of these Osiander (harm. evang.: Basel, Frobenius, 1535) is to be mentioned only as a matter of curiosity, since the theory, in relation to the results of his age, is a mere retrograde. Holding the effect theory of inspiration, he maintained that the evangelists, though they might omit many things (!), could not depart from the chronological order. But since the same events are narrated by the synoptists in a different sequence, he was forced to take refuge in the supposition that the same events had occurred several times under precisely similar circumstances. — Calvin, already (Concord. evang. sine moneta, in Vol. IV., of the Antw. ed. of his works), had come to the correct conclusion that the evangelists did not purpose to write chronologically, and thus laid the foundation to a true and correct harmony and acolouthia, even though he was arbitrary in the application of his principle.² Calvin, without entering upon investigations, has nevertheless in his Commentary arranged the material of the harmony of the gospels as to show that full and sound investigations formed the basis of it. He connects those events and paragraphs, which were connected by the evangelists by unequivocal data. But what was done by Calvin, more from an involuntary, happy tact, and at times even departing from just consequences, was done by Chemnitz (harm. evang., 1593, sqq., continued by Leyser and Gerhard) from clear and conscious principle. It is very clear that from this principle all sound investigation of the subject must proceed. Nothing is more natural and psychological than that the disciples should for many years remember the sequence of prominent and remarkable events (e. g., the sermon of the Mount and its accessories, the calming of the storm, the feeding of the 5000, etc.), especially such as happened during journeys when the memory of places assisted the memory of dates; whilst it was impossible for them to reproduce the sequence of less important events, especially if they happened at the same cation of this interpretation of the proem of Luke, adopted also by H. J. Thiersch (Versuch ein. Herstell., etc., 1845, p. 163), see my Krit. d. ev. Gesch., 1 ed., 1842, p. 975; 2 ed., 1850, p. 802.

¹ Μάρκος μὲν ἐμμανεύρης Πέτρου γενομένος, ὅσα ἐμνημόνευσεν, ἀκριβῶς ἔγραψεν, οὐ μὲν τοι τάξι, τὰ ὑπὸ τοῦ Χριστοῦ

ἢ ἀκθύντα ἢ πρᾶξόντα. The character of this gospel affords no room for the conjecture of Thiersch that M. had subsequently rewritten and arranged it systematically.

² See concerning this Ebrard's Krit. der ev. Gesch., 2 ed., p. 51, etc.

ie, e. g., during his long abode at Capernaum. It in the latter case they arbitrarily invented sequence, is, independently of all doctrinal grounds, improbable; since in so many cases they connect various events altogether without particular data or with vague expressions (e. g., "it came to pass when he was in one of those days:" "it came to pass on one of those days:" and "Jesus went about all the cities and villages teaching," etc.). The first object, therefore, must be to restore those series of events which were clearly connected by the evangelists before the chronological relation of these series to each other can be determined. — In relation to Chemnitz, who, however, did not always carry consistently his correct principle, Bengel notes a retrograde. He correctly admits that he did not design to write chronologically; his method of restoring the chronology of the gospels by a comparison of them, is a total failure.¹ — J. H. A. Ebrard (whilst Wieseler, in "Chronologische Synopse," took for granted the chronological order of Luke, and combined with other objective-chronological investigations), in his Krit. der ev. Gesch. § 10–34, has returned to the principle of Chemnitz, and thinks that he has proven that the scattered data contained in the synoptists regarding the sequence of single events, 1, never contradict each other, and 2, are sufficient for the restoration of series (indesms) of events, which will embrace the entire portion of the gospel history, and whose reciprocal chronological relation may be restored, fully from internal evidence and partly by a comparison with John, so as to effect complete satisfaction. — We will exemplify the nature of these investigations by the most difficult and intricate case; which, however, is also the only difficult one. In Matt. 9, we are told that Jesus whilst sitting at meat was asked by the Pharisees, why he did not fast. On what day this took place, and how closely or remotely, or whether at all, it was connected with the previously related call of Matthew, we are not told. We are distinctly told (v. 18), however, that whilst Jesus spake these things, Jairus arrived and besought Jesus to accompany him: and v. 21, that when Jesus departed from the house of Jairus, two blind men followed him into the house: and v. 32, that as they went out, a dumb man possessed with a devil was brought to him. After this follows: and Jesus went about all the cities and villages. We here obtain, therefore, fully the sequence of the events: the question about fasting, the raising of Jairus' daughter, the healing of the two blind men, and the healing of the dumb man. In Matt. 8: 18, we read that Jesus, when on a certain day (for the previous narrative ends in v. 16–17 with a general notice of the healing labors of Jesus, so that v. 18 is connected with no particular event) he saw great multitudes about him, determined to cross the sea: v. 23, etc., that he stilled the tempest: v. 28, that when arrived at the other side he healed the Gergesene demoniac: afterwards, chapt. 9, that on his return the man sick of the palsy was let down to him through the roof: and v. 9, that Jesus, when he departed thence, called Matthew. We here obtain the sequence of four other events: the stilling of the tempest, the Gergesene, the palsied man, the call of Matthew. How these two series (synochiæ) are related to each other, we as yet know not. — Again, Matt. 12: 22, we are told (again after a general description of the labors of Christ has gone before) that Jesus healed a blind and dumb demoniac, and was, therefore, accused of being in league with Beelzebub; that (v. 38) in the course of a conversation on the matter the Pharisees demanded a sign; that (v. 46) whilst Jesus was yet speaking concerning this, his mother and brethren stood without; that (13: 1) "the same day" he sat by the sea and spoke the parables of the sower, etc. Here again a series by itself. But Mark now, following the narrative of Peter, an eye-witness, tells us, chapt. 4, unequivocally, that Jesus once spoke the same parables at the sea-side; v. 35, that "the same day, when the even was come" he crossed the sea and stilled the storm; hereupon healed the Gadarene demoniac; and that (chapt. 5: 21) having again returned, Jairus besought him to heal his daughter. It thus appears from Mark beyond all contradiction, that the three series of events, which Matt. has narrated separately in distinct portions of his work, to which, as regards their contents, they were suited, belonged, as regards time, together. We thus obtain quite naturally the following series. During his abode at Capernaum the blind and dumb demoniac is brought to him; his cure gives occasion to the blasphemous accusation of the Pharisees present, that Jesus was in league with Beelzebub. During the same conversation they demand a sign. Whilst Jesus is answering, the arrival of his mother and brethren is announced and the conversation interrupted: and since in Canaan the night was preferred for journeys, the arrival probably occurred in the morning. Towards evening Jesus departed (perhaps to accompany his mother for a part of her return, i. e., southward along the sea coast) and taught by the sea-side in parables. Next follows the stilling of the storm, and on the next morning the healing of the Gadarene. After his return to the western shore, whilst sitting at meat, he is asked the question, why his disciples did not fast. In the same hour Jairus arrived, on the road to whose house — according to all synoptists — the woman with an issue of blood touched him; returning from the house of Jairus, the blind men follow him to his house in Capernaum; when these are gone, a dumb demoniac is brought; about the same time — when he had returned from Gadara to Capernaum, perhaps several days after — the palsied man is let down through the roof. Departing thence (i. e., undertaking a subsequent journey), Jesus calls Matthew. It is now also easily understood that Peter, who had been an eye-witness already before, during and after the Gadarene journey, and after him Mark, remembered well the chronological connection of the three chief facts (parables, Gadarene journey, Jairus' daughter); whilst Matthew, on the other hand, having been called to follow Jesus only during the subsequent journey, heard these inidents from the other disciples, and therefore did not so clearly remember their sequence — perhaps he did not even hear them accurately — and could, therefore, the more readily distribute the particulars of this journey among different portions of his work. He could remember clearly only one thing, that his call was subsequent to the Gadarene journey, the healing the palsied man being immediately precedent to it. But then he also still remembered that about the time when he was received among the disciples, much was said about the raising of Jairus' daughter; and hence — not knowing its precise relation to the Gadarene journey — mentioned it, though without an exact date, immediately after he had mentioned his call — Luke, who among the synoptists has the fewest acolouthistic data, in chapter 5, confirms the fact that the call of Levi followed the cure of the palsied man; chapter 8, that the raising of Jairus' daughter took place after the return from Gadara, but the stilling of the storm on the journey thither. He gives nothing new on this series of events. — This concatenation, which we have given for illustration, is, however, as already remarked, the only case of such complicated kind in which several synochia, which in one evangelist are found separated, are united by means of a second or third evangelist into an uninterrupted chain (syndesmos). But if here already the harmony of the gospels is constructed so easily, we find in the other syndesmos scarcely a shadow of difficulty. Thus from the journey of Jesus to Phenicia until his sufferings the synoptists give thoroughly parallel narrations, and at most complete each other only occasionally in minor incidents. Between the above Gadarene syndesmos and this concluding one there is a third, which constructs itself quite readily from a comparison of the synoptists, and begins with the choosing of the twelve and the sermon on the Mount; takes up the healing of a leper, the effort to take Jesus prisoner, the healing of the centurion's servant, of the demoniac in the synagogue, of Peter's mother, the raising of the young man of Nain; and ends with the mission of John's disciples. Concerning the relation of this syndesmos to the Gadarene one, the synoptists furnish no data; but of course, Matthew could not be taken into the number of the twelve, before he was generally called to follow Jesus. — For a number of minor incidents we cannot ascertain the acolouthistic position with certainty, though at times with probability. But it is wholly in vain to try to determine the "original occurrence" of those gnome-like sayings of Christ which are reported by the evangelists in different connections. It is very probable that the Lord repeated those sayings with various turns on different occasions. An instance of this is Matt. 7:17; 12:33; also Luke 19:12, etc., compared with Matt. 25:14, etc. — 2. As regards language, the synoptists at times agree almost verbally, whilst at other times they differ widely. Their verbal concurrence is most complete where they report sayings of Christ, or of others. According to Norton the places in which Matthew concurs verbally with the other evangelists, forms one-sixth of his gospel, of which $\frac{1}{4}$ are sayings. In Mark the ratio of concurrence is the same, $\frac{1}{4}$ of it being sayings. In Luke the verbal concurrence with the other evangelists is only $\frac{1}{10}$, of which $\frac{1}{8}$ are sayings. — To explain these phenomena various hypotheses have been offered. 1. It has been suggested that the three synoptists made use of a common source, a so-called primitive gospel. For a time the Aramaic gospel of Matthew was regarded as such a source. But this did not explain the often remarkable concurrence of the synoptists in Greek expressions, constructions, and entire periods. Still more unfortunate was the hypothesis of Lessing and others, that the Hebrew-Gospel (a corruption of the Aramaic Matthew, which originated in the sect of the Nazarenes about A. D. 70), was the original one. Utterly untenable is the hypothesis of Eichhorn and Marsh, that the original gospel was an Aramaic one composed by the apostles, but afterwards lost; that this gospel had been variously translated into the Greek; and that the synoptic gospels had been formed by combining these translations with the original and other sources. — 2. Others have maintained that the second synoptist made use of the first; and that the third made use of both of the others. But to which of them the priority must be given, and how they follow each other, has again given rise to a number of hypotheses. But none of them possesses a high degree of probability; since during the primitive age of the Church, when oral tradition was yet so complete and pure, the authors of the gospels would have been far from having recourse to written sources. That oral testimony was of high account in the apostolic age, is evident from Acts 15:27, where the letter of the apostles was sent by Judas and Silas, in order that the latter might establish its authority by their oral testimony. The same appears from Papias (a Eus., 3, 39). From a written source the evangelists could obtain no more than it happened to contain. How could men limit themselves to these, who had the best opportunities to inform themselves concerning the life of Jesus from eye-witnesses? Mark had heard everything from Peter; and Luke was conversant with the Apostles and the entire Church of Jerusalem. — Besides this improbability in general, there are certain special difficulties. For in whatever order the synoptists are made to follow each other, each successor will always have omitted parts of his predecessor, without any assignable reason for it. Since also some sayings of Christ are reported by the synoptists in different connections, and since in these cases the similarity of language is most remarkable — the very thing to be explained by the supposed use of the predecessor — it must also be supposed that the successor, in order to transcribe his predecessor, must have turned forward and backward in his work. In this case, why did they not transcribe in regular order? If Luke copied Matthew, why did he not give the accurate data and sequence of the latter? Their verbal deviations are still more inexplicable on this supposition. Why does the evangelist copy half of a verse verbatim, and then suddenly, without any assignable object, use a synonyme stead of the word given? And if the synoptists differ in their report of certain minor incidents, does not this, according to the present hypothesis, resemble a designed correction. —

¹ Richtige Auffassung der Evangelien: Tüb., 1736.

² Concerning his method, see Ebrard's Krit. der ev. Gesch., 2 ed., p. 62, etc.

These difficulties are only seemingly removed by the hypothesis that the synoptists made use of each other from memory. According to this mark is made to use Matthew and Luke from memory: but so as to be unable to give the longer sermons of Christ, in which, accordingly, he made use of the two evangelists indifferently. But this hypothesis is so far-fetched, that it needs no refutation. — 4. The path to the only correct and natural explanation of the relationship of the synoptists has been opened by Gieseler. The particular incidents of gospel history had been repeatedly narrated by the apostles, and thus a certain type of narration had formed itself. The particular points, especially sayings of Christ, were always reproduced; unusual expressions were the more firmly retained, since, when they were uttered, they had been more strongly attracted the attention of the disciples. Sermons and sayings were naturally retained with more care, and reported with more uniformity than incidents: although even in the latter, in the same degree that the incident was surprising and peculiar, a fixed type of narration had involuntarily formed itself. Thus it was that the authors had often heard the points, both of incidents and sayings, narrated; and this always in the same words. The more point there was, the more the language itself became fixed in the memory: naturally, however, not in the same degree with all, and without destroying the individuality of the evangelists. — This hypothesis is fully adequate to explain the relationship of the synoptists, especially if we combine with it the patristic tradition concerning their origin. — That the sayings of the Lord were above all carefully kept in the memory, the gospels themselves furnish a proof, to which the Duke of Manchester has lately called attention (a chapter on the harmonizing of the gospels: publ., by Gill, 1854). If, namely, we compare the Old Test. passages in the synoptists, we find that those of them which occur in sermons and sayings are always from the LXX.; whilst those of them which are quoted by the synoptists themselves deviate from the LXX. in favor, generally, of the Hebrew text. The reason is evident. At the time of Christ the Greek was generally spoken (see Hug, Einl., Thl. II., § 10) in Palestine; especially where, as in Galilee, there was a large mixture of pagan population: hence it was natural that Christ should there speak the Greek, and quote the Old Test. according to the well known LXX. We find this to be the case in fact in all those sermons which were spoken in Galilee, as also in those spoken in the circle of his disciples: whilst, on the other hand, at the raising of Jairus' daughter, where Jesus spoke Aramaic with the ruler of the synagogue, the verbal harmony of the synoptists' reports of his sayings is defective; so also in the history of his sufferings the Old Test. is no longer quoted from the LXX., because at Jerusalem the Aramaic was spoken. — If Christ had generally spoken the Aramaic, it would be incomprehensible why the evangelists should put quotations from the LXX. only upon his lips, whilst they themselves in their own quotations do not restrict themselves to the LXX. — If this proves that the sayings of the Lord impressed themselves accurately even as regards their form upon the minds of his disciples, we can the more readily understand how above all in these sayings a verbal harmony should be found in the synoptists. But that besides this harmony in essentials we find also a difference in unessentials needs no explanation. They faithfully treasured the sayings of their Lord in the heart, but did not slavishly learn them by rote. — But in the materials also of their reports there is at times a remarkable correspondence: at times even in quoting Old Test. passages, in which they deviate in a like manner from the LXX. This correspondence is readily explained from the natural hypothesis that the apostles, whilst yet at Jerusalem, repeatedly narrated the events to the neophytes, pointing out at the same time how the Old Test. prophecies had been fulfilled in them. In this way a fixed type of narration became established. If now we take into consideration the poverty and simplicity of the Aramaic-Greek, used by the evangelists, even by those who, like Luke, were acquainted with the classical Greek: that the evangelists did not aim at rhetorical elegance or striking contrast, but merely at faithfulness in portraying their important and holy subject, this correspondence explains itself readily without far-fetched hypotheses. — III. The partial deviation in the material portrayal of particular events is as readily explained, and is so far from lessening the credibility of the gospel history, that it rather increases it. The seeming deviations in the report of the same events are really only seeming, and such as take place daily where an event consisting of numerous minor circumstances is narrated with different degrees of vivacity by reporters who are equally well informed and truthful — deviations such as are most sure to appear, wherever there is the highest degree of harmlessness, the calmest consciousness of entire truthfulness, and an entire absence of collusion. Irreconcilable contradictions arise only, when the critic arbitrarily pronounces as identical those incidents, which from difference of actors, time, place, etc., are evidently not identical, in order afterwards to prove that they contradict each other in every essential point. If, however, we regard as identical such events only, which correspond in every essential point, every deviation will be reduced to a mere seeming one. The most important synoptic deviations may be reduced to this, that Matthew occasionally combines several similar incidents into one; or that in complex events he confines himself to what is essential. — IV. As regards the Gospel of John, it differs from the synoptists above all in its later origin (about A. D. 96), when the genius of gnosticism, and the completely changed external and internal position of the Church, had opened widely different apologetical and polemical views. Owing to this later origin, John could also take it for granted that the synoptists were already generally known; and he could thus complete them externally, by narrating those portions of the life of Jesus which (being known to the Church at Jerusalem, such as his presence at the festivals; or of minor accounts, as his life previous to the imprisonment of John) the apostles had narrated less frequently, and therefore been omitted by the synoptists;—internally, by portraying in opposition to the false gnosis the true speculative side of Christ, as this appeared to his mystical-intuitive vision.—It may be expected, therefore, that there is a great difference between John and the synoptists; but also that this difference does not destroy the harmony between them. Even the synoptists mention festal journeys, but they do not describe them. Nor does the sublimity character of the sermons of Jesus in John present any difficulty to those who admit that John did not report them in their original form, but according to his own individual way of speaking and thinking. But to those who have an eye for the celestial brilliancy of these sermons, it will be more acceptable to suppose that John had formed his mode of speaking according to the model of his master, rather than the reverse. John, entirely receptive in relation to Christ, penetrated the inmost nature of Christ, and gathered up in his heart the finest and most delicate rays of his words. Expressions which, because less remarkable, practical and immediate in their effects, had escaped the other disciples, still re-echoed in his heart; and thus he was enabled to furnish us with a picture of Christ which would have been lost without him.—Since John has but few events in common with the synoptists (for even in the history of the passion he is altogether supplementary), but few seeming deviations from them have been mentioned, and these may be easily explained on the principles already given. Most of the chronological deviations, also, which have been hunted up, are rather contrived than real. The only real difficulty concerns the time of the last Supper of Jesus. On this point no satisfactory result has as yet been reached.¹ But this is also the only case where there is a real difficulty: for the seeming contradictions in the history of the resurrection can be explained in an exceedingly simple and natural way; and have their origin merely in the fact that the synoptists unite into one narrative, the incidents which occurred to M. Magdalene and the other women separately, whilst John narrates accurately the incident which occurred to the former.

DR. EBRARD.—Reinecke.

Harmonists (Harmonites, Rappists) a sect which attempts to live together in full harmony, or unity and equality. Its founder was a Württemberg farmer, George Rapp (born 1770), who supposed he had been blessed with special inspirations, and in his fanaticism regarded the condition of the Church and the State as so corrupt that he felt himself called to purify both. He took Acts 4:32, for his model. Being opposed by the government in the execution of his scheme, he and his adherents emigrated to the United States (1803) settled on a tract of land near Pittsburg, and founded a town called Harmony. After a few years he sold out the colony to Robert Owen, and moved to Indiana, whence, however, he soon returned again, and founded another colony at Economy, on the Ohio, S. of Pittsburg, where he exercised without molestation the authority of a patriarch, high-priest, and chief ruler over his followers. His power was so unlimited that not even a marriage was consummated without his consent. The members of the union were not only required to yield implicit obedience to his authority, but they put all their property into a common fund, of which he had control. Complete equality in all things was the law. Applicants for admission to the society, were required to pass a probation of four weeks. The peace of the society was disturbed, in 1831, by the advent of an adventurous sectarist, Bernhard Müller, who had previously led a brilliant career in Offenbach on the Main, assumed the name of "Proli," and proposed to found a religious monarchy, but fled from legal proceedings instituted against him, to America. He came to Pittsburg, and, pretending to a princely descent, called himself Count Maximilian von Leon: also, the anointed of the Lord, and declared that he was commissioned to inaugurate the Millennium. Rapp received him as a prophet, and Proli soon won adherents among the Harmonists, especially by promising freedom in marriage, and a full community of possessions. Proli and his party soon seceded, taking their share of the property with them, and founded the New Jerusalem Society in Philippsburg, Ohio, where he ruled as Chief of the Millennium, squandered the money of his followers and then, 1833, deserted them, leaving them in extreme wretchedness. He went to Natchitoches, Ark., and soon after perished in the Missouri.—Rapp died Aug. 7, 1847. The establishment at Economy is still in operation, though not increasing.

NEUDECKER.*

Hatto (Haito, Aito, Hetto, &c.), Bishop of Basel at the time of Charlemagne. Born in 763 he entered the Reichenau monastery in 768, and enjoyed fine educational advantages for that age. He became principal in the monastery school there; c. 805 was appointed B. of Basel by Charlemagne, and in 806 became abbot of Reichenau. In 811 Charlemagne sent him, with Hugo of Tours and Hayo of Frisia on an embassy to Emperor Nicephorus. The mission succeeded, but on his way back he was shipwrecked. His account of the journey is lost. Anon. Sangallensis reports (vita Caroli II., 8) various legends of his journey. About 823 Hatto resigned his office as Bishop and abbot, and lived as a private monk until his death in 836. Of his writings two remain: 1) de visione Wettini. Wettin, a monk, a pupil of Hatto, and teacher at Reichenau, had a vision in 824, in which three days before his death, he imagined himself led through purgatory and hell by an angel. 2) 25 capita, being instrucons for the clergy of his diocese. They show the low condition of the clergy of that period, but also the efforts of Charlemagne and his friends to elevate it. In the capita the German church appears to be still rather independent of Rome.—(The Visio Wettini is in MABILLON, Acta S. Bened. IV., 1, p. 273. The Capita in ACHERY, spicil. I., 583. See HOTTINGER, Belvet. K.-G., I. NEUGART, Ep. Const., 145. PERTZ, Monum. G., III., 439. DU CHESNE, cript. II., 719. Walafrid Strabo, Herm. d. contr. EGINO, de vir. illustr. Augiæ in PEZ, ies. Anecd., I. GFRÖRER, K.-G., III. RETTBERG, K.-G. Deutschl., I., 455; II., 93, &c.).

¹ See concerning it: Hengstenberg (Kirchen-Zeitg., 1838, No. 98, etc.). Tholuck, (to John 13:1). Wieseler (chronol. Synopse, p. 333). Lichtenstein (Lebens-Gesch. Jesu, p. 342). Movers (Zeitschr. f. Phil. u. Kath. Theol., 1833, No. 8). Krafft, (Chronol. u. Harm. der Ev., p. 17). Bleek (Beiträge z. Ev. Kritik, p. 107). Weitzel (die christl. Passahfeier d. 3. erst. Jahrh., p. 305). Ebrard (Krit. d. ev. Gesch. 2 ed. p. 505).

Hatto I. and II., Archbishops of Mayence. —I. born c. 850, probably in Suabia, a pupil and then abbot of Ellwangen (?), 888, abbot of Leichenau, was also elevated to the Archb. of Mayence, by King Arnulf, and in this character played a prominent part in the history of the later Carolingians. He was more of a statesman than a theologian. Arnulf, already, discovered his talents for politics, but he acquired much greater influence when Arnulf's son, Louis IV., in his seventh year, succeeded his father on the throne. He, with Bishop Adalbero and Duke Hatto of Saxony, now actually ruled, until the death of the sickly child, 911. Hatto's influence continued under Conrad I., and, indeed, to his death in Jan. 913. He was a man of great intellect and energy, but worldly and ambitious, even to unscrupulousness.—He was no less active in Church matters. At a synod in Tribur, 895, attended by 22 German bishops, Hatto, with his colleagues, Hermann of Cologne and Ratbod of Trier, secured the adoption of 52 canons, restoring discipline and order, asserting the superiority of spiritual over temporal authority, restricting appeals of the lower clergy to Rome, and defining the jurisdiction of Bishops in disputes between clergymen and the laity.—Various legends spread as to the cause of his death. Some said he was struck by lightning; others, that Satan carried him off and threw his body into Etna.—(Sources: PERTZ, Monum., I., 603; II., Cent. Magdeb., X., 85. BARON., X., 891, 895. GFRÖRER, III., 1, 1. Ersch u. Gruber, Encycl., II., 3, p. 117. Kälin, Würtemb. Gesch., I., 264, 366. NEANDER, Ch. Hist.). —II., a pupil of Fulda, and abbot there, c. 942. In 961 he accompanied Otto I. to Rome, and in 968 was placed by Otto on the Archiep. chair of Mayence, after having declared himself willing to found the Archb. of Magdeburg, and so far reduce the limits of his own See.—(Cent. Magdeb., X., 590. Baron., 961-2. Gfrörer, III. Ersch u. Gruber, I, 1). WAGENMANN.*

Hazael (Sept. 'Aζαζ; cf. 2 Kings 8: 8, 13) a court officer of Benhadad II. (see Hadrach), who probably succeeded Naaman (2 Kings 5: 1, 18). He was an energetic, cunning, hypocritical minister, and scarcely learned from Elisha that he should succeed the King, and deal sorely with Israel (8: 12, 13; 19: 15, 17), before he executed a plot (probably previously conceived, 1: 10, 11) for Benhadad's destruction. Immediately he ascended the throne (8: 15). Possibly Elisha anointed him during his visit to the sick king in Damascus (8: 7, &c.). Hazael vigorously carried out Benhadad's projects for humbling Israel. Soon after he took the throne, the possession of Ramoth Gilead occasioned animosities (cf. 1 Kings 20: 34). Ahab had perished in the first attempt to gain the city (1 Kings 22: 3, 34), and his son Jehoram had returned from an assault on it covered with wounds (2 Kings 8: 28; 9: 15). Jehu, also, was routed by Hazael, who pressed on and seized the whole country beyond Jordan (2 Kings 10: 32, 33). In a subsequent campaign, passing through the midst of Israel and Judah, and laying the whole country waste, he took Gath, and Joash had to pay a heavy sum to keep him from besieging Jerusalem (2 Kings 12: 17, 18; cf. Amos 1: 3). Jehoahaz, Jehu's son, was also oppressed by Hazael (2 Kings 13: 3, 7). Hazael reigned more than 45 years (2 Kings 10: 36; 13: 1). VAHINGER.*

Heart, in a Scriptural sense (καρδία; לֵב, לֵב; or קֶרֶב = the chest with the lungs, &c., cf. Ps. 39: 3; 109: 22; 1 Sam. 25: 37, and Delitzsch, System d. bibl. Psychol., 203, 220.

Hupfeld on Ps. 17: 10, makes לֵב = heart; but this is improbable). According to the mode of representation in the Bible, man's life centres in the heart. And as the heart is the central organ of the circulation of the blood (see Delitzsch on Eccles. 12: 6, &c.), and thus the strengthening of the body by food is a support of the heart (Gen. 18: 5; Ps. 104: 15), and the reverse (Ps. 102: 4; 22: 14), so the heart is regarded as the centre of all spiritual functions. For all spiritual acts, whether pertaining to the intellectual, moral, or pathological spheres, are originated and propelled by the heart. In a word, all the activities of the soul proceed from and react upon the heart (Prov. 4: 23). In order to determine the Biblical idea of the heart more accurately, we must ascertain the relation between it and the soul, שֵׁנָה, however difficult this may be. And first let it be remembered that the heart is the centre and office of the functions of the soul's life, so that both terms are interchangeably used (Deut. 6: 5; cf. Matt. 22: 37, &c.; 1 Chron. 28: 9; James 1: 8; 4: 8; 1 Pet. 1: 22). The soul is the bearer of the life of the Ego, the proper self of man (though at the same time personality is to be distinguished from the soul itself), by virtue of the immanence of the spirit (see Art.); the heart is the place where the process of self-consciousness is completed, where the soul communes with itself (in corde actiones animae humanæ ad ipsam redeunt; Roos, fundam. psychol. ex s. scr., 1796, p. 99). Hence, in passages speaking of the entire person of man, and of his physical or psychical life or destruction, not the heart but the soul is meant (Job 33: 18, 22; Ps. 94: 17, &c.; Mark 8: 35, &c.; Heb. 10: 39; 1 Pet. 2: 11). In these passages

לֵב or καρδία could not be used, any more than ἐπίσκοπος τῶν ψυχῶν, 1 Pet. 2: 25, could be expressed by καρδιογνώστης, Acts 1: 24, or an oath by the life of the soul, by an oath by the life of the heart (cf. 2 Cor. 1: 23; Ps. 22: 26, ~

69 : 33 ; Jer. 38 : 17, 20). When Nabal was struck with apoplexy, his soul was still in him (Acts 20 : 10), but his heart died (1 Sam. 25 : 37. Cf. Is. 21 : 4 ; Gen. 42 : 28 ; also Cant. 5 : 6). When man is represented as meditating or resolving upon something, heart is almost always used (dum ipsa [anima] sibi aliquid ostendit ac proponit, ad cor suum loqui dicitur ; dum suarum actionum sibi conscia est et illarum innocentiam vel turpitudinem ipsa sentit, id ad cor refertur. Anima humana ut $\psi\chi\eta$ suavia appetit, ut spiritus scrutatur, &c., sed quatenus cor habet, ipsa novit, se hoc agere et ideus reflexas habet, Roos, l. c. Cf. Deut. 8 : 5 ; Is. 44 : 19 [with Gen. 8 : 21] ; Ps. 73 : 7 ; Prov. 16 : 1 ; Luke 1 : 66 ; Matt. 9 : 4 ; Luke 3 : 15, &c. ; 1 Cor. 4 : 5, &c.). But the heart is also regarded as the organ of knowledge in general, hence it is used of understanding, insight, &c. (Job 34 : 10 ; 36 : 5 ; Jer. 2 : 21 ; Prov. 17 : 16 ; 1 Kings 5 : 9 ; Ps. 119 : 32 ; 2 Kings 5 : 26). Hence the LXX. often has $\nu\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$ for heart (Ex. 7 : 23 ; Is. 10 : 7, &c.). There are indeed exceptions to this ; for the soul, also, is mentioned as the subject of knowledge, reflection, purposes, &c. (Prov. 19 : 2 ; Ps. 139 : 14 ; Lam. 3 : 20, 24 ; 1 Sam. 20 : 4 ; Esth. 4 : 13 ; Ps. 13 : 2, &c.). But dispositions and affections are as often predicated of the soul as of the heart (Matt. 26 : 38 ; John 12 : 27 ; 16 : 6, and Rom. 9 : 2 ; 2 Cor. 2 : 4 ; Deut. 28 : 65 ; Prov. 12 : 25 ; Eccl. 11 : 10 ; Jer. 15 : 16 ; 1 Sam. 2 : 1 ; Ps. 28 : 7 ; Ex. 23 : 9 ; Ps. 6 : 3 ; 42 : 5, 6, &c., &c.). Usually $\מֵרֶץ$ and its derivations are joined with $\שֹׁפֵךְ$, and $\חַמָּה$ and its derivations with $\לֵב$ (Prov. 14 : 10). If functions are designated which imply an action of the subject upon an object, $\שֹׁפֵךְ$ is used (Jer. 4 : 19) ; probably because heavy breathing is connected with vehement desire (Amos 2 : 7). Of course the impulses to which man yields (Ex. 35 : 5, 22, 29), his motives, desires, &c., are matters of the heart (Ezek. 11 : 21 ; 20 : 16 ; 33 : 31, &c.) ; but as soon as they express themselves, they become acts of the soul (Ps. 84 : 2 ; 119 : 20, 81 ; Eccl. 6 : 7, 9, &c.).—From all this we may gather the ethico-religious import of the term heart. As it is the inner chamber of man's personal life, the workshop for the personal appropriation of spiritual things, man's moral and religious personality is lodged in the heart. Only what has entered the heart acquires a moral character, and only what proceeds from it is a moral product. The state of the heart, therefore, gives tone and character to man's life in general, and to all its particular acts (Matt. 12 : 33, &c.). Hence ex cordis designates what has a real moral value, in distinction from mere show (Rom. 6 : 17 ; cf. Matt. 15 : 8 ; 1 Tim. 1 : 5). This distinction occurs even where God is the subject (Lam. 3 : 33, &c.), and when he is said to look upon, know and try the heart (1 Sam. 16 : 7 ; Jer. 20 : 12 ; 1 Kings 8 : 39 ; Luke 16 : 15, &c.). Hence all man's habits and moral characteristics are associated with his heart ; he is wise (1 Kings 5 : 12 ; Prov. 10 : 8, &c.), pure (Ps. 51 : 10, &c.), upright (Gen. 20 : 5, 6, &c.), simple (Eph. 6 : 5, &c.), and good

(Luke 8 : 15, &c.) in heart, and the reverse (Luke 24 : 25 ; Acts 8 : 21, &c., &c.). In such connections we rarely find $\psi\chi\eta$, excepting that the LXX. is not so uniform.—As the law was originally inscribed on the heart, it is the seat of the conscience, which bears witness to that law (Rom. 2 : 15 ; 1 Cor. 2 : 44 ; Job 27 : 6, &c. ; Delitzsch, p. 100, &c.). Hence all other divine revelations are addressed to the heart (Deut. 6 : 6 ; 11 : 18 ; Ps. 119 : 10, &c.) ; Wisdom desires admission to the heart, that it may send healing virtue into the whole moral organism (Prov. 4 : 21) ; and the heart is the soil on which the seed is cast (Matt. 13 : 9, &c.). That which the heart appropriates becomes the $\sigma\tau\epsilon\gamma\alpha\sigma\tau\epsilon\varsigma\ \tau\omicron\varsigma\ \kappa\alpha\rho\delta\iota\alpha\varsigma$ (Matt. 12 : 35), which may be good or bad. By nature the heart is wicked (Jer. 17 : 9), so that only a divine act of grace can renew it. This is the work of the Spirit, whose operations were known even under the Old Test. (1 Sam. 10 : 6, 9 ; Ps. 51 : 10–14 ; Ezek. 36 : 26, &c. ; 11 : 19).—On the part of man the process begins with the awakening of faith, which, as through it man's personal life receives a new direction in its deepest ground, belongs wholly to the sphere of the heart, and is described, therefore, as a strengthening, support of the heart (Ps. 27 : 13, 31 : 24 ; 73 : 26 ; 112 : 6, &c. ; see Rom. 10 : 9, 10 ; Mark 11 : 23). God purifies the heart through faith in Christ (Acts 15 : 9 ; Heb. 10 : 22 ; 1 John 3 : 19–21), and in it the love of God is shed abroad, and assurance of adoption awakened (Rom. 5 : 5 ; 2 Cor. 1 : 22). Then it becomes the abode of Christ, is kept by and established in him (Eph. 3 : 17 ; Col. 3 : 15 ; Philip. 4 : 7 ; 1 Thess. 3 : 13, &c.).—But if man rejects the testimony of Revelation, the heart becomes hardened, shut, &c. (Ps. 95 : 8 ; Prov. 28 : 14 ; 2 Chron. 36 : 13 ; Is. 44 : 18. Cf. also : Is. 6 : 10 ; Ps. 119 : 70 ; Mark 3 : 5 ; Eph. 4 : 18 ; Matt. 19 : 8, &c.). The result of this unsusceptibility of the heart, is inability to see God's works, to hear his Word, and incapacity for salvation.—Finally, the question of the relation of the heart as the fountain of the soul's life, to it as the centre of man's physical life, could be fully answered only in an investigation of the general relation of the soul to the body. We may briefly observe that, according to the Bible, there is not simply a parallel between the body and soul so far as to allow the former to be used as a symbol of the latter, but that, as the soul, which is the bearer of our personality, is the same which animates our blood and breathing, so are our bodily organs also participant in its higher functions. As daily experience proves the influence of affections and passions upon pulsation and the bowels, no one will regard as mere tropes such expressions as : "my heart was hot," Ps. 39 : 3 (see Jer. 20 : 9). But there are two remarkable points in Biblical anthropology, 1) the specific relation represented as existing between some affections and certain internal organs (the liver, reins) ; 2) the prominence of the heart, to the exclusion of the head and brain, in the operations of the reason and the will. In this respect all ancient authors agree with the Bible. In regard to Homer's usus loq. see Nägelsbach, homer. Theol., 332, &c. In Latin authors we may refer to the words ordatus, recordari, recors, excors, &c. (see Cic., Tusc., I., 9, 18. Cf. also PLATO's Phædr., c. 45). The fact that the heart is the central organ for the circulation of the blood, does not explain this. The phenomena of somnambulism have been employed in illustration of the subject. But physiology has yet to solve the problems arising from this mode of representing the heart's functions.—(For the literature upon this subject see Spirit of man.) OEHLEK.*

Heaven.—The Bible represents the world as composed of earth and heaven, this latter term designating everything beyond the earth. But the heavenly region includes such vast diversity of form and being, that it, again, is commonly designated by the plural (not dual) number (Deut. 10 : 14); in the New Test. we frequently find οὐρανοί. No fixed number of heavens is named; 2 Cor. 12 : 2, is not definite (cf. de Wette, l.c.; G. L. Hahn, Theol. d. N. T., I., 247-9). The Scriptures furnish but one distinction, that between the visible, material, and invisible, immaterial heavens; they are not only mentioned together (Col. 1 : 16, 20), but each one is named separately (2 Pet. 3 : 10; Matt. 6 : 9).—Heaven is the name of everything above the earth, the atmosphere, the clouds, the starry heavens, the hosts of heaven (Gen. 1 : 20; Deut. 4 : 19; Ps. 8 : 3; Matt. 24 : 29). These are the visible heavens, collectively called firmament, in the Old Testament, from their aspect. They stand opposite to the earth, but are of like substance with it, and are often placed in a parallel with it. They were both made of the same material (Gen. 1 : 6-8, 14-19), and now they testify to earth of the power, wisdom, and goodness of God (Ps. 19 : 1-6, &c.). Once they shall also vanish like the earth, to reappear in a more glorious form (Ps. 102 : 25-7; Is. 51 : 6, &c.). The recently advanced opinion (especially by Kurtz of Dorpat, "Bible and Astronomy," transl.: Philad., 1857), that angels inhabit the fixed stars, is untenable, however plausible. An abode must correspond with the nature of its inhabitants. But angels (see Art.) are immaterial beings. Hence no mention is made of the creation of angels in Gen. 1.—The invisible, immaterial heavens are the abode of all immaterial spirits, of God, of angels, of Christ, and of the redeemed. It is a fact on which entire Revelation rests, that besides the heavens we see, there is another, a kingdom of God, prepared before the creation (Matt. 25 : 34), a perfect world of life, light, and love. That is the ideal, or rather the only real world (Luke 16 : 11; Heb. 8 : 2; 9 : 24). in which reign purity, holiness, and harmony, in contrast with which our fleshly existence is but darkness and death; hence a fulness, power, glory, and happiness, compared with which earth is poverty and weakness. Such a life is in its nature eternal; such a kingdom, an immovable, and enduring kingdom of unfading bloom and beauty (1 Pet. 1 : 4; James 1 : 17; Col. 1 : 12; 2 Tim. 4 : 18; Heb. 12 : 27).—In Hebrews and Revelation, especially, this contrast between earth and heaven is clearly exhibited. The natural man, separated by the veil of the flesh from the upper sanctuary (Heb. 10 : 20) cannot apprehend this contrast; he minds only earthly things (Philip. 3 : 19; Rev. 6 : 10, &c.). It is the aim of divine revelation to revive in man a consciousness of heaven, and bring him within the sphere of power and joy. Under the Old Test. the way to heaven was only indicated under dim types and shadows (Heb. 8 : 5; 9 : 23, &c.). Christ, who came from heaven, was the first to bring the pneumatic life of the upper world to earth, and to found the kingdom of heaven amongst men (John 1 : 14-18, 52; 3 : 11, &c.; 31, &c.; Matt. 4 : 17; 12 : 28, &c.); he bestows on his followers heavenly blessings, and translates them, by fellowship with his death and resurrection, into a heavenly state (Eph. 1 : 3; 2 : 6; Philip. 3 : 20, &c.). This transition from death to life, by which the invisible becomes a part of man's life, is faith (Heb. 11 : 1, &c.; John 5 : 24), by which possession is gained of the highest sphere of life. Hence the tenor of the first three petitions in the Lord's prayer. Through Christ heaven is opened to believers after they have laid off the flesh (John 14 : 2; Philip 1 : 21-3, &c.); and finally the opposition between heaven and earth will cease when the glory of heaven shall descend upon the new earth (Rev. 21).—Thus we see that the Bible leads us to apprehend the heavenly and pneumatic state, not in a spiritualistic, but realistic sense; a view insisted upon especially by the theosophists (Böhme, Oetinger, Rothe). It also furnishes hints of the riches and fulness of the celestial life. The most exalted object there is the throne of God, the concentrated manifestation of the glory of the Trinity, where the majesty of the universal Potentate, and the grace of the Lamb commingle, so that the entire fulness of the life of God in the Spirit, with its rays, may illumine the world. Around this throne, borne by the four cherubim, are the 24 elders, the representatives of the redeemed, and further out the countless hosts of angels, in their manifold orders and grades, principalities, thrones, powers, all filled with adoring fear and adoring love to God and the Lamb, whom they magnify in holy songs (Rev. 4 and 5).—There are, furthermore, many mansions in heaven for the spirits of the just made perfect (John 14 : 2), and among these a chief city, the heavenly Jerusalem, the city of the living God (Heb. 11 : 10, 16; 12 : 22; 13 : 14; Gal. 4 : 26; Rev. 21 : 2), with a celestial Zion and tabernacle or temple (Heb. 8 : 25; 12 : 22; Rev. 11 : 19; 14 : 17; 15 : 5). Treasures are also said to be there, crowns of life for conquerors, an imperishable inheritance, a fountain of living water (Matt. 6 : 20; 1 Pet. 1 : 4; Rev. 2 : 7, 10; 7 : 17). This is indeed speaking of heavenly things in earthly language, and it may be difficult to determine how much is symbolical or typical. The heavenly temple seems to be exhibited under different aspects. In the passages just quoted, there appears to be a local sanctuary; but in others the whole heavens are represented as forming this temple. In John 14 : 2; Heb. 10 : 21, "house of God" occurs. Heb. 9 : 11, 23; 8 : 1; cf. 4 : 14; 7 : 26; Eph. 4 : 10; Rev. 4 : 1; 5 : 8; 6 : 9; 7 : 15; 8 : 3. According to these the throne of God on which Christ sits is in the holy of holies, which appears as a place above heaven; the holy place through which, as High-priest, he passed, are the heavens, the abodes of the angels, and, since his ascension, of those saints who serve God as priests. This holy place, therefore, is not the place of absolute holiness, not the full presence of God himself (this explains Job 4 : 18; 15 : 15), though still a sacred, pure abode, in contrast with the outer court, the material visible world. Whilst, therefore, these various expressions are not to be taken too literally, they yet prove that there are heavenly realities and localities, suited to the nature of the spiritual existences inhabiting heaven. The Bible selects such terms and figures from things celestial, as specifically correspond, in their fundamental aspects, to the realities of heaven, which, indeed, are the original types of all things, both in the sphere of nature and revelation (Matt. 6 : 19, &c.; 13 : 31; Luke 16 : 11, John 4 : 13; 6 : 26; Ex. 25 : 9, 40; Heb. 8 : 5; 9 : 23, &c.; 12 : 22; Rev. 11 : 19, &c. &c.). Holding fast to this Scripture idea of the pattern and realness of heavenly things being primeval, we shall escape two errors: 1) a philosophical one, which even evangelical theology has not yet quite overcome, of reversing the proper relation between heaven and earth, so as to regard the latter only as real and the other as an unsubstantial ideal, or mere conceit; 2) a mystical one, which, in a laudable effort fully to realize heavenly things, forgets the distinction between the original form and the copy of it, paints heaven with earthly colors, and even drafts a chart of heaven (Swedenborg, Oberlin, &c. The latest: Uranographie: Ludwigsburg, 1856). — Thus far we have considered heaven only as the abode of blessed spirits, for this is the predominant idea of it in the Bible. But there are some passages in which bad spirits also appear there (Job 1 : 6; 2 : 1, &c.; 1 Kings 22 : 19–22; Zech. 3 : 1; Rev. 12 : 7, &c.). This may be more easily understood by remembering that heaven is the place of spiritual existence in general, and that fallen spirits, also, have their times of development. Such spirits can, of course, not remain there; but Satan, also, had to be overcome by Christ, before he with his angels could be hurled from heaven (Rev. 12). Thus the atoning work of Christ is not only significant for the restoration of the union of earth with heaven, but also for heaven itself. — (See G. L. Hahn, Theol. d. N. T.: Beck, Chr. Lehrwissensch.; Ph. M. Hahn, Gedanken v. Himmel, in his sermons on Coloss., 1845. Auberlen, d. Proph. Daniel). AUBERLEN.*

Heaven, Christ's ascension to. — In the Gospel account of Christ's ascension into heaven (Mark 16 : 19; Luke 24 : 50; Acts 1 : 3, 9, 10; cf. 1 Pet. 3 : 22; Heb. 9 : 24) we note the fact as it appeared to the disciples, and the fact as declared to them by the angels. So far as the disciples saw, Christ merely disappeared in the heavenly region above them, the visible heavens. But the angels told them that he had ascended far beyond those heavens into the invisible heaven, the place of the full manifestation of the glory of God, and the abode of the holy angels (see Heaven). The Scriptures, therefore, teach us that the glorified body of the arisen Saviour ascended until a cloud concealed him from the gaze of his disciples, and that he went into heaven, as he had foretold (John 14 : 2). Hence Paul (Col. 3 : 1–3) could say that Christ was "above, at the right hand of God," placing "earth" in antithesis to the τόπος where Christ is. In his ascension to heaven, Christ left the earth, where sin and death reign, and went to that realm of creation in which there is neither sin nor death. — And this, first of all, was necessary as to his own person. When the eternally begotten Son of the Father united his divine with a human nature, he assumed something which he would eternally retain, and something which he would again lay off. The former was the essentia humana, that which makes man, a man (the possession of a perceiving, apprehending, self-developing soul, dwelling in a body, by which man distinguishes himself from God, and relatively also from angels; and the personal organization of that soul, by which he distinguishes himself from beasts, and lower orders of nature). The other was the accidens mortalitatis, the bondage to death, the ἀσθένεια, the effect of sin, and which is so unessential to humanity, that man not only remains man without it, but first attains to true manhood, when it has been overcome. Now Christ at his incarnation assumed this state too, but only that in it he might free man from it. This he did by his death, and so became the first-fruits of humanity redeemed from that mournful accidens, and restored to the pure essentia humana, when he arose a glorified man from the grave. And he did this not to lay aside the essentia humana, but to remain in this glorified human state, that as first-fruits, head, and king of his members and brethren (Heb. 2 : 11) he might exalt them also to this state (Philip. 3 : 21; 1 John 3 : 2) and draw them to himself (John 12 : 32). — But for Christ thus glorified, our earth still under death was no suitable abode; hence his glorified person demanded that he should quit the earth, and enter that region where a) death had not entered; b) his eternal home had been (Eph. 4 : 9, &c.; John 3 : 13); and where c) he would find a fulness of joy in the presence of the Father (Luke 2 : 49).

Christ's ascension to heaven was also necessary for his work of Redemption and for his Church. For, 1) His ascension is a pledge that as he has gone to heaven to prepare a place for us, he will draw us thither, and keep us in happiness, until his second coming (Rev. 20 : 1, &c.; 21). 2) He had to ascend into heaven, the most holy place, made without hands (Heb. 9 : 24), to represent us there as our High-priest before the Father (Heb. 6 : 20; 7 : 26; 8 : 4; 9 : 24; Rom. 8 : 34). 3) That from thence (John 14 : 16; 16 : 7), as from the fulness of the heavenly glory and majesty, he might pour out the Holy Spirit, now as the Spirit of Christ, upon his Church, and thus prove his promise true, that although "above and not on earth," "no more with his disciples," "no more in the world," and "gone from the world" (Col. 3 : 1, &c.; Matt. 26 : 11; John 17 : 11; 16 : 28), he was still with them (Matt. 28 : 20), had not left them orphans (John 14 : 18), but was remaining with them always (John 6 : 56; 15 : 4). For whilst his visible glorified body is withdrawn from the earth as such, that with that same body he may visibly come again, he is ascended; but by his Spirit (John 14: 16) he might be spiritually and absolutely near his Church (by the space-transcending power of his glory) and fill it with the power and substance of his glorified humanity.¹ 4) That he might participate in the reign and government of his Father, for the protection and spread of his kingdom; to lead in the war of love against the hostile world described in Revelation; as the Lamb who

¹ Thus Polanus a Polensdorf says (syntagm. lib. IV. ap. 25. pag. 762): Ideo corpus Christi non est jam in terra, nedum ubique. Etsi autem Christus corpore suo non sit jam in terra, tamen est etiam conjunctus et praesens corpori nostro secundum carnem, sed non loco; sicut caput uniuscujusque hominis non est eo loco quo pedes, et tamen est illis suo modo unitum. Proinde adest Christus ecclesiae suae non tantum secundum divinam sed etiam secundum humanam naturam, verum spiritualiter, sicut caput membrum, quibus unitum est et quae vivificat.

² The expression is figurative, as Calvin already explained it (Instit. II. 16, 15): Quare mox subjicitur, consedis ad Patris dexteram; similitudine scilicet a principibus sumpta, qui suos habent assessores, quibus regendi imperandique vices demandant. Ita Christus, in quo exaltari, et per ejus manum regnare vult Pater, in ejus dexteram receptus dicitur, ac si diceretur veli ac terrae dominio inauguratus, commissae sibi administrationis possessionem solemniter adisse, nec semel adisse tantum, sed in ea perstare, donec ad judicium descendat. — Vides quorsum pertineat illa sessio, nempe ut ejus majestatem tum coelestes tum terrenae creaturae suspiciant, manu ejus regantur, autum intueantur, virtuti subjectae sint.

³ Thus August. (tract. in Jo. 109): Iturus per mortem erat Christus ad dexteram Patris, unde venturus est ad vivos et mortuos judicandos; praesentia itidem corporalis, secundum sanam doctrinam fideique regulam. Nam praesentia spirituali cum eis erat venturus post ascensionem suam. So ad Matt. 28: 20: Secundum carnem vero, quam Verbum assumpsit, secundum id quod de Virgine natus est, secundum id quod a Judaeis comprehensus est, quod ligno confixus, quod de cruce depositus, quod linteis involutus, quod in sepulchro conditus, quod in resurrectione manifestatus: Non semper habebitis me vobiscum. Quare? quoniam conversatus est secundum corporis praesentium quadraginta diebus cum discipulis suis, et eis deducentibus videndo, non sequendo, ascendit in coelum, et non est hic, ibi enim sedet ad dexteram Patris; et hic est, non enim recessit praesentia majestatis. Ergo secundum praesentiam majestatis semper habemus Christum, secundum praesentiam carnis recte dictum est discipulis: Me autem non semper habebitis. Aguin tom. X. serm. 140: Ideo Dominus noster absentavit se corpore ab omni ecclesia, et ascendit in coelum, ut fides aedificetur. Especially tom. II. epist. 57. ad Dardanum: Noli itaque dubitare, ibi nunc esse hominem Christum Jesum, unde venturus est . . . et sic venturus est illa angelica voce testante, quemadmodum ire visus est in coelum, i. e. in eadem carnis forma atque substantia, cui profecto immortalitatem dedit, naturam non abstulit. Secundum hanc formam non est putandus ubique diffusus. Cavendum est enim, ne ita divinitatem astruamus hominis, ut veritatem corporis auferamus. Non est autem consequens, ut, quod in Deo est, ita sit ubique, ut Deus . . . Nam spatia locorum tolle corporibus; nusquam erunt, et quia nusquam erunt, nec erunt. Tolle ipsa corpora qualitatibus corporum; non erit, ubi sint, et ideo necesse est, ut non sint. Christum autem Dominum nostrum, unigenitum Dei filium aequalem Patri, eundemque hominis filium, quo major est Pater, et ubique totum praesentem esse non dubites tanquam Deum, et in eodem templo Dei esse tanquam inhabitantem Deum, et in loco aliquo coeli propter veri corporis modum. And ep. 146. ad Consentium: Sic alone is worthy to open the seal of the future. This participation in authority is designated a "sitting at the right hand of God" (Matt. 26: 64; Acts 7: 55, &c., &c.). But in order to do this Christ had to leave the earth, and enter the holiest place (Rev. 15: 5), where God's presence is intensively revealed, and whence he governs heaven and earth. — It was thus the ancient Church understood the doctrine of Christ's ascension to heaven.³ — In this Biblical sense of the fact the Oriental, Romish, and eorum, quum esset in terra, contrectatus est manibus (Luc. 24, 39); sic eorum est, quum iret in coelum, deductus aspectibus. Finally tom. IX. tract. 30 in Jo. Corpus enim Domini, in quo resurrexit, uno loco esse oportet: veritas ejusque ubique diffusa est, and tract. 50 Corpus enim suum intulit coelo, majestatem non abstulit mundo.

Likewise Vigilius contra Eutych. lib. 4: Si Verbi et carnis und natura est, quomodo, quum Verbum ubique sit, non ubique inveniatur et caro? Namque quando in terra fuit, non erat utique in coelo; et nunc quia in coelo est, non est utique in terra. . . . Diversum est autem et longe dissimile: circumscribi loco, et: ubique esse. Et quia Verbum ubique est, Caro autem ejus ubique non est, appareat, unum eundemque Christum utriusque esse naturae, et esse quidem ubique secundum naturam divinitatis suae, et loco contineri secundum naturam humanitatis suae.

Greg. Naz. orat. 2, de filio: δεῖ γὰρ αὐτὸν βασιλεῖν ἄχρι τοῦδε, καὶ ἐπ' οὐρανὸν δεχθῆναι ἄχρι χρόνων ἀποκαταστάσεως.

Origines hom. 33, in Matt.: Qui dicit discipulis suis: ecce ego vobiscum sum, unigenitus Dei est, Deus Verbum, qui non est corporeo ambitu circumolusus. Secundum hanc divinitatis suae naturam non peregrinatur a nobis, sed peregrinatur secundum dispensationem corporis, quod suscepit. Haec autem dicentes non solvimus suscepti corporis hominem, sed unicuique substantiae suam proprietatem servamus. Quasi homo peregrinatur, qui est ubique secundum divinitatis naturam. Non enim est homo, qui, ubicunque duo vel tres in nomine ejus congregati fuerint, sed virtus divina, quae erat in Jesu. Neque homo (hoc est, secundum humanitatem) nobiscum est omnibus diebus usque ad consummationem saeculi. — Irenaeus 3, 16, 8, ἐνα καὶ τὸν αὐτὸν εἰδὼς Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ὡς ἠνολέχθησαν αἱ πόλεις τοῦ οὐρανοῦ διὰ τὴν ἔνσρκον ἀνάληψιν αὐτοῦ, θεὸς καὶ ἐν τῇ αὐτῇ σαρκί, ἐν ᾗ καὶ ἔπαθεν, ἡλίσσεται, τὴν δόξαν ἀποκαλύπτων τοῦ πατρὸς. And III., 19, 3: Propter hoc et ipse Dominus dedit nobis signum in profundum, in altitudinem sursum, quod non postulavit homo, quia nec speravit, virginem praegnantem fieri posse, quae erat virgo, et parere filium, et hunc partum Deum esse nobiscum, et descendere in ea quae sunt deorsum terrae, quaerentem ovem quae perierat, quod quidem erat proprium ipsius plasma, et ascendere in altitudinem, offerentem et commendantem Patri enim hominem, qui fuerat inventus, primitivae resurrectionis hominis in ipso faciens, ut, quemadmodum caput resurrexit a mortuis, . . . sic et reliquum corpus omnis hominis, qui invenitur in vita, impleto tempore . . . resurgat . . . unoquoque membrorum habente propriam et aptam in corpore positionem. Multae enim mansiones apud patrem, quoniam et multa membra in corpore. — Theodoretus, dial. 2, Corpus dominicum surrexit quidem, a corruptione et interitu alienum, et impatibile et immortale, et divina gloria glorificatum, et a coelestibus adoratur potestatibus; corpus tamen est et habet, quam prius habuit, circumscriptionem. — Athanasius de incarnat. verbi Dei (ed. Colon. I., p. 592): καὶ πάλιν ἐὰν θεωρῇτε τὸν εἶδεν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἀναβαίνοντα, θεοῦ ᾧ τὸ πρότερον, καὶ ἐγὼ εἶμι ὁ ἄνθρωπος ὁ ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ καταβὰς, ὁ ζῶν καὶ ζῶν διδοὺς τῷ κόσμῳ σαφῶς διὰ τούτων ἐκδηλώσεων ἡμᾶς τὴν θεότητα τὴν αὐτοῦ, οὐκ ἀναιρῶν τὸ κατὰ σάρκα προσεληφέναι, ἀλλ' ἐντὸν αὐτὸν πρὸς τὴν σάρκα, ἐπειδὴ κατὰ Παῦλον ἐν ὁμοιώματι ἀνθρώπων γέγονε καὶ σχήματι ἐρεθείς ὡς ἄνθρωπος.

Reformed Churches have agreed to the present day; whilst in the Lutheran Church, so far as adhering to the Form of Concord, the doctrine of the Ubiquity requires a modification of the fact of a real ascension. The theologians of this school proceeded from a mediæval scholastic view of the subject, essentially Nestorian; as though the two natures of Christ consisted of two distinct parts, one the eternal "filius Dei," and a "filius Mariæ," created by the "filius Dei," and with which the latter connected himself (see Ebrard's Dogm., II., § 376, &c.). By his human nature, therefore, was not understood that nature in the abstract, as one assumed by the Logos as his own; but that nature in a concrete form, a man, a son of Mary, which he allowed to be made, that he might join himself to it at the first moment of its existence. To avoid the Nestorian consequences of this view, it was assumed that both these parts immediately mingled, yet so that the Son of Mary did not impart to the Son of God the human attributes, but the latter divine attributes to the former: omnipotence, omnipresence, and omniscience.—Whilst the Son of God in reality governed the world by those attributes, the Son of Mary refrained from their exercise, so that their possession was concealed. Not until 40 days after his resurrection did Christ, as Mary's son, begin to use divine prerogative. The ascension, therefore, was the entering of his human nature into the attributes of the divine. The Son of Mary assumed the condition of ubiquity, always maintained by the Son of God. He might indeed even now again assume a concrete form, and manifest him visibly (as to Paul, and at his second coming), but usually he is ubique (see Form. Conc. sol. decl., 7). Thus this system denies a circumscribed body to Christ; that he occupies any particular place in heaven; or that he went to heaven as de loco in locum. In support of this theory it is affirmed, in the face of all correct exegesis, that the word "heaven" in the Bible designates ubiquity, and that the phrase "at the right hand of God" is not figurative but literal. But recently zealous Lutheran theologians have dissented from these views, and there is no doubt that the Bible doctrine of a heaven distinct from the earth will gradually win more general acceptance. If it is first established that Christ did not unite himself with a son of Mary, but became man, i. e. assumed in full the constitution of man (as the son of a king, to ransom his brother, becoming a servant in the enemy's country, assumes the character of a servant), we shall see that the true communicatio idiomatum does not consist in an exchange of properties, but simply in this, that both kinds of predicates and actions may be affirmed of the subject, such as pertain to him as the Son of God, and such as pertain to him as the Son of Man (just as in the preceding comparison it might be said: "The king's son suffered from cold and hunger," and "this servant is a prince"). Thus we may see that Christ's ascension to heaven does not designate a change in the reciprocal relation of both natures, but consists in this, that the natura hominum previously under bondage to death, but delivered from death and glorified, by Christ, has now entered, through Christ, as the first fruits, into those mansions which are adapted only to the glorified man, and that from thence he does not pervade the cosmos physically, but is organically, livingly, spiritually, omnipotently near and present with his Church.

DR. EBRARD.*

Hebrew Language.—1) The Hebrew language is the language of the Hebrews, the name given, according to Old Test. usage, to the Israelitish people, who of all the descendants of Abraham were destined to occupy the most prominent position (Gen. 14 : 13). The term expresses nothing more than that the Hebrews spoke this language, without intending that it was spoken by them exclusively. In the Old Test. this particular designation does not occur. As distinguished from the Egyptian it is called the "language of Canaan" (Is. 19 : 18), which implies that other inhabitants of the land, besides the Israelites, made use of it. It is also the "Jews' language" (Is. 36 : 13), to distinguish it from the Syrian. It is only in the writings of the later Jews, for instance the prologue to the book of Sirach, and then in the New Test., that it is called the Hebrew language.

2) As the Hebrew people was a small part of a great national family, so the Hebrew language was a small branch of a large linguistic stock, which has appropriately been designated the Semitic. Other names have been recently proposed, but as none of them have been generally received, and as this rests upon the grouping of nations in Gen. 10, we give it the preference.

To define the boundaries of the region occupied by the Semitic stock of nations, from the earliest periods of history, cannot be done, owing to the changes that were continually taking place, especially in the eastern and northern portions of the newly-inhabited countries. For our purpose, it will be sufficient to say that it was bounded on the north by the highlands of Armenia, on the east by the Arabian Gulf, on the south by the ocean, and on the west by the Red Sea, the Mediterranean, and Asia Minor. Within these limits, the Semitic nations developed themselves. As the starting point and theatre of their intellectual achievements, and of the part they took in the history of the race, the space they occupied was small; and yet, by its central position, its rivers reaching far into the interior, and furnishing easy communication with distant lands, and again by its adjacent deserts and oceans, protecting it against foreign invasion, it possessed great advantages, both for the exertion of its influence abroad, and the undisturbed development of its resources at home. They soon extended their conquests and colonies beyond these boundaries, carrying with them and retaining their language and customs for a long time. Still their condition in those foreign lands was not favorable to an independent civilization in the establishment of their faith, and a more perfect system of morals, and they failed accordingly in this direction. We have proof of this in the three great dispersals of the Semitic stock. (1) In the parts of Africa adjacent to Arabia we meet with Semitic languages, of which the Ethiopic has long been known to learned Europeans. That they were carried thither by emigrants from Arabia is testified by the resemblance of the inscriptions found in Axum to the Himjaritic; by historical records, and the physical features of the people of East Africa, who speak their language. As to the time and circumstances of their emigration, we have no knowledge. There was a Semitic population in Africa from the earliest periods. (2) Semitic merchants from Palestine and the neighboring countries spread themselves over the islands and coasts of the Mediterranean, and in great numbers over the northern parts of Africa, where their language was spoken for centuries. Arnobius, Augustine and others tell us, that in their day the peasantry in the vicinity of Carthage spoke a language similar to the Hebrew. The Semitic emigrants carried with them the culture of their native lands, which, as a fruitful germ, met with a genial soil here and there in Africa and Europe, but they failed to maintain an independent vigorous development of their intellectual resources, and when their political power was broken, they lost all influence, and were swallowed up by the surrounding nations. (3) The Arabs, after the time of Mohammed, subdued a large part of Asia, Africa and Europe. Under the banners of Abubekr, Omar and Othman, they extended their conquests and their religion from Spain and the western shores of Africa to the walls of China; and at the head of powerful states for centuries, it seemed as if they were destined to rule the world. This, however, was not the purpose of God. They failed to establish institutions of vital power in the countries they conquered, which were possessed of a superior culture, and they themselves, aside from their religion, to which they rigidly adhered, soon became the pupils of the people they had subdued, and frequently the faithful guardians of ancient science, but which, in their new relations, they knew not how to turn to account, in the way of improvement and more effective organization.

3) It is not then just the origin and germ of the peculiar culture and accomplishments of the Semitic nations, that we are to seek within these limits, but also their growth and advancement to that intellectual power, by which they were divinely called to achieve a world historical importance. Contracted as these limits were, as compared with the space occupied by other national races, it is still an interesting fact, that owing to the combined influence of their geographical position and climate, and of their various historical associations, the particular nationalities within those Semitic boundaries separated from one another, developed themselves according to their own laws, pursued different ends, and obtained greater or less significance. We know nothing of the Semitic stock historically in its simple unity. What we know is of the Semitic nations as distinguished from one another by their customs, their opinions and views, the measure of their civilization and language. Still, if we would speak of them as a whole, we would be justified in the admission, that in the background of the differences, which in the course of time sprung up amongst them, there was an original unity. This original unity, which a certain similarity of features compels us to admit, notwithstanding the diversity of their culture, rests upon the intellectual foundation of the Semitic stock, the particular endowments, which God in his goodness had bestowed upon them, for the purpose of enabling them to attain to a position of independence and significance in the history of the race. It is therefore necessary to be careful in conducting our inquiries in reference to the Semitic stock, as the recent discoveries in Arabia and the countries of the Euphrates and Tigris abundantly show. We accordingly limit ourselves to the narrower sphere, with which we are better acquainted, that of the people who were to surpass all other Semitic nations, and to impart to them the fruitful germ of their superior culture and requirements.

4) The most prominent among the people of the Caucasian race, are the Semitic and Indo-Germanic nation, or as we now prefer to call them the Arcanic. They develop themselves in various ways, aided by the influence of external conditions, but still more by their particular constitution and appointments, continually increasing in value, in their intellectual efforts. As satisfactory testimony to the peculiarities of the race, we need only call to mind a few controlling facts. Amongst the Arcans, we meet with the attempt, in the phenomena of life, to bring out the necessary and general, to elevate themselves to a calm and comprehensive consideration of things, to discover their correspondencies, and to separate the accidental and essential. The Arcanic nations, especially the Indian, Greek, and German are the bearers and promoters of philosophy. We meet with incipient movements in this direction, as in the book of Job and Ecclesiastes, but of philosophy properly so-called, they were ignorant. — The Arcans were possessed of thoroughly constructed mythological systems, the product of philosophical inquiry. Particular Semitic nations also had their deities, but precisely where the Semitic life was free from foreign influence, do we seek in vain for any trace of the activity and study which lead to the construction of any such systems. — The pure Semitic poetry is the Syrian. It is susceptible of emotions of admiration, or contempt, joy or sorrow, tenderness or terror, love or hate, quick and warm. With the Israelites, it disdains, as it were, the shackles of rhythm, and the rhyme of words, and expresses itself unfettered and free, in flowing euphony of thought, a faithful image of the feelings it inspires. The Arcanic nations, as may be supposed, have their lyric poetry, but they have other poetry also, to which the Semitic nations scarcely aspired: the Epic for instance, with its majestic repose, and objective manner of representation, in which the personality of the poet appears only in the back ground, and the drama, which requires the writer to enter into the feelings, the spirit, and conceptions of others, and to exhibit them as his own. — Music, the most immediate expression of excited feeling, belongs alike to the Semitic and Arcanic nations.

that it is distinguished as to form, by the far-reaching differences, which make their character respectively. That in other spheres of art, the drama, painting, and sculpture, the Semitic are not to be compared to the Arcanic nations, is evident from recent discoveries in the East, and we believe that a more thorough investigation would make this still more apparent. It would appear, if the comparison were carried further, that the same difference would present itself in the organization of the state, the construction of their morals, and the enactment of their laws.

It may, therefore, be safely asserted, that if their scientific and artistic achievements are to be the test of comparison, the precedence must be given to the Arcanic over the Semitic nations. History shows that the significance of the latter is not in that direction. It was their calling to maintain a sense of immediate dependence upon a higher power, cordially to acknowledge their responsibility in all their counsels and conduct, and to have faith in a kingdom of God, as a renovating power in the world, in which all men were to participate, and to which all human effects were to be subservient, whilst they pursued their own way, unable in science and art to satisfy their deepest wants. It was not given to the Semitic nations to comprehend phenomena in the mass, to organize and arrange them before the mind, as an independent all-pervading power, competent to distinguish the general from the particular, the essential from the contingent, and to ascertain the particular laws which govern them. They have as their dowry great susceptibility of feeling, and quickness of purpose. Impressions from without they readily receive, and yield to them influence without a thought. Conscious of dependence and restraint, they freely confess that in all they do, they are but instruments of a higher power working within them. With firm and strong will, they pursue the path, with the marking out of which, they very well know they had nothing to do, and with keen courage they strive for the end set before them, persuaded of their own inefficiency, and yielding themselves wholly to the power which controls them. To penetrate understandingly to the particular they were well able, calmly to consider and settle the particular in a larger connexion they were not competent. Thus endowed, the Semitics never distinguished themselves in the sphere for which the Arcans were specially fitted by their powers. They were, however, admirably qualified by their peculiarities to be the bearers and guardians of religious truth and endowments.

5) If now language, as little as thought itself, is no invention of man, it is still true that particular languages in their peculiar construction, faithfully represent the intellectual efforts of nations, conditioned by circumstances. If the original simplicity and mutual connection of the Semitic nations could be proved in no other way, the affinity and similarity of their languages would compel us to admit it. They are distinguished in the aggregate in their fundamental features from the Arcanic, just as they are by their intellectual activity. The

Arcanic languages are adapted to express, in an easy and convenient way, sober thought and reflection, and to comprehend cause and effect, by means of the comprehensive functions of their periods, and the free use of particles, in the use of which, they readily combine propositions, and bring prominently to view the more delicate relations of particular ideas. In the Semitic languages, on the contrary, ideas are arranged side by side without connection in particular statements, particular impressions are consecutively described, and particular assertions are made; synthesis and combination, they never attempt. In simple propositions, the subject and predicate are loosely placed aside of each other, and thus they have few particles and seldom use them. By the combination of independent words, the Arcanic languages are able to form new constructions, in order to express the correlative of several ideas, or the connection of one idea with another. The peculiarity of the Semitic languages does not consist in thus combining ideas, or corresponding independent words. If an approach to any thing of the kind occurs, it is in an exceptional way. The rule is to use each word for its own idea, and never to connect it with another in a new formation. The Arcanic languages designate in a number of similar conceptions, that which they have in common as derived from the same root, and define it strictly by means of prefixes, as impress, express, depress, suppress, &c. In the Semitic languages, the idea is expressed in the form in which it immediately presents itself to the mind, and thus there are a great many roots and radical forms, whilst the Arcanic languages have but few, and these are profusely employed in rich and regular combinations. In the Semitic languages, a particular law obtains in the construction of the roots themselves, to which all are subject, with the exception of such as lie at the ground of demonstrative words, pronouns, and smaller particles. Every root to which the verbal and nominal formations may be referred, is constructed upon the basis of three distinct sounds, or at least seeks to be conformed to them. An expansion to four or five sounds seldom occurs. And as the free combination of the three sounds in one root is but little limited by the nature of sounds or the law of euphony, it is then possible for the Semitic languages to have the large number of roots for which they are remarkable. In these languages respect has been had, as far as we know, to uniformity and symmetry from the first. The particular ground tone which contributes to the expansion of the root to precisely three fixed sounds, we cannot further explain. —The fixed sounds of the root receive a different vocal expression in the particular words, for whose formation, the root furnishes the basis. The formation of words by a mere vocal change in the fixed sounds is regular and complete, and if the formation by new suffixes to the root is met with from the beginning, it is only in the later constructions, that it spreads itself out. But that this does not lead to the combination of independent words, as in the Arcanic languages, we have already remarked. We have thus sought for the sake of brevity and conveni-

ance to ascertain the peculiarities of the Semitic languages in the way of contrast with the Arcanic. A more extended investigation would lead to the attempt to define the relation of the Semitic linguistic stock to other linguistic families within the reach of scientific inquiry, in which the question would come up, whether there was not a closer connection between the Semitic and Coptic on the one side and the Arcanic on the other.

6) Within the limits we assigned to the Semitic race, as its proper home, conditioned by the influences of climate and country, as well as by historical associations connected with the culture of the people, various languages were formed. Different as they may be, they all rest upon a common ante-historical basis, and have the same general impression. Although some of them, such, for instance, as that of Southern Arabia, and Northern Mesopotamia have only begun to be known to us, we may still venture to hope, that the whole region of the Semitic languages will soon be explored, and that we will be able more accurately to define its peculiar formations, than we can do now. In our attempt to ascertain the position of the Hebrew in the sphere of the cognate languages, we have respect only to such, whose formation, method, and history are presented to view in a more extended literature.

In the northern sections of the Semitic region, in Syria and Mesopotamia, and Babylonia, there were nations, whose history, owing to the various changes of their political state, and the oppression of their conquerors of another stock and foreign culture, was frequently disturbed. They were not allowed to develop according to their original laws. The sudden changes in their civil and social state, as their history shows, in connection with the influence of a foreign language and culture produced a rapid decline and impoverishment in their language. In the earliest times, the Aramaic language lost already many of its finer elements and articulations, that fulness of expression by a change of vowels, and copiousness of words; in fine, much of that which other Semitic languages retained. We have large collections in the Aramaic language, for about five hundred years before Christ, and in these it appears already as the poorest and least cultivated of the Semitic stock. From that time onward, we can trace its history, showing throughout a state of gradual deterioration and decline, justifying the opinion that the Aramaic branch has all along proceeded upon the same downward course it has done for more than 200 years, the period we have known it.

The languages of Central Arabia have a different fate. Among the inhabitants of the deserts, especially the nomadic tribes of the interior, who never were under a foreign yoke, and retained their old customs and institutions with wonderful tenacity, there was very little possibility of any change of language, by the surrender of their traditions. It is precisely in those regions, where the uniformity of the natural relation, and the corresponding pursuits are preserved and handed down from one generation to another, that any activity leading to a change of languages is least likely to be introduced, whilst the reverse is the case, whenever nature lavishly presents in great profusion whatever man wants, and when permanent employment, and the more substantial forms of life are not required. Thus the deserts of Arabia in this respect are the very opposite of the tropical countries of America, where incredibly rapid changes are made in the languages of the people, and the child and the grandfather often speak a different tongue. We are acquainted with the language of Central Arabia from the 6th century, before Christ; and it comes before us with such a profusion of imagery, such a wealth of words and perfection of grammatic material, as may be looked for in vain in no other Semitic language. We can show that the language of Arabic writings, and if we are to believe reports, the vernacular of the people in their families, from the 6th cent. down, has undergone but little change; and from this we may infer, that from the very first, in ante-historical times, it retained its own with remarkable tenacity. For we cannot regard its peculiar wealth and present perfection as a modern acquisition, incidentally made in the way of subsequent progress; but as an ancient inheritance from the common home of the Semitic languages. This view of the relation of the Arabic language to the other branches of the Semitic family, agrees too with the results of modern investigations, which show that in other spheres the same analogies and arguments hold good. From this, it by no means follows, that in particular cases, independent formations may not be produced from existing germs, still this must be the less frequently expected, the more a language is withdrawn from the range of transforming influences.

As the Hebrew, as to territory, occupies an intermediate position between the Aramaic and the Central Arabic languages, so is it also the case in reference to its construction. On the one hand, it does not possess the wealth of expression, the more refined ornaments of diversified formations, the more perfect vocal utterances, and the exuberance of terminations, which belong to the Central Arabic, and it approaches, especially by its less pliant vocal expressions, and by the consequent limitation of its internal formations, more to the Aramaic; and on the other hand it is possessed of a fulness which the Aramaic, in its rapid polishing-off-process, has lost. — The Nabatic language occupies an intermediate grade between the Hebrew and the Central Arabic languages (comp. Tuch, Sinaitische Inschriften, Bd. III., S. 129, &c.). The Phœnician is a mediation of the Hebrew and Aramaic, if we may rely upon some few pretty sure indications, although it must be admitted that all that we know of it is from memorials of a very recent date. At the same time the inscription from Sidon, as early perhaps as 700 years before Christ, which has fortunately been discovered in our day, gives to the language pretty distinctly an Aramaic coloring.

The Hebrew language, if we have respect to the period of our first acquaintance with it, is the oldest of the Semitic family. We have it in writings, some of which, according to the recorded chronology, date as far back as 1500 years before Christ. This does not justify Renan (histoire générale, &c., i, s. 97) in his division of the history of the Semitic languages into three periods, in the sense of three ages, or consecutive periods of the evolution of one and the same language, the Hebrew, the Aramaic, and the Semitic. With all his limitations, depriving the division of significance, it is altogether arbitrary. It is simply a fact, that the Hebrew, Aramaic, and Central Arabic did not become different languages consecutively, they became so incidentally by a simultaneous development in the countries in which they have their home. The antiquity of literature is not the antiquity at the same time of its language.

Nor does it follow from the high antiquity of the Hebrew literature, that the language must originally have been of the Semitic form. We would only be warranted in such an inference by the development of kindred languages under the same conditions, and everywhere in the same regular way. But this is not the case. As certainly as the Aramaic deteriorated more rapidly than the Hebrew, as certainly as the Hebrew, in many respects, resembles the Aramaic, and in the course of its history, as we have it in the books of the Old Testament, becomes more like it, so certain is it, that the Arabic retains its inherited wealth and original copiousness; and if the Arabic literature, as compared with the Hebrew, is recent, we must still acknowledge that in the Arabic, we have the most perfect type of the Semitic, which in the end lies equally at the basis of all the Semitic languages.

Thus, upon the broad ground of general considerations, connected with the history of language, we have come to the conclusion, that the Hebrew, in those earlier times to which its literature extends, fell off from a previously existing grade of improvement. This is proven by grammatical phenomena in the language itself. It may be shown that formations which were frequent and familiar in the oldest writings, only occur in later times as antiquated, and have almost disappeared from the sphere of modern improvements (see Ewald, Lehrbuch).

The representations of earlier scholars as to the antiquity of the Hebrew language rest upon hypotheses, for which the genesis in the names of the patriarchs from Adam down, for instance, in God's discourse to Adam, presents apparent ground. For a long time it was not doubted that the Hebrew was the original language, coeval with the beginning of the race, and it was supposed the traces and remains of it were discoverable in all languages subsequently. — (Comp. Steph. Morini, Bode, &c.).

The process of the evolution of the Hebrew language in the time of Moses is unknown to us. As the Israelites first came with Abram to Palestine from the northern country of the Euphrates and Tigris, it was thought that the Hebrew was brought with them by the emigrant posterity of Terah. At variance with this, we have the separation of the Aramaic and Hebrew, which took place, as is supposed, before the time of the patriarchs (Gen. 31 : 47). And if the Hebrew, as a perfect language, had been introduced into the southern countries, at the first settlement of the Terahites, we might expect certainly to meet with a language closely resembling it among the Terahite Arabians, who, according to all tradition, were the posterity of Abraham. — The Terahites, as they settled in Palestine and the adjacent countries, and subdued the aboriginals, could either have adopted their language, or modified their own. In such case, the more definite principles of the Hebrew would be found in the primitive languages of Palestine, which, in like manner, would have served as the immediate basis of the language of the Israelites and of the Canaanites and the Phœnicians from other lands. Such and similar conjectures present themselves to view, and if we pursue them further, we meet with one difficulty after another. We can only say, that as the Israelites from the first, long before the time of Moses, separated themselves from the mass of the affiliated tribes, so must we also seek the more definite beginning of the Hebrew language before his day.

7) As the proper names of the Moabites, Ammonites and Edomites, according to their construction, belong, without exception, to the sphere of the Hebrew language, it must be admitted that it was spoken beyond the limits of Palestine. The independence of the people, and of the races in those regions, their different customs and modes of living, render it probable that their language was not everywhere the same. Traces of a different dialect are actually met with (Jud. 12 : 6, &c.). By frequent intercourse with the people of Syrian countries, the Aramaic influence was felt earlier in the northern parts of the land than in the southern. Whether further investigations would show that the Phœnician language in essential points was a different dialect in the northern parts of Palestine, remains to be seen. It may be that the fortunate discovery of some ancient monuments may throw light upon this question. In Neh. 13 : 23, 24, the language of Ashdod, the Philistian, is distinguished from that of the Jews in a way that points to a more thorough separation than any trifling difference of dialect would effect. We are reminded too of the difference of dialect in Galilee and Jerusalem, at the time of Christ (Matt. 26 : 73).

8) The formative process of the Hebrew language, until it became the language of Scripture, we are unable, as may be seen from the foregoing, to point out. From this time forward, we have it in the writings of the Old Testament, covering a space from first to last of about 1200 years. During this long period the language was not unchanged, and as we have writings, if not of all, yet of many of these centuries, we may venture to hope, that the process of change may be clearly traced. Still the attempt to do it is attended with so many difficulties, that we can never be certain of the results. We mention the following: of the rich and extensive Hebrew literature, we have, as appears from statements in the Bible, and other reliable indications, nothing more than fragments, in which there is no such completeness of linguistic material for any period of time, as would show was really the state of the language. It is accordingly dangerous, that in estimating the process of development, we adduce peculiarities which belonged rather to the personality of the writer, or to the method or content of his writings. 2) We are obliged first to the antiquity of many of the books and portions of the Old Test. by investigations which do not always lead to satisfactory results, so that we are not able always to arrange the linguistic material of the Old Test. according to a strict chronological order. Independently of this, the limited groundwork of linguistic material is still more reduced. 3) It is certain that older sections have passed through the hands of modern writers, and as little as they, for instance, in their historical works, in avail themselves of more ancient sources, have reiterated their peculiar features, so have they as little avoided every change which the language of their day suggested. Proof of this we have in the comparison of parallel passages in the books of the Kings and Chronicles. The history of the Israelites during the long period, from the time of Moses until the 7th century, does not warrant us in expecting rapid decided changes in their language. During this period, they were not often for any length of time under a foreign yoke, and in their permanent relations, they were connected with a people, who either spoke the Hebrew, or a kindred language. The changes which take place in a peaceful process of development, are in themselves often hard to be pointed out, and can be readily obliterated, not just by revising them, but also by keeping and copying them. In gradual developments, the most frequent changes take place in the softest sounds, the vowels; but it is precisely in the vocal pronunciations of different centuries, that with few exceptions, we have the most difficulty. We are thus admonished on all sides to be careful in attempting to point out the peculiar linguistic features of a particular age. Since about the end of the 7th cent. the Aramaic language had a clear, decided, and transforming influence upon the Hebrew, and we accordingly distinguish two periods in its history—the first including about 600 years. We think that we can see a difference between the language of the time of Moses, or to speak more accurately, the language of the Pentateuch, and that of the other books, and that the antiquated character of the first is very evident. In a grammatical respect, we constantly refer to the use of the pronoun אני for the feminine אני, but which also recurs 11 times in the Pentateuch, also אני (for אני) which is only found in the Pentateuch, and imitated in Chronicles; and yet we cannot avoid the admission that these indications, peculiar to the Pentateuch, do not warrant us in assigning to the language an antiquated character, inasmuch as it cannot everywhere be shown that they are archaisms. We refer also to several antiquated forms as we call them, enumerated in Keil's Introd. to the Old Test., p. 40. It would not, however, be difficult in any given number of books of the Old

Test. of equal space with the Pentateuch, to point out as many strange forms, which with equal right might be regarded as antiquated. We are reminded, too, of words, in verbal forms, which either occur only in the Pentateuch, or otherwise quite alone, and do not consider that the Pentateuch constitutes the fourth part of the Bible, and that in each of the other three parts, many words are met with that seldom or never occur elsewhere, and that the Pentateuch, in particular sections, speaks of relations and things, that are never mentioned in the other books. In those words then that are peculiar to the Pentateuch, there are not a great number of grammatical formations which clearly indicate the antiquity of the language. It is certain that there are sections in the Pentateuch which, in respect to language, differ from other parts of it, and from other books, and that these differences, according to our view, belong far more to the sphere of representation and the old method of literary performances, than to a pure grammatical or lexical linguistic development. Differences of the same kind appear more distinctly in the literary performances in the time of the kings. The language of simple narration and history limits itself to the forms necessary for common purposes. The poets avail themselves of more extended constructions, and of necessity employ richer material. The Hebrew poets particularly availed themselves of a parallelism of members, seldom of ideas and words, of which many are met with nowhere else in the writings of the Bible. This apparently strange material we meet with in kindred languages, and most frequently in the Aramaic, not necessarily as the result of the influence of the Aramaic in the Hebrew; but it is explained by the fact that the poets also availed themselves of such a command of their language, as is only to be realized in the voluminous literature of a people of a kindred language, and not in the narrow range of the books of the Bible. The rhetorical language of the prophets moves in a more free rhythm of thought, and in longer sentences than the poets, but in other respects, especially in its palmy state, falls in very much with it. Thus for each particular branch of literature, there is a particular range of language; within which the personality of the writer has room for exhibition. Notwithstanding these differences, the laws of language for the most part, as to form and conditions, remained unchanged until the 7th century.—The second period is from 611 forward. From the time of the Assyrians, the Aramaic made greater inroads upon the Hebrew. In the days of Hezekiah, his minister understood it as a foreign language, whilst the people of Jerusalem were ignorant of it, Is. 36. In the northern parts of Palestine subject to the Assyrians from the year 720, after the power of the Israelites had been broken by long wars and captivity, the Aramaic, owing to the influence of foreign authority, and foreign colonists, spread rapidly. In the south it forced its way in particular expressions after the termination of the 7th century, as may be seen in the writings of Jeremiah. We meet with the Hebrew in its ancient purity and strength, notwithstanding ing the inroads of the Aramaic in the language of the people, in the writings of authors at the end of the captivity. After their return from captivity, the congregation at Jerusalem had a poor existence, and was in danger of losing its distinctive character, and then it was that the Aramaic forced itself in, and became the language of the Persian court and of the neighboring people. In restoring the ancient customs and peculiarities, Ezra and Nehemiah took care that the Hebrew, in its ancient form, should be made more familiar to the people (Neh. 8 : 8); they both wrote in Hebrew, and Nehemiah was desirous that it should be pure (13 : 23, &c.). Among the more strict Jews, the Hebrew was still retained, although within narrow limits, as appears from Daniel and the legends of the Maccabean princes. Still the introduction of the Aramaic was not to be repressed; and if the ancient language was occasionally imitated, there was always a considerable admixture of the foreign idiom, as is apparent in Ecclesiastes and some of the Psalms. From the second century on, the Hebrew was only known to the learned, whilst the Aramaic became the vernacular.

9. After the Hebrew ceased to be the language of the people, it did not just at once lose its vitality. As it was read in the Bible in the synagogues, so it was known by the people at large, as well as by the learned. Thus it is evident, also, that the learned in those days, when there was occasion for anything to be done by writing, were glad to avail themselves of the Hebrew, intelligible to those of their own faith, as they had become familiar with it in the synagogues; and the more living their traditional knowledge, the less were they limited to a mere imitation of the ancient Hebrew. In the Mishna, which was written about 200 years after Christ, and in the Jewish writings of a later period, we meet with Hebrew, to which an independent development is not to be denied, and that certainly has proceeded on a path marked out by Hebrews of far earlier times. Quite of another character is the language of those learned Jews who, since the 2d century, have availed themselves of the Hebrew in their writings. It is without an independent development according to its proper laws, the pure product of learned exertion. In many respects it is a true image of the old Hebrew, but at the same time, it has a great many new words, artistic expressions, and many particles borrowed partly from the Aramaic, and partly from the dialects of the countries in which they were written. Thus the language we are accustomed to call Hebrew is made up of different elements not transformed and purified so as to form an entirely new whole. BERTHEAU.—Dr. Wolff.

Hebrew Poetry.—That we may the more conveniently survey this rich and attractive, and in a critical and æsthetic point of view, by no means elaborated material, we propose to present the notices, which our limited space permits us to take of it, in three aspects, the national, biblical, and technical. The first two have to do with the contents, character, and history of the poetry of the Hebrews, the last with its form. We thus separate them, for the reason that we are concerned with a science yet incomplete, the imperfections of which may be ascertained before they can be corrected.

1. With the Hebrews, as with all other people, poetry was cultivated before prose. Men give utterance to their feelings before they collect their ideas; and they frequently sing without having learned to write. Poetry seems to have been practised by the Hebrews from the earliest periods of their history. It was, however, precisely of such a character as was to be expected of a people whose primitive social condition was not far removed from nature, and yet in perpetual conflict with it—a people but little inclined to labor, who delighted in the dangers of war, and depended for their security and enjoyments, upon personal prowess more than upon law and order; whilst, on the other hand, they were in a state of gradual preparation for a higher civilization by religious instruction and patriotism, and by a national consciousness based upon both, and handed down by sacred traditions. The shepherd celebrated his love and the warrior his triumphs with music and song. Brief verses, rehearsed at the yearly festivals, commemorated great events, such as the slaying of Goliath by David, and of the Philistine host by Sampson. Battles and victories were described in longer poems, such as the song of Deborah, the crown of the patriotic poetry of Israel, and the most ancient ode that has come down to us entire. The people clothed their homely sense in rhythmical sayings and familiar maxims, expressive of a shrewd and sound judgment. Everything calculated to excite the multitude was expressed in song. It enlivened their festivals and was heard in mournful melody upon personal occasions. Young men and maidens emulated each other in beautiful odes at the village gathering and in the family circle. The daughters of Sion came out yearly to dance and sing at the vintage, and the virgins of Gilead, with sad symphonies, commemorated the tragic history of Jephtha's daughter. The discovery of a fountain was celebrated with joy and gladness, and by its still waters the herdsmen and hunters composed themselves to rest at the close of the day, with singing and the sound of the flute. The spirit of poetry was found even in the lowest walks of life, and was perverted to the basest purposes (Is. 23 : 15). The whole history, indeed, of Israel, as it lies before us in the obscure traditions of the heroic age, and as exhibited in the pastoral pictures of the patriarchal state, reveals a wonderful wealth of poetic sentiment and expression, of which, owing to unfavorable circumstances and the want of judgment on the part of well-meaning, but unpoetic persons, much has been lost, and still more defaced by the dust and daubing of modern scholiasts and scholastics. We must also mention that their religious exercises and worship was always conducted with singing and instrumental performances (2 Sam. 6 : 12; Ps. 68 : 25). The art of poetry was taught in their schools; and the sage philosopher, the sacred orator, and the prophet, not only used a more elevated language, but, as was universal in ancient times, were poets in word and spirit, raised by inspiraion above the world and its vanities. Thus enough has been said to show, that a history of Hebrew literature is as yet a desideratum, and that if attempted would have many and beautiful things to say of popular and national poetry.

The attempt has often been made to characterize Hebrew poetry according to its peculiarities. This already must even be so far uncertain, from the reason, that we have but a single species as a satisfactory standard, and the judgment can never be general. Still less would there be a probability of success in the use of categories of modern or classic poetry, or in resorting to doubtful indications, or remarkable expressions. This was the mistake of Bishop Lowth, in his otherwise profound and accurate work, "de sacra poesi Ebraeorum."

On the other hand, Herder (Spirit of Hebrew Poetry, 1782) prudently avoided theorizing, and sought to unlock the sanctuary to the feelings of the reader; in which, of course, he also failed, when there was no feeling, as has been the case with prominent divines of the present day. If we would have the elements of a general æsthetic criticism, without regard to contents, as is now proposed, we would say at once that Hebrew poetry partakes of the leading features of the West-Asiatic type, conditioned by Semitic culture. 1) It is essentially subjective, inasmuch as the individuality of the poet always appears, giving expression to his own peculiar feelings, views, and wishes, and to nothing external, in the sphere of nature or humanity, as valuable of itself. The Hebrews, accordingly, had neither epic nor dramatic poetry. In these the personality of the poet disappears, and he presents himself as a different individual without, however, divesting himself of his peculiarities. 2) Hebrew poetry (Semitic) is sententious. By this we mean, that the several thoughts are so connected that they would admit of a different arrangement, of increase or diminution, without impairing the symmetry of the whole. Each stanza, each couplet, is complete of itself, and no transposition would affect either the sense or the impression. When the poem opens with even a rhetorical fulness of introductory ideas, it often happens that there are no concluding thoughts to compare and satisfy the mind and ear. Thus the co-operation of the judgment is neutralized by the dominion of the feelings. 3) Hebrew poetry is also more sensuous than that of the Occident; even more than of the romantic. First of all, we are reminded of its proverbial wealth of imagery, not just in the way of illustrations, but also of metaphors, which substitutes the image for the object to be described, and unwittingly lengthens it into allegory. Owing to their secluded life and want of literary culture, the people had few opportunities of rising superior to their natural habits. Their images were accordingly taken more freely and frequently from a sphere, for which the classically educated, those of a higher social position, had no taste, to which they gave attention only for conventional reasons. Just think of images from the animal world playing a part in the name of humanity, and in the idyllic poetry of family life. With this was also connected a great desire for the symbolic, which gives to the abstract idea a concrete form, and a predilection for prosopopoeia, which personifies ideas, and invests even inanimate objects with thoughts and feelings, and speech. Thus the poetry of the Hebrews was so much the ground form of their higher thinking, that it gave coloring to their historical writings, and affected their philosophical speculations; and for this reason too the systematizing logical work of the divine, Jewish and Christian, the most unpoetical that can be thought of, was often so sadly at fault, and corrected itself with so much difficulty. From the same elements arise also those anthropomorphisms, for us frequently so offensive, but which connect themselves so inwardly with the religious views of the Hebrews.

To adduce instances of this would be superfluous, as it is presumed that our readers have more than a superficial acquaintance with the Old Test. and Hermeneutica, and authors able to appreciate poetry in general. For the same reason, it is not necessary to enumerate the various ancient Hebrew poetical writings, of which traces are still extant. It is not our purpose to write a full history of literature, but simply to direct attention to a particular point, with a view to more substantial and extended studies. Modern writers, as well as Lowth and Herder, have given their attention to Hebrew poetry, less as connected with the state of general culture than with its biblical aspect, to which we now pass over.

II. The Bible of late has been termed improperly a code of Hebrew national literature. This is certainly true as to its contents. As to its object and plan, however, it is a manual of doctrine for the religious education of the nation, and for this purpose, in an eclectic way, it takes up a part of the existing national literature, elaborates it, and keeps it from being lost. In this particular collection, there is much that is properly poetical; but it will at once be admitted, that to serve its end, it must be religious poetry—a species of which we are able to speak more intelligently; but whose peculiarities and advantages, as belonging to the poetic national literature of the Israelites, we should cautiously consider. In the meanwhile, we ought to know what is meant by "religious poetry." It is not all the poetry of the Old Test. which may thus be defined. We will here say nothing of the "Song of Solomon," which can only, by a forced allegorical interpretation, have any religious character, and that only in this way was admitted into the collection. At the same time we must not forget, that a good deal of poetry has been woven into the historical narratives, which, so far as its immediate object is concerned, cannot be regarded as religiously instructive, although in sense and spirit it must be supposed to flow from a religious source, and to give evidence of, and encouragement to, a religious faith. The term, accordingly, must be understood in a larger sense. The Jewish doctors counted but three poetic books: Job, the Psalms, and Proverbs. But with equal right must Solomon's Song and Lamentations be classed amongst them. Besides, we must not omit those beautiful poems (Gen. 49; Exodus 15; Deut. 32: 33; Judges 5; 2 Sam. 1; Is. 38: 10, &c.), and the scattered Psalms, and smaller pieces of which we have already spoken. What is still more important, many parts of the prophetic writings, as to form and sentiments, belong to poetic literature, the limits of which, in both respects, it is hard to define. With equal propriety, perhaps with more, upon the ground of a literary-æsthetic judgment, the prophets of the Old Test. may just as well be numbered amongst the poets, as the writers of all the books of the Old Test. were reckoned amongst the prophets by the older divines; some, it is true, with more reason than others, but more altogether without right. Still, we will adhere to the old custom, and keep the spheres apart, so that we may apply to neither a false or insufficient standard.

If now the Hebrew poetry still extant, on account of its great antiquity, must be regarded as quite considerable, it will be found, owing to our present state of knowledge, not so easy a matter to introduce order into it, either as to its epochs or its authors. Every one knows that, upon these points, there is great diversity of opinion. Whether any discussion would bring it to a close is very doubtful. The apparently simple literary historical questions are undeniably connected with others of theological interest—for many exclusively so—and thus it is evident that a perfect agreement upon essential points is scarcely attainable.

For this reason we prefer to consider our subject from a theoretical point of view, and to attempt a classification of the existing poetic literature of the Hebrews, for the purpose of a more careful examination of it. Passing by all that has been taught us by modern æsthetics, we maintain that in the consciousness of the Israelites, and aside from their proper prophetic discourses, all their poetry may be arranged under two classes or categories, the lyric and didactic. Etymologically taken, these two names are not opposed to each other, although in popular speech they are so regarded. The first signifies a Psalm, an air, the singing itself. Poetry and music originally were everywhere closely connected. Lyric poetry was the more ancient, the more prevalent, and frequently the only kind cultivated. Concerning the manner of their connection there is with the Hebrews but little, or more correctly, nothing to be said; and the intimations given in the heading of the Psalms, are for us to this day unintelligible. Additional subdivisions of lyric poetry, according to their sources, can only be admitted as far as the Lexicon, in connection with the corresponding contents, furnishes us with information. This, however, is only in an exceptional way the case, and the inscriptions themselves do not appear to have been made according to an established plan. All that we can do then is to arrange what we have according to its contents, and the prevailing definitions. In addition to the proper religious Psalms, we then also could have national, patriotic, and warlike songs, dirges, individual and general, love songs, and hymns of praise and thanksgiving, of numberless grades, hopeful and encouraging. Even in our Psalm books we find examples of almost all these rubrics; and it would be difficult, without becoming vague and obscure, to extend the characteristics. On the one side, especially in the Psalms, the lyric itself often passes over into a didactic method, simple and dull; and in the other, as in Job, the didactic narrative is raised to the highest pitch of lyrical effusion. In historical Psalms sometimes, the song of Deborah for instance, we are almost led to think it was a prelude to an epic. We therefore can scarcely blame those critics, who discountenance the distinction between the didactic and the lyric, whilst others have lost themselves in hair-splitting rubrications. In the 19th Psalm both elements, as to language, spirit and versification, are found in such immediate contact, that some have thought of dividing them into two distinct and different parts. We may safely affirm that in the lyric the individual feeling predominates, overpowering its objects, seeking the beautiful and the good in its contents, lending to it its vesture, imparting to it life and motion, or enjoying itself in the natural, realizing and graphic expression. Thus understood, the Hebrew lyric, few as may be the points of affinity between it and others, may far surpass the most of the species which antiquity has left to us, in inwardness, depth, and power, only that what we call grace is less immaterial in Semitic literature.

To characterize the second principal division upon the ground of technical distinction, is more difficult. The root שׁוּב expresses the idea of a comparison: שׁוּב is then a parable; and if, in addition to this, we now add that, by comparing two apparently different things, for instance, things from the natural and the moral world, we may derive from it an instructive thought, and remember too that the Orient ever had an aptitude for such sort of instruction, it will lead us to conclude that originally it was known by that name, but that later it obtained a more general application, derived from the end in view. However this may have been, it represents the following classes: a) the fable of which we have two examples (Judges 9: 7; 2 Kings 14: 9, &c.), although they are not brought out in poetic form. b) The parable (2 Sam. 12: 1), which also includes the allegory, and is expressly called שׁוּב (Ezek. 17: 2). c) The apothegm, moral saying and proverb, three classes combined, for the reason, that according to the genius of the Hebrew people, they are not really different, and in the various collections of proverbs which have come down to us, as in Solomon's, they are intermingled. In most cases actual comparisons are made in such way as to present in parallel propositions, a maxim of morality or wisdom, a fact of expressions, with or without a judgment in frequent brevity, and often in witty combinations affecting the spirit, in such way, indeed, that the subsidiary thought precedes, and the idea principally intended, comes after. How strictly this definition applies to the proverb (see 1 Sam. 10: 12; Ezek. 18: 2). d) The iddle which rests essentially upon comparisons, and together with the allegory, so far as it presents a difficulty to be solved, is called חֵדָּה (Judges 14: 12). e) The satire (Is. 14: 4; Job. 2: 6), which, in the expression of strong national feeling, derives its pungency chiefly from comparison. Hence the phrase to become חֵדָּה, sometimes translated proverb, and also witty saying. f) The proper didactic poem, which, in musical strains, treats of religious and moral duties, the dealings of Providence, the relations of human actions to divine judgments, &c. Here may be mentioned many of the Psalms (comp. 78: 2; 49: 5), the first part of the book of Proverbs, and by extending the idea, the book of Job 27: 1; which, according to its name, may be called an epic, in reference to its form or dialogue, and, so far as specific merit is concerned, it rivals the most beautiful productions of Hebrew poetry. Finally, so far as prophecy serves the purpose of instruction it is also called חֵדָּה (Numb. 23: 24), and so far as instruction attains its end, by speculative reflection, it is called חֵדָּה, a word of counsel, or dark saying (Prov. 1: 6; Ps. 78: 2, &c. comp. generally: C. Aurivillius, de poesi bibl. Diss., p. 74, &c. Ravius, de poeseos hebr. præstantia, 1800. Meyer, Hermen. des A., T. II., 13, &c. P. Sarchi, Essay on Hebrew Poetry, London, 1824. B. F. Gultenstein, Poet. Literatur der Israeliten, 1835.

III. That the language of all poetry is peculiar, and different from the ordinary forms of speech, lies in the idea of it. This peculiarity is frequently found in the choice of expressions, which popular language avoids, but with which poetry adorns itself, and seeks to preserve and increase in all their profusion. Thus we find with the Hebrew poets a list of words which the Old Test. prose writers never employ. That they are proper is shown by their use in other Semitic dialects, and their adoption is also indicated by their etymology. Still more is the language of poetry distinguished by its artistic structure, as governed by particular rules. This technic of poetry, if it is not to be merely mechanical, must take its rules from the nature of its object on the one side, and from the ear and music on the other. That Hebrew poetry is subject to this natural condition is a matter of course; but as the means by which this is effected are various, the question arises, which are those made use of by the Old Test. poets.

For the most part, the form of poetry which we call rhyme, and which in modern literature is most prevalent, affects the eye and the ear. As to the means of producing rhyme, the Hebrew language is by no means deficient, as modern Jewish poetry sufficiently shows. It is not met with in the Old Test., and the attempt to discover it (Clericus, on Exodus 2: 15) was a failure. The supposed instances (Ps. 8: 5; Is. 3: 22), we unhesitatingly say, are nothing more than natural modes of expression, still more frequent in Latin. Hebrew poetry is familiar with the assonance, and loves the incidental. The assonance is also a rhyme, but it need not appear at the end of the line; nor is it accidental that Ps. 124 is divided according to accent, affecting the ear pleasantly, and that in Lament. 5, the same sound recurs 40 times in 22 verses. This, however, happens but seldom. It is no law of poetry; still less so alliteration—that is, the beginning of words with letters of the same sound. This is more appropriate to popular poetry in proverbs and pithy sayings, than to artistic poetry. Numerous examples occur in Isaiah, in solitary texts (5: 7; 21, 2, &c.). As a rule, never, as in the ancient German.

In the second plan, the division of the text into equal members, shorter or longer, is often seen. The first we call verses, the second strophes. Verses, not in the modern, but in the Old Testament sense, are, properly speaking, separate and independent parts of speech. This is more the case, as it is a prominent characteristic of Hebrew poetry to arrange itself in such short disconnected verses. That the masoretic division often interferes with this, is saying nothing. They generally consist of two lines, sometimes of three; and the parts, as well as the verses, may be of equal length, although the sentiment and the music may both require and justify diversity. A strophe may be made up of several verses. In the construction of a strophe, homogeneousness is required, both as to form and the number of verses. When this does not exist, it is doubtful whether there is any proper division into strophes. It is customary, however, in our day, to find strophes everywhere, and to seek, not only a psychological but a theological motive, for every purely arbitrary exhibition of singularity. Externally the strophe is simply marked by the refrain, or the repetition of the concluding verse (Ps. 42; 43; 57; Is. 9: 7, &c.; Amos 1; 2), or by the alphabetical beginning (which, however, is frequently mere play), or the alphabetical order is repeated either within the verse, or the strophe (Ps. 111; 112). Inwardly the strophe rounds itself off with the thought, and by means of the mutual reference of the particular parts of the poem (for instance, Ps. 2; 68; 104; 114; Exod. 15, &c.).—(Comp. Köster, in den Studien, 1831, 1. Wocher, in der Tübing. Quartalschr. 1834, p. 613, &c.).

Closely allied to the verse, in the third place, is parallelism, that is, the regular placing aside of each other of symmetrically constructed propositions, or rather the parallelism consists in the peculiar nature of Hebrew poetry. The symmetry, however, is not so much external as ideal. It lies essentially in the relation of the expression to the thought, so that the last, variously applied, furnishes additional material for versification. Either the same thought is repeated several times in other words, or it is apprehended antithetically from opposite sides. Either each line constitutes a perfect whole, corresponding in all respects with the subject of the parallel lines, or the reduplication relates only to one or two elements of the subject, whilst the others are divided upon the two lines without parallel. Again, the parallelism is extended to two or three lines of the verse. In the last case, either three times synonymously, as in Ps. 1 : 1, or only twice, and these completing the thought with an introductory, or concluding line. It can, however, include four members, if the repetition be simple and four-fold, although this is seldom the case, and by carrying it too far, it becomes tedious; or it may be, as is more frequent, by connecting the lines two and two, a b and c d, or more elegantly a c—b d (Ps. 33 : 13). Antithetic parallelism is seldom met with, and for the most part consists of two members, sometimes of four and intricate (Sol. Song 1 : 5). All these, otherwise infinitely diversified forms, are interchanged in most poems, and this interchange itself contributes to the gradation of poetic language even to a rhetorical elevation, or at least not very far from it. Still there are pieces in which there is the strictest adherence to rule, and in which, for this reason, the strophic plan is decidedly prominent. To these belong some of the elegies of Jeremiah, and many of the later Psalms.—(Comp. generally, Kaiser, de parall. in poesi heb. natura, 1839).

From all that has been said, we are still far from the principal thing, in classic, modern, and other Semitic literature in a technical respect, from a proper measuring of the long and short, and the connection of the same according to definite rules. A poem, without respect to this, is a contradiction in terms. The attempt accordingly has been made to discover a metre in the Old Test. poetry, and the more so, for the reason that Josephus, and after him Jerome, has assured us, that the Hebrews actually practised, and wrote their poems in hexameter, pentameter, &c. Every such attempt, however, has thus far failed. Nevertheless we are persuaded that something more than mere parallelism belongs to Hebrew poetry, and something of the strophic order. The latter has no significance, the first no grace, without a certain sort of music, without which poetry is inconceivable. But this music we call rhyme, the pleasing application of the natural laws of sound, which, when properly managed, has a much finer effect than the most formally correct and mechanically conducted syllabic enumeration, as the comparison of each unmetrical, rhymeless, but beautifully cadenced dithrambic, with the next best French Alexandrines will show. That such a rhyme was attempted in Hebrew poetry, and is yet to be found, is evident from this, that poetic language occasionally prefers certain peculiar forms (particular endings) which require a removal of the accent, and a change of the tone in suffixes, and breathing points. Here and there grammatical singularities, which we ascribe to the punctuators, or a peculiar accentuation, may be simply explained upon rythmical principles, and may rest, we need not say upon pedantic tradition, but upon a proper understanding of the thing (comp. the first line of the first speech of Job, &c.). To go beyond the general here, is, however, very uncertain. Rhyme is, so to say, the breath, or pulsation of language, and can only be perceived, as long as it lives and proceeds from the mouth of a good reader. We cannot believe that our pronunciation of Latin and Greek, with both of which languages we are very familiar, will ever represent the true music of the odes of Horace and Pindar, and yet we have the benefit of the undisputed quantities of the syllables. How much more careful then should we be, in setting up rules of rhyme for the Hebrew, when we cannot know what the ancient pronunciation was, and if we did know it, would in all probability, with our organs be unable to reproduce it! The latest system (L. Meier, Form d. Heb. Poesie, 1853) betrays a conviction of the necessity of referring everything to its proper standard, the ground idea of which, however (the only one applicable in our practice), that it is the accent, not the quantity, which determines the rhyme, will, by the farther representation that each line must have two accented principal syllables, whilst there may be as many unaccented articulations at the beginning (or before), in the middle, and at the end, as may be pronounced within the given time, lead either to the actual giving up of a versification, or to the breaking of the discourse into very short lines, consisting often of a single word, and that in fact might just as well be made up of a number of prosaic texts.

Literature:—Bellarmin, Instit. hebr. Buxtorf thes. gram.—F. Gomarus, Davidis lyra, lib. 1. A. Pfeifer, de poesi hebr. vet. CALMET, Bib. Unters. CRAMER, Psalmen. J. D. MICHAELIS on Lowth's work, cited above. C. G. ASTOR, de metro hebr. antiquo, 1770. C. L. BAUR progr. de metro hebr., 1771. C. L. LEUTWITZ, richtige Theorie der bibl. Verskunst, 1774. HOFFMAN, in der Hallischen Encycl. 2. Sect. Sommer, bibl. Abh. 1. Ed. REUSS.—Dr. Wolf.

Hebrews, Epistle to the.—As Christ designated (Matt. 5 : 17) his kingdom the kingdom of the law and of the prophets, it was so regarded by all the Apostles, and especially by Paul. The author of this epistle shows a Jewish Christian Church, which was inclined to transfer the types and shadows of the Old Test. to the realities of the New Test., and many of whose members were on the point of relapsing to Judaism (10 : 25), that the founder of the new covenant was exalted above Moses, and the angels even, and that, as another Melchisedec being the true high-priest, prophet, and king in one person, and more excellent than the Aaronic priests, he was the mediator of a higher covenant, of a higher and an eternal atonement of which the temporary Old Test. atonement furnished only symbolical figures (8 : 1–10, 13). Of course on the basis of the mystical and cabalistic style of exposition then in vogue, and in which the Rabbinical hermeneutics afford better proofs than Philo, the author of the Epistle took a profound view of the symbols and types of the Old Test., and exhibited the eternal Christian ideas which lay concealed in them.

In regard to its authorship, the reader at once perceives that the style differs from that of Paul, in being more rhetorical, quiet, and regular. The Epistle has more of the form of a treatise than a letter (Valckenaer, Berger, Baur); it has not the introductory salutation or name of the writer always found in Paul's Epistles; and, 13 : 19, 23, excepted, we miss those personal allusions so frequent in Paul's

Epistles. But it seems especially strange, that although in addressing Jewish Christians he generally dwelt with emphasis upon his equality as an Apostle with the other Apostles, he mentions himself, 2 : 3, as but a disciple of those who had themselves attended from the first upon the Lord's ministry (LUTHER, Walch, XIV., 46). And yet those churches nearest to Palestine (where those addressed must have lived), the Alexandrian, Syrian, Mesopotamian, with few exceptions, regarded the Ep. as Pauline, and Clem. Alex. explains the difference in style by assuming that Luke translated, Origen by assuming that an unknown writer edited it. It was only after the 4th cent. that Paul came to be generally considered the author, in the Orient. In the West, however, as far as we can trace the matter, in Rome, Gaul, Africa, there were but 13 Ep. ascribed to Paul, Hebrews being excluded. The cause of this diversity has not yet been satisfactorily explained. Hug argues with some acuteness (Thiersch and Delitzsch following him) that the Western Church was committed against the Ep. on account of the appeal of the Montanists, and of the Novatians in the 3d cent., to 6 : 4, as opposed to the restoration of the lapsi. But the Montanists did not acknowledge Paul as its author; and Tertullian in de pudicitia, c. 20, quotes from it only as furnishing testim. ex redundantia. No Christian ever refers to it, but only his party. If, therefore, Oriental tradition did not report the author, we must assume that it became known in the West, without a tradition of its authorship. For had an author been named, the Western Church could not have remained undecided, as it was, whether Barnabas or Clemens wrote it.

But if such external arguments exist to show that Paul was the author of this Epistle, the following internal evidence might be urged in favor of the same view. What is said in chapt. 3 of his intimate relation to Timothy, &c. In 10 : 30 we find a quotation from Deut. 32 : 35, in a form which more nearly agrees with Rom. 2 : 19, than with the Hebrew or LXX. text. The Ep. contains many Hebraisms, both in words and phrases. Though the style differs from Paul's, it has been well remarked, that a man of such mind is not to be thought bound to one set of phrases and constructions. This may be seen in his addresses in Acts. Let Acts 26 : 4, 5, be compared critically with some parallel periods in Hebrews. The typology of the Ep. is Pauline, and also the manner of stating a number of doctrines: 1) God as the foundation and end of all creation, 2 : 10; Rom. 11 : 36; Cor. 8 : 6. 2) Christ as the σπέν of God and mediator of the world, 1 : 1-3; 2 Cor. 4 : 4; Col. 1 : 15, 16. 3) Christ's humiliation and exaltation, 1 : 4; 2 : 9; Philip. 2 : 8, 9. 4) That Christ deprived death of its power, 2 : 14; Cor. 15 : 54, &c.; 2 Tim. 1 : 10. 5) That Christ died once for all for sin, but is now lifted above all suffering, 9 : 26, 28; 10 : 12; Rom. 6 : 9, 10. 6) Christ as mediator, μεσίτης, between God and man, 12 : 23, and ἄγνωτος, 7 : 22. 7) Christ as our high-priest before the Father, 3 : 25; Rom. 8 : 34; and other parallelisms, especially in Colossians. To these we must add the use of certain words peculiar to Paul: ἐντυγχάνειν, 7 : 25; ὁ θεὸς τῆς εἰρήνης; παρησία and καύχημα; ὁ λόγος τῆς ἀποκάλυψης; σκιὰ τῶν ἐπουρανίων, &c. And yet such resemblances might be expected from a disciple of Paul, as well as from Paul himself. That in his addresses in Acts, we must assume that the reporter of them imparted some shade of his own thoughts, seems probable from two expressions altogether peculiar to Luke: ἀποφθέγγομαι, 26 : 25 (cf. Acts 2 : 4, 14); προχειρίζεσθαι 26 : 16; (cf. 3 : 20; 22 : 14).

But the internal evidence of the Ep. is greatly predominant in favor of a different authorship. Some explain the absence of all controversy about ἔργα νόμου, of Paul's favorite themes of justification by faith, the importance of Christ's resurrection, and the equal privileges of the heathen, by saying that they were not specially called for in this case; but it is not true that he treats of those themes only in controversial epistles (see Philippians). And it is still more difficult to account for peculiar modifications of Pauline doctrines, as that of the atonement and justification. As to the language, it differs from Paul's not only in style and purity, but we meet with idioms peculiar to this author: ὁ Ἰησοῦς, ὁμολογία, μακροθυμία, οἶον. Very remarkable is the difference in citations. Whilst Paul, even when quoting the LXX., shows that he had the Hebrew text in view, which he often follows exclusively, the author of Hebrews always quotes from the LXX., even its mistakes (11 : 21; 13 : 15; 10 : 5; 2 : 7). In an ep. to Jewish Christians one would least expect this. Whilst Paul's citations agree with the Cod. Vatic., those in Hebrews agree mainly with the Cod. Alex. Paul cites with ὡς γέγραπται, κατὰ τὸ γεγραμμένον, or Μωϋσῆς λέγει, Δαβὶδ λέγει; but Hebrews direct declarations of God (2 : 6 excepted). But, above all, Paul would never, especially in addressing Jewish Christians, have designated himself as one who had received the gospel secondarily from an immediate apostle (although Ebrard on 2 : 3, assumes just the opposite).

These points of agreement, and of diversity between Paul's other ep. and Hebrews, have caused a corresponding difference of opinion between critics, as to the authorship of the latter. Storr, E. W. Meyer, Scheibel, de Groot, Stuart, Gelpke, Paulus, Stein, Klee, &c., maintain that Paul wrote it; Stier, Hug, Delitzsch, Guerike, Ebrard (Olshausen continued), that Paul was the mediate author, an assistant, chiefly Luke composing it. On the contrary Camerarius, Tweslen, Ullmann (Stud. u. Krit., I., II. 2), Wieseler (Chronol. d. ap. Z. A., 504), Thiersch (Comm. histor. de ep. ad Hebr., 1848), following Tertullian, regard Barnabas as the author. Most suppose an Alexandrian: thus Eichhorn, Seyffarth, Schott, B.-Crusius; especially Apollos: thus Luther, Clericus, Semler, Bleek, de Wette, Reuss, Credner. Two reasons have been urged in favor of Apollos: 1) what is said of him in Acts 18 : 24; 2) the author's acquaintance with Philo's doctrine and hermeneutics (see Tholuck's Comm. on Hebr., 3d ed., p. 80, &c.). But Neander (Planting, &c.) has shown that the realistic practical character of this ep. is at variance with Philonism. And yet among the disciples of Paul, Apollos was most likely to be the author; or next to him Clem. Rom., or Barnabas. But Clement himself quotes the ep., and if Barnabas wrote the ep. ascribed to him, he is excluded. So that only Apollos remains, whose qualities, Acts 18:24, well suit those evidently possessed by the author of Hebrews. That the rhetorical and hermeneutical culture exhibited in the ep. might have been acquired outside of Alexandria, we would not deny, but they certainly point strongly to that city. And from 1 Cor. 1:12; 16:12, and Tit. 3:13, we know that Apollos (see Art.) made independent missionary tours; and according to Acts 18:25, 28, he was especially active among Jews, so that he may have sustained intimate relations to Christians in Palestine.

Those addressed were, according to the inscription, Ἑβραῖος. If these were of Palestine, it might again be questioned whether Apollos, or any disciple of Paul's school, could be the author. But this name neither designates the place of their birth, residence, nor their language. In Philip. 3:5; 2 Cor. 11:22, Paul of Tarsus calls himself a Hebrew of the Hebrews. Eusebius (H. E., 2, 4) calls Philo, an Egyptian Hellenist, a Hebrew, &c. The fact is, simply, that the term designates descent from that ancient people (see Tholuck, l. c., 97), and especially the old language (Jos. Ant., 10, 1, 2). There are other proofs that these Ἑβραῖοι used the language of the country of the Jews. And at the time when this ep. was written the Aramaic idiom was not only prevalent among Parthian, Babylonian, and Mesopotamian Jews, but was used by authors even in Egypt (Tholuck, l. c.). The fact, however, that the ep. is directed against an overestimate of the priesthood and cultus of the temple, whilst Jews in the countries named rarely made pilgrimages, then, to Jerusalem (Philo but once in his life), compels us to suppose that a Church of Palestine is meant. For although Paul had many enemies among the Jews, we must not conclude that he had no friends among converts of that nation. And as to the objection from the use of the Greek language, it has been shown by Paulus and Hug that learned Rabbins were acquainted with Homer, and that even country-people in Palestine had a knowledge of Greek.

The time when the ep. was written can be pretty accurately determined. It must have been before the destruction of Jerusalem, for the Mosiac cultus was still in operation (8:4, 13; 9:6, 7, 9; 13:10); and yet James could no longer have been at the head of the Church at Jerusalem, or the author would not have addressed the readers so authoritatively. We therefore assume the period a. 62-67. — The place seems to be intimated in 13:24. Some (Semler, Bleek, de Wette) suppose "fugitives from Italy" were meant. But there is no etymological objection to supposing the expression equivalent to οἱ Ἰταλῶται (so Ebrard, Köstlin), in which case not Rome, but lower Italy is meant (see Acts 28:13, &c.). — The condition of the Church addressed, so far as the tenor of the ep. indicates it, also points to Palestine. They do not seem to have overrated the ritual law (excepting 13:9), circumcision, or an Abrahamic descent, but not to have perceived the superior worth of Christ and his atonement in comparison with Moses, the Aaronic priesthood, and the typical sacrifices. If anywhere, Ebionitic tendencies must have prevailed in Palestine, and, as a result, the value of the ideal Christian atonement be disparaged; and in proportion as the spiritual view of the subject was lost sight of, would the sensuous Jewish cultus become more attractive. To this must be added that the Ep. to the Romans, in the 2d cent. the test. XII. patriarch, shows what offence was given to the Jewish portion of the Church by the growing addition of heathen members, which threatened to crowd out the Jewish Christian element. And in the 2d cent. the test. XII. patriarch. presents the same points of controversy.

Those books of the Bible have suffered most from erroneous expositions, which possess a symbolical typical character, which contrasts most strongly with the modern spirit of rational reflexion; thus with the Apocalypse and Hebrews. Whilst the aim of the latter is to bring forth eternal ideal truth out of the typical veil which concealed it in the Old Test., it was made use of by the Romish Church in defence of their sacerdotal and sacrificial theory. Whilst in the earlier Protestant Church, the book was interpreted spiritually, the realistic gnosis of Bengel introduced a realism in the exegesis of Hebrews which operates to this day. On 12:24, Bengel says expressly, that Christ took his blood to heaven, not with his glorified body, but apart from it. Rieger, one of Bengel's pupils, adds in proof, that in Rev. 1:14, Christ has white hair, and was, therefore, bloodless. Accordingly, a purifying, sanctifying virtue is ascribed to his blood, independent of the atoning efficacy of his death,—a view which forms an essential point in Kahn's exposition (p. 64, &c.) of the Lutheran doctrine of the Lord's Supper. Whilst the old Luth. Church—Calov, Hunnius, Baldwin—supposes the Holy of Holies, the heavenly Jerusalem, Mount Zion, mean the Church; Oetinger, Menken, Stier (on Hebrews, I., 137, 138; II., 319) insist that all might be taken in a realistic-local sense.—In Semler's day the book must have seemed incomprehensible, and hence it was considered a mere accommodation to crass Jewish notions (Semler, Versuch einer freien theol. Lehrart, p. 447. So likewise Ernesti, Döderlein, Griesbach, and even Ammon, bibl. theol., III., §7). Rationalism has regarded the Ep. as the product of the personal prejudices of the author, and as deficient in good taste. Böhme on 8:2, says the heavenly tabernacle is a figmentum Judaicum, quo hæc gens divina omnia sibi soli tribuens loco suo sanctissimo summam dignitatem conciliare studuit. The return to a deeper understanding of this Ep. was begun by de Wette (Theol. Ztschr. v. Schleiermacher, &c., I. and II.).—The most learned and thorough Exposition of Hebrews is that of BLEEK, 1828, 2 Thle. This was followed by THOLUCK's Comm. 3d ed., 1850. That of DE WETTE is spirited, 2 ed. 1847. The latest is that of Ebrard in the Olshausen series, 1850.

A. THOLUCK.*

a gown. When the Elector Gebhard of Cologne contemplated introducing the Reformation, Hedio and Bucer were called to Bonn, his residence, but the Emperor soon stopped the work. Hedio spent the rest of his days in Strasburg, mostly in literary labors. He died Oct 17, 1552. His works are partly historico-philological, partly exegetical: Chronicon german. until a. 1545; Chron. Abbatis Urspergensis correctum; paralipomena ei addita rerum memorab. ab a. 1230-1537; Prælectiones, in VIII., cap. in Joh., et in Epist. ad Rom.; Serm. de decimis, &c. He also translated various classical and ecclesiastical writers into German.—(See ADAMI, Vita, p. 116 (240, sq.). SECKENDORF, hist. Lutheran., I., 247-71; II., 140. ISRLIN, hist. Lex. Bouginé, literargesch., II. RÖHRICH, Gesch. d. Ref. im Elsass., I., 163, 167, 204, 262; II., 40, 104, 152, &c. &c. HERZOG, Oekolampad, I., 87). HAGENBACH.*

Heerbrand, Jacob, a Lutheran theologian (born Aug. 12, 1521, † May 22, 1600) distinguished for his zeal in literary studies, and his learning. After filling various other posts with honor, he was sent, 1551, by Duke Christopher as theol. delegate to the Council of Trent. Subsequently he filled the post of theol. professor at Tübingen for 40 years, and was eight times appointed rector of the University. After J. Andrea's death in 1590, he became Chancellor, provost, and ducal counsellor. In 1598 he resigned his offices on account of old age.—His chief work is his Compend. theologicæ (Tüb., 1573), afterwards enlarged and more fully conformed to the Form. Concord. (1578, and after). Next to Melanchthon's Loci this was the first scientific system of theology (including Ethics).—(See CELLIUS, oratio fun. ADAMI, Vita theol.; WALCH, I., 38. Böck, Eisenbach, Klüpfel, Gesch. d. Univers. Tüb. GASS, Gesch. d. prot. Dogm., I., 77). WAGENMANN.*

Heermann, John, a preacher, hymnologist, and devotional writer, born at Rauten, Oct. 11, 1585; † Feb. 17, 1647. He is chiefly distinguished as a composer of hymns. A constant sufferer from sickness, and especially distressed by the Thirty Years' War, his hymns breathe the spirit of his sorrows, yet are chastened by firm faith in and love for Christ. He is pre-eminently the "singer" of the militant and suffering Church. Wackernagel has published 200 of his hymns; but he composed at least 400. Many of these are universal favorites: "O Gott du frommer Gott," &c.; "Herzliebster Jesu was hast du," &c.; "Wo soll ich fliehen hin," &c.; "Jesu deine tiefen Wunden," &c. Among all religious poets from the Reformation to Paul Gerhard, he is chief; in character and talent far surpassing Opitz.—(See funeral sermon of Holfeld; Ev. Kirchenztg., 1832, Nr. 27-29. Wackernagel, Ph., J. Heermann's geistl. Lieder: Stuttg., 1856). WAGENMANN.*

Hegelian Philosophy of Religion.—George William Frederick Hegel figures so prominently in the modern history of German philosophy and theology, that a theological Encyclopedia cannot be complete without a brief exposition of his idea of God and of religion. He was born Aug. 27, 1770, at Stuttgart, the capital of the kingdom of Würtemberg, studied theology at Tübingen, 1788, became private lecturer (Privatdocent) of philosophy at Jena in 1801, then professor extraordinary in the same University in 1805, rector of the gymnasium (college) at Nürnberg in 1808, professor ordinary of philosophy at the University of Heidelberg in 1816. From Heidelberg he was called to Berlin in the same capacity, and died there of the cholera, Nov. 14, 1831 (comp. Rosenkranz, G. W. F. Hegel's Leben: Berlin, 1844). As a philosopher he was associated with Schelling in his system of identity as it is called, but subsequently he founded the system of absolute idealism as a further development of the system of his younger and more precocious friend, and thus completed the idealistic speculation of the German philosophy since Kant. His significance, therefore, lies in the fact that he represents the culminating point of an important period in the history of philosophy, and not of philosophy only, but also of theology and religion. For the spirit of the age, since the middle of the last century, the growing worldliness, the spread of English and French sensualism and materialism, and the decay of German theology into that insipid rationalism which degraded Christianity to a level with the so-called natural religion, all this combined to give philosophy, since the rise of Kant, such a preponderance over religion and theology that it became and remained to the death of Hegel the ruling power of the age in the scientific and literary circles of Germany. No wonder that not only the founder of this preponderance, Kant, but also its finisher, Hegel, should have exerted a powerful influence on theology, especially on dogmatics and doctrine-history. The names and writings of Daub, Marheineke, Göschel, Rosenkranz, F. Chr. Baur, David Strauss, Zeller, Schweigler, Vatke, Bruno Bauer, and others, and the entire Tübingen school as headed by the famous church historian, Dr. Baur of Tübingen, sufficiently prove the powerful effect of Hegelian philosophy upon the more recent theology of Germany. Nor can it be said by any means that this influence was only a disadvantage. The leaders of the so-called "right wing" of the Hegelian school, Daub, Marheineke, and Göschel (with whom Dr. Rauch of America may be ranked as far as his Psychology is concerned) took a prominent part in the revival of evangelical orthodoxy in Germany, and many others owe to Hegel their first deliverance from infidelity. The depth and acumen of thought with which he opposed the so-called rationalismus communis or vulgaris which then ruled supreme, and defended the fundamental Christian doctrines of the Trinity and the incarnation—although he perverted their orthodox meaning, and adapted them to his pantheistic idealism—contributed very largely towards the reconciliation of the spirit of the age with Christianity. And this was a far more difficult task than the refutation of the pantheistic error which, through Hegel, acquired considerable strength and vitality in German theology as far as it was affected by his philosophy.

The idea of God (the absolute) forms the beginning, middle, and end of Hegel's system, so that it may be called a progressive dialectical

volution of this idea. According to his view the entire world, both nature and man, are but the self-manifestation of God and the unfolding process of his being as the absolute Spirit. "The idea of the absolute Spirit," he says (Philos. of Relig., I., 201), "comprehends the entire wealth of the natural and spiritual world, it is the only substance and truth of this wealth, and nothing is true and real except as far as it forms an element of his being." The absolute, i. e., the unconditional and the unlimited or infinite, allows no rival and no existence out of itself; else it would stand related to it and be limited by it, consequently it would not be independent and absolute, but relative like every conditioned and finite being. "If the finite is bounded by the infinite and stands on its side, then the infinite is likewise limited, and has the finite for its limit" (Philos. of Rel., I., 180). The absolute, therefore, is superior to all contradictions and distinctions of finite existence and finite thought, it is the unity of the infinite and finite, the eternal and temporal, the ideal and real, the subjective and objective of nature and spirit. But it is not so superior to these contradictions and distinctions as to be only their unity and harmony, and to exclude their difference; on the contrary it carries in itself also the differences and opposition as an element of its being and part of its substance; otherwise the distinctions would stand outside and over against the absolute as something foreign, as a boundary; that is, the absolute would cease to be absolute.

God, therefore, according to Hegel, is not absolutely done—no motionless, eternally self-identical and unchangeable being, but a living eternal "process" of absolute self-existence. This process consists in the eternal self-distinction or antithesis, and equally eternal self-reconciliation or synthesis of those opposites which enter as necessary elements into the very constitution of the divine being. This self-evolution, whereby the absolute enters into the antithesis and returns to itself again, is the eternal self-actualization of its being, from which it (the absolute) eternally results, and in which it constitutes at once the beginning, the middle, and the end, as in a circle where the beginning is at the same time the end, and vice versa. It is in this conception of God as the absolute Spirit, in living process of self-manifestation and self-actualization, that Hegel places his difference from the conception of God in the systems of Spinoza, Fichte, Schelling, as well as those of Kant and all the Deists.

The whole philosophy of Hegel consists in the development of this idea of God by means of the so-called dialectical method which reflects the objective life-process of the absolute. It is divided into three parts, logic (which with Hegel is identical with metaphysics), philosophy of nature, and philosophy of mind. Each part has again three subdivisions, the whole system being controlled throughout by the trichotomic or Trinitarian principle. Passing by the logic and the philosophy of nature as being foreign to our purpose, we confine ourselves to the philosophy of mind.

The philosophy of mind, according to Hegel, is subdivided into three parts. We have first the subjective or individual mind (psychology), then the objective or general mind as represented in the state and in history (political philosophy, ethics, and philosophy of history), and finally the union of the subjective and objective mind, or the absolute mind. This last manifests itself again under three forms, representing the three degrees of the self-consciousness of the Spirit as the eternal truth. These are, first, art, or the representation of beauty (æsthetics); secondly, religion in the popular sense of the term (philosophy of religion); and, thirdly, philosophy itself as the purest and most perfect form of the scientific knowledge of truth. Religion and philosophy are essentially the same as to their contents, and differ only in the form of their conception of the absolute. All historical religions, the Oriental, the Jewish, the Greek, the Roman, and the Christian, are the successive stages in the development or self-actualization of God. The Christian religion is the true revealed religion, the consciousness of the absolute truth.

This whole conception of religion, however, is false, and conflicts with the actual nature of Christianity. Hegel's philosophy, and historical Christianity, in spite of his repeated assertions of the essential agreement, are as violently opposed to each other as pantheism and theism. And this is the case not only as regards the idea of God, but also as regards the critical conception of man. He regards the Trinity as the central truth of Christianity, but perverts it from the scriptural and orthodox sense into a mere metaphysical abstraction, and with his view of the necessity of sin he overthrows the Christian doctrine of an actual historical salvation from sin by the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. In his system Christ is not the incarnate Son of God, but only the first man who rose to the knowledge that religion is the absolute truth, and that man is essentially divine, and who exhibited this unity in his holy life.

Such a violent misinterpretation of the doctrines of the Church, far from being a philosophical exposition of the Christian faith, overthrows Christianity, and substitutes for it the abstractions of pantheistic idealism, which starts with a false idea of the absolute, and the denial of personality and freedom as essential attributes of God. Here lies the firm basis from which both the pantheistic and the materialistic tendencies of the age can be refuted.

H. ULRICH. — P. Schaff.

Hegesippus. — Among the names enumerated by Eusebius (E. H., IV., 21), of orthodox church-writers in the reign of Marcus Antonius, and during the episcopate of Anicetus, and (168) of Soter, that of Hegesippus stands first. In c. 22, Eusebius cites H. as relating: that on his way to Rome he had spent some time at Corinth in edifying intercourse with the Christians there, and that at Rome he had drawn up a record of the apostolical succession (according to Pearson's interpretation, which is justified by the connection of the words: τὰς δὲ ἐκκλησίας ἐκείνης) to the time of Anicetus, who had now — the period at which H. wrote—been succeeded by Soter and Eleutherus. From this it appears that H. remained at Rome only until the episcopate of Anicetus. But in B. IV., 11, Eusebius says that H. staid there until that of Eleutherus—a discrepancy which may easily have arisen from a want of care in comparing the relevant passage in H. Jerome (de vir. ill., XXII., p. 89) omits this statement of Eusebius.—The passage in Eusebius, Bk. IV., 8, seems, at first sight, to aid us in fixing the time in which H. lived, provided the reading, γενόμενος, be correct. According to this reading H. relates, that the games in honor of Antinous, Adrian's slave, were instituted in his day—and so places himself in the reign of Adrian. But the expression, ἐφ' ἧμιν, is too indefinite to warrant a safe conclusion in respect to time; and that H. lived under Adrian, at all events admits of no doubt. To call him, for this reason, as Jerome does, vicinus apostolicorum temporum, is saying too much. The record of his stay at Corinth and Rome, constitutes the only sure one we have of his life. Eusebius, indeed (IV., 22), says that H. was a converted Jew, but on what authority he leaves us in doubt. Yet the information is probably correct; in any case, his native country must have been in the East. According to the Chron. Alexandr., he died under Commodus; hence after 180. As to his character, the only indubitable statement which can preliminarily be made, is that Eusebius considered him to have been one of the pillars of orthodoxy (in Eusebius's sense) in the age in which he lived. An examination of his own work must unfold more in this respect. Eusebius not only used it, but has given us several important literal extracts (comp. II., 23; III., 11, 16, 20, 32; IV., 8, 11, 22). Jerome appears not to have been acquainted with it; Stephen Gobarus, a Monophysitic writer, on the contrary, availed himself of it as late as the end of the ninth century, and has preserved a passage from it, in Photius' Bibl. cc., XXXII., 893. This passage, together with the extracts in Eusebius, have been collected and annotated by Routh, reliq. sacr., I., 189-255, and before him by Grabe, spicileg. ss. Pat. secl., II. (T. II.), 203-214. According to Eusebius the work of H. consisted of five books, and bore the title, ὑπομνήματα (IV., 22; comp. also Steph. Gobarus in Phot. Bibl.). Jerome demonstrates it to be unequivocally a church history, from the death of the Lord to the times of H.; but as he was acquainted with the work only from Eusebius, his opinion is not worth much, although it has given to H. the reputation of being the oldest historian of the Christian Church. The liberal extracts in Eusebius undoubtedly are historical in their character; and many other passages in his work appear to be based on the records of H., without a direct reference to this source as found in IV., 22; IV., 8, &c. Nor would pieces from the gospel of the Hebrews, and other matters taken from written and unwritten Hebrew sources—remarks on the Proverbs of Solomon, and the Apocrypha—of all which Eusebius speaks (IV., 22), be altogether inadmissible on suitable occasions, in a Church history such as H.'s work is supposed to have been. But when Eusebius (IV., 22) says that he has introduced in their appropriate places the narratives which he took from H., it becomes doubtful, to say the least, whether, in the work of the latter, they stood in historical order. And a well-grounded doubt of this, and consequently of the historical character of the entire work, must arise, when we find not merely that the only positive reference given by Euseb., in the case of a historical extract (that respecting the death of James) is to the fifth book of H., but likewise that in this reference (II., 23) he expressly remarks that H. had introduced the narrative when treating of the immediate succession of the apostles—a subject which in a work like Jerome presumed that of H. to be ought certainly to have been brought forward in the first, and not in the fifth book. In B. IV., 8, Eusebius declares that the great purpose H. had in view, was to set forth, in a most simple style of composition, the plain tradition of the apostolic doctrine. Hence his remarks respecting the churches with which he became acquainted on his journey (Euseb., IV., 22). Eusebius further says that, in his ὑπομνήματα, H. has left us a most complete record of his own views, inasmuch as he states that he had formed connections with many bishops when travelling to Rome, and found the same doctrine held by all. We might, therefore, suppose his work to have been a journal of travels, just as well as a history. And yet this supposition again is scarcely tenable, since in the very passage of Eusebius (IV., 22), which contains the opinion of the writer on the ὑπομνήματα, we are told that H. annexed his statement respecting the condition of the Corinthian Church to observations on the first epistle of Clement to the Corinthians. Only one way of explaining the difficulty remains. The ὑπομνήματα (in spite of this title which after all means not much more than our general term notes) constituted a kind of apologetic or polemic work, enriched with historical demonstrations. This view of the case is rendered more probable by a closer examination of the passage in Eusebius (IV., 8) where H. is introduced, for the first time, as a character belonging to the history of his age. For, after having described the magnitude and evil of the gnosis, in the reign of Adrian, and referred to the fact (IV., 7) that the true faith was victorious in the contest with it.—Eusebius remarks, at the end of chapt. 7, that in those times the truth had called forth “many champions who undertook its defence, not only by unwritten argumentation, but also by their written demonstrations against the prevailing heretical impieties.” “Among these,” he continues in chapt. 8, “Hegesippus holds a distinguished rank.” From all this the words of Eusebius, adduced above, respecting the purpose which H. had in view, become plain, and lead us to believe that the work was a polemic production, written from the standpoint of genuine tradition, and in accordance with its mode of argumentation. The simplicity of style, spoken of by Euseb., probably consisted in this, that H. argued only by means of historical narratives and traditions. And it is just on this account that he assumes a very remarkable position in the process by which the old Catholic Church as such was formed—in so far as this process is considered by opposition to the heretical gnosis.

Although the fragments from the work of H., literally cited by Euseb., are comparatively few in number, yet their subject matter is of very considerable interest. They constitute, moreover, the only records of the kind, which enhance their importance. The most ample of them, however, describing the death of James, must be used with great caution as a historical source, for it bears the evidence of traditionary adornments, and is written without a clear apprehension of the circumstances of the case. The deepest interest which these fragments have awakened, has always been in relation to the opinion given by H. on the state of all important churches of his day. This opinion was the result of his journey; and has originated two lively controversies, bearing with great force on the mode of conceiving the history of the Church in the second century. Socinian deism, already, regarded the favorable impression which the churches made on H., pre-eminently as a means of proving the universal spread, in them, of a Judaizing way of thinking; in so far as H. himself was said to have been, by birth and disposition, a decided Jewish Christian. Against his entire position Bull entered the lists 150 years ago. But now Dr. Baur of Tübingen, and his school, reoccupy precisely the same ground, and the view and argumentation of the subject from the standpoint of this school, have been finally and clearly set forth by A. Schweiger (Das nachapost. Zeitalter, I., p. 342-359). Numerous energetic representations of the opposite side have appeared, among whom we mention especially Ritschl in his Entsteh. der alt-kathol. Kirche, I., 3, 3, and Dorner, whose remarks on Hegesippus, in his Entwickelungs-gesch. der Lehre von d. Person Christi (I., 1., p. 219-230) constitute the most comprehensive and thorough reply to the school of Tübingen. In order to decide the controversy, everything depends on establishing either that the tendency of Hegesippus itself was a Judaizing one, or that it was not. The most convincing proofs that it was not, can be brought forward. But for this reason H.'s Jewish extraction should not be called in question. The fact that a Palestinian Christian, by birth a Jew, and educated exclusively under the gospel influence of his native country, meets with his own principles in the whole gentile Christian world: this is the very thing that makes the case of H. so instructive, and shows that not even in the contracted Christian circle of Palestine, Ebionitism which is said to have ruled the whole Church, had a home. Baur has based another controversial point on what H. remarks in Euseb. (III., 32) respecting the origin of the gnostic heresy, namely that it first saw the light of day with the death of Simeon, in the time of Trajan; and that until then the Church had kept itself unspotted from false doctrines. From this statement it follows, so he says, that the apostolical age knew of no gnostic heresy; and this becomes a conclusion decisive for New Test. criticism. However, in the passage in question, H. states that the heresy had existed before, but was not publicly and generally manifested. Such remarks of H. are to be understood altogether relatively, as is quite evident from the circumstance, that on another occasion (Euseb., IV., 22) he dates the origin of the gnosis from the death of James.— (Compare, in this respect, Dorner, p. 223, &c.; and Thiersch, Versuch zur Herstellung &c., chapt. V.). C. WEIZSÄCKER.—de Schweinitz.

Hegira (the flight), the epoch from which Mohammedans (see Art.) compute time, by order of Caliph Omar. The era began on Thursday, July 15, 622, A.D. Most chronologists, especially the earlier European, reckon from Friday, July 16, the actual new moon, instead of the real time of conjunction. It is a prevailing error to suppose that Mohammed's flight occurred on that day; it is only the 1st day of the year, on the 8th day of the 3d month of which it took place. The Arabs reckon their civil day from sunset. Their month is the period from the first crescent after the new moon until the next. In this the popular must be distinguished from the astronomical calendar, as in the former the month may have 29 or 30 days. Twelve such months make a year, which may, therefore, begin successively in any month or season. This irregularity disappears in the cyclical method of reckoning, in which, as two synodic months include 59 days, the months singly, have alternately 29 and 30 days.¹ Their lunar year, therefore, has 354 days. But the astronomical lunar year is 8h. 48', 36" longer, which, in the solar year, must be added as an intercalary day. These 8h. 48' (the 36" are left out because they amount to but one year in 2400) make 11 days in 30 years, and are so disposed of, that when the excess added from year to year, after abstracting the whole days, is more than 12 hours, an entire intercalary day is added to the last month.² Now in order to

¹ The following list will illustrate:—

	Dura- tion.	No. of days.
1) Muharram.....	30	30
2) Szafer.....	29	59
3) Rabi' ul awwal.....	30	89
4) Rabi' ul achir.....	29	118
5) Dschumâdâ-l awwal.....	30	148
6) Dschumâdâ-l achir.....	29	177
7) Radschab.....	30	207
8) Scha'bân.....	29	236
9) Ramadhân.....	30	266
10) Schawâl.....	29	295
11) Dsul-ka'dah.....	30	325
12) Dsul-biddscha.....	29	354

² In the following table an * will show what years, in a tricennial cycle, are intercalary.

Years.	No. of days.	Years.	No. of days.
1	354	*16	5670
* 2	709	17	6024
3	1063	*18	6379
4	1417	19	6733
* 5	1772	20	7087
6	2126	*21	7442
* 7	2481	22	7796
8	2835	23	8150
* 9	3189	*24	8505
10	3544	25	8859
11	3898	*26	9214
12	4252	27	9568
*13	4607	28	9922
14	4961	*29	10277
15	5315	30	10631

reduce the Mohammedan date to our chronology, the present sum of their years must be divided by 30; the quotient will be the intercalary cycle, the remainder the surplus years. Multiply the quotient by 10631 (see note 2), and seek for the remainder, the corresponding number of days in table 2. To this add the current year (table 1) and 227015, the whole number of days from the commencement of the Christian era to that of the Mohammedan epoch. This gives the absolute number. The sum of all these items will give the whole number of days from the commencement of the Christian era, to the Mohammedan date in question. Divide this by 1461, the number of the Christian intercalary cycle, and multiply the quotient by 4; the remainder will be the number of days over the intercalary cycle, 365 for one year, 730 for two years; the remainder still left will indicate the days of the current year.¹ In a leap-year the number of days in each month is one more, from February on. If, therefore, we wish to ascertain the date of the death of Haroun el Raschid: 3d of Dschumâdâ-l âchir, 193 Hag., we get 6 as the quotient of $192 \div 30$, and 12 as remainder. Then $6 \times 10631 = 63786$. The number of days in 12 years is 4252 (table 2). But the 3d of Dschumâdâ is, in that year, the 151st day, (table 2). We must, therefore, reckon $63786 + 4252 + 151 + 227015 = 295204 \div 1461 = 202 \times 4 = 808$, and the remainder, 82 will be (table 3) the 23d day after February. Hence, Dschumâdâ 3d, Hag. 193 = March 23, A. D. 809. The old Julian calendar is, naturally, the basis of these calculations; we must therefore notice that it differs from the Gregorian 10 days from 1582 — 1700; 11 days from 1701–1800; 12 days from 1801–1900. — To change a Christian to a Mohammedan date, the reverse of the preceding process must be adopted. — To ascertain the day of the week, of a Mohammedan date, it must be remembered that July 15, 622, the first day of the Hegira epoch, was a Thursday; hence every 8th, 15th, &c., day will also be a Thursday. We need, therefore, only divide the number of days from the commencement of the epoch to the desired date, by 7, and when the remainder is 1, it will always indicate Thursday, when 2, Friday, &c.—(See Ideler, Handb. d. mathem. u. techn. Chronol. II., 471–512. Lehrb. d. Chron., 106, &c. Wahl, Neue arab. Anthologie: Lpz., 1791, 63–84. Wüstenfeld, Vergleichungs-Tabellen d. Muham. u. Chr. Zeitrechn.: Lpz., 1854). ARNOLD.*

Heidelberg, or Palatinate Catechism.—It is historically certain that this Catechism was the joint production of Dr. Caspar Olevianus, formerly Prof. of Theology, and court-preacher at Heidelberg, and Dr. Zacharias Ursinus, Prof. of Theology in the University. The one composed it in German, the other in Latin. The decree of Elector Frederick III., ordering its publication and use, was dated Jan. 19th, 1563.

¹ The following table shows how these days may be put into the desired Christian date.

Jan., 31 days,	May, 151 days,	Sept., 273 days,
Feb., 59 "	June, 181 "	Oct., 304 "
March, 90 "	July, 212 "	Nov., 334 "
April, 120 "	Aug., 243 "	Dec., 365 "

The first edition, unlike succeeding ones, had not the numbering of the questions, nor the eightieth question, nor the division into Sundays, nor the lessons, while the chapters only, containing the proof passages, were given. In the second, the eightieth closed with the words: "And the mass is nothing but an idolatrous denial of the single offering and sufferings of Jesus Christ;" and, when the Council of Trent published its decrees, the Elector took pains to suppress this edition, and issued a third in which the close of the answer to this question was made to read as now. Before the end of 1563, the Catechism was cast in the mould in which we now have it. In the following editions it was adapted, more or less perfectly, to practical purposes, by the addition of prayers, formularies for baptism, communion, marriage. The best of them appeared 1592, in Neustadt, under the superintendence of Matthäus Harnisch.—The Elector, feeling it to be his duty to provide for the religious wants of the people, made it a point to introduce the Catechism into both Church and schools. The ecclesiastical bickerings that had disturbed the first year of his reign, convinced him, that the only way to make head against the decided Lutheranism of his day, was the adoption of the Reformed faith. We cannot, by any means, agree with Dr. Heppe (Dutch. Prot., I., p. 443–447) who affirms, that the Heidelberg Catechism, "is thoroughly Melancthonian and, in no sense, Calvinistic." If we bear in mind that Calvin allowed the communion of the sick — e. g., in his letter to the Montbeliardians: "De cœnæ administratione ita sentio, libenter admittendum esse hunc morem, ut apud aegrotos celebretur communio, cum res et opportunitas feret — hac tamen lege, ut sit vera communio: hoc est ut panis in cœtu aliquo frangatur (Epist. ed.: Gen., 1576, p. 43; see also, l. c., 329); that, touching the monthly celebration of the Lord's Supper, he says: Jam vero singulis mensibus cœnam celebrari maxime nobis placeret malimus tamen singulis mensibus invitari Ecclesiam, quam quater duntaxat in singulos annos: ut apud nos fieri solet. Quam huc primum veni distribuebatur nisi ter quotannis Mihi placebant singuli menses; sed quum minime persuaderem, satius visum est populi infirmitati ignoscere, quam pertinacius contendere. Curavi tamen referri in actu publico vitiosum esse morem nostrum, ut posteris facilius esset ac liberior correctio; that the Calvinistic liturgy of the Church at Frankford provided for monthly communion, and the Herborn Church Discip. by Olevianus who was a thorough-going Calvinist, arranged: Cœna singulis mensibus ad minimum celebretur et quisque suo loco laboret, ut si non singulis dominicis diebus totus ecclesiæ cœtus communicet—Saltem fiat sæpissime: it will not be easy to conclude with Dr. Heppe, that the Church order instituted by the Elector was not Calvinistic in its character, but Melancthonian, or, as he says, "German Evangelical." Nor will any one be able to understand why the general proclamation of the forgiveness of sins should not be of the Reformed practice, who knows anything about the liturgies of the Reformed Church.

The doctrine of the Heidelb. Catechism—which as the same as of the churches called Calvinistic — can be understood only from the point of view of that theology which owes its existence chiefly to the influence of Calvin. Dr. Heppe is wrong when he attempts to derive it from the Frankford Recess, which is so ambiguously worded that the Lutheran need not take offence. Whilst the Catechism presents in clear, precise terms the Reformed views of the Lord's Supper, this does not even approximate to a correct expression of its points. With Calvin and Martyr it teaches that bread and wine are simply signs and seals of the presentation, in the holy transaction, of the heavenly gifts which are all comprehended in the sacrifice of the Cross (Quest. 67). On the one hand, it affirms the Holy Supper to be a memorial and assurance of the fact that the believer has part in the one sacrifice of Christ, a representation of His death and a pledge to the Christian that the body of Christ was broken for him, and His blood shed, and that Christ nourished him to eternal life with His crucified body and shed blood (Quest. 5); and on the other, that, "besides this, the believer is more and more closely united to his glorified body, through the Holy Ghost," and that this body "is in heaven and we on earth." In his defence of the Catechism, p. 317, 318, Ursinus places this point in a very clear light. "The one party," says he, "affirm the body and blood of Christ to be substantially in or with the bread and wine, and so partaken that He enters into their bodies with the bread and wine, from the hand of the administrator, through the mouth of the communicant. The other party, that the body of Christ, no longer on earth, is and ever remains in heaven till he shall come again to judgment. We, although on earth, are not only cleansed from sin by his blood and sufferings, but through His Spirit that dwells in Him and us, are so united and incorporated into His true, real, human body, that from His flesh and bones we are more closely joined to Him than the members of our body to its head, and that we have eternal life in Him and from Him.—From Quest 65, 66, 73, 74, 77, as well as from the fact that the Catechism is intended for believers only, it is clear that it teaches these, and not unbelievers, receive the sacrament. Ursinus thus expresses the difference between the Heidelbergers and the Lutherans. The one party affirm that all who approach the Lord's table, whether believers or unbelievers, eat and drink bodily, and with the mouth, the flesh and blood of Christ; the one to salvation, the other to condemnation. The other, that unbelievers eat the signs only to their condemnation, but only believers eat and drink the body and blood of Christ to eternal life, by means of faith and the operation of His Spirit.

As in this, so in every other doctrine, the Catechism agrees with the theology of the Reformed Church generally, and with that of the Calvinistic type in particular. Take, for instance, its definition of the Church and the distinctively Calvinistic view of the descent into hell. Most unquestionably, nothing Melanchthonian here. Still less is this the case with its doctrine of sin and grace. No one can deny that Melanchthon, who invested the natural man with the facultas applicandi se ad gratiam, was a synergist: whereas the Catechism teaches that "we are wholly incapable of doing any good, and inclined to all wickedness." Questions 1, 31, 51, 53, 54, affirm beyond a doubt the perseverantia sanctorum, the inamissibleness of grace and regeneration. Ursinus thus commentates on Quest. 1: *Inst. Quidsi gratia Christi excidat? Potes enim peccare et deficere: et longum atque arduum est iter in cœlum. Resp. Christus sua beneficia non tantum meritis et semel contulit, sed etiam perpetuo conservabit et donabit me perseverantia, ne deficiam aut excidam a gratia. Explicit., p. 24; on Quest. 53: Locus hic de æterna Dei prædestinatione, seu de electione et reprobatione, oritur ex loco de ecclesia (Epl., p. 392): on Quest. 53; Confirmat (Sp. S.) nos vacillantes in fide et facit certos de salute, hoc est, continuat et conservat beneficia Christi usque ad finem.—Object. Saul et Judas non obtinuerunt hæreditatem et tamen habuerunt Spiritum sanctum. Ergo . . . Resp., Saul et Judas habuerunt Spiritum S. quoad aliqua ejus dona: sed non habuerunt spiritum adoptionis. Inst., Atqui est idem spiritus. Resp., Idem quidem spiritus est, sed non eadem efficit in omnibus. Adoptionem et conversionem in solis electis efficit (Epl., p. 372–374). Fieri non potest ut electi nullas retineant fidei reliquias (p. 380). This anti-Melanchthonian perseverantia sanctorum necessarily leads to the doctrine of Predestination, and, though this is not treated of particularly in the Catechism, it would be as well just to infer that the Palatines and the German Reformed did not hold it, as that those in Geneva discredited it, because their Catechism left it undiscussed. As already stated, the theory of predestination alone corresponds to its view of sin and grace. Besides, the interpreters of it, when handling it theologically, always append this doctrine to Quest. 54, and it is well known that foreign ecclesiastics, so far from distrusting its meaning on this point, adopted it as an orthodox text-book, considered it a shield for Calvinistic doctrine against the Arminians, and the Synod of Dort looked upon it as a sound, correct treatise.*

Notwithstanding this, Dr. Heppe (l. c., p. 446) tells us this doctrine is not in the Catechism because the circumstances in which it originated forbade its admission, and its authors never dreamed of an apostasy (!!) to Calvinism. And yet the theologians of Heidelberg were Calvinists, and most decided Calvinists, as Peter Martyr and Zanchius were called to fill its professorships. Besides, from the judgment passed in favor of Zanchius, Aug. 25, 1561, by the Heidelberg theologians, Boquinus, Tremellius, Olevianus, and Diller, we learn that, before the time of the Catechism Calvin's predestination theory found favor there (comp. Schweitzer, Centrals., I., p. 460–462). Nor will any one be so fool-hardy as to deny the Calvinism of Olevianus. As regards Ursinus, in his Epistola ad D. Jacobum Monan de prædestinatione, he declares he had no views on this subject different from those of the Calvinists Beza and Martyr. Indeed, it would be hard to speak more Calvinistically than he does in his Explicatio, of the Catech. (See Williard's transl., p. 297, &c.)

It is not necessary to enforce the positive Reformed character of its doctrine on Baptism, the relation between the Divine and human natures in Christ (Quest. 47 and 48), and images, while the Scriptures afford a sufficient vindication of Quest. 5-7, against the attacks of infidelity. It is worthy of remark, that some seem not to appreciate the preference that ought to be awarded this book on the score of its making the sum of the law (Matt. 22 : 37-40) the best means for the excitement of a true knowledge of sin, instead of the several commandments in detail. Cocceius remarks very appropriately on Quest. 4: Cum ponenda hic esset quædam sive sanctitatis in lege requisita, optimo consilio Catechesis non posuit Decalogum, quia Deo sic conceptus est, ut potius recessionem a malo, quam bonum, quod in homine debet esse et ad justitiam ejus requiritur, exprimat: sed duo maxima præcepta a Christo indicata (Opp. tom. VI., p. 5); comp. Sudhoff, Fester Grund, p. 215.

Princes and theologians drew the sword against it. Conspicuous among the latter were Laurentius Albertus, who warned Worms and Spire against its poison, the inconstant Franciscus Balduinus, Brenz, Andreä, Hesshus, and M. Flacius Illyricus. The Melanchthonian theologians of Wittenberg, also, combatted it. The Elector, however, stood firm, and every body knows how brilliantly he conducted himself when assailed by the Lutherans, their princes at their head, who combined with the Romish bishops and Cardinal Commendone to destroy his influence.

The Catholics disliked it, and succeeded, during the Thirty Years' War, in suppressing it. One of their most generally known controversial treatises of this period, is Koppenstein's Excalvinizata Catechesis Calvino-Heidelbergensis: Cologne, 1621. The Reformed replies found in Kücher, Katechet. Geschichte der Reform. Kirche: Jena, 1756, p. 349. Walch's Biblioth., Bd. I., p. 528.—With the year 1685, when a Roman Catholic ruler swayed the Palatinate, the opposition to it waxed warm. The Jesuits directed their artillery particularly against the eightieth Question. Lenfant vindicated it in his L'innocence du Cat. de Heidelberg, 1688. In the year 1719, appeared the prohibition of the Elector Charles Phillip, which suppressed it. The Reformed party, however, not disheartened, at last succeeded in having the prohibition withdrawn. The war again broke forth in the year 1738, when the Jesuits of Cologne issued two tracts on the subject. The Catechism, however, held on in its course. In 1568, it was adopted by the Weseler Synod, by the Emden Synod, 1571, by the Swiss, earlier. It was introduced into Holland, 1568, Hesse, Brandenburg, and Anhalt. In Hungary it was used as a text-book, and highly regarded in Poland, France, and England.

For its literature see Struve's Pfälzische Kirchenhist.; Kücher's Katechet. Geschichte; van Alpen Gench. u. Literat. des Heidelb. Cat.; Augusti, Einleit. in d. beiden Hauptkat. d. Evang. K. Also, the commentaries by Ursinus and Olevianus, and "Fester Grund christl. Lehre. Ein Hilfsbuch zum Heidelb. Cat., Zusammengestellt aus deutschen Schriften Dr.

Caspar Olevianus, &c., by Südhoff.: Frankf., 1854." Comp. Art. in Ersch and Gruber.

LIC. R. SUDHOFF.—Ermentraut.

Helbon, a place whence Damascenes (Ezek. 27 : 18) brought wine to Tyre. Robinson in his second journey identified it in a village called Helbon, N. W. of Damascus, still noted for its wine. At one time Helbon was thought to be the modern Haleb, which also produces wine; it was then associated with Χαλβών (Ptol. 5, 15, 17; Strabo, XV., 735). But Ptol. 5, 15, 13, expressly distinguishes X. from "Bercia," which the Byzantines considered the old name of Haleb, which first flourished in the middle ages. Besides the X. of Ptol. lies too far N. (See Robinson, Palest.; Rochart, hieroz., I., 543, sq.; Winer, RWB.; Ritter, Erdk., XVII., 2 S., 1319, &c.). RÜRTSCHL.*

Helena, St.—The Romish Church has three saints of this name, all of high rank, a Russian, a Swedish Zealander, and the mother of Constant. M. (see Art.), born c. 274. Gloucester, Treves, Upper Mœsia, and Bithynia claim to be the home of the last. Constant. Chlorus shall have married her for her beauty. It is probably an error that she was at first his concubine, for such were then designated by ambiguous names. When Constant. became Cæsar, Helena had to yield place to the daughter of Maximian. She lived retired, perhaps in Treves, until her son's elevation, when he allowed her large participation in the imperial honors, made her an Augusta, and had coins struck in her honor. It is uncertain whether the mother or son first renounced heathenism. She exerted a softening influence upon the tyrannical temper of her son. The large means he gave her were used in acts of mercy, or in decorating churches. She made her celebrated pilgrimage to Palestine, c. 325, where she discovered the grave and cross of Christ. She built pilgrim churches on Calvary, the Mount of Olives, and in Bethlehem. These acts furnished incentives to subsequent crusades. In 327 she returned and died in her son's arms. The Romans say her remains lie in the Ara-Cæli Church, on Capitoline Mount. But the monks of Hautvilliers, near Rheims, affirm that one of their number removed the body in the 9th cent. to their monastery. The Venetians, however, declare that she was buried in Constantinople and then brought to Venice. Thus the Romish Church kneels, on Aug. 18, simultaneously at three graves of this imperial saint. It is certain that scarcely any other woman exerted so much influence upon Church customs. REUCHLIN.*

Heliodorus.—1) Treasurer of Seleucus III., Philopater (187-176, B. C.), who sent him to Jerusalem to demand the treasures of the temple. When he reached the temple he was prostrated by a miraculous appearance, and was only restored by the prayers of Anias (2 Macc. 3 : 7, &c.). Josephus says nothing of this, and the author of de Maccab., c. 4, mentions an Apollonius, but not the miracle. Subsequently H. aspired to the throne, and poisoned Seleucus, but Antiochus Epiph. soon subdued him. Appian. Syriac, XLV., 60-70. — 2) H. of Emesa, son of Theodosius, of an ancient sacerdotal family, c. 390. In youth he wrote romance, Aethiopica; afterwards he became king of Tricca in Thessalia. Socr. (H. E., V. 22) says he was the first to depose priests who, after their consecration, would not leave their wives. Ptolemy (H. E., XII., 34) says that a provincial synod condemned H. for his romance, and required him either to destroy the book, or quit his See. H. did the latter. But this account seems improbable, as the book furnishes no ground of accusation. It relates the adventures of two lovers, Chariclea, the daughter of an Ethiopian king, and Theages, a noble Thessalian, who, after continuing faithful to each other amid many trials and dangers were at last rewarded by a happy union. Its moral tone is above that of all other Greek romances. From the book it seems that H. was acquainted with Christianity, but had not yet embraced it.—We have no further accounts of the life of H.—3) H., native of Dalmatia, who accompanied Jerome on his Oriental journey, but returned to his home until Jerome persuaded him to come back by his beautiful letter de amore solitudinis. He subsequently became a priest in Aquileia, then Bishop of Altino. Jerome commends him for having as Bishop maintained a strict monastic life.—4) H., a priest in Antioch, c. 440, wrote de naturis rerum exordium against the Manicheans, in which he tries to confute their error of two original principles.

TH. PRESSEL.*

Heliogobalus, Roman Emperor, A. D., 218–22, was a son of the Roman Senator, Varius Marcellus and Julia Soëmis; his original name was Varius Avitus Bassianus. In his 13th year he was consecrated high-priest of the sun at Emesa, near the Orontes. Heliogobalus is the Greek name of the Syrian Phœnician god, ἥλιος, i. e., deus montis, hence originally a mountain deity, but who afterwards was regarded as a sun-god. The orgies with which he was worshipped consisted of dances to the sounds of all sorts of instruments, in which women with cymbals and drums took part. Human sacrifices, especially boys, were offered. The youthful high-priest was revered by the Roman troops stationed in winter-quarters at Emesa, who readily recommended him as Emperor. Macrinus, obnoxious to the effeminate Romans for his strict discipline, was conquered in a battle against the rebels at Immæ, and Rome bowed to the yoke of H., but 14 years old, who became the first Roman Emperor of Asiatic descent. Utterly degraded and enervated by his licentiousness, H. exhibits the picture of a moral monster. The great object of his reign was to introduce into Rome the worship of his deity. Soon after he entered the city he had a splendid temple to the sun built upon Mt. Palatine; in it he placed the conic stone which he brought from Syria. Sacrifices were offered, with all the gorgeousness and voluptuousness of the Syrian worship. Other temples were robbed to adorn this, and all other deities declared subservient to the god of the sun. A public festival was held in honor of the nuptials between the sun-god and Astarte. H. himself submitted to circumcision, and forbade the use of swine-flesh—and is even said to have meditated his own castration in imitation of the priests of Cybele. But during his reign Christians had rest. As he introduced innovations upon the old Roman cultus, it was politic in him to tolerate other new religions. He and his mother perished in a tumult of the soldiers; his mutilated body was dragged through the city, and thrown into the Tiber. A subsequent decree of the Senate loaded his name with reproach.

TH. PRESSEL.*

Hell, Christ's descent into, Descensus ad inferos, κατάβασις εἰς ᾗδου. This designation of the corresponding dogma in the doctrine of the person of Christ, and there regarding his twofold state, is taken from the phraseology of the Apostles' creed. G. Holger Waage, de aetate articuli, quo in symbolo apost. traditur J. Chi. ad inferos descensus commentatio, 1886, has refuted the common view, advocated especially by Peter King in his Historia Symb. Apost., c. 4, that the article was introduced in opposition to Apollinarianism. Rufinus, Expos. Symb. Aquilejensis, c. 18, says the article was found in the confession of the Church at Aquileia, c. 390, but not in the symbols of Rome or the Eastern churches. But a careful comparison of the various editions of the creed, as far as known (WALCH, Bibl. Symb. Vet.) shows that the article was admitted before Rufinus' time. Whilst it is not found in most copies prior to the 6th cent. (although the Church Fathers frequently dwell upon the subject), at the beginning of the 7th it is commonly, and in the 8th cent. constantly met with. Its incorporation with the creed was, therefore, gradual, but only because its importance came to be more deeply felt.—In the nature of the case the dogma must have kept pace, on the one hand, with that of the person and work of Christ, on the other, with eschatological views; so that the gradual development of these doctrines must reflect themselves in that of the Descensus. The orthodox doctrine of the various churches does not agree, therefore, in this case, upon any point. The Greek Church, resting upon the Bible and tradition, holds that the Descensus was the voluntary descent into hades of the human soul of Christ as united with the Godhead; whilst there, from the time of his death until his resurrection, he preached the gospel to those held under Satan's dominion on account of original sin, and offered them salvation, and led believers, especially Old Test. saints from hades into Paradise (Conf. Orthod., I., 49). The Romish Church holds, resting on tradition alone, that the whole person of Christ, in the inseparable union of the human and divine natures, voluntarily descended to the Limbus patrum, bosom of Abraham, or ante-hell of the fathers, the ignis purgatorius; there he proved himself the Son of God by overpowering the demons, granted to the fathers, who ibi que sine ullo doloris sensu quiescentia habitatione fruebantur, the merits of his death, and raised them from limbus into heaven (Cat. Rom., § 100–105). In Lutheran theology we find a real descent into hell. Christ, the Godman, after the vivificatio and redemptio animæ et corporis, immediately before manifesting himself as arisen, early on the first day of the week, went with his soul and body into the place of the damned, having spent the interval from his death until then in Paradise. This was primum resurrectionis momentum, the lowest step of the status exaltationis. Then first he took possession of the regnum potentiae, and displayed his triumph over the devil and his angels, whilst his preaching to them was legalis and damnatoria (Form. Conc. art., 9). Reformed theology holds that Christ spent the interval between his death and resurrection in Paradise, without associating this, however, with the Descensus, which is to be taken metaphorically. Regarding a literal descent of Christ into hell as a contrad. in adjecto, the Reformed explain this article as referring to the unutterable hellish anguish endured by the Saviour in his human soul, in his death (Calvin, Inst., II., 16, 8–12. Heid. Cat., Q. 44. Niemeyer, 132, 402).

On the Lutheran side, the dogma being considered an integral part in the doctrine of the person of Christ, the views sanctioned by the Church were tenaciously maintained; and various attempts to modify those views (by Dreyer, Artopoeus, Russ, &c.) were put down. Dietelmayer (Hist. dogm. de desc. Chi., etc., 1741, 1762) cites many leading theologians as advocates of the Church view. On the Reformed side it has been otherwise. Alongside of the orthodox view we find Descendere explained of the simple burial of Christ (Beza, Drusius, Amama, &c.), or of his state of death, status ignominiosus (Piscator, the remonstrants Arminius, Limborch, &c.). Others, unconsciously, came nearer the truth in the case, although by an arbitrary allegorization, the article almost lost its significance in the creed. Zwingli, already, with Megander, Leo Judä, Bullinger, P. Martyr, and Melancthon also, almost discovered the doctrine of Christian antiquity, as derived from the hints of the Bible. Even early in the 17th cent. Rob. Parker wrote an extensive apology of the symbolical, Church interpretation of the article. But from the year 1650, this interpretation was more and more surrendered. Lightfoot and Pearson subjected it to a triumphant criticism. Subsequently, when the orthodox system gave way, the Descensus became a withered branch of a tree at whose root the axe was laid. Some thought it a Jewish mythical mode of describing the condition of Christ in hades; others, a symbolical representation of Christ's love in abiding in a sinful world (Marheineke, Ackermann), or the universality of the salvation obtained by Christ (de Wette, Hase, Grimm). Schleiermacher thought the entire account destitute of proof (G. L., II., § 99, 1).

The following points we regard as clearly taught in the New Test. 1) Christ, during the time that his body lay in the grave, manifested himself to the departed in hades. Whilst Eph. 4 : 8–10, may not be cited in support of this view, Paul assumes a κατάβασις εἰς τὸν ἄβυσσον in Rom. 10 : 6–8. But in Acts 2 : 31, cf. 37, it is directly said, ὅτι οὐ παρέλειπεν (Χριστὸς) εἰς ἄδου, and in Luke 23 : 43, Jesus assures the penitent thief: σήμερον μετ' ἐμοῦ ἔσῃ ἐν τῷ παραδείσῳ (see Hades). 2) Christ went as a πνεῦμα to the dead in their kingdom (1 Pet. 3 : 18, &c.; Acts 2 : 27). 3) There he carried on his work of preaching the gospel (1 Pet. 3 : 19). Whether Peter meant only the contemporaries of Noah, or all who died before Christ, cannot be decided from the passage. 4) But from 4 : 6, νεκροὶς ἐν ἡγγελισμῷ (cf. 5) all the dead seem to be meant. The object of this preaching is stated (v. 6) to have been that they might "live in the spirit" according to God's plan and purpose of mercy. There are other passages, which, although they do not explicitly teach a Descensus, cannot be explained on any other ground.

If it must be admitted that the soul of man, from his death to the resurrection at the ἀνάστασις τοῦ κόσμου, occupies a middle state in hades, it follows from the humanity of Christ, that he must have shared this universal lot of mankind. But as he submitted to this only in fulfilment of obedience to all the laws of humanity, hades had no power to retain this sinless second Adam. His Descensus, therefore, was only the concluding part of that perfecting process (Heb. 2 : 10) through which the divine-human person of Christ passed in attaining to its proper οὐρα τῆς δόξης. Hence the Descensus belongs neither to the status exinanitionis, nor to the status exaltationis, but is the transition from one to the other, and represents the unity of both.—In determining the soteriological significance of the manifestation of Christ among the dead, we must assume that he entered the realm of spirits in his own proper identity, as the God-man, in whom God has fully revealed himself to man, and who, therefore, exerts a redemptive power in all ways. His very entrance into that middle state was a proclamation of the grace of God in him, his presentation of himself as a soul among souls was in itself an announcement of the absolute fulness of truth in him, the manifestation of that light of the world "which lighteth every man." Filled with the spirit and love of God the Father, the redemptive virtue, the principle of salvation, which constitutes his being,—the saving life-power of God which dwells absolutely in him, is there imparted personally to those, who, united to him by faith, stand in living communion with him.—We have no means of ascertaining the result of this activity of Christ among the dead, excepting the analogy afforded by the operations of grace in this life. If before his Descensus hades was divided into Abraham's bosom and the place of torments, the gulf of separation must have widened after Christ's preaching there.—(See J. L. KÖNIG, d. Lehre v. Chr. Hölle. : Frankf., 1842. GÜDER, d. Lehre v. d. Ersch. Jesu Chr. unter d. Todten. : Bern., 1853. Even WIRSIUS, Exercit. s. in symb. ap., 1730, thought: de descensu tantum ferme dissertatum est, quantum est muscarum, quum caletur maxime). GÜDER.*

Hell punishments.—Immortality is the destiny of all men, but eternal life is secured only to those who become partakers of the divine life of Christ, and thus have been born of God, and delivered from sin. All salvation is unchangeably bound to real life-communion with Christ. So far, therefore, as man attains his true destiny only in the realization of the divine image in himself, his eternal misery must consist in that perversion of his being involved in his alienation from God. This alienation increases, ob-actively, with man's bondage to his selfish tendency, and with his sinful decrease of liberty to return to God. As a necessary result of the unreconciled contradiction between the true idea of man and his actual character, it is a state of punishment, in the form of the realized relation of evil to man's nature as created by and for God. This punishment becomes absolute damnation at the judgment to be connected with the second coming of Christ (Matt. 25 : 41 ; 1 : 23 ; Rev. 20 : 15). But the condition of the ungodly, before and after that event, is represented as essentially the same.—The New Testament sets forth the misery of the lost in symbolical language (Mark 9 : 44, 46 ; Matt. 25 : 30 ; Heb. 10 : 27 ; 2 Pet. 3 : 7 ; 2 Thess. 1 : 8, 9 ; Rev. 4 : 10, 11 ; 20 : 15 ; 21 : 8). These expressions have from the first been variously explained ; some have taken them figuratively only, others literally. Earlier writers speak of material fire, yet differing from terrestrial fire. Dante's representations of hell were considered as something more than poetic fancies. The body as well as the soul were thought subject to those punishments. Though, others again, explained the punishments as chiefly inward, supposing the fire that of burning passions, or an unrestrained sense of guilt (Origen, &c.), and the sting of hell to consist in the utter impotence of the damned (Eckhart, Duns Scotus, &c.). But however true it may be that the punishments of hell spring in part from within the soul, it is certain that his inward wretchedness will find its aggravating counterpart in external circumstances. For the second death will consist—1) in a self-condemning exclusion from all participation in the happiness of eternal life in heaven, the pœna damnationis, or mala privativa of older theologians ; 2) in the pœna sensus or mala positiva, which again is interna and externa, viz., the full consciousness of deserved damnation ; the unsolved contradiction between the ideal of life, and its hopeless perversion into confirmed selfishness, connected with an inherent sense of ruin, and restless destruction of personal existence ; consuming enmity to God ; unavoidable association with the lost ; the agony of ungodly desires which cannot be appeased ; and the extreme misery of their external condition. — As to the locality where all this will be endured, besides knowing that there will be no place for it in "the new heavens and new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness," we can designate it in no better terms than those of our Lord who declares it to be in "outer darkness."—Although the eternity of hell punishments has been frequently disputed, the doctrine is strongly asserted in the Scriptures, not only in single passages (Matt. 25 : 46, cf. 41 ; 26 : 24 ; Mark 9 : 43, &c. ; Matt. 12 : 32, cf. Mark 3 : 29 ; Rev. 14 : 11 ; 20 : 10), but still more forcibly by the general tenor of the New Test., which always assumes that the divine plan of redemption will not, in fact, prove availing for all, and that at the second coming of Christ there will not only be a moral separation of men, but that the true ἔσχατος, the συντελεία του αἰῶνος τούτου will be attained. And this has from the first been the doctrine of the Church, some individuals excepted, as Origen and some of his followers, the school of Antioch, many Chiliast and pantheistic mystics, and later, but on wholly different grounds, the rationalists. Indeed the doctrine must follow from the self-determining power with which God has been pleased, even to the limitation of his own absoluteness, to endow man ; hence he may eternally destroy himself. That many will do it is plainly declared in the Bible, and receives further corroboration from what we sadly witness in daily life, in their contempt of the only plan of salvation. "He that believeth not the Son, shall not see life ; but the wrath of God abideth on him." — (See J. F. CORTA, Hist. succincta dogm. de pœn. infern. duratione : Tüb., 1774. J. A. DIETELMAYR, commenti fanatici ἀποκαταστάσεως πάντων hist. antiquior : Altorf, 1769. ERBKAM, in Stud. u. Krit., 1838, 2, 384–464). GÜDER.*

Hellenists was the name given by national Greeks to those foreigners who adopted the customs, manners, language and other peculiarities of the Greeks. The Hellenization of foreign nations occurred, from times immemorial, everywhere on the coasts of the Mediterranean sea, where the two elements came into close contact, on account of the superiority of Greek civilization ; but more extensively, and in connection with political principles, since the time of Alexander and his successors, especially the Seleucidæ and Ptolemies, who carried it on systematically, and even forcibly. The result in Asia and Africa, after a thousand years, was very small ; but for the time the immediate object, the firm establishment of the new government, was completely attained. The immigration of Greek colonists, the influence of the court, of the government, of the army, of trade, literature, the founding and enlargement of numberless towns and cities, all this finally accomplished more than the sword was able to do in this direction.

But now there existed also, in the nations of Semitic origin, an instinct to travel and to trade, and the Jews especially followed it. On this account it happened, that the stream of Greek immigration was met with the stream of Jewish emigration, which also cast itself upon the young Macedonian cities, gained a footing everywhere, animated commerce and industry, and developed that innate spirit of speculation, which has remained to this day the most prominent trait of the Jewish character. These two streams, however, did not mingle. For the same legislation, whose material side was so easily stripped off, stamped upon the nation a culture so peculiar, and, what is not to be forgotten, so pre-eminently religious and moral, together with an aversion to foreigners so personal, that an absorption of it by the Greeks was impossible ; much rather, notwithstanding all other approaches, everything that was connected with their faith made a gulf so wide between the two nations, that it not only protected their faith from every danger and temptation, and preserved their peculiar customs, but also aroused every bad passion which could separate them. In such relations it is a question of the highest interest to inquire in what measure the Jewish element yielded to or resisted foreign influence, in other words, what spheres of public and private life, what sides of the national character were most affected and changed by the Hellenization. The answering of this question will bring before us the image of Hellenistic Judaism.

The Jews were not so skilled in the arts and learned in the sciences as not to need foreign teachers. They possessed but a small degree of the warlike spirit, and this was connected with sacred traditions and religious ideas, by which it was removed from the common political sphere. Commerce is, in its nature, cosmopolitan; every step forward in it was, in fact, a departure from the spirit of the law and the prophets, and so much the more remarkable, because the Jews did not regard it as such. By means of it the two neighboring and jealous ruling houses sought at the same time to gain a foothold on the soil and in the hearts of the nation which separated them, and each ministering largely to the Jewish greed for gain, they entirely blunted the national conservative sense of honor. If the Jews had not possessed so powerful a restraint in their religion, they would then already have been absorbed by the Greeks. The best proof of this, apart from the affectation of assuming Greek names, is, that wherever the two came into contact, the Jews surrendered that which is most precious and peculiar to a nation—their language, with an ease almost unparalleled in history. But in spite of this wonderful capacity and willingness of the Jews to feel at home in foreign elements and even to forget the language of their fathers, their religious faith, as already remarked, raised a high wall of partition between them and foreign nations. Far removed as they might be from home, and powerful as were the temptations in prosperity and adversity, apostasy was ever the unfrequent exception. Wherever there were Jews, there were also synagogues, the strongholds of the national spirit and the targets of foreign antipathy.

Here we come to that part of our subject, when it becomes important for the history of Christianity, and where the more profound contemplation of it clearly reveals the high providential connection existing between the destinies and relations of nations. The transformation of Hebrew Jews into Hellenists is not only of statistical or philological interest; its consequences reached farther and wider. The Hellenization of Judaism, now already not only means the adoption of the Greek language and of Greek customs by Jews, but at the same time the bringing of Jewish faith and doctrines nearer to the Greek population, at a period when heathenism was approaching an unavoidable catastrophe. Its dominion over the minds of men was already broken; doubt, science, and immorality were undermining it, and where this was not the case, an insipid, unpoetical, foreign superstition took the place of religious conviction. However, there were many individuals, who were not able to find satisfaction, either in the intoxication of the senses, the abstractions of philosophy, or in the delusions of the mysteries and secret sciences. These often found their way to the synagogue, where they learned to know the God of Israel, edified themselves by prayer, praise, and preaching, as never before at the altars of their gods, and the female sex especially soon and in large numbers took part in exercises, for which heathenism had no equivalent.

If now, on the one hand, Hellenistic Judaism broke the way for a better religion, in the midst of a heathen population, so on the other, the peculiar development to which it was subjected by its foreign surroundings modified the fundamental elements of the Jewish character. We can say, in general, that in the populous commercial cities, amid the tumult and confusion of dialects and business, where what was national and peculiar was banished to the narrow limits of day, place, and hour, while things common and uniting ruled exclusively everywhere else, where, so to speak, a freer atmosphere dissipated the heavy fog of narrow-hearted and local prejudices, the Jews gradually must be disposed to judge less unfavorably what was foreign, to acknowledge the universally human, without any danger to their monotheism. For it must not be forgotten, that outside of Jerusalem, the public Jewish worship consisted only in the above-named exercises, there was no offering of sacrifices, and consequently it must lose its importance for the reflecting. The Hellenist, without wishing or knowing it, became more and more freed from the bonds of Levitico-pharisaic traditions; he had preachers, no priests; and this change did, by no means, proceed from indifference; it was the natural result of the circumstances. We do not say by this, that all Jews speaking Greek were in the same manner raised above the exclusive views of those speaking Hebrew—the acts of the Apostles give proofs of the contrary. However, it is just the way in which the gospel was spread, that shows what powerful assistance the circumstances described above furnished. The gospel, already as preached by Jesus, made a marked separation between the essential and non-essential in religion, contrasted love and sacrifice, the worship on Gerizim or Zion and in spirit and truth, recognized true faith also outside of Israel, and offered salvation to all nations—things, which, to say the least, must be more intelligible to a Hellenistic mind, if not always consistently more acceptable. Those disciples, who were the eloquent bearers of this side of the message, were all Hellenists, and their preaching found the best soil among the Hellenists. In Palestine, where the Jew was at home and wished to be his own master, the heathen was doubly unwelcome, in whatever form he came; he was called the sinner, the ungodly, the unrighteous, simply because he was a foreigner. National prejudice was the source of moral self-overestimation which, at the same time, resisted the influence of the gospel. Many of the Jews at Jerusalem refused to accept a gospel that they must receive in common with the uncircumcised; at Antioch not only the market, but also the synagogue, to a certain extent, was common to both. How deep the gulf was between the two elements of the Jewish nation, when the Church was first established, we learn from this circumstance, that already where the Church is first spoken of (Acts 6), mention is made of an unhappy dissatisfaction, the occasion of which was plainly a trifling circumstance, the real cause, however, being the national antipathy. We commit to exegesis the application of the ideas here developed, for the better understanding of the text and history of the New Testament. ED. REUSS.—Beck.

Hellenistic Idiom is the current designation of that mode of speech, which was employed by the Jews who either lived among the Greeks or had intercourse with them. From the preceding article it must be evident to the reader, that the Jews did not obtain their knowledge of Greek by education, as the Romans did, but through direct intercourse in practical life. For such the chief matter was not, that they should be able to understand the spirit of the foreign language in its peculiarity, but only be able to make themselves understood in common life, have a stock of words large enough to satisfy the wants of material and social relations, and possess the necessary facility in speaking, in which definiteness of meaning is more important than correctness of expression. Moreover, the Jews in the Greek commercial cities not only learned the Greek in this way with rapid ease, but, at the same time, unlearned their native language equally rapidly, or ceased to use it gradually in the family, just in order to learn the Greek more quickly, so that it came to pass, that in the second or third generation it was no longer necessary to learn it from the Greeks.

Before proceeding further we must call attention to a circumstance, which was formerly only very imperfectly known, and on this account led to many mistakes in judging of facts which are here to be considered. At the time when the commingling of nations began to assume large proportions, in consequence of the conquests of Alexander, the Greek language suffered changes lasting and comprehensive enough to arouse the attention of scholars and to give rise to studies, from which proceeded, for the first time in the history of literature, the science of philology. These changes were manifold in their character. It is of least importance to note, that the Greek language was compelled to take up many foreign words, Egyptian, Persian, Semitic, the names of animals, plants, raw materials, fabrics, implements, arrangements of public and private life of various kinds. It is more remarkable, that, together with the new political order of things, which created great kingdoms and pushed the petty States and their narrow-minded policy into the background, proceeded also the fusion of the local dialects into a common Greek universal language. Of course, the common man at Athens continued to speak the Attic, at Sparta the Doric, at Halicarnassus the Ionic dialect, but they mutually approached each other on a middle ground, especially in the new cities, where the population was not of the same origin, finally in the literature of the time. This common language, on account of the superiority of the Athenian spirit, developed itself from the basis of the Attic dialect. But in the same degree in which it became the common language, it also became mixed, in that it took up lingual materials of different local origin, or produced something altogether new. We know in part from the old grammarians themselves how, and how far, this was the case; they note the separate manifestations rubrically or alphabetically, or critically; and our better lexicons, especially those for the New Test., contain these notices. New forms of inflexion, especially in verbs, were formed; nouns changed their gender; certain characteristic derivative final syllables became prominent, or were changed; lost roots were restored, or those in use were supplanted by derivatives; known words assumed new meanings; figurative modes of speech, formerly belonging to an artificial style, were used in the language of common conversation, or vulgar expressions were honored with literary citizenship; new ideas, and still more the plastic power of the language, created new words continually, which were as picturesque and expressive in their composition as rich and national in their power and naturalness. Much, also, that we meet with for the first time in the monuments of the Macedonian period, may indeed be older, but may have been then first brought out of the obscurity of the vulgar language, or from a more remote province into the focus of the new metropolitan civilization.

This last remark leads us still further. The Greek tribe, which gained dominion through Alexander, and which was the farthest scattered and the most influential, was that one which hitherto had relatively manifested the least intellectual life. It is certainly, therefore, not without reason, that a Macedonian coloring of the later Greek language has been spoken of. From Alexandria proceeded a tendency, which not only gave tone to the customs and character of the Greek nation, but also especially to its language. Here especially were combined all the productive powers of social culture, commerce, art, science, and literature, in order to found an intellectual kingdom. With justice, therefore, an Alexandrian dialect is spoken of, with which we are also acquainted especially through the MSS. of the New Test., which were made here, and of which some modern critics even affirm, that it was the dialect which the Apostles employed in their writings. If this affirmation were true, it would be necessary to admit further, that the present lingual form of the printed Greek text of the New Test. had a later origin, at the time when Alexandrian culture and its influence were destroyed by the Arabs, and Byzantium became the centre of literary, as well as of ecclesiastical life.

Without pursuing these investigations further, we will proceed to inquire as to what became of the Greek language in the hands of the Orientals, and especially within the sphere of a religious application. Here a fact of great importance at once meets us. It is well known, that the Mosiac pentateuch was translated into Greek at Alexandria already in the reign of the second Ptolemy; at a time, therefore, when a generation of Jews flourished, whose immediate ancestors were the first who were compelled to speak Greek. The history of this version, it is true, is now very fabulous; but we will certainly not err, if we refer it to a felt ecclesiastical want, and not to a princely caprice, as is commonly done. The first look into this version shows with what a limited knowledge of the Greek language it was undertaken. We do not refer here to such mistakes as originated from a defective hermeneutics on the part of the translators, or from a corrupted text, but to the numberless examples of Greek expressions wrongly applied, which had not the meaning given to them, and to the Hebrew constructions. For many ideas of religious and ecclesiastical (to say nothing of economical or political) life, adequate Greek expressions were altogether wanting; for many more the unlearned translators had none; and, being familiar only with the language of the market and exchange, they selected without hesitation such expressions as were equivalent in common life, without any reference to the usus loquendi. We have long been acquainted, through the Bible, with such mannerisms, and we are no longer offended in many cases at the Hebrew phrases; but what must a Greek have thought when he heard such expressions as these: all flesh, seed, snare, heathen, fruit of the loins, upright heart, cup, tongue, lip of the sea, to seek the soul, anointed, to walk, etc.? The particles, always the most difficult in learning a foreign language, gave the Jew no trouble, for they remained Hebrew; the oath clothed itself as yet in the elliptical formula of condition; the universal copula also performed its manifold service in the new vesture; the status constructus served the customary relations; indirect address, participial construction, parenthesis, subordination of proposition, fine distinction of prefixes, with their changing cases, the conjunctions and moods, all levelled and smoothed themselves into the clear, simple, artless structure of the sentences of the Old Test. Such a theory and practice of translation was an invaluable blessing for Judaism, but is not yet sufficiently prized by history. We venture the assertion, that the formation of the Jewish-Greek language of the Bible was the first and most indispensable pre-requisite for the further and lasting influence of the revelation contained in the Old Test., and propagated in the schools. The Hebrew spirit so perfectly rules the Greek body in it, that it is often necessary for us foreigners, at the present day, in order to understand the seventy translators, to go back to the original text.

But what was thus far the effect of natural relations in the way described, soon became a co-operative cause. The Alexandrian Bible became, to a certain extent, for the Hellenists, what the Koran was later for the Arabs, or Luther's translation for the Germans, and this the more so, because the so-called Hellenistic literature was essentially religious. Still we meet with important various colorings, and we must examine the causes which produced them. There were several.

The first is that all authors did not possess the talent for language. As a matter of course, some among the Jews were more, others less gifted by nature, had less opportunity, or did not seek it, to obtain a better knowledge of the language. Apart from the fact, therefore, that we find some among the so-called Apocrypha mere translations of the Old Test., it will not appear strange to us, if the legends in this same collection bear the character of the most vulgar Hellenistic mode of expression, as the one more natural to the sphere from which they proceeded, and for which they were designed, whilst the talented author of the Book of Wisdom approaches nearer to the Greek spirit in form and expression. If we pass to the Apostles and their contemporaries, certainly no one will at this day deny that a striking difference exists between the different books of the New Test. as regards style. As proof of this, we need not compare the two extremes, the Epistle to the Hebrews and the Apocalypse. Matthew differs from Luke, Luke from John; and Paul from all; and, in the absence of all tradition, the first glance, at the first Epistle of John for instance, apart from its contents, would ascribe it to the author of the fourth gospel. If we inquire, now, wherein do these peculiarities of style exist? we are brought to the second cause of the changes in the Hellenic idiom.

The kernel of a language is the words of which it consists. At this time already a gradual change began to take place in the material of Hellenistic idiom. On the one hand, it was modified by the transformation of the later Hebrew, on the other, it enriched itself from the Greek. We need not detain ourselves with the last fact. It was natural that the acquisitions in this direction should increase, and that correct and well-selected expressions should be found in the New Test., of which the old Alexandrian translators made no use, or also such as are found more after genuine Hellenic than Hebrew analogy. Luke, and even the Epistle of James, furnish us with interesting examples of this kind. But the spirit of Palestinian culture also reacted continually upon the language. A dialect modelled after the Aramaic gradually took the place of the old classic Hebrew, which not only continued to use grammatical absurdities, but also particular expressions and tropes, which were foreign to the Old Test., ex. gr. to taste of death, to free from death, to loose and bind, flesh and blood, this and the world to come, demoniac, powers or deeds of power for miracles, to remove mountains, a camel going through the eye of a needle, which, however, were familiar to the Hellenists of the later generations from infancy, and were brought over by them. Indeed, apart from the newer Aramaisms, the period of the New Test. is acquainted with Hebrew modes of expression, which, although very old as to their roots, now for the first became more universal in derived meanings, forms, and applications, ex. gr., way for tendency, bowels for sympathy, unclean spirits, and many others. But infinitely more important than the two sources of change just mentioned, is the influence of the Christian spirit and the ideas awakened by it. Hundreds of important and deeply significant expressions, which have been adopted by all modern languages, were created by the first disciples who spoke Greek. Such are faith, grace, works, mystery, flesh and blood, spiritual, redemption, saints, Saviour, messenger, regeneration, gospel, to justify, to save, to edify, to awaken, and numberless others. To sum up, in a word, the Hellenistic idiom was slavishly bound to translating during the Jewish period; during the Christian it was free and creative.

Finally, as regards the more intellectual elements of the science of language, it will not be difficult to show, that each of the writers of the New Test. used them differently. John, ex. gr., how altogether Hebraic the disposition of his propositions! how simple the connection of his thoughts! In his constantly recurring καὶ and ἐν there is no Greek spirit. How differently do the thoughts weave themselves into rhetorical periods in the Epistle to the Hebrews, in the introduction of Luke, and in some of the addresses of the second part of the Acts of the Apostles! And in Paul we can clearly distinguish the currents of the soul wrestling with the language, which is not sufficient for the thoughts: Jewish dialectics, with its incomplete syllogisms, its citations crossing the natural flow of speech, its everything that can make the word dark and the sentence unpleasant, and with it that captivating rhetoric of the heart, the genuine outflow of the new life, which reflects the internal wealth of feeling and intuition in the external wealth of synonyms and figures.

A few historical and critical remarks, in conclusion upon the treatises on this subject.

The philological learning of the period of the restoration of learning and of the Reformation was not sufficient to fathom it. Still it is deserving of mention, that classically educated men, such as H. Stephanus and Beza, were on the way correctly to apprehend the peculiarity of the style of the New Test., but their investigations lack completeness and connection. In the first half of the 17th cent., a mistaken theological zeal earnestly took up the investigation, but conducted it, as regards the material, altogether superficially and one-sidedly, and as regards the motive of decision, transferred it from the sphere of history to that of a dogmatic formula. We refer to the endless quarrel about the Hebraisms of the New Test. The course of this unrefreshing, and, on the whole, fruitless controversy, is related in Morus Acroas hermen., 1797, T. I., in Planck's Einl. in die Theol., II., p. 42, sqq., in the Jena Programm by Eichstädt, 1845, etc. We will simply remark with regard to it, that already the circumstance, that the treatises almost exclusively referred to the Old Test., to the entire neglect of the New, is sufficient evidence, that they were not on the way to get at the truth. And even now, when a bright light has been thrown upon the subject by the united labors of many theologians, of whom we will only mention J. F. Fischer, J. F. Schleusner, C. G. Bretschneider, H. Planck, G. Bd. Winer, Chas. Abr. Wahl, Chas. G. Wilke, J. A. H. Tittmann, Chas. G. Gersdorf, whose thorough grammatical and lexicographical results also have found their way into all the best commentaries on the New Test., it must still be said, that the province of ante-Christian Hellenism has been relatively but little cultivated. Thankworthy contributions are made by single exegetical works on the Apocryphal books, such as Thiersch's work on the Alexandrian Pentateuch, 1841; but a grammar is altogether wanting, and the Lexicon, even in its latest form (Schleusneri, Thesaurus, 1820), is little else than a concordance, from which, it is true, may be seen the exegetical mistakes of the translators, but which gives but little insight into the richness of the language.

All the sources of information on this subject may be found in Geschichte des Neuen Testam., Ed. Reuss, 2te Aufgabe, § 41, sq.

Ed. Reuss. — Beck.

Helvetic Confessions. — The first Helvetic Confession. — The Reformed Confessions of the Swiss, as "the Christian Introduction," (1523), the articles of the Berne Disputation (1528), Zwingli's Confession of Faith, or fidei ratio ad Carolum rom. imp. (1530), and his expositio fidei ad Franciscum Francorum regem, finally the Basle Confession of 1534, were generally unanimous in their views to about 1535. But there was still wanting a common confession for all the Swiss churches. This want was relieved in the following way. — It is known that the Strasburger theologians, who to this time still adhered to the Reformed Confessions, and among them especially Bucer, zealously endeavored, from ecclesiastical as well as political reasons, to reconcile the differences existing between the Swiss and Saxon doctrines. Everything seemed to promise success to these efforts in 1535. Luther was more moderate, the condition of the Reformed Swiss and the circumstances of the times, which urged the Protestants in Switzerland, as well as Germany, to union, all this made the closest combination of the Swiss orders, and also the avoidance of all controversy with Luther and his adherents very desirable. Bucer renewed his efforts to promote this end. He found a most willing associate in Myconius of Basle. The latter, in connection with his colleague Simon Grynaeus († 1541) and Leo Judæ, Conrad Pellican, Theod. Bibliander of Zurich, brought to pass a convocation, at which the Reformed doctrines as opposed to the Lutheran were discussed, and a formula was constructed, which, holding fast what was indispensable, sought, in an ironical way, to promote peace within Protestantism. But the ambiguities and concealments of Bucer's attempts at union hitherto had proven so tortuous, and had caused so much mistrust in Switzerland, that many expected nothing from compromise-formulas in matters connected with the doctrine of the Lord's Supper. Berne especially opposed most decidedly Bucer's unionism and the formula proposed by the above-named theologians, as too yielding to the Lutheran doctrines. It proposed a convention of all the Reformed churches of Switzerland, to take into consideration the matter of a confession. This proposal was approved from all sides, and the convention assembled Jan. 30, 1536, at Basle, being composed of spiritual and temporal delegates. Prominent among them were Bullinger, Leo Judæ, of Zurich, Megander, of Berne, Myconius, and Grynaeus, of Basle. The first and the two last named were appointed a committee by the convention, to construct the confession. Leo Judæ and Megander were added to them. The labors of the committee were already pretty far advanced, when the Strasburger theologians

Bucer and Capito, also arrived in Basle. It cannot be said, that their arrival was generally very acceptable. Bullinger and Judæ insisted even that they be not admitted to the sessions. They were at last, however, admitted, but not allowed to vote. — The confession produced by this convention was called from the place of its origin the second Basle, but from the authority from which it proceeded, the first Helvetic confession. It was originally written in Latin, but, at the request of Leo Judæ, was translated into German. This official version was approved and accepted by all the delegates as a common confession, which, as was expressly resolved, dare not in the least be changed by any rank. The Latin edition, on the other hand, appeared, especially to the Zurichers, to approach to the Lutheran usus loquendi in some expressions, and was opposed on this account. The Latin text was therefore officially revised and corrected according to the approved German edition by Myconius and Grynäus. Therefore the delegates assembled again in March, and after renewed examination of the whole matter, the confession, also the improved Latin edition, was finally adopted and subscribed as the common confession of the Swiss churches.

The German edition bears the title: "Ein gemeine bekantnus des helgen waren und uralten Christlichen gloubens und unsern Mitburgern und gloubgenossen, Zürich. Bern. Basell. Straszburg. Constenz. Santgalln. Schaffhusn. Millhusen. Biel, &c., Z. B. Basell uffgericht geordnet und gmacht," &c., Im 1536. The Latin title is briefly this: Ecclesiarum per Helvetiam confessio fidei summaria et generalis in hoc edita, quod de ea existimare piis omnibus liceat.

The origin and object of this confession, as well as the ecclesiastical circumstances under which it arose, are of such a character that it must be regarded as an important confession of faith of the Reformed Church. It would be very interesting to discuss every one of the twenty-eight articles of which it is composed, but we are compelled to limit ourselves to those on the doctrine of the sacraments. For further information we refer to Niemeyer's collection. With regard to the idea of a sacrament it affirms, that the sacramenta are first rerum arcanarum symbola, but then not nuda signa, but symbola quæ signis simul et rebus constant. The signa are received by the mouth, the res by the believing soul. In baptism the water is the signum, but the res ipsa is regeneratio adoptioque in populum Dei. In the Lord's Supper the bread and wine are the signum, the res is communicatio corporis domini, parata salus et peccatorum remissio. Thus then the sacraments are not merely litteræ quaedam societatis christianæ, but also gratiæ divinæ symbola, of that kind, however, "ut omnis virtus salvifica uni domino transcribatur" (Art. 21). The baptism of the children of Christian parents is proper, because they are born among the people of God, and their election must be pie presumed—præsertim quum de eorum electione pie est præsumendum (Art. 22). Especially remarkable is the statement of the doctrine of the Lord's Supper in Art. 23: Cœnam vero mysticam, in qua dominus corpus et sanguinem suum, id est, seipsum suis vere ad hoc offerat, ut magis magisque in illis ritat et illi in ipso. Non quod pani et vino corpus et sanguis domini vel naturaliter uniantur, vel hic localiter includantur, vel ulla huc carnalis præsentia statuatur. Sed quod panis et vinum ex institutione domini symbola sint, quibus ab ipso domino, per ecclesiæ ministerium, vera corporis et sanguinis ejus communicatio, non in perituum ventris cibum, sed in æternæ vitæ alimentum exhibeatur.

The antitheses against the Lutheran doctrines are very clear and decided. Opposed to the presence of the glorified body and blood in every particle of the bread, is the characteristic qualification id est seipsum, and the rejection of the carnalis præsentia to the oral manducation, Art. 21, and the words non in perituum ventris cibum; to the participation of the unbelieving, the declaration seipsum suis vere ad hoc offerat. The confession teaches positively, the Lord himself (dominus), the Son of God, is present in the holy transaction, and himself offers, not in the bread and wine, which are holy and true signs alone from the institution of the Lord, the "true communion of his body and blood." The communion of the body and blood of Christ is further explained in Art 21 (20), by the addition: "the salvation won on the cross and the pardon of sins." The result of this transaction of the Lord with his own is, that they live more and more in him and he in them. The Lord's Supper is called a nourishment of the spiritual life, a high and holy food, and especially as it is added to this: "we use it often, that being thereby admonished we may look by faith unto the death and blood of the crucified Christ, and contemplate our salvation with a foretaste of heavenly things and with a correct knowledge of eternal life. These views of the Lord's Supper, therefore, do not lead us beyond the death of Christ on the cross and the benefits thereby secured. Not a word is said about the communication of the powers of the glorified corporeity of the risen Christ, and much less about a divinæ human way, in which He here communicates himself to believers, according to Schenkel (Unionsberuf, p. 233). From this circumstance alone, that to the words "his body and blood" is added, that is himself, should be concluded, that here under "flesh and blood" something altogether different is understood, than by Luther or in the Augustana. From the articles 21 and 22, in connexion with their expressed qualifications, the following doctrine concerning the Lord's Supper may be constructed. The Son of God (Logos)—not God-man—present in the transaction, exhibits himself to believers as the one who gave himself up to death, i. e., his body and blood with all the benefits thereby secured, whereby then the life-communion of believers with their head already existing, is knit more closely, of which the bread and wine, according to the institution of the Lord, are signa exhibitiva. If by "personal-real self-communication of Christ" (Schenkel, l. c.) to believers, anything else is understood, this at least is not taught by the Helvetica I. In short, neither Art. 21 nor 22 contain a definition of doctrine to which Zwingli would not have given his full consent.

Art. 28, de sancto conjugio, closes the whole. The German edition has only 27 Articles, because the 13th and 14th are united in one.

The doctrine concerning predestination is only stated in the most general terms in Art. 10, concerning the "eternal decree," or the "Concilium Dei æternum de reparatione hominis." More than this was not necessary for the object in view, because at this time the Swiss and Upper German churches were as predestinarian as the Saxon. The Old Reformed of Germany, as well as the Swiss, are predestinarians, according to their doctrines and confessions. And this fact again remains as irrefutable, as that other historical fact, that as regards the doctrine of predestination, the disciples of Luther did not depart from those of Zwingli and Calvin from the beginning to the end of the 16th cent. Melancthon first began to recede from the Protestant doctrine, after having for a long time held it, but, as is known, the Lutheran Church did not follow him. This fact, often denied, but now again fully acknowledged (comp. ex. gr., Julius Müller, Lutheri doctr. de prædest. et lib. arb.; Schweizer, Centraldog., Vol. I.; Baur, Gegens. d. Kath. und Prot., 2 ed., p. 125, sq.; Hundeswagen, die Conflicte, etc., p. 268, et al.), explains the treatment which the doctrine of predestination as opposed to the Lutherans received in the Helvetica prior, just as perfectly as the Apology of the German Reformed Tetrapolitana shows, how this belongs to a predestination system of doctrine. — Ruchat translated the first Helvetic Confession into French (see his Hist. Vol. V.).

11. The second Helvetic Confession.—The completion of this confession falls in the year 1564, although the first sketch of it by Bullinger is, according to the testimony of the author and of Hottinger (Vol. III., p. 849), two years older. The pestilence that raged in Zurich, 1564, prompted Bullinger to this work, which was to be given over to the government of Zurich after his death. An external event caused this private labor to become that public confession, which was regarded as the second Helvetic confession of the Reformed Church. Maximilian II. had convoked the Diet at Augsburg on Jan. 14, 1566, when the Lutheran party was determined to effect, if possible, the exclusion of Frederick III., who had gone over to the Reformed, from the peace of the empire. The prince sought in time to cover his position as well as was possible, and as the Lutherans had for a long time represented the Reformed as being divided and split into sects, and especially the Reformed outside of Germany, as dangerous heretics—he requested Dr. Henry Bullinger to prepare for him a confession of faith, in order that he might therewith refute the slanders and perversion of his enemies. Bullinger sent him his work, and the Elector was so much pleased with it, that he requested permission to publish it in German. This determined the Zurichers to propose Bullinger's confession to the Swiss churches as the common confession, after that negotiations to this end had already been carried on. The necessity for a common confession of all the Swiss churches was felt; the question how best to bring it to pass, was being earnestly discussed; the common re-adoption of the first Basle, or the first Helvetic confession, was already proposed; but now the confession of Bullinger became the standard under which they would assemble themselves with one mind. Geneva and Berne first agreed to the proposal made by Zurich, then followed most willingly Schaffhausen, Biel, St. Gallen, Graubünden, Glarus, Appenzell, Thurgau, the valley of the Rhine—then Neuchâtel (1568). Basle, which at first had ungraciously "dismissed" Gualther, also accepted it later. At the same time with the original and Bullinger's German translation appeared also Beza's French translation with the appended Gallicana. Thus originated the second Helvetic Confession. It met with the most general acknowledgment in the Reformed Church of all lands, just as the Heidelberg Catechism. We mention in this regard the following facts. In 1566 and 1584, the Scottish Church declared its agreement with the Helvetica; in 1571, at Rochelle, the French repeated it with special solemnities; in 1571 and 1578, the Polish; in 1567, the Hungarian at the Synod of Debreczin. It was but natural, under the circumstances, that there should be many translations. Concerning these, as well as concerning the different editions and titles, we refer to Niemeyer's Sammlung der symbolischen Bücher der reformirten Kirche.

Upon the contents of this Reformed confession, we make the following remarks. Like the Helvetica I., the Tetrapolitana, the Puritan confessio fidei, it begins with the Holy Scriptures, the true Word of God. According to this the known evangelical doctrines are treated of, but so, however, that the specific Reformed character is everywhere prominent. In illustration of this we may refer to the way in which the divine Word works: "We do not hold," it says, "that the external proclamation is, as it were, unnecessary, because instruction in the true religion is conditioned by internal illumination, for although no one can come to Christ except the Father draw and illuminate him, yet we still know, that God by all means wishes, that his Word be also preached externally—nevertheless we acknowledge, that God can (internally) illuminate man also without the external use of the Word, and truly whomsoever and whensoever He will." After the statement of the general Christian doctrines concerning the unity of God and the Trinity in Art. III., in Art. IV., not only the idols of the heathens, but also the images of Christians, especially the images of Christ, of angels and the saints, are emphatically rejected. The Art. V., VI., VII., VIII., are more generally Protestant; in the ninth, on the other hand, the Reformed doctrine with its opposition to the Lutheran again becomes very perceptible, in that it affirms, that fallen man "is not deprived of will and converted into a stock or stone." The 10th Art. of the Confession, which treats of predestination and election, has given rise to much controversy. Arminianism, Phillipism, and Unionism have been found in it.

The teachings of this confession on the doctrine of the Lord's Supper, may be summed up in the following propositions: I. Bread and wine are and remain visible signs and pledges of the heavenly blessings of the sacrament, without either becoming or containing these. A twofold eating, the oral, by which the bread and wine are received, the spiritual, by which the soul is nourished with the body and blood of Christ, is very plainly distinguished. Bread and wine are simple images, seals, pledges of the spiritual nourishment of the believing soul. II. Body and blood do not mean the same as they do in the Augustana, but the broken body, the shed blood, the crucified Christ. III. Nothing is said of a body present in the bread, or of blood in the wine, but only of Christ, and plainly only according to his divinity, who, being present in the Supper, feeds believers with the heavenly blessings, and increases the life in communion with him, which previously existed. IV. Unbelievers do not receive the blessings of the holy Supper. V. It is the Holy Spirit, who consummates the nourishment with heavenly blessings in believing souls. VI. The specific Reformed view, that the heavenly blessings mediated by the Word are essentially the same as those offered in the sacrament, is also peculiar to the Helvetica. VII. The physical mouth is not adapted to receive the blessings, as the Augustana of 1530 affirms, which allows the body and blood of Christ to be communicated to every vescens in cœna Domini, whether he believes or not. — We remark, in conclusion, that this universally approved confession represents the doctrines accepted by the Reformed Church of all languages and lands, and is the first Helvetic Confession in its perfect development. The contents, as well as the form, and the succession of the articles, will demonstrate this assertion to every unprejudiced mind that makes the comparison between the two.

LIC. K. SUDHOFF.—Beck.

Helvetic Consensus Formula (Formula Consensus Ecclesiarum Helveticarum Reformatarum circa doctrinam de Gratia Universali et connexa, aliaque nonnulla capita) is the title borne by the Swiss Reformed particular symbol, which was formed in 1675 to repudiate certain methods of teaching, and opinions proceeding from the French Academy at Saumur. As the last confession, it is essentially different in its character from the great confessions of the Reformation period: its contents are derived mainly from the dogmatics of the schools, instead of from the faith of the Church. Hence it is, that it is generally not regarded and treated as a new confession, but as an explanation and defence of the old ones; not as a symbol of faith, but of doctrine.

After the Synod of Dort (1618–19) had determined upon and fixed the dogma of absolute and particular election against the somewhat indefinite universalism of the Remonstrants, and its decisions had received almost universal acceptance in the Reformed Church, it was hardly possible to think of a modification of the doctrine as regards the thing itself. The harshness with which the unconditional and infallible election of some, and the equally unconditional rejection of the remainder by the eternal decree of God, are expressed in it, brought constantly upon the Reformed violent attacks and imputations from the Catholics, as well as the Lutherans, and threatened to make the union with the latter impossible, for which, moreover, there remained but little hope after the Formula of Concord. For this reason, the want and desire arose, especially where the Reformed came into daily contact with the Roman Catholic Church, and felt its pressure, with all tenacity for the substance still, so far to modify the form of the doctrine as was necessary to vindicate it. This was the state of things especially in France, and it was here, where the disciples of the Scotchman, John Cameron, especially Moses Amyraut, since 1632 Prof. at Saumur, and P. Testard, preacher at Blois, opened the way to a modified view of the doctrine. The so-called hypothetical, better ideal universalism of Amyraut is well known, by which he hoped to support the main building of particularism as with an addition. According to him, God has the will and desire (voluntas, affectus) to grant salvation in Christ to all men, provided they, according to the measure of the revelation made to them, will receive the divine mercy in faith. However, although the objective possibility for all existed, still no one was able to realize it on account of moral depravity and weakness of will, without the special influence and illumination of the Holy Spirit, which God owed to no one, and which He had resolved, in his eternal decree, to give to a number of elect; these, and only these, therefore, are really, definitely, and infallibly saved (see Art. Amyraut and Schweizer: M. Amyraudus, Versuch einer Synthese des Universal. u. des Particularismus; — in the theological Review of Baur and Zeller, Bd. 11, (1852), p. 41, sq. 155, sq.). This new view of the doctrine found at first many opponents in France, but also many friends; the French national Synod regarded the charges against it as groundless, and consequently only forbid controversy, and admonished against the use of certain expressions, and finally Amyraut succeeded, by concessions and explanations, to reconcile his most decided opponents. It was not, however, so favorably regarded abroad, in Holland, and especially in Switzerland. It was certainly an innovation, and already, as such, it was dangerous in the opinion of the theologians; but even the advantage which it promised seemed to be illusory and doubtful; the modification of the form, in order better to vindicate the doctrine, led to all kinds of hazardous consequences and contradictions in the doctrine itself, ex. gr., between the two wills of God, an active and inactive will; and if really Amyraut himself did not depart from the kernel of orthodox doctrines, still the germ and starting-point for later greater departures lay in it for others. Besides, there were many other views, which made the entire more liberal tendency represented by Saumur suspicious. First of all, certain subordinate departures from the customary mode of teaching followed of themselves from Amyraut's principal doctrine, as ex. gr., in reference to the order of the divine decree of salvation, the sufficiency of the natural knowledge of God for the heathen, objectively taken, a threefold covenant between God and man, etc. Then also the theologians

¶ Saumur shared Cameron's preference for the assertion of Piscator, that only the passive obedience of Christ was imputed to us for righteousness, but not the active, which He as man owed to God. (Baur, die christliche Lehre von der Versöhnung). Connected with this was also the view of Jos. Laplace, a friend and colleague of Amyraut, that the sin of Adam was not imputed to his descendants directly and immediately, but only mediately, so far as they themselves have been thereby corrupted and become sinners. Finally, the investigations of L. Capetel, the third colleague, into the history of the Hebrew text of the Bible, seemed to make insecure the foundation upon which the Reformed Church more than any other rested, in that he demonstrated the partial incorrectness of the received text and the later origin of the points (see the Art.).—On this account the otherwise celebrated school of Saumur was regarded with increasing suspicion, as a nest of neology and heterodoxy, the more dangerous for Switzerland, because it was largely patronized by Swiss students.

The first sign of opposition was given by Geneva, which, in 1635, expressed its disapprobation of Amyraut's Traité de la Prédestination (1634), through the pen of Fr. Spanheim. From Geneva and Switzerland efforts were made to counteract the innovation in France, but the clergy, who were friends of Amyraut, defended him and his "Method," and even sent an apology, written by him, to Irminger of Zurich, in which he attempted to show that his views were not different from those of these Reformers, and were even tolerated at Dort. At the same time, the efforts to compose the difference were continued, even to the national Synod at Lausanne (1659). The danger seemed to become more threatening, when Amyraldism approached nearer to Switzerland, and even entered into Geneva. Spanheim's successor, Alex. Morus, having fallen under the suspicion of heretodoxy, was compelled, in 1649, to subscribe a series of articles on original sin, election, redemption, calling, and the divine promises, which can be regarded as the first germ of the Consensus Formula. He was followed by Philip Mestreat, and associated with him later was Louis Bronchin, who received a theological professorship in 1661; both adhered to the freer French tendency, the latter even was once a pupil of Amyraut. In spite of the opposition of their rigidly orthodox colleague, Francis Turretin, they succeeded, 1669, in obtaining a decree from the Council, that, concerning election, one must conform to the doctrine of the Church and existing regulations, but must thereby avoid all controversy and debate. Against this decree not only Sam. Desmarets in Gröningen, but also the Swiss ministeria, and even the governments of the four Reformed cantons, earnestly protested. The consequence was that the Council of the two hundred rescinded the offensive decree, and required the candidates to subscribe the article, threatening all those who departed from it. But this did not appear to give any sufficient guarantee for the future, and against a new revulsion of public opinion. This was sought in a clear and exact formula of pure doctrine, to be made in connection with the Swiss churches which had not been agitated by the innovation, and under the authority of the governments. This was urged already at Geneva, 1659, by Turretin, and was actively discussed at Baden and Zurich, by superintendent Luc. Gernler, of Basle; Deacon Hummel, of Berne; Ott. of Schaffhausen; and J. H. Heidegger, and afterwards by correspondence. To Gernler must be added yet, as most active, John Zwinger and the younger John Buxtorf (II., see the Art.); they insisted that the formula be directed against all the innovations of Saumur, and not only against Amyraut. A large portion of the Zurich clergy, with the superintendent, Casper Waser and Prof. John Müller, at their head, were not less zealous than these; they even would have willingly rejected at the same time other innovations, especially Cartesianism and Cocceianism, at the instigation of Desmarets. But on the other side there also existed a moderate party; a decided opposition was formed by the two Schweizers in Zurich, and the two Wettsteins, father and son, in Basle; Heidegger even was milder and accessible to their representations; those from Schaffhausen wished to restrict to the most necessary things—the doctrines of Amyraut—and although those from Basle finally prevailed, still this much was obtained, that no condemnation was expressed, only certain methods of teaching were disapproved, the theologians of Saumur were not named, were even, indeed, expressly to be recognised as brethren and orthodox in all fundamental articles.

The matter having been thus prepared by the theologians, then came before the governments. At the meeting of the evangelical conference of the four cities at Baden (June, 1674), it was resolved, "that the theologians should correspond with each other about this matter, and unite on a certain formula, by which such erroneous views (concerning gratia universalis) might be entirely, everywhere, rooted out of the evangelical Church, which was to be laid before the first evangelical conference that would be held, for examination and approval." Heidegger was appointed to prepare this formula. His Latin plan was first communicated to the Zurich ministerium, and then to the three remaining ministeria, to obtain their opinions. Basle was so zealous that the Council, without waiting for the ratification of the other orders, adopted the plan, March 6, 1675, and made it law (Hagenbach, Kritische Geschichte der ersten Basler Confession, p. 173, sq.). Zurich soon did the same (March 11 and 13). At the Conference at Aarau (March 16–18), the ratification of Berne and Schaffhausen were yet wanting—"for want of time;"—and it was, meanwhile, resolved, that the sketch should be translated into German by the theologians of the four cities, and then be sent for ratification to the remaining evangelical orders and places. Finally, on the occasion of the new annual reckoning at Basle (June, 1675), "the projected Formula Consensus was unanimously granted and approved, and it was further recommended, "that sacristans and school teachers, also all professors, immediately subscribe it, and for the future no one be received to the holy ministerium who does not accept it without condition and subscribe it; and if any one has scruples and hesitates to subscribe, he shall not be admitted to the ministerium." Immediately hereupon followed the ratification at Berne (June 14) and Schaffhausen, and after the formula had been sent to Protestant Glarus, Appenzel on the Rhine, St. Gallen, Mülhausen, Biel, Neuenburg, Neuenstadt, and Graubünden, it was almost everywhere received as an addition to and explanation of the Helvetic Confession. Neuenburg alone was unwilling, notwithstanding repeated admonitions, especially from Berne, to require the individual subscription of all the clergy, but was satisfied with permitting the deacons and secretaries to subscribe in the name of the clergy. Finally, the turn came also to Geneva. Here there was some hesitation. The French Reformed, as de la Bastide, Claude, Daillé, et. al., attempted to prevent its reception by correspondence; objection was made especially to the Hebrew vowel points; but after Heidegger had written to Turretin, that the decision of grammatical and critical questions was not the matter in question, but only the value of the original text as against the translations, etc., adhesion to the Formula was also given here, although not until the beginning of 1679, and, with some hesitation and opposition.

This Consensus Formula, so universally accepted in Reformed Switzerland, contains, after a preface, 26 canons, in which all the points of controversy raised by the school at Saumur, are defined and decided with great theological exactness, contrary opinions decidedly but mildly rejected, and those holding other confessions, ex. gr., the Lutherans, not polemically touched with a word, which is not the case in the Formula of Concord as regards the Reformed. The preface refers to the duty, to preserve pure and unperverted the faith received from the Word of God, and to protect the youth and the Church from erroneous opinions. The first three canons then treat of the divine inspiration and preservation of the Holy Scriptures; especially that the transmitted Hebrew Codex of the Old Test., including the consonants as well as the vowels, was inspired by God, both as regards the matter and the words; all translations must be tried and corrected by this Codex and that of the New Test., as the only uncorrupted canon, whilst a reverse procedure (Cappel) with the help of versions, MSS., or even mere conjectures, must shake the foundation of faith. Canons 3-6 treat of the doctrines of divine election and of the order of the decree. God wished so to glorify himself, that he resolved, first to create man, then to decree (Latin, permitted) his fall, finally to have mercy on some of the fallen, and consequently to elect them, but to leave the remainder in corruption. Christ was comprehended in this decree, not as meritorious cause or preceding ground—for this is alone the good-pleasure of God—but he himself is elected, the Mediator and first-born of the brethren, ordained before the foundation of the world, whose merit would be so used as to give us salvation without injury to his justice. Therefore the opinion (Amyraut's) of a conditioned will or wish of God, to save all men if they believe, preceding election, is not approved, nor an appointment of Christ as Mediator for all, etc., all of which contradicts the Scriptures, and attributes human imperfection, affections, and change of will to God.—In canons 7-9 the covenant of works with man, created holy, is represented against Amyraut as such a one as would have led man, if he had remained obedient, not only to permanent earthly happiness, but to eternal heavenly life, as Christ the second Adam has again secured it for us by his perfect obedience.—The three following canons, 10-12, reject the view (La Place's) of the merely indirect imputation of the sin of Adam. As God concluded the covenant of works with Adam, and in him, at the same time, as head and root with the whole race, so Adam sinned and forfeited the promised blessings of the covenant, not only for himself, but for all mankind.—Canons 13-16 treat of the particular appointment of Christ. As he was elected from eternity to be head and Lord of all who would in time be saved by his grace, so he was also made in time to be the Mediator of the new-covenant only for those, who, by eternal election, are given to him as a peculiar people. According to the Father's decree, as also according to his own intention, he died alone for the elect. His will, and that of the Father, and of the Spirit agree, are absolutely of the same extent, and as Christ purchased salvation itself, so also the means of salvation, faith, and the spirit of regeneration, for those for whom he died, and they are only really granted to these. His merit consists in his entire, perfect active and passive obedience; they cannot be separated; his life and work was nothing else than complete subjection and humiliation even unto death, and if salvation is specifically attributed to this latter, it occurs in the sense, that in it as the last and noblest act, his whole former life and sufferings are also comprehended. The calling to salvation was, according to canons 17-20, sometimes more, sometimes less comprehensive, but never absolutely universal. In the Old Test. it was limited to Israel, in the New it comprehends Jews and heathens, though there are still many who have not heard of Christ. God has also revealed himself to these in the works of nature and of Providence; but this cannot supply the place of the external calling (by the word) and to make them acquainted with the secret council of God, but only to give them no excuse for not honoring God as God. This external calling by the gospel is always sincerely and earnestly meant on the part of God. This calling is always attended with effect; the elect obtain salvation; the reprobate, who do not heed the calling, are reminded of their duty and of the inexcusableness of their unbelief. This difference in the effect of the general calling, has its ground alone in the grace of God, by which the elect believe, whilst the reprobate persevere in their innate wickedness and hardness of heart.—Canons 21 and 22 declare (against Amyraut) the inability of man to believe the gospel of himself—a natural and not merely moral inability, as if he could believe, if he only would.—According to canons 23-25, there are only two ways of justification before God, that by works, and that by obedience on the part of the surety for sinners. This is expressed also by the twofold covenant of God, the one made invalid by the fall of Adam, the other eternally valid for the elect in Christ. The latter divides, it is true, into two economies; but even in the Old Test. the fathers were not saved differently from us, but through faith in the Lamb of God. But faith in the Holy Ghost was also necessarily connected with faith in Christ, and although the knowledge of the Trinity was obtained by greater effort, it was still at hand, and, according to the small measure of revelation, was sufficient, under the grace of God, for the salvation and comfort of the elect.—The concluding canon 26, expresses once more the wish and exhortation, to hold fast to the pure and simple doctrines of godliness, and to flee vain babblings. It was especially desired to insist upon the necessity of the sanctification of the Sabbath (against Cocceius), and unanimously and faithfully to hold fast, teach and defend the truth of the present doctrines in the churches and schools on every occasion.

Now, although this Formula was introduced everywhere into the Reformed churches of Switzerland, the divine foundation upon which it was built, was too much mixed with human elements, to make it permanent. At first, the introduction of it was conducted prudently, except in Basle; in Zurich they were a long time satisfied with the first subscription of the clergy, without demanding it from the younger ones; in Geneva only the candidates for ordination subscribed it; in Lausanne the academy was controlled by Berne, requiring the candidates for ordination to sign the Formula as well as the other Symbols; it was not done, however, by all, and some did it, adding the clause: quatenus Scripturæ consentit—without it being observed. It was proceeded with more carefully and strictly when, after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, many French clergymen fled to Switzerland, and received appointments, especially in Vaudois. It was decreed, that these, and generally all who wished to preach, should subscribe it unconditionally (purement et simplement), which was now also extended to the natives. An intercession of the great Elector Frederick William of Brandenburg (Feb. 17, 1686), in which he refers to the dangerous condition of Protestantism and the necessity of union among the Reformed, and with the Lutherans, received only an apologizing answer from Berne and Zurich (May 6, 1686), and anxious wishes; in the over zealous Basle, on the other hand, it had this effect, that, at the request of the secret council, the subscription of the formula was no longer required (Hagenbach, c. c., p. 177). Twenty years later (1706) it was omitted in Geneva. Berne and Zurich, meanwhile, adhered to it; but the spirit of the times had changed; worldly interests rose into importance; science began to emancipate itself from theology. Partly from necessity, partly from a spirit of opposition, men returned to the Bible, and anew made prominent the practical side, the ethical ideas of Christianity as the most essential. This new spirit entered French earlier than German Switzerland, especially in Lausanne, where, at the beginning of the 18th cent. distinguished men, as the jurist Barbeyrac, the philosopher and mathematician, de Crousaz, the Church historian, Ruchat, and others, taught; and here arose again a conflict, in which the Consensus Formula, and with it the system of old orthodoxy, received the first fatal blow. Arminian views, which found favor already among the students in 1698, gave occasion to insert in the oath of association for Vaudois, directed against the Pietists of the chief city, a clause against Arminianism and Socinianism. Meanwhile, since 1706, following the example of Geneva, they began again to subscribe the formula conditionally; the academy, therefore, decided it should be done with the formula, "contrarium non docebo;" but the quatenus occurred more frequently with the connivance of the rectors. In Jan., 1716, rector Barbeyrac undertook to vindicate the quatenus as established by custom, as self-understood in the evangelical Church, and as very natural in a symbol, which touches points that are not articles of faith (canons 2 and 3). This vindication was by no means satisfactory to Berne. A controversy as to the duty of subscribing, now arose between Berne and the Academy at Lausanne, which was tedious and unedifying, and which finally terminated in a kind of compromise, according to which the professors simply subscribed from respect for the government. Many of the candidates at first refused, but afterwards subscribed, the government declaring, that "the Consensus Formula was merely a formula of doctrine, against which it was not allowed to teach or preach, either publicly or privately."—From the many controversial treatises, memorials, declarations, etc., which this movement called forth, and which circulated only in manuscript, we mention particularly Ruchat's proposition to make the Helvetic Confession alone obligatory (Sages réflexions sur la Formula Consensus); Bergier's, which is pretty latitudinarian and superficial (Projet concernant les moyens de prevenir les disputes et les contestations scandaleuses, etc.); two treatises by de Crousaz, in which the uselessness, evil, and senselessness of the Consensus is attempted to be proven (1^{re} et 2^d Dissertation faite à l'occasion de la signature du Consensus); finally an anonymous letter to the recusant candidates, encouraging them in their refusal (Lettre à un proposant de la dernière volée—pour la communiquer à ses confrères), and many others. The weapons of fiction, of satire, of persiflage, and of pasquil were also employed; the Reformers were raised up to admonish and chastise the leaders of the Bernese Church (Lettre des bienheureux Réformateurs sur le Consensus), and a spurious address of the Nuncio of Luzerne to the Pope on the hopes of the speedy restoration of the papal authority and Church, by the triumph of the Cons. over the Prot. doctrine concerning the Scriptures was issued (Lettre du Nonce du Pape à S. S. par rapport aux disputes sur le Consensus); de Crousaz replied to an imaginary letter from one of the hyper-orthodox (Lettre à Mr. le Prof. de Crousaz avec sa réponse article par article), and another pretended champion of ortho-doxy defended, with the best sustained irony, the proposition, that nothing had been gained by the unconditional subscription of the clergy, so long as the same had not been obtained from the teachers, and from the fathers and mothers (Une lettre du 27 Juillet, 1718).

The proceedings in Vaudois, and also single persons concerned in them, drew attention from abroad to the affair of the Consensus. The Kings of Prussia and England (Feb. 21, and April 10), and the Corpus Evangelicorum at Regensburg (May 12, 1722), urgently advised the Reformed cantons, for the sake of conscience and of Protestant union, to let the Formula drop. Zurich and Berne answered evasively, and at the same time declared themselves also in favor of union, to which they considered the formula no hinderance. The second attempt of Prussia and England (Jan. 30, and April 6, 1723) succeeded no better; they replied as before, and added that they were prepared to sacrifice subscription, as soon as the union existed.—Several Lutheran theologians also mixed in the matter, especially the Tübingen chancellor, Chr. Matth. Pfaff, against the particularism of the Formula (De Form. Cons. Helvetica Diss. hist. theol.: Tüb., 1723), who was answered by Prof. J. R. Salchlin of Berne (Stricturæ et observationes in Pfaffii Diss., etc., 1723), whilst both were treated by rigid Lutherans as apostates (ex. gr., in the treatise: Hypomnemata in Salchlini strict. et obs.—aut. Dan. Swillingio, 1725). The attacks of Bossuet, Clericus, but especially of the anonymous French translator (Formulaire de Consentement des églises Réf. de Suisse. Traduit en françois avec des Remarques: Amsterdam, 1722) were repelled at length by J. J. Hottinger (Verthädigte Form. Cons., 1723.)—Notwithstanding respect for the formula declined more and more, in Schaffhausen the subscription to it had, for a long time already, not been required, as in Basle. Berne found it necessary in April 13, 1723, at least to forbid controversy about this matter, and Zurich manifested a tendency to milder practice; the clergy, it is true, left nothing undone in a memorial (July 3, 1722) to retain subscription, but the great council substituted a solemn promise with uplifted hand instead of it (July 21). This state of things continued for about ten years, till gradually the spirit of an Alph. Turretin, Sam. Werenfels, Osterwald, and others prevailed; the orthodox system lost all confidence: and the forgotten Consensus Formula finally sank into rest, one knows not rightly when or how.

The official transcript of the Consensus Formula (Latin and German) exists yet, according to Schweizer, in the State archives at Zurich. It was first printed there, 1714, as an appendix to the Helvetic Confession by David Gessner; but this official edition does not seem to have got into the book trade, or at least was not widely circulated; for, in 1718, it was complained in Vaudois, that the Formula existed only in one manuscript copy, and in Berne it was discussed, whether it should or dare be published. Afterwards it appeared several times in Latin, 4to.; German, 12mo., 1718 and 1722. It is found also in Niemeyer's Collectio Confessionum in Eccl. Ref. publicat., p. 729, sq.; comp.

LXXXI., s. On the history of the Consensus Formula consult J. J. Hottinger, Succincta et solida ac genuina Formulæ Cons.—historiz. Latin and German, 1723, 4to. By the same, Helvet. Kirchengeschichte, Th. 3, p. 1086, sq.; Th. 4, p. 258.—Pfaff, in the Dissertation already mentioned. Barnaud, Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Troubles arrivés en Suisse à l'occasion du Consensus: Amsterd., 1726.—Escher, Art. Helvet. Consensus in the Allg. Encyklopädie von Ersch. u. Gruber., II. Sect. 5, p. 243, sq.—Schweizer, die Protestant. Centraldogmen in ihrer Entwicklung innerhalb der Reform. Kirche. 2. Hälfte.: Zurich, 1856, p. 439, sq.; 663, sq. Haller, Bibliothek der Schw. Gesch., Thl. 3, p. 183, sq. Besides this the author of this Article has used the State and Church Archives of Berne, and a collection of manuscript materials, the property of Professor Chapuis, in Lausanne. F. TRECHSEL.—Beck.

Helvicus (Christopher Helwig), born Dec. 26, 1581, at Sprendlingen, Hessendarmstadt (died 1616), distinguished himself as an Oriental, especially Hebrew, scholar. He spoke Hebrew as freely as his mother tongue. In 1606 he was chosen Prof. of Greek and Hebrew, and in 1610 Prof. of Theology in the University of Giessen. He prepared several good grammars and lexicons of the ancient and Oriental languages, but is best known by his theatrum hist. et chronolog. s. Chronol. Systema novum, publ. 1609, and often afterwards; republ. in France and England. S.*

Helvidius, a heretic of the 4th cent., who opposed, but in an extreme way, the unevangelical ascetic tendencies of the times. A pupil of Auxentius of Milan (see Art.), he was a contemporary of Jerome, lived in Rome under Damasus (366–384), and there composed a work in which he proved from Matt. 1:18; Luke 2:7, &c., and by Tertullian, Victorinus of Petau, &c., that Mary had other children after the birth of Christ. He denied the merit of celibacy. Jerome refuted this work, in his adv. Helvidium (383), but in a passionate tone, and with sophistical arguments, whilst Gennadius and others, acknowledging the sincerity and zeal of H., kindly exposed his errors. Augustine calls his adherents Helvidiani; they are probably related to the Antidikomarianites (see Art.).—(See JEROME, l. c., in Martianay's ed., T. 4. RÜSSLER, Bibl. d. Kirchenv. IX., 92. AUGUSTINE, de hæres., c. 84. GENNADIUS, de vir. ill., c. 32. WALCH, Ketzerhist., III., 587, &c. NEANDER, Ch. Hist. GIESSELER, Eccl. II.). WAGENMANN.*

Heman, a descendant of Zerah (Gen. 38:29, &c.) of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:6, and 1 Kings 5:11), ranked, for his wisdom, with Ethan, Calcol, and Dara, sons of Mahol, i. e., the ring-leaders of the dances. This designation, already, and the double title of Ps. 88, seem to show an identity of this person with Heman, the Levite, son of Joel, and grandson of Samuel (1 Chron. 6:18–23; 15:17, 19; 2 Chron. 35:15). Then the Ezrahite Ethan (Ps. 89; 1 Kings 5:11) must be identical with the Levite Ethen (= Jeduthum?) in 1 Chron. 6:28, &c. But even admitting that the title Ezrahite does not make Heman, המנין.

necessarily a descendant of Zerah, but simply a Levitical attendant in the family of the Zerahites (like Zuph, 1 Sam. 1 : 1; cf. Judges 17 : 7), 1 Chron. 2 : 6, forbids this view. Neither does Ewald's (Alterth., p. 305; Gesch. III., 355, &c.) explanation, that in early times skilful persons of other tribes were admitted into the remoter branches of Levi, meet the difficulty. (For various interpretations of 1 Chron. 2 : 6, see MOYERS on Chron., p. 237. KEIL, apol. Vers., p. 164. HÄVERNICK, Einl. II., 1, p. 100. WINER, B.W.B.). In 1 Chron. 25 : 1, &c., Heman, Jeduthun (Ethan), and Asaph are mentioned as leaders of the three classes of singers. To "lift up his horn" the Lord had given him 14 sons and three daughters. The rebellion of Absalom, as well as the latter part of Solomon's reign, might have given occasion to the lamentations of Ps. 88. Modern critics deny that either Heman the Ezrahite, or Levite wrote this Psalm, and ascribe it either to Uzziah (2 Chron. 26 : 20), or to the period of national humiliation after the death of Josiah, or under Zedekiah. They suppose Heman is called the author, because of its resemblance to Psalms of his then extant, or to give it a worthy name.—(See EWALD, poet. Bücher I., 213). LEYER.*

Hemmerlin, Felix (Malleolus), was born in Zurich, 1389, and died in the Franciscan prison in Luzerne, after Whitsuntide, 1457. Of his youth but little is known. He became an ecclesiastic, and in 1412 was appointed canon in the Münster of Zurich, a dulce pondus, as he called it. Afterwards he went to Bologna to pursue higher studies; during the Council was in Constance; and in 1421 became provost of St. Ursus in Solothurn. In 1427 he returned to Zurich, and became provost of the cathedral. His life possesses ecclesiastical interest mainly on account of his position and labors with reference to the condition of the Church in his day. His endless disputes with his colleagues need not be recited. But he unsparingly reprov'd the clergy for their gross immoralities, and endeavored to effect a reformation in this respect. He possessed an unusual fund of scholastic lore, and was never at a loss for pertinent quotations and anecdotes. Still he was a zealous churchman, and could far better appreciate external forms, than vital piety. He never broke through the barriers of the dogma; he only desired to see excrescences and parasites cut from the spiring tree of the hierarchy. His views agreed with those of the Councils of Constance and Basel; of the latter he was a member.—A natural result of his assaults upon clerical immoralities was the animosity of the clergy against him. Even his life was threatened.—He began his career as a writer with the tract Contra validos mendicantes, 1438. His writings, 39 in number (most of them but a few pages) are either ecclesiastical, juridical, political, or purely personal. Of five only the titles are known. Four others, the most important as sources for his personal history: Passionale, and Registrum verele, were never printed, but exist in MS. in Zurich. The rest exists in three different editions; that by Seb. Brand, Basel, 1497, in 177 fol. leaves, is the oldest. In the war between Austria, allied with Zurich, and the Confederates, Hemmerlin violently advocated the cause of the nobles; especially in the largest and best written of his productions, De nobilitate. When Zurich withdrew from Austria, Hemmerlin, on Ash-Wednesday, 1454, was seized by the peasants, against whom he had said bitter things, and handed over to the Vicar-General, Gundelfinger, who sent him bound to Constance. Afterwards he was transferred to Luzerne. Hemmerlin did not die a martyr to the evangelical cause. He gives a more correct account of the matter in his Dialogus de consolatione inique suppressorum, saying: I suffer for my own error, though I meant it well.—(See B. REBER, Felix Hemmerlin von Zürich: Zür., 1846).

GÜDER.*

Hemming, Nicolas (Præceptor Daniæ), for a time the leader of Melanchthonianism in Denmark, and the forerunner of George Calixtus, was born in 1513, on the Danish island Lolland. Having early acquired the necessary qualifications, he spent five years at the University of Wittenberg, under Melanchthon. His success in studies is the more remarkable, as he was compelled to gather means by teaching, and as a copyist. After finishing his course, he became tutor in the family of a Danish nobleman, and subsequently, with great acceptance, minister of the church of the Holy Ghost in Copenhagen, and Prof. of Greek and Hebrew in the University there; 1557, D. D., and Prof. of Theology, and finally Vice-chancellor; which posts he filled with honor until 1579. At the same time he was a fertile writer. His works treat of methodological, philosophical, dogmatic, exegetical, and practical subjects, are written in elegant Latin, and exhibit thorough familiarity with classic literature. His theological writings, especially the Opusc. theolog., are pervaded, also, by a spirit of gentle piety, reminding one of John Gerhard. The first class of isagogical and practical works includes: de methodis (resembling Augustine's de doctr. christ.); the Pastor; Catechismi Quæstiones; de lege Naturæ apodictica methodus. They are interspersed with devotional meditations and forms. His dogmatical writings subjected him to the suspicion of crypto-Calvinism. He opposed ubiquitarianism as unscriptural, and adds: nequi necesse est ea quæ unita sunt æque omnibus partibus patere. Not the form, but the reality of Christ's presence is the object of faith. Other errors were detected by some zealots in his Enchirid. theol.: (Viteb., 1558-9; Lips., 1581); Syntagma instit. Christ.: (Hafniæ, 1574; Genev., 1578; Ludg. Bat., 1585). His Demonstratio indubitæ veritatis de Domino Jesu, &c., 1571, exhibits his pious, gentle spirit. In his Antichristomachia he refutes Romanism, and in his Admonitio de superstitionibus magicis vitandis, superstition in an admirable manner. His de Conjugio, repudio et divortio is practical. The de jure naturæ (Vit., 1566), and de gratia universali (Frankf., 1553), are remarkable productions. His exegetical works consist of comment on some Psalms, the minor Prophets, (Lps., 1564, 4to.), and on nearly all the books of the New Test., a Hist. J. Christi (1562, Opp. 1255-1336), directed against the magical arts.—Notwithstanding his peaceableness, Hemming was assailed for his crypto-Calvinism. To avoid dissensions he modified some offensive expressions found in the Syntagma, and avowed et hoc corpus et hunc sanguinem vere et realiter cum pane et vino a communicantibus sumi, ita ut sit verus cibus ac potus, quo homo pascitur, reficitur et vivificatur ad vitam æternam, as his belief.—In his last years he became blind. He died May 23, 1600. *

Henry III., son of Conrad II., reigned from 1031 to 1056, and distinguished himself by his opposition to the sadly prevalent evils of simony (see Art.), and an attempt to effect a thorough reformation of the Papacy; and although his plans may have involved political aims, they nevertheless originated in a sincere desire to improve the condition of the Church. The best clergymen were his friends, and he supported their efforts to restore discipline. Three Popes were striving for the mastery, and through their discords, as well as the attendant abominations, the office has been deeply degraded. Henry became the deliverer of the Church, at the earnest entreaties of its friends. The papal schism was terminated by the Council of Sutri, 1046, and Suidgar, B. of Bamberg, assumed the chair (see Clemens II.; Gregory VI.). Thenceforth H. exerted more influence upon the election of Popes than even Charlemagne had done. The choice by the clergy and people was abolished, and the Emperor selected from among the bishops the most suitable person. But under Leo IX. (see Art.) there was a reaction against this power of Henry. He died in 1056, greatly lamented by the people, though less by some German princes whom he had held in an iron grasp. — (See FLORO, Kaiser Heinr. IV., &c., 1 Bd., 1855. STENZEL, Gesch. Deutschl. unter d. fränk. Kaisern, 1 Bd., 1827). T. P.*

Henry of Ghent (Henricus de Gandavo), born 1222, near Ghent. His patronymic was Göthaldo (Bonicollus). He was a pupil of Albert the Great, lectured at the Sorbonne upon theology and philosophy, and acquired the title Doctor solemnis. He opposed the determinism of John Duns Scotus. Ritter (Gesch. d. Philos., VIII., p. 355) describes his doctrine of ideas as remarkable, reminding one of Platonism, but differing from it in ascribing to man, not a natural, but a supernatural knowledge of ideas. His works are: Summa theologiae, and Quodlibeta theol.; commentaries on Aristotle's Physics and Metaphysics; a biogr. of St. Eleutherus; de viris illustr. s. de scriptoribus eccles. He died June 29, 1293, being at the time Archdeacon of Tournay.—(See DU PIN, nouv. biblioth. des aut. eccl., X., 85. CAVE, script. eccl. hist. liter., p. 649). T. P.*

Henry of Gorcum (Gorcomus s. Gorichemius), of Gorcum, Holland, lived c. 1450; a distinguished theologian, and at last Vice-chancellor of the Academy at Cologne. He wrote: Tract. de superst. quibusdam casibus seu ceremoniis eccl.; de celebritate festorum: conclusiones et concord. biblicorum; contra Hussitas; comm. in part on Aristotle, Th. Aquinas, and Peter Lomb.—(See TRITHEM., de script. eccl. CAVE, hist. liter. in append., p. 118). P.*

Henry of Huntingdon, canon of Lincoln, then Archdeacon of the diocese of Huntingdon, lived c. 1150, under King Stephan, wrote several histories, the chief that of England, in 10 books. His Historia Anglorum begins with the landing of Julius Cæsar and reaches to 1154. It is dedicated to B. Alexander of Lincoln, whom Galfried of Monmouth addresses in his hist. Britonum. William of Malmesbury acknowledges its merits, and later English chronicists often draw upon it. It is still valuable for its apparent use of Norman sources. But Lappenberg (Gesch. v. England, I., p. LX.) says his chronology, as well as his genealogical statements, are confused and erroneous. The work is included in the collection of Henry Sacule: Rerum angl. scriptores post Bedam principes (Lond., 1596). A Libellus de contemptu mundi in D'Achery Spicil., is also ascribed to him. P.*

Henry of Langenstein, so-called, either because born in a village in Upper Hesse, or of an extinct noble family of that name, studied in Paris, and there, c. 1363, became master and teacher of philosophy, in 1375 licentiate of theology, taught in both capacities, and then was appointed Vice-chancellor of the University. Duke Albrecht III., of Austria, called him, 1390, to the new High-school of Vienna, where he taught theology, astronomy, mathematics, physics, &c. In 1393 he became Rector, and died in 1397. He professed extensive learning, and is lauded as the transplanter of mathematics and physics into Germany. His works are: Contra astrologos; tract. de contractibus emtionis et venditionis; consilium pacis de unione ac reformat. eccl. in concilio univ. quærenda, 1381 (printed in Hermann v. d. Hardt T. II., rerum conc. œcum. const.), in which he sharply rebukes the evils of the Church; summa de republica; secreta sacerdotum quæ in missa teneri debent, the best known and at the time most read. Other productions were of inferior merit.—(See FASSIUS, bibl. med. et inf. lat. lib. VIII. HERMANN V. D. HARDT, l. c., prolegomena, p. 10, &c. Ersch and Gruber). H.*

Henry of Lausanne, Henricians, (1116-1148), of the order of Cluniacensians, so violently assailed in Lausanne the disorders of monasticism, the merely external ceremonies, and some of the peculiar errors of the Romish: the merits of good works, prayers for the dead, the worship of the crucifix, transubstantiation, &c., that the anger of the hierarchy was strongly excited against him. Having left the monastery, and cast away his cowl and cassock, he commenced preaching with an overwhelming eloquence, which soon produced such effects upon multitudes that the people were ready to lay violent hands upon the priests. At first Hildebert, B. of Mans (Cenomanis), countenanced him, but before long was so pressed himself by the fanaticism which Henry aroused, that he was compelled to interfere. Henry was sent away from Mans, and probably joined Peter of Bruis. Afterwards he labored with great success in Poitiers and Bordeaux. Whilst scattering his views in Provence, the Archbishop of Arlate had him imprisoned, and at the council of Pisa, 1134, under Innocent II., he was condemned as a heretic, but again liberated, on promise of leaving the district. Forthwith he assumed his efforts in Languedoc, &c. Hugo, Archb. of Rouen, having directed his Dogmatum Christianæ fidei contra hæreticos sui temporis Lib. III. (1145), against Henry, also, and the Henricians, Eugene III. sent Cardinal Albericus, B. of Ostia, and St. Bernard to suppress the heretics. Henry was taken and handed over to the B. of Toulouse for punishment, but soon after this he died. Still the Cathari of South France were greatly strengthened by him.—(See Acta Episcoporum Cenoman. c. 35, de Hildeberto Episc., in MABILL., Vet. Analecta, III., 112. St. Bernard's Epp., 241, ad Hildephonium Comitem S. Aegidii (1147). CH. U. HAHN, Gesch. d. Ketzers im Mittelalter, especially in the 11, 12, and 13 cent.: Stuttg., 1845, 1847, I. Gesch. d. neumanichäischen Ketzers, p. 450).

NEUDECKER.*

Henry, the Lion, son of Henry the Proud, Duke of Bavaria, and Saxony: and Gertrude, the wealthy heiress of Lothaire II., was born 1129, probably at Ravensburg, Suabia. His father having died in 1139, Henry at once bravely pressed his claims to his hereditary rights, and in 1142 was recognized as Duke of Saxony by the Diet of Würzburg. Immediately he began his heroic career, and after his mother's death, he entered Bavaria and endeavored to recover that dukedom, which had been wrested from his father. In 1144 he assumed the title Duke of Saxony and Bavaria, and in 1148 strengthened his political schemes by marrying Clementina, daughter of Duke Conrad of Zähringen. But he did not acquire undisputed possession of both dukedoms until 1156. Thenceforth he rapidly gained power and influence, and was second only to the Emperor. The North of Germany is greatly indebted to his public spirit. Munich, Lübeck, Braunschweig, and Hamburg, owe partly their origin, and much of the subsequent prosperity, to him. He promoted commerce, manufactures, and agriculture. But his good fortune soon vanished. His envious foes took advantage of a dissension between the Emperor and himself, and succeeded in having him stripped of all his dignities. At first he took refuge with Henry of England, the father of his second wife, the noble Matilda; but soon he returned to his remaining hereditary estates, and there spent his days in deeds of piety and beneficence. It was chiefly, however, on account of his zeal for the spread of Christianity among the Slavonian tribes of northern Germany that Henry merits place in this work.—Various attempts to convert the Wends, Wagriens, Obotrites, and Lucians, had resulted in but partial success, when their prince, Gottschalk, who sought to unite them under one kingdom, and to promote the welfare of his subjects by the establishment of Christianity among them, was murdered by them, and their heathen altars were consecrated new by the blood of Christian priests. Gottschalk's son Henry, indeed, renewed these attempts, by the aid of Vicelin (see Art.), but after his death, the princes Pribislaw and Nielot, who were devoted to idolatry, rose to power, and threatened to extirpate Christianity. This evil was averted by a crusade under Henry the Lion, Duke Conrad of Zähringen, Archb. Adalbert II., and other confederates. Henry restored the bishoprics of Aldenburg, Mecklenburg, and Ratzeburg. Evermodus, a pupil and friend of St. Norbert, was appointed Bishop of Ratzeburg, and (1154) Gerold, his chaplain, B. of Aldenburg. But the difficulty of inculcating Christian truths upon the minds of those heathen is forcibly illustrated by the answer of Pribislaw and Nielot to an exhortation of Henry, urging them to promote the interests of the Gospel: "The God of heaven is your God, but you are our God, and that is enough for us; you pray to him, but we will pray to you (HELMOLDI Chronicon Slavorum, I., 87).—It cannot seem surprising that such rulers would seize every opportunity to cast off the yoke of Christianity. Tidings of an insurrection summoned Henry (in 1159) to an expedition against Nielot, in which the Danish king aided with money. The country of the Obotrites was soon subdued, and for future security Schwerin was fortified (1160). Saxon Counts and Knights were, likewise, placed in various citadels, and other measures adopted to prevent further insurrections. Still a fresh war broke out in 1163, under Nielot's sons Wertislaw and Pribislaw, which, although soon suppressed, was followed by horrid cruelties in the following years; and several generations passed before heathenism was wholly subverted. In 1172, after having committed the temporary government of his Saxon countries to Archb. Wigman of Magdeburg, Henry started on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, in company with a numerous retinue of ecclesiastics and nobles. The Greek Emperor at Constantinople gave them a splendid reception, and sumptuously entertained the pilgrims during the Easter festival. When they approached Jerusalem they were met by Templers, Knights of St. John, and a great multitude of people, and escorted into the city with singing. Henry spent two months there, as the guest of King Amalrich, visiting all the sacred places in the vicinity, and then started on his return home, which he reached early in 1173, having received numerous honorable attentions on the way, from the Sultan of Iconium, the Greek Emperor Emanuel, King Bela III. of Hungary, and the Emperor at Augsburg. The relics and other precious articles which he brought back, were given to the Cathedral of St. Blasius, which was soon afterwards built. He died Aug. 6, 1195, in Braunschweig, leaving three energetic sons, Henry, Otto, and William.—(See HELMOLD, l. c. ARNOLDI Lubeccensis Contin. (to 1209) in Leibnitz. Script. Brunsv. II. PATJE, Recherches historiques et philos. &c.: Hanovre, 1786, 8vo. BÖRTIGER, Heinrich d. Löwe, &c.: Hannov., 1819, 8vo. FR. V. RAUWER, Gesch. d. Hohenstaufen, 2 Aufl. Thl. 2. HAVEMANN, Gesch. d. Lande Braunschw. u. Lüneb. I.: Götting., 1853.)

G. II. KLIPPEL.*

Heracles, a native of Alexandria, a convert from heathenism, and brother of St. Plutarch, who suffered martyrdom, c. 204, under Septimius Severus. In company with Longinus, Plotinus, Origen, and others, he was taught the new Platonic philosophy by Ammonius Saccas; subsequently Origen appointed him a catechist in Alexandria, where, in 232, he became Bishop, and died 274.—(EUSEB. H. E., I, I. P—) de vir. illustr. TILLEMONT, H. E., t. 3. BAILLET, *S.

Vie des Saints.)

Heracleon, a Gnostic of the 2d century; a pupil of Valentine (CLEM. Alex. Strom. IV., 502), who distinguished himself in Alexandria by his acute learning. Nothing certain is known of his personal history, but he probably abode in Egypt. He devoted himself chiefly to exegesis, and wrote a commentary on St. John's gospel, from which Origen largely quoted. GRABE has collected the fragments of H. in the spicileg. patr. et haeret. II., 80, sq. He seems, also, to have written a commentary upon Luke (CLEM. Alex. Strom. IV., 503. See NEANDER, Ch. H. I., 434-6). TH. PRESSEL.*

Heraclius, Emperor of the East, 610-641, son of the African governor Heraclius, rebelled against Phocas, whom he had put to death, and then succeeded to the empire. He found it weak and disordered. On the one side the Avari were besieging Constantinople itself (618); on the other, the Persians under Chosroes had overflowed the Asiatic States, and conquered Egypt. Even Jerusalem had fallen (614) into their hands, many Christians had been murdered, made slaves, or forced to join the Nestorian Church. Having paid the Avari large sums to withdraw, Heraclius marched against the Persians, after a nine years' war conquered Chosroes, and (628) compelled C.'s son and successor Siroes to accept a peace which restored all the Persians had taken, including the wood of the Saviour's cross. Heraclius' detailed account of this matter (still extant) was read in the church of St. Sophia on May 15. Soon after he entered the city in a triumphal car, drawn by elephants, and having laid off all ornaments, walked barefooted, bearing the cross, up Mt. Calvary. Since 631, Sept. 14 has been observed as the anniversary of this incident (festum exaltationis sanctae crucis). An unreliable account of Eutychius and Elmacinius (cf. HORTINGER, hist. eccl. N. J. P. I., 222) says that after retaking Jerusalem Heraclius had all the Jews there cut to pieces, in violation of a previous oath of protection; and that he was instigated to this deed by the Patriarchs and clergy of the city, who assumed the guilt of the act, and promised to do penance for it by an annual fast, thence called the fast of Heraclius. The rest of Heraclius' reign was disturbed by ecclesiastical disputes, in which he mingled with the hope of reconciling the hostile parties in his empire (see Monothelites), and its close, especially, by the invasions of the Arabs, who successively wrested Syria, Palestine, and Egypt from his dominion. He died Feb. 11, 641, of dropsy, aged 66. His descendants held the throne until 711.

TH. PRESSEL.*

Herard, Archbishop of Tours from 855, distinguished for his energy and learning, honored with commissions by Nicholas I., and Charles the Bald, and a member of numerous synods, at which he exercised great influence. He prepared capitula episcopalia, capitularia, which he published at a synod in 858. In these he enjoins that all the faithful shall be taught by the priests concerning the incarnation of the Son of God, his passion, resurrection, ascension, the outpouring of the Holy Ghost, and the for-givenness of sins obtained through the Spirit and baptism in the bosom of the church; also that they shall be warned against sins, especially grosser sins, and instructed in Christian virtues. He likewise requires his curates to establish schools, and see to having books correctly written. He died 870 or 871. — (See Grand Diction. hist. du Moreri, ed. M. Drouet, t. V.).

TH. PRESSEL.*

Herder (Joh. Gottfr.).—We rarely meet with a name in the history of theological science, which is so intimately associated with all its departments, as Herder's. He possessed a universal, encyclopediacal nature. His expansive spirit laid hold of philosophy, history, language, literature, religion and theology, with a freshness, and youthful geniality, which cannot fail to be seen in all his writings. With this universality of talent, which, in some branches, of course could not be equally profound, he combined, nevertheless, a penetration into the essence of things, which clearly distinguishes him from superficial polymathists. With an occasionally dogmatic boldness of judgment, he united a maiden gentleness, which secured him against all the asperities of controversy, and was attractive even when his assertions lacked satisfactory proof. With liberal and broad views, he courageously resisted the destructive tendencies of the age, and vindicated the Bible, both against the scoffs of infidelity and the spiritless pedantry of the schools. Thus, at different periods in his life, and according to the character of the theory he was controverting, he seems at one time the defender of Biblical orthodoxy and churchly conservatism, at another as the advocate of illumination, humanity and progress. He has, therefore, been properly designated "the prophetic forerunner of the theology of our times;" that theology, whose standpoint is above the abstract antithesis of rationalism, and supranaturalism, and which strives not only externally to reconcile it, but inwardly to overcome it. Whatever judgment may, therefore, be passed upon Herder and his theology, it must be admitted that he forms an important link in the development of our later theology, and that the study of his works must commend itself to all the disciples of science.

Herder, the son of a poor cantor and teacher of a girls' school, was born August 25, 1744, at Mohrungen, in East Prussia. His father was strict and conscientious, his mother a woman of fine and tender feelings. Both exercised Christian discipline, so that their son was early taught in the Scriptures. Under the somewhat gloomy, but careful Trescho (author of a "Sterbebibel," then much read), whom he served as a famulus, he learned much that was afterwards useful to him. His parents wished him to become a surgeon, but he fainted at the first operation, and gave up the plan. He then studied theology, at Königsberg, where Kant and Hamann, each in his way, attracted the spirit of the youth. In theology proper Lilienthal (author of "Die gute Sache d. Offenbarung," 1750-82) was his principal teacher. He was soon appointed a gymnasial teacher at Frederick's college, and there experienced the truth of the proverb: docendo dis- imus. His mind rapidly developed, and his early bashfulness disappeared. In the fall of 1764 he became collaborator in the cathedral school at Riga, and in 1767 afternoon preacher in a suburban church. There he laid the foundation of his celebrity as a preacher (the church had to be enlarged) and writer, his friend Hartnoch, the publisher, aiding him. The "Fragmente über die deutsche Literatur," and "kriechende Wälder," in which Herder wrote severe criticisms upon some of the literary magnates of the day, excited considerable animosity against him. To escape this he resolved to travel abroad. He first went to Paris, and was then engaged to attend the prince of Holstein-Eutin on a tour through France and Italy. A disease of the eye detained him in Strasburg, where he underwent a painful but unavailing operation. In Strasburg he became acquainted with Goethe and Stilling, and received a call as court preacher, consistorialrath, and superintendent to Bückeberg, the residence of the Duke of Schaumburg-Lippe. He entered upon the post in 1771, and acquired considerable spiritual influence over the duchess Maria. There he founded his reputation as a theological writer, so that Heyne tried to get him to Göttingen as professor of theology. But Herder would not consent to the required colloquium. Then came an opportune call to Weimar as court preacher, general superintendent, and Oberconsistorialrath. Meanwhile he had married. Herder now became one of the stars of that German Athens, where Wieland, Schiller, Goethe, Jean Paul, Knebel and others shone. In 1793 he was appointed vice-president, and in 1801 president of the higher-consistory, an office which no commoner had ever filled. Shortly before his death the Elector of Bavaria elevated him to the nobility. He died December 18, 1803.

Herder's importance as a theologian is to be sought less in his services to any distinct branch of the science, than in the spirit which he sought to breathe into its several branches, and into science in general. His labors were rather suggestive than systematically constructive. It is not surprising, therefore, that he left many questions unsolved, and that we meet with some paradoxes in his writings. First of all the position which he assigns the theologian and clergyman in society, is important. Instead of regarding them as, at most, useful servants of the state, he saw types of their offices in the priests and prophets of the Old Test., and sought to awaken in the minds of students elevated views of the ordinary affairs of life, and to train a race of theologians who would know how to harmonize "humanity" with earnest piety (cf. "Provinzialblätter an Prelinger," 1774. "Briefe über das Studium d. Theol.," 1780; 2 ed., 1785). Above all he desired to render the study of the Bible useful by freeing it of the fetters of theological dogmatism, and making it subservient to a science which cordially embraced all the interests of humanity. He gave special prominence to the æsthetic-human side of the Bible, though not as at variance with its divine authority (cf. "Geist d. hebräischen Poesie," 1782). He first, Lowth not excepted, awakened a deep sense of the poetic beauties of the Bible, which he did not consider as mere elegant ornaments, but inherent in the very substance of the Old Test. revelation, and inseparable from its inspired contents.—By his poetical interpretation of the Old Test. histories he rescued the Bible from the maltreatments of such exegetes as Michaelis, who saw in those accounts only a codex of doctrines, which they sought to fit on to the stiff forms of their school. His "älteste Urkunde d. Menschengeschl., eine nach Jahrh. enthüllte heil. Schrift," 1774, produced a revolution in the department of Old Test. exegesis. In it he attempted to explain Gen. 1, from a standpoint entirely different from that usually taken. A voyage from Riga to Nantes (1769), on which he frequently witnessed the effect of the break of day, suggested the thought, that a similar perception of objects lay at the basis of the account of the creation, which represents light as first appearing, and then successively one set of objects after another; and that to interpret the narrative as a physico-cosmological treatise did violence to it. He regarded it as a significant hieroglyphic.—But with all that was merely hypothetical in his views, to Herder belongs the undeniable merit of having opened a path in biblical studies, which more recent inquirers followed, and which seems now again to be forsaken to the disadvantage both of science and religion.—Herder also sought to enrich New Test. exegesis by treasures from the spirit of the Orient, as in his "Erläuterungen zum N. T. aus einer neu eröffneten morgenländ. Quelle" (d. Zend Avesta), 1775, in which he contended for a manifest influence of Parsism upon the Hebrew and Christian mode of thought. He wrote upon the epp. of James and Jude: "Briefe zweier Brüder Jesu in unserm Kanon (1775), and on Revelation: "Mapar 'Aḡa, das Buch von d. Zukunft d. Herrn" (Riga, 1779).—He also wrote upon several distinct exegetical and theological subjects, as (in the "christliche Schriften") upon the gift of tongues at Pentecost; the resurrection, as a matter of faith, history, and doctrine; of the Redeemer of men, according to the three Gospels; of the Son of God, the Saviour of the world; of the spirit of Christianity; of Religion, its doctrines, usages, &c. It cannot be denied, that Herder never attained to a full and clear insight into the substance of Christianity, especially that his Christological views could hardly satisfy the theology of our day, any more than his somewhat arbitrary interpretations of the resurrection and Pentecostal miracle. At the same time his efforts to apprehend and exhibit the "Son of God" as the "Son of Man" in the noblest sense of the phrase, were very significant, and form a necessary transition from the old orthodox theory, which put Christ's humanity into the background, to the theory which now prevails. Even here again, Herder may be regarded as the precursor of Schleiermacher, Ullmann, Hase, &c. A connected system of faith Herder did not write. "Herder's Dogmatik," by Augusti, is simply a selection from his writings. And yet systematic, as well as exegetical, and, mediately, historical theology were invigorated by Herder's spirit.—Upon practical theology, also, Herder's writings furnish valuable homiletical, catechetical, and liturgical hints; and his opinions and pastoral letters contain valuable remarks concerning pastoral theology and ecclesiastical discipline. In his sermons, which abound in fertile thoughts, he preferred the form of the homily. Those published seem to be rather sketches, to which much may have been added in their delivery. His personal appearance and manner in the pulpit was impressive, though he had little action. How far the social influence of the court may have interfered with his ministerial duties, cannot be here discussed. It is painful, however, to hear him deplore, in his last years, that his "life had been a failure;" and yet this may merely indicate the nobleness of his nature, and the severe demands he made upon himself. — Glancing, for a moment, at the narrower circle of Herder's theological activity, we find several other productions sustaining a close relation to theology. His "Ideen zur Philosophie d. Gesch. d. Menschheit" (1785), a work which probably attained to the greatest celebrity among all his writings, lacks, indeed, the only true Christian basis for such a history, but still exerted a happy influence upon that age. His "Stimmen d. Völker," awakened a taste for national poetry, and also did service to the philosophy of religion and theology. He himself worked up many of the most beautiful Church traditions into poems, and his other effusions (though none of them are properly hymns) breathe a deep religious spirit. His "Cid" may be called a Christian epos. — Finally, as to Herder's position towards the philosophy of his day, he neither followed any existing system, nor invented one of his own. He was eclectic-critical. In his "God" he defended Spinoza against the attacks of certain philosophers and theologians, and thus came in conflict with his friend Jacobi. In his "Metakritik" and in other writings, he even violently denounced Kant's theory, though without much effect. To this violence he was probably led by the unhappy influence, he observed, of that system on young candidates for the ministry. He was also opposed to Fichte. Indeed he was the decided enemy of all scholasticism, and felt himself rather attracted by a mystical intuitive philosophy, like Hamann's. Hence in his own philosophemes we find rather oracular sayings, than careful dialectic definitions. Herder founded no school, but contributed largely to the formation of schools. — The best and most complete edition of his works is that of Jn. G. Müller of Schaffhausen, which contains, also, a biography of Herder by his wife (whose maiden name was Flachland). Tub., 1820. — See the literary histories of Gelzer, Gervinus, Vilmar, &c. The Heidelb. Jahrbüch., 1812. Döring, Herder's Leben, Weimar, 1823. Danz und Gruber, Karakteristik Herder's, Lpz., 1805. The Weimar-Herder-Album, Jena, 1845. Hagenbach's Vorles. über d. K. G. d. 18. Jahrh., 2 Aufl. 2 Thl. p. 11; &c. Werke zur Rel. u. Theol.

HAGENBACH.*

Heresy, in the wider sense, is any doctrine, which, though it bears on the one side a Christian, religious character, contains elements at war with the principle of Christianity itself. —

Just as our conception of that principle is more or less sharply defined, will our view of what is heretical vary. In modern times many of the so-called heresies have been regarded as necessary steps in the development of doctrine—by which it has been brought out into clear consciousness. A striking support for this opinion is found in the introduction to Origen's work, de Principiis; Con. Gregor. Nazianz. orat. 33 fin., and Aug. de lib. arb., III., 21. According to the evangelical view, the principle of Christianity is the absolute reconciliation of man with God, in Christ and through Christ: and as this principle is attacked in its presumptions we have two classes of heresies, and in its consequences, two more—thus, four in all: — 1. Those which do not fully acknowledge the guilt and corruption of our nature (Pelagianism and Manichæism). 2. Those which entertain such ideas of God that the necessity or possibility of atonement, or its mediation in the person of Christ, or its ethical character is contravened: here belong not only Pantheism, but Antitrinitarianism along with Ebionism and Docetism, and the Nestorian and Monophysite doctrine, so far as it concerns God in his relation to the world and man, if the atonement in Christ is to be regarded as efficacious in a real, absolute and ethical way. 3. Those which alter the consequences of the atonement on the side of God and in his relation to man: here belong the worship of saints, false mediation assumed by the visible Church, the sacrifice of the mass, the doctrine of the opus operatum, as well as the disparagement of the means of grace by the Anabaptists. 4. Those which alter the consequences of the atonement on the side of man; here belong Antinomianism, which subverts its ethical character and work, righteousness, which mars its completeness.

As the Church in the course of ages developed her faith and embodied its various points in creeds and confessions, heresy came to mean any doctrine that conflicts with the fundamental articles thus established. But since the evangelical Church only admits a presumption in their favor, and lays no claim to absolute infallibility and perfection, she yields to every dissenting member the right of appeal to the divine norm of the apostolic testimony. He is bound, however, to produce proof for any such exceptio veritatis; and if this cannot be done, or is refused, she has a right to treat such dissent as heresy. Hence, in the older books of discipline, the dissenter is enjoined, before he ventures to publish his doctrine, to hold a discussion with the organs of the Church. If the matter be old, and no new arguments are advanced, it is sufficient for the Church simply to refer to former decisions. — In its relation to existing ecclesiastical organizations heresy assumes a still narrower meaning. It exhibits an aggressive character, sets itself up against law and order, becomes sectarian, and so long as this is wanting, it is rather to be called error than heresy. As long as dissent remains mere private opinion, or sets itself forth as pure scientific speculation, it may be tolerated, although contended against and excluded from the pulpit; but when it lays claims to be considered an article of faith, and invades the Church in a revolutionary way, it must be met and crushed by ecclesiastical discipline. — The question now arises, how far heresy is to be regarded as a civil crime, and punished as such. The evangelical maxim, that it is no civil crime, is, in the main, true; but when a sect promulgates in the name of religion such doctrines as lead directly to the subversion of those principles of order and morality, upon which all good government rests, it certainly becomes amenable to the civil law. The Church then exercises tolerance only toward scientific error, not heresy; the State is more liberal; yet even this liberality has its limits; and, in case the State is decidedly Christian in its fundamental laws and social order, the restriction may be greater, so that it may not only protect itself from any danger that threatens its civil life, but refuse to recognize a sect as standing on the same ground with the established Church, or churches. This has been publicly proclaimed by the Eisenach Conference as a leading principle of the existing ecclesiastical courts in evangelical Germany (see the protocols of the Conf. of 1853, im allgem. Kirchenblatt, 1853, p. 459, and those of the Conf. of 1855, allg. K.-blatt, 1855, p. 419–23).

We now pass on to the history of the subject. Originally the word αἵρεσις was a vox media for any party distinguished by peculiar principles. It was thus used in the early schools of philosophy and law in the Roman empire. In the New Test. it is applied to the conflicting religious parties of later Judaism, Acts 5:17; 15:5; 26:5; and in 24:5, by an adversary to the Christian Church. The same thing occurs in c. 24:14 (ἡν λέγουσιν αἵρεσιν), and c. 28:22, where we find it applied to Christians as a term of reproach by their enemies. On the other hand it designates (Tit. 3:10; 2 Pet. 2:1) division in the Church itself. In Gal. 3:21, Paul treats his Judaistic adversaries as heretics of this kind, and meets every corruption of the gospel with an ἀνάθεμα ἵσταω (c. 1:8, 9). Αἵρεσις, however, is not clearly distinguished from σχίσμα, as 1 Cor. 11:19, and Gal. 3:20 show; yet in both passages it is no longer a vox media, but implies blame. Titus 3:10, uses the word in the sense of later times, and describes the manner in which the primitive Church dealt with heretics; so, too, 2 Pet. 2:1, 2. With these passages compare Rev. 18:2, 14, 15. Ignatius (ad Smyrnæos, c. 3) recommends prayer for heretics, although he requires strict separation from them, and expresses little hope of their conversion (cf. c. 7); he warns his readers (ad Trall. c. 6) that they should ἀλλοτρίας βοτάνης ἀπίχισθαι, ἥτις ἐστὶν ἡρεσις, and styles it a deadly poison mingled with honey. He, therefore, calls heretics (ad Philad., c. 2) λύκοι ἀξιόπιστοι, and as the best safeguard against their deceptive arts enjoins subordination to the episcopate. This is further developed by Irenæus, who brings to his aid apostolical succession and tradition, c. hæres., V., 26, 2. All those who refuse obedience to the successors of the apostles are to be ranked as heretics and offering strange fire, i. e., strange doctrines on the altar of God, a cælesti igne comburentur, quemadmodum Nadab et Abiud. Thus, where protection against heresy is demanded, special stress is laid upon that which it has in common with schism: although even this passage shows that Irenæus knew how to distinguish between them. So, also, Tertullian, who, along with Irenæus, regards it as a greater crime than schism, and ranks it with apostasia (de præscript. Hæret., c. 4, persecutio et martyres facit, hæresis apostatas tantum.); still it has its uses (c. 1, ut fides habendo tentationem habeat etiam probationem (cf. c. 4); he sees in the vigorous growth of heresy only a sign of mischief existing in the Church itself (c. 2), and refutes those who argue its truth from the rapidity of its growth. These views of the Fathers respecting heresy, are drawn chiefly from their experience with Gnosticism. Irenæus calls attention to the differences and divisions continually breaking out amongst the heretics themselves (I., c. 9, § 5; c. 28, § 2, fin., § 1), and this phenomenon he explains by saying, that they have no discipline and order, each teacher wishing to be, and to have something peculiar: they betray their origin from subjective caprice (c. 28, § 1, velut e terra fungi manifestati sunt) without any hold on historical traditions; and this is plain from the propensity each one has to invent a new terminology (I., c. 11, § 3). In bold contrast with these endless divisions springing from unholy ambition (II., c. 30, 1), Irenæus lays the greater stress on the unity revealed in the traditions of the Church (III., 12, 7). He shows, too, how they deal with the SS., either mutilating them or interpreting them in a capricious and fantastical way (I., præf., 1; III., 12, 12); and that their miracles, instead of having the beneficial, quickening tendency of those wrought in the Church, are merely magic and show, and thus betray their diabolical character (II., 31, 2; I., 27, 4), and point back to Simon Magus (I., 22, 2; 23, 24; 27, 4; III., Præf.). From views like these the ancient Church imbibed a profound abhorrence of heresy. Yet it appears from what Irenæus says of Cerdon (III., 4, 3), that penitent heretics were often, even in cases of relapse, restored to the full privileges of the Church; but the custom soon spread, not to restore those who had relapsed, and the effects of this custom are seen in the middle ages, when the relapsed, on profession of penitence, were again admitted into the communion of the Church, without preventing their execution by the civil law. — To the further development of the views and practice of the Church in regard to heretics, the controversy touching heretical baptism essentially aided; then the Donatistic controversy, of which it is worthy of remark, that for a long time the Donatists were not considered heretics, but merely schismatics; and then finally the Trinitarian and Christological controversies. As dogmas came to be more clearly defined, the differences existing among the older fathers, as well as the discovery, that many of the doctrines condemned as heresies by the later Church were found in their pages, led to interesting discussions upon the idea of heresy. It was now seen that there could be heterodox views, which were neither heretical nor prejudicial to church-communion or the salvation of the soul. But it was only so, until the Church had uttered her decision concerning them; and in this way obstinate resistance to the authority of the Church in such matters soon came to be regarded as the most essential feature in the idea of heresy. This appears particularly in the writings of Vincentius, of Lirinum (see his Commonitorium). Augustine's view of heresy deserves special consideration, because it formed the ground of the later doctrine and practice of the middle ages (see his work, de Civit. Dei, XVIII., 51). Whilst earlier Church-doctors rejected all use of the civil power against heresy (Hilarius, Pictav. ad Constant., I., 2, 7; contra Auxent. lib. init.; Athanasius, Hist. Arian., § 33), and at most only labored by this means to prevent the organization of heretical communities (Chrysostom., Homil., 29, 46, in Matt.); Augustine (Retractat., II., c. 5; ep., 93, ad Vincentium, § 17; ep. 185, ad Bonifac., § 21; Opus imperf., 2, 2), appealing to the passage, Luke 14: 23 (cogite intrare, etc.), wholly renounced his earlier opinion, that heretics and schismatics should not be compelled to recant by the civil magistrate, and planted himself upon the maxim: damnata hæresis ab episcopis non adhuc examinanda, sed coercenda est potestatibus Christianis. He is unwilling, however, that heretics should be put to death, not because he thought they did not deserve it, but because the ancient Church was altogether averse to this mode of punishment: hence it is not to be wondered at, if, in spite of this protest, it should find approval (e. g., Leo M., ep. 15, ad Turribium; Hieronymus, ep. 37; ad Bipar.). In the middle ages, as in the Romish Church at the present day, the difficulty was easily avoided, by shifting the responsibility upon the State. — If now we consider the conduct of the secular powers, for a long time we find it varying between the grant of full liberty for the formation of sects, degrees of limitation in their worship, the withdrawal of certain civil rights and privileges, formal prohibition and criminal punishment. Still the right was claimed to deal with heresy according to their own pleasure. The numerous laws contained in the Codex Theodosianus, XVI., tit. V., de Hæreticis, to which is to be added XVI., tit. I., 2 and 3, are the chief sources for the history of legislation in regard to the sects in the most ancient time. It appears that the civil power then even went beyond the Church in its severity, except during the reign of Julian, the Apostate. In the 5th cent. the authority of Augustine brought about an agreement between the Church and the State upon this question, without any surrendry of its freedom on the part of the latter. This may be learned from the Code of Justinian. — In the middle ages a great change took place. The authority assumed by the Popes in matters of faith, and the doctrine of fides implicita and explicita, modified the doctrine of heresy, which now received a scientific elaboration at the hands of the schoolmen. At length the Church denied the right of the State to suffer within its borders any heresy which had been condemned and punished by her, and compelled the expulsion and extirpation of heretics, by the menace of ecclesiastical censures, yea even the stirring up of violent invasions and insurrections, and the threat of civil punishments, such as the confiscation of estates and the withdrawal of all municipal and political right and protection from the secular power and its bearers (see Art. Innocent III.). Nevertheless, the Church retained the custom of praying the secular power to remit the penalty of death to the heretics condemned by her and handed over for execution; but this was a mere formality, and had so little earnestness in it, that the admissibility of such punishment became one of her most cherished dogmas, for the bull of Leo X. against Luther, 1520, among other points, condemns this: Hæreticos comburere est contra salutem Spiritus (art. 33). At the same time a great impulse was given to denunciation and false accusation by a peculiar rule, which lays the burden of proof upon the person accused of heresy; and by the establishment of the Inquisition the persecution of heretics was reduced to a system, so that at length many secular punishments were looked for as the direct results of those inflicted by the Church. Hence the Romish Church finds it necessary, to place every converted heretic before her court, and remit, after a formal recantation, ecclesiastical and secular penalties, so far as she sees fit. Here belong the provisions of the Canon Law in X. de hæretic. V., tit. 7; c. 49. X. de sentent. excomm., V., 39; then tit. de Hær. in VI. V., 2; de hæret. in Clement. V., 3; de hæret. in Extravag. V., 3; comp. liber septimus, V., 3 and 4; then the laws enacted by Frederick II., which closely follow those of the Church (Pertz, Monum., II., p. 244, 287, 288, 327, 328); also the provisions of the Schwabenspiegel (c. 261). Consult, too, the laws respecting mixed marriages and the marriages of heretics. — All these enactments, although on account of the pressure of circumstances they are not now universally enforced, are still far from being regarded as a dead letter by the Roman Catholic Church (see Benedict XIV., de Synod. Diœc. VI., 5; IX., 14, 3; XIII., 24, 21). Muratori likewise, even in the 18th cent. (de ingeniorum moderatione in religionis negotio, II., 7), defends the position that civil rulers are bound to punish heretics in the severest manner. In the beginning of the 19th cent., in the negotiations respecting the coronation of Napoleon, Pius VII. declared that he could not set foot upon the soil of a country where freedom of worship was permitted by law. The same Pope wrote, in 1805, to his nuncio in Vienna: "the Church has not only sought to prevent heretics from becoming possessed of church-property, but has even made confiscation a punishment for the crime of heresy; for private estates in c. 10, X. de hæret. (V., 7), for principalities and fiefs in c. 16, eod.: the latter law contains the canonical provision, that the subjects of a heretical prince are absolved from every oath, as fidelity and obedience; and any one who has even a moderate acquaintance with history knows of the decrees of Popes and councils deposing obstinate heretical princes. True, indeed, we find ourselves now, alas! in times of so great adversity and humiliation for the Bride of Christ, that the Church is not only unable to enforce these most sacred maxims of hers in regard to the rebellious enemies of the faith, but durst not even name them without injury; but, though she cannot exercise her right to deprive heretics of their principalities and declare their states forfeited, she yet can," etc. Compare with this, how in 1724 (Bullar., Propagandæ II., 4, 56) the Roman See granted beforehand to the Ruthenians, in case of their conversion, the privilege of retaining estates forfeited by heresy; its rejoicings over the expulsion of the evangelical Salzburgers (Bull., Propag. II., 246), and what happens now in strictly Catholic States. To this day, where the State allows, bishops swear to the Pope: hæreticos schismaticos et reuelles eidem Domino nostro vel successoribus prælictis pro posse persequar et impugnabo. The Roman See, however, since Sept. 17, 1824, in its official acts no longer speaks of "Protestant heretics," but only of "A catholici," and has often acknowledged that the pressure of circumstances excuses the secular power, if it tolerates heretics: yet as soon as these circumstances change, the old laws—now only suspended, not abolished—shall be put in force.—With this practice of the Catholic Church and the Catholic State, as we see it now under the pressure of public opinion, it may be well to compare the dogmatic theory of the middle ages, as contained in the works of Thomas Aquinas. In lib. II., 2^{da} qu. 2, art. 5, 6 qu. 11, art. 1, he details the theory at large, and then proceeds to the question (art. 3): utrum hæretici sint tolerandi? The answer is, that heresy has its uses for the Church, in so far as it proves the constantia fidelium and serves this end, ut exequiamus pigrum, divinas scripturas sollicitius intuentes: but this utilitas est præter intentionem hæreticorum, who rather seek corrumpere fidem: hence, if heretics are to be regarded by themselves, they deserve at once non solum ab Ecclesia per excommunicationem separari, sed etiam per mortem a mundo excludi. But keeping in view the interest of the Church, she may exercise special miseriordia, so that one non statim condemnatur, sed post primam et secundam correptionem. Heretics are only to be tolerated, when their extirpation will cause injury to the Church; in which case the tares may be allowed to stand with the wheat (cf. Art. 3, fin., with qu. 10, art. 11, fin.). In what follows (qu. 12, art. 4) Thomas now defends the principle, that ecclesiastical and secular punishments may often be wholly remitted to heretics for the first offence, but in case of relapse, even if they be again reconciled to the Church, they should be put to death, because by the evil example of inconstantia circa fidem others may be infected and encouraged to fall away.

Against this doctrine the Reformation now raised its protest. From the very first Luther opposed those, who fought against heresy with fire and sword instead of the Word of God, because unable to sustain their faith by Scripture (Grund u. Ursach aller Artikel, so durch die Römische Bulle etc., zu Art. 33; Walch, XV., p., 1853. &c.); and was inclined to ask the civil authorities to make over heretics to the evangelical Church to vanquish them by convincing and persuading: thus in opposition to Carlstadt's violent measures he gave counsel in favor of mild reproof and instruction. And yet he did not intend thereby to encourage the State quietly to suffer its subjects to be misled by a heretical propaganda. It was a cardinal principle with all the Reformers, that the State was bound not to tolerate blasphemy, but to use all lawful measures to prevent the growth of sectarianism. Only in certain cases, Luther admitted the employment of civil penalties against heretics, less however on account of their doctrines, than of the practice flowing from them. Zwingli stands near to him in this respect, although he favored the bloody vengeance which overtook the Anabaptists in Switzerland. Calvin goes further, and with his theocratical ideas makes it obligatory upon the State, to treat heresy like blasphemy with the severest punishments. The execution of Servetus, approved and partly brought about by him, gave rise to a controversy upon the question, whether it was lawful to punish heresy with the sword (cf. Calvini defensio orthodoxæ fidei de sacra trinitate contra prodig. errores Mich. Serveti hispani, ubi ostenditur, hæreticos jure gladii coercendos esse et nominatim de homine hoc tam impio juste et merito sumtum Genevæ supplicium, 1554). For this act and his principles, not only was he attacked by Bolsec, but Castellio wrote against him, under the assumed name of Martin Bellius, the work: de hæreticis, an sint persequendi, etc.: Magdeb., 1554, in which he makes use of the authority of Luther and Brenz. Melanchthon alone, of all the theologians of Germany, sided with Calvin (Corp. Ref., II., 18, an. 1530; and III., 195, an. 1536), having long contended against the milder view of Brenz (see Hartmann and Jäger, Johann Brenz, I., p. 299, sqq.). In the evangelical Church of Germany this milder view prevailed, whilst in Scotland the principles of Calvin were applied even against the Papists.—Sources:—Those already named, and the various works on Church-law; Thomasius, de jure Principis circa hæreticos, and an hæresis sit crimen; Bæhmeri, jus eccles. Protest., Tom. IV., lib. 5, tit. 7, § 167, sqq., and his dissertatio preliminaris de jure circa libertatem conscientie (l. c., t. II.); also the articles of the Peace of Westphalia, and the protocols of the Eisenach Church Conference already referred to.

C. JÄGER.—Porter.

Heretical Baptism.—Controversy on the subject.—They who believed salvation to be unattainable in a heretical communion, also believed its baptism to be invalid. Such insisted on the rebaptism of all who renounced it to join the Cath. Church. Numerous authorities belonging to the first part of the 3d century favor this view. Clement of Alexandria refused the baptism of heretics the character of genuineness (οὐκ οὐκείον καὶ γνήσιον ὕδωρ, Strom. I, 375). So, also, Tertullian (de baptismo, cap. 15). In the beginning of the 3d century, a Synod of Bishops at Carthage, under the presidency of Agrippinus unanimously voted it to be null and void (Cyr. ep. 71, 4. 73, 3). So, also, the Synods of Iconium and Synnada, in 235 (Firm. in Cypr- ep. 75, 7. Euseb. H. E., VII., cap. 7, § 5). The Apostolical Constitutions (VI., 15) affirm its invalidity.

Rome, on the other hand, regarded heretics as fallen Christians, and received them into the Church by the laying on of hands; whilst two synods (255), which met at Carthage, under Cyprian, passed decrees against heretical baptism (ep. 70), and forwarded them to the Romish bishop, Stephen (ep. 72), who, at this very time was engaged in a controversy on this subject with the Orientals. The strife now waxed in strength. Stephen branded Cyprian as a pseudo-apostle, and deprived him of Church fellowship. Cyprian convened (Sept. 1, 256) a third council, which was attended by 85 bishops of North Africa, and a large number of presbyters, deacons, and laymen. It reprimanded the arrogant behavior of Stephen, who, it was said, made himself an episcopus episcoporum, and, in vehement terms, declared against the genuineness of heretical baptism. Cyprian, however, repeated an opinion previously expressed (ep. 72, 4), that the opposite practice should not be excluded from the Church (comp: Acts of Council in Augustine, de baptismo, lib. VI. et VII. Cypr. opera genuina, ed. Goldhorn II., 265 seq.). Firmilian of Cæsarea coincided with this action, and the Church in Asia Minor sustained the Church in North Africa. The breach between Stephen and Cyprian was never healed. The former died a martyr, 257; the latter, 258, the same year with Sixtus, B. of Rome, with whom he was on friendly terms.

The first point to be considered in this controversy is: Did Stephen wish that all heretics, who applied for admission into the Church, should not be baptized, or did he distinguish between them? Furnier (later Benedict XII.) Bannage, Alix, Dupin, Launoy, Pearson, Blondell, Pfaff, Höfling, affirm the former; Natalis Alexander, Tillemont, Pagi, Maran, and others, affirm the latter. Stephen wrote (74, 7): si quis ergo a quacunque hæresi venerit ad vos, nihil innovetur, nisi quod traditum est, ut manus illi imponatur in pœnitentiam; and this, because heretics, in the case of such as went over to them, did not, strictly speaking, re-baptize, but simply received them (communicant). It would seem, then, Stephen merely thought of completing the baptism of heretics by the laying on of hands. On the other hand, however, from cap. 8 of the same epistle, and ep. 73, cap. 4, it is plain he regarded it as genuine because performed in the name of Jesus; and from 75, 9, because of the invocation of the Trinity upon the subject whose disposition and faith qualified him for baptismal grace (mente et fide sua baptismi gratiam consequi posse). Add to this his declaration: non quærendum esse, quis sit ille, qui baptizaverit, and we are warranted in concluding that he approximated the later view of this dogma. The contradictions in these different sentiments may be reconciled, if we admit, with Retberg, that, as the controversy went forward, Stephen gave to his views greater precision of expression, and supposed that all sects, in baptism, made use of the formula prescribed by Christ.

The second point is: What grace did Stephen

suppose was conferred on them by the laying on of hands? a grace he designated by the affix of pœnitentiam, his opponents, by the affix of accipiendum spiritum sanctum. An impartial judgment of authorities compels us to the view that but one laying on of hands — not two, as Mattes and others imagine — was intended, as well in pœnitentiam as ad accip. sp. s., which, standing between the usual seal of baptism and public penance, partook of the nature of both. The meaning of "laying on of hands" confirms this opinion. In the ancient Church, it was joined to baptism, reconciliation, and ordination. According to Tertullian (de baptismo 6, 8), baptism denoted the forgiveness of sins and the preparation for the receiving of the Holy Ghost; the laying on of hands, the indwelling of the Holy Spirit; and anointing, the symbol of the spiritual priesthood. These three were regarded as parts of one and the same sacrament, and it was only at a later period they were separated into two acts. In the ceremony of reconciliation, the laying on of hands was merely the repetition of the manus impositio of baptism (comp. August. de baptismo III., 15: manus impositio non sicut baptismus repeti non potest, with an expression in beginning of the c.: spiritus sanctus in sola Catholica per manus impositionem dari dicitur; also Const. ap. II. 41, § 2). It is, thus, easy to see that, when these closely related parts of divine worship had not yet been separated into distinct sacraments, persons would attribute to the one laying on of hands, in the reception of heretics, the meaning implied both in the rite of reconciliation and of ordination. Whilst, therefore, Stephen ascribed to the baptism of heretics, when properly received, the power of forgiving sins, he could not allow them the right of imparting the Spirit, since they themselves did not possess Him, not having the lawful episcopate. This defect he supposed was supplied by the laying on of hands, as with the new-baptized, or penitents. Hence his language to Firmilian (75, 14): hæresis quidem parit et exponit, expositos autem ecclesia suscipit, et quos non ipsa peperit, pro suis nutrit.

We will now turn to the position taken by his opponents, Cyprian and Firmilian. Their fundamental principle was: Extra ecclesiam nulla salus. They argued that, as the conceptions—Church and Baptism—were inseparable, they who allowed heretics the latter, must also allow them the former (73, 25. 75, 17. 71, 1.); that, as there is but one Church, there could be but one baptism (69, 2); that, as heretics worshipped at false altars and had no lawful priesthood, baptism, the efficiency of which rested on a normal episcopate, by them must necessarily be null (73, 4. 75, 7. 69, 1. 73, 1.); that, as the ark of Noah typified the oneness of Church and baptism, no one could be saved by heretical baptism, just as no one, outside the ark, was saved in the time of the deluge (69, 2. 74, 11. 75, 15.); that, like Church and Baptism, baptism and laying on of hands, forgiveness of sins and imparting of the Holy Ghost were inseparably connected; that, if heretics were able to communicate in baptism the forgiveness of sin, so, too, the Holy Ghost; that, as the Church only can beget children to God, he who has not the Church for his mother has not God for his father; that as in the Church only are the Holy host and the keys, her officers alone can bless the baptismal water and the oil (73, 9. 69, 10. 1. 70, 3. 75, 14. 74, 6. 8. 70, 1. 2). From the language: pro baptizato quam precem facere potest sacerdos sacrilegus et peccator, it is plain Cyprian laid great stress on the moral character of the person baptizing, making it a condition of the sacrament.

With the opening of the 4th century, this question again became a subject of dispute. The Council of Arelate, convened by Constantine, 314, condemned the practice of the African Church, and decreed that persons baptized by heretics in the name of the Trinity should be received by the "laying on of hands." On the other hand, in the East, the Council of Nice, 325, ordered that the Paulicians, in case of a return to the Church, should be rebaptized. That of Laodicea (about 363) put the Montanists under the same rule, but excepted the Photians, the Quartodecimans, and Novatians. That of Constantinople (381) made necessary the baptism of Eunomians, Sabellians, and others, but recognized that of Arians, Macedonians, Novatians, Quartodecimans and Apollinarists. The Trullan Council (Can. 95), 692, repeated this, and ordered that the Manichæans, Valentinians, Marcionites (!), Nestorians, Eutychians, together with the disciples of Dioscurus and Severus, should be received on the recantation of their errors. Moreover, the Synodical decree of Carthage, in the time of Cyprian, the canons of Basil the Great, and the 85 Apostolic canons were recognized. Gieseler justly directs attention to the obscurity of these distinctions, ., § 69, Notes.

More stringent views were entertained by the chief teachers of the Greek Church: Athanasius, Gregory of Nazianzum, Basil the Great, Cyril of Jerusalem, who were of one mind with Cyprian and Firmilian (Comp. Theiner, das Heiligsdogma der kath. Kirche, p. 217. Fass, in Illgens Zeitschrift, 1828, IV., p. 121). They held that not only was the unchanged form of baptism, but, also, the orthodox faith of the Trinity on the part of the society baptizing, essential to the validity of the baptismal act. The Apostolical Canons, also, occupy the same position with these fathers, the 45th threatening with excommunication those who received heretics without the repetition of baptism. A milder view, however, gradually obtained, as may be inferred from the quæst. et resp. ad Orthodox., according to which (qu. 14) error in faith could be corrected by a recantation of it, in baptism, by the anointing, in ordination by laying on of hands.—In the ceremony of receiving heretics who were subject to a second baptism, the Eastern Church anointed with consecrated oil (ἁγίον ἔλαιον) the forehead, the eyes, the nostrils, the mouth, and ears. It signified the same as the manus impositio ad accipiendum sp. s. of the Western, the reference to pœnitentiam excepted.

The controversy in North Africa broke out afresh, when the Donatists, who held that the acts of a priest in a state of mortal sin were invalid, rejected Catholic baptism and rebaptized Catholics who joined them. As they appealed to Cyprian, the Church found it necessary to reconsider the question. The language (Can. 14) with which Bishop Gratus concluded the Council at Carthage, 348, shows that the views both of Cyprian and Stephen were now considered extreme. (Comp. Höfling, l. c., p. 73.)

Hitherto, opinions on this subject had been more or less confused, and to Augustine belongs the credit of having reduced them to a system by means of a consistent logical theory. His fundamental thought on baptism in general is based on the objectiveness of the sacrament, and may be thus stated: As baptism was instituted by Christ, when administered in the name of the Trinity, it is His, of which men can only be stewards (contra litt. Petil. I., 5 Nro. 6; II., 24 Nro. 57). A distinction must be made between the sacrament as such (the external transaction), and its grace (gratia, virtus) which is independent of the character both of the administrator and the recipient, so that salvation is in no sense the work of human merit, but of Christ only (de bapt. V., 21 Nr. 29). The redemption that is mediated by the sacrament, is bestowed only on the converted (ibid. IV., 14 Nr. 21). Neither the misbelief and sin of the distributor, nor of the receiver, destroys the truth and integrity of the sacrament (ibid. IV. 15, Nr. 22). Unworthy persons receive it, but not its gratia or virtus, which becomes to them a cause of condemnation (ibid. IV., 9 Nr. 13).

On the basis of these truths, Augustine maintained the validity of heretical baptism by the following argumentation: 1) Baptism impresses an indelible character on the recipient, who may desert the Church. It can, therefore, exist out of the Church, (ibid. V., 14 Nr. 20) and Cyprian was wrong in arguing to the contrary from the close relationship between the Church and Baptism. The possession of the Church must be denied heretics and schismatics, but not baptism and the sacraments which they have taken with them from her (ibid. V., 16 Nr. 21), and, as the devil can have his own in the Church, so Christ, His, out of her (IV., 7 Nr. 10). When, therefore, a heretic baptizes in the name of the Trinity, the Church recognizes the baptism as that of Christ; and Cyprian was wrong in calling it aqua adultera et profana, because the holiness of the Sacrament cannot be stained by human sins (ibid. III., 10 Nr. 15). If the prayer of a sinful priest be heard on behalf of the recipient, so is that of a heretic (ibid. VII., 26 Nr. 51); if the former, in virtue of the Sacrament, can forgive sin, so can the latter (ibid. IV., 4 Nr. 5). Should a catholically minded Christian, in danger of death, and unable to procure a priest, be baptized by an heretic or schismatic, such baptism would be not only valid but also spiritually effective.—2) Though Augustine adopted Cyprian's maxim: Extra ecclesiam nulla salus, he did not from it infer the nullity of heretical baptism, but contended that it was of no profit so long as a man remained outside of the Church which alone had the munus beatæ vitæ (ibid. IV., 1 Nr. 1. cf. I., cap. 1–3). As love is the fulfilment of the law (ibid. III., 19 Nr. 26) he argued that they who separated from the unity of the Church, disowned it, and, though they should possess everything, as the Apostle writes, 1 Cor, 13 : 1-3, even the sacraments (μυστήρια v. 2), without charity they were nothing (III., 16 Nr. 21). As the knowledge of God the heathen may have had served to increase their condemnation because of their idolatry (de unico baptismo, VI., Nr. 8), so the sacrament did but injure heretics, because of their perverseness. In the moment of their return, however, to the Church, the baptism received began to put forth its saving energy (de baptismo III., 13 Nr. 18).—3) As the hypocrite, or mere formalist (fictus), on his conversion, needs not a second baptism, so, likewise, the heretic, or schismatic. Upon the latter, by the laying on of hands and prayer, are conferred the gifts of Catholic unity, the Holy Ghost, and the love of God out of a pure heart and faith unfeigned (de fide non ficta), by means of which is opened up the way for the working of the grace of baptism (ibid. III., 16 Nr. 21). With Augustine this laying on of hands meant not simply Confirmation, but, also, reconciliation to the Church. In this sense he wrote (ibid. V., 23 Nr. 33): Manus impositio si non adhiberetur ab hæresi venienti, tanquam extra omnem culpam esse judicaretur; propter charitatis autem copulationem, quod est maximum donum spiritus sancti, sine quo non valent ad salutem quacumque alia sancta in homine fuerint, manus hæreticis correctis imponitur.—4) Through baptism are generated children unto God; whether derived, like Ishmael, from the servant that is, from heresy, or, like Isaac, from the lawful wife, that is, the Church, they belong to God and the Church. Ishmael, as later, Esau, became the son of a legitimate spouse, and was rejected because he would not keep the peace with his brother. Heresy is thus a servant to beget children unto God and his Church. If these preserve the fellowship with the brethren, they will not be excluded from the Church; if not, they will incur the fate of Ishmael (ibid. I., 14-15, Nr. 22-23).—5) In baptism, whether administered in or out of the Church, is given a character which can never be destroyed nor repeated; called by Augustine, character dominicus (VI., 1) or regius (contr. Gaudent. I., 12), and compared to the nota militaris impressed on the Roman warrior, which indicated his duty and witnessed against the deserter (de baptismo I., 4, Nr. 5).

So completely had Augustine determined the nature and limits of this subject, that nothing was left the Middle Ages to do but to develop more fully some of his inferences. In the following sentence, Leo the Great only repeats Augustine, this excepted, that he limits the laying on of hands to confirmation: Qui baptismum ab hæreticis acceperunt, cum antea baptizati non fuissent sola invocatione sp. s. per impositionem manuum confirmandi sunt, quia formam tantum baptismi sine sanctificationis virtute sumpserunt (ep. 129 ad Nicet., cap. 7). Peter Lombard expresses himself on laying on of hands in the following exact terms: Ex his aperte colligitur, quod qui etiam ab hæreticis baptizati sunt, servato characterе Christi, rebaptizandi non sunt, sed tantum impositione manus reconciliandi, ut spiritum sanctum accipiant et in signum detestationis hæreticorum. According to Thomas Aquinas, who distinguished between the sacramentum (the bapt. act) and the res sacramenti, if heretics administered the sacraments according to the form of the Church, they imparted simply the sacramentum, not the res sacramenti; if not, neither; whilst they who received them at their hands restrained their effect (Summa p. III., qu. 66, Art. 9., qu. 64, Art. 9). If they used the form of the Church, Bonaventure acknowledged their baptism to be a true one, but affirmed their heresy to be a bar to its efficacy (Comment. lib. IV., Dist. V., Art. 2. qu. 2), and, as this sacrament cannot be repeated, it impresses a character on him who receives it as a fictus. This fictio removed, it avails for the forgiveness of sins before baptism, while those after it can only be removed by the sacrament of penance. So, also, Alexander of Hales (Summa p. IV., quæst. 8, Membr. 6., Art. 3. § 1). The Catholic dogma of Salvation is most clearly expressed in the following decree by Eugene IV., 1441 (b. Coleti Concilia Tom. XVIII., p. 1225): Firmiter credit, profitemur et prædicat (sacrosancta Rom. eccl.) nullos intra catholicam ecclesiam non existentes, non solum paganos, sed nec Judæos aut hæreticos atque schismaticos æternæ vitæ fieri posse participes, sed in ignem æternum ituros, qui paratus est diabolo et angelis ejus, nisi ante finem vitæ eidem fuerint aggregati; tantumque valere ecclesiastici corporis unitatem, ut solum in ea manentibus ad salutem ecclesiastica sacramenta proficiant, et jejunia, eleemosynæ ac cætera pietatis officia et exercitia militiæ Christianæ præmiis æterna parturiant, neminemque, quantascumque eleemosynas fecerit, etsi pro Christi nomine sanguinem effuderit, posse salvari, nisi in catholica ecclesiæ gremio et unitate permanserit.

The acknowledgment of heretical baptism required also that baptism in extremis not only by laymen, but also by women, Jews, and heathen, should be regarded as valid. Nicholas I. was the first to recognize this, in the case of Jews and heathen who administered it in the name of the Trinity, or—which is the same—of Jesus (Resp. ad Consult. Bulgar., cap. 15. l. c. Mansi XV., p. 408). In Decret. pro Instruct. Armen. (b. Coleti, Tom. XVIII., p. 547) Eugene IV., 1440, says: In causa necessitatis non solum sacerdos et diaconus, sed etiam laicus et mulier imo etiam paganus et hæreticus baptizare potest, dummodo formam servet ecclesiæ et facere intendat, quod facit ecclesia.

The decrees of the Council of Trent correspond to the development of this doctrine as above stated. They acknowledge the validity of heretical baptism when administered in the name of the Trinity and with the intention of the Church (can. 4., de baptismo). This intentio faciendi, quod facit ecclesia, led to the conditional baptism of converts from Protestantism, the form used being: If thou hast not been baptized, I baptize thee in the name, &c. In the case of those Calvinists who, as they baptized in public, could not be denied the general intention, although they might err in the particular and specific intention, this rule was withdrawn by a decision of Pius V., and by decrees of Councils of Rouen, 1581 (Coleti XXI., p. 623); of Rheims, 1583 (de baptismo 10, p. 690); of Tours, 1583 (de bapt., cap. 6, p. 315); of Aix, 1585 (ibid., p. 943); of Toulouse, 1590 (ibid., p. 1283); of Narbonne (ibid., p. 1490, : 14). Comp. Theiner, das Seligkeitsdogma, p. 559, Anm. Hence originated the practice of receiving by penance and confirmation such heretics as had been baptized by the use of the right material (water) and the right form.

From the Augustinian theory, which the Catholic Church adopted, it follows that heretics can validly administer the other sacraments. Though, in his time, the number of sacraments had not been determined, he says in lib. III., de bapt., cap. 15, No. 20: Sacramenta, si eadem sunt, ubique integra sunt, etiamsi prave intelliguntur et discordiose tractantur, and in many places recognizes the validity of heretical ordination (e. g., contra epist. Parm. II., 13, No. 28). Perrone, the distinguished Catholic theologian, says (tract. de sacr. in genere, § 106) that the reasons which validate heretical baptism, also validate the other sacraments administered by them, penance excepted, for which they have not jurisdiction. These admissions, however, destroy the organic connection of Catholic theology, and render its scientific demonstration a difficult task. The Romish Catechism justifies them, as regards baptism, on the ground of its necessity, P. II., cap. II., qu. 23: quum hoc sacramentum necessario ab omnibus percipiendum sit, quemadmodum aquam ejus materiam instituit, qua nihil magis commune esse potest; sic etiam neminem ab ejus administratione excludi noluit. But the difficulty still remains, as, according to Catholic theology, all the sacraments are ad salutem necessaria.

Protestantism in general confessed the validity of baptism with water, in the name of the Trinity, which became efficient through the faith of the recipient. As Luther, adopting the Augustinian view, believed that the reality of the sacrament depended on the institution of Christ, and not on the character either of the person administering or receiving it, he hesitated not in ascribing true baptism to the Papacy, and combated the Anabaptists who insisted on its repetition. As the Reformers regarded the baptismal act as a signum promissionem exhibens of regeneration, not as its mediating cause, and held these two separable in time, they found no difficulty in admitting the validity of a regularly administered baptism by other confessions. In regard to the duty of parents towards their children, when they could not meet with a minister of their communion, though the Lutherans did not bewail as lost, infants who, by reason of sudden death, departed unbaptized, but entrusted them to the mercy of God (Gerhard, loc. theol. XXI., § 210. Höfling, § 24), they, nevertheless, ascribed to baptism a necessitas ordinata, viz., the necessitas præcepti et medii, and recommended baptism in extremis by laymen, women, and even by the unbaptized (Gerhard, loc. § 31). As the Reformed Church, on the other hand, regarded children as members of the covenant of grace, in virtue of their birth within the Christian Church (comp. 1 Cor. 7: 14), it laid no stress on baptism in extremis. Calvin rejected it as a superstition, and confined its administration to the Church authorities (Inst., lib. IV., cap. 15., §§ 20-22). Hence, it is not difficult to understand how Peter Martyr could warn the English churches against allowing Lutheran ministers to baptize their children propter diversitatem fidei, pietatis et conscientiarum. He wrote to them: Profecto infantes vestri de salute non periclitantur, si absque baptismo intereant, quia nec gratiæ Christi, nec prædestinationis effecta externis rebus et sacramentis sunt adligantur. In the absence of a Reformed minister, he permitted Reformed elders to have them baptized by a Roman Catholic priest, provided it was rightly done, and they detested the accompanying superstitions (in Calvini tractat. theol. omnes Genev. 1597, fol. 610).

In one respect, Protestantism went back of the Augustinian position to the older dogmatic view. Though Joh. Gerhard affirmed the use of water and of the right form to be the essentials of a true baptism, yet he always presupposed that the recipient was in the bosom of an orthodox Trinitarian Church (§ 27). Höfling, also, regarded this last point as absolutely indispensable (p. 71), as by the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, names might, otherwise, be invoked to which a meaning was attached different from that intended by the true Church. The Reformed Ebrard (christl. Dogmatik II., 600), likewise asserts baptism by those who disbelieve the fundamentals of the Christian system to be invalid, even when administered by water and the right form. This view makes the form of baptism rest in the faith of the baptizing congregation in the Trinity; making baptism an act of the Christian Church, it allows its administration only to such persons who are members of the same, and so denies its administration to the unbaptized, to heathen, and to Jews.

A few words concerning the difference between the Catholic and Protestant view of this subject. In order to save itself from the consequences of its maxim: Extra ecclesiam nulla Salus, which the rejection of heretical baptism would have imposed, the Romish Church adopted the theory of Augustine. This theory is: A true baptism may be administered outside of the Church, because it is the sacrament of Christ; it does not, however, benefit the heretic or schismatic, but becomes efficient only when he returns to the Church. The error of this view lies in a one-sided conception both of the Church and of heresy, which implies deviation from doctrine and separation from the Church to be, as such, morally wrong, and mortal sins. In the time of Augustine, when there was one universal Church that opposed the sects and held to the Holy Scriptures, there was, no doubt, more or less reason for its being regarded as absolutely true. But, in our day, the Romish Church is but one of many Churches, and places her apostolic traditions above the Bible. As Protestantism opposes Catholicism that it may not oppose Christ and His word, the censure pronounced by Augustine against heretics as enemies of Christ does not affect it. If love to man is of more worth than love to God, then, indeed, does Protestantism fall under his condemnation when he says that heretics cannot receive the benefit of baptism because they

the highest gift of the Spirit, which is love. The history of Protestantism has triumphantly disproved the sophism of Augustine—the ἀπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ of the Romish dogma—that schism as such is a moral evil. The Roman Church has never been able to show why laymen and heretics should be competent to perform a valid baptism and marriage, and yet incompetent for the discharge of the other sacraments. When, on account of the character indelebilis, and nota militaris, this Church claims the person baptized as her property, to secure which she may even use force, she practises an abuse extremely pernicious.

Whilst Protestantism asserted the objective reality of this sacrament and its independency, touching its operation, of the character of the administrator, it based it on a more scriptural view of the Church, and improved it by distinguishing between the visible and invisible Church. To its apprehension this invisible Church was not a mere abstraction, but the body of Christ, which, as the communio sanctorum, embraced true believers of every age and clime, and exhibits itself in particular Churches as in so many temporary and perishable forms. To the Church alone in its most comprehensive and perfect sense belong the attributes of unity, universality, holiness, and infallibility; to its several manifestations, only so far as these are incorporated in it and partake of its ideal perfection. By means of this principle, the Augustinian theory is set free from its contradictions. As the property of Christ, baptism is designed for His Church, and can be effective to salvation only in it; but, as every ecclesiastical society intends to receive the recipient into the Church, every baptism administered in the sense of the Trinitarian creed, is a true Christian one, and, when received by a living faith, accomplishes that whereunto it was appointed. Protestantism thus acknowledges the validity of every baptism by a Christian society which believes in the Trinity and performs it in this name.

G. E. STEITZ.—Ermentrout.

Heriger, Abbot of Lobbes.—The revival of the sciences which marked the close of the 10th cent., has received far too little consideration, and has been unjustly attributed to the efforts of Gerbert alone. Along the Lower Rhine, in Lorraine, and North France, the classics, dialectics, and mathematics, were zealously studied at all the cathedral and monastic schools. Liege became eminent as the abode of the muses, and the monastery Lobbes or Lobach, on the Sambre, in Hennegau, which was closely connected with the See of Liege, was almost considered the high-school of the Liège clergy. And the most distinguished teacher at Lobbes was Heriger. He was born c. 960–70. He probably came to Liege from Flanders in 965, with Fulkuin (who then became abbot of L.), or with B. Notker, who, in 972, was transferred from the imperial court, or St. Gall, to Lorraine. Heriger soon acquired a reputation in Lobbes and Liege, as a teacher and writer. He paid special attention to the history of his country. At first he wrote poetical narratives for purposes of edification, and the use of the schools (as his de S. Servatio, and vita S. Ursuari).

Then he wrote Gesta episcoporum Tungrensis, Trajectensium et Leodiensium, c. 979; it reaches only to the 7th cent., and dwells disproportionately long upon the life of St. Remaclus. It is still extant. In 980 he prepared, at B. Notker's request, for the use of Abbot Womarus at Ghent, a vita S. Landoaldi.—After Fulkuin's death the monks of Lobbes chose Heriger as his successor. The Bishops of Liege and Cambrai consecrated him on Dec. 21, 990. Thenceforth he devoted himself to problems requiring mathematical and dialectical solutions, and threw himself into the midst of those scientific discussions, in which Gerbert took the lead: determining the period of Advent and Easter, &c. This led him to write: epist. Herig. ad quemdam Hugonem monachum; dialogus Herig. et Adelb. Trajectensis postero tempore episcopi de aduentu Domini celebrando. Mathematics is indebted to him for his Regulæ de abaco, or Reg. numerorum super abacum Gerberti, though subsequent advances in this science rendered it ridiculous.—Heriger also took part in the doctrinal discussions of his day. Ratherius, B. of Verona and Liege, had (957) published the work of Pasch. Radbertus on transubstantiation, the doctrine of which was far from being regarded with general favor. Its reissue by Ratherius revived the controversy on the subject. Of Heriger it is said: concessit etiam contra Radbertum multa cathol. patrum scripta de corpore et sanguine Domini, and there are several MSS. treatises on this subject, over Heriger's name, which were formerly ascribed to an Anonymous Cellotianus, and later to Gerbert. Mabillon has proven Heriger to be the author. Heriger's treatise exhibits the position of doctrinal development toward the close of the 10th cent. Tritheimius says Heriger also wrote two books de divinis officiis. He is hardly the author of vita S. Berlandis, vita S. Landelini, vita Hadelini.—He died Oct. 31, 1007, and was buried in the church of St. Ursmar, Lobbes, in front of the altar of St. Thomas, which he built.—(See SIGBERT's de viris illustr., c. 137. TRITHEMIUS de scriptor. ecclesiast., c. 306; chron. Hirsaug. ad a., 979. MABILLON's Annales ord. S. Bened., IV., 60, 178. Hist. littér. de France VII., 194–208; 472–6. KÖPKE in Monum. Germ. histor. Script., VII., 134, &c. ALBRECHT VOGEL's Ratherius von Verona u. d. 10. Jahrh. I., 238–9; II., 8, 46–49). ALBRECHT VOGEL.

Hermann von dem Busche belonged to the zealous adherents of Reuchlin. He was the first German nobleman who sought to promote science and classical learning by becoming a public teacher. His attachment to the Humanists of the age, and his travels to Italy, France, the Netherlands, and England, brought him into contact with many learned men. He was born 1468, in Sassenberg; his father was Burchard v. d. Busche, and his mother Barbara v. Shedelich. He had one brother, Burchard, who became canon of Minden, and survived Hermann. After spending some time in Heidelberg in the study of Cicero's works, he went, 1485, with Rudolph v. Lange, canon of Münster, to Italy. From Italy he returned to Heidelberg, published Carminum Lib., II., for which he was made Mag. Art. Soon afterwards his friend Count Her-nann v. Nuenar, canon of Cologne, a Reuchlinist, called him as teacher of the classics. There he soon became involved in a bitter controversy with Hoogstraten (see Art.). He left Cologne and taught the classics successively in Hamm, Münster, Osnabrück, Bremen, Hamburg, Lübeck, and Rostock. In 1510 he received a call to Wittenberg, but there, also, became entangled in quarrels which led him to return to Leipsic. Envious opposition drove him from Leipsic to Magdeburg, thence he went to Braunschweig, Hildesheim, the Netherlands, and England. In 1517 Nuenar recalled him to Cologne, but Hoogstraten and his party compelled him to leave the second time. He then (1518) became rector of the school in Wesel. There he wrote Vallum humanitatis: Col., 1518; Freft. ad M., 1719, an apologetic work, and diligently read the writings of Luther and Melanchthon, which led him to study the Bible and Church Fathers. In 1522 he went to Wittenberg to pursue these studies under Luther and Melanchthon themselves. In 1526 Philip of Hessen called him as Prof. of History at the new University of Marburg. During his time he married, and became the father of one son, Jerome. After some years he retired to his estate at Dülmen, Münster, where he died in 1534, his son having departed shortly before him. Besides the works named H. wrote Epigrammation; Triplex Hecatostichon; Scholia in Aeneida; Annot. ad Juvén., &c. &c.—(See MEIER's Lebensbeschr. berühmte Männer, II., 392. Epist. trium virorum, &c., ad Herm. Comitem, &c.; Ejusdem respons., &c.: Col., 1518; Selctadii, 1519; Mogunt. KNAPP's Nützliche Urkunden zur Reformationsgesch., II., 425. HAEUPELMANN, Oratio de vita, &c., Herm. Buschii, in JOH. GOES, Opusc. varia. de Westphal., &c.: Helmst., 1668, 4to.). NEUDECKER.*

Hermann von Fritzlar, a mystic of the 14th cent. He was probably a wealthy layman, like Nicholas of Basel, and was led by political and religious disturbances, or an unhappy marriage, to retire from the world, and seek the society of likeminded friends. An earlier work of his, "Die Blume der Schauung," seems to be lost; but his "Heiligenleben," has been published in PFEIFFER's deutschen Mystik. d. 14. Jahrh. I., 258, from a MS. written under H.'s supervision. It is composed of selections from sources of which some no longer exist, and is valuable for the history of the German mysticism of that period. PFEIFFER.*

Hermann of Lehnin, is named as the author of the notorious Lehnin prophecy¹, in the inscription, and called a monk of the monastery Lehnin in Mark Brandenburg, c. 1300. In a hundred leonine hexameters, the prophecy describes the future fate of the monastery and country at large, and predicts evil to the foes of Rome, especially the successive dynasties of Brandenburg, after 1321. After much discussion as to the actual date of the poem, it is now ascertained that it first appeared in the last decades of the 17th cent., in Berlin, and was not written earlier. The Privy Councillor, Seidel († 1693), the Master of horse, Oelven († 1727), Nicholas of Zitzewitz († 1709), the Jesuit, Peter F. Wolf of Breslau († 1708), the Berlin Provost, Fromm († 1685) have been severally claimed as its author; and the extensive literature upon it, is almost more remarkable than the fiction itself. Of the works devoted to it we name: 1) Dr. GIESELER, Erfurt, 1849. 2) Dr. MEINHOLD, a) Das Vatic. Lehninense, &c.; b) die Weissagung, &c.: Lpzg., Fritzsche, 1849. 3) Dr. GUHRAUER, die Weissag. v. Lehnin. Breslau, 1850. 4) OTTO WOLF, d. berühmte Lehn. Weissag. Grünberg, 1850. 5) Dr. M. W. HEFFTER, d. Gesch. d. Klosters Lehnin, &c.: Brandenburg, 1851. C. F. GÖSCHEL.*

Hermann von Salza, was a descendant of a noble family of Thuringia, of that name, resident in Salza (Langensalzen). Our earliest accounts of him locate him near Jerusalem, where, 1210, he became Grand Master of the order of German Knights, established c. 1190. His zeal and ability soon made the order renowned, and we find Hermann now in the East, now in Italy, now in Germany, near the Emperor, and near the Pope, everywhere acquiring increasing influence. In 1219 he took the most prominent part in the conquest of Damietta; in 1228 he was in the crusade of Frederick II., and in 1229 entered Jerusalem with the Emperor. In the West we often find him engaged in the Emperor's service, and in that of the Pope, for which many gifts and privileges were bestowed upon his order. To all this he added earnest efforts for the Christianization of Prussia (see Art.), so that it was said of him:

Hermannus Prussos Christi sub vota coëgit.

He died on Palm Sunday, March 20, 1239. He has frequently afforded a fertile theme for poets, among whom we name Zach. Werner, and E. Raupach. — (See Analecta Saxonica, 1765, Th. I., p. 35–73, 111–169, 186–198, 317–330. J. F. BÖHMER, Regesta imperii. JOH. VOIGT, Gesch. Preuss., &c., II., 68–368. FR. RAUMER, Gesch. d. Hohenst., III., VI., Die Vorzeit: Jahrg. 1820, 21, 22, 24, 25, 26, 27. CARL VON SALZA, d. edlen Herren v. S.: Lpz., 1838. C. F. GÖSCHEL, Chronik d. Stadt Langensalza, 1818, Bd. I., Zerstreute Blätter aus d. Hand-u. Hilfs-Acten eines Juristen, III., Abth. 2, p. 40, &c.). C. F. GÖSCHEL.*

¹ It begins:

1) Nec tibi cum cura, Lehnin, cano fata futura,
2) Quæ niki monstravit Dominus, qui cuncta creavit.
Lines—

28) Ex humili surgis, binis nunc inclyte Burgis

29) Accendisque facem, jactando nomine pacem, are supposed to refer to the Elector Frederic I.

But the prophetic zeal of the vaticination first blazes out strongly in view of the apostasy of the house and country of Brandenburg from Rome (1539). The Electress Elizabeth, wife of Joachim I., is described as another Eve.

42) Inferet at tristem patrias tunc fœmina pestem,

43) Fœmina serpentis tæbe contacta recentia.

This evil should extend to her eleventh descendant.

49) Hoc et ad undenum durabit stemma venenum.

Of Joachim II. it is said:

52) Ecclesiam vastat, bona religiosa subhastat

53) Ite, meus populus, protector est tibi nullus,

54) Hora donec veniet, nova quæ restitutio fiet.

It ends with a prediction of the ultimate triumph of the Papacy:

100) Nec lupus nobili plus insidiatur ovili.

Hermann, Elector and Archbishop of Cologne (Count von Wied), was distinguished as a man and a prince, for his love of justice, truth, and every good cause. Regardless of personal sacrifices, he co-operated with Melancthon, Bucer, &c., in introducing the Reformation into his principality, though an early reaction took place, and cost him his civil and ecclesiastical dignities. He was the fourth son of Count Frederick von Wied, and was born Jan. 14, 1477. After the death of his (probably eldest) brother Adam, he became canon of Cologne, and after the death of the electoral-archb. Philip, of Cologne, he was elected (1515) Archbishop of Cologne, confirmed by Leo X. as Hermann V., and recognized by the empire as Elector. He attended the Frankfort Diet which elected Charles V., presented to him the sword and sceptre at Aix-la-Chapelle, anointed and crowned him. At first he acted with the friends of Rome against the evangelical cause, but on becoming better acquainted with its merits he changed his views and plans, and devised measures for its establishment in his diocese. With a view to further reform he called a provincial Synod of his bishops at Cologne, where favorable resolutions were actually passed. John Gropper attended this Synod. This encouraged Hermann. After the Synod he visited the Elector of Brandenburg and Saxony. On his way back he became acquainted with Melancthon. In 1540 he went with Mettmann and Gropper, in whose sincerity he still trusted, to the diet at Hagenu, there he met Bucer, and invited him and Hedio to visit Bonn. Bucer was with him in 1542, and after some consultations with Gropper and the suffragan, B. John Stapp, he left, promising to return in the following year; but he came back only in Dec., 1542. In March, 1543, H. summoned his estates for further consultation, when Gropper and the Cologne clergy openly opposed Bucer as a heretic. Meanwhile Melancthon, Hedio, and others arrived, in concert with whom Bucer prepared a plan of reform, which provided merely for a simple, evangelical Church service, without setting forth any doctrinal confession. The temporal estates approved the scheme, but the clergy denounced it, and demanded the dismissal of Bucer and his friends. Melancthon left on July 28, but Bucer, Hedio, and Sarcerius were not dismissed until August. At the diet of Spire, Hermann was accused of favoring the Reformation, but he entered a Libellum dimissorium. The Emperor now, also, opposed him, and in June, 1545, issued a decree declaring that he took the Cologne clergy and Archepiscopal See under his protection. On July 10 Hermann appealed to a general Council, but on the 18th already Paul III. cited him to appear in Rome within 60 days, whilst Charles V. summoned him to Brussels within 30 days, to answer certain charges against him. Hermann sent a delegate to defend him before Charles, but disregarded the Pope's citation, who issued a brief of suspension against him on Jan. 8, 1546, and on April 16, a bull of deposition. Still H. continued to hold his See, and even on July 7, Charles addressed him by letter as Archb. H. appealed from the Papal bull to a Council, but ineffectually. A successor was appointed to his See, and to avoid further disturbances H. resigned his offices, retired to Wied, and died there, Aug. 15, 1552. Adolph of Schaumburg, his successor, restored the papacy in the land.—(See J. Str. Recl. Gesch. d. gräf. u. fürstl. Häuser Isenburg, Runkel, Wied, &c.: Weimar, 1825, p. 137, &c. J. P. Bero's Reformationsgesch. d. Länder Jülich, &c., von Ludwig Tross. Hamm, 1825, p. 64, &c. SECKENDORF, Hist. Luth., III., s. 12, § 50, p. 137; s. 27, § 108, p. 443, &c. &c. PLANK, Gesch. d. prot. Lehrbegr..) NEUDECKER.*

Hermann, Heriman Contractus, the lame, a monk of Reichenau, was one of the most learned men of the 11th cent., and of the best German Chronists. He was born July 18th, 1013, the son of a pious Count, Wolferat II., of Verzen, and Hiltrude, a woman of active beneficence. Being lame, and one of 14 children, he was placed, in his seventh year, in a monastery, probably that of Reichenau, then in high repute for learning, under Abbot Berno. He engaged zealously in his studies, especially mathematics, astronomy, music, poetry, and history, wrote learned books and Latin hymns, made clocks and musical and mechanical instruments. His contemporaries called him the wonder of his age. He commenced his annals 1048, having shortly before seen Henry III. on the occasion of the consecration of the Church of St. Mark in Reichenau. To 1044 his work is based on older chronicles, thence to 1054 it records personal observations, which are valuable for the history of the Emperor. He also wrote a special history of Conrad II., and Henry III., which is lost. His chronicles were first printed, from a now lost MS., in 1529, by Sichard, in Basel; the latest edition, in PERTZ, Monum. Germ., Vol. V., was printed from a Reichenau and Munich MS., and has been translated by K. Nöbbe, (15. Liefg. d. Geschichtschreiber d. deutsch. Vorzeit). H. died in September, 1504, and was buried on his father's property in Alshausen, beside his ancestors. KLÜPFEL.*

Hermann, Nicholas, a hymnist and composer of the 16th cent., "der alte fromme Cantor," of Joachimthal, Bohemia, the friend of his pastor Matthesius, whose sermons furnished material for his hymns. Of his public life, little is known. He led a retired life, and in old age was sorely afflicted. His hymns exhibit him as a tried Christian, and friend of children; they have less of the objective character of strictly liturgical compositions, and are rather suited to the personal experiences of daily domestic life. He wished them to be regarded as "Kinder-u. Hauslieder." He also composed several tunes. He died May 5, 1561.—His works are: Evangelia auf alle Sonn u. Festtage in Gesängen, &c.: Wittenberg, 1560; Hist. v. d. Sündfluth, Joseph, Mose, Elia, &c., in rhymes: Lpz., 1563.—(See GERVINUS, poet. National-Lit., Bd. III. WACKERNAGEL, deutsch. K.-lied, &c., 1841. KOCH, Gesch. d. K.-lieds, Bd. I. LEDDERHOSE, Matthes u. N. Hermann: Halle, 1855.)

J. WAGENMANN.*

Hermas, the author of an ancient writing entitled Pastor (ποιμήν) not to designate the character of its contents, but because the angelus penitentie, who communicated the revela-ons to Hermas, appeared habitu pastorali, and ys: "Ego sum PASTOR ille, cui traditus es" (land. Pro-cemium). It was originally written Greek, but, with the exception of a few fragments (especially in the "Doctrina ad Antiochum" Gallandii Bibl., I., XXVII.) now exists only in a Latin translation. It contains a series of apocalyptic visions, and their import. As we have it, the book is divided into three parts: Visiones; II. Mandata; III. Similitudines.—The Visiones begin with the personal relations of Hermas himself, who had committed a sin, and is exhorted to repent (Vis. 1), but in the first vision already the condition of the whole Church comes under review, and in Vis. 2 it is urged to repent, whilst in Vis. 3 and 4 motives for this are set forth, viz., in the 3d the approximate completion of the Church, and in the 4th the act of approaching persecutions. In part II. details are mentioned, and a number of rules revealed by obeying which the Church may secure moral renovation.¹ Part III. aims at producing the same effect, by means of simple similitudes and more extended visions.—In order to ascertain the significance of this book, it is indispensable to realize the condition of the Church in that age. The Church had outlived the freshness of youth, had become like an aged woman (Vis. I., 2; II., 11). Many had fallen away, others grown cold and carnal, others had been ensnared by the incipient errors of Gnosticism.² The original simple Church-organization still continued. Presbyters are at the head of the congregations, Hermas knows nothing of Bishops, only Clemens (Vis. II., 4) seems prominent in the presbyterial college as a sort of primus inter pares, entrusted with the correspondence with distant congregations. But Hermas complains of a hierarchical tendency in the Church, of presbyters aspiring after honorable positions (Vis. III., 9; Simil. VIII., 7, &c.); of their relaxing discipline among themselves (Vis. III., 9); of their dissensions (Vis. III., 9, &c.; the passover controversy?) Against these evils Hermas directs his admonitions, with the motives already named. The end of the world is near, "cito consummabitur turris" (Vis. III., 8), but God grants a brief delay that men may repent (Sim. IX., 5, 14: "Et ideo intermissio facta est struendi, ut, si hi egerint pœnitentiam, adjiciantur in structuram turris").

This book exhibits an ethical reaction from the growing laxity of the Church, in favor of stricter morals, and earlier simplicity in life and in the government of the Church. Hermas belongs, therefore, to the great reactionary movement of the 2d cent., and which culminated in Montanism. Indeed his book was not alone in its kind, as an utterance of free prophecy, for the predictions of Eldad and Medad (Numb. 11: 26, 29) cited in Vis. II., 3, must have belonged to the same class of unofficial prophecies. Still we find traces of a doctrinal tendency, also, as in Mand. IV., 3, the discussion of the doctrine of no repentance after baptism.—But what relation did H. sustain to Montanism? COTELIER designates it as "propugnaculum fidei cathol. adv. Montani duritiam" (so HEFELE, PP. AA. Proleg., p. 83, and others); but DORNER (Doctr. of the person of Christ) makes H. the forerunner of Montanism (so RITSCHL, Gesch. d. altkathol. K., 546, &c.). HILGENFELD (Apost. VV. p. 178), however, denies all relation of the Pastor to Mont., whether for or against, and suggests a stronger analogy with the warnings of the Ebionites, uttered by the prophet Elxai. But whatever the external relationship between H. and Mont. may have been, the evidences of an inward affinity are obvious. The same leading subjects are prominent in both. The analogy with the Elxaitic prophecies, however, hardly holds, because they are essentially doctrinal. At the same time H. does not go the full length of Mont., but rather opposes what became its extreme views. Free prophecy does not stand in actual conflict with the regular ministry of the Church; H. desires the presbyters to communicate his revelation to the congregations. The reaction is not extra ecclesia. And further, whilst H., like the Montanists, believes himself to be in novissimis, there is still a dilatatio intervening. This delay affords time for repentance, which is possible after baptism (Mand. IV.). Hermas likewise admits of some progressive development in the Church, whereas Mont. is all for reaction (Vis. III., 11, &c.). The ascetic demands of Hermas are, also, less severe; he allows second marriages, enjoins no fasts, does not so rigidly require martyrdom, &c. (Simil. I.). Whilst, therefore, the Pastor furnishes a parallel with Montanism, it exhibits a reaction of a milder and more conservative form.—To a proper estimate of the doctrinal system of Hermas, the aim and position of the book must be kept in view. It has been too commonly regarded as judaistic. But this judgment needs limitation. The Christology of the book is decidedly not Ebionistic. The Son of God existed before all creatures, took part in the creation (Sim. IX., 12, 14). Hermas has been thought to identify Christ with the Holy Ghost simply as a virtue proceeding from the Father, from a misapprehension of Sim. V. The Son of God in consummatione apparuit, by his sufferings removed the sins of mankind, and opened the way to heaven, into which those who receive him, shall enter (Sim. IX., 12; V., 6). This is done through baptism, which is magically conceived of, and as effecting an outward union with God. Fides is simply f. in Deum, not in Christum; faith in one God and his law, so that all stress is laid upon obedience to it (Sim. VI., 1). If man sins after baptism, pardon may be once more obtained, but then only by rendering personal satisfaction, it must be

¹ Mand. I. De fide in unum Deum; II. De fugienda obrectatione, et elemosyna facienda in simplicitate; III. De fugiendo mendacio; IV. De dimittenda adultera; V. De tristitia cordis et patientia; VI. De agnoscendis uniuscujusque hominis duobus genis et utriusque inspirationibus; VII. De Deo timendo et dæmone non timendo; VIII. Declinandum est a malo et facienda bona; IX. Postulandum a Deo assidue et sine hesitatione; X. De animi tristitia et non contristando Spiritum Dei, qui in nobis est; XI. Spiritus et prophetas probari ex operibus, et de duplici spiritu; XII. De duplici cupiditate. Dei mandata non esse impossibilia et diabolum non metuendum credentibus.

² Vis. III., 7: "Qui crediderunt quidem, dubitatione autem sua reliquerunt vitam suam veram, putantes se meliorem posse invenire."

earned (Sim. VI.; Mand. IV., 4).—The doctrinal character of the book explains the importance it acquired. Irenæus cites it as γραφή (adv. hæc., IV.). Clem. Alex. refers to it (Strom. I., 29; II., 1; VI., 15, &c.). Origen, who identifies the author with Hermas in Rom. 16: 14, says of the book, "valde utilis et ut puto divinitus inspirata," though not generally received (Explan. in Ep. ad Rom., l. c.; Hom. 8, in Num.; Hom. 1, in Ps. 37; ad Matth. 24: 32, &c.), and by some rejected (De princ., IV., 2, 8; Philocal. c. 1). The canon Muratori recommends its being read privatim, but not publicly in the churches. Subsequently, when the Montanist controversy arose, the book satisfied neither party. Tertullian, who names it without disapproval in de orat. 12, speaks of it in de pudic., c. 2, as "illo apocrypho Pastore mæchorum," and in c. 10, says all reckon it "inter apocrypha et falsa." It shared the same fate in the West. Jerome, Catal., c. 10, says: "apud Latinos pæne ignotus est." It held its position longer in the Greek Church. Athanasius, de Incarn. verbi, I., 3, speaks "τῆς ὑπερμεγίστης βιβλίου τοῦ Ποιμένος," though he does not consider it canonical (Opp. II., 963). Eusebius, III., 25, reckons it among the σὺδα, though many still esteemed it (III., 3; Jerome Catal., c. 10). It may have injured its reputation that the Arians appealed to it (Athan. ep. ad Afros, Opp. I., II., 895). The stichometry of Nicephorus reckons it among the Apoc. of the New Test.—The authorship of the book was early in dispute. Origen on Rom. 16: 14, refers it to apostolic times, and Irenæus and Clem. Alex. must have shared this view. But the canon Muratori assigns it to a later Hermas, a brother of B. Pius of Rome (142–57; cf. van GILSE, Disput. de antiq. ll. ss. N. T. catalogo: Amstelod., 1852, p. 18). Subsequently opinions are divided. That the book was not written during the Apostolic period, by the Hermas mentioned in Rom. 16, requires no proof; and yet it evidently claims this origin (Vis. II., 4), Clemens being named as a cotemporary. All that can be definitely said is, that the book was written about the middle of the 2d cent., and in Rome (Vis. I., 1; IV., 1, &c. Semler erroneously assumes Egypt). The author was not a presbyter, but a layman, and probably a tradesman (Vis. III., 1).—Editions: Pastor, 1513, by Faber Stapulensis; then by Cotelier and Clericus (PP. App.), this edition is chiefly the basis of later ones, as that of Gallandi in the Bibl., Tom. I. The edition of Anger and Dindorf, though the Greek text may not be genuine, consulted for the Latin text, a MS. of the Dresden library not previously used (cf. ANGER, Synopsis, p. XXIV.—Literature: GRATZ, Disq. in Past. Hermæ, Bonnæ, 1820. LÜCKE, Einl. in d. Offenb. Joh., p. 142. HEFELÉ Proleg. to the PP. AA., and in the Tübing. theol. Quartalschr., 1839, p. 169. JACHMANN, der Hirte Hermas: Königsb., 1835. HILGENFELD, Apost. VV.: Halle, 1853, p. 125, &c. CAVE, Hist. Liter.). G. UHLHORN.*

Hermeneutics, Biblical.—Understanding by Hermeneutics, in the general sense of the term, a systematic theory of the laws and principles by which the sense of a written document is to be deduced from its letter, and looking at the

Bible in the light simply of an ancient writing, a portion of the world's religious literature, there might seem to be no reason to speak of any particular biblical discipline under the name: the interpretation of the Bible, in this view, would call only for an application of the general science to its special contents. But these contents are more than any ordinary human record; they involve a divine revelation; and hence the question arises, whether with this character the Bible does not require a system of interpretation materially different from that which is applied to other writings. This question then, answered as we may, makes it necessary to know and say what the principles are in truth by which the Bible, as such, is to be expounded. It is plain, moreover, that these need to be exhibited in the form of a scientific theory. The Bible is, indeed, sufficient of itself to make even the unlearned wise unto salvation. But the extreme assertion of certain sects, as also of particular enthusiasts and fanatics, that it needs no learned interpretation at all, is at once refuted by the simple fact, that all interior access to it supposes first an outward access—so much, at least, as is offered by a translation of it into the vernacular tongue, which is itself a process of exposition with special claims to learning. To transfer such a book from a dead to a living language, from the past to the present, from the relations and surroundings of its own origin to the wholly different circumstances of other countries and times, demands, it is easy to see, a very large amount of science. At the same time the outward is so joined here with the inward, that the religious element itself can never be fully comprehended apart from the help of such science; as in no other way can it be possible to distinguish properly between temporary form and absolute substance, so as to reach the one through the other. As we need then a science of theology for the true religion in general, so do we need also a science of biblical hermeneutics as one of its particular branches or departments. What place it must take in the general system is plain. Having to do with the determination of the sense which is contained in the letter of the Bible, regarded as a written document, it belongs to historical theology, and particularly to that division of this whose province it is to inquire into the origin and ground of revealed religion, called sometimes philologia sacra. It presupposes, of course, what goes under the name of biblical introduction, including all that pertains to the settlement of the canon; as also biblical criticism, which fixes and determines the text. Its relations to what comes after itself, in the order of theological science, will appear as we proceed.—By hermeneutics we mean a theory of interpretation. To interpret is to bring to understanding the sense contained in the written word, that is, to find this and to represent it, as a series of thoughts expressed in a given form of language. It is not enough that the sense be found; it must be represented also or expounded, so that it shall be made to pass into the understanding of others. So Augustine, de doctrina christiana, lib. I., c. 1, tells us: Duc res, quibus nititur omnis tractatus scripturæ, modus inveniendi quæ intelligenda rent, et modus proferendi quæ intellecta sunt." The business of interpretation is then only properly complete, when the sense of Scripture is made to be intelligible for the general mind.

Considered now first as the finding of the sense from the word, it is plain that interpretation cannot be simply real, occupying itself with things and making no account comparatively of the forms of language in which they are expressed; and just as little, or still less even, can it be simply verbal, having to do with words only in their outward view, as a matter of lexicography and grammar. The relation between words and things, in all language, is not outward, but inward and organic, like that between the body and the soul, which are joined together in the unity of a common life. Interpretation, then, to be true and complete, must regard both at the same time. Contents and form must be allowed to interpenetrate each other. This involves again something farther. What is put into word can be fully understood, only as it is comprehended like any other fact, in its living causes, the inward and outward influences, namely, which have determined the mind of the writer in his use of language. Interpretation, thus, while it regards immediately single combinations of word and sense, cannot stop with these. The single is conditioned always by what is more general than itself; in the case before us, every text by its context, then again by the scope of the particular book to which it belongs, and through this finally by the spirit and sense of the Bible at large. The business of interpretation is not to construct the general, or the whole from the single; but to bring out rather the true sense of the single, in and by the light of the whole.

The sense of any writing is simply a matter of historical fact. In this view, interpretation aiming to determine the meaning of the Bible, must necessarily be philological. This includes two sides, a corporeal and a spiritual. In the first view it must be grammatico-historical, resting purely on the outward letter. But the case involves, besides such mere letter, the presence of a peculiar individual life, the soul of things spoken or done in a particular way; and in apprehending this, the method before us must show itself also historico-psychological. The conjunction of these two processes gives us in full what we are to understand by philological interpretation. It is not necessary to enter into details here in regard to its means and methods. See on the subject Schleiermacher, Hermeneutik; Luz, Bib. Herm.; and Hahn, Stud. u. Krit., 1830, II.).

Of more account for us is the question, whether the Bible is to be interpreted only philologically like every other ancient writing, as some say, or also theologically, as others contend, in view of its being an inspired record of divine truth.

It is plain enough, on the one hand, that the interpretation of the Bible as an inspired and sacred book cannot take its start in theological exposition; it must be primarily philological, and the other method can be regarded as coming in, not to set this aside, but only to modify it, and to raise it as it were into a higher sphere. But it is equally certain, on the other hand, that the true philological method, in the case of such a book, must of itself pass over into the theological; inasmuch as this method itself requires, that every writing should be explained from its own standpoint, and in the light of its peculiar constitution. One of the first hermeneutical canons is, that the interpreter should be in some spiritual sympathy with the book he seeks to explain, should be able to enter into its distinguishing character and life, and to have what may be called a home understanding of its proper sense. Let it be assumed then that the Bible is an inspired book, containing supernatural truth, and it will follow necessarily from this rule itself, that it can be rightly interpreted only from this posture of a mind which is in some actual correspondence with this higher region of truth by the power of faith, or in other words, that the philological method must itself become theological in order to fulfil truly its own task. The Church makes this assumption in fact, and sets as the object of biblical exposition, accordingly, the determination of divine truth. There is a modern school, on the other hand, which tells us we have no right to condition the business of interpretation—that the interpreter has only to make out the meaning of the text scientifically, without any presupposition in regard to its truth one way or another. He must be without prejudice in his work, it is said; and this is taken to mean that the text must be for him a matter of pure historical investigation only, without any theological interest whatever. It is easy to show, however, that no such view can be consistently sustained. The demand that the Bible shall be interpreted without any preconception, is itself a preconception of the most positive kind; since it takes for granted, without proving it, that there can be no such peculiar character belonging to the Bible as its supernatural pretensions imply, which any sound exegesis then must be required even scientifically to own and regard. If the Bible be the Word of God, as it claims to be, the historical system of interpretation itself requires that the fact should be practically allowed in the exposition of its contents. Not to allow it, must be considered a prejudice of the very worst sort, which cannot fail to wrest the exposition continually into conformity with its own standpoint. What the case calls for, as Billroth tells us in his Commentary on the Epistles to the Corinthians, "is not that the exegete have no views, no system, but that his views, and his system, be not subjective simply, but objectively true and right; not that he take no side, but that he take only and alone the side of truth." At the same time, however, the preconceptions on which the theological exegesis proceeds must admit also a scientific justification; it must be shown that the true theological method does not destroy the philological, but serves rather to carry it out to its proper end, and, that what the Bible offers, therefore, as a revelation of supernatural truth, instead of limiting in any way the course of human knowledge, does but help it forward in fact to its proper perfection.

In considering farther the principle of theological interpretation, it becomes necessary to notice the difference which holds between the Catholic and Protestant Churches in the mode of its application and use.

Catholicism takes the position, that the Sacred Scriptures, being for the Church only, can be rightly and truly interpreted also by and through the Church alone; in other words, divine truth, as it has been lodged by inspiration of the Holy Ghost in these writings, can be known and understood, it is maintained, only through the presence of divine truth, as it lives continually in the Church, a presence which is supposed to have place, first in the tradition of the true doctrine handed down from age to age, and then in the power of the Holy Ghost speaking through the divinely appointed leaders of the Church, especially its councils, and consenting orthodox doctors under the supreme authority of the Pope. It is the old rule urged by Vincentius Lir. in his Commonitorium ep., 2, as the only security against lawless and wilful interpretation: "Scripturam sacram pro sua altitudine non uno eodemque sensu universi accipiunt scriptores, sed ejus eloquia aliter alius interpretatur; idcirco necesse est propter tantos tam varii sensus anfractus, ut prophetice et apostolice interpretationis linea secundum ecclesiastici et catholici sensus normam dirigatur." So the Council of Trent, Sessio IV., in the face of Protestantism: "Præterea ad coercenda petulantia ingenia decernit ut nemo, suæ prudentiæ innixus, in rebus fidei et morum ad ædificationem doctrinæ Christianæ pertinentium, sacram scripturam ad suos sensus contorquens contra eam sensum, quem tenuit et tenet sancta mater ecclesia, cujus est judicare de vero sensu et interpretatione sacrarum scripturarum, aut etiam contra unanimem consensum Patrum, ipsam sacram scripturam interpretari audeat."

Protestantism, on the other hand, as it owns no source of divine truth and no rule of faith beyond the Bible, will not allow tradition, of course, to be the norm of its sense, and refuses also to make it dependent on the mere authority of the Church. "Papismus," Luther says in this view, "est merus enthusiasmus." For the like reason, in the same place, art. Smalc., p. 331, the pretension of false spiritualism is rejected, which affects to make the lumen internum, the illumination of the Holy Spirit, the principle of interpretation, without regard to the written Word. Neither can the natural reason of man be held sufficient of itself to explain the Scriptures, for it is declared to be in spiritual things blind and powerless (Form. Conc., p. 579, 822). As God's Word, the Bible cannot be subjected for its exposition to any outward foreign rule; it must interpret itself. So Quenstädt I., 137: "Non aliunde quam ex ipsa sacra scriptura certa et infallibilis potest haberi interpretatio; scriptura enim, vel potius Spiritus Sanctus in scriptura loquens est sui ipsius legitimus interpres." This general Protestant view gathers itself up in the fundamental maxim, that the Scriptures must be interpreted secundum analogiam fidei (an expression resting on Rom. 12: 6, on which comp. Luz, bibl. Herm., p. 78). The conception of the "analogy of faith" includes again, however, different senses. It may be taken more formally, so as to mean that the sense of each particular passage of Scripture must agree with the sense of all other passages referring to the same subject; or more materially, as denoting a certain type of doctrine, made of fundamental articles, according to which all besides is to be explained; or in such a way that the formal and material qualifications may be joined together in the same rule. In any case the rule is held to be simply the sum of the clearest utterances of the Bible itself. It is often spoken of as resting on a purely grammatical and logical operation; but at other times a distinction is made between the claritas externa et interna, and the perspicuitas of the Bible is defined as being not absolute, but conditioned by the use of the right means for understanding it, which include then not simply grammar and logic, but especially the possession also of the Holy Ghost, who is the authentic interpreter of his own Word.

This theological interpretation secundum analogiam fidei, with the assistance of the Holy Ghost, includes the philological, presupposes it as the necessary basis of its own processes. It must be allowed, however, that the older Protestantism failed to do full justice here to the union of the two interests. In the beginning, confessional questions gave all exposition a predominantly theological turn, so that the claims of philology were in some measure overlooked. Then, again, they were made to suffer material embarrassment from the old theory of inspiration; which resolved the whole texture of Scripture so completely into abstract supernatural agency, that no room was left really for the idea of any properly human and natural side in its composition. It became impossible, in this view, to read the Bible in any sort of analogy with other books; interpretation could not be truly either historical or psychological, could not recognize in full any simply human peculiarity whatever. The view taken of the unity of the Bible, moreover, was too mechanical. No proper account was made of its progressive organic character; the form which belongs to it as a scheme of life, in which differences of measure and degree, the various and the manifold in history and doctrine, go to make up at last the full proper conception of the whole. There was a defect also in the old Protestant conception of the "analogy of faith," as related to the sacred text from which it was to be derived; inasmuch as the rule was supposed to be openly at hand on the face of the text itself and capable of being drawn from this therefore at once, with fixed form, and in an immediate way; whereas it needed in truth conditions and experiences going before, in the case of Protestantism itself, to prepare it for thus drawing from the Scriptures what had not been apprehended in the same way previously. The analogia fidei, along with its objective side is the inspired text, supposes in the nature of the case a subjective side also in the religious life and experience of the Church, which as such is relatively movable, and thus capable of progress and improvement. Not considering this Protestantism was led to dogmatize its rule of interpretation; its biblical analogy became dogmatic analogy, the harmony of a system of doctrines, supposed to be of like authority with the Bible; the end of which was, of course, that interpretation became not simply theological, but ecclesiastico-confessional.

Such in general are some of the difficulties of the older Protestant system. The later theology has endeavored to overcome them, by a more profound analysis of the elements and relations with which they are concerned; a process that has been found to bring with it again new difficulties of its own, and whose issues are still far enough from being ultimate and complete. We cannot be expected, moreover, to pursue the subject any farther now in this direction; it would carry us quite beyond the proper bounds of the present article.

Biblical hermeneutics in general regard the Bible as a whole. The Bible is made up, however, of different writings, including no small difference of constitution and character. Hence the necessity of what is called special hermeneutics, embracing the application of the general science to particular books and classes of books. The main distinction, of course, is that which holds between the Old and New Testaments.

The second branch of interpretation, the subject of which is to represent the sense of an author to others, resolves itself naturally into translation, paraphrase, and commentary. Translation is the immediate reproduction of a writing in another language, causing the author as it were himself to speak in this new tongue; this demands truth. As, however, it is a foreign language, and every language has its own peculiar genius, the case requires that the author should be made to speak in it as he would have done if it had been his own; this demands freedom of translation, which must be joined with the other quality of truth. What is needed is not just a daguerreotype of original text, but an artistic copy. The translation of the Bible has its special difficulties, which lie not simply in the depth and grandeur of its matter, but in the fact that its original language is instinct with the Spirit of God; without the transfusion of which into the new tongue, we can have no version properly of the sacred text. In this view we may say, that true translations of the Bible are not simply to be made, however much of laborious and faithful work they presuppose; they must also make themselves, especially if they are for common use, under the powerful impulse of religious feeling. The paraphrase does not simply translate the text, but seeks to make the meaning of it more clear by filling it out with explanatory words and clauses. Erasmus, himself a model in such exposition, describes it simply so: hiantia committere, abrupta mollire, involuta evolvere — sic libenter dicere ut non dicas alia. The use of it is precarious, as being easily liable always to run into tautology or a watery dilution of the text. In the commentary (beginning rudely in the imperfect form of scholia and glosses), the interpreter speaks, not in the name of his author, but in his own person, unfolding the sense of the text in hand with methodical explanation.

It remains to notice now briefly the history of interpretation and its theories. Compare, for the earlier period, Rosenmüller, Hist. interp.

lib. sacror. in ecclesia chr., 1795–1812; for the time since the Reformation, Meyer, Gesch. d. Bibelerklärung seit d. Wiederherstellung d. Wissenschaften, 1802, 5 vols.; also the fine survey of the whole subject by Reuss, in his Gesch. d. heil. Schr. d. Neuen Testaments, 2d ed., 1853.

In the case of the Old Testament, interpretation may be said to have begun first with the Jews in Palestine after their return from the captivity; when their changed circumstances made it necessary to call in such help, for the purpose of placing themselves in right understanding with their own Scriptures. Among the Alexandrian Jews, the desire of reconciling the Old Test. religion with Grecian culture, accompanied with some spirit of philosophical speculation, promoted especially the allegorical method of interpretation; although it is still a question, whether this was derived at first from Palestine, or rose originally in Alexandria itself under Grecian influences.

There is a difficulty, it is well known, in regard to the interpretation of Old Test. passages in the New Testament. To get over it, some, in our time, have taken the broad ground, that Christ and his Apostles, as true children of their own age, interpreted the Old Test. in the full spirit of the Rabbinical Jewish exegesis. But no such assumption can stand. It is easy to see that there is a specific difference between the two modes of handling Scripture, both in matter and form. Christ and his Apostles quote the Old Test. always in the service of truth only—their exposition moves always within the orbit of the Christian doctrine, and is in keeping with the spirit of the Old Testament as we find it fulfilled in the New; with all the freedom in the use of particular texts, they show themselves far removed at the same time from the general wilfulness and perverseness of the Jewish method. To understand the way in which the Old Test. is quoted and applied in the New Test. it must be borne in mind that Christianity, while it appeared originally as a new creation, carrying in itself first in the form of religious life what was to be afterwards developed into full scientific knowledge, grew forth at the same time historically from the old Jewish economy, in the bosom of which it had its heavenly birth. Christ was, in this view, the personal living truth, in which the universal sense of the Old Test. centered and became complete. It was not for him, in this relation, to speak as the outward expositor merely of the sacred text. Interpretation with him became necessarily application, an unfolding of the spirit rather than of the letter. With the Apostles the case is of course not just the same; they were not themselves the central truth of religion; still they stood so near to this centre, in the person of their Master, that their consciousness might be said to take in also some part of its force and power. Their standpoint, too, is in its measure, that of immediate spiritual discernment, doing away with the distinction between interpretation and application; they are the Old Test. pneumatically, and in doing so allow themselves at times to deal with the mere letter of it in a very free way.—(Comp. Bleek, on the dogmatic use of Old Testament passages in the New Testament, Stud. u. Krit., 1835; Tholuck, the Old Test. in the New, 1849.

In the Christian Church the history of interpretation runs parallel, in the nature of the case, with the course of dogmatic theology. Down to the time of the Reformation, the philological interest was made to suffer in favor of the theological; and altogether, being bound by the authority of the Church and its traditions, interpretation was never able to rise to any independent and truly scientific character. In the first ages, its elements show themselves in general confused and chaotic. Before the formation of the New Test. canon, it occupied itself exclusively, of course, with the Old Test., and seeking to make this the immediate witness of Christian truth, it became not only dogmatical, but prevailingly allegorical also (Barnabas, Epistles of Clement); to such an extent, that the power of understanding Scripture is made by Justin to stand especially in the gift of allegorical interpretation. The first interpretation of the New Test., also, as it proceeded from the Gnostics, was in a style of allegory that left the grammatico-historical sense completely out of sight. Against this heretical arbitrariness the judgment prevailed, that the Scriptures must be explained according to the living tradition of the true Christian doctrine in the Church itself (Irenæus; Tertullian, de præscript. adv. hæc.). But this did not overthrow the use of allegory; it only held it to a certain general rule. Origen, as all know, made it the soul of his entire method of interpretation; and his authority served to canonize it in the Church generally. As the doctrinal system defined itself more and more, biblical exegesis took still more decidedly the ecclesiastico-allegorical form. So we have it in Augustine, who, with all his judicious observations on the subject of grammatical interpretation, turns hermeneutics continually more or less into the passive instrument of his own theology (cf. Clausen, Augustinus Hipp. SS. interpre. Havn., 1837). An opposite interest in the West appears among the Pelagians; with whom, however, the anti-ecclesiastical tendency took an openly rationalistic character. Also, in the East, in what Gieseler calls the Syrian historico-exegetical school, known commonly as the school of Antioch; although here, too, the "demissa et humilis interpretatio," so common to the simply rational method, became, not without cause, an occasion for reproach. Its representatives are, Diodorus, of Tarsus; Theodore, of Mopsuestia; and others. Something of the same sober spirit shows itself in Chrysostom; with whom stand connected Theodoret and the Syrians, particularly Ephraem Syrus. Toward the close of this period, a conspicuous place belongs to Gregory the Great, who adopted the Origenistic threefold sense, and acquired an authority as a model of mystical interpretation, which extended itself afterwards far into the middle ages. For centuries afterwards, biblical exegesis, like theology in general, had no independent character, but became almost entirely a business of collection and compilation from older sources. Here may be mentioned Walafrid Strabo († 849), in the Western Church; Oecumenius, of the 10th cent. and Theophylact, and Euthymius Zigabenus, of the 12th cent., in the Greek Church; also the so-called catenæ, chains of different exegetical views put together in the convents, which, with no original merit of their own, are still of some worth as collections, in which much is preserved that might otherwise have been lost. The age of the Schoolmen was too much bound by tradition and authority, and too destitute at the same time of all necessary hermeneutical resources, to add anything very important to the cause of biblical interpretation. The expositions of Thomas Aquinas are mainly matter of compilation. The most respectable products of the period are the postillæ or brief annotations of Nicolas Lyra († 1340). With the revival of learning in the 15th century, a better period begins; and the opening of a new era in the interpretation of the Scriptures is proclaimed in the efforts of Laurentius Valla, Faber Staplensis, and especially Erasmus of Rotterdam.

This new era was inaugurated in full by the Reformation. All the Reformers took an active part in the exposition of the Scriptures. Luther is more dogmatic than philological. Calvin stands unsurpassed in his power of unfolding the sense from its connections, as well as in the general freedom and independence of his exegesis. The main work on the theory of interpretation, in this century, was the Clavis Script. Sacræ (1567) by Matthias Flaccius—a work of very considerable merit, which was not free, however, from the imperfections of its age. Next comes the period of Protestant scholasticism; when interpretation took again a dogmatic, more particularly a polemico-dogmatic, character and tone, ruled by the Established Church theology. This, with a too mechanical view of inspiration, led to a full disregard of the organic, historical constitution of the Bible, in which no proper account was made of the difference between the Old Testament and the New, or of the relation generally between the form of Scripture and its contents. We may refer to the Biblia illustrata of the very learned Abraham Calovius, as an able example of this style. To the same period, in the Reformed Church, belongs the Coccian tendency (see Art. Coccius). It found Christ everywhere in the Old Test., as well as in the New. Among the Arminians, on the contrary, just the opposite tendency prevailed; they had no sense for anything deeper than the historical, antiquarian outside of the Old Test.; and their exegesis generally assumed a cold, shallow, more and more rationalistic character; which had little to distinguish it in the end from the naked poverty of Socinianism itself.

With the rise of Pietism, toward the close of the 17th cent., a reactionary movement appeared over against the stiffness of the reigning Church system, which by laying all stress on the study of the Bible, seemed to promise well for the interest of biblical exegesis. The moderation of Spener, however, and the earlier Pietists was soon forgotten; and having no power of theological thought to give it force, the use of the Scriptures degenerated with the whole school into an arbitrary, typical method, which aimed be edifying, but was too often, in fact, insipid and flat.

Other causes wrought, about the beginning of the 18th century, to unsettle the authority of the dogmatic system, which had previously controlled so generally the interpretation of the Bible; among them, the increase of helps and materials for the proper use of philology, better knowledge of the Hebrew language and of the Greek idiom of the New Test., fuller acquaintance with archæology and history in general, also the freedom of thinking introduced by the course of philosophy in Germany and England. The result was what may be termed an exegetical revolution of the most momentous kind. The transition to it is represented by Ernesti, in his Institutio interpretis N. T., 1761; where the hermeneutical principle is laid down, that the sense of the inspired writings must be sought and found, just as it sought and found in merely human books (cf. Art. Ernesti). The revolution itself, however, begins properly with the name of J. S. Semler. According to him, the Bible must be interpreted historically only — that is, the writers must be understood in the sense of the thinking with which they were surrounded in their time, that of their own Jewish education and custom. What is of permanent doctrinal value as truth must be determined by its adaptation to the purposes of "moral improvement." What may not appear to be of this character in the teachings of Christ and his Apostles, must be regarded as an accommodation merely to the popular prejudices of the age in which they lived, and is to be subjected to a liberal exegesis accordingly. Such became the standpoint of the so-called subjective, empirical Rationalism, with its various modifications; an inconsistent, pedantic system, which may be said to have gone down to the grave finally with its last notable representative, Paulus, judged and condemned by the common reason and good taste of the world, no less than its sense of religion.

It is interesting to observe how, in opposition to this revolutionary tendency, the old supernaturalistic theology, bent on preserving the heritage of the fathers, endeavored to maintain its exegetical ground. It did its best to withstand the wilfulness of the rationalistic method; but while it thus struggled for the forms of the traditional faith, the proper matter of this faith, it became too plain, was allowed to glide more and more out of its hands. What it defended, became in fact a poor shadow only of the old system; and the so-called grammatico-historical interpretation with which it operated for this purpose, in the Storr and Flatt style, ran into a form as arbitrary almost and artificial as the exegesis employed on the other side.

In the midst of this unsatisfactory course of things the way was opened for a new spirit, bringing with it the conditions of an advance in hermeneutics — an improved spirit both in science and religion. Science in general, quickened by the philosophical ideas of the 19th cent., became more full and deep. Religion, at the same time, grew to be more seriously thoughtful and earnest. Various outward and inward causes wrought together to produce this result, and the change has revealed itself under different aspects and phases of Christian belief; but the effect of it all round has been the common conviction, that the interpretation of the Scriptures, while it should be, in the first place, truly philological to the full extent of the scientific resources of the age, must become again theological also, dealing with the Bible as a divine revelation for the Church. This brings us to the exegetical systems and schools of our own time, in which the general principle now stated is found to be carried out practically in different ways.

The most strictly theological scheme prevails, of course, where the Church doctrine, if not always confessedly, yet in fact, forms the material canon for interpretation, so that it is made to assume in the whole an openly dogmatic character. So with Hengstenberg, Hüvernick, Harless, Steiger, &c. The construction of the historical and doctrinal sense of the Old Test., regarded in its relations to the idea of a gradually progressive revelation, may be said to come here too little to its proper rights. Another way of explaining the Old Test., under what we may call the biblico-theological view, in which regard is had to the historical movement of the sacred oracles, as well as to their inward life and soul, is exhibited to us in Delitzsch, Hoffmann, Baumgarten, Beck, Tholuck, with various not inconsiderable modifications. Others again in the same general direction, as Olshausen and Stier, lay more stress on the interior, deeper sense of the Scripture, as that through which the right unison of the Old and New Testaments, the proper idea of inspiration, and the true import of the divine Word, are first brought out with full effect.

Another order of thinking is presented in the theological movement, which has grown forth from the influence of Schleiermacher. He gave a new impulse first to the development of dogmatic theology, by referring religion to feeling and experience as its source; and thus modified the interpretation of the Scriptures also, by giving it a psychological turn, and urging the distinction between religious life and religious doctrine. Owing to his own wrong theological standpoint, however, his exegesis resolved itself into a sort of logical subtlety. His strong subjectivity, joined with his dialectic understanding, impaired in him, personally, the genuine historical feeling which he himself so much insists upon as a hermeneutical necessity. But what most of all unfitted him to be a sound exegete, was his almost idiosyncratic aversion toward the Old Testament, which he did not, and one might say even, would not understand. His posture was of too individual a character for any full discipleship, wide as the school is which stands loosely connected with his name. The most distinguished representatives of his general standpoint, exegetically considered, are Lücke and Neander. Altogether, service rendered by this tendency to the cause of biblical interpretation, must be regarded as holding principally in what it has done, or is doing still, for biblical theology, and the construction of doctrines, especially those which tell strongly on the sense of the Scriptures, such as revelation, inspiration, and the constitution of Christ's person.

The speculative tendency, led off by the notorious Strauss, and ending in the destructive processes of the new Tübingen school—more critical, however, than exegetical—needs to be noticed only as a movement which has run its course.

The Romish Church, since the Reformation, has had its exegetical literature too, more or less full and worthy of consideration; which, however, we cannot pretend to notice more particularly in the present article.

LANDERER. — Nevin.

Hermes and Hermesianism.—George Hermes, born April 22, 1775, in Dreyerwalde, Westphalia, after studying philosophy and theology at Münster, became, 1798, teacher at St. Paul's Gymnasium, in 1799 was consecrated a priest, and from 1807 lectured upon theology there. His favorite study was philosophy, but in the interest of religion and Christianity. His system was based upon the principles of Kant. This is manifest in his "Philosophische Einleitung," to theology, first published in 1819, 2d edition, 1831. He was appointed the Roman Catholic prof. of theol. at the Frederick William University of Bonn, and remained there, in the enjoyment of the love and respect of the students, until his death in 1831. One of his oldest and most worthy pupils published his "Christkathol. Dogmatik," in 1834, in three parts. — His system occasioned the bitter Hermesianistic controversy in the Rom. Catholic Church of Germany, and found so many adherents, that Church authority interposed to suppress a philosophy which stood in such strong conflict with the Romish faith. A papal breve, condemning the writings of H. was issued Sept. 26, 1835; and as the controversy continued to rage, especially through Braun's and Achterfeld's (professors at Bonn) persistent defence of Hermesianism, Pius IX. issued another letter to the Archb. of Cologne, confirming the judgment of Greg. XVI. — (See ESSER, Hermes Leben u. Lehre. Köln, 1832. Acta Hermesiana by ELVENICH, 1837, and Acta Romana by ELVENICH and BRAUN: Hanover, 1838. The letter of Pius IX. is published in the Kathol. Vierteljahrsschr.: Bonn, 1847, IV., Heft. STUPP, Pius IX. u. d. kath. Kirche in Deutschland, 1848). K. SUDHOFF.*

Hermias, Ἑρμίας, a name which occurs in Greek literature, both profane and Christian (see FABRIC. bibl. gr., VII., p. 114, ed. Harless). A so-called philosopher Hermias is mentioned as the author of: διασυρμὸς τῶν ἐξω φιλοσόφων, an apologetico-polemic treatise, in which heathen philosophies are ridiculed. The work is destitute of all philosophical and theological merit. As neither the book nor the author are referred to by any ancient writer, we are left to conjecture the age of both. It is very probably an invention of the 5th or 6th cent.—(Edit.: ed. princ., with a Latin transl., 1553, 1560; in many ed. of M. JUSTIN, 1615, 36, 86, 1742, c. not. Marani, and of TATIAN, by Worth, Oxford, 1700, in the Auctuar. bibl. Patr.: Paris, 1624; alone, by DOMMERICH: Halle, 1764; in German by THIE-NEMANN: Lpz., 1828; latest ed. by W. F. MENZEL: Leyden, 1840, 8vo.—See CAVE, Scr. eccl.,

I. 81. DUPIN, Nouv. bibl., I., 65. FABRIC. I. 1. NEANDER, Ch. Hist. BÄHR in Pauly's R. Encl. d. klass. Altenth., III., 1215).

WAGENHAFF.*

Hermogenes, an African errorist against whom Tertullian directed his adv. Hermog., which furnishes the main authority for H.'s views. Other accounts are obscure and contradictory. He was living when Tertull. wrote against him (c. 1, "ad hodiernum homo in seculo"); and in De Præscr. Hæret. Tertullian mentions him as still alive, c. 206, 207 (cf. UPHORN, Fundam. Chronol. Tertull.). He was doubtless an African, probably lived in Carthage, hence Tertullian's personal knowledge of him (cf. AUGUST., de hær., c. 41). The reproaches of Tertullian (c. 1: "Pingit illic nubit assidue, legem Dei in libidinem decessu in artem contemnit;" so c. 45, i. f.) doubtless sprang in part from Montanistic asceticism, still H. probably led a rather free life, as we may infer from his occupation (a painter, cf. 1, 33, &c.) and his philosophical pursuits and errors. He does not seem to have had a system, but sought simply to complete that of the Church by adding some speculative ideas of Aristotle's philosophy to it, believing that this could be done without violence to the doctrines of the Church (RITTER, Gesch. d. Philos., V., 178, &c.). He cannot, therefore, be reckoned among the Gnostics, but only among the gnosticising teachers of that period. His chief doctrine was the eternity of matter (TERT., adv. Hermog., c. 1, "nolens Deum ex nihilo universa fecisse"). He assumes that God must have made everything either out of himself, out of nothing, or out of existing eternal matter. The first he declares impossible, because God is unchangeable ("Negat illum ex semet ipso facere potuisse, qui partes ipsius fuissent, quæcunque ex semet ipso fecisset dominus; porro in partes non decessit ut indivisibilem et indemutabilem et eundem semper qua dominus." The second he rejects because God would then, ex arbitrio et voluntate, be the author of evil. We are, therefore, constrained to assume the eternity of matter, in which evil must be inherent. This eternal matter, proof of whose existence he finds in Gen. 1, is without any qualities, c. 35, neque corporalem, neque incorporalem, c. 37, neither good nor bad. Still, there is something corporeal in it out of which bodies are formed, and something soul-like, an irregular motion, out of which souls are formed. In this unregulated agitation (like that of a seething pot, c. 41) H. perceives the possibility of its organization, because by this it is related to God, who is regulated activity. This formation of matter was not effected by God's penetrating it, but simply by the magnetic attraction of his approximation to it (c. 44). At this point H. places the origin of evil; c. 38, "nec tota materia fabricatur, sed partes ejus." It is only superficially effected by the divine agency, and in each particle of matter contains the quality of the whole (c. 39), there remains in all something of the reigning disorder out of which, probably, H. supposed evil to spring. Intimately connected with this is H.'s view of the soul as of material, not divine, origin (TERTULL., de mima, 11), and of the mortality of the soul, unless the Spirit impart immortality to it. More than this we cannot gather from Tertullian.—I. appears to have propagated his views by writing as well as orally (adv. H., c. 1). He had doubtless disciples, but founded no sect.—Statements concerning him are found in other Church Fathers, which can hardly be reconciled with those of Tertullian. In the excerptis Theodoti in Clem. Alex., it is said H. referred Ps. 19 : 5 — “In them hath he set a tabernacle for the sun,” to Christ; that Christ had laid down his body in the sun (ἐν τοῖς μὲν οὐρανοῖς, τὸ σῶμα τοῦ κυρίου ἐν τῷ ἡλίῳ αὐτὸν ἀποτίθεσθαι, ὡς Ερμολένης). So THEODORET, hær. fabb. Comp. I., 19, who evidently refers to this same Hermog. Christological errors are ascribed to H. by Philastrius and Augustine, also, who reckon him among the Patripassians (PHIL., de hær., c. 44; AUGUST., de hær., c. 41). Theod., l. c., says Origen and Theophilus of Antioch also wrote against H. (cf. EUSEB., H. E., IV., 24). To reconcile these statements with Tertullian's account of H.'s orthodoxy in Christology, MOSHEIM, Comm. de rebus Christ. ante Const. M.; WALCH, Ketzerhist., I., 580, and others have assumed a second H. But this view is unlikely (see TILLEMONT, Mémoires pour servir, etc., III., 65; BÜHMER, Hermog. Afric. Sundia, 1832, p. 104, sqq.), as Theodoret distinctly identifies him. Possibly H. may have developed his system in a more anti-Christological form. G. UHLHORN.*

Hermon (=a projecting summit), the name given by the Israelites to the main crest of Anti-Lebanon, Jebel esh-Shiorki. This chain separated, by the valley of Bikeah from Lebanon, and lying between Bikeah and the plain of Damascus, is divided, about the latitude of Damascus, and above Râsheiya, into two ridges; the eastern, and higher, stretching southwest in the same direction with the general range, is the proper extension of Anti-Lebanon, and is now called Jebel esh-Sheikh, which gradually declines south of Râsheiya towards W.S.W., and terminates in the plain near Bâniâs; a south-eastern branch, the Jebel Heish, stretches over the northern extremity of the Sea of Tiberias. But this latter, lower ridge, is not the Hermon of the ancients (as WINKER supposes, according to Seetzen and Burkhardt), but the entire chain of the Sheikh mountains, of which Jebel Heish is only a continuation, though it is the central ridge, containing the loftiest summit. Hence the plural form in Ps. 42 : 6, and the different names applied to this chain accordingly as one or another portion was meant (Deut. 3 : 9; 4 : 48; 1 Chron. 5 : 23; Josh. 11 : 3, 17; 13 : 5, &c.). From the main crest the summits are visible at a certain distance (WILSON, the Lands of the Bible, II., 161), covered with perpetual snow, and hence called in Arabic (Abulfeda, tab. Syr., p. 18, 163 sq.), and in Chaldaic (Targg. ad., Deut. 3 : 9; Cant. 1 : 8) Snow mountain (Jebel el-Thaldj; tur alga), whence the Tyrians (Hieron. Onom. of Hermon) obtained snow. These summits have never yet been accurately measured; Russieger (Reiser III., 130), estimated, from Tabor, Hermon's height to be 9500 feet. Its lower peaks were covered with cypress (Ezek. 27 : 5). The Bible reckons Hermon in general with Lebanon, and calls it the extreme northern limit of the land of Israel east of the Jordan (Josh. 12 : 1; Deut. 3 : 8, &c.). Ancient tradition unnecessarily inferred, from Ps. 89 : 12; 42 : 6; 133 : 3, that there must have been a second Hermon, near Tabor, where Jebel ed-Duhy is still pointed out as “little Hermon” (Robinson II., 326). The “dew of Hermon that descended upon the mountains of Zion,” Ps. 133 : 3, has been well explained by Olshausen: “the refreshing dew upon Zion is traced by the poet to the influence of the cool, lofty mountains in the north of the land.”—(See HERDER, Geist d. ebr. Poesie, II., 9; Werke zur Theol. III., 186 of the pocket ed.—RELAND, Palæst. 323, 610, 920.—HOFFMANN in the Hall. Allg. Encykl. II., Th. 6, 361.—ROBINSON, Palæst. II., 337, 354, &c.; III., 48, 58, 376, &c.—LENGERKE, Kanaan I., 30; RITTER's Erdk. XV., I, p. 156, 178, 406). RÜETSCHL.*

Herod, Ἡρώδης (see Simon. Onomast. N. T., p. 69), the name of several Jewish Kings of Idumean descent, who succeeded the Asmonean dynasty. The first of these, usually called “the great,” to distinguish him from his successor of that name, was the son of Antipater (Antipater), a wealthy, influential Idumean, whom flattery to Herod represented as a descendant of the first Jews who returned from Babylon (Jos. Antt. XIV., 1, 3), whilst others traced his descent to some Philistine captives brought to Judea (JUCHASIN, fol. 139, 6; EUSEB. II. E., I., 7; EPIPH. hær., X. 1; Cf. EWALD, Gesch. d. Volkes Isr., IV., 448). Antipater, a friend of Hyrcanus II., managed to gain such favor with Cæsar, that he was appointed procurator (ἐπίτροπος, Antt. XIV., 8, 5; B. J., I., 10, 3) along with Hyrcanus (47 B. C.), and as such exercised the supreme authority, while that of Hyrcanus was only nominal. In this capacity he appointed his elder son, Phasælus, Governor (σπαρτηγός) of Jerusalem; the younger Herod, 25 years old (not 15; see Havercamp on Jos. Antt., XIV. 9, 2; B. J., I., 10, 4; and the Dindorf ed. of Jos.), ruler of Galilee. There the younger Herod energetically strove to extirpate the robbers who infested the country; that is, such Jews as resisted the rule of the Romans and Antipater, and, forming themselves into bands, made war on their own responsibility, and practised all manner of robberies and oppressions. One of their leaders, Hezekiah, with his entire band, was taken and executed. And as security was thus restored in the country, Herod won the regard of the people, as well as the friendship of Sextus Cæsar, a relative of the great Cæsar, and then Governor of Syria. Envy, and dread of the ambition, arbitrariness, and growing power of Antipater and his sons, led to accusations against Herod for the execution of a Jew without trial or justice. He was summoned before the Sanhedrim, but presented himself in such regal state, and attended by so many armed followers, that none ventured to open the prosecution, until Samens, an aged member, rose and complained that Herod presented himself not as a defendant, but as one who defied the authority of the Sanhedrim; then he added that Hyrcanus and the court had reason to accuse themselves, for allowing Herod to acquire power which he would one day use to their destruction (Antt. XIV., 9, 4; XV., 1, 1). Hyrcanus postponed the decision, and, by his advice, Herod escaped the sentence by fleeing to Damascus. There he bought from Sextus Cæsar the governorship of Cœlosyria and Samaria, and then to avenge himself upon the Jews; approached Jerusalem with an army, but was persuaded to withdraw by his father and brother. Cæsar's assassination (March 15th, 44 B. C.) caused great excitement and confusion throughout the empire; in Palestine, also, parties arose. Cassius entered Judea, and demanded 700 talents in tribute, which Antipater tried speedily to collect. Herod paid his portion, 100 talents, to Cassius first, and thus gained his favor. In the war of Antony and Octavius against Cæsar's murderers, Cassius and Marcus (or Marcus), who had succeeded the murdered Sextus Cæsar, as Governor of Syria, gathered an army, in forming which Herod was most active, for which they made him procurator of all Syria (B. J. I., 11, 4; but cf. Antt. XIV., 11, 4), and promised, on the successful termination of the war, to make him King of Judea. At this time the Arabian King, Malichos (Mâlik), poisoned Antipater, for which Herod induced Cassius to have him murdered by some Roman soldiers. After Cassius withdrew from Syria, an insurrection in Jerusalem, headed by one Helix ("Ἑλξ, or "Ελξ; Josephus always writes Felix, Φίλιξ), was soon quelled by Phasaelus. Herod also speedily took the border fortresses which had been seized by the brother of Malichos, including Masada; drove Marion, whom Cassius had placed over Tyre, from Galilee; and when Marion aided Antigonus, the Asmonean, in his pretensions to the crown of Judea, Herod overcame them on the confines of Judea, put Antigonus to flight, and was received into Jerusalem with honors. By betrothing Mariamne, daughter of Antigonus' brother Alexander, and granddaughter of Hyrcanus by his daughter Alexandra, he won many disaffected Jews, but still, like Phasaelus, had zealous enemies, who hated them as foreign rulers. When, therefore, Antony, after conquering Brutus and Cassius, came to Asia, some Jewish rulers presented themselves before him with complaints against both brothers, for injustice and violence. But Herod also appeared, and by making large presents to Antony, frustrated the attempts of his accusers. A subsequent appeal proved equally fruitless. Antony even appointed the brothers tetrarchs, and invested them with the government of all Judea. A third embassy of 1000 persons, sent to Tyre, was nearly hewn to pieces by Roman soldiers. Two years later, the Parthians, led by Barzapharnes, and Pacoras, their king's son, seized upon Syria, and Lysanias, son of Ptolemy of Chalcis, secured their aid in a scheme for the restoration of Antigonus. They overran Judea, took Phasaelus and Hyrcanus captive, and besieged Jerusalem, which, after Herod had fled with his family to Masada, they plundered. Antigonus was enthroned; Hyrcanus, with his ears cut off, to disqualify him for the priesthood, was sent to Parthia; and Phasaelus killed himself. Herod first turned for aid to Malichus, the Arabian king, and, failing in this, went to Egypt, where Cleopatra, who hoped to find in him a good commander for her army, received him most favorably. Thence he went to Rome, to lay his troubles before Antony and Octavius. Both took his part, and induced the Senate to declare Antigonus an enemy of Rome, but Herod King of Judea (40 B. C.)—to the enjoyment of which dignity, however, he did not attain until 37 B. C. Having returned to Palestine, he quickly collected a large army, marched to the relief of Masada, and compelled Antigonus to raise the siege of it. He then besieged Jerusalem, but the Roman General, Silo, having been bribed by Antigonus, Herod could only take Jericho. The Roman army was wintered in cities of Idumea, Galilee, and Samaria, which had joined Herod. Towards the close of winter he went to Galilee, destroyed the adherents of Antigonus, and thence went to Antony at Samosata, and efficiently aided him by his bravery in reducing that city. Meanwhile the party of Antigonus excited new troubles in Judea and Galilee, in which Josephus, Herod's brother, was slain. Herod hastened back, and assisted by the Roman General, Sosius, whom Antony had appointed Governor of Syria, and so completely routed his foes, that but for the severity of the winter he would at once have fallen upon Jerusalem. The winter abating, Herod forthwith began a siege of the city. During the preparations for this he went to Samaria and married Mariamne. The besieged resisted for five months, through the summer of 37; finally it was taken on the anniversary of its entry by Pompey (64 B. C., Antt. XIV., 16, 4), with great carnage, the Roman soldiers having been infuriated by the delay. Herod rewarded the soldiers out of his private treasury to keep them from plundering the city. Antigonus surrendered himself to Sosius, who delivered him to Antony in Antioch, where, at Herod's solicitation, he was beheaded (Jos. Ant. XV., 1, 2; PLUTARCH, Anton., 36; DIO CASS., XLIX., 22). When the war broke out between Antony and Octavius (31 B. C.), Herod prepared to aid the former; but Cleopatra contrived to have him charged by Antony with the conquest of the Arabian King, Malichus. At first Herod was victorious, but being betrayed by Athenion, a General of Cleopatra, he was beaten and lost many men. He avenged himself for this defeat by invading their country, and totally subjugating them. Antony was defeated (in Sept., 31 B. C.) at Actium. To secure the victor's favor, Herod went to Octavius at Rhodes, confessed he had aided Antony, but promised, as Antony had abandoned himself to his passion for Cleopatra, to transfer his friendship to Octavius. By this seeming candor he gained his point, so that Octavius not only confirmed his royal authority, but considerably enlarged his borders, and gave him the life-guards of Cleopatra as his own body-guards (Antt., XV., 7, 3; B. J., I., 20, 3; DIO CASS., LIV., 9). This favor of the Emperor, which soon grew into personal friendship (the saying, melius est Herodis porcum esse quam filium, MACROB., Saturn. II, 2, does not necessarily imply disparagement), continued. Subsequently he appointed Herod Governor of all lyria, to whom all other governors of the country were subordinate, and added Trachonitis, Batanea, and Auranitis. Herod's brother, Pheroras, was made a tetrarch.

In his government, Herod displayed full devotion to his Roman patrons, prodigal liberality towards his friends, and fearful cruelty to his enemies (Antt. XV., 10, 4), and a love of splendor, indulged especially in the erection of magnificent buildings. — He restored Solomon's temple in great grandeur (Jos., B. J., V., 5). He rebuilt the citadel Baris on the north of the temple, and called it Antonio, and erected a palace for himself more magnificent than the temple. He surrounded Samaria with a beautiful wall, placed 6000 colonists there, built a large temple in its midst in honor of the Emperor, and changed its name to Sebaste (Augusta). Indeed there was hardly a place in the kingdom where he did not erect some memorial to the Emperor (Antt., XIII., 9, 1; B. J., I., 2, 7; 20, 1; 21, 4). Straton's tower, then dilapidated, he rebuilt with white stone, adorned with splendid palaces, furnished with an artificial port, and called Cæsarea. Anthedon, on the seacoast, he raised from its ruins, and called it Agrippæon. In honor of his father he founded a city on the plain of Sharon, and called it Antipatris. To his mother, Cypron, he dedicated the newly-fortified and beautiful citadel in Jericho, and called it Cypros; and, in honor of his brother and wife, called one of the splendid towers of his citadel in Jerusalem Phasaelus, another Mariamne, and northward from Jericho he founded a city Phasaelis. A fortress built on the mountain towards Arabia, and the splendid edifice built on an elevated hill (Frankenberg), Ostadia south of Jerusalem, he called Herodion. But in all this love of architecture may also be discovered great precautions against any future insurrections (Antt. XV., 8, 5). And yet he displayed similar munificence in the decoration of foreign cities — Askalon, Damascus, Tripolis, Berytus, Tyre, Sidon, Laodicea, Antioch, Pergamus, &c. The burnt-down Pythian temple on Rhodes he rebuilt at his own expense, and furnished money for the revival of the Olympic games (Antt. XVI., 5; B. J., I., 21). Of course the means for such munificent operations were raised by oppressive taxations (although he suspended these in seasons of public calamity, and otherwise relieved the distressed people), which occasioned insurrections, but these were soon quelled. In an extremity he took the golden and silver vessels from David's tomb (Antt. XVI. 7, 1). — All this public magnificence, however, was attended with great domestic troubles. Lending a suspicious ear to the complaints which the members of his family brought against each other, he became so furious that he resembled a tiger more than a man. Herod's wives and children were: 1) Doris, son Antipater; 2) Mariamne, the Asmonean, sons Aristobulus, Alexander Herod (died in Rome), daughters Cypros, Salamsio; 3) Mariamne, daughter of the High-priest Simon, son Herod Philip; 4) Malthake, a Samaritan, sons Herod Antipas, Archelaus, daughter Olympias; 5) Cleopatra of Jerusalem, sons Philip, tetrarch, Herod; 6) Pallas, son Phasaelus; 7) Phædra, daughter Roxane; 8)

Elpis, daughter Salome; 9, 10) two nieces, childless (Antt. XVIII., 5, 4; B. J., I., 28, 1). Herod's sister, Salome, was first married to Costobarus, then to Josephus, her father's brother, last to Alexias, Herod's friend. Now the original cause of his sad domestic history lay not only in the suspicious nature of the king, but in his political position. Knowing well that as a foreigner he exercised arrogated power, and that the hearts of the people hung upon the Asmoneans, his first aim was to exterminate these. Conscious of Hyrcanus' right to the crown, he soon dispatched him, on the charge of a conspiracy (Antt., XV., 6, 1-4). Mariamne's brother, Aristobulus, he had, at her and her mother's (Alexandra) request, made Highpriest in his 17th year; but soon afterwards, when Aristobulus, at the feast of tabernacles, avowed his sympathy for the people, Herod had him drowned in Jericho (Antt. XV., 6, 3, 4). This inflamed Mariamne and Alexandra against Herod. Opposed to them were Herod's mother and sister, who, being despised by the beautiful but haughty Mariamne, retorted with the worst accusations, among them adultery. This took effect on Herod, and thinking the foul charge confirmed by the fact that Mariamne had learned a secret which Herod confided to his brother-in-law, Josephus (that in case Antony should put him to death for the murder of Aristobulus, Josephus should murder Mariamne, and so prevent her becoming another's wife), he had both put to death (Cf. B. J., I., 22, 3, 4, with Antt. XV., 3, 5-9; 5, 7, 1, &c.; the latter may be a correct, fuller statement). The atrocity was followed by a remorse which brought on a dangerous illness. Aristobulus and Alexander inherited their mother's hatred; Herod had them educated in Rome. When they returned, the former married Berenice, Salome's daughter; the latter, Glaphyra, daughter of the Cappadocian King, Archelaus. Thoughtless expressions of their sentiments were reported to Herod, and, to preserve a balance of influence between his sons, he recalled Antipater, with his mother, Doris (whom he had discarded when he married Mariamne), to the court, and in every way promoted him. With Antipater, a monster of wickedness, there entered a proper demon into the family, and began a series of family intrigues which involved nearly all of them in ruin. First of all, Mariamne's sons, after two reconciliations, were, by Herod's orders, put to death in Samaria. In the palace, one after another was tortured and killed (see B. J., I., 24, 8). At last, Antipater, the guilty cause of these horrors, fell by the stroke of Providence. Herod, towards the end of his life, had sent Antipater to Rome, to obtain from Augustus the confirmation of his will, in which Antipater was named his successor. During Antipater's absence Herod discovered that he had laid plots to poison him, through his uncle Pheroras (whom Herod probably poisoned). On his return, therefore, Antipater was seized, condemned, and executed, five days before the death of Herod (in the 37th year of his reign, 750 u. c. On the murder of the children at Bethlehem, see art. Jesus Christ), caused by a painful disease in his bowels and genitals, in which worms bred. He vainly sought relief in the warm baths of Calirhoe, and on his return thence he expired in Jericho in the greatest agonies. To make his death, in which he knew his subjects would rejoice, a season of lamentation, he had the most respected persons from all his cities collected in the amphitheatre in Jericho, surrounded with soldiers, and enjoined his sister, and her husband Alexis, to have them all murdered instantly after his death. Of course the command was disobeyed. His will made his son Archelaus, heir to the throne; Antipas, brother of Archelaus, became tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa; another son, Philip, tetrarch of Gaulonitis, Trachonitis, Batanea, and Panias; to Salome he gave Jamnia, Ashdod, Phasaelia, and a large sum of money; to other relatives, money and annual revenues. To the Emperor and Empress, also, he bequeathed immense sums (to Augustus ten millions, besides his golden and silver vessels and garments of great value). He was buried with great pomp in Herodion.—Herod possessed great physical and intellectual powers, which might have been made a blessing to his subjects, but for his monstrous selfishness, to which must be traced all that was great, as well as all that was hideous in his character; a selfishness which was cruel even to those dearest to him (Antt., XVI., 5, 4).—(Benides JOSEPHUS, see NOLDII, hist. Idumæa s. de vita et gestis Herod. Franeg., 1660, 12mo., (also in Joseph. opp. ed. Havercamp, II., 331, &c.). SERRARI Herodes, in Ugolini Thes., XXIV. DEYLING, observ. sacræ., II., 322, &c. JOST, Gesch. d. Israel, I., 160, &c. Ersch u. Gruber, Encycl. Sect. II., 6, p. 369. EWALD, Gesch. d. Volkes Isr., IV., 459, &c.—On Herod's successors, see Antipas, Archelaus, Agrippa, I. and II.).

ARNOLD.*

Herodians are named with the Pharisees as opponents of Jesus, in Matt. 22 : 16; Mark 3 : 6; 12 : 13. They were probably adherents of Antipas, or the Herodian dynasty, and in league with the Romans, whilst other Jews hated the foreign yoke (so ORIGEN, in Matt. c. 17, III., p. 805. THEOPHYLACT. in Matt., JUSTIN. MART. dial. c. Tryph., p. 272, ed. Paris.). Others thought them a distinct Jewish sect, which regarded Herod (M. or Antipas) as the Messiah (so PHILASTR. de hæc., EPIPHAN. Hæc. XX. TERTULL. de præscr. Append.). not to name later views. But neither Philo nor Josephus name such a sect, and most probably none existed.—(See commentaries on the passages. WOLFF, curæ phil. et critt., I., 311, &c. Biblioth. Hebr., II., 818. OTHO, Lex Rabbin., p. 275. NOLDII, hist. Idum., 206. J. STEUCH, dissert. de Herod. Lund., 1706, 4to. J. FEODER, dissert. de Herod. Ups., 1764, 4to. C. F. SCHMID, epist. de Herod. Lips., 1764, 4to. LEUSCHNER, de secta Herod. Hirschberg, 1751, II., 4to.).

ARNOLD.*

Herodias, daughter of Herod's son Aristobulus, and Berenice (see Herod). At her grandfather's request (Jos., B. J., I., 28, 2), she married his son Herod Philip (see Herod), who, disinherited by his father, lived privately. Their daughter Salome is mentioned in Matt. 14 : 6; Mark 6 : 22. Antipas (see art.) visiting his brother Philip, was seized with a passion for Herodias, who yielded to his advances, preferring the prince to the private citizen. Antipas put away his wife, a daughter of the Arabian King Aretas, and lived incestuously with Herodias, for rebuking which John the Baptist was beheaded. Subsequently she shared her seducer's exile.—(See NOLDII, hist. Idum., 350-1).

ARNOLD.*

Heruli (Eruli, Aeruli), a German tribe which are first seen with the Goths, at the Black Sea, and was most active in all the invasions of the Goths into the eastern provinces of the Roman empire. Subsequently they appear with the Turcilingi and Rugians in Attila's army. After Attila's fall they founded on the Danube a mighty kingdom, to which the Lombards became tributary. Procopius (de bello Goth., II., 11) describes them as a barbarous people. Long after the Lombards and other neighboring German tribes became Christians, the Heruli adhered to their ancient faith, offering human sacrifices to their gods. Under the command of Odoacer, who is once called a Herulian, but oftener a King of the H., they, with the Turcilingi, Scyri, and Rugians, overthrew the Western empire. About 495 the Lombards conquered them. Paulus Diacon. de gest. Longob., reports the tradition, that in their flight after this defeat they were so blinded by the wrath of God, that they mistook green fields for a river, and whilst spreading out their arms to swim, many were put to the sword by the pursuing foe. Some, after seeking a home in Rugiland on the Danube, concluded to settle within the Eastern empire. Anastasius, the Emperor, welcomed them, and assigned them a residence near Illyria. But as they would not cease their plundering, he was compelled to send an army against them. Those who survived this punishment became subject to Roman rule, and greatly assisted in subverting the Ostrogoth dominion in Italy. Under Justinian I., they, with the Ahalgi, Alani, Lazi, and Zani, joined the Romish Church, laid aside their barbarous manners, but also lost their historical prominence. P.*

Hervæus, Natalis Brito, born in Brittany, early entered the Dominican monastery at Morlaix, studied in Paris, and was then employed as a teacher in various provinces of France. From 1307-9 he was regent and professor at Paris, and lectured upon the sentences of Peter Lombard. In 1309 he became Provincial and in 1318 General of the Order. He died 1323 at Narbonne. He was a zealous Thomist, and was esteemed one of the first theologians of his day. But few of his many works were printed: 1) Comm. on the four books of the sentences of P. Lomb. (Venice, 1503; Paris, 1647); 2) A tract, de potestate eccl. et papali (Paris, 1500, 1647).—See Script. Ord. Præd., by Quetif and Echard, I., 533.—Hervæus is also the name of a learned Benedictine monk of Bourg-Dieu, c. 1130, who wrote Comm. on Paul's Epp. and on Isaiah. Cf. Grand Dict. of Moreri ed. Droux: Paris, 1759, T. V.

TH. P.*

Heshbon (= wisdom. LXX., Ἑσέβων; Vulg. Hesebon; Joseph., Euseb. Ἑσέβων), a city beyond the Jordan, on the parallel of its entrance into the Dead Sea, and 20 Rom. miles E. of it, is situated upon a limestone hill commanding the elevated plain, central between the districts watered by the Jabbok and Arnon, above the sources of Wady Heshbon, which empties into the Jordan near its mouth. It belonged originally to the Moabites, from whom it was taken by the Amorites shortly before the Israelitish invasion. Sihon resided there (Numb. 21 : 26, c.; Jer. 48 : 45; Josh. 13 : 10; Deut. 2 : 24) when Moses took it (Numb. 21 : 23). The battle-field was the elevated plain of Medeba, S. of Heshbon. It was then made a Levitical city, and apportioned to Gad (Josh. 21 : 39; 1 Chron. 5 : 81) or Reuben (Numb. 32 : 37); it lay on the borders of both (Josh. 13 : 17, 26), and seems to have been mainly inhabited by Levites, and not to have belonged exclusively to either tribe (Ewald thinks it belonged to each at different times). After the downfall of the kingdom of the ten tribes, the Moabites again got possession of the city (Is. 15 : 4; 16 : 8; Jer. 48 : 2, 4, 45; 49 : 3), after which the Chaldeans overthrew it. Under Alex. Jannæus the Jews again inhabited it (Jos. Antt., XIII., 15, 4), and subsequently it became a Christian See. At the time of Jerome and Eusebius it was called Ἐσβών (but differs from that in Plom. V. 16, 6, who, in 17, 6, calls Heshbon Ἐσβόρρα). The ruins found on the side of the hill occupied by the city still bears its name (ABULFEDA, Ityr., p. 11, names it as the small capital of Belka). The country around, once called Essebonitis (Antt., XII., 4, 11; B. J., II., 18, 1; Plin., 5, 12), now covered with ruins (cf. Is. 5 : 4) was fertile, especially in wheat (Ezek. 7 : 17). The traveller Legh took Heshbon wheat to England, the stems of which measured five feet two inches, with 84 grains in the ear, which was four times heavier than a head of English wheat. The plateau around Heshbon was furnished with wells or pools of clear water, for common use, of which recent travellers found a number hewn in the rocks (Cant. 7 : 4; RBY and MANGLES, Travels in Egypt, &c.: London, 1847). BUCKINGHAM, Travels in Syria, &c., II., 108, found a large cistern a half mile from the S. base of the hill, well built in, like the pools in Jerusalem, which Solomon may have constructed in imitation of those of Heshbon.—(See Seetzen, Reisen, XVIII., 431; BURKHARDT, 365; ROBINSON, I., 551). LEYER.*

Hessen.—Although the Landgrave Philip opposed the Reformation at the Diet of Worms, and even in 1524, yet his mind soon after underwent a change, through the influence mainly of Zwingli's writings, but partly, also, of Melancthon's Epitome. That his sympathies preponderated in favor of the views and order of the Reformed rather than the Lutherans, is so evident from the tenor of his explicit declarations, by letters and orally, that the opposite view needs no refutation (see ZWINGLI, Opp., Schuler and Schulthess ed., VIII., 664. RICHTER, Gesch. der ev. K.-verfass. Corp. Ref., II., 100. HOTTINGER, hist. eccl., VI., 509. FUESLIN, Epist. ref., 1740, p. 71. ROMMEL, Phil., III., 35, 52. HASENKAMP, Hess. K.-G., I., 230). It is true he subscribed the Augustana and not the Tetrapolitana, but this was done for political purposes, and with avowed reluctance, and a protest against Art. X. (J. JONAS, Corp. ref., II., 155). The Catechism of Luther may also have been used in Hessen, but only along with others, and not by authority. The introduction of the Augustana, moreover, was neutralized by the recognition of the Concordia Bucer, and modified by the Liturgy of 1539. And as soon as the variata to the Augsburg Confession were published, Philip declared his full approval of them. If further evidence of his position were needed, the Church Directory of 1566 affords it, by its explicit statement of the Reformed doctrine concerning the person of Christ, and the sacraments. And in Dec., 1576, the theologians of Hessen, in an opinion on the Form. Conc. declare: "Wir sind geblieben und bleiben bei dieser Concordia, so Bucer, a. 36, zwischen den Wittenbergern u. oberländ. Theologen aufgerichtet hat." In 1577 the four Landgraves of Hessen protested both against the Form. Conc. and unaltered Augsburg Confession, Landgrave William pronouncing some passages in it from Luther: "Schrecklich Gerede." Another attempt to introduce the Form. Conc. in 1579 also failed. At the 11th General Synod, 1580, Landgrave William had 21 writings and declarations read against it, hoping to gain Upper Hessen; and though he failed in this, the measure served to keep Lutheranism from his own State. William's son, the Landgrave Moritz, perfected what had thus been introduced by his grandfather and further developed by his father. He made the Church of Hessen expressly and exclusively Reformed. He did this by expunging all ambiguities from previous doctrinal results, and giving them dogmatical definiteness. His improvements may be set forth in three points: 1) All the preachers of the land should rigidly adhere, in regard to the doctrine of the person of Christ, to the old Hessen synodal decrees, exhibit it only in concreto, and not use ubiquitarian phraseology; 2) the prohibition of images to be restored in the decalogue, and all images to be removed from the churches; 3) the custom of breaking bread be restored in the Lord's Supper. These regulations must, to all but mere superficial observers, clearly show that Prince Moritz contemplated doctrinal as well as liturgical results. But his most important and conclusive measure was the convocation of the General Synod of Hessen, in Cassel, 1607, the authoritative framer of the confessional faith of the present Reformed Church of Lower Hessen. That Synod adopted a confession of faith and a catechism, both of equal authority, and forming an integral part of the Synod's official acts (see Consist.-Ordnung of 1610 and 1657, c. 13; Marburger Gutachten, 76–79); and both, likewise, harmonizing throughout with other Reformed confessions, upon all the distinctive doctrines of the Reformed Church. The first consequence of this measure was the introduction of the Heidelberg Catechism into Lower Hessen. It would have been officially introduced in 1607, but for political considerations. It is certain that it was used in the Marburg pedagogium in 1616, in Smalcald before 1627, and in 1655 it was used not only in all the high-schools, but in nearly all the State schools, and an ordinance of Feb. 1, 1726, enjoins all ministers and teachers to adhere to it, as a symbol approved by the Reformed Church. They were to use the Hessen catechism as a primary book, and gradually lead their pupils and people to the Heidelberg Catechism as a higher book. Subsequent acts and ordinances confirm this course. — As the Church of Hessen thus adhered to the general symbol of the Reformed Church, it also maintained fraternal intercourse with the Reformed Churches of other countries, as did these with that of Hessen, students of the different countries promiscuously entering the schools of each. Representatives from Hessen attended the Synod of Dort, 1618, and there proved themselves true to the Reformed faith, and at the Leipsic colloquium, 1630, Hessen took part as a Reformed C. — Indeed the Reformed character of the confessional basis and organization of the Church in Hessen, was not disputed until recently, and more especially by Dr. Vilmar, who, in 1851, became superintendent of Cassel, and forthwith endeavored to carry out strictly Lutheran measures.

Hessen-Darmstadt became, from the first, decidedly Lutheran. In 1609 the Lutheran University of Giessen was established in opposition to the Reformed measures of Landgrave Moritz. In 1624 the Landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt, aided by the predominant Catholic party in Germany, compelled Moritz to give up the half of the Upper principalities of Hessen, Schmalkalden, and some smaller districts belonging to Lower Hessen. The imperial Reichshofrath acknowledged that Moritz had forfeited his possessions by introducing the changes at Marburg. In all these territories Darmstadt abolished everything Reformed, expelled Reformed ministers and teachers, and published a Lutheran confession which reiterated the doctrines of the Form. Conc. in the most decided antagonism to the Conf. of the Cassel Synod of 1607 (see SUDHOFF, Das gute Recht d. ref. Kirche in Kurhessen: Frankf., 1855).

ECCLESIASTICAL STATISTICS.—THE ELECTORATE OF HESSEN.—The present evangelical Church of this State consist: 1) of the Reformed Church of Hessen and the Earldom of Ziegenhain; 2) the Lutheran Church of the province of Marburg, the Earldom of Schaumburg, the dominion of Schmalkalden, and some congregations in Lower Hessen; 3) the United Church of Hanau, where, however, the Reformed and Lutheran confessions are used respectively in the congregations. The ecclesiastical organization of the Hessen Church may be gathered from the following sketch.

A. The Consistory at Cassel comprises the superintendencies of Cassel, Allendorf, and Rinteln, and the inspectorates of Hersfeld and Schmalkalden.—The Suprt. of Cassel; residence Cassel, with 7 Reformed congregations, and 14 Reformed clergymen, and one Luth. congregation and two Luth. clergymen. This suprt. is divided in the classes of Ahna, Borken, Felsberg, Gottsbüren, Gudensb., Hofgeismar, Homberg, Kaufungen, Trendelb., Wilhelmshöhe, Wolfshagen, Zierenberg, with 123 Ref. congregations. In Wenzigerode, Nieste, and Karlshafen there are small Luth. congregations.—The Suprt. of Allendorf embraces the classes of Allendorf, Eschwege, Lichtenau, Melsungen, Rotenburg, Sontra, Spangenberg, Waldkappel, Witzenhau-sen, with 106 Ref. and three Luth. congregations.—In Rinteln, including the classes of Rinteln and Obernkirchen, the Lutherans predominate, though in the city of Rinteln there is a Ref. church with two ministers.—The Inspectorate of Hersfeld is Ref. with 15 congregations.—In Schmalkalden there are two inspectors, a Ref. and Luth., and in Schmalkalden and Steinberg there are congregations of both denominations, excepting that those in Floh, Kleinschmalk, Herrenbreitungen, and Asbach are purely Reformed, and those in Brotterode, Springstille, Fambach, Trusen, and Barchfeld are purely Lutheran.

B. The Consistory at Marburg embraces the province of Upper Hessen, and is divided into a Lutheran and a Reformed diocese, each with its own superintendent.—The Lutheran diocese includes, besides the Luth. congregation in Marburg, the classes of Frankenberg, Fronhausen, Kirchhain, Rauschenberg, and Wetter, with 55 congregations. In Marburg, Frankenb., Cappel, Kirchhain, Rauschenberg, Gemünden, and Wetter there are, also, Ref. congregations.—The Reformed diocese embraces, besides the congregation at Marburg with two ministers, the classes of Neukirchen, Treysa, Ziegenhain, with 27 congregations.

C. The Consistory at Hanau comprehends the suprt. of Hanau and the inspectorate of Fulda. The Suprt. of Hanau embraces, besides the congregation at Hanau, the classes of Bergen, Birstein, Bockenheim, Bücherthal, Gelnhausen, Meerholz, Schlüchtern, Schwarzenfels, Wächtersbach, and Windecken, with 71 congregations, including the French and Dutch Reformed of Hanau, neither of which joined the Union.—The Inspectorate of Fulda has seven congregations, including that in Fulda with two ministers.

The theol. faculty of the State University at Marburg, which was once wholly Reformed, is composed, since the restoration of the Elector William I., of Ref. and Lutherans, and it serves both the evang. Churches of the Electorate.

THE GRAND-DUCHY OF HESSEN was, until 1802, almost exclusively Lutheran; after that several political measures served to increase the Reformed and Rom. Cath. population. The edict of organization for 1832 placed the entire evang. Church of the Duchy under a common eccl. government. The Minister of the Interior and Justice has supreme supervision, and exercises his control through the following Boards: 1) A supreme Consistory; 2) the Superintendents; 3) the District Counsellors; 4) the Deans; 5) the clergy; 6) the congregational officers.—The Union has been only partially introduced, owing to unfavorable rules adopted regarding it (see Prälat KÖHLER's Handbuch II., 363).—The entire Church of the Duchy is divided into three provinces, each with its superintendent; and each province into deaneries.

A. The province of Starkenburg has 16 deaneries: Darmstadt, Babenhausen, Breuberg, Dornheim, Erbach, Grosgerau, Langen, Lindenfels, Michelstadt, Offenbach, Pfungstadt, Reinheim, Rossdorf, Umstadt, Wimpfen, Zwingenberg. The congregations are all Lutheran excepting one Ref. church in Oberklingen, one in Walldorf, one in Mohrbach, one in Hering, one in engfeld, and two in Umstadt, three Union, and one French Ref. church.

B. The province of Upper Hessen with the deaneries Giessen, 10 Luth. congregations; Alsdorf, 15 L. c.; Assenheim, 4 L., 4 Union c.; Biebrich, 12 L. c.; Büdingen, 13 Union c.; Butzbach, 11 L., 1 Ref. c.; Friedberg, 14 L., 1 Union c.; Gedern, 10 L., 6 Union c.; Gladenbach, 12 L. c.; Grossenlinden, 14 L. c.; Grünberg, 10 L. c.; Hungen, 12 Ref., 2 L. c.; Kirtorf, 13 L. c.; Laubach, 14 L., 1 Ref. c.; Lauterbach, 13 L. c.; Lidda, 15 L., 1 Union c.; Rodheim, 6 Union, 2 L., 1 Ref. c.; Schlitz, 5 L. c.; Schotten, 10 L. c.; Ulrichstein, 8 L. c.; Vöhl, 7 L. c.; total, 207 Luth., 31 Union, 15 Ref. congregations.

C. The province of Rhine Hessen with the deaneries Mayence, 1 congregation; Alzey, 12 c.; Oberingelheim, 9 c.; Oppenheim, 14 c.; Rhodfen, 12 c.; Wöllstein, 11 c.; Wörrstadt, 14 c.; Worms, 11 c.—The State University at Gießen, founded as a citadel of Lutheranism, has recently been severely assailed by the Luth. clergy of Darmstadt, on account of Dr. Credner's work, "Philipps d. Grossm. Hess. K.-reform.-Ordnung." K. SUDHOFF.*

Hesshus, Tilemann, born Nov. 3, 1527, at Nieder-Wesol, Cleves, of honorable parentage, was early sent on a tour through France, England, Denmark, Germany, and Austria, after which he went to Wittenberg, joined Melanchthon's convictus, in 1550 became Magister, and obtained permission to lecture on Matthew and Melanchthon's Loci, and preached. In 1552 he was chosen superintendent and first pastor of Goslar, which town, in 1553, furnished him means to procure the D. D. This early promotion, however, awakened in him an arrogant self-importance which made his career one of vicissitudes. He obtained prominent appointments in nine different German territories, but was driven from each after a short stay; from Goslar, May 6, 1556; from Magdeburg in 1557; from Heidelberg in 1559; from Bremen, 1560; again from Magdeburg in 1552; from his native place Wesel, to which he had last fled, in 1564. In May, 1565, he was called to Neuburg, as court-preacher, and enjoyed a season of peace. After the death of his patron, Count Palatine Wolfgang, in 1569, H. accepted a call to Jena as Prof. of Theology. In 1573 John William of Saxony died, and the Elector Augustus expelled H. and his Flaccian colleague, Wigand, from Jena, for their hostility to the theologians of electoral Saxony. Through Chemnitz H. was appointed in the same year, B. of Sameland, at Königsberg, whither he got Wigand as Prof. of Theology. But Wigand's envy of H.'s higher post, prompted him to lay schemes for his fall. He accused H. of teaching a heresy concerning the attributes of the human nature of Christ (its omnipotence, omniscience, &c.), which was condemned by a Synod in Jan., 1577, and as he refused to retract, he was deposed. Driven from Prussia, he was appointed second Prof. of Theology at the new University of Helmstädt, 1578, and in 1579, when his senior colleague Kirchner was expelled, became Prof. prim. There he effected the gradual withdrawal of the University from the Form. Conc. (which he himself had subscribed in 1578) on pretence of certain changes made in it as published, though Chemnitz showed the insignificance of these changes. He died in Helmstädt, Sept. 25, 1588, indefatigable to the last in his struggles for his peculiar views. His writings are partly controversial, in defence of his course in matters which led to his frequent changes of place, or in opposition to moderate Lutheran theologians, partly exegetical and dogmatical—comm. on the Psalms, on Isaiah, and Paul's Epp.; also de justificatione peccatoris coram Deo, 1587, above all Examen theolog., continens præcipuos locos doctr. Christ., 1571, also 1586, 8vo., Helmst.—(See JOH. G. LEVCKFELD'S Biogr., hist. Hessh.: Quedlinb., 1716. CHRYSANDER'S diptycha profess., qui in acad. Julia docuerunt: Helmst., 1748, 4to. PLANCK'S Gesch. d. prot. Lehrb..)

HENKE.*

Hesychasts, the name of a party of mystic monks of the Greek Church, in the 14th and 15th centuries. — After the Paleologi became Emperors the Greek Church became greatly distracted. The Arsenian party, originating in the contest between the Patriarch Arsenius and Mich. Paleologus, had been strengthened by the monks, and opponents of union with the Latin Church. The government wavered between union and hostility to the Latins, and the Patriarchs of the capital moved with the government. In the first half of the 14th cent. a violent civil discord broke out, which resulted in the younger Andronicus taking the throne. After his death the energetic John Cantacuzene seized the government, and continued the struggle against the Empress Anna, widow of the elder Andronicus. In this period the Hesychasts arose; and as the political conflicts involved the Church, we cannot wonder that the Hesychast movement has been differently judged by the opposite parties. Even the Arsenians had devoted themselves in part to a mystical life, but still more the monks on Mt. Athos (see Art.), who had influence in the cities, especially Thessalonica. The leader of these Hesychasts (ἡσυχασταί, ἡσυχαστοί) was Palamas, subsequent B. of Thessalonica. They were forthwith assailed by the learned monk Barlaam, who had come from Calabria to Constantinople. He spoke and wrote against those quietists as heretics. The controversy became public. The matter came before the Synod of Constantinople, 1341; Barlaam's courage failed, he recalled his charges, and returned to Italy. A second Synod condemned Greg. Acindynus, an adherent of B. and opponent of the Hesychasts; the majority having been no little influenced by the fact that Barlaam was an Italian, and that the monks had the orthodoxy in their favor. We have two diverse accounts of these things; that by Cantacuzene, which is partial to the monks (lib. II., 39; IV., 23, 24), and that of Nic. Gregoras, which is unfavorable to them (Nic. Greg., lib. XV., XVIII., XIX., XXII.). Still the Barlaamites multiplied, and as Andron. had died 1341, they might have prevailed under the influence of the Empress Anna, who had the Patr. John deposed at the third Synod of Constantin., if Cantacuzene had not triumphed, in the succeeding war. C. insisted upon having the controversy decided. Acindynus shunned every summons; but in 1351 a fourth Synod investigated four points touching the doctrines of the H., and approved of them in each (HARDUIN, Acta Conc., XI., 283, &c.). The Archb. of Ephesus, who had appeared instead of Acindynus, and others were deposed; Barlaam and Acindynus were excommunicated.

The aim of these mystics was a morbid indulgence of the same mystical impulse which, from the first, had been cherished by Greek theology. Pseudo-Dionysius, to go no further back, sought for an organ of closer approximation to God, than was attainable by the ordinary means of knowledge and meditation. Monastic life among the Greeks favored these views. But the monks on Mt. Athos must have made the appropriation of the θεῖον φῶς, a special study. They wished, by full abstraction from the world, introverted thought, and asceticism (ἀμπαρόθυμοι), to experience the illumination of that light which shone around the Lord on Tabor, and appeared to St. Anthony and other saints. All this, under other circumstances, might have remained confined to their own secret circle, had not Barlaam's opposition demanded a theoretical vindication of their views. From the controversy which followed it appears, that the light after which they aspired, was supernatural and divine, not God himself, for to aim at identification with him would have been blasphemous, but an emanation from God, partaking of his nature yet distinct in essence. To make out their case they distinguished between God's being and activities (ἐνέργεια γὰρ ἔστιν ἡ φερούσα ἐκείνου οὐσίας ὁράματα καὶ κινήσεις. Thus Palamas. HARDUIN, l. c., 303). These, as the attributes in exercise, are radiations from God, or emanating divinities (θεόρρητες), which penetrate the sphere of human perception, and may be substantially contemplated. The capacity for seeing this light can be acquired only by long, devout, introverted thought.—Their opponents objected that God's activities and attributes could not be thus separated from his being; the uncreated light must either be self-subsistent, or a divine attribute; if the former a fourth hypostasis must be assumed, if the latter it could not be separate from its subject. On both assumptions, therefore, the doctrine of the H. was to be rejected as heretical.—It is obvious from this statement, that as the case came before the several Synods, it involved two points, 1) the distinction between being and activity, 2) the manner in which the H. converted the divine energies into θεόρρητες, and made them the principle of a mysterious self-deification. Had the latter point alone been involved the monastic party would doubtless have been defeated. But the Synods kept the speculative point mainly in view, and as the distinction of οὐσία and ἐνέργεια was current and familiar, it seemed safest to sustain the party which appealed to it, and adduced numerous quotations from the Greek Fathers in its support (HARDUIN, l. c., 302, 310, 331. ENGELHARDT, Die Arsenianer, &c., in Bd. VIII. of Illgen's Ztschr. f. hist. Theol., p. 48, &c. PETAVIUS, De theol. dogm., I., cp. 12, p. 76, 81: Antw., 1700. GASS, Kabasilas, p. 8, 20–24. Append. II., Marci Eugenici cap. syllog.). GASS.*

Hetzer, Lewis, a native of Bischofzell, Thurgau, was a youth when the Reformation first passed through Switzerland and Germany. Possessed of high thoughts, great energy, and strong passions, ever fluctuating between piety and carnality, he was easily drawn into the whirlpool of the extreme radicalism which in that period of religious agitation engulfed so many. About 1523 he was a chaplain in Wädenschwyl, on lake Zurich. At the second Zurich discussion (Oct., 1523) he was appointed to record and publish the transactions. A month before he had issued a small work: "Urb. Gottes, unsers Ehegemahels, wie man sich zu allen Götzen und Bildnissen halten soll, an der heil. Schrift entzogen," which, though lacking in ability, was popular in its style, and exerted so much influence that several editions were published. His views and ambition led him to join the extreme radicals, and subsequently to sympathize with the Anabaptists. Having been found guilty, in 1529, of gross immoral practices, he was condemned to death by the authorities of Constance. Whilst awaiting execution, in prison, he seemed to have become truly penitent. He was beheaded Feb. 3, 1529. During his life he had frequent intercourse with Zwingli, Oecolampadius, &c., until they discovered his true character. Among other writings he translated the Old Testament prophets into German, which he regarded as his best service to religion.—(See ZWINGLI'S Works, ed. Schuler and Schulthess, VII., 406, 419, 433. HETZER'S Schriften. Letters of Urb. Reginus and Joh. Zwick in the Simler. Samml. THOS. BLANCHER'S rare work: L. Hetzer zu Const., &c.: Strasb. Beck, 1529. SEE. FRANK'S Chronik Museum Helvet., VI., 100, &c.: Anecdota quædam de L. Hetz., by BREITINGER. Füssli Beiträge, V., 146, &c. BOCK, hist. Antitria. Ortu. annal. anab. RIEDERER, Nachrichten, II. TRECHSEL'S Antitria., I., 13, &c. HEBERLE on Denk, in the Stud. u. Krit., 1851, I., 148, &c. 1855; IV., 817, &c.) TH. KEIM.*

Hezekiah, King of Judah, the successor of Ahas (2 Kings 18–20; 2 Chron. 29–32; Is. 35–39; Micah 1), reigned from 725–696, B. C., according to the usual chronology, which, however, has been recently assailed (for synchronistic data see MOVER'S Phœnix, II., I, p. 154, &c. v. GUMPACH, d. Zeitrechn. d. Babylon. u. Assyrr., p. 105. BRANDIS, über d. histor. Gewinn aus d. Entzifferung d. assyr. Inschriften, p. 46). When Hezekiah, at the age of 25 years, ascended the throne, Judah was politically prostrated, being tributary to Assyria, and morally under the bondage of idolatry. He accordingly, at once tried to remedy both these evils. In 2 Chron. 29, &c., he is said, in the first month of the new year after he began to reign, to have ordered the priests and Levites to purify the temple. The brazen serpent of Moses, which had become an object of worship, was probably then destroyed (2 Kings 18:4). The temple purified, the true worship of Jehovah was reinstated with impressive services, in connection with a general celebration of the passover (chapt. 30). Previously the altars of the idols in Jerusalem were torn down, and

ter the festival this work of demolition was done all over the land. — That Hezekiah was sincere in all this is evident from the record. But in the case of the people generally the change seems to have been only from idolatry to empty ceremonies (Is. 1 : 10, &c. ; 29 : 13 ; Isaiah 6 : 6). Persons in authority, especially, seem to have been mercenary extortioners (Isaiah 3 ; Is. 1 : 15, &c. ; 28 : 7, &c. ; 22 : 15-17), against H.'s first minister, Shebna). Upon the political state of the kingdom a powerful party of nobles, favorable to the policy of Ahaz, had a pernicious influence. Instead of bearing the Assyrian yoke as a divine judgment, and waiting for God's promised help (Is. 10 : 24, 25 ; 30 : 15, &c.) this party was ever urging an alliance with Egypt, as the best means of getting rid of Assyria (Is. 28 : 15, &c.) Their counsels finally prevailed; though the precise time when Hezekiah revolted from Assyria cannot be fixed; but it probably occurred when Sennacherib was engaged in his expedition against Babylonia and Media. Three years later (in the 14th of Hezekiah, a. 712, 711) S. may have resumed his predecessor's plan of invading Egypt, and then punished Judah for its defection. The Assyrian army in its march through Judah, laid waste the country and took one fortress after another. H. sent ambassadors to sue for peace, and agreed to pay 300 talents of silver and 30 talents of gold to secure it (2 Kings 18 : 13, &c.). After receiving the money Sennacherib broke his compact, and sent his general, Tartan, with a party of soldiers to demand the surrender of Jerusalem, and threaten the transportation of the nation (Is. 36 ; 2 Kings 18 : 17, &c.). H. adopted measures to defend the city (2 Chron. 32 : 2-6 ; cf. Is. 22 : 9-11). Still the city seemed in a hopeless condition (Is. 37 : 3). The danger, also, reached its height, as Sennacherib, hearing of the approach of Tirhaka, moved from Lachish nearer to Jerusalem. Then it was that divine deliverance came. The Lord sent a fatal pestilence among the Assyrians, by which 185,000 men perished in a single night (Is. 37 : 8, 26 ; 2 Kings 19 : 8, 15, &c.). Concerning the time of this event see KEIL, Com. on Kings, 541 ; DRECHSLER, do. From Is. 10 : 32 ; 37 : 33, and Ps. 76 : 3, we infer that it took place near Jerusalem. It is worthy of note that Herod., II., 141, reports that a great disaster befel Sennacherib's army on this expedition (cf. Jos. Antt., X., 1, 5) ; and mice, the instrument of the evil, according to Herod., were a symbol of ἀπαρχμός (1 Sam. 5 : 4 ; cf. HIRTZIG, Urgesch. u. Mythol. d. Philist., 201). The deep impression made by this divine interpretation is indicated by Psa. 46, 75, and 76, which were probably then written. Even surrounding heathen nations recognized in it the power of Judah's God, and brought costly offerings to Hezekiah (2 Chron. 32 : 23 ; Is. 18 : 7 ; Ps. 76 : 11). The event was subsequently referred to (Tobit 1 : 18 ; 1 Macc. 7 : 41, &c.). — In the same year of this invasion (Is. 38 ; 2 Kings 20) the sickness of Hezekiah occurred, in which he received the promise of recovery, confirmed by a remarkable token, which some have foolishly attempted to explain by supposing that Isaiah took advantage of a simultaneous eclipse of the sun (THENIUS on 2 Kings 20 : 9). — Upon H.'s prayer see, besides others, DRECHSLER's Comm. II., 2, p. 219. — After his recovery, Merod.-Baladan, King of Babylon, sent messengers to congratulate him (2 Kings 20 : 12, &c. ; Is. 39), to whom he vainly displayed his treasures — (recovered from Sennacherib's army after its destruction, and received as gifts from adjacent nations). For this vanity he was rebuked by Isaiah, and told that his posterity, and all those treasures would ere long be carried away to Babylon (see Chaldea). — Upon the latter part of Hezekiah's reign the Scriptures say but little. In 2 Kings 18 : 7, 8, a victorious battle with the Philistines is named (cf. Is. 14 : 28, &c.), and in 2 Chron. 32 : 22, it is intimated that he secured peace with the neighboring nations. Beyond this the Chronicles simply report his wealth, activity in fortifying the cities, &c., and (2 Chron. 29 : 30) provision for the use of the Psalms at public worship. Prov. 25 : 1, also, mentions a compilation of proverbs made under his reign. He died at the time predicted, and the high regard in which he was held was shown by burying him "in the chiefest of the sepulchres of the sons of David." OEHLEK.*

Hierapolis, a city of Phrygia major, not far N. of Laodicea, and E. of Colossæ (Itiner. Auton., 6 Rom. miles ; Fellows, 6 Engl. miles), where one of the first churches was planted (Col. 4 : 13). Anciently the city was celebrated for its warm baths, and for a cave, Plutonium, whence issued a deadly black vapor, the effects of which none but eunuch priests of the great Mother, the Galli, could escape (STRABO, XIII., 629. PLIN., H. N., II., 95, (93). DIO, 252. AMMIAN. MARCELL., XIII., 6. APULEJ., de mundo, p. 65). Stalactites were formed by the water which was used in building. The water was also well adapted for coloring (STRABO, l. c. VITRUV., VIII., 3). The locality is now occupied by a village called Pambuk Kalesi, amid numerous and important ruins. The springs are still there, but the cave has disappeared. — (POCOCKE. RICHTER, Wallfahrten, p. 523, &c. v. SCHUBERT, Reise, I., 283. FELLOWS, Asia Minor, p. 283, &c.). ARNOLD.*

Hierax, an Egyptian who lived in or near Leontopolis, c. 280, a man of learning (EPIPH., hær., 64, 65), and celebrated for his chirography, being equally skilful in writing Coptic and Greek. He was also familiar with the literature of both languages, and so well versed in the Scriptures that his enemies said he could repeat the whole from memory. Moreover he was poet, physician, astrologist, and magician. He wrote commentaries on the Bible in Greek and Coptic, and composed many hymns. It is said he lived to be more than 90 years old. His manner of life was rigidly ascetic; and he founded a society to which none but the unmarried, continent, virgins and widows, were admitted. The contents of his works are known only through Epiph., who represents H. as an offshoot of the Manichean heresy. But from E.'s statements we should rather infer that H.'s system of Hierax was Origenism run into extremes. His method of interpretation was allegorical (thus of paradise, and the relation of Adam and Eve there). He rejected marriage, and argued that if Christ did not teach and enjoin celibacy, he revealed nothing new. His ascetic theory led him to lay stress on the importance of each one conquering his flesh by moral efforts, and thus gaining a participation in the kingdom of heaven. Holding that none could win the crown who did not strive for it, he denied salvation to children dying young; but he supposed that they occupied an intermediate condition. He denied a supernatural influence to baptism. His views concerning the Trinity were, also, denounced. He considered Melchisedec a type of the Holy Spirit, who (Rom. 8 : 26) is called an intercessor, and therefore must be a priest. Many monks in Egypt joined H., but gradually they abated their ascetic severities.—(See WALCH, Hist. d. Ketzereien, I., 815–23. NEANDER, Ch. Hist. GIESELER, Eccl. Hist.).

DR. PRESSEL.*

Hierocles, a Roman governor of Bithynia, and afterwards (from 306) of Alexandria, an enemy of Christianity under Diocletian. A philosopher and politician, he opposed Chr. on both grounds, writing against its adherents, λόγοι φιλαλήδεις πρὸς τοὺς Χριστιανούς (lost) and, in part, instigating the Diocletian persecution against them (LACTANT., de mortib. persec., 16. Acta Martyr. ed. Assemani). The abovenamed work (known through LACTANT., Inst. div., V., 2, and especially EUSEB., of Cæs., contra Hieroc.: Paris, 1628, and in OLEAR., ed. of Philostrates, 1709, p. 428) was not original, and of little account. Euseb. thought it deserving of an answer only on account of the parallel drawn in it between Jesus Christ and Apollonius of Tyana (see Art.).—A Neo-Platonist named Hierocles (confounded with the previous one, by Pearson, Tillemont) taught in Alexandria in the 5th cent., and wrote some philosophical works (cf. BÄHR, in Pauly's Realenc., III., 1311).—(See FABRICIUS, bibl. gr., I., 791. CAVE, hist. lit., I., 131; II., 99. SCHRÖCKH, K.-gesch., V., 201. NEANDER, Ch. Hist. BAUR, Apollon. of T., &c., p. 3, &c.).

WAGENMANN.*

High Places.—Worship of the Hebrews on High places.—The term הַרְבָּ, signifying a mountain-height, is of uncertain origin, and gives simply the idea of a high place for sacrifice. The root does not occur, but must have been רָבָ. The word belongs most probably to the Indo-Germanic languages, as being transplanted by the northern immigration of the proper Semitics (the Arian) into the tongues called Semitic, but correctly Hamitic. In the Doric dialect, βᾶμα, for which the other dialects employed βῆμα, denoted any elevated place; and with this word we may compare βωμός, probably also βουρός, a hill [the Gaelic ben, as in Ben Nevis, Ben Lomond], and the Persian dam, an elevation. The word as it exists in the Chaldee and the Syriac, was derived, we may readily suppose, from the Holy Scriptures. But tradition very plainly points to a mountain-height. The LXX. usually render it by ὄρος, ὄψος, also βουρός, or by transliteration make it βᾶμα (ἀδάμα). The Vulgate translates it by excelsum, and that the Vulgate does not blindly follow the LXX. in this matter, is evident from the fact that where the LXX. give it by ὄρος, as is the case in the Pentateuch (Lev. 26 : 30; Numb. 21 : 28; 22 : 41; 33 : 52), the Vulgate there as usual has excelsum. The usus loquendi also implies the idea of a mountain-height. It is a place ascended and descended (1 Sam. 9 : 13, 14, 19; 10 : 5); הַרְבָּ and הַרְבָּ, both meaning a hill, are employed as synonymes of it (Is. 65 : 7; Ezek. 20 : 28, 29; Deut. 12 : 2; 2 Kings 7 : 9; Numb. 23 : 3, and often elsewhere); also הַרְבָּ a mountain, and even a high mountain (Deut. 12 : 2; Ezek. 18 : 11, sqq.), and הַרְבָּ a height (Ezek. 16 : 24, 25, 39). Where, however, this word does not denote a place of worship, it invariably signifies a mountain height (Genesius Thes.). Further explanations of its use will be given as we proceed.

The history of worship on high places has often been discussed in a critical manner. During the First Period, the Patriarchal, the word bamah does not appear, but we find the worship of God on mountains spoken of. On Bethel, which, according to Josh. 16 : 1; 1 Sam. 13 : 2, was a mountain, sacrifice was offered by Abraham and Jacob (Gen. 12 : 7; 13 : 3, 4; 28 : 16, sqq.; 35 : 15), and on Mt. Moriah, Isaac was to be offered up (Gen. 22 : 2). De Wette, Winer, and Gramberg, indeed, supposed that later tradition first gave a patriarchal sanctity to Mt. Moriah, the mountain of the Lord's house. But the worship on mountains is everywhere a matter of primeval antiquity, and afterward temples were commonly erected on heights already considered as sacred, as, on the other hand, the appellation Bethel has in modern times often been bestowed on a sanctuary. A later age also would have designated Mt. Moriah much more fully than is done in Genesis, had not that age preferred to use the name of Zion, the name so dear in the Prophets and the Psalms. That worship on high places should have arisen at a very early period, is altogether probable in itself. It everywhere springs from the immediate worship of nature, and grows up before service in temples. It is a favorite practice with Indians to go up a mountain to pray, and they believe that a spirit dwells within the mountain. So the ancient Germans. And this service on mountains has remained as intelligible in itself as any part of the older worship. Even our Saviour often went up a mountain to pray. The nations of antiquity instituted a regular service on mountains, as the Persians, Herod., 1, 131; 7, 43. The Greeks had proceSSIONS on mountains, ὄρεβασίαι. Throughout ancient Europe, among the Germani, the Esthoni, the Finns, the Cours, and the Slavonians, mountains were places of worship. Among the Chinese, down to the latest times, the chief religious rites have been performed on mountains. Hence there were conceived to be special gods of the mountains, as the thalocs among the Mexicans; the oreads among the Greeks; and among the Romans, dii montenses, dii montium, montinus, and dea Collina. The Syrians, too, according to 1 Kings 20 : 23, must have believed in particular deities of the mountains. Some single mountains were held sacred rather than ers, as in Peru and Hayti; while in the old world Zeus, Pan, Hera, Athene, Aphrodite, and Jupiter received various appellations from such mountains. Mountains were regarded as dwellings of the gods, as for instance, Caucasus (Philostr., Apoll., Thya., II., 5); and it was a conceit of the Emperor Julian that the father of all gods had his abode on a mountain-peak. Hence it is that mountains are often adorned with myths as celestial abodes; as the Culcan and the four Yo of the Chinese, Albordi and Gedenelmets of the Persians, Aherman in Turan, Caucasus, Menu, Yamnotri, and Sansadhare of the Hindoos. As Menu, as Summr Oola, and Rieghiel Lunbo of the people of Thibet, so Sumeru of the Buddhist Mongolians is surrounded by seven mythical mountains of gold. The Greek Olympus, Parnassus, Helicon, and Ida were famous as abodes of divinities. To this head is to be referred the Babylonian mythical mountain of the gods, mentioned in Is. 4:13, the mount of the congregation in the sides of the North, which is supposed to be Albordi of the Persians. In this way various mountains became objects of worship and even themselves gods. Hence arose the myths of the transformation of kings and giants into mountains, as the myth of Mt. Atlas, which was worshipped as a deity by the Mauritanians. Libanus, Libanus, and Anti-Libanus, according to Philo B., derived their names from giants, and were gods among the Syrians, as was also Carmel. From all this it appears that the people of Palestine, even in a very remote age, were addicted to the worship on high places, which is of earlier origin than idolatry, the latter having been consummated only in after ages.

As among the Patriarchs a holy place was called Peniel, so a Phœnician promontory was designated ἱεὺν πρόσωπον, that is, Peniel (Strabo, XVI., p. 754). The worship of the goddesses of Asia Minor on Mt. Pessinus, Berycynthus, Syphelus, Cybelus, and Ida, is also of very early antiquity. It follows at the same time from what we have now presented, that the high place was not an altar, as Ugolini (Thes., X., 588) asserts on the authority of the Talmudists. In later times it is, moreover, expressly distinguished from the artificial heights (1 Kings 13:32).

In the Second Period, between the time of Moses and that of Solomon, the tabernacle, the tent of the Hebrews in their wanderings, was the central seat of worship, along with which, however, the high places still continued. Thus, Horeb is called a Mount of God, a Holy Place, on which by divine command the Israelites were to worship God (Exod. 3:1, sqq.; 12:4, 27; 18:15), and in several passages in Deut., and also in Mal. 4:4, Horeb, as well as its twin-peak, Sinai, is spoken of as the mount of the Covenant or mount of the Law. Sinai itself, in like manner, is called the Mount of God (Exod. 24:13); on it God appears continually; before it the people are filled with holy awe. On Ebal, too, an altar was set up by the inspired command of Moses (Deut. 27:4), and there Joshua performed holy rites (Josh. 8:33). During this same period heathen worship on high places was more fully constituted. We meet with the height of Baal (Numb. 22:19, 41, 44; Josh. 13:17); the twin-heights, Pisgah and Nebo, were sacred to the Moabitish god Nebo, and there Balaam made an offering on a high place (Numb. 23:4; Deut. 33:49; Is. 15:2; 16:12; Jer. 48:35); and the peak of Peor (Beth-Peor) may be mentioned, on which the wanton rites of Baal-Peor (9 v.) took place; and among this people we know that human offerings were then made. Baal-Hermon, too, belongs here (Judges 3:3; 1 Chron. 5:23). The more fully the heathenish character of the heathen worship on high places disclosed itself, the more distinctly was this worship forbidden in the Law, and indeed not only in Deut., but even in Lev. and Numb.; and from the terms in which this prohibition was couched, which are no longer applicable to natural heights, it appears that also artificial heights were now erected, which still existed in the following period. It is commanded that they should destroy and utterly remove them (Lev. 26:30; Numb. 33:52; Deut. 12:2; Ezek. 6:3); that they should tear them down (2 Kings 23:8); that they should burn them up (2 Kings 23:15). So, also, mention is made of fashioning, building, and erecting the high places (1 Kings 11:7; 14:23; 2 Kings 17:9, 29; 21:3; 23:15; Jer. 7:31; 19:5; Ezek. 16:24, 25; 2 Chron. 22:11); and in fact they were set up on mountains, in fields, valleys, cities, streets, and on roofs (Jer. 7:31; 17:3; 19:4; 32:35; Ezek. 16:23, sqq.; 2 Kings 7:9; 17:8, 29). These expressions are as little suitable to natural heights as they are to holy places set apart, which Otto Thenius avers the high places to mean. We should sooner, with Ewald, think of conical stones, monuments of stone, images of Asherah, objects similar to which are often mentioned both among the heathen and among the Hebrews. The LXX. translate הַמָּקוֹם in the Pentateuch uniformly by στήλη. But such stones as they used also for altars, are distinguished from the high places (2 Kings 22:15; with which comp. Gen. 35:15), or again the high places and altars are opposed to columns and stones (Numb. 33:52; Deut. 12:3; Ezek. 16:16-39; 2 Kings 23:15), if the high places are not designated exactly as tents. If now the artificial heights are mentioned as houses of the high places, בְּתֵי הַמָּקוֹם (1 Kings 13:32; 14:23; 2 Kings 17:29; 21:3; 23:8, 13, 19; Ezek. 16:16), there lies in this expression itself a distinction between houses and heights; they are explicitly opposed to each other (1 Kings 3:32; 2 Kings 17:29), whenever the shortened form height is used instead of house of the height (Ezek. 16:16). The artificial heights are the houses of the heights, to which latter all the expressions cited above, as used of the former, are applicable, and which are likewise distinguished from the monuments of stone, and so forth (1 Kings 14:23; 2 Kings 21:3; 23:13, 14). They are also called dwelling-places (הַמְּקוֹמוֹת, Deut. 12:2) instead of houses. All these forms of expression bring us to the idea of a temple. And, indeed, artificial heights for temples among many tribes of America and Asia at this day consist of truncated pyramids, as did also the temple of Baal in Babylon. But nothing of this kind is spoken of in Palestine; no ruins of such objects have been found there; and the language above quoted concerning artificial heights, for the most part, does not apply to pyramids, while, on the other hand, it all very well applies to tents, nomadic coverings, and portable temples. And with this view, the two passages, Ezek. 16 : 16; 2 Kings 23 : 7, agree, according to which, the high places were decked with cloths of various colours, and again they wove tents for Asherah. These are the Tents of the Daughters, Succoth-Benoth, (2 Kings 17 : 30) in the lascivious sanctuary of Mylitta (Herod., 1, 199; Strabo, XVI., 1), with which the Σάσια or Feast of Booths among the inhabitants of Asia Minor may be compared. Such a nomadic tent existed in America; among the Italians (according to Servius); the Egyptians (Descript., I., pl. 11, fig. 4); the pagan Slavonians; the Mongolians; and especially in Asia Minor, whence the Carthaginians received it (Diod., XX., 65). That even in the time of Moses it had come from Asia Minor into use among the idolatrous Israelites, is testified by Amos (Amos 5 : 25; with which comp. Acts 7 : 43).

The believing Israelites, however, in their wanderings likewise needed such a tent, as a military, political, and religious centre. They set it up in the Tabernacle, הֵיכָל, also called a house or abode of God (Exod. 23 : 19; 25 : 8, 9; Josh. 6 : 24; 24 : 26). This Tabernacle was to be an exclusive place of central worship (Lev. 17 : 1-9; Deut. 12 : 13, sqq.); and that in actual life they seriously treated this requirement, is manifest from the account in Josh. 22 : 10, sqq. The Tabernacle was, of course, not always in the same place. In the desert it was a wandering temple. It was afterward commonly at Shiloh, perhaps also once at Shechem (Josh. 24 : 1, 26). When, therefore, the people assembled before Jehovah in other places, as in Bethel, and in the two Mizpahs, we must suppose that the Tabernacle, or at least the Ark of the Covenant, was sometimes brought to such place from Shiloh. That the Tabernacle, down to the time of David, often changed its place, plainly appears from 2 Sam. 7 : 6. It was in Gilgal, under Samuel; in Saul's time, in Nob; under David, and in the early part of Solomon's reign, in Gibeon, from which place it was removed to Jerusalem. Notwithstanding all the rigor of the letter of the Law, there were yet, beside the central sanctuary, other places of worship, which were presupposed even in the Book of the Law, Exod. 2 : 20, 21, sqq. That in this passage allusion is not made to a different place of setting up the Tabernacle, is evident from the circumstance that mention is here made of altars of stone, whereas the altars of the Tabernacle consisted of wood or metal. So in fact Moses gave direction that an altar of unhewn stone should be erected on Mt. Ebal, and this direction Joshua obeyed. During the times of the Judges we find private and family altars in various places (Judges 2 : 5; 6 : 11, 24; 1 Sam.

24 : 18; 1 Chron. 21 : 26, 36). Thus then the worship of Jehovah on sacred heights was expressly said to exist as well in the times of the Judges (Judges 13 : 19), as in that of Samuel, who, together with the people, resorted to such a height (1 Sam. 9 : 12, with which comp. 7 : 17). Saul also prepared an offering on Mt. Carmel (1 Sam. 15 : 12); in the time of David the Mt. of Olives was used for such purpose (2 Sam. 15 : 30, 32); and Solomon himself, and the people, made offerings on high places before the erection of the temple (1 Kings 3 : 2, sqq.).

During the Third Period, from Solomon to Hezekiah and Josiah, the high places existed along with the temple. This structure, with all its magnificence, must have made the demand for unity still more emphatic than the Tabernacle, which now no longer answered its original end. Like the Tabernacle, the temple was to be a throne of God, not simply a high place for sacrifice, though built on a height. The more the temple required centralization, the more distinctly did all tendencies to political and religious disunion separate themselves from it. The temple was scarcely finished when ten tribes under Jeroboam fell away from its service and from Judah, and built, on the heights at Dan and Bethel, temples and houses of the heights, in which priests ministered who were not Levites (1 Kings 12 : 27; 2 Kings 17 : 32, 33). In these places the form of a golden calf or bull was worshipped as Jehovah at that period (1 Kings 12 : 28-33), and even down to later times (2 Kings 10 : 29; 17 : 16, 32; Hosea 8 : 56; 13 : 2). There were some instances even of heathen worship on high places, under Solomon to some extent (1 Kings 11 : 7); then in Israel under Ahab (1 Kings 16 : 19; 18 : 19; 2 Kings 10); and under Hosea (2 Kings 17 : 9, sqq., 29, sqq., 23 : 15). Nor did Judah remain free from this heathen service. As early as the time of Rehoboam they built many high places, set up columns and images of Asherah on every high hill and under every green tree, and there were then Sodomites in the land (1 Kings 14 : 23). The same thing took place under his successor Abijam (1 Kings 15 : 3), under Joram (2 Kings 8 : 18, 27), under Ahaz (2 Kings 16 : 4, 32; 10 : 21), and finally under Manasseh (2 Kings 21 : 3). Relapses also occurred in the period following. But while in both kingdoms, the opposition of the believing kings, prophets, priests, and Levites, was open and strenuous against the heathen heights, as against heathen worship in general, such was not the case with the monotheistic high places. The pious kings retained the high places of Jehovah, and were censured by no contemporary prophet. They had the example of Samuel before them, and even the zealous Elijah had made an offering on Carmel (1 Kings 18 : 17, sqq.). The assertion of K. Ad. Menzel (Staats-und Religionsgeschichte der Königreiche Israel und Juda, § 240), that the priesthood had already insisted on abolishing the high places, is, as well as much else in that work, utterly without foundation. The historical books, the Kings and the Chronicles, which were not written till a later period, first give utterance to their censure of the high places, which is repeated by the prophets (Isa. 65 : 7; Hosea 4: 13). Thus in Kings it is said of Asa, that he put away all idols, but did not remove the high places, and yet his heart was given to Jehovah as long as he lived (1 Kings 15: 12, 14). The same is declared of his son Jehoshaphat (1 Kings 22: 44); of Jehoash (2 Kings 12: 3); of his son Amaziah (2 Kings 14: 3, 4); of Uzziah (Azariah) (2 Kings 15: 3, 4); and of his son Jotham (2 Kings 15: 35). There seems to be a contradiction of this in 2 Chron., in which book these kings are said to have abolished the high places. The case stands thus: in respect of Jotham, 2 Chron. 27: 2, quite agrees with 2 Kings, when it declares: And still the people did evil: of Jehoash, Amaziah, and Uzziah, the Chronicles make no mention, but of Asa and Jehoshaphat they state two different things: that namely the high places were abolished by them (14: 3-5), and then again that they were not abolished (15: 17; 20: 33). Recent critics, as de Wette, in his Beiträge, and Gramberg, in his Religionsgeschichte, press this contradiction against the statements of the Books of Kings, as if the Chronicles had ascribed to their own time the views of the earlier period, and had asserted that the faithful kings had already abolished the high places, which in fact they had not done. The Chronicles, these critics assume, made this representation with a view to vindicate the antiquity of the Law concerning the unity of divine worship; but when again the Chronicles, in agreement with the Books of Kings, make these two sovereigns, Asa and Jehoshaphat, still retain the high places, the Chronicles, in careless thoughtlessness and entire forgetfulness of their chief dogmatic aim, must have copied this from the Books of Kings. In opposition to such views, the general credibility and historical character of the Chronicles have more recently been vindicated by the result of the investigations of Dahler, Drey, Herbst, Hirscher, and especially of Movers and Keil, with whom, in general, judicious critics, such as Bertheau, Otto Thenius, Ewald, and Stähelin, concur. Such being the case, we are justified in the attempt to explain an apparent contradiction between the two historical statements. We cannot, however, follow the older commentators in referring the one passage to an attempt to abolish the high places, and the other to the ineffectual result, the very language employed forbidding this.

On the other hand, a simple examination of those passages in the Chronicles which seem to involve the contradiction, shows that they refer to the heathen heights; while the other passages that represent the heights as still existing, refer to the heights on which Jehovah was worshipped (comp. Movers, p. 257). It is said of Asa, in 2 Chron. 14: 2, sqq.: "And Asa did what was good and right in the eyes of the Lord his God: for he took away the altars of the strange gods, and the high places, and brake down the images, and cut down the Asherah; and commanded Judah to seek the Lord God of their fathers, and to do the law and the commandment. And he removed from all the cities of Judah the high places and images to the sun." The same in substance is declared of Jehoshaphat in ch. 17: 6. Here, by the context, the high places are clearly enough designated as heathen, and indeed in exactly the same manner in which in the Law, the Prophets, and the historical books, the heathen heights are always mentioned. The places in the Law and the historical books are adduced above; for those in the Prophets, comp. Hosea 8: 8; Amos 7: 9; Micah 1: 5; Jer 7: 31; 17: 3; see also 2: 19, 9; 32: 35; 48: 35; Ezek. 7: 3, 4; 6: 6; 16: 16, sqq.; 20: 28, sqq.; Ps. 78: 58. In general, Ewald and Stähelin concur in this view, but they suppose that the later writers had gradually come to signify by the term height simply an idolatrous height, so that with these later writers also the monotheistic heights, and even those on which the Tabernacle stood, were idolatrous. But from the passages quoted in support of the latter supposition (1 Kings 3: 2, 4; 1 Chron. 16: 39; 21: 29; 2 Chron. 1: 3), it is evident that the Tabernacle was often erected on a height. That a two-fold, relative mode of expression was used in the Chronicles as well as elsewhere, is manifest from this apparent contradiction itself. In respect to the matter in question, there exists, between the Chronicles and the Books of the Kings, the point of agreement, that both hold all high places to be contrary to law. We learn, therefore, from the history of the worship on high places, that even from the time of Moses the Law prescribed centralization of worship. Effect was given to this law in actual life at first by the erection of the Tabernacle, afterward by that of the temple. This law was required by the necessities as well of the people in their wanderings as of the subjects of the kingdom. If, however, the law was not carried out with perfect consistency either by prophets or by pious kings, it was owing, in the first place, to the force of custom, which in religious matters is very strong; then to the circumstance that worship on high places is, in and by itself, natural, appealing as it does to the religious sentiment in general, and not simply to that of the heathen; finally, in the third place, that the Old Dispensation, neither in its beginning nor in its completion, required the temple, except only in one stage of the development of the people, when as yet they were not truly centralized. If, therefore, the worship on high places was practised without the adoration of false gods and the veneration of images, the latter being always considered as heterodox and sinful, and was so practised as not to violate fundamentally the leading principle of the Hebrews, such worship was tolerated even during this Third Period, according to the statement of the earlier records and those of the Chronicles themselves.

The Fourth Period, from the time of Hezekiah and Josiah, first wrought in the matter itself, and in the view entertained of it, such a change that thenceforth service in the temple, to the exclusion of the high places, was predominant in Judah. The greater part indeed of what is rehearsed of the reformation accomplished by these two sovereigns, relates to the abolishment of idolatry, but even the monotheistic heights were now done away, and are therefore no longer mentioned. That Hezekiah abolished the illegal monotheistic worship, we see from his destruction of the brazen serpent (2 Kings 18: 4.)

which Moses made, and to which, even at this period, offerings of incense were made. Again in v. 22 it is expressly stated that Hezekiah took away the high places and altars of Jehovah, and commanded the people to worship only at the altar in Jerusalem, with which statement Isa. 36 : 7 coincides. Josiah afterward followed in the footsteps of Hezekiah, and therefore the reformation he effected is to be regarded in the same light as that of his predecessors (2 Kings 23 : 4-14; 2 Chron. 34 : 35). Of him also it is related that he destroyed the houses of the heights at Bethel and elsewhere. This refers to the worship of the figure of a bull as Jehovah, which Jeroboam had instituted, and with which the elements of heathen worship were mixed, as had been done even in Jerusalem (2 Kings 23 : 15, 19; Zeph. 1 : 4-6).

Comp. on heathen worship on high places and mountains, the well-known Histories of Religion, by VOSS (Idol.), CREUZER and MONE, KLEMM, WUTTKE, SCHWENK, J. GRIMM, W. MÜLLER; FR. HERMANN'S Gottesdienstl. Altherthümer der Griechen; PAULY, ZACHARIÄ, De more veterum in locis editis colendi Deos, 1754; REISKE, ad Max. Tyr. VIII. 8; Journal des Savants, 1842, p. 217. On the same in America: Geschichte der amerikan. Urreligionen, von J. G. M. In Western Asia, especially in Palestine: MOYER'S Geschichte der Phönizier; GESENIUS, zu Gramberg, im Thesaurus und zu Jes., 13 : 13; DE WETTE'S Beiträge; GRAMBERG'S Israelitische Religionsgeschichte; WINER'S Lexicon; MOYER'S und KEIL'S Untersuchung über die Chronik; STÄHELIN, über die Leviten; EWALD'S Geschichte Israels, III., 1, 110, 182; Alterthüm. 235; EISENLOHR, das Volk Israel, I., 114; and the Commentare zu alttest. Büchern von BERTHEAU, OTTO THENIUS, and others.

J. G. MÜLLER.—C. Short.

High-priest.—The complete designation is found in Lev. 21 : 10: "The high-priest among his brethren, upon whose head the anointing oil was poured;" hence, more briefly, הַכֹּהֵן

הַכֹּהֵן הַגָּדוֹל, Lev. 4 : 3, 5, 16; or הַכֹּהֵן הַגָּדוֹל

Exod. 35 : 28. In the middle books of the Pentateuch, however, instead of the name of the office, that of its first incumbent is mostly used; in Deuteronomy (esp. 17 : 12), and the subsequent books of the Old Test., the high-priest is called simply הַכֹּהֵן; and still later, כֹּהֵן

שֶׁרָאָה, 2 Kings 25 : 18; Esra 7 : 5; 2 Chron.

19 : 11; comp. 24 : 6. In the modern Hebrew of the Mishna, &c., the common name is כֹּהֵן

גָּדוֹל, to distinguish them from the ordinary priests. In the LXX. the general name is ὁ ἱερεὺς ὁ μέγας; Lev. 4 : 3, ἀρχιερεὺς, and thus generally in the New Test., in Philo, and Josephus. In the plural, the latter name, according to the most generally-received opinions, designates the chiefs of the twenty-four priestly classes; according to some, the members of the sanhedrim, who were of priestly descent. According to WICHELHAUS (Versuch eines ausf. Comm. z. Leid.-Gesch.), the name designated, besides the actual high-priests, only those who had either formerly held the office of high-priest or were members of those families to whom the office was confined. The high-priest is the special representative of the theocratic people before Jehovah: in him is concentrated what is the special calling of the priesthood—the mediocrity between God and the people, through which access to God is given to the latter. If in the blood of sacrifices, God accepts the life of a clean animal, by which the uncleanness and sin of the people are covered before him (according to the leading sense of כִּפֹּר); he, in the high-priest, on the other hand, chooses and sanctifies a man to be surety for the people, in order, as is said in Exod. 28 : 38, to "bear the iniquity of the holy things, which the children of Israel shall hallow in all their holy gifts, that they may be accepted before the Lord." Hence, that the sacrifice might have a reconciling and sanctifying effect, it was necessary that in the high-priest a personally reconciling mediocrity should appear before God¹; in which, of course, the old covenant shows its inadequacy to establish a true reconciliation in the fact that the very high-priest, through whose mediation the defects cleaving to the sacrifices were neutralized, needed, on account of his own sins and infirmities, an atonement and purification through the blood of sacrifices. As representative of the people, the high-priest bears the names of the twelve tribes upon his shoulder and his heart (Exod. 28 : 12, 29). Since the mission of the entire nation is united in his person (aequiparatur universo Israeli, says Aben Esra, to Lev. 4 : 13), the same sacrifice is required for him as for the entire nation (see Art. Sacrifice). According to Lev. 4 : 3, if the high-priest transgresses, there attaches to the people an interruption of the entire theocratic order: if, on the other hand, God acknowledges a high-priest as well-pleasing to him, it is a virtual declaration that he graciously accepts the entire people.—This character of the high-priest, in virtue of which he is specially "the saint of the Lord" (see Ps. 106 : 16), must show itself in his entire life, which is to make the impression of the highest purity and of an entire surrender unto God. To this refer the directions which concern 1, the person and order of life of the high-priest; 2, his official ordination and dress. 1. Here we have to describe only what is peculiar to the high-priest, as given in Lev. 21 : 10-15. According to this he is above all to be separated from all defiling contact with the dead—even with the dead bodies of his parents—that his priestly labors in the sanctuary might not be interrupted. In this surrender of the most sacred ties of nature in favor of the divine calling is symbolized the priestly disposition required in Deut. 33 : 9. Every token of mourning, even, is forbidden him. The words "uncover not your heads" (v. 6), have reference perhaps to the uncovering of the head in order to cast dust and ashes upon it (see Hävernick on Ezek. 24 : 17). The prohibition of rending the garments was not applied to mourning on account of public calamities (see 1 Macc. 11 : 71; Jos. B. Jud., II., 15 : 4). Mishna Horajoth, 3 : 5, allows it in every case of mourning, only that the high-priest rend it from the hem, not from above.—As regards sexual relations, besides the prohibitions of the ordinary priests, the high-priest was also forbidden to marry a widow: he was to take a virgin "of his own people." Later tradition strained the qualification of virginity so far, as to exclude a virgin beyond her flowers (see Mishna Jebum, 6 : 4). The words, "of his own people," designed nothing more, perhaps, than to exclude a foreigner. That, according to Philo, de monarch., II., 11, the high-priest could marry only the daughter of a priest, is a mere exaggeration. Of course, the high-priest had also to be born from a lawful marriage of the above kind; in later times, special weight was attached to the point that the mother had never been a captive in war (Jos. Arch., XIII., 10 : 5).—As regards the age in which the high-priest could enter upon his office, there is no law given: Jewish tradition requires him to be 30 years of age, although Herod once appointed a youth of 17 years to the office (Jos. Arch., XV., 1). As regards moral qualifications, the crime of idolatry, murder, incest, &c., excluded from the office.—2. The official consecration of the high-priest, the ceremonies of which occupied seven days, consisted of, 1, washing; 2, putting on the vestments; 3, anointing; 4, sacrifices, with which, again, special ceremonies were connected (Exod. 29; Lev. 8. See also Art. Sacrifices and Priest). What is peculiar here to the high-priest belongs to the putting on of the vestments and the anointing. As regards the former, see Exod. 29 : 5–9, Numb. 20 : 26–28, according to which latter passage, the transfer of the high-priest's office from Aaron to Eleazar was performed by the transfer of the high-priest's vestments. Without this holy vestment the high-priest is a mere private person; he is threatened with death if he appears before Jehovah without it (Exod. 28 : 35). A description of the official dress of the high-priest is given in Exod. 28 and 39, with which Sir., 45 : 9–16, Jos. Arch., III., 7 : 4, and his B. Jud., V., 5 : 7, must be compared. The most important monographs on this subject are: BRAUN, de vest. sacerdot. Hebr., 1680; CARPZOV, de pontif. Hebr. vest. sacro, in UGOLINO's Thes., vol. XII.; ABRAHAM BEN DAVID, dissert. de vest. sacerdot. Hebr., in UGOLINO, vol. XIII. Among recent writers, especially BÄHR, Symb., II., p. 97. In so far as the dress of the high-priest was the same as that of the ordinary priests, see Art. Garments, holy, among the Hebrews. Over this ordinary dress the high-priest wore a robe of woven work, blue, and of cotton, which, from the description, must be regarded as a closed garment, having a hole at the top, with a binding of woven work, and holes (not sleeves) for the arms. To the hem, pomegranates and golden bells in alternation were attached, the purpose of which is stated in Exod. 28 : 35. Their tinkling signalized to the people in the outer court that the high-priest was engaged in his offices in the sanctuary, so that they could follow him with their thoughts and prayers. Over the robe was the ephod, to which the breast-plate was fastened by chains and bands (see articles Ephod, and Urim and Thummim). The head-dress was a mitre, which differed from the bonnet of the ordinary priest, although Josephus and the Rabbins often call the bonnet a mitre. According to Jos., the mitre of the high-priest consisted of the bonnet of the ordinary priest, with another of purple-blue wound over it. In front of it was a plate of gold, קָדֵשׁ (LXX., κεφαλαιον, see Lexicons), called in Exod. 29 : 6, קִדְדָן , diadem; it bore the inscription, "Holiness to the Lord." In Sir., 45 : 12, and in Josephus, it is called κεφαλαιον χρυσεον, perhaps from its later shape. For the offices on the day of atonement, another dress of white linen was prescribed (see resp. Art.). In the age of the Herods and of the Roman supremacy, the official dress of the high-priest was kept in the tower of Antonia, and handed over to the high-priest seven days before the three annual festivals and the day of atonement, and returned the day after the festival (Jos. Arch., 18, 4, 3; 20, 1, 1).—Various symbolical interpretations have been given to this dress. Philo, de monarch., II., 5, refers it to cosmical relations. Among moderns, Bähr interprets the ordinary garment of the high-priest to represent the priestly, the robe the legal, and the Ephod and Choshen the kingly office. There is no doubt that in the splendid dress of the high-priest a certain royal dignity was to become apparent: but it is still certain that the Old Test. knows nothing of a kingship as attached to the high-priest. The union of the two offices was looked for only in the Messiah. A kind of anticipation of this union we find rather in the person of the king, since David and Solomon attached a certain priestly character to the kingship (see Art. Kings of the Israelites). Not until the age of the Asmoneans, is the high-priest at the same time a prince. The calling of the priesthood is constantly represented as twofold (see Deut. 33 : 10); 1, to be mediators between the people and God; 2, to teach the people the laws of Jehovah, as the messenger of Jehovah to the people (Mal. 2 : 7). To the latter office belongs the judicial function of the high-priest, and the Urim and Thummim (see Sir., 45 : 16–17; Joseph. c. Ap. II., 23; Philo, M., p. 321). Hence the dress of the high-priest can have a symbolical meaning only in these two respects, which appears also evident in its chief parts, the Ephod and Breastplate. That the robe has no peculiar meaning, appears from Exod. 28 : 31. We cannot here discuss the second import of the H.-P.'s dress (see Art. Urim and Thummim). The first, that of an atoning mediatorship, appears especially in the fact that the high-priest, clothed with the ephod, bore the names of the twelve tribes upon the heart and shoulders. Although in Exod. 28 : 9, the heart may perhaps denote the seat of wisdom, which judges and decides; yet it must not be forgotten that it is also the seat of the memory (see Jer. 44 : 21, לִבְיָדָה; also Isa. 46 : 8). The representative of the nation, who had to represent it before God that he might remember it in mercy (Numb. 10 : 9), had, of course, to bear the people in his mind. But this does not yet exhaust the idea (see besides the above, Cant. 8 : 6; 2 Cor. 7 : 3; Phil. 1 : 7). The heart designating also the centre of personal life, this bearing upon the heart symbolizes also a personal commingling with the life of others; in virtue of which, as Philo, spec. leg., II., 321, well expresses it, the high-priest is τοῦ συνπαρὸς Ἰσραὺς σὺνγυμνὸς καὶ ἀνταρὸς ποιεῖν, and therefore stands in the most lively sympathy with those for whom he intercedes.—That the ephod is essentially a garment for the shoulders, does not make it a symbol of royal authority; this designates only that an office rests upon him, which certainly is related to that mentioned in Isa. 22 : 22, since to it alone it belonged to open access unto God. Nor do the onyx stones (Exod. 28 : 12), upon which the names of the tribes were engraved, designate by any means the high-priest as ruler of the people; but merely that he as mediator bears the people before God, or that the people rest as a burden upon him (Numb. 11 : 11).—The putting on of the dress was followed by the anointing. From Exod. 29 : 29, it has been concluded that this was administered on each of the seven days of the consecration, but that a single one was valid. The peculiarity of the anointing of the high-priest was that the oil was poured upon the head (Exod. 29 : 7; Lev. 8 : 12; 21 : 10; Ps. 133 : 2), after which, according to tradition, the sign of the Greek X was made upon his forehead. From this anointing—the symbol of the communication of the divine spirit—the high-priest was called the anointed priest. Hengstenberg, on Ps. 133, supposes, though altogether without foundation, it “very doubtful” that the high-priests after Aaron were anointed: but according to Jewish tradition, the anointing of the high-priest continued to the age of Josiah, when the holy oil was hidden and thus lost (see KRUMBHOLZ, sacerdot. hebr. in Ugol. thes., XII., p. LXXXVII.), and the succeeding high-priests consecrated by merely putting on them the official dress. This may perhaps explain the difference made between the high-priests in Mishna Maccoth, 2, 6.—As regards the offices of the high-priest, all those of the ordinary priests could also be performed by him. According to Jos. B. J., V., 5, 7, his functions were limited to the Sabbaths, new moons, and festivals; but in Mishna Tamid, 7, 3, it is taken for granted that he could at pleasure take part in the sacrificial service. In fact, the priesthood was a unit, of which the high-priest was the special bearer; and the ordinary priests, in their functions, were only his deputies. In Sir., 45, 14, 16, the sacrificial service is called the service of Aaron. Concerning the special functions of the high-priest on the day of atonement, and the consulting of the holy oracle, see the resp. articles. Of course, the high-priest had the chief supervision of the temple-service and treasury; for the latter, see 2 Kings 22 : 4; 2 Macc. 3 : 2. Concerning their part in the administration of justice, see Justice, &c., among the Hebr. In later times he was generally, though not necessarily, president of the Sanhedrim (see Art. Sanhedrim).—The office of high-priest was in older times retained by its incumbents no doubt until their death (Jos. Arch., XX., 10, 1); nor can it be proven that at any time an annual change was customary. The succession was originally perhaps determined by the law of inheritance: so that, if no legal impediment prevented, the oldest son, and if he had already died, the oldest son of the same, succeeded. The entire number of high-priests from Aaron to Phanassa, who was elevated at the beginning of the Jewish wars by the insurgents, was (Jos. Arch., XX., 10) 83, viz., from Aaron to Solomon, 13; during the existence of Solomon's temple, 18; the second temple, 52. The lists of the high-priests in Josephus, in Seder olam, and in the Chronica paschale, show many deviations; see a comparison of them by LIGHTFOOT, minist. templi cap. IV., opp. ed. II., vol. I., p. 682. The names of the high-priests, as well as they can be determined, are as follows: 1, Aaron; 2, Eleazer; 3, Phinehas. The names of the high-priests until Eli are wanting in the earlier books of the Old Test.; according to tradition (Jos. Arch., V., 11, 5), the office remained in the family of Eleazer to near the end of the age of the Judges. According to Josephus (ut supr., see also the genealogies in 1 Chron. 5 : 29, &c.; 6 : 35, &c.; Ezra 7 : 1, &c.), the 4th high-priest was Abiezer; 5, Bukki; 6, Ussi; 7, Eli, with whom the succession passed over to the family of Ithamar. In this way, however, the number of 13 high-priests cannot be made out; wherefore some supply, from the genealogies of Chronicles, 7, Seraja; 8, Merejoth; 9, Eli; and, during his lifetime, 10, Phinehas; 11, Ahitob; 12, Achia; 13, Abiathar. The latter being deposed by Solomon, the office again passed over to the family of Eleazer in the person of Zadock. In this second line, commencing with Zadock, follow, 2, Ahimaaz; 3, Azariah; 4, Johanan; 5, Azuriah; 6, Amariah. After this, everything is uncertain. Lightfoot gives, 7, Ahitub; 8, Zadock. In 2 Chron. 26 : 17, we find another, Azariah; 2 Kings 16 : 11, a Uriah; 2 Chron. 31 : 10, an Azariah. With Shallum, the father of Hilkiah, the succession of high-priests can again be determined. According to Josephus, Hilkiah was succeeded by Seraiah, who was slain by Nebuchadnezzar in Riblah (2 Kings 25 : 18), so that the office passed over to his son Jehozadak, who went into captivity (1 Chron. 6 : 15). With Joshua, the son of the latter, commences after the captivity the third series (see, concerning this series, in Herzfeld's Gesch. d. Volkes Isr. von Volland. d. 2ten Temp., I Bd. 1855, p. 368, &c.). In the canonical books of the Old Test., the last list of high-priests is given in Neh. 12 : 10, 11. During the Syrian period the regular succession ceased, and from 160–153 B. C., the office was entirely interrupted. In 153, Jonathan, the son of Mattathias, begins the series of Asmonean high-priests from the class of Jojarib; which, according to 1 Macc. 2 : 54, was descended from Phinehas, and hence beanged to the line of Eleazer. Herod was very arbitrary in the appointment of high-priests, and his example was followed by Archelaus and the Romans (Jos. Arch., XX., 10, 5). From Herod the Great to the destruction of Jerusalem, Josephus enumerates twenty-eight high-priests (see Wieseler, chronol. Synopse d. Evang., p. 88).

¹ Comp. CALVIN'S just interpretation of the passage: "Oblationum sanctarum iniquitas tollenda et purganda fuit per sacerdotem. Frigidum est illud commentum, si quid erroris admissum esset in ceremoniis, remedium fuisse sacerdotis precibus. Longius enim recipere non oportet: ideo oblationem iniquitatem deleri a sacerdote quia nulla oblatio, quatenus est hominis, omni citio cordi. Dictum hoc asperum est et fere repudiosum, sanctitates ipsas esse immundas, ut venia indigeant; sed tenendum est, nihil esse tam purum, quod non aliquid labis a nobis contrahat.—Nihil Dei cultu praestantius: et tamen nihil offerre potuit populus, etiam a lege praescriptum, nisi intercedente venia, quam non nisi per sacerdotem obtinuit."

ÖZHLER.—Reinecke.

Higden, Ralph, an old English historian and Benedictine monk of St. Werberg, in the dukedom of Chester, died 1363 (according to some, 1377), being nearly 100 years of age. His history, Polychronicon Lib. VII., ex anglico in latinum conversi a Joh. Trevisa et editi cura, G. Caxton, 1482, sq., extends from Creation to 1357 after Christ; the best edition in 1642, fol. Caxton added one book—the eighth—and Dr. Gale, in his Quindecim scriptores histor. Britann. etc.: Oxon, 1691, published the section treating of the ancient Britons and Saxons. The work, though but a compilation—seventh book excepted—evinces good taste, and is often quoted by English historians.—(See Rees, Cyclop. Britann.)

S.—Ermentrout.

Hilarion, Saint, and founder of monasticism in Palestine, was born in Tabathe, near Gaza, towards the close of 3d cent. (288?) When a mere boy, he studied in Alexandria, and received baptism. Inflamed with the desire of imitating St. Anthony, whom he had visited, he returned home, being now but 15, distributed his estate among his brothers and the poor, and retired to the sickly wilderness by the sea-shore of Majuma, near Gaza. The tenderness of his body was afflicted with the most ascetic practices. He ate only after the sun had gone down, and, it is said, lived on the juice of herbs from the 64th to the 84th year of his age.—He prayed without ceasing, knew by heart the greater part of Scripture, and had written out the Gospels. The length of Anthony induced him—now 65 years old—to visit his place of abode in Egypt. Penetrating the deserts, he reached Epidauros, in Dalmatia. His miraculous prayers, rigorous life, and disinterestedness, brought upon him much veneration that, to escape it, he sought a new home. The possessed, however, whom he healed, found him out. He had power, also, over serpents and earthquakes; the sorceries of love yielded to his influence. At the earnest prayer of a Christian of Majuma, who wished him to bless his horses, he attended a race, excusing himself on the ground that the interests of religion were involved. Though the horses of the Pagan antagonist had been strengthened by the magic of the principal god of the city, those of the Christian seemed to fly over the course, and many of the spectators submitted to baptism. Died in 371 or 372, 84 years of age. The Church celebrates his anniversary Oct. 21st.

REUCHLIN.—Ermentrout.

Hilary, Saint, one of the most prominent Bishops of Gaul, and an earnest defender of the Gallican Church, was born about 403. Elected against his wishes Bishop of Arles, 429, he quit the monastic life to assume his new duties. In connection with the clergy of his diocese, he practised the rules of a strict asceticism. To redeem captive Gauls from the hands of the Germans, he cheerfully gave up the costly ornaments of his church. He was a terror to evil-doers, as the Governor of Arles experienced to his cost, whom he publicly reprimanded in church for his unjust judgments. In his official capacity he came into collision with Leo I., on account of the deposition of Bishop Chelidonius (444), but had to succumb to the veneration in which the Pope was held. Died in 449. He was celebrated for his fiery eloquence, his erudition, and literary zeal. Of his writings there remain only, 1) vita S. Honorati Arelatensis episcopi, together with a letter to Eucherius, Bishop of Lyon (reprinted by Surius, ad 16 Jan.), in the Bollandist Collect., Tom. II., fol. 11, in the Max. bibl. PP., T. VIII., fol., 1228, and in the edit. by Salinas; 2) a metrum in Genesin, written about 429, and reaching from Creation to the Deluge (reprinted in the works of Hilary of Poitiers). There is also ascribed to him a poem, de providentia, generally counted in among the poems of Prosper. See Bähr, christlich-römische Literatur, I. Abtheil., p. 34; 2. Abth., p. 338.

KLING.—Ermentrout.

Hilary, of Poitiers (Pictavium), born, as is most probable, towards the close of 3d cent., in that diocese of Gaul whose metropolis was Burdigala (Bordeaux), shone a star of the first magnitude in the dark sky of the Church of 4th cent. As a representative of the Western Church, he was no unworthy successor of Tertullian, Cyprian, and Irenæus. It would not be an easy task to find his equal in point of subtilty of spirit, depth of thought, acuteness of mind, and thoroughness of theological culture. A devoted student of the Scriptures, his was not a traditional orthodoxy; and, though he moved in the element of the Church, he yielded not himself to mere party. Nor did the tenderness of his disposition keep him from defending the assailed rights of truth and the Church. Of his early life little is known. His parents were heathen, and it was only in manhood that he, together with his wife and daughter Apra, joined the Church. In the year 350 we find him Bishop of his native place.—The sky of the ecclesiastical world was now deeply overcast. Arianism began to spread extensively over the Occident. His resolute opposition to its doctrines brought upon him the imperial censure of Cæsar Julianus and Constantius, who banished him to Phrygia, which swarmed with Arians. His activity kept pace with his persecutions. In 358 he addressed to the Gallican bishops his treatise on the faith of the Orientals, and, during the time between 359 and 361, composed 12 books on the Trinity (ll. XII. de trin.). At the Synod of Ariminum (Rimini), he effected a union between the Gallic bishops and the Homousians in opposition to the Arians. His urgent desire, however, for a public discussion was not gratified. A second letter (360) to Constantius, caused his banishment from Constantinople, and withdrawal to Gaul. Later, he directed his energies against the errors that swept over Italy. His opposition to Bishop Auxentius, of Milan, the influential advocate of Arianism at the imperial court, brought about his banishment from the city. As an exegete, he copied Origen, and paid more attention to the development of theology from Scripture than to its historico-grammatical sense. Of his two commentaries, that on Matthew and that on Psalms, the latter is the more important. Of this, Jerome said: in quo opere imitatus Originem nonnulla etiam de suo addidit.—To define his position in brief, it may be said that, whilst on the one hand he made it a point to determine the relation between Church and State, he, on the other, energetically resisted errors that tended to subvert the foundations of religion. He was, in all respects, a worthy contemporary of Athanasius. To do him full justice, however, it is necessary to take some notice of his theology as contained in the 12 books on the Trinity, which, as Möhler has shown in his Athanasius II. 165, are characterized by exegetical tact and thoroughness, by comprehensiveness of plan, and fullness of detail.—By faith Hilary apprehended the infinite grandeur of God, as made known in the Old Test., and the Incarnation, as made known in the New. Looking upon the pretension of a finite being to perfect wisdom as a vain conceit, he held that the knowledge of God could only be had through God, and that what He revealed must be believed. He disdained to measure the Divine by the limited rule of the human. Thus armed, he drew his pen against the rationalism of the Arian heresy. Nor did he forget to insist on the unity of the Church, whose inward strength heresies served to develop, while they deepened and enlarged the scientific understanding of her doctrines.—In considering his views, we pass by those points which had not yet engaged the attention of theologians, and confine our remarks to such as were under discussion, viz., the Trinity, and the relations that obtained between Father and Son.—As regards the Son, the main thing was the determination of His essential oneness and equality with the Father. Generation being the communication of being, the Father, who begets, would not be Father, did he not recognize His essence in the Son. The Son, likewise, knows Himself in the Father in whom He reaches the full understanding of Himself. (Comp. Dorner, die Lehre v. d. Person Christi, I., 900). This oneness, however, does not destroy, in either case, the distinction—a distinction which by no means involves a division of the Divine Being. The Son—the Father's image—is another person, but not distinct in essence from Him. Nor can that which was in the beginning, and with God and God, be a mere word or sound, but must be a being; hence the Word, by which everything was created, must be the eternal Son. Thus reasoned Hilary. We subjoin a few specimens of his exegesis. The words: My Father, My Son, The only-begotten, denote the Sonship and Divinity of the Lord (Romans 5 : 10; compare 8 : 14, 15). That He possessed the power of God, shows the equality of being (John 5 : 18), which also grows out of the equality of life (John 5 : 26). His doing all the Father does (verse 19), proves their oneness; and, as by generation He has in Himself all that is in the Father, His work is the work of the Father (John 10). Both are one God, because both have in them one Divine essence (10 : 30). See also 14 : 9; comp. v. 10. A mere oneness of will is disproved by 14 : 9; 10 : 30. Nor can the analogy in 17 : 20 be adduced in proof of it, as the unity of Christians is a result of regeneration, of which the oneness of Father and Son is the type. The glorifying of the Father through the Son is a counterpart to the prayer of Christ for His glorification, John 17 : 1; so that the Arians cannot make use of this passage in support of their system.—In the department of Christology, Hilary felt bound to maintain the distinctive properties of the Divine and human in Christ and the unity of His Person, against Ebionitism, Sabellianism, Patripassianism, and other kindred errors which in one way or another did violence to these relations. He carefully distinguished between the Divine and human in the production of the incarnation. His fundamental thought was, that He himself was the causal principle of both His soul and body. The heavenly essence of the soul not being tainted with earthy matter, he denied the transmission of it from Adam, and affirmed its creation by the Logos. The Son or Spirit of God is also the Creator of the body. Nor was Mary simply the foster-mother of a child, the germ of which had been put in her from without. For, the Holy Ghost (the Logos) assumed the earthy material of the body of Mary whom He had sanctified. Thus it was our Saviour received His body from the Virgin; by His own power, not by human conception.—Touching the unity of Person, Hilary taught that, though the Son in assuming nature emptied Himself (evacuatio) of His glory, that is to say, concealed or veiled its splendor, in order that the finite nature of man might gradually be attuned to it (temperat), and glorified by it, He did not cease to be the Son of God. As He, by this evacuatio, rendered Himself susceptible, as it were, to a union with human nature, so was the soul of man, in virtue of its heavenly character, capable of elevation to such a union. And as the Holy Ghost, by His cleansing influence over the body of Mary, disposed or qualified the earthy matter for conjunction with Christ, His body, though like ours in substance, was endowed with different properties—properties, however, which glorified saints shall also be made to possess. He also held that subjection to the ills and sufferings of mortal life was not a necessity of His nature, but an act of His will. Regarding His whole earthly existence as an act of the will, he could refer this also to His Divinity, and thus secured the unity of His Person.—Though his firm belief in a real incarnation, and the actual death of our Lord, kept him free from Doceticism proper, yet, by abridging the growth of Christ's manhood through the too rapid glorification of it by His Divinity, by allowing it, at too early a date, an unlimited knowledge, and by not recognizing a free human will in Him, he would seem to have been somewhat tinged by this peculiar heresy. He makes mention of three births as having found place in Christ. The first was the eternal, out of or from the Father; the second occurred in the Incarnation; and the third, beginning with the resurrection, ended in His complete glorification by which human nature is transformed into the eternal substance. In Him, inasmuch as one flesh is rescued from all weakness and corruption, humanity as a whole is complete. Christ is in the Father by Divine birth, we in Him by His bodily birth, He in us by the Sacraments. In virtue of His assumption of flesh out of Mary, the body of the whole race is sanctified with Him. In us exists the germ of all He did; in Him we died and rose again; in Him humanity sitteth at the right hand of God the Father; in Him the nations behold their own resurrection and glorification.—H.'s doctrine of the work of redemption corresponds thus to that of the person of Christ.—His view of the final causality of the incarnation is worthy of special notice. Its possibility he finds in the fact that the Son, who created the soul an image of Himself, is the primitive type of it, and so stands from the start, ere time was, in intimate relationship to it; and its absolute necessity in the fact that the idea of humanity is complete only in the glorified God-man. His writings are a seed-bed of rich, fruitful ideas, the power of which is felt even in our day, and the thinkers of our time need not be ashamed to learn wisdom from his lips. — He died, most probably, in 368.

Literature: Walchii, bibliotheca patrist.; Schöemann, biblioth. hist. lit. patrum latinorum; Neander, Church Hist.; Möhler, Athanasius II., 33; Dorner, Entwickl.-gesch. v. Pers. Christi., 1037, in which are answered all the objections advanced by Gieseler (Ecol. Hist.), and Dr. Baur (die christl. Lehre v. d. Dreieinigkeit), 681. KLING.—Krmentrout.

Hilary, Deacon of the Romish Church, about 380. According to Jerome, he composed a treatise—lost, however—in vindication of the Luciferian schism (comp. Art. Lucifer v. Cagliari), and against the validity of heretical baptism. Ascribed to him is the Commentary on 13 Epistles of Paul, known by the name Ambrosiaster (comp. Art. Ambrosiast.), and the questiones veteris et novi Testamenti, to be found in Augustine's works, Benedictine edition, in Appendix, f. III. Comp. Richard Simon, histoire critique des principaux commentateurs du N. T., p. 132.

S. — Ermentrout.

Hilarus, Bishop of Rome 461–468, successor of Leo I., a Sardinian by birth, and legate of Leo at the Robber-Synod of Ephesus, 449; obtained for himself a claim upon the papal chair by his rigid adherence to the Metropolitan system, opposition to annual Provincial Synods, and mercenary pastors, and by his erection and decoration of oratories.

S. — Ermentrout.

Hillel, Rabbi, called "the aged," by way of distinction, one of the most celebrated doctors of Jewish Law, lived from 110 B. C., to 10 A. D. Little is known of his private life, the tales usually assumed for its various incidents being assumed. He was born in Babylon, of David's family. His parents were poor, and he was compelled, even after he went to Jerusalem, to labor for his livelihood. His brother Hezekiah, also very learned, presided over a school in Babylon; another brother, Schabbana, became wealthy in Jerusalem, and despised Hillel. In his 40th year H. went to Jerusalem to learn the law under Shamai and Abtalion, laboring as a porter by day to support his family and attend lectures at night. One winter's day he failed to earn enough to pay for admission to the lecture, and took a seat on the window outside where he could hear the speaker; his attention became so absorbed that he became unconscious through the severe cold, and was found there in the morning half dead, and great exertions were necessary to restore him. This perseverance secured him, thereafter, a free admission. Such was his zeal in study, that he not only became learned in the law, but acquired a knowledge of languages and other sciences, so that the Talmud (Tract. Juchasin, p. 55) says of him, hyperbolically, that he understood all languages, as well as the speech of valleys, hills, and mountains, of trees and plants, and even of demons. In 30 B. C., he became president of the Sanhedrim (see Art.). During the greater part of his term Schammai (Jos. Antt., XIV., 9, 4) was associated with him. It seems strange that Jos. does not name Hillel, but it is probable that Pollion (Antt., XV., 1, 1; 10, 4) is Hillel. Hillel and Schammai differed so much in disposition (H. being mild, and considerate of circumstances; S. severe, and rigid in literal adherence to the law) that it was natural for them to disagree in their expositions of the law, but they never became antagonistic. Their disciples, however, carried their zeal to physical violence. The Bath-Kol (see Art.) decided the contest in favor of the Hillelians; hence later rabbins mostly adhere to H., whilst the Caraites follow S. In his official capacity H. was moderate, paid regard to circumstances, and zealously promoted temporal reforms (Bartolocci, II., 791, &c.). Thus he introduced the perusbol, an agreement on the part of a debtor to yield his claim to release in the sabbatical year (Deut. 15 : 1, &c., Talm. tract. Schebiith, c. 10; Rabe, Mishna, I., 142. Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col., 1806, sq.). In all these things H. did not seek to evade the law, but to put such constructions upon it as its true spirit justified in the circumstances; and it is not at all probable that Jesus had these reforms of H. in view, in Matt. 5 : 17, though he may have meant to condemn extreme applications of these, by H.'s disciples.—(See Bartolocci, Biblioth. Rabbin., II., 783–96. Wolf, Biblioth. Hebr., II., 824–28. Geiger, Commentat. de Hillel et Schammai in Ugolini Thes. Antiqq. sacrr., Vol. XXI., Col. MCLXXXI–MCCXII. Ottónis, Hist. doct. Misnicorum, in Ugolini, l. c. Col. MCXXXIII., sq. Ottónis, Lex. Rabbin., 276. Jost, Gesch. d. Isr., &c., I., 157. Erach and Gruber, sect. II., Bd. 8, p. 450, &c. Fürst, Literaturgesch. d. Juden in Asien, I., 11. Biesenthal, Hillel d. Aeltere, in the Blätter für Israel's Gegenwart, &c., III., 65, &c. Literaturbl. d. Orients, 1848, No. 43, 44, 46; 1849, No. 10, 15, 21, 27, 34, 35, 37, 38).

A descendent of H. in the 10th generation (upon Gamaliel, see Art.) was Rabbi Hillel, surnamed "the Prince" (i. e., pres. of the Sanh.), in the 4th century. He is supposed to be the Ḥallāḡ, named by Epiph. adv. Hær., II., 127, edition Paris, as converted to Christianity shortly before his death. The Jews say the Sanhedrim, and the laying on of hands, in consecration of the doctors of the law, ceased after his death. He rendered service to Jewish chronology (see Era). — (See Bartolocci, l. c., II., 797–802. Wolf, l. c., II., 829). ARNOLD.

Himerius, B. of Tarragona, Spain, known by a letter addressed to him by Siricius, B. of Rome (385–398), in which S. arrogates supreme eccl. authority, and seeks by flattery to gain H.'s consent to his pretensions (see Siricius. HARD., Concil., T. I., 848. J. A. CRAMER, in Bossuet, IV., 597). S.*

Hincmar, Archbishop of Rheims, an ecclesiastical statesman, who vindicated the rights of the national Church, and his See, with wisdom and skill, sometimes passionately and arrogantly, was born c. 809. He was reared and educated by Hilduin, the learned Abbot of St. Denys, and followed him in his exile to Saxony. Subsequently H. returned, became canon of St. Denys, and gained the favor of Lewis the Pious, who employed him to restore discipline in the monastery. In 845 H. became Archb., and distinguished himself by completing the cathedral of Rheims, by his participation in the predestinarian controversy (see Gottschalk) of that period, and by his maintenance of the rights of his Prince against papal assumptions. Hincmar adopted semipelagian views, and succeeded in having his opinions confirmed by the Synod of Chiersy, 853 (Mansi, Concilior. nova et ampliss. Coll., XIV., 920). He was thus brought into a violent contest with Remigius, Archbishop of Lyons, whom the Synod of Valencia sustained by adopting the doctrines of a double predestination. Soon after this H. and R. were reconciled, and H. wrote the lost Libb., III., De prædest. Dei et libero arbitrio, and then his, still extant, Posterior de prædest. Dei et libero arbitrio diss., in Hincm. Opp. ed. Sirmond.: Paris, 1645, T. I.). — H.'s energy in resisting papal assumptions appears in his letter to Hadrian II. (see Art.). His life was one of agitation. Even his latter years were disturbed by the invasions of the Normans, which compelled his retirement to the forest regions beyond the Marne. He died 882 in Epernay, whither he had transferred his See. — (See W. F. Gess, Merkwürdigk. aus d. Leben, &c., Hincmars: Gött., 1806). NEUDECKER.*

Hincmar of Laon, the nephew, by his mother, of Hincmar of Rheims, by whom he was reared and educated, and through whom he became B. of Laon in 858. For a time they stood in friendly relations; but the nephew having caught the restless and arrogant spirit of his uncle, soon rose up against his authority as he had against Rome's. He had, without his uncle's consent, accepted an abbey from Charles the Bald, which lay out of his province, and often visited it, thus disregarding his metropolitan, and violating Church order. This caused a breach between himself and his uncle, which was widened by his constant opposition to the Archb., by harboring clergymen whom H. of R. had excommunicated, and other exasperating measures. To frequent citations to appear before Synods he paid no attention, and he even threatened Charles the Bald, who would not tolerate his violent seizure of another benefice, that he would join Lothaire. Thereupon Charles deprived him of his abbey and the revenue of his See. H. retaliated by placing his diocese under an interdict, (869) which, however, the Archbishop immediately annulled.

Being now cited to appear before a provincial Synod, he appealed to Pope Hadrian II. (see Art.). He was imprisoned, but liberated again after an earnest reproof. Soon he became involved in fresh disputes with the Archb., and declining to appear before a provincial Synod, appealed again to the Pope. But in spite of this appeal, his uncle and the King preferred charges against him for insubordination, and other offences, and the Synod of Douziacum deposed him (see Mansi, l.c., XVI., 569). Charles had him imprisoned. When Pope John VIII. was in France, 878, he allowed H. to go untrammelled. He died in 882. — (See Schäfer, Kirchengesch., XXII., 176, &c.). NEUDECKER.*

Hippolytus.—In order to ascertain the facts in the life of Hippolytus, we must set aside the legendary and confused accounts of a later age, and confine ourselves to the oldest sources, which belong to the 4th and 5th cent. (see an estimate in the traditions in Döllinger's Hipp. and Callistus: Ratisb., 1853. Eusebius (Ch. II. 6, 20, 22) is the first to mention him; he calls him Bishop, but is ignorant of his See. From works which he attributes to him, he places him in the age of Alex. Severus. Several works excepted, Jerome (Cat. vir. illustr., 61) knows nothing more of him. The Roman Church honored him as martyr, and commemorated his burial on August 13th. Prudentius (about 400) narrates in his Hymnós, περί εὐσεβίου, the circumstances of his martyrdom. He was brought before the tribunal at Portus, near Rome. Having belonged to the Novatian party, he repents in view of death his part in the schism, and exhorts his adherents to return to the Cath. Church. Hereupon he is condemned, with bitter allusion to the mythical Hippolytus, to be dragged to death by horses.—Prudentius had seen the subterranean chapel in which the corpse of the saint was buried. It was beautifully decorated, and furnished with a painting of his death. There existed, therefore, a tradition of this kind; but strong doubts may be entertained whether it did not originate in the well-known myth (Döllinger, 58). But that a saint, who, according to the poet, was one of the most honored at Rome, was by a mere empty fiction converted into a schismatic, is not to be imagined: here, then, there must be a historical fact. Tradition, in order to account for his canonization by the Rom. Church, may have added his conversion before his death.—We should obtain the most reliable information concerning the life and position of Hippolytus, if a work belonged to him, the first book of which was formerly already known by the name of φιλοσοφούμενα; and of which seven others, from the 4th to the 10th, were discovered in 1842 in Greece, and in 1851 published with the other by E. Miller, under the title Ὀριγένους φιλοσοφούμενα ἢ κατὰ παλαιῶν μοσείων ἔλεγχος, at Oxford. Style, method and thought, indicate that Origen was not the author. Baur (Theol. Jahrb., 1853) has attributed them to the presbyter Caius (see Art.). But this supposition is based upon the remark of Photius, that Caius had written a work, περί τῆς τοῦ παντός οὐσίας, which the author of the ἔλεγχος, B. 10, calls his own. But Photius asserts the authorship of Caius, not from the book itself, t merely from a marginal note of a copyist. 1 that we know of Caius from Eusebius (Ch. 2, 25; 3, 28) is against the supposition. He had written a work against the Montanists; the other author dismisses them with the remark, that it was not worth the pains to describe them. Irenæus had very peculiar opinions of Cerinthus, and would not, setting these aside, have merely copied the account of Irenæus, as was done by the other; one of these opinions was, that Cerinthus was the author of the Apocalypse, which the other ascribed to John.—On the other hand, there are weighty reasons which lead to the conclusion that Hippolytus was the author of the work. In 1551 a statue was dug up in the locality of the chapel of H., which represents him as sitting upon a θρόνος, upon the back of which was a catalogue of his works, in which is found the book περί τοῦ πατρὸς. But if this work belongs to H., it necessarily follows that the εὐχὴ also belongs to him. This is further proven from the contents of the εὐχὴ taken in connection with the remark of Prudentius, that H. belonged to the Novatian party: for the book shows that the author was at variance with the ruling party at Rome on account of Novatian principles. Photius himself indirectly confirms this supposition. He describes (Cod., 121) a small work of H., which seems to have briefly treated of the same heresies, which are treated of more at large in the εὐχὴ. But in the preface to the same the author says that he had written a polemical work of similar design but more compendious. These reasons, to which others might be added (see Jacobi's papers in the deutsch. Zeitschr. für christl. Wissensch. u. christl. Leb., 1851, No. 25; 1853, No. 24), have led most investigators of the subject to conclude in favor of H. (DUNKER, in d. Gött. gel. Anzeig., 1851; BUNSEN, Hipp. and his age, 4 vols.: Lond., 1852; GIESELER, Stud. u. Krit., 1853; RITSCHL, theol. Jahrb. v. Baur u. Zeller, 1854; DÖLLINGER, l. c.).—From these premises his life would seem to be somewhat as follows. He was born in the second half of the 2d century, probably in the West: he had listened, as he remarks in the shorter polemical work (Phot. Cod., 121), to Irenæus, and hence had probably visited him at Lyons. At the beginning of the 3d cent. we find him at Rome as presbyter, and highly honored for his learning and activity. He participated with much earnestness in the moral and doctrinal affairs of the Church; and, as one of the most prolific authors of the West, helped to direct its movements. The violent paschover controversies under Victor were previous to the age of his maturity, but he afterwards asserted the custom contended for by Victor. With the successors of the latter, Zephyrinus and Callistus, he differed on important points of discipline and doctrine. With many, at that time, very rigid principles were entertained, not without the influence of Montanism, with regard to the treatment of the lapsi; and since the persecutions of Sept. Severus and Caracalla had led many to deny their faith, the question at Rome also had become an urgent one. The principles subsequently represented by Novatian and his party, that the Church should be pure, and exclude those guilty of mortal sins, became current. H. approved of them, whilst Callistus then already followed the milder course afterwards adopted by Rome. Another point of dispute was the marriage of the clergy, in which H. was less liberal than Callistus. But the special point of difference between them was a doctrinal one. Zephyrinus and Callistus favored the patripassian doctrine; to which, whilst the doctrine of the Trinity was yet undefined, many, especially in the West, were inclined. According to H., Callistus regarded the divine in Christ as God the Father. Hippolytus, on the contrary, defended the subordination theory of the Trinity, which was at the time the most prevalent one. If he charged his opponents with the Noëtian heresy, they called him and his party ditheists, since they worshipped a second God in the hypostatical and subordinated logos. Amid these conflicts H. was also furnished with weapons by the earlier life of Callistus; for although he may have given too strong a coloring to his representations, yet it cannot be supposed that his charges against Callistus were wholly unfounded.—Before the open rupture Hippolytus was evidently one of the most influential members of the Rom. clergy. In the εὐχὴ, written after the separation, he describes himself as a successor of the apostles, participant in the ἀρχιεπισκοπή and doctrine, and a watchman of the Church; which seems to indicate that he was bishop. But where was his See? The tradition which is followed by Prudentius, says at Portus, near Rome: for he evidently means to say, that after Rome had been satiated with blood, the judges went to Portus in order there to continue the persecution. Nothing justifies the hypothesis that Roman Christians, and Hippolytus among them, were dragged to Portus to be condemned there. Nor is the objection of weight, that Portus was an insignificant place, and was not until the 4th cent. erected into a bishopric: for from our scanty accounts nothing certain can be said concerning the size of Portus. And besides, in that age there were many rural bishops located in small towns. And even if it could be proven that no Roman Bishop lived there before the 4th cent., it would still be not improbable that a schismatic party might have formed a Church there under a Bishop: for that Novatianism was spreading in the vicinity of Rome, is evident from the epistles of Cornelius and Cyprian. We might then conclude Hippolytus to have been Bishop of Portus, which would solve more than one difficulty, if the εὐχὴ, the authentic testimony, were not unfavorable to this. For according to it, Hippolytus evidently stood at Rome itself, at the head of a party opposed by Callistus; and it would be unaccountable in him to leave his party to itself and retire to such a narrow field as Portus. Nor does he give the least intimation of this. The most natural conclusion then is, that at the time when he wrote the book he was yet at Rome. To solve the difficulties by making him, as is done by Bunsen, presbyter at Rome and Bishop of Portus, would conflict with the ecclesiastical custom of the 3d century.—If according to this he was Bishop at Rome, it is certainly remarkable that a movement so closely allied to the Novatian controversy should find no mention in existing courses; and that neither Jerome nor Prudentius should have known aught of his episcopate at Rome. But the testimony of the ἡγζος cannot be invalidated by this circumstance. — Of the later years of the life of H. we derive an incident from an old catalogue of Rom. Bishops, which says: Pontianus, ann. V., m. II., d. VII., Fuit temporibus Alexandria, a cons. Pompejani et Peligniani (231). Eo tempore Pontianus episcopus et Yppolitus presbyter exiles sunt deportati in Sardinia in insula nociva Severo et Quintino cons. (235). In eadem insula discinctus, IV., kl. Octobr. et loco ejus ordinatus est Antheros, XI., kl. Dec. cons. ss. (235). If the Hippolytus here mentioned was the same with our Hippolytus, we learn from it that he was banished to Sardinia, but nothing more. The reading discinctus est seems to be corrupt, since it gives no meaning: it was most probably defunctus est. But if the author had been acquainted with the death of Hippolytus, he would most likely have mentioned it also. Like others, Hippolytus also may have returned from Sardinia, which would agree very well with the account of Prudentius concerning his death, if this account were only more probable. — With Irenæus, his teacher, Hippolytus shares a practical character, the general method and degree of cultivation, and many specific ideas. He is calm, unimpassioned, simple; of much erudition, well versed in the works of the philosophers; and although without a speculative talent, yet not without acuteness in the comparison of philosophical and heretical ideas. His opposition to philosophy is almost as severe as that of Tertullian, although in the development of his system he uses many definitions; which leads us to suppose that he would have criticised it more mildly, if the enemies of the Church had not made use of it. The leading ideas of his system are the following. The absolute God, conditioned by nothing external to himself, who is existence in its strictest sense, conceived within himself the Logos; who, included within him, was the sum of the ideas actualized by the creation; distinct from the reason of the Father, but not ignorant of it, and taking up within himself the will of the Father. He came forth from the Father to a separate existence, and as the first-born became the agent of the creation, forming on the command of the Father everything according to the divine ideas. The elements of existence are fire and spirit, water and earth. The angels and stars he formed of fire and spirit: man, as the lord of the world, he composed of all the elements. Since man was compounded and not simple, he was subject to dissolution, i. e., death. God could, if he had so willed, have made him divine and immortal, like his Son: but man was by obedience to make himself worthy of an immortal and divine existence. God gave him a free will, without which he would have been a servant, not a lord. But in this, also, lay his capability to do evil; for God is good and created man good, and the evil would not have been, if man by his own act had not produced it. The law was given to him as a bridle and spur, and his training, by means of it, was directed through all ages by the Logos. Moses and other righteous and godly men gave an honorable and righteous law, and prophesied of the future. Through them the Logos, by the command of God, desired to bring man back to obedience, not by force enslaving him, but by a free abedience. But in the last times the Father sent the Logos himself, in order that he might not speak by a dark prophetic word, but by a visible manifestation. He received a body from the virgin; a common human nature, but in received originality. He passed through every age of humanity that he might be a law for every age, hold up to all his humanity as the aim of their labors, and show that God created nothing evil. If his humanity had not been the same as our own, he would in vain have required us to follow him. For this reason he endured fatigue, hunger, thirst, and sleep, did not resist suffering, yielded unto death, brought immortality to light, and in everything gave an example in his own humanity, that we might not despair in sufferings, but expect the same for ourselves. Through his doctrine and the ordinance, to wash man of sin in baptism, Christ by his divine power renews our old man according to his image. We must, however, know ourselves by knowing God our creator; for whoever knows himself and worships God, is known of him. Whoever follows the love of Christ, attains unto immortality for body and soul, the kingdom of heaven, communion with God, the heritage of Christ, and freedom from passions and sufferings. He is made a god unto the honor of God; but heathens and heretics are cast into the fiery lake, whither the light and the voice of the Logos never penetrates; and where the avenging angel of the abyss ever threatens them. — Of the works of Hippolytus the ἡγζος is to us the most important. Its design is to combat heresy, especially that of Gnosticism. Like Irenæus and Tertullian, only more extensively and in detail, Hippolytus shows the organic connection between the heathen philosophies and Gnosticism. He thinks that the pride of the Gnostics can be humbled only when it is shown to them that the pretentious revelations of their mysteries are to be found, and even with greater truth, in heathenism. With him no other refutation of heresy is needed than to trace it thus to its source. He therefore uses but few arguments from the received orthodoxy, but is content with the portrayal of heathen and heretical theories, and concludes with a brief sketch of his own system. This setting aside of his own reflections makes his portrayal of heresies all the more valuable. It consists, also, mostly of excerpts from Gnostic literature, which he could gather at Rome better than at most other places. No little of what belongs to this department we learn only from him, and thus obtain a desirable complement to the other reports. The first four books treat of heathenism. The first, named, by himself perhaps, φιλοσοφούμενα, gives a sketch of the philosophies. Those of the Greeks are classified as the physical, ethical, and dialectical. These are followed by the Indian and Druid doctrines, and by an extract from the theogony of Hesiod. The second and third books are lost. The fourth describes the Chal-

se wisdom, viz., astrology, the art of taking the horoscope, the meaning and influence of the constellations, especially of the signs of the zodiac upon those born under them, the art of magic and its means, etc., and thus gives us a deep view of the morals of the age. After this are given some statements from pagan metaphysics, especially of the Egyptians; extracts from the astronomical poem of Aratus, and finally the Pythagorean doctrine of numbers, with a reference to the influence which they had upon the heretics. In the fifth book he turns directly to the heretics. He begins with the Gnostics, who take up the entire book. Here we become thoroughly acquainted with the various kinds of them; such as the Naassenes, Cerinthians, Sethians, Justin the Gnostic, etc. In the sixth book follows the sect of Simonians; after which, in order to pass over to the Valentinian doctrines, he describes those of Pythagoras as their chief source. Very important for a proper development of this school is his remark that it was divided into an Italian and Oriental branch, and that the latter was more docetic in the doctrine of the person of Christ than the former. The seventh book commences with the system of Basilides, of which he gives an entirely new account (see Art. Basilides. Also G. Uhlhorn, das Basilid. Syst.: Götting., 1855). Among the other Gnostic systems described in this book, the account of the Marcionite system alone gives us new information. Among the Gnostics enumerated in the 8th book, he gives information of a party previously unknown to us, which are related to the Valentinians, and called by him docetics. He also treats in it of Monimos the Arab, Hermogenes, the Quartodecimans, and Montanists. In the ninth book he describes the heresy which had affected him most, and which he therefore controverts with an overrated importance and passionateness, viz., the Patripassians. He compares their doctrine with that of Heraclitus, concerning whom he furnishes us with several new and important fragments. Concerning the Patripassian doctrine and its derivation from Noëtus, he was among the ancients already the chief source. But more important than this is his account of events in the Rom. Church, which throws an unlooked-for light upon the condition of the Rom. Church, and the development of its doctrine. What he says concerning the connection of the Elkesaites with Rome is also worthy of consideration, on account of their relation to other Ebionite phenomena. He concludes with a description of the Jews. In the tenth book he furnishes for the sake of convenience a summary of the 1st and 5th to the ninth book, and concludes with a confession of his faith. Since this abbreviated form was more convenient, and the interest in the ancient heresies became diminished, this latter book was the more frequently consulted. This helped also to render the entire work less known.—The period in which the whole work was written, seems to have been about 234.—Under the name of a homily against Noëtus a fragment was published by L. Holstenius, which has been regarded as a part of the work against heresies. It is evident, however, that it is no part of the ἀντιπρὸς, though it may be by the same author. Eusebius (Ch. II., 5, 28) furnishes from the work of an unmentioned author against the Artemonites a fragment, which has been attributed to Hippolytus, though apparently without convincing reasons. So, also, the work κατὰ Εὐρωτος καὶ Ἡλίου seems to belong to a later theology.—Jerome mentions a work on anti-Christ, which is perhaps the same as that published by Guidius in 1661. Another fragment, mentioned in the codex, περὶ τοῦ πατρὸς πρὸς Πλάτωνα, was very probably the conclusion of the book περὶ τῆς τοῦ πατρὸς οὐσίας. The statue also bears the title of a work, προτρεπτικὸς πρὸς Σεβήριον, probably the same with the letter πρὸς βασιλῖδα τινά, mentioned by Theodoret. The seat of the statue bears, moreover, the paschal cyclis of sixteen years calculated by Hippolytus in the 1st year of Al. Severus, and the titles of a number of doctrinal, historical, exegetical, and homiletical works, which have perished. The work named περὶ χαρισμάτων ἀποστολικῆς παράδοσις was evidently not written by him in its present form. Jerome also mentions a number of commentaries to Old Test. books, and one on the Apocalypse.—(See BUNSEN, Hippolytus, &c.; CAVE, Script. eccles., I., 48. Ed. of J. A. Fabricius, Hamb., 1718, 2 tom. fol. For his life and writings, C. G. HANELL, de Hippolyto: Götting., 1838. E. F. KIMMEL, de Hippol. vit. et script.: Jena, 1839; SEINECKE, üb. Leb. u. Schrift. des H. in Illgens Zeitschr. für hist. Theol., 1842, 3d number. ASSEMANNI, Biblioth. Oriental., III., I. Also the works already mentioned).

JACOBI. — Reinecke.

Hiram, originally the name of a Phœnician deity (Mover's Phœniz., I., 505). The Phœn. form is Hirom (cf. 1 Kings 5: 1, 2, 7; 7: 40), the Hebrew Hiram or Huram (2 Chron. 2: 3), the Greek Εἰρώμος (Jos. c. Ap. 1, 17, &c.), Εἰρώμος (ANTT. 8, 2, 6), Χιράμ (LXX.), Σιρώμος (Herod. 7, 98; SYKELL, p. 343), and even Σούρων (Eupolem. in EUSEB. præp. ev. 9, 34). In the Bible we meet it as the name of a king of Tyre, a friend of David and Solomon. Josephus (l. c.) reports that he succeeded his father, Abibaal, and reached the age of 53 years; having reigned from 1023–990 (1033–999, Ewald; or 980–947, Mover's l. c.). Under him Tyre reached its highest prosperity. He engaged in magnificent architectural projects, both for the defence of the country and embellishment of temples. He built new temples for Heracles-Melcart and Astarte, and adorned that of Zeus-Baalshamim with such splendor that Herod. (2, 44) speaks of it with admiration, and which later Phœn. traditions partly refer to Solomon's gratitude for Hiram's assistance in the erection of the temple at Jerusalem (Eupolem. et Theophil. ap. Euseb. l. c.). He also endeavored to give increased stability to his kingdom, re-subdued the Chittim (Cyprians), and managed to secure the political superiority which Tyre had recently acquired. David's successful wars had promoted Phœnicia's prosperity by securing to it an extensive trade. Sustaining amicable relations with Israel, which remained undisturbed through Solomon's reign, there was a free commercial intercourse between the nations (2 Sam.

5:11; 1 Chron. 14:1. The seeming chronological difficulty in Samuel's account is relieved by remembering that he groups classes of events with less regard to time. (1 Kings 5:15, 21). In Solomon's fourth year (Hiram's 11th, 1 Kings 6:1; Jos. Antt. 8, 3, 1) he began the building of the temple, and entered into a contract with H. for materials and workmen (1 Kings 5:15, &c.; 2 Chron. 2:1, &c.). H. sent him a skilful artificer, who did the ornamental work for the edifice. His name was likewise Hiram, the son of a Tyrian brass founder, who had married an Isr. widow of the tribe of Dan (1 Kings 7:13, &c.; 2 Chron. 2:12, &c.; 4:16. See Bertheau on these texts, p. 253, &c.) For these services Sol. paid H. a fixed amount of staple products (2 Chron. 2:9; 1 Kings 5:25). H. also loaned S. money, for which 20 cities of Galilee were ceded to him (1 Kings 9:10, &c.). During this period they united in commercial enterprises (see Ophir). Phoen. tradition further reports (Jos. c. Ap. 1, 17) a correspondence between S. and H., in which S. proposed riddles which Hiram could not solve, and so had to pay a large sum of money as a forfeit. At length a Phoen. sage outwitted S., and won back the money which H. had lost. Solomon is said to have married a daughter of Hiram; but this must have been in his later years (Chaetius et Menand. ap. Tatian. or c. Græc. § 37; Clem. Al. Strom. I., § 114; 1 Kings 11:1, 5). H. was succeeded by his son, Baalazar. His sepulchre is still pointed out at Tyre (ROBINSON, Pal.).—Toward the close of the Chald.-Babyl. empire, there reigned in Tyre a Hiram II., 551–532 B. C., Jos. c. Ap. 1, 21), not mentioned in the Bible.—(See EWALD, Gesch. Isr. iii., 1, pp. 28, 83. MOYER'S, ii., 1, p. 326, &c., 466, &c.). RÜTSCHI.*

Hita (Juan Ruiz de), a Spanish priest and poet, who composed his poems during a threatened imprisonment by the Archbishop of Toledo, in consequence of slanderous accusations. From his poems, we learn that he was born at Guadalajara or Alcalá de Henares (c. 1300–1310). Clarus ascribes eminent talent to him, for his age, and Wolf places his poems on a parallel with Don Quixote. He designed his poems to be a mirror of the arts and perils of carnal love, combined wit with earnestness, and abounded in allegories.—(See L. CLARUS, Span. Literatur im Mittelalter, Mainz 1846, I., 398–427.)

TH. PHESEL.*

Hittites, a Canaanite nation, dwelling in that country in Abraham's time (Gen. 10:15; 15:20), and holding the district around Hebron, where Abraham bought ground from them (Gen. 23:3–15). In Isaac's time they were still in the S. of Palestine. After Israel's return from Egypt, they occupied the hill-country with the Amorites, as far as Bethel (Numb. 13:30; Judges 1:26). The Israelites subdued them, but did not exterminate them (Judges 3:5; 1 Kings 10:29); they even had petty kings, but tributary to Solomon (2 Kings 7:6; 1 Kings 9:20). They seem to have taken advantage of the disturbances under Saul, already, to re-establish a small kingdom, near Syria, which subsequently strove to become independent (2 Kings 7:6). There they maintained themselves until after the exile. At times they and the Amorites are named for Canaanites in general (Josh. 1:4; Ezek. 16:3, 45).

VAININGER.*

Hivites, a Canaanite nation, first named in Jacob's time, when they held Sichem in central Palestine (Gen. 10:17; 34:2). When the Israelites took Canaan, the people of Gibeon were called Hivites (Josh. 9:7; 11:19). Another portion of them dwelt on the north side of Hermon (Josh. 11:3) and around Lebanon (Judges 3:3). As no Hivite king is mentioned, it has been inferred that they had a republican-aristocratic form of government (cf. Josh. 9:12. EWALD, Isr. Gesch., I., 283, 286). Those abiding in the south came under Hebrew dominion and embraced the Jewish religion (2 Sam. 21:1, 4; Josh. 9:21, 27), and even became absorbed in that nation. Those in the north maintained themselves in cities near Tyre, at the time of the kings.

VAININGER.*

Hobah, a Syrian town north of Damascus, whither Abraham pursued Chedorlaomer and his confederates (Gen. 14:15). During the earlier Christian period there was still a village of that name north of Damascus, inhabited by Ebionites, who observed Jewish customs.

VAININGER.*

Holland, historical and statistical.—Under the Spanish-Hapsburg dynasty, 17 Netherland provinces were united. Of these only eight belonged to Holland proper; viz.: Holland, Zeeland, Utrecht, Guelders, Zutphen, Groningen, Friesland, and Up. Yssel: the others were Belgic. During the entire 15th cent., which produced such distinguished Reformers before the Reformation in the Netherlands, these countries were approaching towards a Reformation. The influence exerted by Geert Groote (born 1340), of the Fratres Communis Vitæ, the Beghards and Lollards, of men like John v. Wesel is well known. On a soil so well prepared, and amid a people so generally educated,¹ the Reformation was naturally received with great favor. The commercial connections of the people, and the foreign merchants settled among them, as also the hired soldiery, were of no little importance for the spread of the Reformation (see Strada, de bello Belg., T. 1, 76.) The Flemish nobles, who studied in great numbers at Geneva, brought Calvinism into the country, which was soon deeply penetrated with reformatory ideas. Charles V. did not remain inactive. In March, 1520, he published the first of his barbarous edicts, which were followed by many others. The last of them appeared in 1550 (see GACHARD, Corresp. de Phil. II., Brux., 1848, T. I., p. 105–6). As their first victims, Henry Voes and John Esch were burnt at Brussels, July 2, 1523. Soon, of course, anabaptist tendencies mingled with the religious movement, which at first also had a tint of Lutheranism. Later, however, the Protestantism of the country bore a decidedly Calvinistic character.² The influence of the English exiles during the reign of Mary Tudor, as also of the Reformed churches of France, must be regarded by no means slight. — Notwithstanding his error, Charles V. had to confess at the end of his life that his efforts to check the growth of heresy in the Netherlands had been in vain. Calvinists and Reformed are from this time the common names of the Protestants in the country. In the southern provinces Calvinism met with its earliest favor and spread. Its headquarters at first were Flanders, Hennegau, Artois, and the provinces bordering on France. From hence it spread, under the influence of distinguished Calvinist theologians and statesmen, to Holland, Zeeland, and other countries, through the auspices of the Calvinist preacher Marnix v. St. Aldegonde, a Calvinist Flemish noble, the celebrated "Compromise" was effected. A Walloon preacher, Guido de Bres, in company with several others, composed the "confessio Belgica" the basis of the French "confession de foi" (see art. Belg. Conf.). In the prefatory apology, the number of Netherland Reformed is already estimated at 100,000. This confession was received in 1561, and sent to Philip II. On the basis of it, the first Netherland Synod was assembled at Teu: it was adopted formally as the Netherland confession by the Antwerp Synod in 1566. The Church of the Netherlands thus entered the ranks of the other Protestant churches. The congregations constituted themselves thoroughly on Calvinist principles, with pastors, elders, and deacons, under the supervision of presbyteries, and of provincial synods; which latter were also constituted in the South, in Tournay and Armantiers. Characteristic of the spirit of these churches is resolution 2d of the Synod of Tournay (1563), which says: "Qu'on vive le conseil de ceux de Genève." The most comprehensive church constitution of this age contained in the articles of the Synod of Antwerp of May 1, 1564 (see Hist. and Royaards, Nederl. Arch. voor Kerk. Gesch., 1849, IX., 141). — When the Calvinists had become the predominant party in the Netherlands, they stood opposed to their enemies in complete organization. In many large cities they had a senate and a kind of lower house, composing the consistory, which latter was subject to that of Antwerp, the chief fortress of the Reformation. They formed in their totality an independent Reformed republic. Unwavering in their principles, they made not the least concession towards Lutheranism; on which account, however, they lost the sympathy and aid of the German Lutheran princes, who in 1567 interceded with Margaret, though vainly, for the few Lutherans. — The government and Roman clergy made the most strenuous efforts to suppress the growing heresy. Extreme severity was not spared, and in 1567 the restoration of the old order was entrusted to the Duke of Alba and his executioners. Discoveries in the archives of Madrid and Simancas will hereafter permit no faithful historian to conceal or defend the odious measures of the duke or his sublime master. The excesses of the anabaptist iconoclasts injured, it is true, the Reformation considerably; but the latter had as little connection with these fanatics as with the executed nobles, Egmont and Honore. — The correspondence and documents published by Gachard and Groen v. Prinsterer dispel many a poetic nimbus which has obscured the circumstances of that age. Egmont stood in political connections with Orange; the latter was the head of the Calvinist party, for which the former had not the least sympathy. After William's removal, he passed with his troops, in excessive loyalty to the king, through the country, abolishing the consistories everywhere, and restoring the Roman worship. Having thus lost the confidence of his former political friends, he at last gained only his execution. After the victorious regent had fearfully decimated the Reformed through her remorseless dragoons (see Prescott's Philip II., pp. 138–9), Philip adopted extreme measures for the suppression of the disturbances and heresies. Fearful is the formal edict of Feb. 16, 1568, by which the Spanish inquisition declared all the Netherlands, with few exceptions, as heretics, apostates, or abettors of heresy, and therefore guilty of high treason. The king thus devoted thousands of his subjects to the axe, and could allow himself to represent as pardoned all those whom he suffered to live. After he had uttered the words "heresy and insurrection," Alba regarded himself at liberty to employ the most revolting proscriptions, degradations, confiscations, punishments, and tortures (Groen v. Prinsterer, Arch. de la maison d'Orange, T. III., p. ix.). Even the dead were not spared. How deeply the feelings of the people revolted against such measures, appears, among other things, from the popular songs of the times, such as the Gentsch Vaderonze (Ghent Lord's Prayer), the song of the pastor of Lierre, called Arent Dirckz Vos; an inscription for a statue to Alba, preserved in MS. in the Bibliothèque de Bourgogne, etc. Under this heavy cross the fresh life of the Reformed congregations in the South was prostrated, though we still find traces of it. Dec. 27, 1572, there was a meeting of the Classis of Brabant, the resolutions of which are of interest in showing that the congregations were distinguished as French and Flemish: the two, however, formed a common Classis. Nevertheless the heavy blows of Alba succeeded in scattering a large portion of the Netherland Reformed, and in driving them out of the country. They again reunited and organized in Germany and East-Friesland, along the Rhine and in the Palatinate, and held the important synods of Wesel (1568) and Emden (1572). We cannot here prosecute further the fluctuations of the struggle between the liberties of the Netherlands and the political and religious yoke of Spain. The northern provinces, under the sublime guidance of Orange, with their admirable hosts of naval Gueux, their undaunted and self-sacrificing devotion to their faith, their heroic cities,—such as Haarlem and Leyden,—came out of the struggle as victors; their reward was ecclesiastical and political greatness: whilst the southern provinces, through the machinations of the Catholic nobility and the enmity of the Walloons to the Dutch, were again reduced beneath the yoke of absolutism. From 1578, especially since the

¹ See Cornejo, Sumario de las guerras civ. de Flandra. Fr. transl., pp. 8, 10. Guicciardini, who lived more than 40 years in the Netherlands, says that there was scarcely a peasant who could not read.

² Calvinismus omnium pene corda occupavit. Viglius v. Zuichem to J. Hopper. See Kpp. ad Hopp. ep. 34.

Utrecht Union of 1579, by which Holland, Zeeland, Guelders, Zutphen, Utrecht, the territory of Gröningen and city, Friesland, Up. Yssel, and Drenthe declared their independence of Spain, the exiles gradually returned to their homes. Holland and Zeeland had already held their first Synod of Dort (1574), by which the Articles of Emden were repeated and completed, the clergy obligated unto obedience to their Classes, and the elders and deacons called upon to subscribe the confession of faith and the constitution. — Meantime, this strictly Reformed Church, which, in spite of oppression, had arisen and organized itself independent of the State, was soon to experience that even on the part of the Protestants its liberties would not be respected. The first Synod of Dort already produced conflicts with the government. During the 7th decade, it was designed to establish a kind of government consistorium over the Church. In 1575, the Prince of Orange, as governor of Holland and Zeeland, was even required, in opposition to the formerly adopted constitution of the Netherland Church, to recognize no consistories except those appointed or sanctioned by the town councils or states. The free Reformed churches, become suspicious during their persecution of state power, were not disposed to surrender the autonomy of the Church. Differences could not fail to take place, especially since Erastianism had numerous advocates among lukewarm members, the magistracy, and jurists. — Thus it happened that the provincial states really arrogated to themselves the government of the Church. In 1576 there appeared, under the authority of the Prince of Orange, a church constitution in 40 articles, in which, indeed, the office of pastor, elders, and deacons were recognized as according to Scripture, and church-discipline by the pastors and elders admitted; but in which, also, the most important points of the independent presbyterial constitution were wanting. The secular government, with the advice of the clergy, was to exercise authority over the Church. The right of a Christian government to issue enactments for the Church was thoroughly and acutely canvassed; and it was hinted that it was dangerous that two kinds of government should exist in one and the same community! The magistrate was to appoint the clergy; the elders to be nominated by the government. The local order of worship was to be determined by the magistrate, with the advice of the clergyman; only in the lower grades of discipline the congregation is allowed to act with freedom; the final decision rests with the magistrate. Synodical autonomy is set aside almost entirely. Such a constitution could only exasperate in the highest degree the strict Reformed members of the Netherland Church, who desired ecclesiastical freedom. — An effort was therefore made at the second Synod of Dort (first national Synod of the Netherlands) to achieve the Calvinistic presbyterial and synodical constitution, with complete ecclesiastical autonomy. A national Synod was to be held triennially. These resolutions were, of course, opposed by the secular authorities. When the next triennial national Synod was to be held, the States General were requested to send deputies in order to settle existing disputes, and to effect a constitution for the Church of the country. The proposition was declined; whereupon the Synod at Middleburg, 1581, arranged matters so as to divide the Church of the country into provincial synods and the provinces into classes. The right of the government to appoint pastors, elders, and deacons was denied. In 1581, the Prince of Orange appointed a committee to revise this resolution, which elaborated a scheme that however, it could not carry out, since William died in 1584, by the hand of an assassin. It seemed, then, as if no general constitution for the entire Church of the Netherlands could be formed. Hence another course was adopted — that of a provincial organization of the Church. Its congregational organization remained predominantly presbyterial, though modified according to provincial circumstances. — The National Synod of Dort (see art.), at the beginning of the 17th cent., formed an important factor in the history of the Reformed Church, both as regards doctrine and polity. It is known that the doctrine of grace was the subject of the controversy, and of the deepest interest. Not to repeat what has already been given in the articles Arminius and Gomar, we mention only that the former parties here again enter into conflict, although under other names. Politically, they were divided into the state party and provincial party, or political Gueux and Genevan Gueux. The latter asserted that the existing religious controversy could be settled by a national synod alone: the former, with men like Uitenbogaart and Hugo Grotius, wished the government to settle it. A thorough exposition of this opinion is given by the former in his tract (publ. 1610): "Trakt. van het ambt en cener hooge christelyke overkeid in kerkelyke zaken." But the authorities in favor of this opinion were by no means a majority; and in whatever towns the state-churchmen became too prominent, the Reformed began, in 1616, to separate from the Remonstrants. In consequence of these increasing separations, the call for a General Synod became constantly more urgent. The strict Reformed and free-church party became at last so powerful, that even the States-General thought it advisable to favor a General Synod. Pastors and elders were now elected by the provincial synods, and all the foreign Reformed churches were invited by the States-General to send deputies. — The Ref. Church of Holland, at the beginning of the 17th cent., occupied without doubt the most prominent position among her sisters. Whilst the leading men of the other Reformed churches had died, the theologians of Holland exceeded all others in learning and acuteness. Breiting, the artistes of Zurich, says: "At the Synod of Dort there are so many men distinguished for talent, learning, and piety, so much knowledge of the fathers, the Scriptures, and even of our Helvetic Confession and literature, that I cannot imagine whence they know all this." In Holland, therefore, the important and penetrating question was brought to such a profound and sharp discussion and decision. As in the questions of predestination and polity, so also, in a bird respect, there were opposite parties. The strict churchmen adhered closely to the symbolical books as a Scriptural norm, especially to the Belgic Confession and the Heidelberg Catechism: they were therefore deeply outraged, when others desired to change many things in these books, which had been hallowed by the blood of thousands of martyrs. The state-church party and Arminians complained of compulsion in symbols, in which latter they saw only human authority. Thus the questions concerning election, polity, and the authority of symbols were interwoven. As regards the first point, it is known that the Synod of Dort rejected Arminianism most decidedly. On account of the great importance of the articles of Dort, they must be described more closely. The first article treats of the Divine predestination, which is, "the eternal and immutable purpose of God, by which, before the foundation of the world, he has chosen, according to his own good will, and of mere grace, from the entire race fallen in sin through its own guilt, a certain number, not better than the others, to salvation in Christ, whom he has also predestinated from eternity to be the mediator and head of all the elect, and to be the foundation of salvation,"¹ and has thus given the same to him to be saved, and effectually to call and draw them to communion with him through the word and his spirit, to incline them with true faith, to justify, sanctify, powerfully to defend, and finally to glorify them: all this to the glory of his grace." — The basis of election is not an already existing faith, or any other good quality; but it is in order unto faith. The rejectio errorum consists of nine points. — The second article treats of the death of Christ and redemption: articles three and four of human depravity and conversion. We reject the error that original sin does not in itself condemn; that Adam never possessed the spiritual gift of righteousness, and hence never lost it; that the will has never become depraved, but only darkened and impeded, and can choose freely as soon as the impediment is removed: that man is not dead in sin, and deprived of all power to do good: that he can thus use that common grace which remained to him even after the fall, as to attain in this way unto saving grace: that in conversion no new qualities and gifts are infused by God into the will: that faith is no infused gift, but only an act of man: that grace is merely a moral suasion: that in it God did not employ his omnipotence, and that man could resist and defeat God's design to convert: that grace and free will are partial and co-operating causes of conversion. The fifth article treats of the "perseverance of the saints." Whom God, according to his eternal counsel, has called and converted, him he delivers from the dominion of sin, though not wholly from the flesh. Hence there are daily sins of infirmity, which cleave even to the best works of the saints, but incite them to humility and sanctification. Left to their own power, they could not stand and persevere in grace: God, however, defends them powerfully unto the end. Although this power is greater than the strength of the rebellious flesh, and can never be set aside by it, yet the converted are not always so guided by God, that they cannot through their own fault turn away in particular acts from the force of grace; hence they must watch and pray, and if they forget this, they may be drawn by Satan, God permitting it, into grievous sins, as was David and Peter. These grievous sins offend God deeply, interrupt the exercise of faith, and at times take from us temporarily the consciousness of grace, until after sincere repentance the face of God again shines upon us. For God, according to his immutable purpose of grace, never takes the Holy Spirit from us entirely, nor suffers us so to fall from grace, that we could commit the mortal sin against the Holy Ghost, and plunge into eternal damnation. He maintains in us the germ of regeneration, renews us without fail to true repentance and faith, to the renewed consciousness of grace and zeal in sanctification. All this is due merely to the grace of God, not to ourselves. The elect can be sure of this protection and perseverance in the faith in the ratio of the measure of their faith; not indeed by a special revelation, but by believing the promises of God in his word, by zeal in good works. — These are the celebrated five articles of the Synod of Dort, which undoubtedly correctly and faithfully represent the existing opposites which here came into collision, and at the same time exposes the rottenness of the Arminian system, with all its destructive consequences. With the same determination with which it defined the doctrine, the Netherland Reformed Church also carried it out within its bounds. Discipline was enforced without respect of person against those who would not adopt the orthodox doctrine as defined. The Synod thus assisted not only in the development of the Reformed peculiarity, but also in giving a specific character to the Netherland Church. Even yet, in spite of many events and fluctuations, the Dort spirit is to be felt in Holland, just as the Dort articles are still a symbol of the Netherland Reformed Church.

After the departure of the foreign deputies the Synod held 27 sessions, which had reference to the church affairs of the Netherlands, especially the obligation to adopt the confession. May 13–14, 1619, the question of church polity was settled. The constitution of the Synod of the Hague of 1586 was taken as a basis, and confirmed in all essential points. Here again the States-General opposed a general constitution, and refused their sanction to the one legally adopted by the Synod. Only Utrecht and Guelders adopted it, though with some modifications. After the Dort National Synod only provincial synods were held. Accordingly each province formed its own constitution at pleasure, so that from 1619–1775 there are really seven church constitutions in the Netherlands. There was, however, an organic link in the deputies which the provincial synods sent to each other. Zee-land excepted, the synodical organization was generally prevalent; in the congregations the presbyterial organization was general, for only in a few of them either the deacons or elders were wanting. The latter were elected by the congregations, generally, for two years. At the head of the congregation stood the Church council, which met every week, and had a local magistrate as one of its members. The Classical assemblies consisted of the preachers and one elder from each of the congregations. The Classis sent a committee of two or three preachers annually to visit the congregations. The provincial Synod consisted of deputies from the classes. But it can be held only with the consent of the States-General, from which it must receive two commissaries as members. For every two preachers there is one elder. — If we look at the religious life of this period, we find the Dort spirit everywhere carried out in doctrine and morals. Besides the high-schools at Leyden, Franeker, and Gröningen, academies and Athenæa, with theological chairs, were founded. Thus arose the academies of Utrecht and Harderwyk, and the Amenæa of Deventer and Amsterdam. The labors of these schools were mostly directed to the biblical and accurate portrayal, development, and defence of the established doctrine of the Reformed Church. The doctors of theology regarded themselves as strictly bound to the exclusive service of the Church and her orthodox doctrine. We would, however, do these men great injustice if we, on this account, lessened or even denied their immense service to theological science. Even exegesis, though somewhat too much in the service of dogmatics, became for the age very flourishing. This is proven by the labors of Rivetus, Louis de Dieu, Drusius, Amesius, Schottanus, and Gomarus. They were also distinguished philologists. The Dutch translation of the Scriptures (of 1637), which is still an ornament of the Dutch Reformed Church, and even now occupies a most honorable position among all the translations of the Scriptures, is also a proof of the earnest and profound study of the Scriptures, their language and antiquities, as they flourished at the time in the Netherlands. The Synod of Dort has also the merit of setting on foot this excellent work. We may here also mention Grotius, however little the Reformed Church can be satisfied with his doctrinal tendency. Especially brilliant is the series of doctrinal theologians which the Dutch Church possessed at this time. Here we must again mention Gomarus and Rivetus. The labors of Maresius, Makosius, Amevius, and Alting give them a very honorable position among the first theologians of the Ref. Church, and the evangelical church in general. But the most distinguished of the Dutch theologians of the 16th century was Voetius, born in 1589, professor at Utrecht, and the most powerful defender of the orthodox doctrine (see Art.). Cocceius (see Art.) introduced a method opposite to the scholastic one. This method, which certainly seemed to ignore the established orthodoxy, and especially its very important form, the novelty of the matter, as also the connection of the school of Cocceius with the hated and, on account of its natural theology and other general principles, certainly very suspicious, Cartesian philosophy, excited the profoundest suspicions of the scholastic-orthodox theologians. Tedious controversies arose: but since both parties stood upon the foundation of the same Church and faith, they could not fail in the end to recognize each other as members of the same Church, and not only tolerate, but also esteem each other (see Arts. Cart. philos. and Cocceius). About 1736 the controversy became extinct. Through it, rich and various energies were applied to the service of the Church, which ended in a blessing to the Reformed communion. Theological science owes to Cocceius not only a series of excellent works, especially in exegesis and biblical theology, but also such men as H. Witsius, Bermann, Van Till, and Vitringa. With his disciples he accomplished an extensive awakening of religious life, the effects of which were felt far beyond the limits of Holland. In his footsteps followed Jodocus v. Lodenstein (1620–71), whose entire efforts were directed to the awakening of the Church to a new life by a true conversion and sanctification. Jean de la Badié, of course, advanced to a decided separation (see Art. Labadie, Lodenstein).—Various minor controversies arose during the times of the Voetian and Coccejan struggles. It would lead us too far, however, to enter upon these.—About the middle of the 18th cent. we notice not only the disappearance of the old parties, but also an increasing indifference with regard to the specific Reformed doctrine. A revolution was in progress which subsequently not only lost sight of the central doctrines, but even partially denied them. In Holland the same thing took place, as everywhere else at that time. What Klema (1775) taught concerning the intimate connection between the so-called free morality of man and the supernatural gifts of the grace of God, Le Sage ten Broek (1784) concerning the atoning efficacy of the suffering Christ, and Hammeisfeld concerning the purpose of Christ, justly deserves the name of “new light” given to it by the old orthodox Reformed Dutch. The exegetic-linguistic labors of Venemas († 1787) and Albertis († 1762), however, are deserving of praise. But a more and more decided opposition arose in the midst of the congregation, the more that unbelief was spreading, and Voltaire and Rousseau on the one side, and German rationalism on the other, were exerting a pernicious influence. The Reformed Dutch gave, during these days of apostasy, the brightest and most practical proofs of their attachment to the doctrine of the Church. During this time many noble institutions were established in defence of Christian truth, which even now are rich in blessing. We may mention here the institution of P. Stolp, at Leyden (1735), the Teyler Society, at Harlem (1778), the Hague Society, the object of all which was to publish distinguished works in defence of the fundamental truths of the Reformed faith, and of Christianity in general, against their successive enemies.—About the end of the century we find rationalism proper represented in Holland. Van Hemer advanced the Kantian principles concerning the “authority of reason in matters of faith.” Regenbogen is a rationalist of the Bretschneider kind. In exegesis, the tendencies of Bosveld made themselves felt. Van der Palm, Th. Pureau, and Van der Villigen, followed the same rationalistic course. In short, the “new light” sought

¹ Notice, the foundation of salvation, not of election.
VOL. II.—37

o penetrate everywhere, and during the first quarter of the 19th cent. attained to a truly dangerous influence.—Meantime the old constitution of the Dutch Church had perished beneath the fearful throes of the age. With the republic of the United Netherlands the work of the Synod of Dort crumbled. In consequence of the founding of the Batavian Republic the Church was separated from the State, and the position of the Reformed Church became very difficult, although it maintained itself in all its former essential features. When the kingdom of Holland was established under Louis Bonaparte, a new organization of the Church was attempted. A National Synod was to form its head. But this project was not executed, since the Netherlands were incorporated in 1810 with the French empire. The introduction of the organic articles was now thought of (1812), but no result was attained. When, in 1814, the Netherland government was restored, the constitution of the Church was again earnestly thought of. Everything had perished except the Classes. The State, favored by circumstances, at once assumed the government of the Church. Nevertheless, in 1816, a "General Government of the Reformed Church" was established, in which the congregations, Classes, provincial and national Synods, regained a large portion of their former rights. In fact, the Church of the country had for the first time found a united head in a National Synod, although considerable influence was still left to the government in the appointment of members of the ecclesiastical assemblies and boards. The constituent Synod of 1816 completed the work by an order for church supervision and discipline. A general synodical committee was appointed, which had to execute the resolutions of the Synod: this became, after 1827, a permanent committee of the General Synod to attend to current business, and consisted of seven members chosen by the king from fourteen persons proposed by the Synod. It possesses, however, no legislative authority, and can make no changes in the Church constitution. But although the Church was thus outwardly re-organized, its inward condition was still very deplorable. Unbelief had made sad havoc in the Dutch Church. As soon as the pernicious influence of the French had been broken, the rationalism of Paulus and Bretschneider gained ground among the Dutch theologians. The orthodox faith was also frequently preached in a dry and lifeless manner. The thoroughly-rationalized Mennonite community also exercised a pernicious influence upon the Dutch Church. A change made in the obligation subscribed by the preachers opened a wide door to license in preaching. All this, as also the existing latitudinarianism with regard to the Remonstrants who had advanced far towards Socinianism; the laxity of Church discipline; the rapid "Evangelical Songs" attached to the Psalms, publications such as the "Beiträge" of Donker Curtius; public offence, such as that given by P. W. Brouwer in his defence of Arianism and Sabellianism, soon stirred up an ecclesiastical opposition. Add to this the interference of the State in religious affairs sanctioned by the constitution of 1816, an interference so odious to the strict Reformed Dutch.—In March, 1816, the Classis of Amsterdam sent an address to the King, in which it complained that the new constitution of the Church was introduced, not by the Church, but by the King; that the influence of the Ministry of religious affairs was unjust and injurious; and that the power of the Synod was too great. The articles of Dort were repeatedly urged, and the necessity that they should be adhered to by the theologians. In the 2d decade the opposition had already become strong, and was increasing every year.—The head of this movement was the gifted Dutch author and poet, William Bilderdyk. He zealously urged the restoration of the old Dutch Church and her constitution. To him were joined his two pupils, Da Costa, the gifted poet, and Capadose, the physician, both converts from Judaism to the Reformed Church; Groen v. Prinsterer and Dyrk Molenaar, minister at the Hague. All these labored in the restoration of the old system. A work of the latter, "An address to my Reformed Brethren," in which he comes to the conclusion that the "Ref. Church is the Reformed Church no longer," was widely circulated, and produced an immense sensation.—The restoration was in full progress, when the Belgian insurrection gave it a check. But this was of short duration, for in 1832–33 the opposition became bolder and more active than ever. The motto now became: "Let us leave Babel, and build a new Church." In many places the people with enthusiasm joined the movement, and followed the orthodox preachers even to a secession from the Dutch Church. The chiefs of the movement were H. de Cock, H. P. Scholte, a pupil of Bilderdyk; A. Brummelkamp, J. van Reek, and H. T. Gezelle.—It may be granted that De Cock and Scholte sometimes went too far in the manner of their opposition; but it cannot be denied that the state of the Church fully justified them. The government interfered with the military measures of compulsion and various annoyances. In 1834 the subjects of this persecution separated from the Church, and a considerable number of their members followed them. But a royal edict of June 5, 1836, ended these vexations, and opened the way to religious liberty.—From this time we find scattered throughout all Holland a Ref. Church of the Netherlands separated from the establishment. It has simply placed itself again, both in organization and doctrine, upon the ancient basis of the Dutch Church, and exercises an earnest discipline. It cannot be denied that in these seceding congregations there is much life, a decidedly Reformed spirit, and an astonishing liberality. Although thousands of these seceders have emigrated to America, their number is nevertheless still increasing. Their churches are much frequented by the awakened and active members of the establishment.—Da Costa, Groen van Prinsterer, de Clercq, and Capadose, with many others, although they shared the opinions of the seceders, remained nevertheless in the establishment, since they rejected the principle of secession, and maintained that the Church must be restored within the Church. The flourishing Society of Christian Friends, 1845–48, also rendered distinguished services by means of periodical and other literature, and by practical enterprises of Christian charity. They also appealed to the congregations and the Synod to reinstate the Reformed Confession to its ancient rights, and to apply Church discipline in doctrine and life, especially against the pastors. To their efforts especially it is due that the Synod of 1841 restrained laxness in matters of doctrine by an unequivocal explanation of the obligation to be subscribed upon entering the pastoral office. But this did not yet content them. The opposition was continued, and gained in activity, when two rationalist pastors were called to parishes at Amsterdam and the Hague. In consequence of these circumstances the Synod of 1854 felt itself compelled to give to the obligation of ministerial candidates a shape more positive and more favorable to the Reformed Confession. But even by this the wishes of the faithful church members cannot be completely satisfied; for though progress has been made in this highly important matter, the question of the symbols has not yet been brought to a satisfactory solution. The struggle of parties is, therefore, actively continued. The tendencies and doctrines of the so-called "Gröningen school," and other neologies are especially opposed by the decided adherents of the Ref. Church and doctrine. The leaders of this school are, Professors Hofstede, de Groot and Pareau. Their principles are given in their leading features in the Encyclop. Theol. Christ. in schol. usum breviter delin. a Hofst. de Groot et Pareau, ed. 3, 1851; also the "Compend. dogmat. et apologet." by the same authors, edit. III., 1848.—The theological and scientific importance of these works has been much overrated. They are imbued with Socinianism and Rationalism, sometimes tinged with the system of Schleiermacher, and wanting in doctrinal definiteness and scientific precision. All the essential doctrines of Christianity are either altered or entirely ignored. Christ is to be the centre of this system; and yet this Gröningen Christ is after all nothing more than a human individual, only somewhat more divine than other men. He is the educator of his race, sent to deliver man from the guardianship of the Old Test. law, and to lead him to his majority. Even the superhuman in this Christ cannot, from the premises of the system, be sincerely meant. The admitted pre-existence of Christ is utterly untenable in the form here given. From the premises the redemption of Christ must necessarily in the Gröningen system have a meaning and intention entirely different from that given in the Scriptures and the doctrine of the Church. He is no mediator and surety, who atones for our sins and secures for us pardon and righteousness. The theory of redemption here offered is a mere rationalistic evasion. The Holy Spirit is a mere divine power or life, which God imparts to man. From this it is evident that the Gröningen school has given up the common faith of Christendom in the Holy Trinity and the fact of redemption; as also the doctrine of grace as held by the Prot. Church of the 16th cent., and particularly of the Ref.

Church. "Reason and freedom take the place of faith; and everything is good and holy, which arises from these two forces" (Chantepie de la Saussaye, pastor at Leyden, to the Evang. Alliance at Paris, 1855). Prof. Scholten at Leyden, whose chief work is his Dogmatics of the Ref. Church according to their sources (3d ed., 1855, 2 vols.), has much higher claims to the respect of scientific theologians. He manifests earnestness and depth, and an earnest desire to do justice to the Ref. theory, to comprehend it in its depths, and to portray, maintain, and advance it in its peculiarities. There are points in Scholten's system, also, which cannot be defended with the symbols of the Ref. Church: for which reason orthodox men are not satisfied with it, and even charge it with Pantheism. Among younger theologians, however, the Leyden school has many adherents; its aim is to do justice to both the Ref. orthodoxy and to the freedom of science, and to reconcile them.—The theological faculty at Utrecht is more historical and conservative. It numbers among its adherents the larger portion of the older clergy.—If we survey the sphere of the modern Dutch Church, we must come to the sad conviction that here also unbelief and neology have left many wounds. But nowhere in the Evang. Church can we find so much fidelity to evangelical doctrine, such soothing charity, churchly firmness, and knowledge of saving doctrine, especially among the people—who formed, after all, the main pillar of defence against unbelief—as in the Reformed Church of Holland. With great and self-sacrificing zeal various energies were here mustered to rebuild the broken walls of Zion. And although we cannot find in societies either a substitute for the Church or a dispensation to restore it, yet the rich life with which they enfold their labors in Holland gives us the hope that the nearest future of the Dutch Ref. Church will be richly blessed of Christ.—Among the Christian societies which arose at the beginning of the present struggles we may mention the Bible Society and the Society for Heathen Missions; each of them numbering some 8000 contributing members and an annual revenue of some 90,000 florins. The anniversaries enjoy the most lively sympathy of the people. The Bible Society distributes yearly some 30,000 Bibles and New Testaments. One of the noblest of their achievements is the Japanese version of the S. Scriptures. Deserving of all praise are also the "Tract Society," the "Society for the Moral Improvement of Prisoners," the "Society for Public or General Beneficence," a number of local societies for purposes of home missions, which are all related to the "Netherlands Evangelical Society." Throughout the country there are "prayer-unions" for the conversion of the Jews. There is also a "Society in defence of the doctrine and rights of the Netherlands Ref. Church," with auxiliaries in various towns. The immense efforts of Romanism in Holland gave rise to various societies to furnish material aid to the Reformed citizens and merchants, who were threatened with the financial manœuvres of the Jesuits; whilst the "Society for the Spread of Truth and Piety among Catho-

ics" contended with spiritual weapons. In most recent times we find an auxiliary of the Gustavus-Adolphus Society. Deacons, Institutes, Houses of Refuge, Sunday-schools, Young Men's Societies, Unions for reading the Bible, &c., fill up the list of charitable institutions.—The question of organization has been considerably advanced since the storms of 1848. The result thus far has been, that a Church council, consisting of the pastors, elders, and deacons, all elected by the members, stands at the head of each congregation. The entire Church of the country is divided into 43 classes with 10 provincial districts. The classes meet yearly at the end of June, and consist of pastors and elders, the number of the latter never exceeding that of the former. The Classis appoints the members of the Provincial Classis. A standing committee of the Classis exercises a general supervision, holds visitations, enforces discipline, decides controversies, and can suspend pastors, candidates, elders, and deacons. In the place of the former provincial Synod there is now in each province a Provincial Board, consisting of as many pastors as the number of Classes in the province, with another pastor as secretary, and an elder to every two pastors. This Board has supervision over the Classis and its board, issues ecclesiastical ordinances for the provinces, can depose pastors, elders, &c., and examine candidates for the ministerial office. The legislative body, however, is the General Synod, which meets annually at the Hague. It consists of 10 pastors from each provincial Synod, whilst the Walloon Church, the Church of the E. and W. Indies, and that of Limburg, send one pastor each. The Provincial Board also sends three elders, and the theological faculties of Leyden, Utrecht, and Gröningen, each one representative.—The Dutch Ref. Church numbers 1,800,000 members in 272 congregations, with 1511 pastors.—The 17 Walloon churches have 25 pastors, and form an integral part of the Ref. Church of Holland. In the ten provinces of the Netherlands there are 13 Classes.—The independent Ref. Church of the Netherlands numbers from 50–70,000 members in 220 congregations and 30 Classes. It possesses one theological school at Kampen.—The Remonstrants number only about 5000 members in 27 congregations, with 25 pastors.—Lutheran congregations are found in the Netherlands at an early date. At present they number 55,000 members in 47 congregations, with 58 pastors. The Synod is the supreme authority. They have a theol. seminary at Amsterdam with two Professors. Near the end of the last century a portion of the Lutherans rose in opposition to Rationalism, and formed the so-called restored Lutheran Church, which still exists with 8 congregations, 11 pastors, and 1,000 members.—Of Mennonites there are 10,000 in 123 congregations, with 124 pastors. They are a genuine Netherland phenomenon, which is older than the Reformation, and cannot, therefore, be identified with the Protestantism of the 16th century. Chantepie de la Saussaye remarks concerning them: "The ecclesiastical and doctrinal principles of Calvinism find little favor among them. They are more attached to the mysticism of the middle ages, to the custom of free, religious unions. Their congregations, therefore, form no connected and organized Church. Formerly several Mennonite unions might be found in the same city. Since the beginning of the present century they have begun to enter upon a certain kind of connection with each other. They, therefore, possess no common creed, no Church organization, no bulwark against unbelief. They possess, however, a common seminary for the education of their clergy, and an executive board for some common external interests."

Besides the works already named, see Die Nederl. Ref. Kirche. Charakterisirende Mittheil. üb. ihren dormal. Zustand, von AUG. KÖHLER: Erlangen, 1856. The author has carefully investigated, in Holland itself, the condition of the Dutch Church, and is also conversant with modern Dutch theology.

SUDHOFF. — Reinecke.

Homerites, the Greek name for the Hamjarites, or the descendants of Hamjar, the son of Eber (the son of Saba or Sheba, Joktan's grandson. Cf. Gen. 10), to whom the true ancient South Arabians, in distinction from the Ishmaelites or mixed Arabians, trace their origin. These Homerites, whose dialect resembled the ancient Hebrew and Syrian more than the present Arabic, pressed from the interior to the west coast, and seized the country of the Sabæans and Catabani. There (the modern Yemen) they founded a kingdom which flourished over 500 years. Their kings were called Charibaël (prince of the sword), and their capital was Saphor (Dhafar, now in ruins). About 100 B. C., their kings embraced Judaism. Later, the commerce between a part of Arabia and the Roman Empire led Constantine to send to them Theophilus of Diu, with costly gifts, to procure the privilege of establishing among them a Christian church for the benefit of Roman merchants. The embassy was successful. The Hom. King himself was converted, and built three churches; one at Tharpar, then the chief city, another at the Roman port, Aden, the third at the Persian trading-place, Ormuz. But for the Jews, the whole nation would have become Christian. Early in the 6th cent., they again had a Jewish king, Dunnan, who caused Christian merchants to be murdered in retaliation for the sufferings of his brethren in the Roman empire. Elesbaan, King of Abyssinia, thereupon invaded the Hom. kingdom, dethroned Dunnan, and made Abraham, a Christian, his successor. But Abraham soon died, and Dunnan seized the throne, and became a still more bitter persecutor. About 4000 native Christians were burned or beheaded. Elesbaan again interfered (under Justinian), overthrew the old Hom. kingdom, established a Christian government, which thenceforth maintained itself until the Persians, and finally Mohammed, got possession of the country.—Although Theophilus was an Arian, the Hom. Church never embraced or adhered to Arianism, but under the Persian rule Monophysitism insinuated itself. Niebuhr heard of no Christians there, but of nearly 5000 Jewish families. In the 7th year after the Hegira, Mohammed sent a messenger to the Homerite king, who, with his subjects, embraced Islamism. The name of the Homerites has almost become extinct. TH. PRESSL.*

Homilarium, a collection of sermons for the whole church year, selected from the works of different Church Fathers, and arranged as a model collection for ministers, as a Church book, indeed, to be read by such as are not able to preach. The thought of providing such a collection belongs to the early part of the mediæval period; a time that was so barren of homiletic productivity, that it depended entirely upon the rich treasures of the Fathers. The best known work of this sort, by which the older and less available were superseded, is the homilarium of Charlemagne. Its title (we refer to Cologne ed. of 1530) gives us Alcuin as the collector (Homiliae seu maxis sermones sive conciones ad populum, præstantissimorum ecclesiae doctorum. Hieronymi, Augustini, Ambrosii, Gregorii, Origenis, Chrysostomi, Bedae, etc., in hunc ordinem digestae per Alcuinum levitam, idque injungente ei Carolo M. Rom. Imp. cui a sacretis fuit). From other information, however—and, indeed, according to the instruction which accompanied this work—it was Paulus Diaconus, who was commissioned by Charles to prepare it, “because among the horae, promiscuously selected from the Fathers, he found in use a great many that were badly written and badly chosen.” As it is not to be supposed that Charles, in a work which he deemed so important that he saw and examined every sheet as it was prepared, would not have availed himself of the services of Alcuin, so the two statements may be reconciled by the admission that both these men participated in the service. Alcuin, perhaps, was entrusted with the revision of the plan; and Paulus Diaconus carried it out. Or the very plausible opinion of Lentz may be preferred (Gesch. der Homil., 1, 215), that Alcuin, as he by the command of the Emperor, revised the comes (the Pericopen-Ordnung) of Jerome, by a change of the later publisher of the Homilarium, may have come to adopt the title of the last.—The work has obtained a further significance in addition to the immediate object contemplated, in this, that it has confirmed the pericopic arrangement founded and gradually established by Jerome, although since then, and even at the present time, differences of various kinds still present themselves.

PALMER. — Dr. Wolff.

Homiletics.—As this science will be duly discussed, as to its contents, in the article on Pulpit Eloquence, we shall here simply consider it in its formal aspect, the method of sermonizing, as it has been historically constructed. The term Homiletics, ὁμιλία (see Art. Homily), has only recently been adopted, as is the case, indeed, with other terms employed for particular departments of theological education, especially those that belong to practical theology. We meet with it first in the latter part of the 17th cent. and the beginning of the 18th. It was doubtless the case in the introduction of this term, as it was when it was adopted by Augustine and others, and again by Melancthon, and a succession of theorists who followed him, that pulpit oratory rested as yet upon the basis of classical rhetoric, and that it was only in the application of its rules, with the necessary modifications, that Homiletics, properly considered, were brought to view; whilst on the other hand, those who attached greater importance to the specific Christian stand-point, regarded the sermon more particularly from the pastoral point of view. For this reason, the science had no name of its own: sometimes it was found in the service of rhetoric, at others in that of pastoral theology. Its appearance, with insignia of its own, marks the time when the practical Christian intervened, dissatisfied with a theory that had become stark and stiff, demanded a more exalted activity in the pursuit of academic culture in the various spheres of the spiritual office, the Spener-Frankian period. Since that time there has been such a diversity of views respecting the sermon as a whole, its objects and significance, that new names have been sought both for it and the theory of preaching. Thus Stier for Homiletics would substitute Keryktic, and Sickel, Homilectic. But these new names remain the undisturbed property of their inventors, for the reason that they cannot express the thing, the object, ἡ οὐσία, but only an aspect of it, the design and operation. But the name we give to a science should indicate objectively the thing itself as it presents itself under every variety of view.

The sermon now, as one of the essential organic activities of the Church, requires in the first place, as do all others, a systematic discussion, so that the rules applicable to it be arranged in proper order, with a view to practical observance; and in this respect, Homiletics furnishes directions for preaching. But this already, if we are not to be controlled merely by the authority of distinguished precedents,—the common practice,—or an undue regard for details, must carry us back to fundamental principles, which lie deeper than customs, and ground themselves in the idea of the Church and Cultus; and for which history is no longer a collection of authorities, but as a whole, is the realization already before us of the idea, whilst each particular act of preaching is a realization of the same idea, completing itself in the present, as though in parts it commenced it. Thus the science of Homiletics has a side upon which it is clearly practical, and will admit of rules and directions entering into particulars. It is seldom that any writer has contented himself with merely unfolding the idea without reference to practical results (as, for instance, Marheineke's “Grundlegung der Homiletik,” 1811). And this practical side is by no means conditioned exclusively by the idea, but equally so by its actualization in history. From this it does not follow that every elaboration of the science must, as one of its parts, include the whole history of preaching, which, on account of the large store of material at hand, would only be possible as a compend (see Nitzsch, Pr. Theol., Th. II., 1, § 96. Baur, Homiletik, § 4, p. 20–68); besides, the academic lecture, unless it accompanies the lecture on the history of preaching in an independent way, cannot be dispensed with. But every treatise should at least clearly and distinctly show the connection of that which it demands of the preacher, with history and tradition in the curinuous life of the Church ; and must also make appear that the Homiletic does not cherish the unscientific as well as arrogant imagination that he must begin anew, as if all history was made up of absurdities and errors, which he has surmounted, and that, for this reason, his self-subsistence is not that silly negativeness which seeks to exhibit itself under the mask of Christian freedom from all that is called human ordinances.

As, now, it is only possible to construct a theory after the practice has, to a certain extent, been ascertained and adjusted, so preaching, as a particular form of church life and activity, must have been defined and cultivated by skilful hands before a theory of it could be expected to appear. We indeed already, in the first centuries, meet with detached observations upon Christian elocution, and they all agree in this : that it does not need the ornaments of heathen declamation ; so Clem. Al. Strom. 1, 4, 2, 1 ; Orig. hom., 7, in Jos. ; Cypr. ep. 2, ad Don. ; even Lactantius, who had a good deal of rhetoric himself, calls it, Inst., 3, 1, a divine order, ut simplex et nuda veritas esset luculentior, quia talis ornata per se est ; but, then, expressions of his kind have respect not so much to preaching in the congregation as to the missionary, catechetical, and apologetic exhibition of Christian truths in ordinary conversation and writing. At first, when the art of preaching had attained to its culminating point in the ancient Church, great attention was paid to the subject of art generally. It originated with two individuals, representing, as preachers, the highest grade of oratory—Chrysostom in the Greek, and Augustine in the Latin Church. The first, after showing by the example of Paul, in the 4th vol. of his work de sacerdotio, the necessity of eloquence for a minister, enters more fully into his subject in the 5th vol. ; but instead of a scientific theory, he merely furnishes, in a general way, practical directions ; and these, too, so as to show plainly, by his great regard for applause, instead of seeking to please God, that he man lived at a time when the sermon par took altogether too much of worldly eloquence, and, indeed, of the theatre. The subject is treated in a far more earnest spirit in Augustine's doctrina christiana. In this there is no method. After exhibiting the contents of the sermon, he shows that we should only exhibit that which we are able intelligibly to appropriate. But, then, the influence which Pagan rhetoric, in the hands of all those men who passed over from their schools into the Christian ministry, had upon the construction, is apparent also in Augustine. His theory betrays this connection far more than his practice. Although, in his "Confessions," he had said of this same rhetoric, victoriosam loquacitatem victus cupiditate vendebam, he still could not do without it in his theory of preaching. He recommends the study of it, especially to young men. He also clearly points out the distinction between sapientia and mere eloquentia, and gives the preference decidedly to the first. In this way, and still more in directing the attention to the best specimens of oratory contained in the sacred Scriptures, the elements of Pagan rhetoric are confined to proper limits. At the same time, both factors are only brought together and associated in an outward way, whilst on the other hand, a development of Christian rhetoric from the Christian and churchly life principle is not yet secured.

As, during the earlier mediæval period, there was but little productiveness in church sermonizing, and they lived upon the rich treasures of the Fathers, so they availed themselves of whatever was regarded as homiletic oratory, especially in Augustine, and with him in the rules of ancient rhetoric, as little as they corresponded with the tone and spirit of the preaching of that age. To this belongs what Isidore of Sevilla says of rhetoric in his Origines, l. II., and still more, the spirited discussions of Rabanus Maurus, in the third book of his Institutio Clericorum, where not merely the 19 chap. de rhetorica, and ch. 28–39 (quid debeat doctor catholicus in dicendo agere—quod facili locutione uti in vulgus debeat—de triplici genere locutionis, etc.), but also the previous chapters on the laws of scriptural interpretation, are considered. The book of Gregory the Gr., de cura pastorali, is also usually mentioned in the history of Homiletics. It is entitled to this honor solely on account of a few—very few—general rules which it contains, whilst the whole, true to its title, partakes far more of the pastoral, although partly of a casuistic character. The Synod of Tours, in 813, might also have been mentioned in the history of Homiletics, so far as it assigned to preachers the principal themes, quibus subjecti erudiantur, namely : de fide catholica, prout capere possint, de perpetua retributione bonorum et æterna damnatione malorum, de resurrectione quoque futura et ultimo judicio, et quibus operibus possit promereri beata vita, quibusve excludi.

The second half of the mediæval period evinces greater homiletic productiveness. Still, it is evident that it was only within the range of one of the homiletic tendencies of the age—the scholastic—that there was a disposition to treat the sermon theoretically ; the other preachers,—such popular speakers as Berthold, such mystics as Tauler and Suso, such reformatory spirits as Wickliffe,—they were far too much taken up with practical interests, and lived so much in their works, that they had no time to spare in any other direction. Besides, even the scholastics gave themselves no trouble to transfer their systematizing skill to this particular sphere. In the wake of a few obscure theorists (Alanus ab insulis † 1203, with his summa de arte prædicatoria, &c.), there appeared, under the firma of Thomas Aquinas, a tractatus solennis de arte et vero modo prædicandi ; which, however, not just on account of its late appearance in the second half of the 15th cent., but that the sermons of Thomas Aquinas, as we meet with them in his works, have no reference scarcely to the rules ascribed to him, its authenticity is more than doubtful. The compiler himself says, both in the commencement and conclusion, that the writings of other holy teachers were made use of in the work. Very soon after, 1503, Sur-gant's manuale curatorum was published, in which the modus prædicandi occupies a separate section; the more worthy of remark, as the author, who seems to belong, as to his personality, far more to the class of popular orators, commends the scholastic method of sermonizing as a necessary discipline and means of correcting the recklessness and confusion frequently met with. In Reuchlin's liber congestorum de arte prædicandi, which appeared only a year later, the classico-oratorical culture appeared again, after a long interval, in Homiletics, and that, too, in a way that, owing to Melanchthon, secured for it favor for a long time with the Homileticians in the evangelical Church, inasmuch as the classic rules were retained also for spiritual discourses; and on the other hand, by means of the loci communes, the ground-themes of all Christian preaching, there was secured to the matter of the sermon its proper right. For the rest, the ministers of that age gave less attention to such rules of art than to those which required less study. A work of this sort already was Bonaventura's biblia pauperum, a lexicon for preachers, furnishing historical material for such as were in need of it. The later works of this class show already by their titles, dormi secure, and other names, how convenient they meant to make it for preaching.

In the evangelical Church, with the regeneration of the sermon, reflection upon it,—the consciousness of what it then was, and was intended to accomplish, must be very clear. "Our office is now very different from what it was under the Pope; it is far more earnest and sincere, and accordingly costs us more labor," says Luther, at the close of the Preface to his smaller Catechism; and, for this reason, it was necessary for the fulfilment of its important duties that there should be suitable directions. Accordingly there is no want of scattered golden words for the sermon. They are collected in the Pastorale Lutheri, of Porta, 1586. Jerome Weller had already borrowed the greater part of his modus et ratio concionandi, 1562, from Luther. Also in later times there existed a number of such collections, referred to by Lentz in his history of Homiletics, and more recently in the works of E. Jonas, Luther's Pulpit Oratory, 1852. The zeal and earnestness of his successors are, however, shown more in the rich products of a particular form, than in actual improvement. They did as much avail themselves of Luther's choice words for the purpose of obtaining from them proper fruit and new seed, as of the connexion between rhetoric and pastoral teaching, which Melanchthon effected in his elementa rhetorices, in imitation of Reuchlin, and the still more brilliant and classical performance found in the ecclesiastes of Erasmus. That in this way the art of rhetoric for a time vacillated between the pagan Ciceronian rules, divisions, &c., and the Christian, devotional, pastoral standpoint, without being able to fix itself upon its proper ground and basis, has already been shown. It was, however, still worse that the externality of the whole theological tendency of the age directed itself to the sphere of preaching, and in fact extended its theory to really childish trifles and mere pedantry. It is really lamentable to think of the methodus concordantialis, methodus parallelitica, prosopopœia, and the dozen other names by which they were called, a knowledge and familiar handling of which made out and wrote the homiletic virtuosa, and of the "Leipziger, Wittenberg, and Holmstädt fashion," after which the sermon was made and measured. It was the purpose of many of these methods, that much of the matter taken from the old rhetoric, under the name of amplification, could be made use of that the preacher would need no fountain of thought within himself, but in a purely mechanical way could avail himself of material with which to fill up the empty frame of his discourse. Generally, the Homiletics of that period consisted simply in this, that the old categories of inventio, dispositio, elocutio, memoria, pronunciatio, actio, and farther, exordium, narratio, propositio, confirmatio, confutatio, peroratio, and indeed the genus didascalica, deliberativum, demonstrativum, were applied to the sermon, and regulated its construction: although Hyperius already was opposed to the last division, and preferred a genus didascalica elenctica, paedenticum, epanorthoticum, and paracleticum (consolatorium), similar to the five-fold usus which obtained at a later period in Homiletics. Essentially Val. Lœscher, in his breviarium oratoriae sacræ, 1715, which was opposed to pietistic homiletics, had not yet given up this mode of treatment. The minute care with which the preparation of a sermon, and the different possible modes of providing material, were carried into the most trifling detail, must really excite surprise; and yet it produces no other impression than that the sermon was the complex of a number of particular operations, an artificially-constructed machine, and not a fresh stream flowing from a living spring.

As clearly as the Spener school comprehended this view, they were nevertheless chiefly concerned in protesting against the ruling abuses, and practically to introduce another method. The theory developed itself with them at first in academical lectures. The most important work produced by them was Rambach's præcepta homiletica in 1736, which, however, as to the form and statement, partakes already of the influence of the Wolfian method. The Spener standpoint is most prominent in the prolegomena, where, alongside of the habilitas naturalis, a habilitas supernaturalis (§ 15, &c.), an unctio sp. s. is required, according to which, homines impii atque irregenerati non possunt habiles judicari ad munus oratoris sacri recte obeundum. The arrangement is simpler and much more superficial than that of the earlier divines. The intermediate link between the Spener and the rationalistic schools was Mosheim (Anweisung, erbaulich zu predigen," first published 10 years after his death, 1765). The distinction between enlightening the understanding by ideas and arguments, and the moving of the will and emotions, shows already that the wind was coming from another quarter. These formal indications of the business of the sermon, if even the expressions were not Spenerish, would still admit the thought of their being filled with Spenerish contents. But we are already upon the road, which led farther and farther astray from the positive doctrines of the Christian Church. And in the succeeding rationalistic period, there are in fact two principal thoughts to be distinguished: 1) the philanthropic Eudæmonism, which proposes to make man happy, to free him from prejudices, and to secure to him health, prosperity, &c. With this intention, Spalding's "Nutzbarkeit des Predigtamtes," 1772, Steinbart's Anweisung zur Amtsberedtsamkeit christlicher Lehrer, unter einem aufgeklärten und gesitteten Volke, 1779, were written. 2) In distinction from this we have the transfer of the Kantian morality to the sermon, which we see carried out to an extreme in Schubert's "Versuch einer Kritik der Homiletik," 1797, and in which it is asserted that a sermon ought to be properly a religious discourse, but that it need not absolutely be Christian in its character. An abatement of the strictness of the Kantian principle in reference to the people, Ammon (in his "Ideen zur Verbesserung der herrschenden Predigt-Methode," 1795,) was willing to concede. This party, aside from their opposition to false Eudæmonism, had right only in their thorough aversion to persuasion instead of conviction. On the side of the orthodox theologians, during his whole period, there was no attempt to produce any thoroughly-scientific work. The publications of Bengel and Oetinger, and the treatise of Palmer concerning Oetinger, and of Ph. D. Burk in his Sammlungen zur Pastoral-Theol., contain nevertheless much that is appropriate.

The Reinhard period, as on the one side, it returns again to positive Christianity, although rationalistically apprehended and expressed, so, on the other hand, it reverts again to the classic models of antiquity. The most important work of this tendency is Schott's "Theory of Rhetoric" (1815-1828), the exemplification of which is to be met with particularly in the sphere of the Reinhard sermonizing. Thoremin, in his "Beredtsamkeit eine Tugend" (1814-1838), more cordially still seeks to exhibit the relation of the orator, especially the classic models, to the Christian sermon; but the earnestness with which he strives to trace the source of eloquence to the "life of faith," does not suffice to conceal the mistake, that this source of Christian eloquence is essentially the same with that from which the worldly flows, and that the efficacy of the first is conditioned by the same power with that of the last. We must have entirely lost sight of the peculiarity and self-subsistence of the sermon, and especially its Church character as to form and contents, in order to believe that the idea of eloquence advanced by Thoremin is really the same with that which lies at the ground of the Christian evangelical discourse.

And now if we deduct for these, the stragglers of the rationalistic and Reinhard periods (such as Alt, Anleitung zur kirchl. Beredsamkeit, 1840; or Ziegler, the fundamentum dividendi, 1851; and others), we have, as the principal feature of the sermon at the present time, on the one hand, as distinguished from classic elegance, the application of Christian freedom to the individual life, the right of personality in the sermon, and on the other, as the connecting bond, the insisting upon its churchly character; the first since the time of Harms, the second since that of Schleiermacher. Within these outlines, that personal diversity of apprehension stamps itself in strong delineation; still, as the writer of this article has shown in his "Evangel. Homiletik," this two-fold, although in fact single effort, leads nevertheless to the acknowledgment of the same fundamental arrangement. (Comp. Ficker, Grundlinien der evang. Homiletik, 1847; Nitzsch, Pract. Theol., 1848; G. Baur, Grundzüge der Homiletik, 1848, &c.). That which is peculiar in these works could not be adverted to without enlarging this article to a review. The order of Homiletics is, in some way, according to some, to connect itself with the antithesis of the matter and form of the sermon (so with Nitzsch: 1, the idea and object of the sermon; 2, choice of material; 3, plan; 4, execution; 5, language; 6, delivery;—with Schweitzer: 1, principles of Homiletics; 2, method; 3, form). Others, however, as Gaupp and Palmer, think that in the sermon there should be no separation of matter and form, and proceed rather from this, that in the sermon, the word of God, the Church, as the Church at large and as the congregation, and the personality of the preacher, should be the co-operating, and in the Holy Ghost, the comprehending factors, by means of which the plan and divisions in a variety of ways might be determined. In these two principal modes of constructing Homiletics is represented still in our day the difference between the classic rhetorical and the specific churchly fundamental view.—We must not omit specially to mention the author of the Keryktik, Rudolph Stier, inasmuch as with him the biblical element is decidedly prominent in the form of the sermon. His work, too, occupies precisely its proper place, as well for the inculcation of free individuality, as for that of the Church features of the time, which, particularly since Schleiermacher's day, could not, in all its controlling authority, be appreciated—that is, the duty of stricter conformity to the Scriptures. The admonition was not unheeded, as all the works just mentioned distinctly show.

As it respects the Romish Church, we must content ourselves with the remark, that in manuals and guides there has been no lack, within the last centuries. In earlier times, the plan seemed to be to provide for the preacher the necessary material collected from the sphere of morals (Abraham a. S. Clara, in his "Judas der Erzscheim," has accomplished something of the same sort, and in his grammatica religiosa has constructed a Homiletic in his own way). Performances of a more scientific character are met with for the first time in the last century. Graf has enumerated them in his work, "Zur praktischen Theologie," but without being satisfied with them. In modern times, Zurbel has appeared with a "Handbuch der kath. Homiletik," 1838; Lutz, with a "Handbuch der kath. Kanzelberedtsamkeit," 1851; to which we must add Hirscher's "Beiträge zur Homiletik und Katechetik," 1852.

Finally, among these works are to be mentioned the History of Homiletics, including the History of Sermons. With the exception of the unfinished labors of Eschenburg (Versuch einer Geschichte der öffentl. Relig.-Vorträge, &c., 1785), of PANIEL (Pragmat. Gesch. der Christl. Beredsamkeit, 1839-41), and of AMMON (Gesch.

der prakt. Th., 1 Bd., 1804), there exists but a single complete work, the Gesch. der Homiletik of LENTZ, 1839, which, however, furnishes simply notices and brief specimens of popular preachers, without mastering his materials from a higher standpoint. In this field there is still much to be done.

PALMER.—Dr. Wolff.

Homily, originally the name of the sermon itself, was afterwards used of only one kind of sermonizing, the exhortatory. As sermons could not then be discourses in an oratorical sense, but rather expositions of Scripture, they were called homiliai, with reference, if not to the form, yet to the familiar, fraternal style adopted. During the more brilliant period of Greek pulpit oratory, when the style of the homily was superseded, the name was retained; but in the West we soon find homilia or tractatus distinguished from sermo (Augustine). But even there the sermo was not synthetical, or the homilia analytical; for Augustine's quingenta homiliae might as well be called sermons as the de sanctis, &c. And yet we can see in these the antithesis which fixed the later use of homilia. One kind of discourses aimed merely at exposition, the other at commemorating the festival on which it was preached; or it had a distinct doctrinal aim (as de amore dei et amore seculi, &c.); so that although the terms seemed to be used promiscuously, one still feels that the sermo was less dependent on the text than on the theme. And this indicates the essential feature of the homily; it adheres to, and practically develops the text, in an analytic way. There is no necessary conflict between these two methods, but they must be treated as auxiliary to each other. (See PALMER's Homilet., 3d ed., p. 451). It is noteworthy that as the Latin postillae of the middle ages were superseded by evangelical sermons, the term homily disappeared. ZINZENDORF was the first to revive its use, "34 homiliae über d. Wunden-Litanei" (1747). The most important homilies of recent times are those of MENKEN (über Elias; über d. Hebräerbr., &c.).—(See A. G. SCHMIDT, "die Homilie," &c.: Halle, 1827).

PALMER.*

Honorius, son of the Emperor Theodosius I., born A. D. 384, was appointed Emperor Nov. 20, 393, and succeeded his father, after his death, on Jan. 17, 395, under the guardianship of the Vandal Stilicho, as the first Western Roman Emperor, whilst his brother, Arcadius, inherited the kingdom of the East. Honorius, a weak and characterless ruler, submitted entirely, even after he had obtained his majority, to the control of Stilicho, to whose daughter, Maria, he had been married, and that the Western empire was not already convulsed under him, was not owing to the services he rendered as ruler. In addition to the invasions of Alaric into Italy in 403 and 408, the empire was visited by other barbaric invasion, as well as by rebellions in the provinces during the reign of Honorius. Soon after his ascension to the throne, he confirmed the laws of his father against heathen worship with new restrictions; but the weakness of his government, in connection with the manifold political agitations and the corruptibility of several governors, promoted the preservation of heathenism in many parts of the empire, so that it was necessary continually to renew these laws. In 399 he published a law that all the heathen temples in the provinces should be destroyed, in order to remove all occasion to superstition. But as the heathens at this time believed a prophecy, that Christianity would only exist 365 years, the destruction of temples failed in its purpose. After the death of Stilicho, Honorius, under the influence of several nobles favorable to heathenism, enacted a law which conflicted with those heretofore existing. Between the years 409 and 410 a law appeared in the Western kingdom: "ut libera voluntate quis cultum christianitatis exciperet," by which the laws hitherto existing against those who practised a worship other than the Christian were abolished. This law, however, remained in force only for a short time, and the old ones were re-enacted. By an edict of 416 the heathen were excluded from civil and military honors—at least on paper, for according to Zonimus V., 46, Honorius was compelled to abolish this law by the heathen general, Genserid, whose services were indispensable, and who would remain in service only on this condition. He was equally weak and sickly with regard to doctrinal controversies within the Church. In 418 he published several edicts against Pelagius and Celestinus and their adherents. He also came into conflict with the Donatists. Already in 405 he enacted several laws against the entire Donatist party as being heretical, which were more severe than even the Council of Carthage desired. Later he appointed a conference, which was to be held at Carthage in 411 between the Catholic Bishops and the Donatists. As was natural, the imperial commissioner decided in favor of the Catholic Church. Severer laws followed, by which all Donatist priests were banished from the country, and the laymen of the party condemned to pay fines. As important as was the period of Honorius' reign for the Christian Church, so weak did he show himself to be in all his transactions. He remained his life long a child in understanding, and his death, which took place in Aug., 423, from dropsy, was no misfortune either to the State or Church.

TH. PRESSER. — Reck.

Honorius I., Pope from 625–638, born in Campagna di Roma, is especially distinguished by his participation in the monothelite controversies (see the Art.), which originated just at this time, and by the charge of heresy under which he fell. These controversies having spread and increased through the influence of the patriarch of Jerusalem, Sophronius, Sergius, the patriarch of Constantinople, who declared monothelitism to be orthodox doctrine, proposed a cessation of controversy. Pope Honorius approved of the proposition as well as of the dogmatic views of Sergius (see Honorii Epist. I. ad Sergium, in Mansi, SS. conciliorum nova et ampliss. Collectio, Tom. XI., p. 537; comp. p. 529; 579), still, the controversy not only increased in violence, and II. was even involved in it after his death. It was attempted, namely at Rome, to vindicate II. after his death on account of his monothelite views (see Johannis IV., Epist. ad Constantium Imp.; Mar- mus in Ep. ad Marinum, and Maximi Disp. um Pyrrho, in Mansi, l. c., T. X., p. 682, sq.; 39, sq.); and although his position was then passed by with silence, still the VI. Oecumenical Council of Constantinople, 680, condemned him as a heretic (in Mansi, T. XI., p. 556). This judgment was repeated by several Popes, ex. gr. Leo II., who expressly anathematizes him as a heretic, because he attempted apostolicam ecclesiam—profana prodicione immaculatam subvertere (Mansi, T. X., p. 731). Roman Catholic authors of later times have attempted, after the example of Anastasius (about 870), to defend him against the charge of heresy. Baronius says that the acts of the Council of Constantinople, Ballarmine that even the letters of II., have been interpolated; others, on the other hand, as Garnier and Ballerini, affirm that II. was not condemned on account of heresy, but propter negligentiam. Contra comp. Richer, Historia Concil. general., T. I., p. 296; Du Pin, De antiqua eccles. disciplina, p. 349. It is yet to be remarked that the festival of the elevation of the cross was introduced under II. (about 1228), and that he was also active in promoting conversions to Christianity.—II. was the anti-pope of Alexander II. from 1061–1064, having previously been Bishop of Parma, and was called, as such, Peter Cadolaus. Whilst Alexander was only raised to the papal chair by cardinals, and without the approbation of the Emperor, Henry IV., II. was chosen by the imperial party, at a council held at Basel. Hereupon the German bishops, under the influence of Anno, Archbishop of Cologne, at a synod at Augsburg, 1062, gave their adhesion to Alexander (comp. Mansi, T. XIX, p. 1001), and II., whom also the synod at Mantua, 1064, declared deposed, was now limited only to his former bishopric, although he maintained his claims to the lawful possession of the papal chair until his death, 1072. He is charged with simony and concubinage. On account of his deposition, he is not reckoned among the popes; therefore Lambert of Fagnano, who raised himself from a low position first to the bishopric of Velletri, then to the cardinalate of Ostia, and finally, through the influence of the powerful party of Robert Frangipani, to the papal chair, is called Pope Honorius II., whose reign extended from 1124 to 1130. He laid Duke Conrad of Franconia under the bann, because he permitted himself to be crowned anti-king of Lothaire III., and received therefor important new rights (see J. D. Oleneschlager, Erläuterung l. gold. Bulle, Urkundenb., p. 19); on the other hand, he was compelled to permit Count Roger of Sicily to appropriate to himself the papaliefs of Sicily and Apulia. The order of Premonstrants, just instituted, was sanctioned by him, as also afterwards, at the Synod of Troyes, the order of Knight-templars.—III., born at Rome, was, previous to his election to the papal chair, Cardinal of St. John and St. Paul, was called Cencio Savelli, and ruled as pope from 1216–1227. In the violent contests of the hierarchy with the Hohenstaufen then existing, he manifested a yielding disposition, making no opposition when Frederick II. allowed his son Henry, who was King of Sicily, also to be elected King of Germany (April 1220), even crowned him emperor (Nov. 1220), and allowed Frederick to restore the rights of his crown in Sicily. The peaceable relations between him and the emperor, however, appeared to be endangered, when Frederick attempted to bring somebody again under his sceptre. II. sent his chaplain, Alatrinus, to the Diet of Cremona, 1226, the league of Lombardy was renewed, and II. favored it; and Frederick, not pursuing his plans further, preserved thus the peaceable relations. These were soon threatened again with interruption. Frederick, who at his coronation at Aix la Ch. vowed to undertake a crusade, continually postponed the fulfilment of his vow. Finally, by an agreement at St. Germano, 1225, it was decided that Frederick should undertake the crusade in Aug. 1227, under penalty of the bann; H. however, died in March 1227. The mildness, yielding temper, and forbearance which he showed towards the Emperor Frederick, were wanting in his conduct towards Count Raymund VII. of Toulouse. The father of the latter, Raymund VI., lost his province to Count Simon of Montfort, from whom it was retaken by Raymund VII. Hereupon H. incited King Louis VIII. of France to conquer Toulouse with a crusade; but neither he nor Louis survived the end of this war. H. solemnly sanctioned the order of the Dominicans, 1216, and the order of the Franciscans, 1223. The Tertiarians came into existence under him (1223), and he first granted indulgences at the canonization of saints. The treatise, Conjuraciones adversus principem tenebrarum, Rome, 1629, is attributed to him.—IV., pope from April 2, 1285, to April 3, 1287, was called, before his election to the papal chair, Cardinal Jacob (Giacomo) Savelli. During his short reign he was occupied with the Sicilian quarrels which were then raging, and gained the credit of putting a limit to the robberies prevailing in the Roman province.

NEUDECKER.—Beck.

Honter, John (Honerus), a pillar of Protestantism in Siebenbürgen. He was born in Cronstadt, 1498, studied at Wittenberg under Luther, then went to Cracow, where he taught grammar, and from thence to Basel, where he attended Reuchlin's lectures. In 1533, he returned to his birth-place and established a book-printing office; later, 1547, also the first paper-mill. Hermannstadt had already, in 1529, driven out all priests and monks. Cronstadt soon followed this example, and Honter became now, by continual labors, and by circulating the writings of Luther, the chief cause that entire Berzenland accepted the Augsburg Confession in 1542. Because Luther's works were costly and rare, he translated them into Hungarian and published them himself. In 1544 he became town-rector of Cronstadt, and obtained an assistant, whom some call Matthias Calvin, others Klatz, and later a certain Valentine Wagner. He died at Cronstadt, Jan. 23, 1549. He was an eloquent orator, thorough mathematician, and able philosopher. He belongs to the first humanists and scholastics of his time. He employed his printing office mainly in printing school-books, and was instrumental in founding the gymnasium academicum in Cronstadt. Of his writings we mention, de grammatica libri II., (1532, and often reprinted); Rudimenta Cosmographica, in verse; Sententiæ ex omnibus operibus divi Augustini excerptæ; Sententiæ catholicæ Nili monachi græci; Formula reformationis ecclesiæ Coronensis et Barcensis totius provinciae, published by Melanchthon, 1543, with a preface. Agenda für die Seelsorger u. Kirchendiener in Siebenbürgen. Comp. Dav. Cavillingeri specimen Hungar. literatæ, Francof., 1711; Mailath, Gesch. d. österr. Kaiserstaats, II., p. 234, sq.

DR. PRESSEL.—Beck.

Hoogstraten, Jacob van (Hoogstraten, Hogstraten, Hooch Straten), Dominican monk, prior of the convent of this order at Cologne, one of the most violent opponents and accusers of Reuchlin, and later of Luther, was born at Hoogstraten, in Brabant, 1454. He studied at the University of Cologne, which was then the chief seat of spiritual darkness; and having received the degree of A. M. in 1485, and having previously entered the Dominican order, he was chosen prior. He represented the order with such zeal against the illumination then spreading, especially against Erasmus, that he was appointed inquisitor at Louvain. He also became professor of theology at the University of Cologne, although his ignorance was great; and, in connection with Hermann of Busche, undertook to crush Reuchlin and the spiritual movement originated by him. Failing in this after many assaults, he attacked Luther and the Reformation, proposing that Luther be burned before he would disturb the Church (Raumer, Geschichte Europa's, p. 210; Walch, Luther's Schr., XXI., Anh., p. 118). He died Jan. 21, 1527, at Cologne. Hermann of Nunnar characterizes him in a letter to Charles V. (in v. d. Hardt, Ænigmat. prisca orbis p. 574), thus: Pestis est in Germania Jacobus Hochstraten, quam si restrinxeris, tota p̄ntia p̄llescit; homo præter ingentem suam audaciam insigniter impudens atque temerarius. Omnes interroga, si libet, per Germaniam doctos viros, omnes laesit, omnibus aequè invidus est. His writings appeared at Cologne, 1526. Comp. Meiner's Lebensbesch. berühmter Männer I., p. 97, sq.; Mayerhoff, Joh. Reuchlin und seine Zeit, p. 158, sq.

NEUDECKER.—Beck.

Hooper, John, of Somersetshire, the originator of the Puritan movement in England, (see Art. England, Reformation in), studied for a time at Oxford, and early accepted the principles of the Reformation, notwithstanding the efforts of Gardiner to the contrary. His situation, on this account, became critical already under Henry VIII., especially so when the six Articles appeared, within which the King wished to limit the Reformation (see the Art. Eng. Ref.). He left England, went first to France, and then to Switzerland; where he became intimately acquainted with Bullinger (see the Art.), and applied himself zealously to the study of theology and the ancient languages, especially the Hebrew. At Zurich, by the advice of Bullinger, he married, and the latter baptized a child of his (Hess, Leben d. Ant. Bull. I., 216). He continued to correspond with B. after his return to England. He returned to England when Edward ascended the throne (1549), and soon became distinguished through his attacks on Roman Catholic doctrines, and through his eloquence. Next to Latimer, he was the most popular preacher. He was also instrumental in causing Bucer to lose his position. The Earl of Warwick appointed him his chaplain, and had him elevated to the bishopric of Gloucester. Before his consecration he objected to putting on the episcopal robes, which were still very similar to those of Romish bishops. He also refused to take the prescribed canonical oath (which closed thus: "So help me God, all saints," &c.), and to acknowledge any other ecclesiastical authority but the holy Scriptures. Cranmer, together with Bucer and Peter Martyr, sought in vain to remove Hooper's scruples. He vindicated his opposition in a treatise, which he called his confession of faith, and by his preaching against ordination and episcopal robes caused a violent agitation among the people. Finally he was imprisoned, and after a time agreed to a compromise, according to which the clause "all saints" was omitted from the oath, and he consented to wear the episcopal robes only when he preached before the king and in his cathedral, and when he officiated on solemn occasions, and was consecrated in March, 1551; soon after which, by the union of the bishoprics of Gloucester and Worcester, his labors were greatly increased, but not his income. His labors as care, as preacher, pastor, and superintendent of schools, are highly extolled; not less great was his fearlessness in exercising church discipline.—He died as a martyr at the stake, 1555, one of the many sacrifices of the Roman Catholic reaction under Mary Tudor. Comp. Bauer's Hist. of the Ref. of the Eng. Church; Weyl's Gesch. der akatholischen Kirchen und Sekten in Grossbritannien II., 106–109, 264.

HERZOG.—Beck.

Hope is the third element of Christian life and character (1 Cor. 13 : 13; 1 Thess. 1 : 5 : 8; Col. 1 : 4; Gal. 5 : 5; Eph. 4 : 2–5; Heb. 10 : 22–24). As faith is the receptive, and the responsive act of the soul in regard to Divine grace, and as the Christian is conscious of having found, through these acts, eternal life in Christ, they produce hope, as a living assurance, and inward certainty, that all things are secured in Christ, not only for the individual believer, but for the Church and the world. Faith is the root, love the fruit, branches, and hope the crown of the Christian tree, rearing its head to the very heaven. Faith embraces the accomplished grace of God for man's salvation; love is the soul of our present Christian life; hope is persuaded that the future belongs to the Lord and his people. Thus in these three factors we see a reflection of the actuality of the kingdom of God.—Hope is joined to faith and love, because the spiritual life, though begun, is not yet perfected. It is the antithesis of seeing, having, and perfecting (Rom. 8 : 24, &c.; 1 John 3 : 2, &c.); it is, however, simply a desire and longing (Rom. 8 : 19, 22), nor yet the mere expectation of a future existence, but the real looking nd prospect of the fulfilment, collectively, of all things promised to believers and the Church. Rom. 15 : 4, 13; Heb. 3 : 6; 6 : 11, 18). Hence hope is based upon the fact of Christ's resurrection, as the primal victory over the world, and glorification of the flesh, the reality of which manifests itself in our regeneration; hence the Holy Ghost, given unto believers, is the pledge and power of their hope (1 Pet. 1 : 3; Acts 23 : 6; 2 Cor. 5 : 5; Rom. 8 : 11; 15 : 13; Gal. 5 : 5). This is nothing else than the self-consciousness of the new spiritual life begotten in us by the glorified Redeemer, that it is the power by which the still existing antagonisms between flesh and spirit, the world and the kingdom of God, earth and heaven, will be overcome. Hence the full clear idea of hope first appears after the resurrection of Christ, and the outpouring of the Holy Ghost. In this form we do not find it in the Old Test., nor even in the Gospels (Heb. 7 : 19). — From this we see how essential an element of Christian life hope is, so essential that it may serve faith and love as a sign of the nature of Christianity (1 Pet. 3 : 15; Heb. 10 : 23). In it the glory of the Christian profession is concentrated (Eph. 1 : 18; 4 : 4); it is the proper aim of the Gospel (Tit. 1 : 2; Col. 1 : 5, 23); for the Christian's chief treasures are, in their perfection, the objects of hope (1 Thess. 5 : 8; Rom. 8 : 23; cf. Ezek. 1 : 14; 1 : 30; Gal. 5 : 5; 2 Tim. 4 : 8). Unbelievers are designated as persons without hope, because without God in the world (Eph. 2 : 12; 1 Thess. 1 : 13), for God is a God of hope (Rom. 15 : 13; 1 Pet. 1 : 21). The proper object of hope, however, is Christ, who is called ἡ ἀντίδοσις, not only because all our confidence rests on him, but especially because his second coming will fulfil the believer's hope of glorification (1 Tim. 1 : 1; Col. 1 : 27; Tit. 2 : 13). The fruit of hope is patience and steadfastness under present trials and tribulations; hence ὑπομονή is the constant associate of ἀγάπη (1 Thess. 1 : 3; Rom. 8 : 25), or faith and love in its stead (Tit. 2 : 2; 2 Tim. 1 : 10; 1 Tim. 6 : 11). And as hope produces patience in suffering, so it incites to endurance in action, because the Christian knows that his labor is not in vain (1 Cor. 15 : 58), and purity of life (1 John 3 : 3; Phil. 1 : 10). — In theology most attention is given to faith, less to love, and least to hope (prophecy); and after the 1st cent. the element of hope was kept far too much in the background. It will be the duty of modern theology to secure to it proper attention, both in theory and practice. — (NITZSCH, System d. chr. Lehre, §§ 209–214). AUBERLEN.*

Hophra (LXX. Ουαφρα, Vulg. Ephree, Jer. 44 : 30) is doubtless the same Egyptian King whom Manetho calls Ουαφρα, Herod. and Diod. Ἀπριης, the 8th of the Saitic dynasty. The writers just named speak of his successful wars against the Phœnicians and Cyprians. He reigned 25 years, and the nation flourished under him. Towards the close of his life, however, the Cyrenians rebelled against him, and were joined by his general Amasis, who overthrew him (c. 571 B. C.) and put him to death. Zedekiah, the last King of Judah, after his revolt from Nebuchadnezzar (Ezek. 17 : 15), formed a league with H., who actually sent out an army to aid Z., and thus caused the Chaldeans to raise their siege of Jerusalem for a time (Jer. 37 : 3, &c.). Subsequently the siege was renewed without H. interfering. Hence Jeremiah's displeasure at many for looking to Egypt for aid, and his prophecy of H.'s downfall (Jer. 44 : 30; 46 : 26; Ezek. 29 : 3). VAHINGER.*

Hornbeck, John, born at Harlem, 1617, died at Leyden, 1666, distinguished himself as Prof. of Theology and as clergyman from 1644, in Utrecht, from 1654 in Leyden. His writings were highly prized, and are in part yet deserving to be read, as the Examen bullæ papalis quæ Innocentius X. abrogare nititur pacem Germaniæ: Ultraj., 1652; or the Epistola ad Joh. Duræum, de Independentismo: Ludg. Bat., 1659; and the Commentarius de paradoxis Weigelianis. An important question of the times is discussed in his treatise de conversione Indorum, which contains a biography of the author. His Brevis institutio studii theologici: Ultraj., 1658, shows us the mode of theological instruction then in vogue. Of his polemical writings, De convincendis Judæis, L. B. 1655, may be antiquated; but the Summa controversiarum religionis, Trajecti ad Rhen., 1653, remains, with Spanheims, the most serviceable Reformed compendium of polemics, and contains especially an important section on the Brownists. His work, Socinianismus confutatus, 1 T.: Ultraj., 1650; 2 T.: Amst., 1662; 3 T., 1664, continues to be instructive as a learned and able representation and refutation of Socinianism. To this he added a Compendium Socinianismi confutati: Ludg. B., 1690. His Miscellanea sacra were published at Utrecht, 1677. Highly prized is his Theologia practica cum irenica, sive de studio pacis et concordie, 2 T.: Ultraj., 1663; Auctior, 1689; and Franef. et Lips., 1698, with supplements, Vetera et nova, s. Exercit. th. — Traj. ad Rh., 1672. Besides the biography already mentioned consult the Art. Hornbeck in Bayle's Dictionary.

ALEX. SCHWEITZER. — Beck.

Horites (חֹרִי, Sept. Χορραῖος, Vulg. Horæus), the name of the aborigines of Edom, Gen. 14 : 6, who inhabited Mount Seir, but who were conquered and partially exterminated by Esau and his descendants, Deut. 2 : 12, 22. Their name is derived from Hor (חֹר), hole, cavern, and represents them as troglodytes, which they also might have been in great part. Their independent existence was destroyed only gradually by the constant oppression and hatred of their conquerors, which were transmitted from one generation to another. This becomes tolerably evident from the book of Job, where 17 : 6; 24 : 5, sq.; 30 : 1, sq., allusion is made to the great contempt and to the ignominious fate, which befell the oppressed nations of the land of Uz. (Comp. Ewald, Hiob in l. u. israel. Gesch., 1, 273, sq., and Vaihinger, das Buch Hiob, metrisch übersetzt u. erläutert, Stuttg. : Cotta, 1842, in these passages). But as Uz was a descendant of Seir (Gen. 36 : 28; 1 Chron. 1 : 42), as also a descendant of Nahor, the brother of Abraham (Gen. 22 : 21); it follows, that the descendants of Nahor, to whom Job might have belonged, mixed themselves with the descendants of Seir, that is, with the Horites, and gradually destroyed their independence. The province of Uz, however, was situated near to Edom in the East, and was even taken possession of later by the Edomites (Lam. 4 : 21; comp. Jer. 25 : 20, and Vaihinger's Commentary, p. 55). But the Horites belonged, as Knobel shows in his register of nations, with the Rephaim and Anakim, with the Amorites and Amalekites, to the great race of the Sudim, who was the fourth son of Shem (Gen. 10 : 22). Consequently they were not Canaanites, descendants of Ham, but Shemites, and, as Knobel shows, cognate with the Hyksos, emigrated from Assyria to Egypt, and after 511 years returned to their country. This section of the Ludim, however, was greatly reduced, and became the prey of the Abrahamic tribes.—The name 'רְחִי (Sept.

Ῥαῖοί, Vulg. Hori), Gen. 36 : 22, is the name of a single man, and signifies a nobleman, a baron, as also Numb. 13 : 5; 1 Chron. 1 : 39).

VAIHINGER. — Beck.

Hormisdas, Pope, born at Frusino in Campagna, was chosen Bishop of Rome as successor of Symmachus, July 26, 514, and was soon after his election invited by the Eastern Emperor, Anastasius, to a general Council to be held at Heraclea, in order to bring to pass a reunion between the Oriental and Occidental Churches, and especially to examine impartially the decrees which had been published against those who believed in the two natures in Christ. H. consented to attend, provided that the decrees of Chalcedon were not disturbed, and the chiefs of Eutychianism, Dioscurus, Timotheus Aelurus, Peter Mongus, and Acacius were condemned. The Emperor was willing to accede to all these conditions except the condemnation of Acacius, Bishop of Constantinople. He insisted upon it, and the Council was not held. The Emperor made another attempt in 517, and failing again, he stopped all intercourse with Rome. After the death of Anastasius (518), his successor Justinus began negotiations again with H., but as the Patriarch of Alexandria, the Metropolitan of Thessalonica, and many other of the clergy refused to accept the articles which had been dictated by H., he repelled the overtures of the Emperor so roughly, that the latter abandoned the undertaking (comp. the correspondence between the Patriarch of Constantinople, the Emperor Justinus, and Hormisdas). He acted more mildly and prudently in the dogmatic controversy which arose concerning Faustus of Rhegium.—Nothing more than this is known concerning the labors of H. He is said to have discovered traces of the Manicheans at Rome, and to have driven them out and burned their writings. He died Aug. 6, 523. A number of his letters are yet in existence, to be found in the Epistolis Romanorum Pontificum.

DR. PRESSEL. — Beck.

Horney or Hornejus, Conrad, Lutheran theologian in Helmstädt, was born Nov. 25, 1590, at Braunschweig. He early made such rapid progress in writing prose and verse in Latin and Greek, that he became known to men like J. Gruter in Heidelberg, et. al. In 1608 he went to Helmstädt, where he became the favorite pupil of the elder Caselius (see Art.), whose colleagues, the Aristotelian Cornelius Martini, Nich. Gran, et. al., became more his teachers than the theologians of the University, and other distinguished pupils of Caselius and Martini, as George Calixtus, Barthold Neubam, et. al., became then already his friends. After the death of Caselius in 1613, he remained eight years in the family of his teacher, Martini, was appointed Professor of Logic and Ethics in connection with Martini in 1619, and after the death of the latter (Dec. 17, 1621) became his successor. In 1628 he was transferred from the philosophical to the theological faculty, having his friend Calixtus as colleague, when he remained until his death.

Horney wrote several philosophical text-books which were much used at other Universities, as the Compendium dialecticæ succinctum, first published at Helmstädt, 1623, and in 1666 had run through twelve editions; the disputationes ethicæ depromptæ ex ethica Arist. ad Nicom., first published in 1618, and seven editions to 1666; in addition to these many other philosophical treatises: Compendium naturalis philosophiæ, 1618; disquisitiones metaphysicæ s. de prima philosophia, 1622; institt. logicæ, 1623; philosophia moralis, 1624; exercitationes et disputationes logicæ, 1621; processus disputandi, &c. — He died Sept. 26, 1649. Among his papers were found a Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, and on the Cat. Epistles, which were published in 1654 and 1655; also a compendium theologiæ, quo universa fidei chr. tam credendorum quam magendæ doctrina pertractatur: Br., 1655, in 4to., and in the year of his death also a compendium hist. eccl. of the first three centuries. Many of his letters to Calixtus, Schwartzkopff, et. al., are preserved in the libraries at Wolfenbüttel and Göttingen. The Latin and German funeral addresses by his friends and pupils are referred to and used in der Ersch- u. Gruber'schen Encyclopædie, sec. II., Bd. 11, in the Art. Hornejus by HENCKE. — Beck.

Hosea, the Prophet, holds a very peculiar position in the number of those great men, who were impelled by the Spirit of the Lord, to rebuke the violators of the covenant and to comfort the faithful. No other prophet beheld such an appalling abyss of sinfulness and idolatrous abominations, that tainted the people from the throne down to the lowest classes. The heart-sickening picture of depravity, which presents itself in Hosea, will not surprise us, if we bear in mind, that he lived, as appears from his book, in the kingdom of Israel at the period of its greatest degeneracy, in Ephraim joined to idolatry (4 : 17). For when he refers to Judah (4 : 15; 5 : 5; 5 : 12, 14) he does so only incidentally, while Israel is always prominent in his mind (6 : 4; 10 : 11). In chapter 7th he deals exclusively with the iniquity of Ephraim and the wickedness of Samaria; in chapter 8th he refers particularly to the calf-worship of Samaria, and its unauthorized appointments of kings. Though at the end of the chapter Judah also is rebuked, this is hardly more than a passing notice of the sister state. It cannot, indeed, be expected that a prophet, though belonging to the ten tribes, would in his exhortations leave Judah altogether out of view. The rememrance of their common ancestor Israel, and their common earlier history, did not allow such an exclusion. Jerusalem, however, is never mentioned, and only the North of Palestine, Samaria, and Bethel, Gilead, Gilgal and Sichem, are familiar localities. The land, therefore, which, according to 1 : 2, was rebellious against Jehovah, and where Hosea was commanded to take his wife, was undoubtedly the same in which he lived and prophesied, not one of which he merely took a view from Judah: it was Israel with its capital Samaria, whose ruler he calls "our king" (7 : 1, 5). Upon this point critics of the most diverse character (Hävernick and Keil, Ewald and Hitzig, &c.) agree, and the opinion of Jahn, that Hosea was a prophet in Judah may now be regarded as given up. Maurer (Observ. in Hos., in Maurer's and Rosenmüller's Commentat. theol., tom. II., p. 1, cap. 3) suggests that Hosea, like his predecessor Amos, might have removed from the southern to the northern kingdom, but his reasons are by no means conclusive. Ewald, on the contrary, connects the writing of the second half of the book with a presumed residence of the prophet in Judah, thus accounting for his greater forbearance with Judah in the beginning, when he observed its iniquity from a distance only, and his later severity after he had himself become an eye-witness of its wickedness.

Turning to the inquiry as to the time when the prophet of Ephraim saw "terrible things" in this kingdom, we find the beginning of his ministry referred to in the first words of the book: "The beginning of the Word of the Lord by Hosea" (1 : 2), which, in connection with 1 : 4, "for yet a little while, and I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu," etc., clearly prove that the prophet did not prophesy before that King, whom Elisha chose from the captains of Joram and anointed as master against his master, to smite in the son of Ahab the house of Ahab, that the whole house of Ahab might perish (2 Kings 9 : 7).

With respect to the question, how long before the fall of the house of Jehu the prophet arose, we find in the text no other clue than the words just quoted: "Yet a little while," etc., which, though couched in rather general terms, will justify us in assigning no earlier date to Hosea's ministry, than the time of King Jeroboam II., son of Joash, in conformity with the superscription of the first chapter. If we emphasize the expression "a little," the probability arises, that the prophet did not enter upon his office till towards the end of the King's reign, and this is the opinion of almost all interpreters. But it is even possible (as we need not be guided by the superscription, which is of doubtful authenticity) that Hosea spoke those prophetic words in the time of Jeroboam's son, Zachariah, with whom the house of Jehu actually ended (Berthold). To judge by the description of the country, as given in the beginning of the book, the people, though guilty of apostasy, appear to have lived on a fertile soil in thrifty comfort (2 : 10-13). Between the death of Jeroboam II. and the accession of his son, there was an interregnum of 10-11 years (Simson, Introduction to his Comment., p. 14), a period of wild distraction, of which we find a saddening picture in the second part of Hosea's book. Zachariah ascended at length his father's throne, but found his death six months after by the hands of the rebel Shallum, who, in his turn, after one month, was killed and succeeded by Menahem, a cruel oppressor of Israel for ten years. It is not unlikely that Hosea (10 : 6, 7) alludes to the disgrace and humiliation of Israel, which paid at one time for the aid rendered by Pul, the Assyrian King, to Menahem's faction (for both Assyria and Egypt had been appealed to, 7 : 11), and was heavily taxed another time, in order to avert a permanent occupation of the country by the same monarch (2 Kings 15 : 19-20). The more difficult question, how long Hosea continued to fill the prophetic office, would find a ready answer if שִׁלְמָן, in 10 : 14, as I think most likely, were an abbreviation of שִׁלְמָנָאֶדָר. Ewald, taking a different view, supposes that Shalman was some predecessor of Pul, who had destroyed the celebrated Arbela on the Tigris, and treated its inhabitants with cruelty. If the former explanation is the correct one, as Gesenius, Keil, and others think, Hosea was still a cotemporary of King Hezekiah, and as such he is represented in the superscription. His prophetic activity would then have continued upwards of 60 years, which cannot be disproved by merely alleging improbability. For other attempts to determine the time of the prophet see Simson, p. 17, sqq. He was undoubtedly a younger cotemporary of Amos, on whom he seems to be dependent in some of his passages.—(Comp. 4 : 3 with Amos 8 : 8; 4 : 15 with Amos 5 : 5).

The soul of the prophet is profoundly agitated under the burden which God has laid upon it, to preach against the sinfulness of his nation, and to announce the punishment to which it was doomed. Hence the abruptness of his discourse, in which the sentences seem imperfectly connected, and the rapid succession of images that are merely sketched and not filled out. Jerome well observes of him, "Commaticus est et quasi per sententias loquens." But the dark and impetuous surge of his indignation is wonderfully tinted with the gladdening beams of reconciling love, which God in his mercy and long-suffering can bestow anew on those of his erring children who "seek the Lord their God, and David their King, and shall fear the Lord and his goodness in the latter days" (3 : 5). It is this very contrast, this impressive blending of God's retributive justice with his eternal love, which gives a peculiar sublimity to all the appeals of Hosea (11 : 3, 4; 5 : 14; 13 : 8; 14 : 6, 9). "Hosea," says Ewald, "has a rich and stirring imagination, his discourse is remarkable for a pithy fulness, and though he uses many forcible images, which evince his poetical boldness and originality, as well as the straightforwardness of his times, his language is tender and warm."

The book of Hosea, taken in its connection, consists of two parts, chapter 1-3 and ch. 4-14. The former contains the "beginning" (1 : 2) of the prophet's discourse, and treats of apostasy, punishment, repentance and mercy, in a sym-

cides, thieves, and robbers. The murder of Coligny gave his soul incredible refreshment (incredibile animi recreationem); he thanked God for the deed, and wished a Bartholomew's night for his own country: so he wrote to the Cardinal of Lorraine (see d. d. Sublaci 4. Septembris, 1572; Epist., 178; Opp., II., p. 339, 340). Coligny he called a man, quo uno haud scio an unquam tellus produxerit pestilentiorum. In politics he was an absolutist (comp. Rescius, Vita Hosii). Krasinski says of him: his learning could not, however, free his mind from the unchristian notions inculcated by the same Church, that voluntary self-torment is acceptable to the Father of all mercy; and being a rigid observer of those practices which are more in accordance with pagan rites than the mild precepts of Christianity, and which that Church recommends, he frequently lacerated his own body by severe flagellations, spilling his own blood with the same fervor as he would have spilled that of the opponents of the Pope (Reform. of Poland, p. 406).

The best edition of his works is that of Cologne, 1584, in two fol. We mention: 1) De expresso verbo Dei: Rom., 1559. 2) Dialogus num calicem laicis et uxores sacerdotibus, &c. 3) Judicium et censura de judicio ministrorum Tigurinorum et Heidelbergensium, &c. 4) Confutatio Prolegomenon Brentii. 5) De loco et auctoritate Rom. Pontificis. 6) De sacerdotem conjugio. 7) De missa vulgari lingua celebranda. 8) Propugnatio Christ. Cath. Doctr. Comp. Biog. by Rescius and Dr. A. Eichhorn, Sixt, Paul Vergerius, 1855, p. 425; Hist. Sketch of Rise, Progress, and Decline of Reformation in Poland, &c., by Count Valerian Krasinski, 2 vols.: London, 1830 and 1840.

K. SUDHOFF.—Ermentrout.

Hospinian, Rudolph, born in Altorf, canton Zürich, Nov. 7, 1547. On his return from the Reformed Universities of Marburg and Heidelberg, he entered the ministry, 1568. In 1576 he became principal of the Carolina school, the duties of which, in connection with those of his parish, he discharged for 19 years. His biographer, Heidegger, says of him: Ferreum certe adamantinumque dixeris, qui tot labores exantillare et simul ingenium a situ et squalore vindicare posset. To demolish the Papacy appears to have been one of his objects. On this point Heideg. remarks: "Impetum concepit animo suo plane heroicum et laude nunquam intermoritura dignissimum fictitiæ illius vetustatis spectrum debellandi Gibeoniticæque artes et fraudes, monstratis genuinis errorum, qui paulatim detegendi, concellandique. Et magnæ quidem molis, immensusque laboris opus aggrediebatur, cum de cælesti doctrina et ceremoniis veræ primitivæ ecclesiæ, cum de inclinatione et depravatione ejusdem doctrinæ, deque ceremoniarum mutatione, autione et progressu iis seculis, quæ Christum et Apostolos primum deinde vere Constantinum Imperatorem imprimis autem Gregorium M. secutæ sunt. His first work on these subjects, De origine et progressu Rituum et Ceremoniarum Ecclesiasticarum, appeared in 1585; two years later, his De templis, hoc est de origine, progressu et abusu templorum, ac omnino rerum omnium ad templa pertinentium; in 1588, his De Monachis, seu de origine et progressu Monachatus ac Ordinum Monasticorum, Equitum militarium tam sacrorum quam secularium omnium; in 1592 and 1593, his De festis Judæorum et ethnicorum, hoc est de origine, progressu, ceremoniis et ritibus festorum dierum Christianorum; in 1598 and 1602, his Historia sacramentaria, with the title, De origine et progressu controversiæ sacram., de cæna Domini inter lutheranos et orthodoxos, quos Zwinglianos et Calvinistas vocant, exortæ ab anno Christi Salv. 1517 usque ad annum, 1602; in 1617, his Concordia discors, seu de origine, progressu, formulæ concordiæ Bergensis; in 1619, his Historia Jesuitica. These productions created a great sensation over all Europe, and placed Hosp. in the first rank of theologians. The Catholics pitted against him their most distinguished champions, such as Bellarmine and Gretscher, and the embittered Lutherans fought him with extravagant zeal. His reply to Leonard Hutter, who had in hand the review of his Historia sacram. and the Concordia discors, was never published. Of another treatise, which it appears shared the same fate, Heidegg. says: "Neque tamen opus isthoc ad metam perduxit seu lædio victus et maledecentiis adversarii, qui nescio quibus agitaturs furius ubique insultare, quam cum ratione quadam disputare maluit, seu fastidium subiit docendi, funem molestæ adeo conventionis, qua non tantum animos veritatis facta copia sauciatis ægrosque, magis exulceratum iri, sed etiam capitales religionis hostes. Jesuitas cum primis, infausti certaminis illius futuros spectatores avidissimos delicias jucundo ejusmodi spectacula sibi futuros metuit. Hutter can by no means be put on an equality with Hosp., who, for the sake of peace and of the various governments which desired a cessation of religious disputations, withheld many things which were to his own advantage. (See his letter to Wolfgang Amling, Aug. 22, 1607.) His countrymen now loaded him with fresh honors, but he did not live long to enjoy them. His devotion to science and the doctrine of his Church had undermined his constitution. He endured blindness for one year, and, in his 76th year, became idiotic. Death relieved him of his sufferings, March 11, 1626. The best edition of his works appeared at Geneva, 1681. 7 fol., to which is prefixed Hospinianus rediens seu historia vitæ et obitus Rod. Hospin., by J. H. Heideggeri.

K. SUDHOFF.—Ermentrout.

Hospital (Michael de L'), born, 1506, at Aigueperse, in Auvergne, studied at Toulouse and Padua, and became Auditor of the Rota in Rome. On his return home, he was the recipient of various imperial honors, and was finally created Chancellor, 1560. A learned, ingenious, dignified, and honest statesman, he adorned his character with a morality such as is seldom found in men of his profession. Inspired with a national idea, and abhorring sectionalism, he sought to unite the ecclesiastical factions that divided his country, in a hearty, cordial support of its interests. The excited religionists of his day could not appreciate the sentiments he uttered on Dec. 13, 1560, when he said before an assembly of the States that, as Christianity had neither been founded nor spread by arms, exhor-tions availed more than force, and advised them to drop names, such as Lutherans, Huguenots, Papists, and keep unchanged that of Christ. He seemed to think that good-for-nothing people were to be found in all religious societies, and that the devil had most to do with religious dissensions. And so, in April, 1561, he proposed a decree, granting toleration to all parties, and inviting back refugees. He was forced, however, to content himself with mitigating the severity of the laws on this subject. His remarks he made before the Conference at Meaux, Sept. 9, 1561, are worthy of being recorded. "It is first of all necessary," said he, "that you be united in spirit. To accomplish this, let no one think himself better than another, avoid all wire-drawn subtleties, and strive to know only the divine Word and Christ. Do not look upon the adherents of the new doctrines as enemies: instead of hating them, love them and seek to gain them, for they are baptized and, like ourselves, Christians. You are not to determine which religion is the better, but how to uphold the State, and secure the public peace," &c. He obtained for the nobility the privilege of worshipping in their own castles. His opposition, 1564, to the reception of all the Tridentine decrees, brought him into collision with the Cardinal of Lorraine. Pope Paul IV. demanded his dismissal, but the Chancellor retained his position. His denunciation of the shameful breach of the peace of Longjumeau, which his exertions had brought to pass, interrupted the amicable relations that had hitherto obtained between him and Catharine. Resigning the Chancellorship, Oct. 7, 1586, he retired to his country-seat at Vignay, near Etampes. He died May 13, 1573, 68 years old — a wise as well as an honest statesman. Of his writings we have: Epistolæ seu sermones; harangue contenant la remonstration faite devant CHARLES IX., and poemata. He was an accomplished Latinist. Many of his poems were classical, in the full sense of this term. Comp. Vie d'Hopital, Amsterdam, 1762; F. Raumer, Gesch. Europa's, Bd. II.; Soldan, Gesch. des Prot. in Frankreich, Bd. II.

DR. PRESSEL.—Ermentrout.

Hospitalist brothers — those lay-brothers, monks, and knights, who, while leading an ascetic life, nursed the poor and sick in hospitals. Each brotherhood had a Superior, and over all presided a General. Some of their societies were independent of Episcopal jurisdiction, being responsible only to the Pope. They first originated in Italy, in 9th cent., in the Order U. L. Fr. della Scala. They multiplied with extraordinary rapidity in the time of the Crusades, and, spreading over France, England, Spain, Portugal, Germany, Netherlands, Bohemia, Poland, reached even the West Indies. As spiritual knights, they were divided into knights, priests, and serving-brothers. To this class belong the Hosp. of St. Antony, founded by Gaston, 1095; of St. John (Fratres hospital. S. Joannis) in Jerusalem (1099); of the German knights (Equites Teutonici hospital. s. Mariæ Virginis); of the Holy Ghost, by Guido, 1178, of Burgos (1212), of John of God (de Dieu), of Bethlehemites (1655), &c.

NEUDECKER.—Ermentrout.

Hospitalist sisters, called also "daughters of God," were nuns and lay-sisters, who, besides discharging the duties just mentioned, also undertook the education of girls, particularly orphans, and the reformation of women who had forgotten to be virtuous. They are still to be found in France, Netherlands, and in Italy. Of them we mention the order of St. Gervasius (founded 1171), of St. Catharine in Paris (1222), of St. Martha in Burgundy, of the Holy Ghost, of Loches and St. Joseph, of Bethlehemites (17th century).

NEUDECKER.—Ermentrout.

Host (oblation), is the name given, in the Romish and (in part) Lutheran Churches, to the wafers of flour and water used by those Churches as the sacramental bread (panes eucharist., orbiculares, ἄpros σπογγωσίδης, Epiphan.). The composition and form of this bread occasioned violent controversies, first between the Eastern and Western Churches, then between Lutheran and Reformed theologians. Certain traces of unleavened bread at the communion are not found in the Latin Church prior to the 9th cent., when Rab. Maurus recommended it. But the Rom. Church contend for its use in the 2d cent., although under Innocent I. consecrated bread is called fermentum. Even in the 9th and following centuries, Photius, and other prominent opponents of the West, say nothing of a diversity upon this point (see Azymites). The Greeks had antiquity on their side. Indeed, originally the communion bread and wine were taken from the προσφορæ, oblationes, of the members, and the custom of preparing special bread for the sacrament was introduced with the development of the doctrine of transubstantiation, and the mystical view of the sacraments. The Rom. Church urged the insignificance of the distinction, and appealed to Luke 22:7, as favoring the use of unleavened bread. Later, it was argued that unmixed wheat flour was a symbol of the unspotted paschal lamb; hence, long after the lay oblationes had ceased, the wafers were called oblata, and, after the consecration, hostiæ. The Greeks replied that, as Christ had instituted the Supper on the evening before the passover, he used leavened bread, the unleavened having not been prepared until the following day. At the Synod of Florence, 1439, the matter was compromised by admitting the use of both kinds; but Constant. refused to sign the formula. At the Reformation no general change was made of the Romish custom. In Zurich and Geneva, as in Wittenberg, oblata were used. After some time, however, the Lutheran Church alone retained them, as ἀδιαφόρον. The Reformed Church (Zurich excepted) rejected wafers, as lacking the nutritive property of bread, and precluding the εὐχαριστία. In the united Church of Prussia, strips of bread, cut across, are used. The oblata of the Romanists and Lutherans usually have the impress of a cross or lamb.

GRÜNEISEN.*

Hubertine Annalist, or anonymous author of the Chronicles of St. Hubert's Monastery in Arduenna, living in the middle of the 11th cent. In his Chron. St. Hub. Andaginensis, he imitated the style of Sallust. L. C. BETHMANN and W. WATTENBACH issued a new edition of it in PERTZ

Script., VIII., 565–630, where the following opinion of the author is expressed: "satis habeamus nosse, auctorem operis fuisse virum inter medias res versatum, acrem judicis, veritatis studiosum; hoc enim totum ejus dicendi genus, hoc simplex et sincera rerum narratio suadent."

P.*

Hubert's Order.—St. Hubert, the son of Bertrand, Duke of Guienne, early entered the service of Theodorick, the Frank. king, and became passionately fond of hunting. After his wife's death he entered the monastery of Stablov. A legend says that whilst hunting on a Good Friday in the forest of Ardenne, near a monastery, he met a deer with a brilliant crucifix between his horns, which led him to abandon the chase, and devote himself to the Church. After Lamprecht's martyrdom (708), he became B. of Mästricht and Liege, and built a cathedral in Liege in honor of Lamprecht. Many years after H.'s death (727), his body remained uncorrupted. He was canonized, and his body placed (827) in the monastery, which was thenceforth called St. Hubert's. It was the popular belief that St. Peter gave Hubert power to cast out devils, and cure the bite of mad dogs. Hubert became the patron of hunting, and his anniversary is observed on Nov. 3.—Several orders were founded in his honor, among them that in Bavaria bearing his name. NEUDECKER.*

Hübmaier, Balthasar (Hübmr), born at Friedberg, near Augsburg, c. 1480, was a zealous advocate and promoter of the Anabaptist (see Art.) agitation of his day. He possessed popular oratorical powers, and could easily sway the multitude by his earnest appeals. When he first changed his views, as a Romish priest, he embraced evangelical views, especially those then spreading in Switzerland. But before long his fanatical tendencies showed themselves, and he ranged himself under Münstzer's banner. The principal field of his efforts was Waldshut. In support of his views he wrote numerous works, especially upon the sacraments. At length he was arrested by the Austrian government as a seditionist, and condemned to the stake. He was burned at Vienna, March 10, 1528. His wife, who firmly clung to him, was drowned in the Danube three days later.—See Letters of Zwingli and Oecolamp. FÜSSLIN'S Beiträge zur Ref.-Gesch. II. FABRI, Ursach warum d. Wiedertäufer Patron * * * Hubmayer verbrannt sei, 1528. RAUPACH, Evang. Oesterr. II., 52. SCHELHORN, Acta hist. eccl.: Ulm, 1738. SCHREIBER'S Biographie im Taschenb. f. Gesch. in Süddeutschl., 1839, 1840 (not completed). Some of H.'s works are reprinted in the Unschuld. Nachr., 1746. SCHELHORN, Samml. f. Gesch., u. dessen Beitr. z. Erläut. d. schwäb. K.-gesch. STÄUDLIN, K.-hist. Archiv, 1826). CUNITZ.*

Hucbald (Hucbold, Hugbald, Hubald, Ubald), was probably born about 850, and was placed, as was customary, in youth, at a monastery. He enjoyed the tuition of his learned uncle Milo, in the monasterium Elnonense (St. Amandus), and during a long life became an ornament of that institution. Under Milo, H. made rapid progress in his studies, and excelled in music.

"philosopher," i. e., teacher of the liberal arts, and continued in the post for 60 years. He devoted his talents mainly to the advancement of music as a science. First he established the laws of harmony (diaphonia), then invented musical signs, and prepared books of instruction. The Abbot Gerbert of St. Blasius published (Scriptores eccl. de musica, T. I.) three works of Hucbald: de harmonica institutione sive de musica; musica enchiridialis; and comment. brevis de tonis et psalmis modulandis. The second had the widest circulation.—H. was also a great linguist and a poet. He wrote a Latin comic poem of 130 lines, each of which begins with a C (Charles the Bald). He likewise wrote some saints' lives, which are valuable as sources, especially Vita S. Lebuini. He died in 930, when the Annales Elnonenses majores remark: obiit Hucbaldus philosophus.—(See CASIM. OEDK. comm. de scr. eccl., II., 417, &c. MARTIN GERBERT, scr. eccl. de musica, St. Blas., 1784, sq. T. I., pref. n. VII.). ALBRECHT VOGEL.*

Hugo de Sancto Caro, so-called from his native place, a suburb of Vienne in Dauphiné; sometimes also called Hugo de St. Theodora. At Paris he studied theology and canon law, and in 1224 entered the celebrated Dominican monastery of St. James. On account of his erudition he was often consulted in difficult ecclesiastical matters. In 1236 the Chapter-General of his order entrusted to him the correction of the Vulgate, according to ancient manuscripts. Somewhat later he was one of the commissioners who examined and condemned the Introductorius in Evangelium æternum, composed by Gerhard the Franciscan, and developing the fanatical doctrines of Alb. Joachim of Flore. He was equally active in the controversy of William de St. Amour with the mendicant orders. In 1245 he was appointed by Innocent IV. as Cardinal of St. Sabina. He died in 1263 at Orvieto, but was buried at Lyons. His works are merely collectanea, which display, however, much diligence and reading. His correction of the Vulgate is said to have been made according to the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin manuscripts of the age of Charlemagne, of which, however, little is known. He seems also to have had but a limited knowledge of the original languages of the Scriptures. From his correction arose the formerly much used Correctorium Biblicæ Saronicum, as yet unpublished. We possess of him also: Postilla in univ. Bibl., juxt. quadrupl. sensum, short explanations of words, in order to unfold their literal, allegorical, mystical, and moral sense, in which often the queerest and most ridiculous notions occur. It has often been printed. Speculum Ecclesiæ: Lyons, 1554, designed for the instruction of priests in their office; Sacrorum Bibl. Concordantiæ, an alphabetical index of all the words of the Vulgate, with the places in which they occur. This work, which first made the division into chapters general, has been often printed. We possess of him in MS., Sermones sup. Evang. et Epist., a commentary on the four books of sentences, and the processus in libr. Evang. æterni. Besides these there are found in French libraries a number of works bearing the name Hugo cardinalis, or Hugo magister;

it is difficult to decide from what Hugo they originate.—See concerning H. de St. Cher, and the manuscripts and editions of his works: QUÉTIF ET ECHARD, Scriptores ordinis prædicatorum, I., 194; and Hist. littér. de la France, XIX., 38, sq. C. SCHMIDT.—Reinecke.

Hugo de Flavigny, a son of Rainer by a daughter of Crotilda, sister of the Emp. Conrad the Salian, was born 1065, in or near Verdun, and educated in the monastery of St. Vitonius, at Verdun. A persecution against the Bishop here led him, with the other members, to Flavigny, then to Dijon, where the Abbot of St. Benignus, Jarenton, kindly received him. He accompanied the Abbot, 1095–6, to Italy, and in 1097 became Abbot of Flavigny, but lost the office in 1101. Thenceforth he seems to have joined the imperial party. In 1111 he became Abbot of St. Vannes, and still held it in 1115. He is author of: Chron. Virdunense, a quibusdam dictum Flaviacense, hist. eccl. undecimi præsertim seculi thesaurus incomparabilis. Ex ipso auctoris authographo MS., quod servatur in Bibl. Collegii Claromontani Parisiensis Societati Jesu, nunc primum prodit. (In Ph. Labbei nov. Bibl. MSS. libro, T. I., 75). It reaches from the birth of Christ to 1002, and from then to 1102. The latest edition, PERTZ, Script., T. VIII., 280–504. P.*

Hugo de St. Victor ranks with Abelard and Bernard of Clairvaux (see Arts.) as a representative of the revived literature in the 12th cent. He was a speculative mystic, a man of deep religious experience, the John of his age. And in harmony with his Johannean nature, he was of so retired a habit, that but little is known of his external life. The place of his birth is in dispute. But he is generally called Saxon (not Gallus), descended, say some, from the Dukes of Blankenburg (HENRICI MEYERII, jun. rerum german., T. III.: Helmst., 688, fol., 427, sq.), whilst other older accounts (Hist. littér. de la France, T. XII.) call him lothariensis, and territorium Yprense, his birth-place. Against the former opinion we have his own words (Eruditio didascalica, III.): Ego a PUERO exulavi, et scio, quo maerore animus arcum aliquando PAUPERIS TUGURII fundum deserat, qua libertate postea marmoreos lares et tecta laqueata respiciat.—Born c. 1097, Hugo was early placed in the monastery of Hamersleben, near Halberstadt, probably by the advice of his uncle Hugo, Archd. at Halberstadt (Neander's account is not supported by the authorities). From his youth H. was thoughtful and studious, diligently using such facilities as he could command. It was his love of study, more than the wars then disturbing the country, which led him, c. 1115, to accompany his uncle Hugo to Paris, then the centre of learning, where they both joined the monks regular of St. Augustine in the monastery of St. Victor, then under Abbot Gilduin; the school was under the prior Thomas, who had filled that post since the withdrawal of William of Champeaux. Hugo became the successor of Thomas, and remained in this secluded post until his death. Of his official labors we know but little, excepting that, though of a feeble body, he could inflame his pupils with love for the truth and for science, and earnestly warned them against the brilliant but perilous attractions of his eloquent cotemporary Abelard. From his few extant letters, especially to Bernhard, we also gather that he took a lively interest in the affairs of the Church. When he found his end approaching he confessed his sins with tears, and desired to receive the Holy Supper. This done, he audibly commended his spirit into the hands of the Lord, and died 1141, one year earlier than Abelard. On his tombstone was truly inscribed: Claruit ingenio, moribus, ore, stylo.

A fuller view of Hugo's character and spirit is obtained from his writings, which he is said to have begun in early youth, and continued to his end. In these two periods may be discovered, the former that of a one-sided mysticism, the latter that of a harmonious development of conflicting views. To the latter belong the eruditio didascalica and de sacramentis christ. fidei; the summa sententiarum was only a prelude to de sacr. chr. fidei.—Hugo was not a creative reformatory spirit; his talent was to elucidate and develop existing systems. In the struggle between mysticism (Bernhard) and scholasticism (Abelard) H. was on Bernhard's side; but he aimed at harmonizing the two, so that in his writings, sometimes the one, then the other, becomes prominent. But his mysticism, like B.'s, always rests upon a practical religious basis. Hence he assails, at once, dialectics, which philosophize but teach nothing, and a mysticism which allegorizes without understanding the letter, and he recommends the study of empirical sciences, the Bible and the Church Fathers. This led him to write his de erud. didasc., of which the first three books are a sort of practical encycl., the other three an introduction to the Holy Scriptures (the 7th book in the usual edition is an independent work).—Starting from Wisdom as the lowest basis of all knowledge, he divides knowledge into intelligence, science, and logic. Intelligence, or higher knowledge, he classifies as theorics or speculation, and ethics, or, as he terms it, practica. Science (also called mechanics) includes the knowledge of the arts and manufactures. Logic, including grammar, rhetoric, and dialectics, though last invented, must have the precedence in education. Theorics includes theology, mathematics, and physics; mathematics: arithmetic, music, geometry, and astronomy. At the close of this part of the work he complains of the usual neglect of these practical studies, and assumes as requisite qualifications for study, natural talents, practice, and moral discipline, especially the last.—In the other three books it is noteworthy how decidedly he distinguishes between the canonical and apocryphal books of the Bible, and indulges in other liberal remarks in adherence to Jerome. In exegesis he adopted, as was then usual, the threefold sense: the historical, allegorical, and tropological, though he admits that these senses are not to be found in all passages. Indeed he demands in theory, that the historical take precedence of the allegorical sense: "si litera tollitur, scriptura quid est." He divides Bible students into three classes: the foolish and miserable, those who hope by its study to secure wealth and renown; the inconsiderate, those who study God's Word and works only because they are wonderful; the praiseworthy, those who study that they may grow in heavenly grace and knowledge.—It was this work which gained for Hugo the title magister or didascalus. Of greater theological importance are the other two works named above.

Although in his summa we have but a sketch of the doctrines of the Church, he exhibits therein his own theological studies, so that from it, compared with his other writings, we obtain the best idea of his views and of the peculiarities of his system. In correspondence with Paul's trichotomy of body, soul, and spirit, Hugo distinguishes a threefold eye in man: a bodily eye for visible things, the eye of reason, by which man sees his own soul and its faculties, and the eye of contemplation, susceptible of divine impressions. But sin blinded the last, and obscured the second, leaving only the first clear. Now instead of contemplation we have faith, the merit of which is that it realizes without seeing. But reason has not been so obscured as to excuse man's ignorance of divine things. He acutely distinguishes between what is ex ratione, secundum, supra, and contra r., and shows that only the second and third can be objects of faith. Faith is supported by reason, reason perfected by faith. The certainty of faith is superior to opinion, but not to knowledge; still a scire quod ipsum sit must precede faith; after faith comes intelligere quid ipsum sit. But the true value of faith consists in its enabling the heart to apprehend and love God (fides, voluntaria quædam certitudo absentium supra opinionem et infra scientiam constituta). Upon the basis of faith rises mystical contemplation, that foretaste of heaven. The means of attaining to this is oratio et operatio. He distinguishes tres animæ rationalis visionis, viz., cogitatio, meditatio, contemplatio. In the first, the spirit is only superficially aroused; meditat. seeks after the ground of things; contempl. actually apprehends them (meditatio quærit, contemplatio possidet).—In these views we find the groundwork of Hugo's numerous mystical writings, his annotationes in Dionys. Areop. de cælesti hierarchia, de arca morali, de arca mystica, de vanitate mundi, his beautiful monologue upon "the pledge of the soul."—His de sacramentis fidei is mainly occupied with the opera restorationis: the 1st book treating of redemption from the Creation to the incarnation of the Word; the 2d, from then until the Judgment. He regards man as the end of Creation, but God as the end of man. In the doctrine of the divine attributes he assumes, with Abelard, power, wisdom, and goodness as the primary attributes of God, but opposes Abelard's view that what God does is the limit of his omnipotence. He endeavors, like Anselm, to exhibit the doctrine of the Trinity by its analogy with the human spirit. Spirit, wisdom, and love, correspond with the three divine persons, with the difference that human wisdom and love are changeable affections, but not so the divine.—His reserve upon the doctrine of angels is notable.—In anthropology, Hugo follows Augustine (he was even called alter Aug.), striving to soften the severities of A.'s system. In order to harmonize human freedom with divine omnipotence, he distinguishes between willing per se, and the fixing of the will upon something definite; the former is free, the latter bound by the moral government of God. Hence God is not actor ruendi, but merely ordinator incedendi.—He is the first to advance distinctly the idea of gratia superaddita. Grace is creatrix and salvatrix. The former involved the power not to sin; positively to do good required gr. appositæ. But after the fall, gr. operans had to be added to gr. coöperans. He supposes the essence of original sin to consist in ignorance and concupiscence.—Hugo was the first among the scholastics who gave definiteness to the doctrine of the sacraments. Augustine's definition of them as sacra rei signum, does not satisfy him. In his summa he calls a sacrament a visibilis forma invisibilis gratiæ in eo collatæ, and in de sacr. f. still more distinctly: a corporeal, actually perceptible element, which by virtue of the divine institution exhibits, and really contains, symbolically, invisible grace. He is, also, the first who distinctly names seven sacraments, though giving special prominence to baptism and the holy supper. He of course holds transubstantiation, calling the mode of the change transitio; but the main thing with him is communion with Christ, through the sacrament.—In regard to vows, he maintains that a vow to surrender ourselves wholly to God, can never be dispensed. Some of his expressions remind one of Reformation theses.—The ethical section of his work reveals Hugo's inner life, especially where he speaks of the excellency of Christian love. His prudence, however, is displayed in the decided manner in which he speaks against the so-called theory of disinterested love. This ignores the essential character of love, which cannot be conceived of apart from a longing after the object beloved (non amares, si non desiderares). He wrote a special treatise, de laude caritatis, in which, as the Benedictines appropriately say, love is describing love. Ardent love to Christ was, indeed, the ruling principle of Hugo's life, and his beautiful saying: ubi caritas est, claritas est, furnishes the best outline of his character.—Although he lived secluded, his ideas exerted great influence on succeeding periods. Richard de St. Victor and Peter Lombard, though inferior to Hugo in religious depth, were the most distinguished advocates of his views—the former in their mystical, the latter in their scholastic aspect.—There are five editions of Hugo's works: Paris, 1526; Venice, 1588; Mayence; Cologne, 1617; and Rouen, 1648. The ed. princeps is the best, but all are scarce. A new, carefully-sifted edition is needed. As worthy preparations for this, we name OUDIN, Comm. de script. eccl.; the Benedictine Hist. lit. de la France, T. XII.; and LIEBNER's excellent monograph on Hugo: Lpz., 1832.

SCHNEIDER.*

Humility (ταπεινότης, humilitas (χαμηλός) found on the earth), as the derivation of the word implies, is opposed to high-mindedness, and, therefore, in general that virtue which keeps man from thinking more of himself than he ought (Rom. 12: 3), and leads him to keep himself subject to his superiors. And as God is above all, humility shows itself as a sense of

entire dependence upon God, and is thus the root of all piety. In the strictest sense of the word, it is only in our relation to God that humility can be exercised; our relations to each other call only for modesty. And this is the more evident in view of the fact that, in the former case, humility results not merely from a sense of dependence, but from a consciousness of our moral defects in contrast with the holiness and justice of God, of our sinfulness and guilt.—Among the great spirits of ancient times, in the classical world, Sophocles approximated nearest to the true idea of humility. It runs as a thread of light through the piety of the Old Test., from Genesis (17 : 1) to Micah (6 : 8), and John the Baptist (Matt. 3 : 2).—Although Christ was without sin, humility shines forth in his life (Matt. 19 : 17; John 5 : 30), and he demands it as a condition of entrance into his kingdom (Matt. 5 : 3; 18 : 2). But if humility is necessary to prepare us for repentance and faith, it must also continue to animate the Christian; and, though sensible of personal impotence (1 Cor. 4 : 7; 2 Cor. 3 : 5), or even because of this consciousness, it must urge him to work out his salvation with fear and trembling (Phil. 2 : 12; 1 : 12). And if supreme love to God in Christ is the soul of the Christian life, it must, in more than one respect, maintain its true character, through humility, and, when needful, act as a corrective against mystic and quietistic errors. If it is grateful, reciprocal love, springing from humility, humility will continually accompany it in pure, prayerful reverence for God, in unqualified obedience to him, and confident trust in him, which will meekly bow to trials and sufferings, even as it will bear prosperity without self-complacent exultation—yea, will kiss the rod, assured that whoso thus humbleth himself shall be exalted; and yet it will do this without improper regard to such a reward (1 Pet. 5 : 6; Luke 17 : 10). Hence also it does not affect a self-imposed humility (Col. 2 : 23), such as is often met with in the Romish Church, and even in much of the extreme pietism of the Protestant Church, the obnoxious pride of which is poorly masked under its lowly garbs. But of true humility involuntarily shows itself in the language and entire life of the Christian, its caricature becomes hypocrisy (Luke 18 : 13, &c.). Its mask falls off in its conduct towards others. For the Scriptures, so far as their whole spirit is opposed to all simulation and flattery, require men to exercise towards each other a humility based in humility before God and animated by love. True humility, however, presupposes proper self-respect, which exhibits itself in patience, meekness, goodness, kindness, peaceableness, and a forgiving disposition (Matt. 5 : 5; 1 : 29; Rom. 12; Eph. 4 : 2; Phil. 2 : 3; Col. 3 : 12; 1 Pet. 5 : 5; James 4 : 5, &c.).—(See MOSHEIM'S Sittenlehre; REINHARD'S Moral; SCHLEIERMACHER, Christl. Sitte; MARHEINEKE'S Moral; HIRSCHER, III., 114; MORUS, de hom. se submitte Deo).

E. SCHWARZ.*

Humility, the Order of, founded, say some, under Henry II., others in 1134 under Lothaire, others under Fred. I. in 1158–63; all agree that it was established by nobles carried as captives from Lombardy to Germany, after their return, in fulfilment of a vow. They adopted the Benedict. rule. Innocent III. confirmed the order, and it rapidly spread in Upper Italy. Later, many abuses crept into it. Borromeo attempted to reform it, but only excited a conspiracy against himself, for which Pius V., 1571, dissolved it. But the female order of the name still exists in Italy. Their rules bind them to severe penances, fastings, and prayers, especially during Lent.

NEUDECKER.*

Hunting (Gen. 10 : 9; 25 : 27, 28; 27 : 3; Jer. 16 : 16).—Whilst the earth was still thinly populated, and wild animals could multiply without hindrance, their destruction was thought a meritorious service. In heathen antiquity, the heroes of the chase are ranked among the greatest benefactors, and exalted to demigods; thus Nimrod of Babylon, and Hercules of Greece (called ἀλκιμαχός, αὐτῆρ). Opposed to this estimate is the judgment of the Bible, indicated by the name of Nimrod (= we will revolt), and the exclusion of Ishmael and Esau from the line of promise (Gen. 21 : 20; 25 : 27). Esau's grandson was called Kenaz = venatus est (so the Kenizzites, and several members of Caleb's family, Gen. 36 : 11, 15, 42; 15 : 19; Numb. 32 : 12; Josh. 14 : 6; 15 : 3; 1 Chron. 4 : 13, 15), with reference to hunting. The natural tendency of hunting is to produce restlessness and roughness of manners. The Lord did not wish his people, therefore, to become a nation of hunters. It is true a pastoral people (see Shepherds) had to protect themselves against wild beasts, especially the Israelites from their exposure to adjacent wildernesses (Judges 14 : 8; 1 Sam. 17 : 34, &c.; 2 Sam. 23 : 20; Jer. 49 : 19; 50 : 44; 12 : 8). During periods of their downfall, and of the depopulation of the country, wild beasts gained an ascendancy, as a divine punishment (Exod. 23 : 29; Deut. 7 : 22; 2 Kings 17 : 25; Jer. 5 : 6; Ezek. 14 : 15). To prevent the increase of wild animals, the Israelites were to take gradual possession of Canaan, as they became able to settle and cultivate it. As cultivation progressed, wild animals decreased. It is doubtful whether even game was spared, considering the injury done by deer, &c., to agriculture; only an exception was made in sabbatical years (Exod. 23 : 11; Lev. 25 : 7. Cf. Lev. 17 : 13). The blood of animals slain in the chase was to be fully shed, and covered with earth (Deut. 12 : 15; cf. 14 : 5). Roens and harts were not to be offered in sacrifice, but might be eaten. Venison was formerly, as still, a favorite dish (Gen. 27 : 3, &c.). The law also provided for the protection of birds, both clean, for eating, and unclean, for the destruction of worms (Deut. 22 : 6, &c.; 1 Sam. 26 : 20).—In destroying wild animals, the bow was used (Gen. 27 : 3; 21 : 20), a javelin (Ps. 57 : 4), or only the hands (1 Sam. 17 : 34). They were also taken in nets (Ps. 18 : 5; Job 19 : 6, 8; Isa. 51 : 20), gins and snares (Ps. 18 : 5; Job 18 : 10, spring-nets). Lions were taken in pitfalls and cisterns (2 Sam. 17 : 9; Isa. 24 : 17), in one covered with snow (2 Sam. 23 : 20; Ps. 57 : 6; 9 : 15; 119 : 85. Cf. SHAW, Travels, &c.; PLINY, 10, 54). At a post in a pit a lamb was fastened, that its cries might attract the lion, which, leaping down, could easily be secured. Thus taken alive, the lion, with a ring thrust through its nose, was put in a cage, and carried off in triumph (Ezek. 19 : 4-9). Hunting, with its various arts and perils, is often employed in figurative descriptions (Job 18 : 7, &c.). There is reference to the use of dogs in the chase, in Ps. 22 : 16 (cf. Jos., Antt., IV., 8, 9).—In the post-exile period, the Jews caught from the Persians (XEN. Cyrop., I., 6, 19; VIII., 1, 3), Syrians, and Egyptians (WILKINSON, Anc. Eg., III., 4), a passion for hunting as a noble exercise (Sirach 11 : 31; 13 : 22. Cf. Jos., Antt., XV., 7, 7; XVI., 10, 3; B. J., I., 21, 13. Also HOM. Il., X., 11; Od. XIX., 438. STRABO, 5, 215. POLYB., 31, 22. CURT., 9, 1, 31. PLIN., 8, 61. AELIAN, anim., 8, 24. SHAW, l. c., 300. HARMAR, III., 79. D'ARVIEUX, III., 94, &c., 269). Herod is said to have been an admirable hunter, and killed 40 animals in one day. Game bitten by a dog was, of course, not eaten by the strict Jews. In hunting partridges, tame ones were used, in Sirach's time, as decoys (Sir. 11 : 31). The manner of hunting in countries penetrated by Greek cultivation, may be ascertained from XENOPH. lib. de venat., and OPIAN's ζωοηγετικά.—(See BOCHART's hieroz., I., 751-64).

LEYRER.*

Hus, John, (not Huss, as it is generally written, which the Cheskian would read Husch; in the genitive the name takes a second s, like os, ossis) was born in the year 1369, or, according to others, in 1373, at Husinec, a village of Bohemia. His parents were common people, but not without means. He studied at the University of Prague, and took the usual degrees. The turn of his mind was practical, and its development slow. History tells us very little of his youth, and it has been supposed that he did not distinguish himself among his fellow-students. In the whole appearance of Hus there was nothing which made the impression of greatness; his was more a passive than an energetic nature. He is represented to have been a tall man, with a thin, pale face; acute, learned, grave, and of austere morals. Even the Jesuit Balbinus bears testimony to this effect, in Epit. rer. Bohem., p. 431. In the year 1398, Hus began his career at the University as teacher; and in the following year had the first open dispute with his colleagues, in reference to several dogmas of Wickliffe. Hus had been reading the works of this Reformer, since 1391, and, without question, these had exercised a great, but by no means the only, nor the chief, influence upon him. On the contrary, the origin of his theological tendency must be sought in the writings of Matthias von Janow. This worthy disciple of Milicz reproduced the idea of a universal priesthood, and labored for the moral renovation of the Church, according to the pattern of the apostolical. The same thing was the great object which Hus had in view. To this end his office as preacher, which he held in addition to his professorship, afforded him the best opportunities. While dean of the philosophical faculty (to which dignity he attained on Oct. 15, 1401), he was appointed preacher in the Bethlehem chapel, the charter of which required the gospel to be proclaimed in the vernacular from its pulpit. Here it was that the words first re-echoed, at whose sound the walls of Rome shook. Hus appealed chiefly to the understanding of his hearers. The acuteness and perspicacity of his mind, the skill with which he took up the pith of a question, and the facility with which he developed it, his extensive reading, especially in the Holy Scriptures, the firmness and sober consistency with which he maintained a whole system of articles; together with the circumstance that in nearly all the other churches of Prague, there was no preaching, and the services were conducted in Latin by priests from Germany;—all these things made Hus so popular, that his chapel could not hold the multitudes which flocked to hear him. Dr. J. Nowotny is engaged, at present, in translating into German a collection of sermons by Hus, which the Moravian Brethren brought to Herrnhut, in the last century. This work¹ gives a better insight, than ever before, into the character of Hus as a preacher. From the contents of the sermons, it is evident that they were delivered in the last years of his life. They are eminently sermons for the times, and hence full of polemics. Hus generally treats his text in a homiletical manner, introducing explanations from the Church Fathers, especially from Augustine, and insisting on the necessity of vital Christianity. His castigatory discourses are directed especially against the clergy, of high and low rank. What his views were in this respect, is seen from his sermon preached on the 5th Sunday in Lent, Judica (comp. J. Hus, Predigten, Part II., p. 77). His opinion on withholding the Bible from the common people, is set forth in the sermon delivered on the 6th Sunday after Epiphany (comp. J. Hus, Predigten, Part I., p. 45). In other passages of these discourses, Hus opposes the sending of substitutes to the livings; speaks against those of the clergy who considered human statutes as of more importance than the commandments of God; and especially inveighs against such priests as led immoral lives—calling them simoniacs, betrayers and barterers of divine truth, and saying that they were men who studied papal rules, but showed utter indifference to what Christ commanded and taught. The sermons of Hus are important, not only because they excited the bitterest enmity against him, but particularly in so far as they make known the points in which he attempted a reformation of the Church. By our reference to their contents we have, however, anticipated the history of his career. To every step which Hus took against the Church, he was driven, solely and alone, by the stress of outward circumstances. His operations were not the result of a free, inner, and least of all, of a systematic development. This explains the circumstance that the consequences of his reformatory plans remained hidden to himself, and that he allowed certain abuses of the Romish Church to continue unopposed. The outward occasions for withstanding them were wanting. Thus, f. i., we do not find a trace of his having disapproved of the worship of saints, or of the celibacy of the clergy, or of monasticism.

¹ Johannes Hus Predigten über die Sonntags-Evangelien, Part I., Görlitz, 1854; Part II., Görlitz, 1855; Part III., Görlitz, 1855. Also Johannes Hus Predigten über die Advents-Evangelien: Görlitz, 1854.

The first serious conflict between Hus and his opponents of the Reformation, was brought on by the discussion of the 45 theses of Wickliffe, which were afterwards stigmatized as heresies by the Council of Constance. On May 28, 1403, the faculty of the University of Prague met to give an opinion respecting these articles. They were condemned by a majority of votes, in spite of the strenuous efforts of Hus and his friends. But this condemnation was, in fact, illusory, for it was couched in the following language: No one shall explain the 45 articles in a heretical, wrong, or offensive sense. The clergy now appealed to Rome, and in 1405 a papal bull appeared, having in view the suppression and punishment of the heresies of Wickliffe. In consequence, Zbynek, Archbishop of Prague (appointed in 1403), decreed heavy penalties against all those who should venture to uphold and spread these doctrines. At the same time, however, Hus enjoyed the fullest confidence of his prelate, and was sent by him, as his commissioner, to examine into certain alleged miracles, said to be worked in the church of Wilsnack, through the agency of an old relic of the host. The miracles were found to rest on gross deceit, and the Archbishop at once forbade all further pilgrimages to the spot. This gave Hus the first occasion to take sides against superstition. He did so in his work: Determinatio questionis, cum suo tractatulo de omni antiquine Christi glorificato. Another token of Zbynek's favor, was the circumstance that he invited him to deliver the hortatory address, at a diocesan synod, before the assembled clergy, which duty Hus performed with evangelical boldness. But the good understanding between him and the Archbishop could not continue long. Through the instrumentality of Hus, a royal dict appeared (Jan. 26, 1409) distributing the votes in the University in such a manner, that to the foreigners, who had heretofore had a very great preponderance, was given only one, while the natives secured three. Great indignation prevailed among the former in consequence, and nearly all of them left Prague; some say as many as 44,000, others only 5000. This exodus furthered the Reformation throughout Bohemia, and it assumed a decidedly national character. From this time on, the Archbishop took a more positive stand against Hus and his party. In the same year the clergy of Prague renewed certain accusations which they had brought before the Archbishop, in 1408, against Hus. The latter, on his part, produced complaints against the Archbishop. The result of the appeals made by each to the Pope, was a bull from Alexander VI., forbidding, under pain of excommunication, the spread of Wickliffe's works, which were to be delivered to the Archbishop and examined by a commission, and all preaching in private chapels. This bull, which was published at Prague, March 9, 1410, caused very great dissatisfaction among the people, and at court. But the Archbishop carried it out, nevertheless. On July 16, more than 200 volumes of Wickliffe's works were publicly burned amidst the ringing of bells, and the solemn chanting of the Te Deum laudamus. Two days afterwards Hus and his friends were excommunicated. The excitement which followed was so great that Wenceslaus forbade all further provocations under penalty of death; but, at the same time, commanded that the sentence of excommunication should not be obeyed, and that the Archbishop should indemnify the owners of the books which he had destroyed. Zbynek refusing to do this, the King stopped his revenues.

Meanwhile, Balthasar Cossa, a pirate, fornicator, and adulterer, had been elected Pope. To this holy father, John XXIII., Hus sent his second appeal, showing that the Archbishop's conduct had been arbitrary and unreasonable, and that to prohibit preaching, conflicted with the commands of Christ and the regulations of the fathers. To the people he expressed his views on this latter point, in a sermon delivered on the 4th Sunday in Lent, Lactare (comp. J. Hus, Predigten, Part II., p. 73). Several works from his pen, explaining more fully why he could not obey the Archbishop, and defending the writings of Wickliffe against the condemnatory sentence pronounced on them, also appeared at this time. These publications seem to have had their origin in public disputations held by Hus in the University. We mention especially: Actus pro defensione libri Joannis Wiclef de Trinitate. John XXIII. confirmed the decrees of Zbynek against Hus, set aside the appeal which the latter had made, and cited him to Bologna, where the papal court then was. At the persuasions of his friends, and of the King, he did not obey the summons, but sent three representatives to plead his cause. In the sermon referred to above, he gives eight reasons for not going in person (comp. J. Hus, Predigten, Part II., p. 71).

In the month of February, 1411, Cardinal Colonna, to whom the case had been intrusted by the Pope, issued a decree of excommunication, in contumaciam, against Hus, and threatened to lay under an interdict every place where he might stay. But when Zbynek found that Hus and his friends, supported by the King, did not heed this arbitrary proceeding, he was constrained to lend his countenance to a compromise, the principles of which were adopted by a committee that had been appointed for this purpose. In consequence, Hus delivered to the University, in official form, a confession of faith which was considered orthodox (Sept., 1411). But the Archbishop died (Sept. 28) at Pressburg, whither he had gone to invoke the aid of the Emperor Sigismund, without having sent the requisite testimony to the Pope. His successor was Albicus, physician to the King, a well-disposed, but weak and incompetent old man. The papal legate who brought him the pail, was commissioned to publish a bull proclaiming a crusade against Ladislaus, King of Naples, who supported the antipope, Gregory XII. This bull, under the presupposition of repentance and confession, promised to all who would personally take part in the crusade, or contribute money for its prosecution, the forgiveness of their sins; but put Ladislaus and his children, to the third generation, together with all his friends and adherents, under the ban, denying them a Christian burial, even in case they should be absolved before their death, and decreeding that whoever accorded any of them such a burial should be excommunicated, and not released from the sentence until, with his own hands, he had disinterred their bodies. The King permitted the publication of the abominable manifesto. This brought on the decisive crisis for Hus and the Bohemian Reformation. The national party in the University was dissolved. A majority of the professors retrograded, while Hus advanced. Some of his warmest friends became his bitterest enemies. Hus loudly declared the promised indulgence to be a gross lie and deceit, and announced a public disputation for June 7th. This took place, in spite of the efforts which were made to prevent it. An immense concourse of people gathered on the occasion. Hus drew up twelve theses against the papal bull. These he afterwards developed in his two works: Quæstio de indulgentiis, s. de cruciata papæ Joannis, and Contra bullam papæ Joannis XXIII. His well-known friend, Jerome, of Prague, took part in the disputation, and delivered a fiery address. Very great excitement followed among the people and the students. A procession was formed, having in the midst of it a wagon full of prostitutes, from whose necks the papal bulls were suspended. Near the pillory these documents were thrown on a heap and burned. The King now interfered, and decreed every further act of contempt against the Pope, and resistance to the bull, punishable with death. But Hus, nothing intimidated, thundered from his pulpit as before, even in the presence of the Queen, who continued to visit his church. Carried away by his eloquence, three young mechanics undertook to interrupt another preacher to whom they were listening, and called out: "Thou liest! We have heard from Magister Hus that these things are lies." They were arrested and beheaded, in spite of the efforts of Hus to save them by assuming the entire blame. When the news of their execution spread through the city, the people and students magnified these young men as martyrs, and buried them with great solemnities, in which Hus took the lead. This witness of the truth was now excommunicated a second time. Cardinal P. de St. Angelo, to whom the case had been intrusted by the Pope, issued the sentence to this effect: "If Hus should continue refractory for twenty days, the ban should be published in all the churches of Prague, on Sundays and festival days, amidst the tolling of the bells and the extinguishment of the altar-lights; whoever had intercourse with him should come under the same ban; every place of his abode should be put under an interdict." Hus caused a protest against this unjust sentence to be affixed to the walls of his church, and appealed from the corrupt Roman tribunal, "to the only incorrupt, righteous, and infallible Judge, Jesus Christ." But as the clergy of Prague universally published the ban, and strictly observed the interdict, dispensing no sacraments, and refusing the burial-service to the dead, Hus left the city (Dec., 1412) for a time, at the request of the King, and found a refuge in the castles of his friends among the nobility.

The involuntary leisure which he now had, he devoted to literary labors. His chief work is De Ecclesia. In the introduction he sets forth the idea of the Church, in agreement with Wickliffe; the Church is the corpus mysticum, to which only the prædestinati belong. Afterwards he says that the Church consists of such exclusively, as have not sinned, or have ceased to sin. But, besides this sancta ecclesia, there is another; there is a twofold Church — ovium hædorum, sanctorum reproborum. The Church has a threefold head; the first is Christ, in his divine nature, as God, the caput extrinsecum; the second is Christ in his human nature, the caput intrinsecum; the third is a divinely appointed human leader of the Church. This brings him to a contemplation of the Church of Rome, in reference to which he arrives at uncertain and vacillating conclusions. In spite of these, however, we recognize the innermost tendency of his mind, in the explanation which he gives to the passage that forms the foundation of the Hierarchy: Tu es Petrus, etc., super hanc petram, quum confessus es, quam cognovisti dicens: Tu es Christus, etc., ædifico ecclesiam meam, i. e., super me ipsum, filium Dei. Peter has, among the apostles, aliquam prærogativam, but this depends altogether on moral pre-eminence, on fides, humilitas, caritas. If the Pope walks in the way of these Christian virtues, he is the proper vicarius Christi, and pontifex maximus ecclesiæ; but if not, he is Antichristi nuntius, contrarius Petri, vicarius Judæ. According to chapt. 13 of the work, Hus knows only an ideal Pope: suppono, quod Papa significat illum spiritualiter Episcopum, qui gerit altissime et simillime vicem Christi, sicut fecit Petrus post ascensionem. Si autem Papa vocetur quæcunque persona, quam occidentalis ecclesia acceptat pro romano episcopo ad capitaliter decidendum: abusio est termini. That the Pope and the cardinals are essential to the existence of the Church, he is not prepared to assert; it is possible that God may bring back his Church to the original state, when presbyters and bishops were the same. And yet he regards the sedes apostolica as the auctoritas judicandi et docendi legem Christi. Hus did not mean to found a new Church, or to separate from the existing one; but the principle which must eventuate in such a separation, is clearly expressed in this work, and in the polemical writings connected with the same. In view of the corruptness of the clergy and of so many Popes, there can be, he says, no thought of an implicit obedience to the ecclesiastical præpositi. Upon the whole, obedience can refer only to what is, in itself, permissible, and this is determined by reason and the Scriptures. In how far, however, the laity have a right to decide for themselves in the teachings of their spiritual overseers, is not clearly defined. Like Wickliffe, Hus indeed gives an objective rule to guide the judgment in foro conscientiæ, when he says: "The Christian must believe every truth set forth in the Scriptures, by the Holy Ghost, et isto modo homo non tenetur dictis sanctorum, præter Scripturam, nec bullis papalibus credere, nisi quod dixerint in scriptura vel quod fundatur implicate in scriptura." But who is to decide what is contained implicite in the Scriptures? From this point of view, Hus, after all, points to the holy doctors. He had the formal, but not the material principle of reformation. His tragic end showed that it was impossible to put a piece of new cloth on the moth-eaten garment of Romanism; but that, on the contrary, new bottles were needed for the capacity of the evangelical spirit. And this is the church-historical importance of Hus. He became a martyr, but not a Reformer, because he attempted a reformation only of the outward life of the Church, without understanding the necessity of reforming its dogma.

At the instance of Sigismund, the Pope appointed a Council of the Church to meet at Constance. Hus was invited by the Emperor to appear before the Council, and received from him the promise of a free return to Bohemia, even in case he did not submit to this ecclesiastical judicature. Modern historians of the Roman Catholic Church attempt in vain to disprove this promise. Hus joyfully accepted the Emperor's invitation. By placards which he caused to be posted in Prague (Aug. 26, 1414), whither he had returned from his retreat in the country, he professed his willingness to be examined by the Archbishop and the diocesan synod then in session, and to suffer punishment if proved guilty of heresy. But he did not succeed in obtaining a hearing. So he left the city provided with a testimonial of orthodoxy from the papal inquisitor (Nicholas, Bishop of Nazareth), and with a copy of a protocol containing all the accusations which his opponents had drawn up against him. Three noblemen constituted his escort. He travelled through Germany, not only without disguise, but in his clerical robes; inviting, by posted placards in every place where he stopped, all who might wish to converse with him, to hear from his own lips an account of his doctrines. On Nov. 3, 1414, he reached Constance. During the first three weeks of his stay in this city, nothing was done in his case. But on the 28th of the month he was treacherously deprived of his freedom, in spite of the Emperor's safe-conduct, which he had received at Constance, and after having been kept under guard for eight days, was cast into a gloomy dungeon in the Dominican monastery on the bank of the Rhine. The unceasing efforts of Baron Chlum, who had accompanied him from Prague, to secure his release, were without avail, as well as the displeasure which the Emperor himself at first expressed. Fetters were put on the prisoner's feet, and at night his hands were chained to the wall. The unhealthy location of his cell brought on a severe illness, and he was removed to a more airy place in the convent, lest he should die a natural death. Here he had a relapse, and suffered intensely. In the midst of his pains, still loaded with fetters, he was obliged to prepare his defence. But his courage and confidence in God remained unbroken, as is seen from the many letters which he wrote at this time. He also composed at the request, and for the benefit of his keepers, who had a high regard for him, several short treatises on dogmatical and moral subjects. While Hus was in prison the controversy about the withdrawal of the cup from the laity, in the Holy Communion, broke out in Prague. Being asked for his opinion, he said: to take the cup licet et expedit, although the flesh and the blood are sub utraque specie, so that the enjoyment of the one is sufficient; adding—si potest fieri attendetis, ut saltem permittatur per bullam illis dari, qui ex devotione postulerint circumstantiis adhibitis. But when the Council (June 15, 1415) expressly condemned the cup, he was filled with indignation, and wrote: "No passage of Scripture, only a bad custom, prevents the cup from being given to the laity; Christ and His truth must be followed; to such an extent has evil increased, that an institution of Christ is condemned as an error!"

The Pope having fled from Constance, Hus was committed into the hands of the Bishop of Constance, who had him brought to his castle, Gottlieben, on the lake. Here he was kept in close and severe confinement from March to June 5th. The remonstrances of the Bohemian nobility with Sigismund, that he permitted his safe-conduct to be thus broken, were fruitless. The Emperor silenced his conscience with the excuse, suggested by the prelates, that no pledge need be kept in the case of a heretic! On the day named above, Hus was admitted to a first hearing before the Council, which, however, broke up in confusion, when he attempted to defend his works from the Bible and the Church Fathers. The second hearing took place on the 7th of June, the Emperor being present. A number of accusations were brought against Hus, to all of which he replied. On the following day, the third and most important hearing occurred. He was examined in reference to his work De Ecclesia. The Cardinal d'Ailly, who conducted the examination, tried to represent Hus as a revolutionary character, and to incite the Emperor against him on political grounds. In this he was completely successful. Sigismund believed that the accused aimed at the overthrow, not only of the priesthood, but of kings. To the incessant cry, "Recant! recant!"—Hus replied: "I pray and conjure you not to force me to do what I cannot perform without sinning against my conscience, and without danger of eternal damnation." After the session was closed, the Emperor said to the Council: that single heresies among the many uttered by Hus on this occasion, were pernicious enough to condemn him to the stake; that even if he recanted he must not be permitted to preach, much less to return to Bohemia, &c. A retrospect of the questions before the Council, in the case of Hus, shows that they consisted solely and alone in canonical points. The accused and the accusers avoided the dogma, after the attempt to prove Hus a heretic in the doctrine of the eucharist, had failed. Hus sincerely desired to be instructed, but returned unconvinced and unconquered to his prison. It was now that he clearly saw, for the first time, the necessity of breaking with the Romish Church. With calmness and confidence he awaited the inevitable result of this step. The four weeks granted him for reflection, during which time every possible effort was made to induce him to recant, did not change his mind. At last the day of condemnation came. It was the 6th of July, the birthday of Hus. The Council held its 15th general session in the cathedral. Hus having once more made a fruitless attempt to defend himself, fell on his knees, and committed his cause to God and Christ. This was declared to be a mockery of the jurisdiction of the Church; whereupon he again appealed to Christ. Being reproached for having remained so long under the ban, he narrated the circumstances of the case, and, fixing his eyes on Sigismund, closed with the remark that he had voluntarily presented himself before the Council, on the strength of the safe-conduct granted him by the Emperor. Sigismund blushed at these words. The sentence having been read, Hus fell on his knees and prayed: "Lord Jesus, forgive my enemies; thou knowest that they have accused me falsely, and have brought false testimony and calumny against me; forgive them for thy great mercy's sake." Seven bishops then proceeded to degrade him from the priesthood, according to the forms usual on such occasions. A cap painted with figures of devils, and inscribed with the word, "Häresiarch," was put on his head. "Now we deliver thy soul to Satan," said the bishops. "But I," replied Hus, "commend it into thy hands, O Jesus Christ, for thou hast redeemed it!" He was forthwith led away to execution by secular officers. Before the door of the cathedral his books were being burned as he passed out. He smiled when he saw this. Arrived at the place of death, he prayed the 51st and 52d Psalms, thanked his jailors for their kindness, and was then fastened to the stake, his body with cords, his neck with a chain. Hus said: "Willingly do I bear this chain for Christ's sake, who bore a far heavier burden." Once more he was called on to recant, but declared that he was not conscious of having ever promulgated errors; that his chief purpose had always been to teach men repentance, and the forgiveness of sins. The pile having been ignited, Hus cried out: "Jesus, thou Son of God, have mercy on me!" — and again the same words a second time. Then the wind drove the flames into his face and choked his voice. But his lips continued to move in prayer. He died about eleven o'clock in the morning. His ashes were cast into the Rhine. The tradition that Hus, on his way to execution, foretold, under the image of a swan which should not be roasted, the coming of Luther after a century, is without historical foundation. The Council had the law on its side, but Hus eternal truth. Erasmus said: "Joannes Hus exustus, non convictus!"

Ulricus von Hutten commenced to edit the works of Hus. A complete edition appeared for the first time, in 1558, at Nuremberg, in two folios, under the title: Historia et monumenta J. Hus atque Hieron. Pragensis. A revised and enlarged edition was issued in 1715. Several of the treatises in it belong to Matthias von Janow. A complete picture of Hus can be given only after we have those of his works which are written in the Bohemian language, in more faithful translations than is now the case. Hence, the most important source for studying his history and writings is the recent work: "Die Gesch. v. Böhmen, grösstentheils nach Urkunden u. Handschriften, von F. Palacky" (III., 1: Prague, 1845). Compare what this author says (p. 299) respecting Hus as a Bohemian writer, and his efforts to improve the language by fixed rules and a new system of orthography. T. PRESSER.—De Schœnauitz.

Hussites.—The people had been forgotten at Constance. All Bohemia rose up against the Council and against the Emperor. At Prague, serious disturbances broke out, as soon as the news of the execution of Hus reached the city; Wenceslaus himself was indignant, and the Queen openly took the part of the martyr. On Sept. 2d, 1415, the assembled Diet addressed to the Council a manifesto full of reproaches and threats; and, three days later, adopted a resolution authorizing the preaching of Hussite doctrines on every estate where the owner favored these. Nor was the opposition party idle. An association of Catholic barons was organized (Oct. 1st, 1415), which pledged itself to be faithful and obedient, in all things, to the King, to the Romish Church, and to the Council. Meanwhile the latter had attempted to justify its proceedings against Hus, in several communications sent to Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia; and, in August, had dispatched the Bishop of Leitomyel to Bohemia, with the powers of an extraordinary apostolical legate. But being implicated in the condemnation of Hus, the man was so universally hated that he did not venture to show himself in public. In the beginning of 1416, the Council determined to adopt the severest measures against the heretics, and consequently cited (Feb. 20th) the 452 barons who had affixed their seals to the manifesto, before its tribunal, as suspecti de fide. Indeed, had it not been for the intervention of Sigismund, the King and his Queen would have been among the number. Meanwhile the Hussites had separated into two parties: the Calixtines, the more moderate, at whose head stood the University of Prague, and the Taborites, as they were afterwards called, who had their chief seat in the little town of Austin, later Tabor. In the beginning of 1417, the University issued a manifesto deprecating, and complaining of, the spread of opinions which were entirely too liberal. This manifesto was without effect, therefore a sort of Synod was convened at Prague (Sept. 28, 1418), which adopted 24 articles bearing on the questions of the day. These articles were in unison with the doctrines of the Church. But while the University thus upheld the authority of the Council, it departed as positively, in other respects, from the decrees of the same, especially in the matter of the Lord's Supper; pronouncing (March 16, 1417.) the Communion, in both kinds, to be eminently proper, and exhorting the Bohemians not to believe otherwise, even if an angel from heaven were to come and teach them.

In the way of answer to this declaration, the Council deprived the University of all its privileges, and decreed that the Bohemian heretics should be suppressed by force. Wenceslaus yielded to the representations of his brother, Sigismund, and restored the Catholic priests to the parishes from which they had been expelled. But soon these priests, and other zealous Roman-sts, began to manifest their enmity towards the Hussites. Then multitudes of the latter flocked together for self-defence. Two noblemen were their leaders, Nicholas v. Hussinez and John Ziska. Among the 40,000 persons who sat down at several hundred tables, on Mt. Tabor, and partook of the Communion in both kinds, and who afterwards founded the city of Tabor, the most violent fanaticism was enkindled. Led by Ziska, a party of Taborites proceeded to Prague, and took bloody vengeance on the council of the New Town. When Wenceslaus died (August, 1419), complete anarchy ensued, which was increased by the growing doctrinal difference between the Calixtines and the Taborites. The latter rejected all laws for the Church, except the statutes and law of God, all doctrines and customs not founded on Scripture, all worldly amusements and sciences, inveighed against monasteries and pontificals, and fell into manifold apocalyptic errors. They are said to have taught that God was the only king of men, and that the government should be intrusted to the people, that the nobility should be rooted out, that taxes should cease, &c. Some of these doctrines they put into practice, by burning monasteries and maltreating priests and monks. In this extremity, the Bohemian States applied to the Emperor, who, however, instead of making common cause with the moderate party, offended all parties, and gave occasion to their coalition against him. The united Hussites successfully defended themselves against three of his armies, and even made incursions into neighboring parts of Germany. A Diet held at Caslau (1421), and largely attended by Catholic as well as Hussite nobles, refused to acknowledge Sigismund, and declared him to be an arch-enemy of the honor and of the persons of the Bohemian nation. At the same time, the so-called "Articles of Prague," previously drawn up by the Calixtines, were adopted. These articles contain the substance of the doctrines which were held in common by the Hussites: "1. The Word of God is free in the kingdom of Bohemia, and is to be preached by Christian priests, without hindrance. 2. The Holy Sacrament of the body and blood of Christ is freely to be given, in both kinds, of bread and wine, to all faithful Christians, in whose way stands no mortal sin. 3. Inasmuch as many priests and monks administer large earthly possessions, contrary to the commandment of Christ, to the detriment of their spiritual office, and to the disadvantage of the civil States, such administration is to be taken from them, and they are to live as ensamples to the flock, according to the Holy Scriptures, imitating the walk and conversation of Christ and His Apostles. 4. All mortal sins, and especially those of a public character, as well as other disorders, contrary to the word of God, are to be inhibited and punished by those whose office it is, so that the evil and false report concerning this land may be refuted, and the welfare as well of the kingdom, as of the Bohemian nation, may be furthered." These articles formed the basis of deliberation at an ecclesiastical convention which convened in the same year (July 4), at Prague. The next year Ziska separated from the Taborites, and after his death, his followers, who called themselves Orphans, constituted a middle party between the Taborites and Calixtines, and seem to have approximated most nearly to the spirit and views of Hus.

After the third crusade against the Hussites had resulted in the great victory which they gained at Taus (Aug. 14, 1431), Sigismund declared that the heroic Bohemian nation could be conquered only by itself, and advised peace at any cost. The Council of Basle immediately opened negotiations with the Hussites, and subsequently received their deputies with the utmost politeness. After a discussion of 50 days, these became impatient, and left Basle. But the Council sent an embassy after them, and granted all their demands, with reservations indeed, which, at a convenient season, were to be turned to the subversion of the Hussite cause. Thus originated the well-known Compactata of Basle. Sigismund's foresight proved correct. For the Taborites, refusing to accept these Compactata, were attacked and totally defeated by the Calixtines, at Böhmishbrod, May 30, 1434. The Calixtines, under certain conditions, now acknowledged Sigismund as king; the remnants of the Taborites subsequently did the same; so that, after having solemnly promised to carry out the Compacts, and to permit the Utraquists, as the Calixtines were now called, to elect the Archbishop of Prague, the Emperor entered this city in triumph (Aug. 23, 1436), and received the Bohemian crown. But Sigismund soon forgot his promises, so that at his death, which took place in the following year, the parties were again in a state of violent agitation. The Catholics chose Albert of Austria as king—the Calixtines, Prince Casimir, of Poland. After the demise of the former (1439), it was finally agreed to intrust the kingdom jointly to a Catholic and to a Calixtine Regent, until the majority of his posthumous son, Ladislaus. In 1450, George Podiebrad, a Calixtine, became sole Regent; and after the short reign of Ladislaus (1453–1457), who showed himself a zealous Catholic, was elected king. During all this time the disputes between the parties had continued. In 1462, Pius II. declared the Compactata null and void. Podiebrad imprisoned the legate who appeared in B. to announce this decree, and for this was put under the ban. But in spite of Pius, and of his successor, Paul II., who even went so far as to depose him, Podiebrad maintained his throne until his death (1471). He was succeeded by Wladislav, a Polish Prince, who, although a Catholic, upheld the Compactata; originated the mutual agreement between Utraquists and Catholics, made at Kuttenberg (1485); and gave the former (1497,) the right to elect, as their spiritual head, an administrator of the archbishopric of Prague.

After G. Podiebrad had subdued Tabor (1453), the Taborites, as a party, disappeared. From their midst came the Bohemian Brethren (see Art.), who adopted their religious principles, but not their extravagant fanaticism. The Reformation in Germany was joyfully greeted in B., not only by the Brethren, but also by the Calixtines. These subsequently became adherents, partly of the Lutheran and partly of the Swiss creeds, and, in 1575, united with the Brethren in a common confession. Thus the history of the Hussites, as such, ceases. From that time on, they shared the faith and the sufferings of the Protestant Church.

T. PRESSEL.—De Schweinitz.

Hutten, Ulrich von, one of the foremost champions of humanism and religious liberty in Germany, descended from an old knightly family of Franconia, and was born April 22, 1488, at Stackelberg. In 1499 his father placed him in the renowned monastery of Fulda, whence, however, he fled in 1504, unable longer to endure the rigors of a monastic life. Perhaps Eitelwolf of Stein, a friend of his father, encouraged H. to this step, having perceived his talents. He went to the University of Erfurt, where humanism was cherished, and a society of young men, zealous in its study, existed. But in the summer of 1505, a pestilence drove him and his fellow-students from Erfurt. He went to Cologne, and studied Thos. Aquin. and Scotus. There he also found incentives to the new movement, and gathered, as he richly could, material for inflicting upon the old system sarcasm and ridicule. He followed his friend, R. Aesticampianus, who was driven from Cologne for attacks upon the old religion, to Frankfort on the O., where a new university was founded April 27, 1506. There he found Eitelwolf of Stein, who kindly assisted him. He remained in Frankf. two years, pursuing literature, and enjoying the society of scholars. Then, seized with a vile disease, he started on a course of restless, aimless wanderings. He reached Greifswalde, and got into difficulty with the Burgomaster Lötze and his son; but soon had to flee, and being overtaken, was severely beaten, and robbed of his papers. Half naked he arrived at Rostock, and was kindly received. There he wrote a poem describing his maltreatment, and calling upon the whole literary German world to avenge him, mentioning poets and humanists by name. In Rostock he lectured on classic authors. Late in 1510 he went to Wittenberg, thence to Bohemia, Moravia, and Vienna, where he prospered until the spring of 1512. His poems and literary labors increased his fame. To reconcile his father, whom his flight from Fulda had estranged, he resolved to study jurisprudence, went (1512) to Pavia and Bologna, where he indeed learned Rom. jurispr., but felt equally repulsed from scholasticism as Cologne theology. The fruit of his new attainment was "Niemand," a satirical poem upon Rom. jurisprudence. He was now confirmed in his humanistic tendency and love of poetry. Ecclesiastical politics also claimed his notice, and he devoted his whole power to the deliverance of Germany from the papal yoke. Numerous troubles and sufferings in Italy embittered his feelings. Returning to Germany in 1517, an attempt of Duke Ulrich of Würtemberg upon the wife of Hans Hutten, led Ulrich Hutten to write a series of bitter articles against the Duke, and all tyrants like him. This brought about his restoration to his father's house, and general popularity. About the same time he took an active part in Reuchlin's controversy with the Cologne Dominicans. He participated, doubtless, in the Epist. virorum obscur. (see Art.).—Hutten's opposition to Rome was based far less upon religious than national considerations. He desired Germany to be freed from the injuries inflicted by Romish tyrants (see his address at the Augsburg Diet, 1513, and "Römische Dreifaltigkeit"). And finding logic and satire unavailing, he urged the resistance of violence with violence. Hence he attached himself to Franz v. Sickingen, the man, as he believed, for his purpose, and formed plans for uniting nobles, cities, and peasants, in a great national scheme. Germany's freedom from the tyranny of the princes and of popery was the incentive and aim. At an assembly of the Upper Rhine nobles, at Landau, 1522, Sickingen was chosen Commander-in-chief. It was hoped that the Emperor was really not averse to the movement, but would, if successful, openly support it. The result is known; S. was defeated, and Hutten was involved in his fall. Soon after the war began, H. went to Switzerland, both for safety and to incite sympathy for Sickingen. At Basle, Erasmus shunned him, not wishing to be implicated in H.'s scheme. In Zurich, the Council refused to harbor him. Thence he took refuge to the island Ufnau, in the lake of Zurich, with a letter from Zwingli to Hans Schnepp. There he learned the issue of the war, and died broken-hearted Aug. 29, 1523.—(See HAGEN, "Deutschl. lit. Verhältn. im Reformationszeitalter," 3 Bände, Erlangen, 1841-44, and his "Ulrich v. H. in polit. Beziehung," in the work, "Zur polit. Gesch. Deutschl.," Stuttg., 1824; a crit. on Hagen in Ullmann's Theol. Stud. Jahrg., 1845, H. 2. Cf. also Zuschr. f. Prot. N. F. B. 30, p. 268-275. An imperfect and defective collection of H.'s works was published by Ernst Münch, 6 vols., Berlin, 1821-23.)

KLÜPFEL.*

Hydroparastatæ (ὑδροπαράσταται, aquarii), a name given in derision to certain Eucharistites (see Art.) of Tatian's school, as Theod. says: τοὺτον (τὸν Τάτιανον) ἔχουσιν ἀρχηγὸν οἱ λεγόμενοι ὑδροπ. καὶ εὐχαρίται; so called because to mortify the body they used water, instead of wine, even at the communion (cf. CLEM. ALEX. Pædag. II., 2, and EPIPH. Hær. 46, § 2, p. 392). Theodoret is the first to identify the H. with Tatian, whilst Philastrius (hær. 77) and Augustine (de hær. 64) use the name in a more general way.

P.†

Hyginus, the 8th or 10th B. of Rome (137-141). According to the liber pontif. he was born in Athens, was a philosopher before his elevation, and "Clerum composuit et distribuit gradus." He is (erroneously?) said to have introduced the custom of sponsors, the consecration of churches, and a number of rules for eccl. usages. The martyrologies assign Jan. 10, or 11, 142, as the date of his death. Many writers allow him to have been only a confessor.—A B. Hyginus, of Cordova, is mentioned as the first opponent of Priscillian.

TH. PRESSEL.*

Hymenæus, a false teacher, mentioned in 1 Tim. 1:20, as a warning against the peril of not only falling from the faith, but becoming blasphemers. Whether both H. and Alexander lived in Ephesus, cannot be determined. In 2 Tim. 2:17, another H. is named with Phiotus, to show how "vain babblings" soon lead to ἀσέβεια. Most commentators regard these as identical, as the sins rebuked are nearly allied.

TH. PRESSEL.*

Hymnology (cf. Church Hymns and Church Music).—The hymnologist is distinguished from the religious poet, so far as the latter produces the material, which the former uses scientifically, at least in a limited sense. In the full sense of the term science, Hymnology became such only of late. Indeed the name, after Wetzels analecta hymnol., 1752, is first met with in Schmieder's Hymnol., 1789, a work, however, which did not aspire to a scientific character. In the old Romish Church, only technical rules were needed for the preparation of Church hymns; thoughts upon the nature and importance of Church-singing are met with but occasionally, in authors who attempted to describe and explain Church customs. Thus GUIL. DULANDUS (rationale divinorum officiorum, l. II., c. 2): ceterum propter carnales, non propter spirituales cantandi usus in eccl. instit. est, ut, qui verbis non compunguntur, suavitate modulaminis moveantur. Cantores repræsentant prædicatores, quos ad Dei laudes excitantes. Eorum namque symphonia plebem admonet in unitate cultus unius Dei perseverare. Or, V., c. 2: cantus in eccl. ætilitiam cæli significat. In IV., c. 20, the various parts of the choir symbolize the various degrees of Christian perfection. The small treatise of Vicetius, B. of Treves (c. 563), de psalm. bono (see GALLAND. bibl. patr., XII., 774), consists merely of praises of singing, and some practical directions; the song of the three men in the fiery furnace is thought an original model. In the comm. of the fathers on the Psalms, &c., we find only general remarks. Even recently Romish liturgists give the subject only cursory attention (cf. Graf, Zur prakt. Theol., &c.: Tüb., 841; Staudenmaier, d. Geist d. Christenth., &c., Tbl., 264, &c.); for, however much the Rom. Church avails itself of music in its worship, it does not cherish congregational singing, with which Hymnol. is mainly concerned. This explains, also, how the Evang. Church came only gradually to the consideration of H. as a science. The Reformers had first to provide for the practical wants of the people, and their hymnol. efforts were directed merely to this end (cf. SPANGENBERG's cithara Lutheri, 1569; HIER. VELLER's Ausleg. geistl. Lieder.; SCHAMELIUS, schwerscheinende Stellen d. K.-ges., 1719; KÖPPING, Katech. über Lieder, 1847). During the Opitz epoch, prosody engaged too much attention to make it yield much for the æsthetics of hymns. It was only during the last century that an important advance was made, 1) by giving attention to the history of the composers of hymns (WETZEL, hist. Lebensbeschr. d. Liederichter, 1719; SCHAMELIUS, Lieder-comm.: Lpz., 737; GRISCHOW, Nachr. d. Liederverf., 1771), and then to that of the hymns themselves (Beicht, &c., 3 Bde.: Dessau, 1782; Götz, Beitrag, &c., 1784; HEERWAGEN, Literaturgesch., &c., 792-7); 2) by the criticisms which the Glaucha hymn-book, the product of the Halle pietism, provoked, and by the attempts of Rationalism to substitute its rhymes for the old hymns, in justification of which it was compelled to appeal to hymnol. principles. The main product of this tendency was the Berlin hymn-book of 1780, which elicited many reviews. The most important work springing from this movement was Schmieder's Hymnol., in which he attempts to determine the merits of hymns upon some general rules, and recommends, as the chief qualities of a hymn, that it be, 1) scriptural (without using, however, every figure or expression found in the Bible), 2) simple, 3) humane (free of expressions which might offend delicate ears!), and 4) decorous. This spirit of rationalistic reform, against which even Herder vainly protested, carried everything before it.—Thenceforward we have nothing on this subject until we meet RAMBACH's Anthologie chr. Gesänge: Hamburg, 1817-33, and a historical monograph named below. First in our times have due efforts been made to raise H. to a practical theological science. And now, as nearly 100 years ago, it is a practical reform, though in an opposite direction, demanding the investigation and settlement of principles. Not only have efforts been made to furnish hymn-books of a true churchly spirit, and free of mutilations (RAUMER's Samml., &c.: Basel, 1831; d. Berliner Liederschatz, 1832; BUNSEN's Versuch eines allg. evang. Gesangb., 1833, 1846; Liedersg. v. Stier, Pauli, Knapp); but the subject has also been theoretically discussed (as in the 2d Anb. to Bunsen's Ges.-B.; eine Abhandl. K. v. Raumer in his "Kreuzzügen;" deutsch. Vierteljahrsschr., 1838, II.), and the awakened sense of the wrong which had been done to the Church in regard to its hymns, has sought vent in those loud complaints which Stier's "Gesangbuchsnoth," 1838, started (cf. KRAZ 1838, Schede 1852, &c.). The earliest practical effect of this movement was the Wittemb. G.-Buch., of 1842. But there immediately arose a controversy among the friends of reform, which is not yet settled. Some, disgusted with the flat novelties of the rationalistic period, desire only the old hymns, unaltered (STIP, K.-fried, u. K.-lied., Hann., 1853); others think some regard should be paid to the change of time, especially in certain expressions. The above movement received an impetus, likewise, from the more comprehensive manner in which Schleiermacher, and his school, treated Pract. Theol., leading to the scientific discussion of Church hymns, as an essential part of public worship. Still, theoretical works on the subject are scarce. The first was by WEIS, Versuch einer Theorie, &c.: Breslau, 1842, not to be commended; then LANGE, kirchl. Hymnol.: Zurich, 1843, far superior to Weis. More recent are RUDELBACH, hymnol. Studien, in the Ztschr. für luth. Th. u. K., 1855, IV.; NITZSCH, prakt. Theol., II., 2, § 298-309; GAUPP, prakt. Theol., I., § 60-65; ARMKNECHT, d. heil. Psalmodie, 1855; NAUMANN, Einführ. d. Psalmges., 1856. There have been rich contributions to the history of our subject: MOHNKE's hymnol. Forsch., 1831; DANIEL, Thesaur. hymnol.; Jos. MONE, lat. Hymnen d. Mittlalt., &c., 3 Bde., 1853-55; WACKERNAGEL, "d. deutsche K.-lied," &c., 1841, and "Bibliographie," &c., 1855; KOCH, Gesch. d. K.-l., 1st ed., 1847, 2d ed., 1852, 1853; HOFFMANN, of Fallersl., Gesch. d. K.-l. bis auf Luther, 2d ed., 1854; MÜTZELL, geistl. Lieder, &c.; CUNZ, Gesch., &c., 1854. To these have been added compilations for schools, &c. Especially acceptable are the numerous monographs which have appeared. AUGUSTI, diss. de hymn. Syrorum sacris: Bresl., 1814; HAHN, Bardanes Gnosticus, Syr. primus hymnol., 1819; MIDDELDOFF, über Prudent., in Illgens Zschr., &c., 1832, II., St. 2; SCHNEIDER, über Luther's Lieder, &c., &c.

Concerning Hymnology as a science, we remark, primarily, that not all the poetry and music appropriated to public worship belongs to H. It excludes the chanting of the priest, which belongs to the liturgy. But H. has to treat of singing as a congregational act (see Art. Church Music). I. It must inquire how singing came to have a place in public worship. This will involve, 1) the discussion of the relation of art in general to religion and worship, and so of the contradiction found in determining this relation between the Christian and ante-Christian religion, and even between Christian confessions themselves; and these relations and contradictions must be explained with special reference to music. 2) Another point would be to determine the precise place of singing in Christian worship. Here the idea of sacrifice becomes especially prominent. 3) The difference between congregational and choir singing, as well as their connection, and the subordinate character of the latter, would then be ascertained.—II. Of congregational singing especially. A. Theory of it. 1) Its justification must be derived from the ev. idea of the congregation. 2) Its properties: it is a) essentially lyric, all other modes of thought must be subordinate, or momentary; b) objective; c) popular; it must be shown how all this impresses itself on a) the text, its conformity with Scripture, churchliness, popular poetic form, β) the music, chorals, melody, harmony, rhythms, unison, &c. 3) Significance of Church hymns, a) as bringing single congregations into communion, not only with other existing ones, but with the whole Church of all ages; b) as uniting the Church and family and schools (THILO, K.-lied in d. Volksschule, 2 Aufl., 1855).—B. Having thus fixed the idea of Church hymns, the history of the subject will follow. This must neither be purely literary, nor devotional, but scientific and theological.—C. Next to the history, which terminates in the present, will arise certain practical questions: 1) what may be gathered, from the history of the subject, for the use of the Church? 2) What is to be done regarding the diversity of hymns of different periods—allowable and objectionable changes—the harmony of the conservative and progressive spirit? 3) The best arrangement. 4) The proper selection of hymns, by the minister, for each public service—with regard to its opening and close, special occasions, metre, &c., adaptation of the hymn to every one present (an unreasonable demand), &c. Under B and C, as under A, the poetical and musical features would find a parallel place.—III. The treatment of choir-singing is, in general, the same as under II.—From all that has now been said, it is clear that much remains to be done in this field of science;

but, also, that there are many inducements to its cultivation. PALMER.*

Hypatia, daughter of the mathematician Theon, at Alexandria, flourished c. 391–415. To great personal attractions she added the higher beauties of virtue and knowledge. After learning mathematics with her father, she went to Athens to study philosophy, and subsequently, assuming the philosopher's mantle, she lectured upon Plato and Aristotle in Alexandria. Occupying the highest position as a Platonist, she enjoyed unbounded influence, and numbered among her disciples a Synesius, who submitted his writings to her criticism before he published them. Palladas, a cotemporary poet, compares H. to Astrea, the virgin of the heavens, and calls her a spotless star.—She always remained a virgin. Her tragical end has enhanced her celebrity. There are two diverse accounts. Suidas (III., 533) says that, as B. Cyril was one day passing her residence, he saw a great crowd of men and horses there, and, asking what it meant, was told that Hypatia dwelt there, and was receiving the homage of her adorers. Cyril became so jealous that he resolved to effect her death. Socrates (H. E., VII., 15) gives a more probable account: Among the adorers of H. was Orestes, Governor of Alexandria. He, incited by the arrogance of Cyril and the violence of his monks, repulsed all offers of a reconciliation. The people, regarding H. as the instigator of this hatred, made an attack upon her, under the lead of a precentor, Peter, seized her on the street, dragged her into an adjacent church, and there stoned her to death. Her limbs were torn asunder by the enraged mob, and burned (March, 415). This brutal act remained unpunished, but put a dark stain upon Cyril's character. An appeal of H. to Cyril, on behalf of Nestorius, is spurious (FABR., bibl. Gr., IX., 187, &c.). DR. PRESSER.*

Hyperius (Gerhard, Andrew; called himself Hyperius, from his birthplace Ypress,) was born May 16th, 1511, of highly respectable parents. His father was an attorney, and, perceiving the talents of his son, carefully trained him, and on his deathbed (1525), urged his wife to send the lad to Paris, as soon as the war then raging should cease, that he might there more advantageously pursue his studies. After the peace of Cambray, H. went to Paris (July, 1528), thirsting after knowledge. Through the friendly influence, probably, of his countryman, Helsus, a Parliam. counsellor, and v. Kampen, a theologian, he was admitted to the Calvicum college, one of the oldest (founded 1270) of the University, and began a full philosophical course, under Joachim Ringelberg, a zealous humanist, then lecturing upon dialectics. The teacher (though much older) and pupil became warmly attached. The result of this friendship was not only the philos. writings (Annot. in X. libr. Ethic. Aristot., Marp., 1553; a Dialectics, Rhetoric, and Physices Aristot. Comp., Basil, 1574); above all, H. owed Ringelberg his taste for humanism, an excellent method of teaching, the first incentive to those exercises in debate, which H. subsequently instituted in Marburg, and, finally, according to R.'s rule: quicquid didiceris, con- festum doceas (conf. Ringelb. de ratione studii l. d. Th. Erpen. Lugd. Bat., 1642, p. 43), his skill in teaching. After three years, H. obtained the degree of Mag. Philos., and went home. In 1532 he returned to Paris, and commenced his theol. studies; but having no relish for the dry scholasticism of the Sorbonne, he privately read the Church Fathers, Church History, and canon law. His chief delight, however, was in the lectures of the humanists, especially those of John Sturm, the distinguished friend of Melancthon and Bucer, which, probably, sowed the seed of ev. truth on H.'s heart. He used travel as another means of improvement, passing thus through France, Upper Italy, and, after finishing his course in Paris, 1535, the Netherlands and Northern Germany, seeking, in Marburg, Erfurt, Wittenberg, and Leipsic, to become acquainted with the leaders of Protestantism and their principles. He embraced the ev. cause, and proved an important accession to it. Like Melancthon, he was intent upon placing the acquisitions of the Reformation upon a firm scientific foundation.—Invited by Charles of Montjoie, he went to England, and pursued new studies at Cambridge and Oxford. But the unfavorable turn of things after Cromwell's death, led H. to return, 1541, to the Continent. On his way to Strasburg, in hope of attaining a professorship, he stopped at Marburg, June 15, 1541. There the aged Geldenhauer, Prof. of Theol., desirous of relief from his labors, secured H.'s appointment to the post. He now found his proper position, and labored earnestly to solve the problem of Protestantism.—In consequence of frequent disputes about small matters, a mistrust of ev. theology had become prevalent, as H. himself complains (de sacr. litterarum studiis non deserendis, in the Opusc. Basil, 1570; and de dijudicatione doctrinarum, in the 2d ed. of the Opusc. Basil, 1580). Confidence in theol. studies had to be restored. This H. successfully attempted to do in his lectures. These, moreover, led to the publication of a series of exegetical monographs, included in his Opuscula, and a comm. on Paul's epistles, and the Hebrews (Zürich, 1582-4, 4 vol. fol.), which served Protestantism at large; the exeget. works are among the best of that period. His Methodi Theologiae (Basel, 1566, 1568, 1574, 8vo.), and de formandis concion. sacr. sive de interpr. script. populari (libr. II., first ed., Marb., 1553, and in quick succession five others; transl. into French, and published by a Rom. theol., Villavincensius, as his own), are works of the highest merit—the value of the latter having been enhanced by his Topica Theologica (Zür., 1561). The estimate put upon his de recte formando Theol. studio, libr. IV. (Bas., 1556), may be inferred from the five editions through which it soon passed. It is properly the first full and scientific encyclopedia and methodology of Dogmatics.—To these literary merits, H. added important services done for the correction of the laxity of public morals, which had fallen into sad decay. In his de S. Script. lectione ac meditatione quotidiana, libr. II. (Zürich, 1561), he urged the civil authorities to require in every family the daily reading of the Scriptures.—He died Feb. 1, 1564.—(See the memorial sermons in Hyperii Methodi Theol., libri III. (2), Basil, 1568; WAGNITZ, ed. de formandis concion. sacr. Halæ, 1781; MELCHIOR ADAM, Vitæ Germ. Theol. (ed. 3), Francof., 1706, fol. 178-190; TILMANN, Vitæ Prof. Theol., Marb., p. 54-62; SCHRÖCKH, Lebensbeschr. berühmter Gelehrten (2), T. I., 237-44; STRIEDER, Grundlage zu einer Hess. Gelehrten-gesch., VI., 293-312; Deutsch. Ztschr. für chr. Wissensch. u. chr. Leben., 1854, Nr. 30-32).

MANGOLD.*

Hypnistarii, a religious sect described by Gregory of Naz., whose father belonged to it before his conversion to Christianity (cf. Orat., XVIII., 5, p. 333). Gregory says their religion was a mixture of heathenism and Judaism; from the former they obtained the custom of using fire and light in their worship; from the latter, the sanctification of the Sabbath, rejection of images, and scrupulousness in regard to certain sorts of food: "Ἐπιστάριοι τοῖς τὰν εὐνοίας ὁρῶντες, καὶ ὁ πατριάρχης δὲ μόνος αὐτοῖς σεβασίμος," Greg. of Nyssa (adv. Eunom., lib. II., T. II., p. 440) says of them, calling them probably in reproach, Ἐπιστάριοι, that they agree with Christians in acknowledging one God, whom they call ὕψιστον, or πατριάρχον, but differ from them in denying that he is a father. Other accounts are based upon these two (so Etymolog. Gudianum, ed. Sturz, p. 547). The sect did not spread beyond Cappadocia, or exist long; it is not mentioned after the 4th cent. Whilst they were generally thought to be monotheists, Böhmer concluded from Gregory's remark concerning his father, ἐκ' εἰδωλοῦ πάρος ἦν ζῶν, that they admitted the existence of many gods. Having so few accounts of them, it is no wonder that opposite views have prevailed as to their true character. It is evident the sect was not Christian. Some think them related to Zoroaster. Ullmann regards them as eclectics, mixing Paganism and Judaism. Gregory commends their morality.—(C. ULLMANN, de hypnistr.: Heidelb., 1833; G. BÖHMER, de hypnistr.: Berol., 1834.)

DR. PRESSEL.*

I.

Ibas succeeded (435) Rabulas as B. of Edessa. Rabulas had taken sides with Cyril of Alex., and endeavored to bring Theodore of Mops. into discredit, as a heretic. Ibas pursued an opposite course (ASSEMANI, biblioth. orient., I., 198, &c.), became suspected of Nestorianism, and was accused, before the Patr. Proclus, and Theodosius II., of mainly causing the schism between the Oriental and Egyptian bishops, and of having translated the works of Theodore M. into Syriac, and spread them throughout the East (ASSEM., l. c., I., 200 &c. n. 1, and 350, n. 2; cf. MANSI, coll. concilior., T. VII., 249, &c.). But the efforts of his enemies failed. In 449, after the matter was dismissed, Ibas was deposed by the Robber Synod (ASSEM., I., 202, 404; PAGI, crit. in Baronii annales ad a. 449, no. 12), Nonnus took his place until Ibas regained it at the Council of Chalcedon, 451 (MANSI, VII., 261). But the Jacobites did not recognize him (ASSEM., I., 202-3). He died in 457, when Nonnus again succeeded him (ASSEM., I., 202, 205; cf. 424). — Ibas, aided by Cumas and Probus of Edessa, translated the writings of Theodore of Mops. into Syriac (ASSEM., III., 85). His letter to Mari or Mares of Beth-Hardaschir, a B. of Persia, is celebrated (ASSEM., I., 350; cf. 203), and important as an authority contemporaneous with Nestorianism, and an evidence of Ibas' faith. It exists only in a Greek translation (Acta conc. Chalced. act. X., ed. Harduin. II., 530; MANSI, collect. concilior. ampliss., T. VII., 241, &c.). In it Ibas severely reproaches Cyril, but also disapproves of much in Nestorius, and shows himself a man of independent, and by no means partizan judgment. It was one of the three chapters condemned by an edict of Justinian, and the fifth oecumen. Synod at Constant. 553, although that of Chalcedon had pronounced it orthodox. — (See NEANDER'S Ch. H. GIESELER'S do. Hall. Encyclop., 2. Sect. Bd. 15, p. 4. LE QUIEN, oriens christ., II., 690. CHR. W. F. WALCH, Entwurf einer vollst. Hist. d. ketzer. Spalt. u. Religionstreit., Th. 5, 650, &c.). E. RÜDIGER.*

Iberia, conversion of the Iberians.—This race, residing in the Caucasian isthmus (now Georgia or Grusia) is mentioned by Virgil, Horace, and Lucan, as a terrible, implacable, warlike people, whilst Strabo describes the entire nation, one caste excepted, as religious, peaceable, and devoted to agriculture, and says their cultivation resembles that of the Medes and Armenians. Their conversion took place, as Rufinus and Moses, of Chorene, relate, as follows: Under the Emperor Constantine, a Christian woman, perhaps a nun (Nona or Nunia), was captured by the Iberians, and became a slave. Her strict ascetic life secured attention and respect. It happened that a sick child was carried, according to their custom, from house to house, that if any knew a cure they might apply it. Having been brought to where Nona was, she said she could not help it, but that her Lord, Christ, might. She prayed for the child, and it recovered. Afterwards the Queen of the country also took sick, and sent for pious Nona; who, pretending to no miracles, refused to go. The Queen then had herself carried to Nona, who prayed for her, and she recovered. The King (Mirus) desired to reward the Christian with costly gifts, but was told by his wife that she despised all earthly treasures, and only wished others to worship God. This made a deep impression on him. Subsequently having, on a chase, lost his way in a thick fog, he called on the God of Nona, and vowed to embrace his worship, if he would help him. The fog dispersed and the King reached home safely. His mind was now prepared to receive the gospel. The King and Queen aided Nona in teaching the people; teachers were invited from the Roman empire, and thus, c. 320-330, Christianity was established in a nation which, with some superstitions, has retained it to this day. That Nona went from Byzant. to Iberia, has been concluded from Procopius, V., 9, who says that an old monastery, maintained in Jerusalem, and renewed by Justinian in the 6th cent., was called Iberian. With this the account of Moses of Ch. agrees, calling the Christian woman an Armenian, and stating that application for teachers was made, not to Rome, but to the Armen. B. Gregory. From Iberia the gospel early spread to Albania, the Lazi, and adjacent tribes. TH. PRESSEL.*

Iceland.—When Harald Harfagr made himself sole master of Norway, and crowds of natives sought a new home, a number of the dissatisfied people went to Iceland, which had shortly before (860) been discovered. The scattered Celtic Christians there fled before the heathen immigrants, and the few Norwegian families who had previously become Christians soon fell from the faith. The new republic, therefore, soon became wholly heathen, only occasionally brought into contact with Christianity, through war or commerce. From mercenary considerations, some Icelanders were occasionally baptized, or received the sign of the cross, very few from conviction. Among true converts was Thorwald, Codran's son, surnamed Vidfürli (the traveller), who, sustained by Frederic, a Saxon B., made the first attempt to publish the Gospel in Iceland (981-5; NEANDER'S Ch. H., III., 300). This work was more energetically pressed by King Olof Trygvason of Norway (995-1000), who used all kinds of means to influence such Icelanders as visited Norway, and sent and supported missionaries on their island. First Stefnir went (995-7), then Dankbrand, then a Saxon priest. Two prominent Icelanders, Gizur and Hialti, succeeded in compromising the religious disputes which arose by having Christianity declared the religion of the island, with certain concessions to heathenism (1000). Without resistance, but reluctantly, the people consented to be baptized. In 1016-

20, Olaf Haraldson annulled those concessions. — An antecedent political dissolution, seemed indispensable to the conversion of the island, and various carnal motives had to be employed at first to produce any effect. Of course such effects were mainly external, much heathenism mixing with the Christianity so embraced. The effect of these heathen influences upon the organization of the Church is especially noteworthy. In their heathenism the temples of the Icelanders were private property, in which the owners officiated, there being no sacerdotal class. When Christianity was adopted this plan was mainly retained, and either the owners took orders and officiated in their own churches, or hired a priest. Consequently the priests were mostly farmers, merchants, or justices, or regular priests miserably poor and at the mercy of the landlords. The condition of the Bishops was little better. The first resident and native B. of Iceland was appointed in 1055. The taxes of a few temples which had been made public, yielded him a scanty support. The second B., Gizur, endowed the See, and located it at Skalaholt, and in 1106 another at Holar. The Bishops were elected by the people, the priests chosen by the owners of the churches. Of course the clergy were worldly, ignorant, and rude. Considerable improvements were subsequently made by Gizur, who authorized the tithe system (1097), and Bishops Thorlacr and Ketill, who introduced the canon law for the government of the Church (1123; published by Grim. Joh. Thorkelin in 1776; Jus eccl. vetus, sive Thorlaco-Ketillianum, or, also, Kristinnretr hinn gamli). But even now yet the condition of the Iceland Church was but little in advance of that of the middle ages. Lay-patronage still prevailed. The clergy and even the Bishops were married. There was no independent ecclesiastical judicatory, excepting that in the discipline of the clergy a court of Bishops acted. — Originally the Iceland Church was subject to the Archb. of Bremen-Hamburg; when the See of Lund was founded (1103) it was transferred to it; and finally to that of Nidaros, founded 1152. The early attempts of the Norwegian Archbishops to secure independence of the State, of course brought them into violent conflicts with the government of Iceland also, especially in reference to the habits and condition of the priesthood. The authorities presented a stern resistance. But from 1238 the Archb. began to appoint the Bishops; and about 1256–64 the Church agreed to a subjection of the republic to the crown of Norway. Thenceforth the Iceland Church participated more decidedly in the affairs of Norway, and to the advantage of the hierarchy, because the throne thought it needed the aid of the hierarchy in suppressing the liberty of the peasants. An attempt of Arni Thorlacson, soon after his call to the See of Skalaholt (1269), to abrogate lay-patronage and the tithe system, &c., excited violent opposition, which was not allayed until 1277, through the intervention of King Magnus Lagabatar. But after his death, 1280, it broke out with greater virulence, through the attempt of King Erikir Magnusson and his officials, and the Archb. Jon, † 1283, and Iorundr, † 1309, to enforce a new eccl. law. The dispute was finally (1297) settled by allowing the laity to retain all eccl. property of which they held at least the half. Thus restricted, the new law was then, 1356, likewise extended over the See of Holar. It was published by Gr. J. Thorkelin, 1777: Jus eccl. novum sive Arnæanum, or Kristinnretr inn nýi.

From this time until about 1500 the Iceland Church enjoyed external quiet; its internal condition was, however, extremely wretched. If the people could say the creed, paternosters, and Ave Marias, and observed outwardly the feasts and fasts of the Church, especially abstinence from flesh, they were accounted good Christians. Vows, pilgrimages, the worship of images and relics, especially Mariolatry, were everywhere encouraged. Iceland itself produced two or three saints, Thorlacr, Ion, and Gudmundr (the last never canonized). The adoration of the host was introduced in 1270. Superstitions abounded. The morals of the people were shameful, ambition, covetousness, and uncleanness prevailed. Iceland needed purification, in common with the entire Continent. But its Reformation occurred under the influence of that in Denmark. — Near the close of the 14th cent. the kingdom of Norway was united by inheritance with that of Denmark, and this union was confirmed by the union of Calmar (1397). Hence when the Diet of Copenhagen adopted Protestantism (1536), the movement naturally soon reached Iceland. A few clergymen and laymen who had embraced Luther's doctrines on the Continent, soon collected, and among them Oddr Gottschalkson, the author of the first Icelandic translation of the New Test., printed at Roeskilde, 1540. The bishops, and people generally, at first were hostile to the innovation; but the King's favor to it weakened their opposition. In 1540 Gizur Einarsson, a Lutheran, became B. of Skalaholt, and, although many difficulties had to be surmounted, succeeded in spreading the cause in his diocese. To counteract celibacy he married, and zealously opposed image-worship, and other Popish superstitions until his death (1548). Meanwhile B. Ion Arason of Holar adhered to Romanism, and after Gizur's death tried to usurp the See of Skalaholt, and suppress the Reformation in the whole island. Gizur's successor, Martin Einarsson, he imprisoned, and had the corpse of G. disinterred and buried in public ground. The King's officers were insulted, and stripped of their prerogatives, and foreign aid was treacherously solicited, of the Pope, the Emperor, and perhaps of Holland. All attempts to bring him to an account Ion treated with contempt. At length he and two of his sons (the zealous celibate had at least six!) were taken, and tried, with some irregularity, and executed for high treason (1550). Then outward opposition ceased, the Danish Liturgy and discipline were (1551) introduced in Holar also, and the articles of Ripen, as well as other regulations of the Danish Church, were adopted. — That the work thus begun and carried forward would, likewise, be rather external, is obvious, and for a long time the measures used to remedy the consequent evils were culpably inadequate. The royal officers absorbed the Church revenues, so that little was left to support the clergy, and a lack of candidates compelled most clergymen to take several parishes; simple farmers, even, had sometimes to be employed. Gradually the founding of seminaries at both the cathedrals, especially the establishment of the printing office in Holar by the excellent Bishop Gudbrandr Thorlakson (1574) remedied these evils. His translation of the Bible (1584) was an eminent means of elevating the people; many stubborn superstitions now yielded to the spread of knowledge; so that, whatever evils still remained, the Church of Iceland in the 17th cent. was no worse in this respect than the churches of the Continent. The last execution for witchcraft occurred in 1690. And now the people of Iceland are above the average of other countries in morality and cultivation.—The Church of Iceland has been formed mainly after that of Denmark, only retaining some peculiarities. The chief magistrate is the summus episcopus, who exercises his authority partly through bishops, partly through civil officers. The Archb. was abrogated, and the bishops, in whose choice the people participate, were essentially superintendents, and enjoyed considerable power. Towards the end of the last cent. the See of Skalaholt was transferred to Reikiavik, and in 1825 a cathedral built near by; but the See of Holar was dissolved in 1801, so that the island forms but one diocese. Next to the Bishop are the provosts, whose office, formerly mainly financial, acquired a more ecclesiastical character after the Reformation. There are 19 provostships, under which the several parishes are arranged. The parishes were at first, against the rules of the Danish directory, supplied with clergy by the Bishops; but since 1563, each congregation chooses, under the management of the provost, whilst the tenant in chief has the right of investiture. The revenues of the 299 churches, and of the clergy, are still scanty, and various strange peculiarities may yet be found.—(See FINNUS JOHANNÆUS, Hist. eccl. Islandiæ, IV. Tom. 4to., Havniæ, 1772–78, reaching to 1740; cont. by PETUR PETURSSON, Havn., 1841, 4to., to 1840. MÜNTER'S K.-gesch. von Dänemark u. Norw., Th. 1–3, 8vo.: Lpz., 1823–33. K. MAURER, d. Bekehr. d. norweg. Stammes, &c., 2 Bde. 8vo.: München, 1855–6. HARBOR'S Abhandl. in Det Kjöbenhavnske Vidensk. Selskabs Skrifter, V., 209; VII., 1–100. JOANNES OLAVICS, Synt. histor.-eccl. de baptismo, &c.: Hafn., 1770, 4to.; Diatr. histor.-eccl. de cognatione spiritali: Hafn., 1771, 8vo. PETUR PETURSSON, Comm. de jure eccl. in Isl., &c., Havn., 1844, 8vo. HALDOR EINARSON, Om Værdie-Beregning paa Landsviis og Tiende-Ydelsen i Island, Kjöbenhavn, 1833, 8vo. For statistics: Skýrslur um landshagi á Islandi, gefnar út af hinu Íslenzka Bokmentafelagi: Copenh., 1855–6). K. MAURER.*

Iconium.—This populous city of Asia Minor, (called by Strabo, 12, p. 668, only a παλιχτιον, but by Pliny H. N., 5, 27, 25, an urbs celebratissima), lay in a fertile plain at the foot of Mt. Taurus, near a lake. It was well built, inhabited by Gentiles and Jews (Acts 14: 1, 19), Gallienus, as a Roman colony. Xenophon (Anab., 1, 2, 19) reckons it the most Eastern city of Phrygia; Ptolemy (5, 6, 16), Cicero (ad Div., 8, 8; 5, 20; 15, 4) calls it the capital of Lycaonia; and Ammian. Marcell. (14, 2) places it in Pisidia. Here Paul, coming from Antioch in Pisidia, on his first missionary tour, planted a church, but, assailed by the people, was compelled to flee to Lystra and Derbe (Acts 13: 51; 14, &c.; 16: 2; cf. 2 Tim. 3: 11). Iconium became distinguished during the crusades, and for a time was the chief city of the Seljukes (KORTUM, Gesch. d. Mittelalt., I., 314, 220; ROBINSON'S Palest.). It is still an important place, with c. 30,000 inhabitants. Its old name was retained under the forms Cogni, Kunjal, Konia (see NIEBUHR, Reise, III, 113, &c.; CARMER, Asia M., II., 65; HAMILTON, Researches, II., 205, &c.; WINER'S Lex.; PAULY'S Real-Encl., IV., 51). RÜTTSCHEL.*

Iconoclasm (εικονοκλάστας, εικονομάχος).—The controversies concerning images occurred at a time when Christians, at least in the Orient, were forced in self-preservation to maintain opposition to Islam. The Church in Asiatic countries under Mohammedans, was, therefore, most zealous in guarding all those peculiarities which distinguished it from Islam. This secured to it a degree of self-subsistence which provoked the envy of the Church groaning under the tyranny of the Greek-Roman empire. To secure this same independence was the aim of the Church of the Empire. The idea of the freedom of the Church from the State, associated itself, also, with that of sole dependence upon the collective Patriarchs. But Rome had for centuries maintained this idea, with the assumption of the primacy among the Patriarchs, and now embraced it with self-sacrificing decision. At first the political state of Rome was less favorable to it than to the Oriental Patriarchate. But the Franks soon reversed this, and Rome became the sole head of a Church entirely free from the State, and even of a State-Church. Then the friends of the Church in the Greek empire, regarded it as most desirable to be connected with and united under Rome. This tendency corresponded with a growing inclination of the Eastern Church towards a Western element, that of a predominantly realistic apprehension of religion, which had gained such strength that the popular religion had acquired an ethnic-superstitious character, and overpowered the intellectualism of Greek Christians favored by the orthodoxy. The iconoclasm of that deistic intellectualism opposed all these tendencies, but ineffectually. The opposition to the women and monks who favored the superstition, excited hatred, as the despotic attempt of a barbaric government, and made all the friends of the Church iconolatrists. The friends of images were identical with friends of the Church and its independence. Hence iconolatry prevailed; but it prevailed before the ideas of the unity and liberty of the Church was fully developed; it prevailed through iconoclasts whom the monks and women had converted into iconolatrists, but who still remained enemies of the Church aiming at independence. The Greek Christians held, therefore, only to the unessential part of the controversy. Cæsareopapism was strengthened, and instead of union, the two churches, both friends of images, became permanently separated. Eastern Christians were removed from participation in the great mediæval development of the West. The Greek Church became isolated, servile, petrified. In the West iconoclasm was of small importance, because relics engaged more attention than images, and the conflicts with Islam and the State were trifling. — (Sources: GOLDAST, Imper. decreta de cultu Imaginum, &c.: Frcf., 1608. MANSI, Concil. coll., T. XIII. JOH. DAMASCENUS, Λόγοι πρὸς τοὺς διαβάλλοντας τὰς ἁγίας εἰκόνας, d. le Quien. THEOD. STUDITA, Op. ed. Sirmond. NICEPHORUS, Brev. historię, ed. Pelav.: Paris, 616. THEOPH. CONFESSOR, χρονογραφία: Paris, 655. Works: DALLÆUS, de imag.: Lugd., 1642. LAMBOURG, hist. de l'hérésie des Iconocl.: Paris, 679 et 1683. SPANHEMII, hist. imag. restituta: Lugd., 1686. WALCH, Ketzergesch., Bd. X., II. SCHLOSSER, Gesch. d. bilderstürmenden Kaiser, &c.: Frankf., 1812. MARX, d. Bildertritt, &c.: Trier, 1839. GFRÖRER, Allgem. K. gesch., &c. &c.).

Leo III., the Isaurian (717–741), aimed at a triumph of the State-Church over Jews, Monanists, and Mohammedans. But nothing so much repelled the last, as the image-worship which had become prevalent since the 5th cent. As late as 723 the Calif Yezid had commanded images to be removed from all the churches of his dominions. Leo also abhorred images, and resolved to exterminate them. A hasty attempt of some Bishops to execute this command caused an insurrection, and led the most revered theologians of the Greek Church, John Damasc. and Pope Greg. II., to oppose the Emperor. Leo persisted; in 730 he issued a second mandate; deposed the resisting Patriarchs, and responded to a Synod which Greg. III. summoned against iconoclasm, by cutting off the papal revenues in Sicily and Calabria, and attaching Eastern Illyria to the patriarch. of Constantinople. Gregory sought help from the Franks. John Damasc., living in Jerusalem, was beyond Leo's reach.—Constantine V., Copronymus (741–775) met with hostility from the iconolatrists, and was thus provoked to use severe measures to extirpate images. In 754 he convened a general Council at Constant.; all the Patriarchs staid away. Pope Stephan III., to escape the Lombards, threw himself into Pipin's arms. The 338 Bishops present attributed the introduction of images to Satan, and decided, upon the authority of the first six general Councils, that whoever made an image of Christ or adored it, was either a Nestorian or Eutychian. The Lord's Supper was the only proper representation of Christ. The worship of images was condemned by Scripture (John 4 : 24; 1 : 15; 20 : 29; Deut. 5 : 8, 9; Rom. 1 : 23; 10 : 17; 2 Cor. 5 : 7) and the Fathers (Ephiph., Greg. Naz., Chrysostom, Athanasius, &c.). But it was right to pray to Mary and the saints. Those who made and worshipped images were put under the ban, and John Damasc. was cursed under the name of Mansur. The clergy were required to sign these decrees. The monks refusing, were cruelly persecuted, and to be utterly exterminated. But Rome withstood the storm. Stephan III. rejected the decrees of 754, and Stephan IV., at a Lateran Council of 769 condemned the iconoclasts. Leo IV. inherited his father's hatred of images, and was enraged at the Empress Irene for secretly worshipping them. His early death placed Irene in power. At first she exercised forbearance. But the monks gathered around her and soon inflamed her zeal. An attempt was made to hold a Council in Constant., 786, but a majority of iconoclast Bishops, and the soldiers, who held the views of Leo III. and Constantine V., being present, the scheme was frustrated. A more cautious attempt in Nicæa, 787, was successful. The Council of 754 was condemned, the ἀσπασμός καὶ τιμητικὴ προσκύνησις (salutation and adoration) of saints' images was approved, only distinguished from the real worship (ἀληθινὴ λατρεία) of God. All iconoclasts were condemned. These decrees, refuted by the Libri Carolini, and by the Synod of Frankfurt, 794, remained unassailed in the Byzant. empire until 814, because they harmonized with the religion of the people, and their leaders, the monks. The chief iconolatrism was Theodore, Abbot of the monastery Studium in Constant., who alone comprehended the controversy in all its importance. — When Nicephorus became Emperor, 802–811, he neither opposed the prevailing orthodoxy, nor complied with the demands of Theodore of Studium; but Michael I. (811–13) followed Theodore's counsel. In 813 the soldiers elected Leo V., Emperor. At first he proceeded cautiously against image worship, but in 814, yielding to the turbulent demands of the army, issued an edict against it. The Patriarch and monks were punished for their secret machinations against Leo. A new Patriarch, 815, annulled, at a Synod in Constant., the decrees of the 2d Nicene Council. Theodore of Studium, and his friends, were persecuted. Theodore, though banished, organized the friends of images and incited them to resistance. Michael II., Balbus (820–29) followed Leo V., and allowed the private worship of images and saints. He desired the strife to cease. The insurrection of a certain Thomas made further concessions to the friends of images necessary. But from 823 more decided opposition was again made. In the West, also, Michael investigated, by an embassy to Lewis the Pious, the condemnation of image worship, at a Synod in Paris, 825. Theodore died 826, without seeing his object secured. Michael's son, Theophilus (829–42) forbade the keeping of images in private houses, and cruelly persecuted the monks, although his mother-in-law, and wife, Theodora, were zealous iconolatrists. After his death they broke the oath made to him against images, and Theodora, exercising the regency with Bardas, Manuel, and Theoctistus, for Michael III. (842–67), had the decrees of 787 revived by a new Council at Constant. The images were solemnly restored to the churches, and Feb. 19, 842, was celebrated as the day of triumph for orthodoxy. Iconoclasts were severely dealt with, and never again acquired power.

A. VOGEL.*

Idolatry.—The idea conveyed by this term is derived from Holy Scripture. In the Old Testament, idolatry was designated by זָבָח, a lie (Ps. 40 : 4; Amos 2 : 4), or by שָׁוָא, evil, a lie, nothingness, or more frequently by תועבה, an abomination, while the later Jews denoted it by עבודה זרה, strange worship.

Idolatry, therefore, had in Hebrew no name descriptive of the idea signified by it. The biblical expressions indicate the judgment of monotheism concerning the worship of false gods, rather than name the thing itself, while the later Jewish designation intimates the non-Jewish origin of idolatry. In the New Testament, the use of the word εἰδωλαστροφία is derived from the LXX., who translate by εἰδωλον all the different names of idols, even where they are simply called אֱלֹהִים, nothings; and thus one species of false worship, the actual worship of images (idololatria), gives name to the whole class (1 Cor. 10 : 14; Gal. 5 : 20; 1 Pet. 4 : 3). Afterward we find the comprehensive term idolatria (for idololatria) was formed, which includes also the erection and worship of other visible symbols (εἰδωλα) of the Deity beside images. Idolatry always appears in the Old and the New Testament as the extreme form of ungodliness. The Fathers describe it mostly after Rom. 1 : 23, sqq., as a taking away of the honor due to God: deo fraudem facit honores illi suos denegans et conferens aliis (TERTULL., de Idololatria, c. 11); or, divinus honor alteri datur (CYPRIAN); also, Dei honorem usurpat et vindicat creaturæ (HILAR. DIAC.); but oftener as a transferring of the worship of the Creator to the creature, μετάθεσις τῆς προσκυνητικῆς ἀπὸ τοῦ πεποιημένου ἐπὶ τὰ πλάσματα (GREG. NAZ.). — The first mention of idolatry made in Scripture, appears to be the allusion to the mysterious teraphim, in the house of Laban (Gen. 31 : 19, sqq.), which, as derived from ta-raph, to heal, and appearing in token of dangerous illness even in 1 Sam. 19 : 16, can hardly be anything else than amulets and images to charm away disease; but, in Judges 17 : 4, sq., they are to be regarded as representations of the one true God. To the same class, though suggested by the worship of animals among the Egyptians, belong the golden calf (Exod. 32 : 8) and the calf of Rehoboam (1 Kings 12 : 28; 14 : 9, sq.), as, indeed, Josephus calls the latter δαμάρις ἐκωρύμους τῷ θεῷ (Antl. 8, 3). Idolatry, without doubt, began with the symbolical worship, which was still closely connected with monotheism, and therefore, in Deut. 4 : 19, treated with a certain degree of allowance, though we cannot assent to the Jewish view of its origin, as the worship of the celestial bodies in the time of Enos (cf. MOSES MAIMONIDES, de Idololatr., c. 1, from a misconception of Gen. 4 : 26), and just as little can we consider that it first made its appearance in the time of Heber. But that the worship of the great physical powers of the world, the sun, the stars, the elements, as symbols of the Deity, was the oldest form of idolatry, is evident from the fact, that not only the Canaanite and Phœnician worship points to such more distant background, as it were (comp.

MOVERS, die Phœnicier, I., 148, sqq. 157), but also the religion of India presupposes a grand symbolic representation of the divine (LASSER, indische Alterthumskunde, I., 756, sqq., also ROTH, zur Geschichte der Religionen); the Jews expressly call the oldest idolatry the worship of the stars and planets (Mos. MAIM., loco citato); and Sanchuniathon also, tracing idolatry back to Cain, regards the worship of the elements as the first phase of it. Hence, among Christians, no doubt remained concerning this point (FRANCISCUS MATERNUS, de Errore Profanarum Religionum, ed. MÜNTER., c. 1–5). Plato and Aristotle are weighty authorities for the origin of polytheism from a contemplation of the grand unity of God, and of the manifold character of the visible world (PLATO, Philebus, ed. STALLBAUM, pp. 16, 31; ARISTOTLE, Metaphys., XI., 8); to which philosophers, Dicaearchus also may be added (PORPHYRIUS, de Abstinencia, III., 2). If, on the other hand, Clement of Alexandria considers the admiration of the celestial bodies, gratitude toward the inventors of agriculture, the consciousness of guilt and sin, the personifying of the passions, and the like, as sources of the myths, he does not mean to describe the origin of polytheism, but the gradual development of it as it existed before him in its various forms and combinations. From the original worship of the stars, in which the One Being, God, made known by the sacred tradition of primitive time, was obscured and hidden by the world and its phenomena, religion soon proceeded to a multiplicity of symbols along with the spread of nations now subjected to manifold physical influences in various countries. Another cause that developed the general worship of images from the false worship of God, was history. Nations cherished the memory of their ancestors and ancestral heroes, and lived under their controlling influence; and, when once they had abandoned the living God, the worship of their forefathers was a necessary consequence of their own filial piety, and of the authority which their forefathers, even after death, continued to exercise over them. The worship of manes, such as is the Chinese religion, thus arose, and along with it the worship of heroes, which many writers, as for instance Voss, taking a partial view of the matter, regard as the only source of the mythical religions. How the transition was next made to the symbolism of animal worship, and from that to anthropomorphism, to the ideas of mythology, and to the worship of images of the gods, is best explained by Creuzer (Symbolik u. Mythologie der alten Völker, 3te Ausg., I., 5, sqq.). Inquiries concerning the origin of myths naturally have their place here. The fathers of the Church did not fail to notice the share which even the sacred tradition of primitive times had in the formation of heathen religions, by way of symbolism and myths; and Lactantius (de Falsa Relig., I., 11.) considers the consensus gentium, in the belief in gods, as an evidence that they were affected by such tradition. The older theologians of the Protestant Church were chiefly occupied in the contest against naturalism, which assumed as invincible the position that the idea of one Supreme God is innate in man, and that therefore neither revelation nor tradition was needed to give this idea in the manner in which it appears as the foundation of the refined systems of polytheism. All further development into classes and families of gods, and the myths, were accordingly in their opinion a deliberate invention to subserve the interest of the hierarchy or the State. This view was held by HERBERT of Cherbury (de Relig. Gentilium, p. 6, 168, sqq.). Against such opinions, various writers contended with a solid array of learning; as G. J. VOSSIUS, de Theologia Gentili et Physiologia Christiana I., 3 sqq., et al.; VAN DALE, de Origine et Progressu Idololatriæ (C. I., c. 2, 3); SELDEN, de Diis Syriis (Lips., 1662, p. 25, sqq.). It was their belief, as well as FARMER'S (The General Prevalence of the Worship of Human Spirits among the Ancient Heathen Nations: London, 1783), that the demons, whether evil spirits or souls of the departed, were objects of veneration among the heathen even in very early times. The Jews gradually came to the belief that the gods were not a nonentity, as the prophets invariably represented them, but that they were actually living spirits of evil—a view which was adopted by the Fathers of the Church, and extended to oracles. It was in this way that our old theologians arrived at the doctrine of the worship of demons, from which, in later times, authorities receded, and S. J. Baumgarten, for instance, speaks simply of mutilated tradition as being the source of idolatry. TOLAND (Lettres Philosophiques, p. 99, sqq.), adopting the opinion of PLINY (Hist. Nat.; comp. CIC., de Nat. Deor., I., 1), brought forward, in explanation of the origin of religion, merely the interest of rulers, who ascribed divine attributes to kings, lawgivers, and other persons distinguished for their influence or services among men. DUPUIS (de l'Origine de tous les Cultes.) derives all religion from the pantheistic view of the world, as being in his apprehension the natural view. Rationalism, resting on its Pelagian foundation, either leaned toward the views of naturalism or availed itself of the tendency of such authorities as Heyne, or J. H. Voss, and others. Heyne asserted that the myths, and along with them the systems of idolatry, were either the voice of historical events echoed back by a wondering and admiring age, or a mere expression of philosophical ideas; that is, that they were either historical or philosophical myths; while Voss referred the origin of the gods to philosophy, which clothed its higher ideas in the childlike garb of mythological tales for the people, and thus again ascribed it to priestcraft; and in his view the traditions concerning actual heroes was a fruitful source of religious myths. Others, as LOECK, have been inclined to see in the mythology of heathen nations only the play of a childish fancy. But above all the prejudice has prevailed, that a true philosophy or religious conception underlies the stories of the gods, and that the appearance of personal and historical forms was owing solely to the mode of viewing and describing the idea, or to a misunderstanding of it (BUTTMANN; G. HERMANN). Finally, a mere work of the priests (FR. CREUZER, in the earlier editions of his Symbolik), or a hierarchical system of nature, and so in fact a work of the priests (WELKER), has been considered as the foundation of developed idolatry (K. O. MÜLLER, Prolegomena zu einer wissenschaftlichen Mythologie, pp. 316–344). K. O. MÜLLER has most profoundly conceived the origin of the conception of the several gods, and of idolatry withal, to be certain views springing up of necessity, real but not reflected upon, in a circle of whole nations, in which views the fundamental idea was in no instance pure and existing by itself, but always joined with what was actual and historical. From this view of primitive religion, which has not been duly considered, it was easy to pass to the idea prevailing in the modern philosophy of religion, which is most consistently set forth by HEGEL (Vorlesungen über Religionsphilosophie); and according to which, religion, from the beginning, has been in a course of steady development, the first stage of which was idolatry; or rather, idolatry existed not as a departure from God, but as the necessary first step toward God. By this procedure, the proper idea of idolatry is taken away in a pretended higher recognition of the connection of all religion which advances through manifold grades of development to the one absolute religion. HEINRICHS (die Religion im innern Verhältnisse zur Wissenschaft: Heidelb., 1821, S. 141, sqq.), KRAFT (die Religionen aller Völker in philosophischer Darstellung: Stuttg., 1848), fall in with these notions, and FEUERBACH and others go beyond them, and even fancy religion to be only a morbid phenomenon in the life of man.

All religious worship which is not offered to the true, invisible God of the Bible, is to be regarded as idolatry; as well as all worship which is rendered to Him in symbols chosen by man, and not appointed of God in the revelation made in Holy Scripture. Idolatry had its origin in that natural longing after God which was caused by a survey of the outward world, and by the primitive tradition whose voice still echoed down the tract of time, which longing, without the continual interposition of God, that is, without Divine Revelation, misses its true object, so that worldly existences were apprehended by men unconsciously in the place of God, and as God. The nature of this apprehension has varied according to the physical, historical, and social condition of a people, and has admitted the worship even of what is most unreal and accidental, as in the case of feticism, if priest or sorcerer had given it a sacred character. From the most ancient symbolism to the rudest acts of false worship, there are sometimes more, sometimes fewer intermediate steps; and it must be observed that the better cultivated among the heathen have the feeling that the idols are mere symbols, either of many gods, or of the one only God, while the mass of the people are always near feticism, or are actually fallen into it.

Idolatry used to be divided into proper and improper. The former was the true polytheism, the belief in the divinity of the image itself and of the various images; the latter was either, according to Baumgarten, the worship of many gods as simply subordinate to one god, or, according to J. H. Voss, the viewing of the objects of adoration as mere symbols of the invisible God. There has been added to this, as founded on Col. 3 : 5, figurative idolatry; that is, an excessive, sinful regard for earthly and sensuous objects; and controversialists, going beyond the bounds of fairness, designate indiscriminately as idolatry all reverence of statues and paintings in the Greek and the Roman Catholic Church.

W. HOFFMANN.—C. Short.

Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch.—1) Of his life and labors we have no sure record. What is told—as that he was the child whom our Lord set up as an example to his disciples (Matt. 18 : 4); that he was a scholar of John (Acta mart. c. 3; Euseb. chron. ad. a. 11 Trajani) or Peter (Greg. M. ep. 37, ad Athanas.); that he was consecrated bishop in Antioch by the Apostle Paul (Constit. Apost., VII., 46) or Peter (Chrysost. hom. in Ignat. Mart. c. 4); that he was the first who promoted church-music and introduced antiphonies (Socrates, H. E. VI., 8), and the like—all belong to the sphere of the legend. Concerning his martyrdom we have Acta in several editions. A shorter one was first published by Usher in Latin (Londini, 1647), and then by Ruinart, in the appendix to his Acta primorum martyrum sincera, in Greek, 1689 (printed from still older editions are those of Hefele, PP. app. ed. 3, p. 245; Petermann, Epp. Ign., p. 449; Cureton, Corp. Ign., p. 190, which contains also, p. 222, a fragment of a Syriac translation). Larger Greek Acta, probably of the 7th cent., are to be found in Simeon Metaphrastes (Cotelier, PP. AA., II., 163; Gulandi, I.; Petermann, p. 472; in Latin, AA. SS. 1, Febr., p. 24). Finally, there is a yet later one in the Vita S. Ign. in AA. SS., varying indeed from, but related to the Armenian, published first by Aucher (Vita SS., II., 72) and then by Petermann (p. 496). But even the shortest, and without doubt the oldest, of these Acta, is to be rejected as spurious. Eusebius (Hist. eccl., IV., 15), and perhaps Chrysostom, was unacquainted with it, and its contents show historical errors and contradictions, as, for example, that Ig. was sentenced by the Emperor Trajan himself in Antioch (Uhlhorn, Zeitschr. f. hist. Theol., Jahrg. 1851, I., II., p. 248, sq.). Thus the story of martyrdom rests solely upon the Epistles. These (even in the briefest Syriac version) intimate that Ig. was condemned, in Antioch, by the ordinary court, ad bestias, and conveyed to Rome to suffer death. On the way thither the Epp. purport to have been written. This, then, must have happened between the years 105 and 108 (the most probable date is 107 or 108). His bones are said to have been carried back to Antioch, where he was specially honored, as we learn from Chrysostom's homily on S. Ignat. martyr.

2) In all there are 15 Epistles, which bear the name of Ignatius, but they evidently vary much in age and value. Three of them, 1, 2 (ad S. Joannem ap.) and 3 (ad S. Mariam V., to which is added a Responsio B. M. V. ad Ign.), exist only in Latin, and appear to have been originally composed in that language (Cureton, Corp. Ign., p. 156; Petermann, p. 439). Five, 4 (ad Mariam Cassobolitam, to which one of hers to Ign. is added), 5 (ad Tarsenses), 6 (ad

Antiochenos), 7 (ad Heronem, Diaconum Antiochenum), and 8 (ad Philippenses), occur in the Greek language, and in a Latin and Armenian translation (Cureton, p. 119; Petermann, p. 289). Seven, 9 (ad Magnesios), 10 (ad Trallianos), 11 (ad Philadelphenses), 12 (ad Smyrnas), 13 (ad Ephesios), 14 (ad Romanos), and 15 (ad Polycarpum), are found in a two-fold Greek copy, one larger (B) and one shorter (A). The former (B) was first published by Pacæus in 1557, and independently of him by Andr. Gessner in 1559 (lately in the collections PP. AA. by Cureton and Petermann); the latter (A) first by Archbishop Usher (1644, Cod. Cajensis), L. Vossius (1646, Cod. Medicæus), and Ruinart (Cod. Colbertinus of the Ep. to the Romans, 1689). The text now received is from the Cod. Medicæus. Of both we have old Latin translations; of A. one in the Syriac, fragmentary it is true, in Cureton, and another in Armenian made from it (Constantinople, 1783), which Petermann has collected). Finally, the three last numbered Epp. (ad Eph., ad Smyrn., ad Polycarp.) have come to light very lately in a still shorter copy (although but a Syriac version), and been edited and corrected from the Greek text by Cureton, first after two MSS. discovered in the Nitrian Desert in 1839 and 1843 (The Ancient Syriac Version of the Epistles of St. Ignatius, London and Berlin, 1845), and afterward more accurately in the Corpus Ignatianum by the aid of a third MS., discovered in 1847 (A Complete Collection of the Ignatian Epistles, etc., Berlin, 1849). Bunsen also gives a comparative view of the three editions (Hamburg, 1847). Petermann offers a rich collection of materials in his: S. Ignat. epp. collatis edd. græcis versionibusque Syriaca, Armeniaca, Latinis (Lipsiæ, 1849). A critical edition formed by the use of all this material is yet a desideratum, although Lipsius has made an excellent beginning toward it in the Zeitschr. f. hist. Theol., 1856, I.

3) On account of the relation which the Ignatian Epp. bear to the earliest history of the Christian Church, the question of their genuineness has been very largely discussed, and because so many various copies are extant, the previous question, which of them must be regarded as original, must first be settled. Their critical history divides itself into three periods. The first extends to the discovery of the copy A. During this time it was determined that the three Epp. existing only in the Latin tongue should be rejected as spurious. Even Baronius gave them up. As to the others, opinions wavered. Whilst Bellarmine and Halloix declared them all genuine, the Magdeburg Centurionists doubted them, Calvin (Inst., I., c. 13, 29) decidedly rejected them, though without sufficient reason, and some (as Scultetus) took middle ground by supposing interpolation. In the second period the result reached was that the 5 Epp. not named by Eusebius (4—8 in the enumeration already given) must also be considered spurious, and besides this, that the shorter copy, A., is much nearer the genuine text than the larger one, B. Meier (Stud. u. Krit., 1836) attempted to defend the latter, but Rothe (Anfänge d. chr. K., p. 735) and Arndt (Stud. u. Krit., 839, I.) have thoroughly refuted him. On the other hand, diverse views in regard to the authenticity of the Epp. were entertained. It was favored chiefly by Rothe (l. c.), Huther (Zeitschr. f. hist. Theol., 1841, IV.) and Düsterdieck (De Ignatianarum epp. authentia, Göttingæ, 1843); denied chiefly by Baur (über d. Urspr. des Episc., 1838, p. 147), who thinks they were composed for the purpose of strengthening the Catholic Church, after the middle of the 2d cent., and Schwegler (Nachap. Zeitalter, II., 59); whilst Neander was inclined on the whole to acknowledge the genuineness of the shorter copy, but with the limitation that it also was not free from important interpolations (Oh. Hist.). In the third period, new interest and discussion were awakened by the discovery of the shortest Syriac version of the 3 Epp. to the Ephesians, to the Romans and to Polycarp. The first editor, Cureton, at once gave his decided opinion that they are the genuine Ign. Epp., afterward interpolated to favor the doctrine of Christ's divinity and the episcopacy, and further enlarged by 4 spurious ones (ad Mag., ad Smyrn., ad Phil., ad Trall.). This view he maintained in England against no strong opposition. In Germany, Bunsen supported it in the work before quoted, and in a second ("Ign. v. Ant. u. seine Zeit. Sieben Sendschreiben an Dr. Aug. Neander, Hamburg, 1847"), but with less success. Baur came out against him ("die Ign. Br. u. ihr neuester Kritiker. Eine Streitschrift gegen Herrn Bunsen, Tübingen, 1848") and argued for the originality of the shorter Greek copy, although he even regarded it as a forgery. In favor of this copy and its genuineness we find Hefele (PP. AA. ed. 3, proleg. LVIII.), Denzinger ("Ueber die Aecht. des bisherig. Textes d. Ign. Br.," Würzburg, 1849), Uhlhorn (l. c.) and Petermann (l. c.), whilst Hilgenfeld along with Baur regards the copy A. as more original, but at the same time not the work of Ignatius ("die apost. Väter," Halle, 1853, p. 274). On the other hand, Ritschl, in his history of the "Entstehung l. altkath. Kirche" (pp. 418 and 577), advocates the view that the genuine Ign. Epp. are contained in the Syriac version, but does not enter into details. Weiss has made a later attempt in defence (Reuter's Repertorium, 1852); a more extended justification, indeed we may say the first thorough one, has been given by Lipsius (Zeitschr. f. hist. Theol., 1856, I.; comp. J. G. A. 1856, St. 152-154). Thus the controversy remains to this day undecided.

4) The relation of the different copies or recensions. Since B. is universally discarded, the question as to whether A. or S. is the original, is to be considered. The external evidences collected by Cotelier, more fully by Cureton, (Corp Ign., p. 158) are decidedly more favorable to A. The oldest, the Ep. of Polycarp, ad Phil. 13, contains an undoubted quotation from A. The defenders of S. can only escape its force by declaring it an interpolation, but without sufficient reason (Bunsen, Ritschl, Lipsius). The following testimonies, that of Irenæus (c. haer., I., 28) and those of Origen (Prolog. in Cant. Cant. ed. de la Rue, III., 30; Hom. in Luc., ib. 38) decide nothing, because the brief passages quoted are alike in both copies. Eusebius names in full (H. E., III., 36) the seven Epp. of A., as also Jerome after him (de viris ill., c. 16). The Ep. of Athanasius, de Synodis Arimini et Seleucia (ed. Bened., I., 761), if it be altogether genuine, mentions ad Eph. (7) according to A. That Chrysostom was acquainted with S. alone, cannot be proven, since he cites merely two short sentences (Hom. in S. Ign. Ed. Bened., II., 592, and Hom. de Legislatore, VI., 410), and the common reports concerning Ign. in the first suit as well, if not better, the 7 Epp. of A. Later evidences have no weight, and just as little can be gained from the Syriac MSS.—Thrown back thus upon internal grounds, it will certainly be of greater importance, if dogmatic diversities and later dogmatic views can be pointed out in A. That Bunsen's assertion of a Christological variation, according to which A. lays special stress upon the divinity of Christ, is erroneous, even Lipsius (l. c., p. 20) has acknowledged. Although the latter has set up a difference between the Christologies of the two, by which he supposes S. to rest upon Patripassian, or more correctly, modalistic conceptions, whilst A. finds its chief difficulty in the assertion of the true humanity of Christ, his position is scarcely tenable, since, leaving out of view the grave objections which spring from the development of Christological doctrine here supposed, the circumstance that in S. long passages, in which the humanity of Christ is asserted against the heretics are left out, is easily explained by the entire character of S. as an epitome; besides, particular passages in which the humanity is asserted occur even in S. (especially ad Eph. inscr., where the interpretation of Lipsius is far from satisfactory) and others, which according to Lipsius are Patripassian, in A. alone (especially ad Rom. 6, which Lipsius indeed inserts in S.). Polemic references to the errors of Gnostic Docetism, abundant in A., are wanting in S., although a few traces may be discerned (especially ad Polyc. 1, 3, where ἡτεροδιδασκαλοῦντες are spoken of). Whether the combatting of errors is an argument against the genuineness of the Epp., see below. Passages bearing on episcopacy are for the most part wanting in S., yet enough remain to show that there is no essential variance between the two copies. In S. also the bishop is ranked higher than the congregation (ad Pol. 6) and represents its unity (ad Eph. 1), and the principle, that nothing shall be done without the bishop, which appears at large in A., we find plainly stated in S. (ad Pol. 4). Only in S. everything is fragmentary. The historical relations are essentially the same in both, and if ascertained to be true, the greater number of Epp. in A., and their greater length, can form no bar to this acknowledgment. Where they differ in this respect, it cannot be determined in many cases where the probability lies. In the chief variation in the Ep. to Polycarp it is manifestly on the side of A., since it is impossible that Ign. could have himself sent, as S. supposes, a successor to Antioch. Besides, A., where it varies from S., as in the Epp. wanting in the other, never contains such statements as facts derived from independent sources can prove to be unhistorical. — In which the closer logical connection and the greater unity exists, whether it can be positively determined from particular passages that S. is an abridgment or A. an enlargement, is a matter of dispute. Uhlhorn has shown a better connection throughout in A., and endeavored to prove many traces of a secondary character in S. Lipsius always finds the reverse true (with a single exception (ad Rom. 6), where in S. a paragraph has been omitted by the negligence of the copyist), and everywhere in A. marks of interpolation. Just in this main point the question cannot be decided. Yet passages like ad Rom. 6, and especially ad Eph. 19, speak very strongly in favor of A. If S. is an abridgment of A., it must have been made in later times, for ascetic purposes, and can then have no historical value.

5) Still more undecided is the question of authenticity. The external evidences in favor of the Epp. have already been named. The quotation in the Ep. of Polyc. ad Phil., is indeed ruled out by regarding that Ep. itself as spurious or interpolated (Baur, Schwegler, Hilgenfeld) — but the hypothesis of interpolation must be considered as very unfortunate, and the rejection of the whole Ep. by these scholars, who were preceded by Semler and some other older opponents of the Ign. Epp., so accords with their entire views of the post-apostolic age, and finds so little ground in the contents of the Ep., and so strong a barrier in the ancient testimonies in its favor (especially Irenæus), that hitherto it has met with few supporters. — Against the authenticity of the Ign. Epp. (the reference is now only to the copy A.) the following are the chief arguments: a) That the facts on which they rest are not historical. If, however, we derive these facts, not from the spurious legends of the martyrs, as Baur has done, but from the Epp. themselves, we will find them fully corresponding with the circumstances of the time. That Christians suffered martyrdom under Trajan is known; and that Ign. should be condemned ad bestias by the Governor of Antioch (and the Epp. intimate nothing else,) cannot appear strange when we read the accounts in Hermas (Vis., III., 2), the Ep. ad Diogn. (c. 7), and Justin (Dialog. c. Tr. 110), where such sentences are recorded. That Ign. was sent to Rome, εἰς εἶρην τοῦ δῆμου, can be objected to with just as little reason, because the sending of condemned persons to Rome to fight there with wild beasts was first restricted by a law of Severus and Antoninus (L. 31, D. de pœnis). Such transportation did not yet depend upon the permission of the Emperor, and hence the mild disposition of Trajan cannot be arrayed against the fact, since he probably knew nothing of it. The route of travel was the usual one of the time, and that Ign., though a prisoner, had the privilege of receiving the envoys of the churches and writing epistles, because similar examples are recorded (Lucian de morte Peregrini, c. 12; Tertullian ad martyres; Acta SS. Perpetuæ et Felicitatis, c. 3), cannot be accounted strange, and the less so, since it is clearly enough intimated (ad Rom., 5) that it was purchased by gifts. Nor is there the least difficulty in the circumstance, that Ign., in his Ep. to the Romans, supposed that they might perhaps take measures to procure his liberation, since the way was open to them, he having been condemned by the Governor in Antioch, and not by the Emperor himself, to make appeal to the latter even against his will (comp. L. 6, D. de appellat. et relationibus). This entire class of objections, especially in the light of recent investigation, may be regarded as completely set aside. b) "The personality of Ign.," it is said, "as it appears in the Epp., agrees far better with a fabricated legend than real history." His "affected humility," and "mock-martyr heroism," give special offence (Baur, Bunsen, Hilgenfeld). Just the contrary is the judgment of Rothe (o. c., p. 715), who everywhere sees marks of genuineness, and denies to any one the capacity of discerning authorial peculiarities who does not decide with him. The argument is at all events very subjective, and of little weight. Whether the humility of Ign. was affected, or real, might be hard to determine, and though his martyr-heroism was perhaps not wholly free from earthly dross, since we discover in his Ep. ad Rom. an eccentric personality violently perturbed by an inward conflict, yet the image with its lights and shadows betrays no signs of fiction, but exhibits rather, in the sharp outlines with which it comes upon the stage, the stamp of genuineness. The most weighty arguments against the authenticity of the Epp. are undoubtedly the two following: c) In them heresies are combatted, which belong to a later period than the beginning of the 2d cent. It is a question whether two heresies, one Docetic and the other Judaistic, are attacked, or whether only one is to be admitted, to which both tendencies may be ascribed. Pearson (Vindic., I., 2) favored two, whilst Huther, Disterdieck, and Hefele, find but one. The latter view Uhlhorn has defended at length (l. c., p. 283), and Hilgenfeld the former (AA. VF., p. 230), whilst Lipsius has come to the aid of Uhlhorn, and endeavored to refute Hilgenfeld's arguments. That only one heresy is referred to, would seem clear from passages like those ad Mag. 8–10, and ad Phil. 8, 9. In answering the question as to the period to which the heretics here combatted are to be assigned, the opponents of the authenticity of the Epp. disagree. According to Baur and Hilgenfeld, the latter of whom lays special stress on this argument, the Epp. presuppose the great Gnostic system, that of Valentinus and Marcion; according to Lipsius, on the other hand, the Docetism of the Epp. is indeed later than Saturninus, but earlier than Valentinus, and for this reason he places them between 130–140. It is easy to prove that the heretics of our Epp. preceded the great Gnostic systems, the blooming period of Gnosticism. They are manifestly attacked in their first rise, and are still few, ῥῆγες (ad Mag. 4; ad Smyrn. 5), οἰστοὶ ἀπορεῖς, and as the idea of number is very relative (Hilgenfeld), so the whole appearance of the heretics in the Epp. makes the impression that they have not yet grown to that threatening power to which Gnosis attained in 130–140. The particular elements of this error show less division than at a later time. The connection between Judaism and Gnosticism is not indicated, as it comes out afterward in the Homilies, but as they are here, they belong to an earlier period. Whether, now, such heretics appeared about the year 108, depends upon the answer given to the still more comprehensive question, whether the germs of Gnosis existed already in the apostolic age, in fine, whether the heretics of the Pastoral Epp., and the Ep. to the Col., are to be regarded as positively Gnosticizing Judaists. If, as we certainly believe, the beginnings, though only the beginnings, of Gnostic doctrines are to be dated back in apostolic times, then the heretics of the Ign. Epp. form the true middle member, the transition link to the fully developed forms of Gnosis in 130, and opposition to them can afford about as little argument against the authenticity of the Epp., since after Gnosis had unfolded itself to what it became after 130, it would be altogether impossible for a forger or interpolator to represent its earlier stage as it occurs in the Epp. d) The ecclesiastical constitution of the Epp., it is said, especially the episcopate, belongs to a later era. It is indeed true, that the episcopate appears throughout in Ign. as an office different from, and superior to, that of the presbyter, yet he nowhere makes it of apostolic institution (not even in ad Phil. 1, which Hilgenfeld adduces; but the passage only treats of the installation of a particular bishop, and not of the institution of the office), and connects none of the Old Test. ideas of the priesthood with it. The presbyters still stand in high regard, and are almost always named with the bishop. The presbytery is the successor of the college of the apostles; the bishop, the vicar of Christ. As is clear from what is just said, the episcopate is regarded as a congregational office (Gemeindeamt), and not a church office (Kirchenamt), even not in ad Smyrn. 8, and ad Eph. 3). True, indeed, the episcopate has special importance in the eyes of Ign. for the sake of unity, which, as "ἄνθρωπος εἰς ἑῶν κατηρητισμένος" (ad Phil. 1), he seeks to strengthen, but to him only the unity of the congregation is represented in the bishop, whilst the "καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία" has its unity in Christ (see ad Smyrn. 8, where the phrase κ. ἰ. occurs). As head of the congregation, and vicar of Christ in it, the conduct of worship belongs to him, no marriages are to be concluded without his will, and no vows assumed without his consent. Ign. sees, it is true, in the episcopate an excellent means for preserving ecclesiastical unity against the inroads of heresy, but the bishops are not, for him, bearers of traditional doctrine on the ground of a special gift of the Holy Ghost, nor is any particular importance attached to the succession of the bishops. This form of Church government is certainly beyond the stadium of development found in Clemens Romanus and the Pastor of Hermas, since there a prominent presbyter, but still only primus inter pares, appears. And yet that of Irenæus is considerably in advance of this. In Irenæus the presbyters are put further in the background, and no longer figure as the successors of the Apostles; the episcopate has become a church-office, representing the unity of the Church, and the bishops, now regarded as the successors of the Apostles, are by their special charisma the bearers of traditional doctrine—a progress far beyond Ignatius. Between Ign. and Iren., records are wanting by which we might trace the course of development in detail. Yet the ecclesiastical constitution of the Homilies, certainly more ideal than real, is further advanced than that of Ign., and Justin Martyr, in reference to worship at least, assigns a similar position to the bishop, for with him the πρόεδρος of the congregation has the conducting of it. We may add that, since with Ign. the episcopate appears as an institution still in its youth, and greatly needing recommendation, it need not be deemed so impossible a thing, that the form of Church government had already, about 108, progressed thus far in Syria—a land where many ecclesiastical institutions struck root, because a land in which the Church very early received a national character—in Asia Minor and in Rome (that this was the case in all congregations, is not intimated in the Epp.).—The question of the authenticity of the Ign. Epp., deeply interwoven as it is with all the important questions respecting the post-apostolic age, is by no means to be regarded as positively settled; but we are not wrong in saying, that the judgment concerning these Epp. has become much more favorable during the last decade of years. Many strong objections of an earlier date have been removed, and other difficulties brought much nearer to a solution.

6) The doctrine of the Ign. Epp. rests essentially upon a Pauline basis, since the Epp. of St. Paul are chiefly quoted. This is generally admitted. Schwegler alone (N.-Apost. Z. A., II., 159) wishes to distinguish a mediating tendency in the prominence given to the ἀγάπη as the highest dogmatic idea, in which Christianity culminates, and according to Hilgenfeld (l. c., p. 251) the Pauline idealism is thought to be modified in a realistic way. It were hard to prove either; and yet elements from the Gospel of John are brought in to modify the doctrines of Paul, since many references are made to the Gospel of the first-named apostle. Baur first attempted to point out Gnosticizing features in the Epp., and Hilgenfeld followed him more in detail—a view which harmonizes with the great latitude which these scholars give to Gnostic ideas. The outlines of the doctrines of the Epp. are about these: God has revealed himself to us in Christ, who, as λόγος ἀίδιος, became man (ad Magn., 8; ad Eph., 15), lived and suffered as true man (on which as opposed to Docetism he laid special stress), died and rose again. Ign. makes great account of the death of Christ. By it our salvation was effected (Ταῦτα γὰρ πάντα ἔπαθεν, ἵνα σωθῶμεν, ad Smyrn., 2; comp. ad Eph., 7; ad Trall., 2; ad Philad. inscr.; ad Trall. inscr.). This salvation is appropriated by faith, whilst we die with Christ (ad Magn., 9). By faith man comes to a new life (the καὶνότης ἀδίδου ζωῆς; comp. ad Eph., 11), and this new life shows itself in love. In love the Christian character obtained by faith reveals itself (ad Magn., 5), and since all virtues follow it (ad Eph., 14), it is the end of Christianity, whose beginning is faith (ad Eph., 14). Faith and love is the flesh and blood of Christ (ad Trall., 8; ad Rom., 7). The Holy Supper, which is brought forward very often, and in very strong language in the Epp., is the meat and drink of God (ad Eph., 5; ad Rom., 7), uniting us with Christ (ad Phil., 4), a "φάρμακον τῆς ἀσθενείας" (ad Eph., 20). In it at the same time the unity of the congregation completes itself; it is the ἑνωστικόν, yet so, that the prayer of thanks, the εὐχαριστία, appears as the special sacrifice. G. UHLHORN. — Porter.

Ignatius, Patriarch of Constantinople, a son of Emp. Michael I., was born c. 790, or 796, and a pupil of Tarasius, Patriarch of Constantinople. He lived in the midst of the strife which hastened the schism between the Greek and Roman Church. Leo V. had usurped his father's throne, and even emasculated Ignatius and put him in a monastery. He obtained his liberty again after some years, and by degrees reached the patriarchate (847). But his zeal for correcting the immoralities of the court soon led to his expulsion from office, by Michael III., and banishment to the island of Terebinthus. Photius, his opponent, succeeded him (858). Still Ignatius did not yield his claims, but maintained a party in Const., which led to a schism. Michael asked the mediation of Rome to heal the schism. Pope Nich. I. seized the opportunity of establishing a Roman primacy in the Greek Empire, and acted, not as mediator, but as judge. He reproved Michael for deposing Ignatius without his approbation (MANSI, Conc. nova et ampl. Coll., XV., 160), and declared the deposition invalid, because the requisite number of witnesses (70) was not called in. He sent B. Zacharias and B. Radoaldus to Constantinople, but Photius won them to his side, and at the Council (861) they advocated his claims (MANSI, l.c., 219, 241; XVI., 237). But as Photius did not avow the expected submission to Rome, Nicholas summoned a Council there, 863, which sustained Ignatius, and excommunicated Photius. Michael denounced this procedure; but Nicholas persisted, knowing that he had nothing to fear from a Greek Emperor, adopted for his course of conduct can. 9 of the Conc. of Chal. (MANSI, VII., 369; XV., 201), threatened a ban, and expressed himself in accordance with the Pseudo-Isidorian principles, without quoting their language (cf. NICOLAI, Ep., 70, ad Hincm. et cæt. Episc.). But Photius kept his place until Michael was murdered, and Basilus, the Macedonian, ascended the throne, who drove away Photius and restored Ignatius, 867. Nicholas now died, and Hadrian II. succeeded him. Ignatius soon became involved in a dispute with Hadrian, by claiming the Bulgarians for his diocese, whilst the Roman chair claimed them as having been converted by Latins (866). The disputes became very animated (MANSI, XVII., 62) and survived Ignatius, who died in 878. His anniversary is Oct. 23. Besides his letters we have S. Tarasii Vita by Ignatius. — (See SCHRÖCKH, K.-G., Th. 23, p. 355, &c.). NEUDECKER.*

Ignorantins (Frères ignorantins, fratres ignorantiae, the congregation of Christian instruction and schools), the name of a Jesuit institution in France, founded by Abbé Baptiste de la Salle (1724), the object of which was to give gratuitous instruction in the public schools, in the interest of the hierarchy. Hence the Jesuits favored the society; it spread rapidly, and became a substitute for the Jesuit order, in 1764 and onward. At the outbreak of the Revolution the Ign. had 121 institutions, but in 1790 they too were driven from France. They fled to Italy, and began to labor there, when Napoleon allowed them (1806) to return, knowing that they would favor his schemes. In 1830 they had 250 large institutions; and now they have about 400, with 700 schools. They are also to be found in Germany and Bohemia, quietly laboring to advance their object. Their dress resembles that of the Jesuits. NEUDECKER.*

Ildefonsus, Archbishop of Toledo, born at Toledo, 607, of a distinguished family, educated under Isidore of Sevilla, became a monk, then Abbot of Agli, near Toledo, and finally, 658-67 (or 69) Archbishop of Toledo. Julian of Toledo says that Ildefonsus composed many works, which other duties prevented his finishing. We have, 1) de illibata b. Virginis virginitate, published in bibl. Patr. Lugd., T. XII.; 2) two books de cognitione baptismi et de itinere deserti quo pergitur post baptismum; 3) a continuation of Isidore's de viris illustr. in Fabr. bibl. eccl., p. 60, &c. In further continuation of it his successor St. Julian (680-90) wrote his life. — Two letters of Ildefonsus, with a reply of B. Quirinus of Barcelona, are in d'Archéry Spicil. — The Adoptians of the 8th cent. appealed to Ildefonsus also, as favoring their views (see Alcuin, Opp. II., 568; I., 872. The Bolland Jan. 23. A Span. biogr. appeared in 1727. Kurtz, K.-G., II., 1, 536). WAGENMANN.*

Illuminati. — There have always been fanatics, mystics, and theosophists, who have assumed the name of illuminated ones, as expressing their high attainments in the knowledge of God, and of the spirit-world. But the name was especially applied to the Alumbrados, or Alumbrados, a party which arose in Spain in 1575. Persecuted by the Inquisition, they soon disappeared, but arose again in France, in 1623, as Guerinets; there too they were suppressed in 1635. They believed that by inward prayer the soul might enter into such complete union with the being of God, that all its acts would be divine, so that such persons needed no good works or sacraments. A similar sect arose in 1722 in South France, who went so far as to assert that human nature might be wholly absorbed by the Holy Ghost. They also combined with their theory, all sorts of mysteries borrowed from the Freemasons, and continued until they were wholly suppressed during the Revolution of 1794 (SHIRACH, Polit. Journal, v. 1785-94). — But the name Illuminati is borne pre-eminently by the order founded May 1, 1776, by Adam Weishaupt, Professor in Ingolstadt, on a Freemason basis, and with Jesuit forms, the professed object of which was the attainment of individual moral perfection, and a general moral reformation, but which in reality developed tendencies destructive both for the State and the Church; because, in hostility to existing institutions, political and religious, it attempted to establish a religion of reason, to destroy positive Christianity, bring about universal equality, and found a republic of unbounded liberty. Although Weishaupt was an excellent man, he lacked practical judgment, and did not see the dangers to which his substitution of naturalism for revealed religion unavoidably led. In 1780 Baron Adolph v. Knigge joined these Perfectibilists, and zealously promoted the order. He regarded Christianity not as a religion for all, but for the elect only, who really perpetuated it, through the schools of the mysteries, and that its proper sphere was Freemasonry. Whilst only a small number of the elect reached the highest grades of the order, it steadfastly pursued its aim of getting all the state offices into its own hands, and, in spite of its avowals of universal equality, acquiring unlimited power. To attain this object, its leaders employed the same means as the Jesuits, endeavoring to secure men of wealth and political influence as members, to surround rulers with its members, and to persuade them of its political importance, &c. Implicit, unquestioning obedience to officers was required of each member. Only the most cautious, zealous, and affable men could reach the higher grades of the order, and be initiated into its deeper mysteries, of which lower members had scarcely an idea. The mysteries related to religion, converted into naturalism and free-thinking, and to politics, substituting socialistic republicanism for monarchy. In the correspondence of the officers of the order in different places, a cryptography was used, commonly with figures, but also other signs. January was called Dimeh, February, Benmeh, &c.; Germany, the Orient, Bavaria, Achaia, &c. The order was designated by \odot , a lodge by \square . A letter for a chief of the order was marked Q. I. (Quibus licet), to open it; if intended for the chief of a higher grade, Soli; for a still higher one, Primo. Each illuminatus had a particular name; the founder was called Spartacus, Knigge was called Philo. — It is remarkable that the very men who proposed to secure universal equality, deprived their adherents of all liberty, and required them to be mere tools in their hands. The rapid spread of the order, which soon embraced not only men of rank and influence, but 2000 common members, must be attributed to the great activity and craftiness of its leaders, to the attraction which mysterious forms have for many persons, or to the combined efforts of some to make others serve their private schemes. It is said that even princes became members; but they were never admitted to the grades in which the deeper mysteries (political schemes) of the order were revealed. The chief seat of the order was in Bavaria, but it established itself in Berlin, Dresden, Leipzig, Vienna, &c., and extended to France, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Livonia, Poland, Hungary, and Italy.

Its organization was mainly the work of Weishaupt, who had been a Jesuit, but on the abolition of that order became its bitter opponent, and Knigge. It was patterned after Jesuitism. In 1777 Weishaupt joined the Freemasons, but he became more fully acquainted with the nature of this society through Knigge and Marotti. His aim at the outset was to unite the Freemason order with his society, and thus, securing the success of his movement, finally absorb that order. Through Knigge's efforts he secured the adoption of illuminatism in Freemason lodges, but this also created many enemies to his order, who contributed to its downfall. It was Knigge, also, who had the order organized on the plan of Freemason. The order was divided into three classes, with various sub-grades. 1. The preparatory class, to which novitiates, Minervals, and illum. minores belonged. Applicants had to be 18 years old, and the novitiate lasted from one to three years, according to the talents of the member. Duly trained, he was placed under the constant supervision of his overseer, received a name, and was taught the cryptography of the order. Having completed his novitiate, he became a Minerval, received, as the sign of the order, a green band, with the picture of an owl upon it, holding a book, on which were printed the letters P. M. C. V. (per me coeci vident). Having qualified himself in this grade, he became an illum. minor; no special ceremonies were used on admitting him to this grade, only he was made acquainted with its rules, its motto, Cave ne cadas, and the sign of recognition, holding up the forefinger of the right hand. — 2. The Freemasons, divided into scholars, fellows, and masters; it included two higher grades, that of the illum. major, or Scottish novices, and illum. dirigens, or Scottish knights. An applicant for the former had to furnish a minute autobiography, and reveal the inmost feelings of his heart, and even then his promotion would fail if three members objected. To be admitted to the illum. dirigens the applicant had to swear that he would never belong to any other secret society, not even the Freemasons. When admitted, he was led into a lodge draped in green; there the members sat in their uniform, the president under a green canopy, wearing the St. Andrew's band, and the star of the order. On his right sat the priest of the order robed in white. Under solemn ceremonies he was dubbed a knight of St. Andrew of Scotland, and was told the sign of his order; crossing the arms, and taking hold of the elbows of the brother, saying: "Behold me, if thou seest no sign in me." The other replies: "Yea, I see the flaming star upon thy brow," and kisses him. The person admitted was called illum. dirigens, because he had supervision and control of the Minerval lodges. It was especially his duty to persuade Freemasons to join the new order. This was the highest grade which could be attained by those not admitted to the proper mysteries of the order. 3. The class of the mysteries, divided into the greater and lesser mysteries, the last, again, into the grades of priests and regents. If a Scottish knight wished to enter the grade of priests, he had first to answer various questions pertaining to religious and social life, and then was led blindfold to the lodge by a circuitous route; there a sword was put into his hands, and on being called: "Come in, unhappy fugitive. The fathers wait for thee, come in and lock the door after thee," he entered into a richly decorated room, in which there lay upon a table, standing before a canopy, costly jewels and a simple white priest's robe, between which he was to choose. If he took the latter he was admitted. Then he was instructed in the peculiar secrets of the order, and received the dress of the grade, viz., besides the white robe, a broad scarf of scarlet silk, and a four-cornered hat of red velvet. The sign of the grade consisted in placing the hands crosswise upon the head, then offering the hand, fingers shut and thumb extended, to the other, who then took hold of the thumb. The brothers of a lower grade called the priest Epopt; the officers called him Hierophant. From the priest's grade they passed to that of Princeps, in which they advanced to still more radical views of religion and politics. The initiation took place in a room draped in black, with a skeleton in it, at whose feet lay a crown and a sword. Back of this room was another, with the door open, in which the president sat upon a throne. The candidate was led, manacled, into the first room, and there stood a while in meditation; then the president took off his manacles, put on him the dress of the order, communicated the sign, and pronounced him a Princeps. The dress was a white cloak with a red cross, a breastplate of white leather, also having on it a red cross, a white hat with a red feather, and red buskins. The signal word was Redemptio, whilst uttering which the brother reached out both his hands wide opened.—The grade of the greater mysteries also consisted of two classes, called Magus and Rex; in the former fully developed naturalism was cherished, in the latter socialism and republicanism. There were no special initiatory ceremonies. The brothers were the Areopagites of the order, at whose head stood the General (Weishaupt) with a privy council, composed of the higher officers, the provincial colleges (the presidents of a province, elected by the regents), the national directories, and the Areopagus consisting of twelve members; the last was the highest court of the order, but under the General.

The Order continued a secret until it sought to absorb the Freemasons; and even then its seditious and irreligious tendencies remained long unknown, although the former were suspected in Bavaria in 1781. They became public in 1783, when the order rapidly sank. Various causes hastened its dissolution, but especially its tyrannical rules, the mistrust it engendered, the ambition of its members, and rivalry between Weishaupt and Knigge themselves. By an edict of June 22, 1784, the Elector Charles Theodore dissolved the order in Bavaria. Knigge then left it, but it still existed secretly. The government seized its books and papers, and exposed its entire character by publishing them (Munich, 1787). The members of the order were imprisoned and banished. A price was put on Weishaupt's head. He found a safe retreat with Duke Ernest of Gotha-Altenburg, and died in Gotha Nov. 18, 1830.—(See Grosse Absichten d. Orden d. Illum., &c.: Münch., 1786; Nachtrag zu d. grossen Absichten, &c.: Münch., 1786. R. Z. Becker, Grundsätze &c. d. Illum., &c., 1786. Weishaupt, Apol. d. Illum.: Frankf., 1786. Philo's (Knigge) endliche Erklärung, &c.: Hann., 1788. Voss, Ueber d. Illum., 1799). NEUDECKER.*

Images, among the Hebrews.—In Exodus 20 : 4, &c., the Israelites are expressly forbidden to make images for religious uses, if not for all purposes. No image of the invisible, eternal Creator should be made or worshipped by the creature, especially as all such images must be inadequate. But the law did not prohibit all kinds of imagery in their worship; on the contrary, certain artistic symbols were prescribed in the arrangement of the sanctuary, as the cherubim (Ex. 25 : 18, &c.; 26 : 1; 36 : 35 [cf. Jos. ANTT., 3. 6, 2]), and these with olive-trees (1 Kings 6 : 23, 32, 35), oxen and lions (1 Kings 7 : 29, 36), flowers (Ex. 25 : 31, &c.; 1 Kings 6 : 18, &c.), the twelve colossal oxen supporting the brazen sea (1 Kings 7 : 25), and even the brazen serpent (Numb. 21 : 8, &c. On these several symbols see the respective articles). But with these simple and innocent symbols the people were not satisfied; for they added, partly ancient religious images of their own, partly such as they imitated from the surrounding heathen, until the pure worship obtained from God, was well nigh superseded. This worship had primarily to contend with the ancient custom of the Shemitic race of having house-gods, teraphim (see Art.) appealed to as oracles (Hos. 3 : 4; Zech. 10 : 2). Rachel took such (resembling the human form, 1 Sam. 19 : 13, &c.) with her to Canaan, where we find them in spite of Jacob's remonstrance (Gen. 31 : 19; 35 : 2); and they are found not only during the anarchical period of the Judges (17 : 5; 18 : 27), but to the reformation under Josiah (2 Kings 23 : 24; Ezek. 21 : 26). This indicates their Mesopotamian-Babylonian origin. They were not associated with the worship of Jehovah, but retained alongside of it, at least sporadically, for several centuries.—The inclination of Israel to the use of images is further explained by their long abode in Egypt, where animal-worship prevailed (see Art. Calf). Bethel especially became a centre of such idolatry (Amos 3 : 14; 7 : 10, 13; Hos. 10 : 15; see Jeroboam), and continued such until Josiah abolished it (2 Kings 17 : 28; 23 : 15, &c.). At Beersheba in Judah, it was also established (Amos 5 : 5; 8 : 14); but, otherwise, from the time of David and Solomon, the worship of Jehovah without images was general there, and hence, probably, the people of Judah, no less inclined to sensuous worship than the Ephraimites, were more easily drawn into heathen idolatry. And if in patriarchal times, the Canaanitish worship of sacred trees and stones, as memorials, or images of deities, passed over to Jacob's descendants (Gen. 28 : 10, &c.; 31 : 35; see v. Lengerke, Kanaan, I., 251, &c.; Ewald, Alterthüm., 124, 234, &c.), which of course the law forbade (Levit. 26 : 1), it is easy to see how the cultus of related surrounding tribes would influence the Israelites after their establishment in Canaan; and especially during a period of civil disorders (Judges 17 : 6), and when the more distant tribes were so far from the regulating and restraining power of the stated worship at Shiloh. Hence in different places, the worship of Ashtoreth, Moloch, Chemosh, &c., was practised. Under Samuel, indeed, a purer religion began to predominate, and under David idolatry proper may have disappeared; nt in the last years of Solomon it again became scendant, through the influence of his strange wives (1 Kings 11 : 1, &c.). And in spite of the reactions effected by prophets, and more pious kings, as Asa, Josiah, Hezekiah, idolatry and star-worship continued until the exile (2 Kings 23 : 4, &c.; Jer. 2 : 3, 4; Ezek. 16 : 15, &c.; 7 : 20, &c. &c. See Idolatry).—The mentioned images of the deity, usually consisted of figure (לפפ) carved out of wood or stone (rarely metal), plated with some precious metal (מספ), both terms being used to designate the entire image. The prophets often describe the folly of worshipping such impotent images (Jer. 10; Is. 44, &c.).—Of non-religious images, only the lions at Solomon's throne are mentioned (1 Kings 10 : 29, &c.). After the exile, the Jews became more strict in regard even to such, at least the orthodox Pharisees applied the Mosaic prohibition to all kinds of images (Jos., Antt., 17, 6, 2; B. J., 1, 33, 2), even to architectural ornaments (B. J., 2, 10, 4; de vita, 12), and objected to the imperial ensign being admitted into Jerusalem (Antt., 18, 3, 1; 15, 8; B. J., 2, 9, 2; TACIT., hist., 5, 5). But this rigid view was not universal. John Hyro. adorned his castle with colossal figures (Antt., 2, 4, 11), and Queen Alexandra allowed portraits of her children to be painted (Antt., 15, 2; 19, 9, 1). RÜRSCHL.*

Image-worship in the Romish Church, or rather the veneration of images; for that Church complains of being unjustly accused of an idolatrous worship of images. And it must be admitted that she has guarded herself, by definitions, against such objections. As in the case of the general reading of the Scriptures, and of good works, her formal avowals seem to favor the truth, whilst they yet admit of error, and have practically led to it, so in this case. She distinguishes between the adoration and worship of saints, and yet in fact the devotions of her people are directed far more to saints than to Christ. Thus also with images of saints. The Council of Trent (Sess. XXV., de invoc. Sanct., &c.) decrees: "Imagines porro Christi, Deiparæ Virginis et aliorum Sanct. in templis præsertim habendas, et retinendas; eisque debitum honorem et venerationem impertiendam; non quod credatur nesse aliqua in iis divinitas, vel virtus, propter quam sint colendæ," &c.,—and appeals to the 2d Nicene Council. This honoring and veneration involves the consecration of their images, offering incense to them, and the use of the appropriate prayers, in the Pontif. Rom., &c. Whilst, therefore, the Rom. Church avoids the term adoration, or worship, she practises the thing. Her nice distinctions are not noticed by the multitude, but her acts are. And even some Romish theologians favor the popular view of the matter. Thomas Aquinas puts the following dilemma: if we regard an image per se, no veneration is due to it, but if regarded as an image of Christ, it would be vain to inwardly distinguish between the image and its subject, so that adoration and worship belong to it as well as to Christ (III., Sent. dist., 9, qu. 1, art. 3; Summa qu. 23, art. 4, 5). Bonaventura correctly argued: as all worship paid to the image of Christ avails for Christ, worship is due his image (cultus, latriæ 1, III., dist. 9, art. 1, qu. 2). Bellarmin teaches: the images of Christ and the saints are to be worshipped, not only indirectly, but directly, ita ut ipsæ (imagines) terminent venerationem, ut in se considerantur et non ut vicem gerunt exemplaris. The image itself is holy because of its resemblance to a holy thing, its consecration, and its sacred use. Hence, a less degree of adoration is due them than to God (de imag. SS. 1, II., c. 10); that is, the difference is one of quantity, not quality. To such views the Rom. Church has never objected.—History shows that these views are the result of a gradual, slow development. The Catholic Church of the first three centuries repelled the very arguments, urged by heathen in favor of images, as are now employed in their vindication. The heathen said: "We do not worship the images, but the beings they represent;" to which LACRANT., Just. div., lib. II., c. 2, rejoins: "You honor them, because you believe they are in heaven; why then not raise your eyes to heaven? why gaze at the wood and stone?" &c. The Council of Elvira (305) decreed, c. 36: placuit, picturas in eccl. esse non debere, ne quod colitur aut adoratur, in parietibus depingatur. They feared that the use of images would lead to idolatry. They were introduced into churches in the 4th and 5th cents., as a means of instructing the ignorant masses then becoming Christians; they were pronounced the Bible of the laity. Their use was soon perverted, but earlier in the East than West. But in the West, likewise, the idolatrous tendency soon showed itself. Hence, Serenus, B. of Marseilles, broke and removed certain images which he saw were adored. Greg. M. approved his course, and reminded him of what Paulinus of Nola, and Nilus, had said, that pictures were simply to serve as narratives to those who could not read (lib. IX., ep. 105). He assumes as a general principle, that the invisible might be exhibited in visible forms (lib. IX., ep. 52). But soon afterwards we learn that he also kneeled (prosternimus) before the image, mentally adoring Christ. Hence the Rom. bishops accept the decrees of the 2d Council of Nice. Charlemagne published the Carolinian Books against that Synod, which, whilst allowing the use of images in churches, do so only for the purposes of commemoration and ornament. For, it is added, if intelligent persons would not worship the images themselves, the common people would be tempted by them to idolatry, if any prayers were offered before them (lib. III., 16). True to this position, the Council of Frankf. on the M., 794, and of Paris, 825, reaffirmed it, although Pope Hadrian anathematized the rejection of image-veneration; indeed, the Council of Paris freely avowed an opinion adverse to that of the Pope. During the whole 9th cent. this opinion prevailed, only Claudius of Turin, Agobard, and a few others dissenting. Jonas of Orleans, the opponent of Claudius of T., says distinctly (in de cultu imaginum) that images were hung in churches solummodo ad instruendas nescientium mentes.—This last view the Rom. Church still maintains (Decrees of Trent, l. c.), only she had added what the Frank. C. so correctly forbade, a mistake, it is true, almost unavoidable in their position. (See Iconoclasts.) HERZOG.*

Immunity, ecclesiastical.—In Church language, a distinction is made between immunitas ecclesiastica and imm. ecclesiae. The latter is equivalent to the right of a refuge, the former to libertas eccl., and designates exemption from general public duties. The ministers of religion, among all nations, enjoyed certain privileges and liberties not granted to others. Thus Roman priests, whose prerogatives were transferred, after Constantine, to the Christian clergy (see J. GOTHOFREDUS, in the Paratheton to the Cod. Theodos., l. XVI., t. X., de paganis, sacrificiis et templis, in RITTER's ed., T. VI., P. I., 280, 281; and FABROT on c. 14, l. c. 320). These included, especially, exemption from civil and congregational offices, census, munera sordida, parangariae, and metati onus (GOTHOFREDUS, l. c., t. II., de episcopis, &c., l. c., p. 20, 21). To this was added the prerogative of a special eccl. court (see Jurisdiction eccl.). These privileges extended to the persons and families of the clergy, and to the property of the Church, but not to their private property, nor to such persons as became clergymen only to escape obligations. These principles were ever maintained in the Rom. Empire, as is evident from Justinian's including them in the new codex, of 529 (cf. c. 1, 2, 3, 6, &c., C. de episc. et cler., l. 3, of 343, 357, 360, 377). Justin. added (532) the immunitas tutelae (c. 52, C. cit., l. 3), which he subsequently defined as forbidding bishops and monks from assuming such tutelage (Nov. CXXIII., c. 5, Auth. Presbyt., C. cit., l. 3).—The Germans also granted many privileges to their priests (Cæs., de bello Gall., VI., c. 13, 14), which were then transferred to Christian clergymen, who also enjoyed those granted by the Roman law (secundum legem Rom. eccl. vivit. Lex Ribuaria, t. LVIII., § 1, &c.). And Clotaire I., 560, allowed the Church the exemption at 30 years, fixed in the Rom. law (Const., c. 13, in PERTZ, Mon. Germ., III., 3). The Church itself took care that earlier privileges were not curtailed, by appealing to the imperial constitutions (c. 40, Can. XVI., qu. I., c. 23, Can. XXIII., qu. VIII.), and inflicted upon offenders eccl. penalties. The protection which the Church secured to all her clients, greatly increased her wealth. This relation was called, in the 6th cent., mitium or mitium legitimum (cf. ROTH, Gesch. d. Beneficialwesens: Erlangen, 1850, p. 163, &c.). To this were soon joined other rights, since the exemption from taxes involved the right of levying upon those protected the taxes which they owed the exchequer. This was called emunitas, and rested upon a royal grant. To the other fiscal taxes belonged costs of prosecution and fines, which the person enjoying the immunity could draw. Hence, immunity was granted absque introitu iudicium. To this was subsequently added the right of summons to the army, by which the Church assumed military duties. From these immunities, for which we early find the expression territorium, the spiritual lordships subsequently arose (RETTBERG, K.-G. Deutschl., Bd. II., § 97).—The strict maintenance of this immunity was repeatedly urged by Frankish edicts (Capit. Syn. Vernensis, a. 755, c. 19, 28. Cap. Molens., a. 756, c. 8, &c.) and no less the liberties granted to the clergy and eccl. property. Lewis the Pious ordered that every church should have a mansus free of all imposts (Capit. a. 816, c. 10; c. 25, Can. XXIII., qu. VIII.); this law was renewed by the Capit. Wormatiense, a. 829, c. 4, Conc. Mâdense, a. 845, c. 63 (c. 24, Can. XXIII., qu. VIII., Wormat. a. 858, c. 58, &c.). Property subject to tribute, however, which the Church might additionally acquire, was subject to existing taxes, unless exempted by a special royal privilege (Capit. III., Caroli M. a. 812, c. 11., Capit. IV. Ludov., a. 819, c. 2). Subsequently, also, the Church and clergy were so burdened with taxes by rulers, and in cities, that the Lateran Council of 1179, c. 19, and 1215, c. 46, forbade this under penalty of the ban, except that the aid of the clergy might be demanded in cases of necessity (c. 47, X., de immunit. eccl., III., 49), whereupon Fred. II. decreed that those who abused their immunity should be mulcted threefold, and subject to public penalties (Const. Frid. II. of 1220, § 2, in PERTZ, Mon., IV., 243). Still this law was violated, and Alex. IV., 1260, Bonif. VIII., 1296, and Clem. V., 1311, had to reiterate earlier threatenings (c. 1, 3, de immunit. in 6°. III., 23, c. 4, de censibus in 6°. III., 20. Cap. to Clem. de immunit., III., 17, c. 3. Clem. de censibus, III., 13). And though the Council of Trent (s. XXV., c. 20,) claimed divine authority for this prerogative, and the Bulla in causa Domini (see Art.) repeatedly urged the matter, complete immunity has not always been maintained. For the clergy, especially bishops, were often required to furnish the King, and his train, gifts for their journey (Du FRESNE, Gloss., gistan).—Existing laws, in general, exempt clergymen from civil duties. H. F. JACOBSON.*

Impanatio, or assumptio, is one of the many modifications of the doctrine of transubstantiation (see Art.). After various obscure hints which, if developed, would have led to the theory of impanation, it was first distinctly set forth by Abbot Ruprecht of Deutz († 1135), who argued that as God, in becoming incarnate, did not destroy the human nature assumed, so the substance of the bread and wine in the sacrament is not destroyed, though he literally unites with it; and as the Word, which became incarnate, was not changed into flesh, but assumed flesh, so the sacramental elements, when raised up to actual union with him, are non mutatum into the taste and nature of blood, but invisibly and insensibly assume both, and so the divine and human immortal substance which is in Christ (Opera ed. Col., 1602, I., 267; Comm. in Exod., II., 10; De opp. Sp. S., III., 21, 22; De divinis offic., II., 9; Opp., II., 762, &c.). He also declares that whoever ate the visible bread of the sacrifice, but by unbelief rejected the invisible bread joined with that, slew Christ; proving that, whilst he held to a real spiritual participation, he rejected an impanation of the Logos, as parallel with the incarnation.—Ruprecht's contemporary, Alger, or Adelher, of Liege († 1131), in his vindication of transubst. (LL. III., de sacra corp. et s. D., in Bibl. max., PP. XXI.: Lugd. 1677), first used impanatio in the sense of trans-abst.: in pane Chr. quasi IMPANATUM, sicut leum in carne personaliter incarnatum (p. 251. ff. Bibl. max., l. c. XVIII., 441). This is the doctrine which John of Paris († 1306) preferred (Determinatio de modo exist. corp. Chr., &c., ed. Petro Allix.: Lond., 1686, 8vo.). We may reach, he says, that the substances of the bread manerent sub suis accid. in Sacr. altaris non in proprio supposito, sed tracta ad esse et suppositum Chr., ut sic sit unum supp. in duabus naturis. There are not two corporities — humanity and divinity — but one body, because a body is not, but possesses, corpority. Peter escaped by death from a compulsory renunciation of this view. But as impanatio shared the difficulties of transubst., without its simplicity, the view was soon dropped, though Occam († 1347) still clung to it.—(See SCHRÖCKH's K.-gesch., Bd. 28, p. 54, &c., 71, &c.; MÜNSCHER's Lehrb. d. Dogmen-gesch., 3 Aufl. v. Daniel v. Kölln, II., 1, 144, n. 2, § 145, n. 12, 13; KLEE, do., II., 202; LAGENBACH, do., § 196; Ersch u. Gruber, Encycl., II., 16).—Subsequently, Andr. Osiander, and Luther (by Carlstadt, Bellarmine, &c.) were unjustly charged with holding impanation (FUS-NEGGER, dissert. de impan. et consubst., Jenæ, 677). Cotta (on J. Gerhard's loci theol., X., 65, &c.) understands by it: localem corporis in pane, tanquam in receptaculo, et vini in sanguine inclusionem. But it is thus often confounded with consubstantiation (see Lord's Supper, controversy). Those holding impanatio are also called dessearii, from adesse. L. PELT.*

Incapacity, absolute disqualification for ordination, as in unbaptized persons, and women. Of course, a person desiring consecration to an ecclesiastical office must be a member of the Church. But baptism is janua ecclesiæ, vitæ spiritualis, and the foundation of all other ordinances (c. 60, can. I., qu. I., capit. Theodori Cantuariensis, &c. &c.). A baptismus fluminis and anguinis, it is admitted, may save, but not constitute a member of the visible Church. Hence the Council of Nice (325, b. 19, c. 52, can. I., u. I.) decreed that when clergymen of sects who did not properly baptize (Cataphrygians, &c.), entered the Catholic Church, they must be rebaptized to be ordained. And it was repeatedly declared that if it was discovered that persons ordained had not been baptized, they should be baptized, and then reordained (c. 112, dist. IV., de consecr. [Leo. a. 458] c. 60; can. I., u. I., &c.), although a priest ordained by an unbaptized priest, had not to be baptized, according to Innoc. II. (c. 2, X. de presb. non bapt., &c.).—The incapacity of women has never been questioned in the Church (Gen. 3 : 16; 1 Tim. 2 : 12; 1 Cor. 14 : 34, 35. TERTULL., de veland. virg., c. 8. August., c. 17, can. XXXIII., qu. I., &c. &c.). Hence the decrees against ordaining, consecrating, or blessing women as presbyteræ (viduæ) or diaconæ (diaconissæ), also against their teaching in promiscuous assemblies, handling sacred vessels or garments, and carrying incense around the altar (Conc. Laodic., a. 372, c. 11, in c. 19, dist. XXXII. Conc. transic., I., a. 441, can. 26; Epæonense, a. 517, an. 21; Aurelianense II., a. 533, can. 18 [ed. Brunet. II., 126, 170, 187]; cf. c. 23, can. XXVII., u. I., Novella Justin. VI., cap. 5; Conc. Car- thag. IV., a. 378, c. 36, in c. 29, dist. XXIII., c. 20, dist. IV., de consecr. Pseudoisidor in c. 25, dist. XXIII., c. 41, 42, dist. I., de consecr.). Abbesses were forbidden to bless nuns, hear confessions, and preach publicly (c. 10, X., de pœnit. et remiss. [V., 38] Innoc. III., a. 1210).—The evangelical Church also regard unbaptized persons and women, as incapacitated for ordination. H. F. JACOBSON.*

Incorporation.—The incorporation of a benefice consists in its being united with a monastery, institution, &c., quod spirituali et temporalia. We meet with such incorporations as early as the 9th cent., effected to increase the revenues of spiritual corporations, and for other reasons. The result was, that previously self-subsistent offices were absorbed by the corporation with which the benefice was united, and which also assumed the duties of those offices; thus a parochus principalis was obliged to discharge the cure of souls, by a vicar whom he appointed with the bishop's confirmation. Upon this vicar devolved the cura animarum actualis, whilst the monastery, &c., only held the cura habitualis. For such cases the canonical precepts often urge the appointments of perpetual vicars, though only temporary vicars were frequently appointed, or the duties left merely to members of the order not residing in the parish.—Essentially different from these pleno jure, or utroque jure, incorporations, were those unions of benefices with spirit. corpor. which related only to temporalities, often called incorp. quoad temporalia, in which merely the property was transferred, and the right to its revenues, on condition that the incumbent of the benefice was paid portio congrua. In this case the spiritualia continued as before, and the Bishop appointed a person proposed by the monastery, &c., to the office. Such clergymen, though really parochi, were called vicarii, were perpetual, and subject only to the Bishop (c. 1, X. De capellis monarch., III., 37; c. un. De capell. monach. in VI., III., 18). The Council of Trent took action against the many abuses which sprang out of these unions (s. 7, c. 7, De reform.; cf. s. 24, c. 13; s. 7, De reform. c. 6). Since then the evil has abated (see NELLER, Diss. de genuina idea et signis parochialitatis primitivæ ejusque principio incorp., and Ejusdem Diss. de juribus parochi, &c., in SCHMIDT, Thes. jur. eccl., VI., 441, &c.). WASSERSCHLEBEN.*

Independents, or Congregationalists, in England and America, are those who hold that any number of Christians, who may associate for worship and religious transactions, constitute a Church, with full authority for self-government independently of any higher court, and for the discharge of all ecclesiastical functions.—Origin and fundamental doctrines. The fierce persecutions waged against the Puritans under Queen Elizabeth drove many Presbyterians to Holland. There, sore with the violence attempted against their consciences under episcopal authority, they adopted the opinion of their leader, Robert Brown (see Art.), that every congregation was an independent society, not subject to any higher eccl. authority, whether of bishops, councils, presbyteries, or synods. After Brown's secession, this party found a better leader in

John Robinson, who somewhat restricted the principle of Independence, and better organized the party. Previously, the congregation, after due consultation, decided all questions by the vote of the majority, even electing ministers in that way; Robinson had some rules adopted, requiring certain qualifications in persons elected to church offices. Brown, embittered by intolerance, had, with no less bigotry, denounced all other forms of Church government as antichristian; Robinson, whilst regarding his own form as most apostolical, recognized others, also, as allowable. This broad concession involved the principle of perfect toleration. Early in the 17th cent. the name "Brownist" was supplanted by that of Independents, favored by declarations of Robinson in an apologetic work: "Cœtum quemlibet particularem esse totam, integram et perfectam eccl. ex suis partibus constantem immediate et INDEPENDENTEM (quoad alias eccl.) sub ipso Christo;" but this name first became general when the Independents took an active part in the political movements of the 17th cent.—by which, however, they and the Episcopalians became very obnoxious, so that the Independents then usually styled themselves Congregationalists. Although single congregations gradually approximated other Prot. churches in their forms and regulations, the maintenance of independence, and the rejection of established creeds, continued to be their distinctive characteristic. They use no liturgical forms, and the only bond of union between the members of each congregation, is faith in the Gospel of Christ, and the recognition of the Bible as the only rule of faith. The consociation of several congregations, or their representatives, to consider matters of general interest, is not forbidden by them, but the acts of such assemblies have no binding authority.

History.—Henry Jacob, a friend and fellow-believer of Robinson's, returned to England in 1616, and organized some Puritans into the first Independent congregation, after the model of the English congregations in Holland. Jacob became its pastor. For twenty years it escaped the vigilance of the State church, as its meetings were held in different private families. At length a spy of the B. of London detected them; several members were imprisoned, others fled to New England. Soon, however, views so consonant with the dominant opinions of those times, found other advocates. In 1640, a congregation discovered in the house of Stephen More was brought to trial. The members confessed that they acknowledged Christ as the only head of the Church, and denied the right of any temporal power to bind the conscience. But so mighty had the current become in favor of such sentiments, that a confession which, but a year previously, would have cost a man his ears (NEAL, Hist. of the Puritans, II., 398), was now made with impunity. The meetings multiplied. It was found that their forms of worship, &c., agreed essentially with those of other Protestant churches. They observed the sacraments, preached, read the Scriptures, had pastors, ruling elders, &c., like others. During the struggles of Parliament with the King and Church, the Independents increased, especially as Cromwell and Milton were among their adherents. But historians like Clarendon do them gross injustice in charging them with opposition to all civil authority, with treasonable desires and schemes, and with the death of Charles I. These accusations are prompted by Romish and hierarchical predilections, which call for a union of Church and State, whilst Independents maintain that the civil and spiritual swords should be in different hands. Formally to disclaim such accusations, the Congregational societies in and about London published a solemn Declaration, in 1647, setting forth their principles as being especially in full harmony and good citizenship. That most Independents sided with Cromwell and favored extreme measures is not to be denied, but their views were those of but private individuals; as a body they had no political creed, and several of their clergymen petitioned Fairfax on behalf of the King (NEAL, III., 537, &c.).—Under Cromwell's Protectorate, their number and influence grew rapidly, many prominent and learned men joining them, whom Cromwell appointed to important posts in Colleges and Universities. They now began to feel the need of union among themselves. An assembly was held in the Savoy, attended by the ministers and delegates of more than a hundred congregations, which adopted, Oct. 12, 1658, a few weeks before Cromwell's death, a Confession of Faith and Discipline, entitled, a "Declaration." But to save their principle of independence, this declaration was not invested with binding symbolical authority; and to guard against all hierarchical schemes, it was enacted, that no one should be ordained without having a call from some particular congregation. They used similar precautions against all civil interference in Church matters, excepting when Christians were guilty of civil disturbances.—Whilst Independents may boast of having established the principle of eccl. self-government, it must be conceded to their honor, that they never abused civil power for purposes of intolerance, but that in an age when religious persecutions and oppression were thought obligatory, they sacredly maintained liberty of conscience. Some individuals, indeed, may have cherished hopes of securing general assent to their views (as Milton, in his remarkable treatise on the best means of getting rid of hirelings, 1659), but such views were not general, and only excited the wrath of Episcopalians, who, on the restoration of the Stewarts, had the Act of Uniformity passed, 1662 (see England, Church of). A season of persecution now opened upon all Dissenters: their meetings were prohibited by the Conventicle-act, and offenders were imprisoned and fined. Thousands fled to New England, and there founded congregations wholly on their own principles, and were zealous in spreading the Gospel among the Indians. Here their views of the relation between the Church and State became a fundamental principle of government. They formed associations, composed of several congregations within certain geographical limits; these held annual meetings consisting of the clergymen and lay delegates at which they consulted together upon matters general interest, and, in an advisory way, commended suitable measures for the adoption of the congregations. The several associations have specific terms of membership, for protection against irregularities in doctrine and practice; thus approximating to Presbyterianism. From New England they have spread to the western portion of the United States, and founded numerous congregations there. Several of the most distinguished colleges of the United States were founded by them (Yale, Amherst, Harvard University, &c.), and continue under their patronage.—After the expulsion of the Stuarts, whose Cæsareopapistic despotism caused many persons to join the Independents, they were finally granted full liberty by the Toleration Act of William of Orange, 1689. Since then they have rapidly spread in England. Their active zeal for the spread of the Gospel, and the advancement of Christian culture among all nations, has won for them universal admiration and esteem. The London Missionary Society owes them its origin, and many other Christian enterprises, of the most extensive usefulness, have been suggested, or sustained, by their beneficence. DR. G. WEBER.*

Index librorum prohibitorum, is, in the Romish Church, the list of such books as are forbidden to be read, on account of doctrines in them hostile, or thought hostile, to that Church. From the name, the Index would be a product of the 16th cent., but the prohibition of such books sprang up with the pretensions of Romish bishops and Popes to supreme power. Indeed, it necessarily associates itself with the idea of the universal Catholic Church, out of which there is no salvation. The full development of this idea by Cyprian (J. E. Huther, Cyprian's Lehre v. d. Kirche, Hamb. u. Gotha, 1839,) led to the belief that unity in doctrine was essential to the unity of the Church, and that every real seeming variation from received doctrine must be rejected as heresy. All speculations, therefore, and every spirit of inquiry, have ever been regarded by the hierarchy as its dangerous enemies. At first, heathen and Jewish works were condemned (see even Conc. Carth., a. 400, can. 1), then burnt. Next the writings of heretics (as Arius) were burnt; and this continued to be done from the 5th cent. And as books of heretics were published also with eccl. titles, the post. canons of the 5th and 6th cents. (c. 60) commanded such offences to be punished with expulsion. So the Council of Elvira (813) threatened those with an anathema who should reculate condemned books. At this time, already, it had become customary to forbid reading books which priests pronounced heretical, and to regard the offender as guilty of the heresy taught in the book. Above all, translations of the Bible were thought pernicious. Thus Gregory VII. (1080), in a letter to Wratislaw of Bohemia (Mansi, Collect., XX., 296); and though Innoc. III. (Epist., lib. II., ep. 141, . 1199,) says searching the Scriptures is not to be censured, he adds: Tanta est divinæ Scr. profunditas, ut non solum simplices et illiterati, sed etiam prudentes et docti non plene sufficient ad ipsius intelligentiam indagandam.—Unde recte fuit olim in lege divina statutum, ut bestia, quæ montem tetigerit, lapidetur; ne videlicet simplex aliquis indoctus præsumat et sublimitatem Scr. s. pertingere vel etiam aliis prædicare. The frequent attacks made upon immoral Popes, and upon the hierarchy in general, led to the prohibition of the Bible along with heretical books. The Conc. Tolosanum (1229) issued the decree (c. 14) which expressly forbade laymen possessing it (Hegelmaier, Gesch. d. Bibelverbots: Ulm, 1783, p. 123. See Bible, Reading of, &c.). When the Inquisition arose, it obtained control of this matter, and the Conc. Biterrense (1246; Mansi, l. c., Bd. 23, p. 724,) speaks in general (c. 36) of theological works, which laymen and clergymen were forbidden to have. But the more zeal the Papacy showed against such works, the more was it resisted, especially by the fore-runners of the Reformation, whose writings threatened to sever its life-chord. A Synod of London (1408) forbade the reading of Wickliffe's writings, unless previously approved, and those of Hus were thought entirely heretical. The evil increased with the invention of printing, as Alex. VI. (RAYNALD, Annal. ad a. 1501, no. 36) complains; and Leo X., at s. 10 of the Lateran Council (May 4, 1515,) ordered, in the decree "Inter sollicitudines," that no book should be printed without the approbation of a bishop, legate, or the Inquisition, on pain of excommunication; a book otherwise published should be confiscated and burnt.—The Reformation, in spite of prohibitions, produced and circulated many books pernicious to the papacy. This trouble had reached its climax when the University of Louvain, by order of Charles V., prepared and published an index of such books (1546) as were thought dangerous. A new edition appeared in 1550; meanwhile the papal legate in Venice, John della Casa, also published an index (1549; see Schellhorn's Ergötzlichk., II., 3). During the suspension of the Council of Trent, Paul IV. (1557) directed a special congregation to issue a new index of forbidden books, which is properly the first official Index libr. proh. of the Romish Church, entitled: Index auctorum et librorum, qui tanquam hæretici aut suspecti aut perversi ab Officio S. R. Inquisit. reprobantur et in universa Christiana republica interdicuntur., Rom., 1557; enlarged (1559) by Vergerius, whilst Paul (1558) forbade all Romish theologians and scholars to read such heretical books as had been previously allowed; but this was little heeded, even in Italy. There most of the prohibited books were burnt (see NAT. COMES, Hist. sui temp., lib. XI., Venet., 1581, p. 263). Those which Paul's index prohibited were mainly such as defended the autonomy of the State against Papal aggressions, the supreme authority of Councils, and episcopal prerogatives, or assailed the general and special pretensions of the hierarchy. The Index divided the authors of prohibited books into three classes: 1) those whose books were entirely forbidden; 2) those some of whose books were prohibited; 3) all anonymous books after 1519. It closed with a list of 62 publishers of heretical books. The reading of these books was punished with the ban and disgrace.—The Council of Trent, at its 18th session, appointed a committee to prepare a new Index. This committee, however, reported, at the 25th session, that it was unable to come to any conclusion, and recommended that the matter be left to the Pope. Accordingly Pius V. issued a new Index, based on that of Paul IV., but extended by the addition of 10 rules, which the Trent committee had followed. This, often erroneously called Index Tridentinus, was published in accordance with the bull Dominici gregis custodia (March 24, 1564), for the government of all Christendom, but was never received in Germany, France, or the Netherlands. The most important of the 10 rules relates to translations of the Bible. By the 3d rule, the translation of the eccl. writings of condemned authors are so far allowed as they contain nothing contrary to Romish doctrines; translations of the Old Test. to be used by the learned only by consent of the Bishop, and then non tanquam sacro textu utantur. Translations of the New Test., by authors of the first class, are wholly prohibited. The laity were allowed, by rule 4, to use, by permission of the Bishop or Inquisition, only approved versions. Rule 10 confirms the regulation of Leo X. This Index was published in Rome by Aldus Manutius, 1564, then, revised and enlarged, by Greg. XIII., Sixtus V., Clem. VIII. (1595). Sixtus V. also appointed a congregation to prepare the Index libr. expurgandorum, or expurgatorius, a list of books from which offensive passages had been expunged, first published by order of the Duke of Alba: Index expurg. libr., qui hoc sæculo prodierunt, Antv., 1751; Dublin, by Milliken & Son, 1837. Several similar works subsequently appeared in Spain and Italy, among them one by J. M. Brasichellen, or Brasichelli, aided by the Domin. Thos. Malvenda (Rom., 1607), which was itself placed on the prohibited list. The Spanish Inquisitor-General, Antonio a Sotomajor, issued one prized for its completeness: Noviss. libr. prohib. et expurg. Index, Madr., 1648. The Rom. Index was again published in 1819, but it is continually receiving additions. The Congregation of the Index still exists in Rome, but its influence, even in Italy, is feeble. Maria Theresa forbade the publication of the Rom. Index in Austria, and in Germany the special privilege of the Government is necessary to its publication (see PEIGNOT, Diction. critique littér. et bibliogr., &c., Par., 1806).

NEUDECKER.*

Indifference, religious (indifferentismus), is among the chief evils connected with the history of Christianity, and claims consideration in polemic, moral, and pastoral theology. Assuming various forms, often confounded with true faith, so far as this tolerates fanaticism, itself devoid of truth, for there can be no sincere neutrality in Religion, it exhibits one of the most noteworthy religious maladies of our day. For more than a century the Church has constantly complained against this evil (see DANZ, Universal-Wörterb. d. theol. Literat., 449, and the suppl., 54). It has even been favored by orthodox theologians. Buddeus (instit. theol. dogm., p. 60,) distinguishes between indiff. universalis and particularis. The former regards all religions alike, because it believes in none (atheism), or only in a natural religion (naturalism); the latter considers the differences of the various sects as unimportant, jumbles together either all or most of them, or at least several, while it accepts revealed religion. Others distinguish between gross and subtle indifference: the one regarding each religion as sufficient for salvation, the other considering it immaterial to what Christian sect a person may belong.—Reinhard (Moral, I., 752,) reckons indifference among the general failings of conscience, and distinguishes between infidelity, levity, and indifference: the first professes to have investigated the subject; the second carelessly declines all investigation, either from predominant worldliness, or pride; the third regards religion only for some external advantages which may be gained from it.—But all these definitions consider indifference, not as holding against religion per se, but against the differences existing among the various confessions or sects. Indifference is a disinclination to what is essentially religious in those diversities, from an avowed preference for what is religious outside of them, a religion consisting in having no religion. We must, however, distinguish disregard for essential religious distinctions, out of regard to what is essential, from actual indifference. In this view, not everything is indifference which is condemned as such. The manner in which Christ's disciples treated some precepts, seemed to the Pharisees like indifference; and the evangelical union sentiments of our day are denounced by bigoted confessionism as indifference. It is impossible to consider real indifference as wholly an exaggerated regard for what is essential in distinction from what is unessential. This advocacy of what is essential only is the deadly foe of fanaticism; whilst real indifference is but an alter ego of fanaticism (NITZSCH, System, p. 39). Indeed, the most prominent indifference cannot establish itself without fanaticism. The phantom of a natural coldness of man towards religion & towards religious diversities, contradicts the fact that man's religious consciousness cannot be externalized. Apparent indiff. in such cases is always produced by a secret aversion or attraction, infidelity or superstition, fanatical hate or love. Fanaticism directs its indifference against the inner sanctuary and sole foundation of religion, by blindly contending for the isolated outer sanctuary and its diversities; blindly, because the outer sanctuary is desecrated by severing it from the inner. Indifference assails the outer sanctuary, the manifestation, establishment, and distinctions of faith, because it has fanatically embraced a faith of its own kind, supposed to be harmonious, unique, and universal. In the sphere of natural religion, or the lowest grade of religious life, indiff. appears mainly as stupidity, with regard to the high import of religious traditions and usages. As here, through the ever-varying religious forms of Fetichism, it may sink into full barbarism and want of religion. But the same holds in the relapse of the "Alleinslehre" to a positivism back of the symbolical forms of primitive monotheism, of that doctrine regarded as a religion; for as a philosophy it is not stationary, and its efforts may be salutary. In the sphere of revealed religion (including the mediæval Church), indiff.

ence turns from positive traditions and definitions, to seek the essentials of religion in a titious natural religion. Thus the Israelites, falling between two opinions, fell into Baalism; a sun seemed to them a general object of human religiousness. Mediæval humanism (so far as left the line of churchliness,) spread itself in its form, from the time of Alex. Comnenus, over the Western Church.—Whether in the sphere of religion of faith, indiff. can assume a higher form, is the main question. Usually the contest is between the remains of a legal indiff., e., naturalism, and those of a fanatically legal ecclesiasticism. But when infidelity endeavors to exhibit itself as indiff. over against developed church faith, it becomes mythological in its character; that is, whilst adopting the original, fundamental idea of Christianity, it regards all historical developments of that idea as equally mythical, and entitled respectively, therefore, to no exclusive consideration. It may, indeed, assume various forms, opposing the letter of the Bible to Confessions, or it may oppose those Confessions as laws to the entire fulness of churchly and Christian life. But here, again, as mythologism comes into play. Belief in the letter of the Bible, alone, makes the entire Church a myth; and abstract confessionalism makes a myth of the Church of the present and future, and of the great saying: "There shall be one fold and one Shepherd." It is true, indiff. may adopt a negative, mawkish, syncretistic unionism; but this then will, in its essence, always flow in with mythologism or literalism. Real union, however, holds the same relation to indifference as faith to infidelity.

J. P. LANGE.*

Indulgences.—The granting of indulgences is exclusively peculiar to the Romish Church.—Its sacrament of penance includes, besides contritio cordis and confessio oris, a satisfactio, consisting of good works, by doing which the penitent compensates for past sins. The ancient discipline of that Church was so stereotyped in regard to the manner of these penances, that the measure of satisfaction was determined solely by the time of their duration. But, gradually, pilgrimages and attendance at a newly-consecrated church, were also regarded as penances (c. 14, X., de pœnit. et remiss., 5, 38), and especially almsgiving. Thus arose the practice of commuting penances for money, the amount being determined by the ability of the penitent. Penitentials of the 9th cent. are full of such commutations.—The doctrine of indulgences was first developed by scholastic theology, on the basis of that system of commutation, completed by Thom. Aquinas, and retained, unaltered, by the Council of Trent (see GIESELER'S Eccl. Hist., §§ 35, 81).—It distinguishes the natural consequences of sins from their penalties, and these are partly temporal and partly eternal. After sin is committed, those penalties are irrevocably incurred. True, the Christian has obtained justification in baptism, and thus secured the possibility of escaping both kinds of penalties; but confession, satisfaction, and absolution, secure only the remission of the sin and its eternal penalty, whilst the temporal penalties incurred still remain (Trident., s. 6, decr. de justific., c. 16.

and can. 30, eod.). These include the chastisements which God inflicts either on earth or in purgatory, before he admits sinners as purified into heaven, the censures and punishments which the Church imposes, and finally penances themselves. It is for the remission of these the Church claims power, because, with the power of the keys, she claims to have received a general authority over the sins of the faithful, and, with this, power to remit them. Trent (s. 25, de indulg.) hurls an anathema against all who deny this power. Of course, there is no proof of the existence of such power, but the Romish Church argues that, as in receiving the power of the keys, such penalties were not specifically excepted, and as the nature of both temporal and eternal punishments is the same, power to remit ecclesiastical (not natural) penalties must belong to her; to this it is added that the decree of Trent essentially approximates to the Protestant view, which denies the Church only the power of remitting divine penalties. In this sense, Pius VI., Const. Autores fidei, expressed himself strongly against the opinion of the episcopalists, who allow indulgence only in the way of remitting penances. Those alone who are in purgatory are admitted to be beyond eccl. jurisdiction, so that in regard to them indulgence cannot be granted as a judicial pardon; but as they continue in the communion of the Church, it is bestowed per modum suffragii (ALEX. HALES, summa, p. 4, Q. 23, art. 2, membr. 5; TH. AQUIN., summa suppl., p. 3, Q. 25, c. 28, X., de sent. excomm., 5, 39; BENED. XIV., in constit. a. 1749; Bullar. Bened., Tom. 3, p. 87, § 14).—But were such penalties gratuitously remitted, the divine justice would be violated, which demands proper satisfaction for every sin (Trent, s. 6, decr. de justific., c. 14). But this requires that good works be regarded as opus operatum, which renders substitution possible, i. e., vicarious satisfaction, a doctrine supposed to be found in Origen (hom. in num., h. 22; Exhort. ad martyr.; Cyprian. de lapsis, c. 36, &c.). And with this is connected their doctrine of the communion of saints: Christ and the saints performed more good works than were necessary; this thesaurus meritorum, thes. supererogationis perfectorum, is available for the entire Church to which they belonged; only, the Pope has the dispensation of them in his hands. This completes the idea of Indulgence. And this completion of the idea we owe to Alex. Hales († 1245) (see Extrav. comm., c. 2, de pœnit. et remiss., 5, 9. Trent, s. 14, de pœnit., c. 8).—The measure of those grants is mostly fixed by days, months, and years; though sometimes indulgentia plenaria is bestowed. The relation of indulgence to the sacrament of penance is also seen in this, that whoever would obtain it must confess, so that it is still annexed to satisfactio. And this is appealed to as a proof of its usefulness (Tid. s. 25, dec. de indulg.).—Besides, the Romish Church always makes indulgence dependent upon some special service, participation in missions, the worship of relics, &c., attendance at church, pilgrimages, &c. So that an indulgence may be general, or local (particularis). The most general is that of the Roman year of jubilee (see Art.).—A general indulgence is always dispensed by the Pope; particular indulgences, full or partial, may be granted by many places, through Papal privilege, at times during particular festivals, or longer, sometimes perpetually. Such indulgences must be published by the Bishops and two capitulars of the diocese. Quæstores elemosynarum are abolished (Tid. s. 21, c. 9, de ref.). In the management of this department of labor, the Pope is assisted by the Congr. cardinalium de indulg. et sacr. reliquiis. In a subordinate measure, Bishops also have jurisdiction over indulgences; at the consecration of churches they may grant them for one year; at other times for 40 days. This right is suspended sede vacante, but papal faculties can extend it (c. 14, X., de pœnit. et remiss. [5, 39], c. 1, 3, in eod. in VI^o. [5, 10], Bened. XIV., de synod. dioces., lib. 2, c. 9, n. 7). In granting breves of indulgence, the permission of the civil government is always necessary — (PERMANEDER, K.-recht, 2, 403; AMORT, de origine, progressu, valore et fructu indulg., Aug. Vindeb., 1735, fol.; J. B. HIRSCHER, die Lehre von Ablass. Tub., 1844, Aufl. 5). MEYER.*

Inheritance.—As, according to the Mosaic law, the land of Canaan was distributed among the several tribes, and then again subdivided among the respective families of each tribe, as a perpetual inheritance (Lev. 25 : 13, 23; Numb. 27 : 1, &c.; 32 : 18; 33 : 54; 34 : 14; of. Ps. 16 : 5), so each individual of God's people obtained a heritage, which was not, however, properly his own, but God's, to whom the entire land belonged. Hence, these real estate inheritances could not be permanently alienated, but only the use thereof be disposed of for a limited period; in the year of Jubilee all reverted to the original owner, or his heirs, if it had not been previously redeemed (Lev. 25; Ruth 4). Thus we can see how such property came to be sacredly regarded, so that a genuine Israelite, like Naboth (1 Kings 21 : 3, &c.; of. 2 Kings 9 : 10), would for no amount part with his inheritance. But besides this inheritance, other possessions might be acquired (Josh. 14 : 6, &c.; 24 : 30, 33; Numb. 33 : 54). But all such property, including slaves (Lev. 25 : 46), passed, at the father's death, to his legitimate sons, the first-born receiving a double portion, and providing for the widow, unmarried sisters, and younger brothers (Gen. 21 : 10; 31 : 14, &c.; 25 : 5; 24 : 36; Deut. 21 : 17). The children of prostitutes inherited nothing (Judges 11 : 2, 7). This right of primogeniture was legally protected (Deut. 21 : 15), though David and Rehoboam disregarded it (1 Kings 1 : 2; 2 Chron. 11 : 22); it might also be forfeited (Gen. 25 : 31; 49 : 3; 48 : 5). It was an exception for daughters to receive real estate (Josh. 15 : 18; Job 42 : 15), but they inherited it when there were no sons; then they had to marry within the tribe, to prevent the alienation of the family inheritance (Numb. 27 : 1, &c.; 36 : 1, &c.; Josh. 17 : 3; 1 Chron. 23 : 22; Ruth 4 : 1; Tobit 6 : 12. Jos., Antt., 4, 7, 5, must allude to a subsequent modification of this law. See Thaasith, 30 b.). If there were no children, the brother, uncle, or nearest relatives, became the heirs (Numb. 27 : 9, &c.; cf. PHILO, opp., II., 172 M.). It might also happen that a faithful slave became the heir, either by marrying the daughter, or by being adopted, &c. (1 Chron. 2 : 34, &c.; Gen. 15 : 2, &c.; cf. Prov. 17 : 2 and 30 : 23). These provisions rendered a will superfluous, excepting for personal property (Dent. 21 : 16), hence there is no word for this idea in ancient Hebrew; for the phrase in 2 Sam. 17 : 23, and Isa. 38 : 1, does not involve the making of a will. But the case was changed when the Jews lost their country, which rendered great modifications of existing laws necessary, or entirely annulled them. Then wills became common (Jos., Antt., 17, 3, 2; B. J., 2, 2, 3), though with such restrictions as conformed them to Mosaic precepts (of. Gal. 3 : 15; Heb. 9 : 17); they were called קְדֻשָּׁה = sanctum, by the Rabbins קְדֻשָּׁה. The father might also, during life, make a partial distribution of his property (Tub. 8 : 21; Luke 15 : 12). Contentions about an inheritance also occurred (Luke 12 : 13, &c.). — See EWALD, Alterthum Isr., p. 156, &c.; SAALSCHUTZ, mos. Recht, &c. RÜETSCHL.*

Innocent I.—XIII., Popes.—Innocent I., native of Albano, the son of one obscure Innocentius, succeeded Anastasius I., May 18, 402. The powers to which, at so early a date of the Christian Church, he laid claim as Roman Bishop, were as absolute as those acquired by his later predecessors, and by dint of discretion and persevering energy he advanced the authority of the Roman See not inconsiderably. A short time after his election he gave the churches of Eastern Illyria in charge of the Bishop Anysius of Thessalonica, after whose death Rufus obtained the same office, with the express understanding that he should hold it as vicar and legate of the Roman pontiff. In the decretal, addressed by Innocent to Victorius, Bishop of Rouen, a number of important rules respecting Church discipline were laid down. In the first, all ordinations of Bishops made without the knowledge and consent of the Metropolitan, were prohibited as uncanonical; in the second, military service was declared incompatible with the clerical office; the third conferred on the provincial bishops exclusive jurisdiction in the disputes of clergymen, reserving the right of appeal to the Roman See in important cases; the following three prescribed the dismissal of all priests that had been married to widows, divorced women, or concubines; the ninth provided that priests and deacons, after their consecration, shall have no intercourse with women. In the decretal addressed (406) to Exuperius, Bishop of Toulouse, the Pope renewed the prohibition of priest marriage, and rebuked the practice of dealing more leniently with adulterous men than with adulterous women. In the year 404 the Pope was requested by Augustine, in the name of the Bishops assembled at Carthage, to intercede in their behalf with the Emperor Honorius against the Donatists, and this Innocent did effectually. He also very earnestly commended the cause of Chrysostom to the favorable consideration of the Emperor Honorius, who, after fruitless remonstrances, was about to make war on that account against his brother Arcadius, when the invasion of Italy by the barbarians diverted him from that per-pose. Innocent now renounced all connection and fellowship with the enemies of Chrysostomus; but the statement of Baronius, that he excommunicated Arcadius and his wife, Eudoxia, is unfounded. How high ground Innocent took in the assumption of power over all Christendom, may be seen, indeed, from various acts of his. He severely censured the Macedonian bishops for calling in question what had been settled by papal authority. In a letter to the Archbishop of Antioch, he maintained that the prerogatives of the See of Antioch were not owing to the merits of the city, but to the fact that St. Peter had ministered there; and were, for that reason, second only to those of Rome, where St. Peter finished what he had commenced at Antioch. In a letter addressed to Decentius, Innocent declared unequivocally, that the Western churches were bound to conform in their rites and exercises with the Roman Church. When a North African Council, held at Carthage, reported to Innocent their resolutions about some doctrinal controversy, with the request to accede to them, he eagerly seized this opportunity to assert the supremacy of the Roman pontificate. In his answer (417) he expressed himself well satisfied, that, by submitting the subject to his decision, the Council had manifested a due deference to the Apostolical See. Such a dependence of all Christian churches on Rome he represented as indispensable for the establishment of general rules in the government, and the preservation of unity in the worship, of Christian churches. As to the subject-matter, he declared his entire concurrence with the North African bishops in rejecting the Pelagian doctrines about the relation of Nature to Grace. It should, however, not be inferred from this, that Innocent's views on this subject coincide altogether with those of Augustine. Neander (Church History, II., i., 827) remarks that Innocent, making the communication of Divine Grace depend on the worth of the individual, differs, in a material point, from St. Augustine. Innocent excluded, by the power of his apostolical authority, Pelagius and Coelestinus, with their followers, from the Church. Shortly before his death he wrote two more letters, one to Jerome, to whom he administered consolation, and another to John, Bishop of Jerusalem, with whom he remonstrated for abetting the sect of Origines and opposing Jerome. Innocent died March 12, 417. He was admitted by his successor in the number of saints. — (Comp. SCHÖNEMANN, Epist. Pont., II., 507, sqq. EGGS, Pontificium doctum, i. 63, sq. — II., Gregorius Papareschi, a Roman. He was chosen, after the death of Honorius, Feb. 14, 1130, by a part of the cardinals; whilst the others elected the wealthy Cardinal Peter Leonis, who took the name of Anacletus I. The latter had a powerful ally in Roger, King of Sicily, and forced his competitor to seek refuge in France. Here he obtained the support of the heads of monasticism, Peter of Cluny and Bernard of Clairvaux, whose influence led to his acknowledgment by King Louis VI. and the Gallican Church. Owing principally to the vigorous eloquence of Bernard of Clairvaux, the cities of Lombardy submitted to Innocent, and the Synod at Pisa (1134) pronounced in his favor. Emperor Lothaire II. finally reinstated him in Rome (1134), but the schism continued until Anacletus' death (1138). — At the Council in the Lateran (1039) Innocent announced the restoration of concord in the Church: on the same occasion he condemned Arnold of Brescia, whom he ordered to leave Italy, and not to return without papal consent. Soon after, Innocent excommunicated Roger of Sicily, who had invaded the Duchy bestowed by the Emperor upon Rainulph; but in the war that ensued the Pope was taken prisoner by his enemy, and had to offer a compromise in order to regain his liberty. According to its terms Roger was absolved of excommunication, and confirmed in the possession of Sicily, Apulia, and Capua; but he had to swear allegiance to the Pope, both for himself and his successors, and to receive his kingdom as a feudal dependence of the Church. On the 29th of Sept., 1139, Innocent returned to Rome. About this time he reiterated the sentence of several councils, condemning the errors of Abelard. The King of France, who had done so much for Innocent, incurred, nevertheless, his displeasure, and was put under an interdict, because he disagreed with the Pope about the election of an Archbishop in Bourges. This interdict was kept up till 1143. The last years of Innocent's life were spent principally in subjecting the rebellious cities, Tivoli, Palestrina, Tusculum, and Albano. At length even the Romans renounced their obedience, restored the Senate, and elected municipal officers. While Roger was on the point of sending succor to the Pope, the latter died, Sept. 23, 1143. Innocent II. was not equal to the exigencies of his times. About his numerous letters see Fabricius bibl. lat. med. et inf. æt. ed. Mansi, IV., 33, sqq. — III. — An anti-Pope. — Landus, of the Frangipanni family. He was one of the rivals, who, after the death of Hadrian, contested the accession of Alexander II. He was seized by Alexander in the vicinity of Rome, and lodged in the monastery Cava. This ended a schism that had lasted twenty years, under four successive rival popes. — III., Lothaire. — One of the most eminent heads of the Church, equally distinguished for clearness of mind, erudition, and energy. He greatly added to the authority of St. Peter's chair, and during the 18 years of his pontificate, he ruled over Christendom as no Pope did before or after him. He was the son of Count Trasimund, and belonged to the noble family of the Conti. While yet quite young, he held several ecclesiastical offices under Lucius III. and Urban III.; by Clement III. he was appointed dean of the Cardinals. At that time, while under a depression of mind, he wrote his book: De contemptu mundi sive de miseria humanæ conditionis. On the day of Coelestin III.'s death (Jan. 8, 1198), Lothaire, who was only 37 years old, was chosen pope. The greater part of Italy was at that time subject to the Germans; Rome was not, but it was undecided whether to acknowledge the Pope, or to establish a free commonwealth. Innocent commenced with restoring papal authority in Rome and the Pontifical States; the imperial Prefect of Rome had to take the oath of allegiance to him, and the vassals of the Emperor were driven from the Marches. Under his auspices the cities of Tuscany entered into a league and ejected the Germans who had been invested by Henry IV. with the territories of the Church. The Empress Constance, in order to secure Sicily to her son Frederick, was compelled to receive it as a fief from the Pope, on such terms as the latter himself dictated. After her death he administered the regency over the two Sicilies with a vigorous hand, being both the guardian and feudal lord of the young orphan Frederick. When he had thus consolidated his power in Italy, he began very efficiently to interfere in the affairs of Germany, assuming the right of deciding between the two claimants of the imperial throne. His partiality to the Guelfs inclined him to decide in favor of Otto IV. But the successful warfare of Philip against his antagonist, led at length to negotiations which left the chances of Otto very precarious. The Pope revoked the sentence of excommunication against Philip (1207), and his legates opened a Diet of princes at Nordhausen. While this was pending, Philip was assassinated by Otto of Wittelsbach, and civil war in Germany thus brought to a close. Otto IV., though at first obsequious to the Pope, from whom he received the imperial diadem (Sept. 27, 1209), soon began to vindicate his rights in Italy; he occupied the estates bequeathed to the Church by Mathilda, and the Duchy of Spoleto: he even threatened to seize the States of the Church and the lands of Frederick. Regardless of the ban which the Pope hurled against him (1211), and which was most rigorously enforced, the Emperor undertook, in the following spring, another campaign against Italy, during which he subdued Apulia and Calabria. The Pope now had the sentence of excommunication and deposition solemnly proclaimed in Germany by his legate, Siegfried, Archbishop of Mayence, and absolved the princes of their oath of allegiance to the Emperor. This bold step, followed up by the support of the last Hohenstaufen Frederick, as candidate for the empire, actually led to the dethronement of Otto IV. and the elevation of Frederick, who was crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle, July 25, 1215. Otto had henceforth to content himself with his hereditary estates in Brunswick. With equal vigor Innocent enforced the acknowledgment of the papal supremacy in other countries. Philip Augustus, King of France, who had repudiated his lawful wife, Ingeburgis, was forced by the Pope's interdict to restore her to her rights. Alfonso IX., King of Leon, who had married in a forbidden degree, was excommunicated for refusing to dismiss his wife: in this case, however, Innocent did not carry the point. Peter, King of Arragon, was, for a similar reason, restrained by the Pope from marrying Blanca; and the same submitted to the exaction of an annual tribute, when Innocent crowned him in Rome, 1204. John, Prince of the Bulgarians, solicited and received a crown from the Pope. But no potentate was more deeply humbled than John, King of England. When two rival candidates claimed the Archbishopric of Canterbury, Innocent, setting both aside, appointed his friend, the Cardinal Stephen Langton. As John resisted this arbitrary act, Innocent put England under an interdict, and excommunicated and finally deposed the King (1208). The English throne was offered to Philip, King of France, who would have invaded England, had not John yielded, and reaccepted the crown, as the Pope's vassal. The bishops and barons, who despised the King for his pusillanimous conduct, wrested from him the Magna Charta (June 15, 1215), and though the Pope assailed it and its authors with the customary hierarchical arms, neither these nor the King's temporal power could effect its overthrow. Very favorable prospects for the extension of papal dominion seemed to open in the East. Constantinople was conquered (April 12, 1204) by crusaders, a Latin empire established, and Count Baldwin proclaimed the first Emperor. Innocent, while disapproving of the act, was not loth to take advantage of it, and appointed a Patriarch of Constantinople. This proved, however, no real gain. The new empire bore within itself the germs of speedy dissolution, and crippled all vigorous efforts for the recovery of Palestine. The 4th Lateran Synod, opened by Innocent in Nov., 1215, forms an apt conclusion of his eventful life. This Council adopted 70 canons, by which the tenets of the Church and the most important judicial and disciplinary rules were settled. The main objects of the Council were to promote a crusade, to exterminate heresy, and to reform the Church. The suppression of heresy had, indeed, been a favorite scheme with Innocent since his elevation, and he had vigorously pursued it, by his unrelenting persecution of the heretics in Southern France, by the instigation of a crusade against the Albigenses, and the establishment of an inquisitorial tribunal in Toulouse. In his letters he advocated the harshest measures against persistent heretics, whose very bones he ordered to be removed from consecrated ground. The Council at the Lateran enjoined on all faithful princes an unflinching persecution of heretics, threatening with the usual penalties all who should be recreant to this duty. The like severity was displayed against the pagans in Liffland, who were to be converted by word or—sword. Jews were forbidden to have intercourse with Christians, and only Christian subjects were recommended to the protection of their sovereigns. Another important feature of this Council was the confirmation of the two monastic orders of Francis of Assisi, and Dominic Guzman. Innocent, who had opened the Council with a presentiment of approaching death, felt a desire to direct his meditations to the Invisible, and performed his ministerial duties as often as he could. He died July 16, 1216. About his writings, comp. F. Harter, Hist. of Innocent III. and his contemporaries: Hamburg, 1834-42, 4 vols. — IV., Sinibald Fieschi.—He was elected the successor to Celestin IV., June 25, 1243, after the papal chair had been vacant for eighteen months. Fieschi belonged to one of the first Genoese families, and was considered the best jurist of his time. It was generally expected that by this choice the controversy between the Emp. and Pope would be terminated, since Innocent had, while card-

l, taken sides with Frederick II. But the mutual distrust with which they were regarding each other's steps, prevented the consummation of an agreement that had been entered into. The Pope, whose freedom was hampered by the terms of Frederick, secretly repaired to Lyons, where he summoned a Council, with the ostensible purpose of correcting some abuses in the Church, procuring aid for the Christians in the East, and reconciling the Church with the Emperor. But the Council had hardly met, when Frederick was put to the ban, deposed, deprived of his kingdoms, dignities, and powers, and the electoral princes were directed to hold another election. Though Louis IX., of France, offered his mediation, and though the Emperor had his orthodoxy attested by the Archb. of Palermo and other prelates, Innocent adhered to his sentence. The contest now grew warmer, and was waged on both sides with reckless animosity.—The Pope stirred up an insurrection in Sicily (1246), which was, however, of short duration; he also instigated the Landgrave of Thuringia, Henry Raspe, to aspire to the imperial crown. The Emperor, on the other hand, punished as rebels all who acknowledged the validity of the interdict; he banished most of the monks, and suppressed the rebellion in Apulia. Henry Raspe was discomfited by King Conrad; William of Holland, to whom the imperial crown was then given by Innocent, found very little support, and the cause of the Pope seemed desperate in Germany, when Frederick died, Dec. 13, 1250. His son Conrad did not, however, give up the contest. At the head of a large army he repaired to Italy, to take possession of Sicily, which had been kept for him by the illustrious Manfred. The Pope now offered the crown of Sicily to different persons as a prize, bestowing it finally on the English prince Edmund, when death, which has more than once opportunely succored the papal cause, suddenly closed the career of Conrad (May 21, 1254). Upon the promise of Innocent to respect the rights of young Conradin, the guardian of the latter, Manfred, entrusted him with the regency of the kingdom; but when it became apparent that he had ulterior views, Manfred declared war against him, and signally defeated a papal army, December 2, 1254. Five days later Innocent died at Naples. During the pontificate of Innocent IV. some missionary enterprises were set on foot. Several Franciscans and Dominicans were despatched to Persia (1245). To Conrad, the Master of the German Order of Knights, the Pope ceded the rights on Prussia, which he divided in four bishoprics.—Innocent is the author of "Apparatus super quinque libros decretalium," a work which has been called: "Canonistarum splendor et juris pater." In the "Apologeticus," written against Peter de Vineis, Chancellor of Frederick II., he advocated the jurisdiction of the apostolical chair over the Empire.—(Comp. Fabricius, bibl. lat. med. et inf. æt. ed. Mansi, IV., 36, sq. Egg's pontific. doctum, p. 442, sq.—V., Pierre de Champagni, also called after his native city, De Tarantaise (now Moûtiers, in Savoy) was elected (Jan. 21, 1276) successor to Gregory X. The short time of his pontificate, which lasted five months only, was well spent in reconciling several cities and States of Italy, as Lucca, Pisa, Tuscany, which had been arrayed against each other as partisans of the Guelfs and Ghibelines. His project to consummate the union of the Greek and Roman Churches, to which the Greek deputies had assented at the Council of Lyons, was thwarted by his death (June 22). He was a prolific author. Besides postils and other trifles, composed in the taste of his times, he wrote some philosophical treatises: "De intellectu et voluntate, de materia cæli, de æternitate mundi, de unitate formæ, etc.; his theological works comprise an introduction to the canonical law (abbreviatio decretorum); a commentary on the four books of the Magister sententiarum, and interpretations of the Scripture. His learned contemporaries culled from his writings 100 erroneous propositions, a defence of which was undertaken by Thomas Aquinas. —VI., Stephen Albert, a native of Mont, in the diocese of Limoges; succeeded Clement VI., Dec. 18, 1352, and was at that time Bishop of Ostia. Before proceeding to the election of a pope, the cardinals adopted a number of resolutions, for the purpose of protecting their own independence and rights against the encroachments of papal despotism. All cardinals in the conclave took an oath, that they would be guided by these rules if elected, a few of them adding the reservation, si jure niturentur. Among the latter was Innocent VI., and it was his first official act, after his election, to annul those very resolutions as illegal. As head of the Church he was distinguished for his accurate knowledge of law, and the strictness of discipline that he enforced in the Church. The Commendams and Reservations, granted by his predecessors, were revoked by him, "quod occasione commendarum, sicut experientia docuit, ut plurimum divinus cultus minuitur, animarum cura negligitur, hospitalitas consueta et debita non servatur," etc. The heavy taxes, also, to which the clergy were liable at their installation, were abolished, "since," said he, "the sheep ought to be tended by a shepherd, not by a mercenary." A frugal simplicity in the mode of life was practised by himself, and recommended to the cardinals; while, on the other hand, the auditors of the Rota, who, till that time, had received no compensation, were allowed a liberal salary, "as hungry people," he used to say, "were inclined to help themselves at the expense of others." Innocent reduced the entire States of the Church to obedience, but when he wrested also Bologna from the powerful ruler of Milan, Bernabo Visconti, the latter proved to be an adversary who knew no respect either for Pope or Church. Peter of Castile, the cruel persecutor of his brothers, and poisoner of his own wife, was put to the ban. At the request of Charles IV., who had been crowned by this Pope, April 5, 1355, he established the feast of the Holy Spear, to be celebrated in Germany and Bohemia on Friday of the first week after Easter. To the order of mendicant friars, who had greatly sunk in the respect of the people, he restored their former privileges. Innocent VI. died Sept. 12, 1362, with the reputation of being a sincere and just man. He left no writings except a few letters and bulls.—VII., Cosmos Megliorati, of Sulmone, in the Abruzzi. Under Urban VI. he had been appointed Archbishop of Ravenna and Bishop of Bologna. Boniface IX. made him cardinal, and deputed him as legate to reconcile the warring provinces of Italy. When he was elected, Oct. 17, 1404, to succeed Boniface IX., he was already 65 years old. All the cardinals had, before making a choice, solemnly bound themselves that they would use all means in their power to terminate the great Western schism, and even to lay down the papal tiara, if that should be deemed expedient. Immediately after Innocent's election, a riot broke out in Rome; the Ghibelines, with Giovanni and Nicolo Colonna for leaders, clamored for the restoration of the people's ancient rights, while the Guelfs favored the concentration of power in the hands of the Pope. The people being victorious in the bloody contest that ensued, Innocent had to yield to their demands. But the young Nepota, Ludovico Megliorati, indignant at their insolence, conspired with his friends, and assassinated a number of distinguished Romans. Innocent being suspected of having connived at the crime, fled for his life to Viterbo (1405), but was led back to Rome in triumph, when it appeared that the suspicion was groundless. The Neapolitan troops, however, which the Colonna had brought to Rome, still continued to infest the city and its vicinity, till Innocent found himself finally constrained to excommunicate Ladislaus, King of Naples, and to divest him of his kingdom, which he held as an ecclesiastical fief. Ladislaus, who was afraid of his rival, Louis of Anjou, now accepted the terms of the Pope. About this time, Benedict XIII., the anti-Pope, proposed a conference for the alleged purpose of restoring the peace of the Church; but Innocent, who knew, that under this pretext he merely courted the favor of the Christian powers, refused the request; and for some time the two rivals indulged in violent reproaches and recriminations. Innocent died soon after of apoplexy, Nov. 6, 1406. A rumor that he had been poisoned, seems to have no better foundation than the suddenness of his death. Innocent was good natured, frugal, and generous; but he has been justly censured for nepotism.—(Comp. the two Vitæ Innocentii VII., Muratori III., 2, p. 832–837).—VIII., Giovanni Battista Cibo, a Genoese, was chosen, Aug. 29, 1484, successor to Sixtus IV. In his youth he was for some time at the court of Naples, but soon obtained, in Rome, a charge in the service of Cardinal Philip of Bologna, through whose recommendation he was appointed by Paul II., Bishop of Savona. Sixtus IV. made him Bishop of Melfi, and (1473) cardinal. Not long after his accession to the papal chair, he exhorted all Christian princes to become reconciled with each other, and to unite for a general war against the Turks. But his appeals remained ineffectual. He went himself twice to war against Ferdinand, King of Naples, and instigated Renatus, Duke of Lorraine, to claim Ferdinand's throne. A peace was concluded, Aug. 12, 1486, but Ferdinand broke it, and was dethroned (1489) until peace was restored, 1492. Innocent's zeal to arm the Christians against the Turks did not prevent him from striking a profitable bargain with Bajazet II., whose unfortunate brother, Zizim (Dachem), he kept in duress for the consideration of an annual sum of 40,000 ducats, to which the generous Sultan yet added the lance that had pierced the Saviour's side. At the same time the Pope received the regular tax which was levied in the Christian countries for an enterprise against the Turks. The persecution of witches and sorcerers in Germany, and their barbarous punishment, was rigorously enjoined by this Pope. He appointed for that purpose two commissioners, who wrote an absurd and disgusting book about the trial of witches (see Witches and Witchcraft). He attempted to stay the progress of the Hussites in Bohemia, condemned 200 propositions of Pico de Mirandola, and prohibited the reading of them, on penalty of excommunication. The last years of his life he spent in indolent ease, enriching himself by the sale of offices that he created. He died July 25, 1492. His numerous offspring (he had 16 children) are sufficient evidence how little he respected the vow of chastity; and his open preferment of them to profitable offices, evinced a shameless indifference to the opinion of the world. One of the eight cardinals that he created was the son of Lorenzo de Medicis, who, at the time of his appointment, had not completed his thirteenth year.—(Comp. Vialardi's Vita di Papa Innocenzo VIII.: Ven., 1613).—IX., Antonio Faccinetti, succeeded Gregory XIV., Oct. 30, 1591. Pius IV. delegated him (1561) to attend the Tridentine Council; Pius V. appointed him nuncio at the Republic of Venice, Gregory XIII. made him Patriarch of Jerusalem, President of the Inquisition, and (1583) Cardinal. Though his pontificate lasted two months only, his regulations during that time prove that he had good designs. Several projects of an utilitarian character occupied his mind when he died, Dec. 30, 1591. He left a number of writings (Moralis adversus Macchiavellem, in Platonem de Politicis), most of which remain as manuscripts in libraries.—X., Giambetista, succeeded Urban VIII., Sept. 15, 1644, at the age of 72 years. Both his success and the obloquy attached to his name are due to his connection with Donna Olympia Maidalchini, his brother's widow, with whom he is accused to have been on too familiar terms even before his brother's sudden death. Though Innocent was indebted for his elevation to the brothers Barberini, he initiated his reign by a judicial proceeding against them, with the design to seize the immense riches which they had amassed under the preceding pontiff. They fled to France, where they roused the sympathies of the French government. An armed expedition was undertaken in their favor, Piombino and Portolongano were conquered, and the Pope was finally compelled to reinstate the Barberini into all their domains and dignities, of which they had been stripped by a papal bull during their absence. More satisfactorily to the Pope ended his quarrel with the Duke of Parma, a part of whose possessions, Castro and Ronciglione, he annexed to the Pontifical States.—Two protests of Innocent's (Oct. 14 and 26, 1648) against the Westphalian peace, as well as his all (Nov. 26, 1648) by which the articles of peace were declared void and without effect, remained, of course, unheeded, since protests and prohibitions of whatever kind, and from whatever source, were in the articles themselves disavowed as totally inadmissible. At a later time his protest, which has never been revoked, acquired more importance; and several of Innocent's successors have reaffirmed its validity. For the history of dogmatics no act of Innocent of consequence, except the condemnation which he passed (1653) on five propositions of Jansen.—When he entered upon his reign, the papal chamber was in debt to the amount of eight millions of scudi; and it must be confessed that, with the aid of Olympia, he devised most ingenious expedients to replenish his coffers. Money was procured by systematic extortions and the unscrupulous reception of bribes, by a most scandalous traffic in offices, by the sequestration of convents, to the number of 2000, the revenues of which were confiscated, by the appointment universalis maximique Jubilæi for the year 1650, by the oppressive monopoly of the papal chamber in grains, to which may be ascribed the ruin of agriculture in the States of the Church. Innocent died Jan. 5, 1655. His character was not without some noble traits, but blemished by his obsequiousness to the intrigues and avarice of Olympia. The Vita di Donna Olimpia Maidachina is, according to Ranke (Hist. of Popes), a fabrication.—XI., who belonged to the family of the Odeschalchi, was called to the papal chair, Sept. 21, 1676, after the death of Clement X. In his youth he devoted himself to the study of law, and received at Naples the degree of LL. D. In the discharge of his duties as Prothonotary, President of the Apostolical Chamber, Commissioner of the Marka di Roma, and Governor of Macerata, he acquitted himself most creditably. Through the influence of Olympia, to whom he presented a magnificent silver vessel, he became cardinal, and afterwards legate of Ferrara, and bishop of Novara. His elevation to the pontifical chair was mainly due to the French party and the recommendation of Louis XIV. Innocent XI. effected a number of very salutary reforms, both in Church and State. He abolished benefices and cardinalships that had solely served for the support of nepotes; he rendered the examination for the various ecclesiastical degrees stricter than it had been before; he introduced economy in his own household, demanded of the clergy correctness of conduct, encouraged catechetical lectures and the establishment of schools for children, and admonished the clergy to preach no dialectic sophistries, but Christ crucified. He also discarded the castrati of the papal chapel. Against the ethics of the Jesuits he declared himself most emphatically, in the bull dated March 2, 1679. A rupture with France was occasioned by his resistance to the privilege, arrogantly claimed by the French ambassadors, of shielding criminals, not only in their palaces, but in the whole quarter of the city where their residences happened to be. As the Pope refused to accredit the French ambassador, De Levardin, who would not renounce this pretension, the representative of Louis XIV. entered Rome with an escort of 800 guards and 200 servants, and defied the Pope's sovereignty in his own capital. Innocent excommunicated him, but the controversy did not end till several years after Innocent's death, when the French Court waived its pretended rights. Another source of ill feeling between the Pope and the King of France was the regale, or prerogative, claimed by the King, of receiving the revenues of a bishopric, and of presentation to its dependent livings, as long as the See was vacant. Several bishops protested against this assumption, and Innocent sustained them in three briefs, the last of which was quite minatory to the King. A Synod of the French clergy, summoned by the King (Nov. 9, 1681), not only awarded to the crown the contested rights, but issued a solemn declaration to that effect, called the Quatuor Propositiones Cleri Gallicani. The Pope had a copy of these publicly burned by the hangman, and withheld his confirmation from all bishops who were appointed during and after the Synod. The abrogation of the Edict of Nantes, and the persecution of the Jesuits, met with the cordial approval of Innocent, whose joy was so unbounded that, in a brief to the King of France, he extolled the zeal of that monarch for the promotion of Christian faith, and that he celebrated the expulsion of the Protestants from France with a Te Deum, and the booming of cannon. Notwithstanding this, the old differences between him and Louis XIV. remained unsettled. Innocent died Aug. 12, 1689. The French and the Jesuits continued, after his death, to disparage his name, and successfully resisted his canonization, which was proposed under Benedict XIV.—(Comp. Mar. Guarnacci, Vita et res gestæ Pont. Rom. I., p. 106–126; Phil. Bonamici, Life and Hist. of Pope Innocent XI., transl. from the Latin (Rome, 1776, 4,) by Le Bret: Frankft. and Leips., 1791; Ranke, III., 159, sqq., Append., 283, sqq.).—XII., Antonio Pignatelli, was elected, Feb. 12, 1691, successor to Alexander VIII., at an age of 76 years. He strove to emulate the virtuous government of Innocent XI., by whom he had been appointed successively Cardinal, Bishop of Paenza, Legate of Bologna, and Archbishop of Naples. He sought to abolish nepotism forever, restraining by a bull (June 22, 1692), all future popes from bestowing on their relatives any possessions, revenues, and offices dependent on the Apostolic Chamber. The Bullarium magnum contains a great number of regulations amending the discipline in convents and churches. The controversy respecting the regale (see Innocent XI.) was terminated by a compromise, which limited the King's prerogative to the older territory of France, and excluded its operation from the later acquisitions. The inquisition at Naples was the cause of a quarrel between the Pope and Charles II. of Spain; neither monarch lived to see it adjusted. In the controversy between Bossuet and Fenelon, about Fenelon's book, "Explication des maximes des Saints sur la vie intérieure," the Pope, who acted as umpire, decided in favor of Bossuet (1699). Innocent died Sept. 27, 1700. Shortly before his death he bequeathed a large sum of money to the hospital that he had erected, and the proceeds from the sale of his furniture to the poor. He left the reputation of a benevolent, just, generous, and pious man. — (Comp. Guarnacci, Vita, &c., I., 389–404; Ranke, III., 170, sqq.; Appendix, 290, sqq.). — XIII., Conti, was elected after the death of Clement XI. (May 8, 1721), after an excited conclave, during which the Cardinals came to blows, and hurled inkstands at each other. He had been raised to the rank of Cardinal by Clement XI. As he was generally esteemed for his prudence, learning, and conciliatory spirit, it was hoped that he would restore peace to the Church. Italy had reason to be satisfied during the three years of his pontificate. The English Pretender, James III., found in him a zealous friend. Emperor Charles VI. was invested by Innocent with the crown of Naples, upon formally acknowledging the Pope as feudal lord over that kingdom, but Clement XII. declared this act null and void. Innocent protested, but without effect, against Parma and Piacenza being bestowed as imperial fiefs. He materially aided Malta, when it was threatened by the Turks, with funds, and by an appeal to the Christian princes. Though opposed to the Jesuits, and not disinclined to abolish the Order, he stood by the Constitutio Unigenitus, which his predecessor had reluctantly granted. Innocent died March 7, 1724. — (Comp. Guarnacci, Vita, &c., II., 381, sq.; Life of Innocent XIII.: Cologne, 1724; Ranke, Appendix, p. 302, sqq.).

TH. PRESSEL.—Seidensticker.

Inquisition (Inquisitio hæreticæ pravitatis, also sanctum officium) is the name given to the spiritual tribunal which exists in the Romish Church, to spy out and punish those who depart from the dogmas of Rome, either orally or in writing. It is a degeneration and perversion of the old Church discipline, which was originally in the hands of the rural Bishops, whose duty it was to check false doctrines, and also to improve the visitation of the churches of their districts to spy out rising heresies. They punished discovered heretics with ecclesiastical punishments, the greatest of which was excommunication, by which the heretic was at the same time regarded as given over to the devil. Banishment was also connected with it as a civil punishment, and towards non-Christians even death, as appears from Diocletian's Edict to Julian, proconsul of Africa, against the Manicheans. The death-penalty on account of one's faith, was not inflicted by Christians upon Christians until in the 4th cent. The first Christian Emperor who legally issued the death-penalty against certain heretics, especially the Manicheans, was Theodosius (382), although celebrated Church fathers, as Chrysostom (Homil. 29 and 46, in Matth.) and Augustine (see Augustini Epist. 93, ad Vincentium, contra Gaudentium, Lib. I., Ep. 185, ad Bonifacium.) declared against it. On the other hand, already Jerome (Epist. 37, ad Riparium adv. Vigilantium.) attempts to justify it by Deut. 13 : 6, sq., and Leo the Great (440–461) approved it (Leonis Opp. Epist. 15, ad Turribium). The clergy committed its execution to the civil power, and thus sought to preserve the Church from the shedding of blood, and from blood-guiltiness. The persecution of heretics was, and remained now, it is true, in the hands of the Bishops; but on account of the spreading degeneration of the clergy, they were wanting in zeal for the faith of the Church. The synodal judicatures were to remove this evil, as the Concilium Taranconense (516). c. 8, expressly decrees, and the capitulars of Charles the Great, repeatedly commanded. (Compare F. A. Biener, Beitr. zu d. Gesch. d. Inquisitionsprozesse: Lpz., 1827, p. 28, sq.) This mode of inquiring after unchurchly views and opinions remained hereafter still in the hands of the Bishops, but received a more regular form since the 11th cent. Meanwhile, the Papal chair adopted other measures to discover and punish heretics, which promised it greater success in rooting them out. It found instruments upon whose devotion it could reckon in the legates; through these it now permitted the affairs of the Church to be managed, even at the expense of episcopal rights. It invested them with large powers, transferred to them the authority to punish; and they fearfully exercised it towards all who were suspected as being heretical, or as being opponents of the hierarchy. Pope Innocent III. now first organized the spying out and punishment of heretics into a permanent institution; by the 4th Lateran Council (in Mansi, Conciliorum nova et ampliss. collectio, &c., T. XXII., p. 986, sq., c. 3), the persecution of heretics was made the chief business of the Episcopal Synods, in the form, that every Archbishop or Bishop visit either personally, or through the archdeacon, or some other suitable person, the parish in which, according to rumor (in qua fama fuerit), there were heretics, and put under oath two or three of the inhabitants of irreproachable character, or, if necessary, all the inhabitants, to point out those who were known as heretics, or those who held secret meetings, or departed from the faithful in their walk and conduct. The refusal to take oath justified the suspicion of heresy, hæreticæ pravitatis; the careless Bishop was deposed (comp. Biener, l. c., p. 60, sq.). In name, the Bishops still conducted the matter, but the legates had supervision over them, and in fact conducted the persecution of heretics.

The organization of the inquisition, begun by Innocent III., was perfected by the Council of Toulouse, 1229, by publishing, to this end, 45 decrees (see Mansi, T. XXIII., p. 192; Planck's Geschichte der kirchlichen Gesellschaftsverfassung, IV., 2, p. 463, sq.). In this way it was constituted in Toulouse and the remainder of South France. But notwithstanding the rigid and definite regulations, and notwithstanding the terrible zeal of the legates in urging the Bishops to carry them out, the papal chair did not even approach the desired end. To accomplish this more certainly, it took the affairs of the inquisition away from the Bishops, made it a papal institute, and subjected the Bishops themselves to its tribunal. Accordingly, Gregory IX. appointed, in 1232, in Germany, Aragonia, and Austria, in 1233 in Lombardy and South France (see Concilium Bitterense: Beziers, anno 1233, in Mansi, T. XXIII., p. 269, sq.; Raynald, Annal., a. 1233, n. 59, sq.), the Dominicans permanent papal inquisitors; later also the Franciscans became such. At the same time arose a Militia Jesu Christi contra Hæreticos. Raynald, l. c., n. 40, sq.). The Dominicans found terrible models of shocking cruelty in their work in the earlier papal legates, Peter of Castelnau (de Castronovo), Arnold, Milo, et. al., whom they imitated first in Toulouse, Narbonne, Albi, and generally in South France. They were greatly assisted in their bloody work by the civil power; King Louis IX., already in his Mandato ad cives Narbonnæ (1228, in Guil. Catel. Hist. des Comtes de Tolose, ibid 1633, p. 340, sq.), making it the special duty of the civil authorities to punish all heretics. In similar manner, Duke Raymund VII. of Beziers (1233) was compelled to enact such laws (Mansi, T. XXIII., p. 265). The judicial prosecution, however, soon disappeared from the civil process, so that it soon became an instrument of priestly vengeance and envy. The name of an accusing witness was not allowed to be made known to the accused, as had already been decreed by the Councils of Beziers and Narbonne (1235); this decree was renewed by Innocent IV. (1254), in the bull Cum negotium. Even such as were themselves accused were allowed to be witnesses. The suspicion of holding a heretical opinion justified arrest. An admission was extorted by harsh treatment and imprisonment, but it also was Innocent IV. who, in the bull Ad exstirpanda (1252), first decreed that the civil authorities should apply the torture to the arrested, not only to extort admission, but also to compel them to accuse others. The arbitrariness and cruelty with which even the innocent were treated, led King Philip the Fair (as early as 1291) to command his officers to conduct with caution the arrest of those accused by the inquisitors, and Clement V. decreed (1311) that the inquisitor should not proceed against accused persons without the co-operation of the Bishop of the diocese (Biener, l. c., p. 72, sq.). Evidences of the unprecedented cruelties of inquisitors, see in Ph. a Limborch's Hist. Inquisit. cui subjungitur Liber sententiarum Inquisitionis Tholosanæ, ab a. chr. 1307-1323: Amst., 1632.

To enlarge the sphere and increase the pecuniary income of the inquisition, a very wide meaning was given to the word heresy. It was not confined to views which departed from the dogmas of the Church, or to sectarian tendencies, but was made to include usury, fortune-telling by the hands, signs, lots, &c., insulting the cross, despising the clergy, pretended connection with the leprous, with Jews, demons, and the devil, demonolatry and witchcraft. The punishments were loss of reputation, of civil and ecclesiastical rights, severe imprisonment in jail or on the galleys, and death in different ways, either by simple execution, or preceded by tortures, or by immuring, or, and most frequently, by fire. There was no appeal from the decision of the tribunal. The confiscation of property was always one of the mildest punishments, and a source of wealth to the clergy and the Church (Limborch, l. c., p. 171). Concerning the knavery practised by the inquisitors, in accusing even the innocent, and robbing them of their property, see M. Menard, Histoire de la ville de Nîmes, T. I.: Par., 1750, Preuves 73.

The Council of Narbonne (1243), Philip the Fair, and Louis XI., sought to restrain the inquisitors in inflicting money-penalties; but in vain. At length the people turned against them, and there occurred bloody insurrections, as in Albi and Narbonne (1234), where the inquisitors were banished in 1235, as also in Toulouse, where, in 1245, some were murdered. Nevertheless, they still continued to swing the bloody lash. But what insurrections and royal edicts in France were not able to accomplish, was brought to pass by ecclesiastico-political events, as the papal schism in the 14th and the reformatory councils in the 15th cent. The former crippled the power of the hierarchy with the latter, and limited thereby the power of the inquisition, so that it now proceeded against secret or suspected heretics only on the accusation of sorcery and connection with the devil (comp. the Breve of Nicholas V., in Raynald, a. 1451). In the 16th cent., the time of the Reformation, the clergy, supported by the Guises, were able to kindle violent persecutions against the Huguenots, and endeavored to restore the inquisition to its former power, but it had now lost its territory. Paul IV., it is true, published a bull (April 25, 1557), to re-establish it (Raynald, a. 1557, No. 29), and Henry II. compelled the Parliament to pass a corresponding edict, but Paul, who, on his deathbed, commended the inquisition as the main support of the Romish Church (Schröckh, K.-G. seit d. Reformation, III., p. 248, sq.), died already in 1559, and the new attempt to re-establish it failed; and in France, where it took its rise first, it also first began to decline, in spite of priestcraft and Jesuitism. But from France it cast its net over neighboring and distant countries, even beyond the ocean, through the aid of the Jesuits.

From France, the inquisition, as organized by the Council of Toulouse, spread almost immediately to Germany, where the Dominican, Conrad Droso, or Torso (see Illgen's Zeitschr. für K.-G., 1840, III., p. 55), but especially Conrad of Marburg (see Gesta Trevirorum, ed. Wytttenbach et Müller, T. I., p. 317; Alberici, Chronicon ad ann. 1233, p. 544), were first, and with fearful cruelty, active in establishing it from 1231-1233. Although its death-sentences were approved by the Emperor, Frederick II., in 1232 (see Pertz, Monumenta hist. German., T. IV., p. 287, 326), the opposition of the people and the nobles was so general against it, that Germany, for more than 100 years, was only visited by its bloody sentences occasionally; new attempts to re-establish it entire here, never succeeded according to the wishes of the hierarchy. The Beghards, who, since the middle of the 14th cent., appeared in Constance, Spire, Erfurt, Magdeburg, and farther north, reopened a wide field for the inquisition in Germany. Pope Urban V., in 1367, appointed again Dominicans to be inquisitors, among whom Walther Kerling became specially notorious. After the Emperor Charles IV., in 1369, issued special mandates in favor of the inquisition, Gregory XI. (1372) limited the number of inquisitors for Germany to five, whilst as early as 1399, Boniface IX. increased the number for North Germany alone to six. But in proportion as the reformatory tendency increased in Germany, did the inquisition meet with opposition. At the instigation of the two inquisitors, Henry Krämer (Institutoris) and Jacob Sprenger, Innocent VIII. issued the bull Summis desiderantes affectibus (Dec. 5, 1484, in E. D. Hauber's Bibliotheca, Acta et scripta magica, &c.: Lemgo, 1739-45, St. I., p. 1, sq.; G. C. Horst's Dämonomachie oder Geschichte des Glaubens an Zauberei, &c.: Frkf., a. M. 1818, II., p. 17, sq.), which sanctioned anew the existing doctrines concerning heresy in regard to sorcery and witchcraft, as also their prosecution by the inquisition. Soon after, these two inquisitors published, partly to expose the whole system of sorcery and witchcraft, and partly to vindicate the action of the inquisition against them, the notorious Malleus maleficarum (Col., 1489; comp. Hauber, l. c., St. I., p. 39, sq.; 2, p. 90, sq.; 5, p. 311, sq.), which has been justly regarded as a monstrous bastard of priestcraft and scholasticism. Many sacrifices were now again offered by the inquisition, and many perished through it even during the Reformation; this was also the case in Austria, Bohemia, Hungary, and Poland, although now it only acted periodically and in single places. The Jesuits attempted later to re-establish it there and in Bavaria (1599); also during the 30 years' war, it showed itself here and there again, but Maria Theresa abolished it entirely in her kingdom, and soon thereon it disappeared entirely from Germany.

Whilst the inquisition appeared only as a temporary manifestation in the Northern States of Europe, as in England, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, it found a much wider field in the Netherlands, and in the southern countries. As early as the 13th century, and later, it exercised its power against the heretical parties in the Netherlands, especially, however, at the time of the Reformation, when these parties greatly increased. After Charles V., already at Worms, May 8, 1521, had issued a severe edict against the evangelicals as heretics, he also immediately appointed his Councillor, Franz von der Hulst, and the Carmelite Nicolas of Egmont, as inquisitors. They began to inflict the usual penalties on their victims, banishment, &c. The Regent of the Netherlands, Margaret of Austria, in connection with the Bishop of Arras, Granvella, was especially active in behalf of the inquisition. The printing, sale, and possession of heretical books was strictly forbidden, and the magistrates were required, under penalty of loss of office, to be active in discovering heretics, and send a quarterly report of their labors to the Regent. The informers received a considerable reward for any proof (Raumer's Briefe, I., p. 164, sq.). Nevertheless, the Reformation spread, and the inquisition was not even able to prevent the rise of fanatical sects, as the Anabaptists, &c. In these circumstances, Charles believed that he would be able to uproot the Reformation more certainly by a new mandate for the organization of the inquisition after the Spanish form (April 20, 1550). (see Sleidani, Commentarii, ed. chr. car., Am Ende: Frkf., ad M. 1785, T. III., p. 203; Gerdesii, Hist. Reformat., T. III., App., p. 122). But this attempt failed also. Maria, the widowed Queen of Hungary, who in secret inclined to the Reformation, was now Regent. Deputations of citizens made her aware of the threatening dangers; she went immediately to Germany to Charles, and effected a change of the mandate, in so far that in a new form of it (issued Sept. 25, 1550), the words "inquisition" and "inquisitors" were omitted. It still was opposed, and could only be published in Antwerp on the condition of the municipal rights being preserved (Gerdesii, l. c., T. III., p. 216, sq.). That the inquisition was very active up to this time in the Netherlands is certain, but the accounts that, under Charles V., 50,000, or even 100,000 persons, lost their lives by it in that country (Sculleti, Annales, p. 87; Gratii, Annales et Historiæ de rebus Belgicis: Amst., 1658, p. 12), are much exaggerated. When Philip II. received the Netherlands, he determined neither to postpone, nor to modify, but rather to increase the punishment of heresy. Granvella encouraged him in this. The inquisition at once manifested great zeal, but its cruelties aroused a violent opposition. Finally, the cities Louvain, Brussels, Antwerp, and Herzenbusch, united in demanding the abolition of the inquisition. Their example was imitated, and in Feb. 1556, a league of the nobility, called the Compromise, was formed, which demanded the same (Schröckh, K.-G., III., p. 390, sq.).—After some delay this was accomplished in 1567. Hereupon, however, the terrible Alba came into the Netherlands with unlimited power; Margaret resigned the regency, and he now proceeded with unheard of cruelty against those who had become suspected, or whose riches attracted him. But even he failed in uprooting the Reformation as a dangerous heresy, and he was recalled by Philip in 1573. The southern and northern provinces concluded the treaty of Ghent in 1576, the fifth article of which (Dumont, Corps universel diplomatique, T. V., 1, p. 278.) abolished the mandate and the edict which had been issued against heretics. Philip now attempted again to uproot heresy by force; the northern provinces thereupon formed the Utrecht Union, sundered themselves from him (1579), and obtained finally their independence of Spain, which was guaranteed to them in the Westphalian peace; whilst in the southern provinces, many were still persecuted by the Jesuits, but still the inquisition now also disappeared here.

Of all the southern countries of Europe, Portugal retained the inquisition the longest. It came from Spain to Portugal, and was first and chiefly directed against the Jews. It became here a royal tribunal, in that the King appointed the Great Inquisitor, who was confirmed by Rome; the chief tribunal had its seat at Lisbon, and all other tribunals of the kingdom were subject to it. After the conquest of Portugal by Philip II. of Spain, it was made to endure all the horrors of the Spanish inquisition. Already in decline, Portugal, under the successors of Philip, was involved in the ruin of Spain, until finally a conspiracy brought the Duke of Braganza, as John IV., to the throne (1640), and the hope of better things for the country. John designed to abolish the inquisition entirely, but he found too strong an opposition in the priesthood, especially in the Jesuits, and he could only withdraw from it the privilege of appropriating to itself the possessions of the condemned. Pedro II. (1706) also restricted its activity and privileges still further, and another and more decided step was taken under the government of his son, Joseph I., by Pombal, who expelled the Jesuits, and so far restricted the inquisition, that it was compelled to communicate to the arrested the accusations, the names of the accusers, and allow them an attorney; further, that it dare not execute a judgment without the approbation of the Royal Council comp. l'Administration de M. de Pombal: Amst., 1789). He also forbade the Auto da Fé. After Joseph's death and Pombal's fall, the clergy, it is true, rose to new power, but the new spirit could not be again destroyed. King John VI. (1818-1826) finally abolished the inquisition entirely, and the attempt of Don Miguel to restore it failed.

The inquisition continued several years longer in Spain than in Portugal. It found its way into Spain from France in the 13th cent. Here, especially in Aragon, it was mainly employed against the Moors and Jews. Many of these embraced Christianity, others, however, preserved the faith of their fathers secretly among themselves. This was the case especially with the Jews. The suspicion of secretly belonging to Judaism was cast, by Cardinal Pedro Gonzalez de Mendoza (1477), upon many inhabitants of Jewish descent in Seville; and, at his instigation, the inquisition was introduced throughout the united kingdom of Arragon and Castile. Pope Sixtus IV. sanctioned the introduction (1478), and gave the King and Queen the power to appoint and dismiss inquisitors, and to seize the possessions of the condemned. Thus the inquisition became a royal tribunal. The inquisitors appointed by the King and Queen (1480), the Dominican Michael de Morillo and John de St. Martino, began immediately with so great cruelty, that even the Cortes made earnest complaint, and Sixtus IV. himself condemned their proceedings (see Sixtus IV., Epist. ad Ferdinandum et Isabellam, in Histoire critique de l'Inquisition d'Espagne, par Jean Ant. Llorente, T. IV., p. 347). Hereupon the terrible Thomas de Torquemada was appointed General Inquisitor of Spain, who was still more cruel, fully organized the inquisition, and spread terrorism throughout the land. Its tribunals were established now in all the principal cities of Spain; its members received the most exact instructions (see sammlung der Instruktionen des spanischen Inquisitionsgerichtes, übersetzt von J. D. Reuss: Hanover, 1788), and surrounded themselves with spies (Familiares sancti officii). The Bishops were also subjected to this tribunal. The terrors which it spread by imprisonment, tortures, &c., not only called forth complaints from the Cortes, but gave rise also to rebellions and assassinations of the inquisitors (Llorente, T. I., p. 187, sq., 211, sq.); but it still prosecuted its bloody work. The suspicion of belonging to Judaism or Islamism, of protecting Jews or Moors, of practising soothsaying, magic, and blasphemy, caused an endless number of trials. Upon Torquemada's advice, all Jews, who would not become Christians, were compelled (1492) to emigrate; a similar fate befell the Moors (1501). Torquemada, from 1483 to 1498, when he resigned his office, burned 8800 persons literally, 6500 in effigy, and punished 90,000 with various penalties. His successor, Deza, sent 1664 to the stake, burned 832 in effigy, and punished 32,456 in various ways. Under the third General Inquisitor, Francis Ximenes de Cisneros (1507-17), 2536 persons were killed, 1368 were burned in effigy, and 47,268 were punished in other ways (Llorente, T. IV., p. 252).

But in spite of the terrors which it spread, voices were repeatedly raised in Spain against it, especially when it developed all its power to crush out evangelical doctrines at the time of the Reformation. Hatred towards it had spread itself far through the country (McCrie, History of the Reformation in Spain), and when Charles V. ascended the throne, the Cortes of Castile, Arragon, and Catalonia endeavored to bring to pass a reformation of the tribunal (Llorente, T. I., p. 376, sq.) Negotiations to this end were entered into with the papal chair, and concessions were made, but they were not carried out. It directed its power now against those who openly or secretly adhered to evangelical doctrines. It published yearly an edict of denunciation, and held its chief tribunals at Seville and Valladolid. But it also directed its power against such members of its own Church as did not accept the doctrines of the Council of Trent concerning justification. But as Protestantism had been entirely suppressed in Spain before the beginning of the 17th cent., executions became rarer, and, in the 17th cent., the inquisition was active principally in suppressing books, and persecuting those who possessed or circulated forbidden books. It was first in the 18th cent. that successful measures were adopted to overthrow it. From time to time its powers were restricted, until Spain fell under the supremacy of France, when Joseph Napoleon (Dec. 4, 1808,) entirely abolished it. When Ferdinand VII. ascended the throne, he again collected the clergy around him, and immediately restored the inquisition (1814); but already in 1820 the hatred of the people was kindled against it, they destroyed the palace of the inquisition at Madrid, and the Cortes now again abolished it. The clergy labored unceasingly to re-establish it, and really succeeded in 1825-6 in Valencia. However, Ferdinand VII. died in 1833, and it was again abolished in 1834, and finally by a royal decree (1835) it was ordered that its possessions, together with those of the Jesuits and the abolished orders, should be applied to removing the public debt (Acta hist. eccl., 1835, p. 25, sq.). Since then, Spain has been free of the inquisition.

In Italy it still exists, but has not developed itself here in such fearful form as in other countries. It was introduced here in the time of Gregory IX. (1233), when the Waldenses fled from Southern France to the valleys of Piedmont. It directed its power then and later against the heretical parties, but the papal schism and the political commotions greatly weakened its power, until finally, in the second half of the 16th cent., it gathered all its strength to crush Protestantism. At the advice of Cardinal John Peter Caraffa, it was introduced throughout all Italy by Pope Paul III. to crush Protestantism. Caraffa was appointed General Inquisitor, and was so active and zealous, that many, who inclined towards or received the evangelical doctrines, were compelled to flee the country. Becoming afterwards Pope under the name Paul IV., he granted the inquisition many important privileges, and more fully developed its fearful power. It also manifested great zeal here in spying out and burning heretical books. Sixtus V. established, by the bull Immensa, the congregation pro S. Inquisitione in Rome, which was composed of the Great Inquisitor, who was always a Dominican, six Cardinals, several prelates and doctors from the Dominican and Franciscan Orders, two secretaries, and the fiscal; the Pope confirmed its decisions. The inquisition was aided with a similar arrangement in the other States of Italy (comp. McCrie's History of the Progress and Suppression of the Reformation in Italy: Edinb. and Lond., 1827), but its power was often crippled by conflicts with the civil power, as ex. gr. in the republic of Venice and Naples, where it stood under the control of the State, which secured its independence of the Pope. In Sicily it was under the General Inquisitor of Spain; here it was abolished, 1782, throughout entire Italy, however, first by Napoleon, 1808. The fall of Napoleon led to its re-establishment by Pius VII., 1814, but it did not spread far, and met with strong opposition. Gregory XVI. introduced it again into Sardinia (1833); here, and in the States of the Church, and in Tuscany, it still exists. It has lately punished the circulating of the Bible and of evangelical doctrines with imprisonment, but it stands too sharply opposed to the political and national movements of the age to recover its ancient power, and to become more than a disciplinary tribunal for the clergy.

The inquisition was brought to the transatlantic countries by Spain and Portugal, the former introducing it into America soon after its discovery, where, especially in Mexico, Cartagena, and Lima, it raged fearfully. It was taken by the Portuguese to East India, where it had its chief seat at Goa. After many changes it was abolished in Brazil and East India by John VII. of Portugal. NEUDECKER.—Beck.

Inspiration.—The Greek word for this idea, θεόπνευστος (2 Tim. 3: 16), denotes the divine guidance of our cognition. Nemo vir magnus sine aliquo AFFLATU divino unquam fuit (Cic. pro Arch. c. 8). The Breath of God is the sensuous expression for his δύναμις; e. g., δύναμις ἡψίστου for πνεῦμα ἅγιον, Luke 1: 35; 24: 49. In this sense, also, the Classics speak of a θεόπνευστος σοφία (Phocyl., v. 121), of θεόπνευστοι ὄνειροι (PLUT., de plac. philos., 5, 2), comp. ὑπὸ πνεύματος ἁγίου φερόμενοι ἐλάλησαν ἅγιοι θεοῦ ἄνθρωποι (2 Pet. 1: 21). In the neuter the word is used by Nonnus, paraphr. John 1: 27, in the sense of “God-breathing,” and it is applied to the Scriptures by Origen, hom. 21, in Iren., T. II., de la Rue: sacra volumina spiritus plenitudinem spirant.—A psychological definition of the relation of this divinely wrought, and therefore passive cognition to the merely human, is given by Plato in his doctrine concerning the divine μανία, the ἰνδρος ἰδρα. This state is the germination of the divinely implanted faculty of cognition, not as yet arrived at clear consciousness (Zeller, Griech. Phil., II., 166, 275; Brandis, II., 428). When it apprehends thought in the form of the beautiful, it utters itself through artists and the better poets: οὐ τέχνη ταῦτα τὰ καλὰ λέγουσι ποιήματα, ἀλλ’ ἰνδρος ὅτε καὶ παρ’ ἡμῶν (Jon. 533) Οὐ γὰρ τέχνη ταῦτα λέγουσι, ἀλλὰ θεῖα δύναμις, (ib. p. 534). It also gives rise to the μαντική, which requires a προφήτης as interpreter (Timæus, p. 72).—This Platonic theory of inspiration exercised an essential influence upon the Jewish and Christian. It was adopted by Philo, by whom divine and human cognition are placed, according to it, in direct opposition (quis rerum d. h., T. I., 511, Mang.): ὅτε μὴ πῶς ἐπιλάβηται τὸ θεῖον, δύναται τὸ ἀνθρώπινον ὅτι δ’ ἐκείνο δύνει, τοῦτ’ ἀνίσχει καὶ ἀπατέλλει. But he does not limit this divine influence exclusively to the divine Scriptures, and does not hesitate to claim for himself an occasional θεοληπτεῖσθαι (de Cherub., T. I., 143). The Greek Fathers also describe this inspiration as a purely passive state (JUSTIN., Cohort., c. 8; ΑΘΗΝΑΓ., Legat., c. 9). The theory of a verbal inspiration was accordingly entertained at an early date. Iren. III., 16, 2: Potuerat dicere Matthæus: Jesu generatio sic erat, Sed prævidens Sp. S. depravatores et præmunens contra fraudulentiam eorum, per Matthæum ait: Christi generatio sic erat. CLEMENS, Cohort., T. I., 71, ed. Pott.: ἐξ ὧν γραμμάτων (he means the ἱερὰ γράμματα, 2 Tim. 3: 14) καὶ σφαλῶν τῶν ἱερῶν τὰς συγκειμένας γραφὰς ὁ αὐτὸς ἀκολουθῶν Ἀπόστολος θεοπνευστος καλεῖ. Origen, T. II., hom. XXI., in Jer.: secundum istiusmodi expositiones decet sacras literas credere nec unum quidem apicem habere vacuum sapientia Dei.—But these were expressions merely of the general religious impression, rather than of a fixed dogma: hence we find that among the pre-Nicene Fathers some heathen books, e. g., the Sibylline, are regarded as inspired (THEOPH., ad Antol., 2, 9); and that they express views which exclude at least an equal inspiration of all the parts of the Scriptures. Concerning the origin of the Gospel of Mark, John Presbyter says, like Luke 1: 1-3; he was the interpreter of Peter, and wrote down carefully whatever he had heard from him, without confining himself in the sayings and deeds of Christ to a regular order (Euseb., H. E., 3, 39).—In like manner Irenæus cannot have supposed of Paul that the contents of his works were communicated to him in a purely passive condition. He wrote a work on the “peculiarities of the style of Paul,” in which he admits the ungrammatical structure of his language, and accounts for it from the velocitas sermonum suorum et propter impetum, qui ipsi est, spiritus (Neander, Ch. Hist., Torrey’s transl., I., 679). Concerning Origen, see Redepenning, “Origines,” I., p. 261. Although Origen was convinced of the correctness of the Sacred Scriptures, even to the ἰῶτα and κεφαλαία, he nevertheless admits a different measure of the Spirit in Jesus and the Apostles: hom. in Luc., XXIX., T. III., p. 966, ed. de la Rue: eodem modo et Jesus et Paulus pleni erant Spiritu S., sed multo vas Pauli minus erat vase Jesu et tamen erat secundum mensuram suam utrumque completum. He therefore mainains against the Jews that Jesus was more worthy of the faith than the prophets (c. Cels., ., T. I., p. 360) and Moses (ib., p. 337); in the p. to the Romans he discovers an intricate and heavy style (ad Rom., X., T. IV., p. 678), and solecisms in John (Philocal., T. IV., p. 93). In John, t. 10 (T. IV., p. 183), he says that, as regards the historical sense, there is an irreconcilable contradiction in the accounts of the last paschal journey of Jesus, as given by John and Matthew. The reason of this inconsistency was not merely the want of a systematic development of his own theory, but also the influence of the Jewish theory of inspiration. The Old Test. spoke only of an influence of the Holy Spirit upon the holy men of God—a conception which does not exclude the free activity of the speaker, and could also be interpreted to admit various degrees of inspiration. Philo himself admits de vita Mosis, I., III., T. II., 163, ed. Mang.) various degrees of inspiration. According to the Recog. Clement., I., 68, 69, the prophets can substantiate their credibility only by their agreement with the Pentateuch. The later Jewish writers assert the same difference as Philo: KIMCHI, Vorr. zu den Ps.; ABARBANEL, Vorr. z. d. grossen Proph., f. 3, col. 2; MORE NEVOCHIM, P. II., c. 45; Porta Mosis, opp. Pock., I., 65. "This book," says Kimchi of the Psalms, "is not inspired by the רוח ה' but by the רוח הקדש." Prophecy comes in dreams, or also in a waking state, whilst the activity of the senses is interrupted; and the mind, withdrawn from all things of this world, either sees visions or hears a voice. The Holy Spirit is active where man finds himself indeed in his customary condition, but where the spirit of the Highest moves him, beams into him, and suggests words to him." The highest degree is assigned to Moses, who speaks with God "face to face."—In its full extent, however, the Mantico theory was applied to prophecy by Monizus, in the sense of whom Tertullian, c. Marc., 22, says: Nesciens quid diceret (Luke 9:35). Quomodo nesciens? utrum simplici errore, an ratione, quam defendimus in causa novæ prophetiæ, GRATIÆ ECSTASIN, i. e. AMENTIAM conveire? In spiritu enim homo constitutus, præsertim quum gloriam Dei conspiciat, vel quum per ipsum Deus loquitur, NECESSE EST EXCIDAT SENSU, tumbratus scilicet virtute divina, de quo inter os et psychicos quæstio est. Interim facile est mentiam Petri probare. Against this heresy the direct opposite of this theory of prophecy became prevalent in the Church. CHRYS., hom. 9, in ep. ad Cor.: τὸντο γὰρ μάντειας ἰδίον, τοῖς ἐστὲν κίνηται, τοῖς ἀνάγκη ὑπομένειν, τοῖς ὠδιδῶσαι, τοῖς κλεισῶσαι, τοῖς σὺνιῶσαι, ὡς περ μαινόμενον. Ὁ δε προφήτης οὐκ οὕτως, ἀλλὰ μετὰ διανοίας νηφοῦσης αἱ σωφροσύνης καταστάσεις καὶ εἰδῶς, ἃ φέγγεται, ἡσὶν πάντα. Although with such views the human in the composition of the SS. cannot be denied, still, as regards the expressions concerning the infallibility of the Bible, the former uncertainty still continues. Augustine says on the one side (ad Hieron., ep. 19): Si aliquid in his offendero litteris, quod videatur contrarium veritati: nihil aliud quam vel mendosum esse indicem, vel interpretem non assecutum esse quod dictum erat, vel me minime intellexisse non ambigam. On the other side he says (Io. tr. I.): Audeo dicere, forsitan nec ipse Joannes dixit, ut est, sed ut potuit, quia de Deo homo dixit. Et quidem inspiratus a Deo, sed tamen homo. Quia inspiratus, dixit aliquid: si non inspiratus esset, dixisset nihil. De cons. evv., II., 28: Per hujusmodi evangelistarum locutiones varias, sed non contrarias, discimus nihil in cujusque verbis nos debere inspicere nisi voluntatem, cui debent verba servire, nec miseri aucupes vocum apicibus quodammodo litterarum putent ligandam esse veritatem, cum utique non in verbis tantum, sed etiam in cæteris omnibus signis animorum non sit nisi ipse animus inquirendus. He also says that each of the evangelists had made their narrations more or less full, "ut quisque memineral et ut cuique cordi erat" (de cons. evangel., 2, 12). Since a rigid grammatico-historical interpretation especially conflicts with a verbal inspiration, we find in Jerome, the philologist, notices of a difference of style in the biblical writers. In his proem. to Is. he says: Sciendum, quod in sermone disertus sit, quippe ut vir nobilis et urbanæ elegantiae, neque habens quicquam rusticitatis admixtum; in his prologue to Jerem.: Sermone quidem apud Hebræos Esaias et Hosea videtur rusticior. He finds solecisms in the Acts, and trivial language in Paul (ad Gal., 3, 1). Chrysostom, who had declared that all contradictions in the Scriptures would be found to be mere seeming contradictions (Opp., T. VII., p. 5), has nevertheless remarked of Paul (Acts 26:6): "He speaks humanly, and does not at all times enjoy grace; but he is suffered also to bring in his own thoughts" (Opp., T. X., p. 364). "We should not be surprised," says Euthym. Zigabenus (post 1118) to Matth. 24:28, "if the evangelists have not narrated everything in the same manner; since they did not write down immediately as Christ spoke, and may also have forgotten many things."—Nor does scholasticism furnish a doctrine of inspiration, though Thomas Aq. makes a distinction between what belongs to faith principally, and what indirectly (Summa theol., II. 2, qu. I., art. 6; qu. II., art. 2). As of the latter kind he regards historical notices, that Abraham had two sons, etc. At times very liberal opinions are expressed. In the 9th cent. Agobard, Archb. of Lyons, writes (adv. Fredegisum, cap. 12): Quodsi ita sentitis de Prophetis et Apostolis, ut non solum sensum prædicationis et modos vel argumenta dictionum Sp. S. eis inspiraverit, sed etiam ipsa corporea verba extrinsecus in ora illorum ipse formaverit, quanta absurditas sequetur! ABELARD says (Sic et non, ed. Causin, p. 11): Constat et prophetas ipsos quandoque prophetiæ gratia caruisse, et nonnulla ex usu prophetandi, cum se spiritum PROPHETIÆ HABERE crederent, per SPIRITUM SUUM FALSA protulisse; et hoc eis ad humilitatis custodiam permissum est, ut sic videlicet verius cognoscerent, quales per Spiritum Dei et quales per suum existerent; and he adds: Quid itaque mirum, cum ipsos etiam Prophetas et Apostolos ab errore non penitus fuisse constat alienos, si in tam multiplici s. patrum scriptura nonnulla erronea prolata videntur?—The Council of Trent gives no definition of inspiration. Hence various views concerning it obtain among Rom. Cath. theologians; some, like Sanctius, Salazar, Huet, Este, etc., assert the strictest literal inspiration; others, like Anth. de Dominis, R. Simon, H. Holden, etc., teach an inspiration of the doctrinal contents merely. The Church has never decided authoritatively upon the subject.—In the Luth. symbols the theory of a verbal inspiration is taken for granted, though not expressed. C. A., p. 42: Num frustra hæc præmonuit Spiritus S.? Apol. Conf., p. 81: Num arbitrabantur excidisse Spir. S. non animadvertenti has voces? Art. Smal., p. 333: Petrus inquit: Prophetæ non ex voluntate humana, sed Spir. S. inspirati locuti sunt. The Reformed symbols give more precise definitions. Conf. Helv., II., c. 1: Credimus Script. canonicas ipsum esse verbum Dei. Hodie hoc Dei verbum per prædicatores legitime vocatos annuntiatur in ecclesia. Cat. maj., p. 502: Spiritus S. quotidie nos divini verbi prædicatione attrahit. Fluctuating opinions like those of Origen and Augustine, we find expressed by Luther also. He speaks of the book in which there are no contradictions (Walch, VIII., p. 2140), and in which a single letter, ay, a very tittle, is of more account than heaven and earth (VIII., p. 2161). And yet he did not hesitate to make his well-known exceptionable expressions concerning the canon of the S. Scriptures. These, indeed, he afterwards softened; but he nevertheless still admitted imperfections and logical errors in the scriptures (Walch, XIV., p. 172). He allows himself to give to passages of the Old Test. a construction different from that given in the New Test. Thus, in Hebr. 2: 13, Is. 8: 17 is regarded as the language of Christ; Luther regards it as the language of the prophet merely (Walch, VI., p. 121). He declares Paul's argument, derived from his typical interpretation of the history of Hagar and Sarah, Gal. 4: 22, etc., without force, although it set in a clear light the matter of faith. With regard to Matth. 24, and Luke 21, on which commentators differ as to what refers to the destruction of Jerusalem, and what to the end of the world, he says: Matthew and Mark confound the two, and do not follow the order observed by Luke (Walch, XI., p. 2496). Other remarks of the same general purport may be found in his works. Calvin also, who, with regard to the doctrinal contents of the Bible, had said: Quoniam non quotidiana e cælis red-duntur miracula — non alio jure plenam apud fideles auctoritatem obtinent, quam ubi statuunt e cælo fluxisse ac si voce ipsæ Dei voces illis ex-audirentur, is very free in his judgments concerning single historical inaccuracies. In the choice of examples to illustrate complete non-resistance, Luke (6: 29) differs from Matthew (5: 40). Calvin contents himself with the remark: Diversæ locutiones apud Matthæum et Lucam sensum non mutant. Gen. 47: 31 is given in Heb. 11: 21, according to the Septuagint, which follows a various reading of the Heb. text.—Calvin remarks briefly: Scimus apostolos hac in parte non adeo fuisse scrupulosos; cæterum in re ipsa parum est discriminis. On 1 Cor. 10: 8, where Paul gives 23,000 instead of 24,000, he says: Novum non est, ubi non est propositum minutim singula capita recensere, numerum, ponere qui circiter accedit.—Bullinger admits, with the utmost freedom, that the writers of the Scriptures had committed errors of memory (see to 1 Cor. 10: 8). Bugenhagen remarks that the chronological order of the gospel narrative is incorrect, and points out errors of the Septuagint, which had at times passed over into the New Test.—Brenz, also, remarks on Rom. 11: 25, that the quotation does not give the meaning of the Old Test. text—sed sententia est eadem.—The older doctrinal works, also, such as the loci of Melancthon, Chemnitz, and Gerhard, furnish no precise definition of inspiration. Only in 1625 Gerhard added an exegesis uberior loci de script. s. Even here he does not discuss the locus de inspiratione; but in c. 14, he defends both the integrity of the script. text and the antiquity of the vowels and accents. It was in opposition to syncretism, pietism, and indifferentism that the doctrine received in the Luth. Church its complete development, and the form in which it is found in Calov, Quenstedt, and Hollaz.—The course in the Ref. Church was the same. Whilst the Swiss and French theology, as also the Dutch previous to the Synod of Dort, occupied a more liberal position in respect to this doctrine, Voetius, in his disp. selectæ, T. I., when discussing: quousque se extendat auctoritas script. s., defends the verbal inspiration in its strictest form. He says: Not a word is contained in the S. Scriptures, which is not in the strictest sense inspired,—even the punctuation not excepted; even what the writers knew before was made known to them anew, not indeed quoad impressiones specierum intelligibilium, sed quoad conceptum formalem et actualem recordationem. In direct conflict with Luke 1: 1–3, to the question: An ordinaria studia, inquisitiones et premeditationes fuerint necessaria ad scribendum? he answers: Nego, Spiritus enim immediate, extraordinarie et infallibiliter movebat ad scribendum, et scribenda inspirabat et dictabat. The controversy of Capellus with Buxtorf concerning the age of the Hebrew vowels, in connection with other doctrinal aberrations of the school at Saumur, stirs up the opposition of the Swiss Church: the result is the Formula consensus (1675), in which the inspiratio is sanctioned even quoad verba et vocalia textus Hebraici (see Art. Helv. Cons. Form.). After the middle of the 17th cent., the doctrine prevailing in the two Churches was that of a passive inspiration of the S. Scriptures, which made the writers mere “calami spiritus s. dictantis” (Quenstedt, theolog. didact. polem., P. I., p. 55; Heidegger, corp. theol., II., p. 34). Sense, words, letters, vowel-points, and punctuation, all proceeded from the Spirit of God (Calov, I., p. 484; Marsius, syntagma theol., p. 8). Differences in mode of thought and style are mere accommodations of the Spirit (Quenstedt, I., 76, etc.). The question might be asked: Could the Spirit condescend to grammatical errors, barbarisms, and solecisms? Whilst some admitted, others regarded this as blasphemy. Quenstedt solved the difficulty by saying, that what were barbarisms to a Greek were not such in the eyes of the Church (I., p. 84): others again asserted that the New Test. language was thoroughly pure and classical (Pfaffen, Hollaz, Georgi, tc.).—But this strict construction the doctrine had received in the very period in which the traditional creed had begun to totter at all joints. Milder views on inspiration had been asserted in the Luth. Church by Calixtus, who accepted the Romish distinction between a revelatio and assistentia or directio divina. Quæ in census incurrerunt aut aliunde nota fuerunt, Deus criptoribus peculiariter non revelavit; gubernavit amen eos per suam assistentiam, ne quidquam criberent a veritate alienum (resp. ad theol. Monument. de infallib. Pont. Rom. thes., 72 et 74). By, he limits this revelatio to those truths which Thomas Aquinas had designated as the proper and direct subjects of faith. Among the Arminians, Grotius in the votum de pace, and Clericus in the sentiments de quelques théologiens de Hollande sur l'histoire critique du V. T. comp. par Rich. Simon, 1685, had also limited the inspiratio to an assistentia divina. The same view was represented in England, in the Church by Lowth, vindic. of the insp. of the Old and New Test., 1692; Lamotte, inspiration of the New Test., 1694; Williams, in Boyle's lectures, 1695; Clarke, divine authority of the holy scriptures, 1699; and among the dissenters, by Baxter, method. theol. christ., 1681; Doddridge, dissert. on the insp. of the New Test. Math. Pfaff, in his instit. dogm. et mor. was the first Lutheran theologian of note who advanced this opinion. He denies that all parts of the Scriptures are equally inspired: in matters of faith there is a suggestio, in historical matters a directio, and in some external and unimportant matters the writers had been left to themselves. "Generally," adds Baumgarten (Glaubenslehre, III., 35), "in the selection and arrangement of the materials, God suffered as much of the views and mode of thinking of each writer, as was at all consistent with his design."—The greater the influence of his doctrine upon exegesis, and through this upon theology generally, the more it must surprise us that the attention of the later theology has been so little directed toward it. It would have repaid the trouble to revive and examine more closely the scriptural authority for the theory of inspiration held by the ancient Church; his authority especially in passages like 2 Tim. 3:16; John 10:35; 1 Cor. 2:13. Theologians who explain these passages without a proper knowledge of the biblical usus loquendi, defend even now not only the entire correctness of all doctrines, but even of all the reports of facts in the Scriptures; passing over in silence or forcibly setting aside whatever opposes their view. This old theory appears in all its consequences, however, only in Prof. Gaussen, sur a théopneustie, 2d ed., 1842; a work, however, which is more the product of an enthusiastic and brilliant religious rhetoric, than of profound theological study. In Germany the facts brought to light by more recent criticism and exegesis have exerted such a force, that an equally decided defender of the old theory cannot be found. Stier might be regarded as such, if we should judge him from certain expressions in his exegetical works; other expressions, however, lead to a different conclusion (see Tholuck's Com. s. Bergpr., 4th ed., pp. 34 and 4). Judging from their exegetical method, Heng- stenberg, Delitzsch, and Hofmann seem to entertain freer views of inspiration. The latter expands the idea of inspiration even to heathen authors and poets (Schriftbeweis, I., 26, 27).—Among most recent theologians, Beck has spoken very suggestively concerning inspiration (Syst. d. chr. Lehre, p. 240). He, as also Lange (philosoph. Dogmat., p. 552), opposes a mechanical separation of contents and form, of inspired and uninspired portions. "Form and contents are inseparably blended in the product of the revealing spirit." But this provides against a mechanical separation only, for it is said (p. 242): "It extends only to the mysteries of the divine kingdom, the spiritual truth, and to the external and human only so far as it is essentially related to the former." Philippi, the latest Luth. theologian, teaches an inspiratio verbi, though not an insp. verborum. If this distinction means anything, it must mean that with the thought the genus dicendi is given at the same time. But if the thought is indifferent to the words given in the various readings, may it not be asked whether the various readings are also indifferent with regard to the thought? Aug. Tholuck has treated the subject in a more popular manner in his article "die Inspirationslehre" in the "Deutsche Zeitschrift," 1850, No. 16.

DR. THOLUCK.—Reinecke.

Inspired, the, were a sect formed in Germany, about 1710, through the influence of the Camisard (see Art.) prophets Allut and Marion. Its members were mainly gathered from the separatists of north and west Germany, especially in the territory of Wetterau. Even Knauth, the Reformed preacher at the Halle cathedral, and Aug. H. Francke, were captivated by the delusion. They maintained that God bestowed immediate inspiration upon certain of their number, whom he chose as instruments of special revelations. From 1714–19, eight such instruments were raised up, mostly stocking-weavers: Joanna Marg. Melchior, Mrs. Wagner, John Adam Gruber, Schwanfelder, Mackinet, Rock, Ursula Meyer, and John Charles Gleim. These travelled in all directions, seeking to make proselytes. In 1716 they numbered several thousands, and organized themselves as "congregations of the truly inspired." They kept the agapæ; their first in Halle, 1714. Before sending out prophets on mission tours, they celebrated a love-feast, after eight days' preparation by fasting and prayer. At these feasts they used cakes and wine, and washed each other's feet. On July 4, 1716, in Büdingen, Gruber obtained a revelation of "twenty-four rules of true godliness and piety." Ten congregations were founded, upon these rules, in that vicinity. Each congregation had a leader and two co-elders. These held conferences, at which the general affairs of the society were acted upon. They had no separate office of teachers, but all the members, men and women, were required to take part in their public services, which consisted of singing and reading the Scriptures, and the written or printed sayings of the instruments or media; if a medium was present and received a new revelation, it was announced. In doctrine they agreed essentially with the Evangelical Church, but which, like all separatists, they denounced, and all fellowship with which (especially in the sacraments) they strictly forbade. In other respects their practical views were those of the well-known mystics Schwenkfeld, J. Böhm, Weigel, and Huburg. — As the high excitement required by their prophetic ecstasies could not be long sustained, most of the media soon grew lukewarm, and lost their gift, so that in 1719 Rock, alone, continued to act. After his death, 1749, the congregations dwindled to such an extent, that it is surprising that the movement did not wholly die out. And yet, after an interval of 60 or 70 years, during which it lay dormant, it recently again revived, with new vigor, under the guidance of Krausert, Barbara Heinemann, and Christian Metz. — As early as 1725 a colony of the Inspired had emigrated to Germantown, Philadelphia, in the United States; and now again, on the revival of the sect, which was opposed by the government, about 800 of them emigrated to the State of New York, purchased a tract of land in Erie county, near Buffalo, where, under the sole management of Metz, they seem to be flourishing. The colony is said to number about 1500 souls. This colony has already sent two others into Canada, and within a few years past some have gone to Iowa. — Besides these communities of the Inspired, there have, from time to time, persons arisen who claimed special inspiration. To this class belong the so-called readers, or preachers in Sweden and Norway, and Irvingism in England rests on a similar basis. — (See Ztschr. für hist. Theologie, 1854, II., III.; 1855, I., III.)

M. GOEBEL.*

Intercession for the living (on that of the Saints see Art.) is prayer for others. The chief examples of it in the Old Test. are the prayers of Abraham, Gen. 18 : 23, and Moses, Ex. 32 : 32; Numb. 14 : 13, &c. Christians are enjoined to practise it by express precept, Matth. 5 : 44, and by the example of Christ, John 17 : 1, &c., and his apostles, Phil. 1 : 3; James 5 : 16. It is involved in the Lord's prayer: "Our Father," &c., "give us," &c., &c. Those most nearly related to us, are of course to be primarily remembered, but the spirit of intercession will also embrace others. It is a special duty to pray for enemies, Matth. 5 : 44; Luke 23 : 34, and for all whose circumstances demand such remembrance. And we are to intercede not only for spiritual but for temporal mercies, yet with submission, Matth. 6 : 33. The promise to prayer, John 16 : 33, applies especially to intercession, in which the suppliant remembers that he is but a part of the body of Christ, so that the joy of others is his joy, their sorrow his sorrow, 1 Cor. 12 : 26; Rom. 12 : 15. Hence it is the perfection of a life of prayer, illustrating what Paul says of charity, 1 Cor. 13 : 1, &c. The duty is based, 1 Tim. 2 : 1-6 : 1) upon the character of God as the Father of all men, who desires that all shall be saved; thus it is made a part of worship, so that, even where we cannot lay hold ourselves we may help by our prayers to have the will of God accomplished, Eph. 6 : 18, 19. 2) Upon the mediatorial work of Jesus Christ, in which, as members of the universal Christian priesthood, we all participate, though only in and through him, who is the only mediator between God and man (Rom. 8 : 34; 1 John 2 : 1; Heb. 7 : 26; 1 Pet. 2 : 9). 3) Upon our relation to society, especially as organized into a civil government, by the will of God (Rom. 13). As Christians owe tribute, &c., to the State, so it is eminently due from them to bear it before God in prayer, and especially in times of disorder and calamity. In this way the Christian citizen best proves himself his country's friend, and may do it better service than by wise counsels or deadly arms.

KARL BECK.*

Interdict (interdictum sc. celebrationis divini officii) is the prohibition, for a stated period, of the offices of Religion, as a censure or penalty for offence against the Church. It is personale when imposed on an individual, locale when affecting a parish, city, territory, &c. It is therefore a sort of general excommunication (see Bann). The precise date of its origin cannot be fixed. Its prohibitions are met with, singly, in earlier times (e. g. c. 8, Can. V., qu. VI. [Conc. Agath. a. 506], and 10, 11 Can. XVII., qu. IV. [Poenit. Rom.], &c. Cf. Gonz. Tellez on cap. 5, X. de consuet., I., 4 nro. 19). These parts were combined into what constituted the real severity of the interdict, at a later period. Ivo of Chartres († 1125) calls it (ep. 94): remedium insolitum, ob suam nimirum novitatem; but it dates further back, as a decree of the Council of Limoges, 1031, shows.¹ — An interdict is generale or particulare (c. 17, X., de reborum signif. V., 40 [Innoc. III., a. 1199]; c. 5, X., de consuet., I., 4 [Innoc. a. 1205]; c. 10, de sent. excomm., susp. et interd., V., 11 [Greg. X., in Conc. gen. Ludg. a. 1274]; c. 16, 17, cod. [Bonif. VIII.]). If an individual is put under a particular interdict, the penalty is limited to himself; if under a general interdict, public worship may be held in the congregation where he resides, but not if the interdicted person is present (FERRARIS, s. v. interd., Art. I., nro. 40, &c.). A local particular interdict is limited to a designated place, parish; a general one to all the churches of the interdicted diocese. Every interdict is strictly interpreted, so that one imposed on a parish, &c., does not include the clergy, and the reverse (FERRARIS, l. c. II., V.). It may be inflicted a jure, or ab homine. The causes of its infliction are various, but chiefly violations of eccl. immunities, persons, or such laws as have this penalty annexed. The penalty properly consists in prohibiting the administration of the sacraments, public worship, and a Christian burial; though various ameliorations have been admitted. Alex. III., 1173, allowed baptism to children, and absolution to the dying (c. 11, X., de sponsalibus, IV., 1; cf. c. 11, X., de poenit. et remiss., V., 38; c. 24, de sent. excomm. in VI., V., 11), and Innocent III. confirmation and preaching (c. 43, X., de sent. excomm., V., 39, a. 1208), and, with certain restrictions, general absolution (c. 11, X., de poenit., V., 38, a. 1214; cf. c. 24, de sent. excomm. in VI.), the silent burial of the clergy (c. 11, X., cit. V., 38), and in the convents of the regulars the observance of the canonical hours, without singing, and the reading of a silent mass, which was, the following year, allowed to bishops (c. 25, X., de privil., V., 33, a. 1215). But then those excommunicated or interdicted could not be present, the doors of the church were to be kept locked, and the bells not to be rung. These last restrictions, however, were suspended by Bonif. VIII., on Christmas, Easter, Whitsuntide, and the ascension of Mary; only the persons excommunicated were excluded, and those who had caused the interdict were not to approach the altar (c. 24, de sent. excomm. in VI. [V., 11]). Martin V. and Eugene IV. extended this favor to the entire octave of Corpus Christi (Const. Ineffabile a. 1429, and Const. Excellent. a. 1433, in the Bullar. Magn., T. I., 308, 323), Leo X. to the octave of the festival of the Holy Conception. Other exceptions were made in favor of the Franciscans and other orders (FERRARIS, l. c. VI., nro. 15, &c.). The regulars, however, were otherwise to observe the interdict (c. 1, Clem. de sent. excomm., V., 10, Conc. Vienn. 1311; Conc. Trid. s. XXV., c. 12, de regular.).—The right of imposing an interdict belongs to the Pope, a provinc. synod, and the bishop with, or without the chapter (c. 2, X., de his quæ fiunt a majori parte capituli, III., 11, Cælest., III., a. 1190; Clem. I., de sent. exc. cit., Conc. Trid. cit. GONZ. TELLEZ on c. 5, X., de consuet. nro. 4). Any confessor may remove a personal particular interdict, canonically imposed, without reservations (c. 29, X., de sent. exc., V., 39, Innoc. III., a. 1199); other interdicts must be removed by the persons who imposed them, their successors, delegates, or superiors (FERRARIS, l. c. VIII.). The Church still holds the prerogative of the interdict (Bened. XIV., de synod. dioec. lib. X., c. 1, § III., &c.), but since the 17th cent. it has not exercised it in full. In 1606 Paul V. put the Republic of Venice under an interdict (RIEGGER, dissert. de poenit. et poenis eccl., Vienn. 1772, § LXXVI.; SCHMIDT, thes. jur. eccl., VII., 172). But particular interdicts are still used, as the interd. ingressus in ecclesiam (c. 48, X., de sent. exc., V., 39, Innoc. III., a. 1215; c. 20, cod. in VI., V., 11, Bonif. VIII., &c.; Conc. Trid. s. VI., cap. 1, in fin. de ref.) and the cessatio a divinis, the partial suspension of sacred usages, as the ringing of bells, playing of the organ, imposed by the Chapter on the Bishop (c. 55, X., de ap. pelat., II., 28, Innoc. III., a. 1213; c. 13, § 1, X., de offic. jud. ord., I., 31, Innoc. III., a. 1215, &c.; c. 2, cod. in VI. and I., 16, Greg. X., a. 1274; c. 8, cod. Bonif. VIII.).

¹ Nisi de pace acquieverint, ligate omnem terram Lemovicensem publica excommunicatione: eo videlicet modo, ut nemo, nisi clericus, aut pauper mendicans, aut peregrinus adveniens, aut infans a bimatu et infra in toto Lemovicino sepeliatur, nec in alium episcopatum ad sepellendum portetur. Divinum officium per omnes ecclesias latenter agatur, et baptismus petentibus tribuatur. Circa horam tertiam signa sonent in ecclesiis omnibus, et omnes prout in faciem preces pro tribulatione et pace fundant. Poenitentia et viaticum in exitu mortis tribuatur. Altaria per omnes ecclesias, sicut in Parasceve, nudentur: et cruce et ornamenta abscondantur, quia signum luctus et tristitiae omnibus est. Ad missas tantum, quas unusquisque sacerdotum januis ecclesiarum observatis fecerit, altaria induantur, et iterum post missas nudentur. Nemo in ipsa excommunicatione uxorem ducat. Nemo alteri osculum det, nemo clericorum aut laicorum, vel habitantium vel transeuntium, in toto Lemovicino carnem comedat, neque alios cibos, quam illos, quibus in Quadragesima vesci licitum est. Nemo clericorum aut laicorum tondeatur, neque radatur, quousque districti principes, capita populorum, per omnia sancto obediant concilio (MANSI, Coll. Conciliorum T. XIX. fol. 641. Du FRESNE, s. v. interdictum).

H. F. JACOBSON.*

Intervals (interstitia).—The Council of Sardica decreed: "*Potest per has promotiones, quæ habebant utique prolixum tempus, probari, quæ fide sit, quæ modestia, quæ gravitate et verecundia, et si dignus fuerit probatus, divino sacerdotio illustretur, quia conveniens non est, nec ratio vel disciplina patitur, ut temere et leviter ordinentur episcopus aut presbyter aut diaconus, * * * sed hi, quorum per longum tempus examinata sit vita et merita fuerint comprobata.*" Accordingly, every clergyman was required to spend a preparatory interval before passing from a lower to a higher order (cf. Dist. 59, c. 2). The same rule was previously observed in regard to the lower orders, whilst special eccl. functions were connected with them, only the length of the interval varied (Dist. 77, c. 2, 3, 9); but when their earlier character was changed, and they became mere transition grades to the higher orders, the intervals of course ceased. The Trid. Conc. vainly sought to restore the original rule (c. 17, s. 23, De Ref.; c. 11, l. c.); but it requires an interval of a (Church) year between the last lower order and the next higher one, and between each of the higher orders, "nisi necessitas aut eccl. utilitas aliud exposeat," and that "duo sacri ordines non eodem die, etiam regularibus, conferantur, privilegiis ac indultis quibusvis concessis non obstantibus quibuscunque" (c. 11, 13, 14, l. c.; c. 13, 15, X.; De temp. ord., I., 11, c. 2, X.; De eo qui furtiv., V., 30). In regard to the right of dispensation granted to bishops by Trent, c. 11, cit., the Congr. Conc. decided that to impart the ordines minores and subdiaconate on the same day was punishable (Nro. 1, ad c. 11, cit. in the ed. of Schulte and Richter).—(Cf. THOMASSIN, vet. et nov. eccl. discipl., I., 2, c. 35, 36. VAN ESPEN, Jus eccl. univers., I., 1, c. 2; II., 9, c. 5. PHILLIPS, K.-recht, I., 648, &c.)

WASSERSCHLEBEN.*

Introduction to the Old Testament.—This branch of Christian science has been variously defined. 1) According to the most external conception of it, it comprehends certain antecedent and auxiliary studies, necessary to the proper understanding and appreciation of the Old Test. as a whole, and in its parts: bibl. history, archæology, geography, chronology, philology, hermeneutics, criticism, and literature (DE WETTE, KEIL, Lehrb. d. hist.-krit. Einl. in d. kan. Schr. d. A. T.). But this definition is exceedingly vague. To the proper, full understanding of the Holy Scriptures, a great deal of preparatory knowledge is requisite; and the limitation to certain studies is arbitrary. And Delitzsch (Ztschr. f. Prot. u. Kirche, by Thomasius and Hofmann, N. F. XXVIII., 3, p. 133, &c., 138) has shown, what de Wette and Keil admit, that according to their definition, this discipline could not be ranked as a science. It is, however, furthermore inadmissible, because the branches embraced in the so-called Introduction, are rather the result of a thorough study of the SS. than a preparation for it.—This view of the subject will naturally lead us to reject the term Introduction, as an improper designation of the science. The term is first met with in Hadrian's (c. 5th cent.) tract εἰσαγωγὴ εἰς τὰς ἁγίας γραφάς, then in Magn. Aurel. Cassiodorus (6th cent.), who calls his institut. divinarum literarum, and his de artibus, &c., introductorii libri. It is next found in Santes Pagninus Lucensis (†1541, isagogæ ad ss. lit. lib. unus) and in Petr. Palladius (isag. in bibl. proph. et apost., Vit. 1568). Its use became general after the publ. of the works of Andr. Rivetus (†1643), isag. s. introd. generalis, &c., in the Reformed Church; and of those of Joh. Gottl. Carpzov (†1767), introd. ad libros canon. Bibl. V. T. omnes in the Lutheran Church. The term Einleitung was first used by J. D. Michaelis (†1791). (The name was adopted in English by Thos. Hartwell Horne, Cambridge: An Introd. to the critical study and knowledge of the SS.—The "General Introd.," &c., by the Rom. Cath. Joseph Dixon, publ. Dublin, Ireland, and Baltimore, United States, whilst attempting to disparage Horne, is scarcely more than a disguised compilation of Horne's elaborate work. *)

2) This branch of Christian knowledge has also been regarded as a critical science. Thus Pelt (theol. Encyklop., 1843) divides it into Canonicity and Criticism, and Lücke, following Pelt, and appealing to Richard Simon, hist. critique du V. et N. T., makes the criticism of the canon the great business of Introduction. So Baur in Baur and Zeller's theol. Jahrb. IX., 1850, p. 463, &c. But Lücke has missed R. Simon's real aim (see below), and a criticism of the canon would require, not only an inquiry into its origin and formation, but into the history, doctrines, &c., of the books belonging to it.

3) Introduction is most correctly to be regarded as a historical science. This view was first advocated by R. Simon, who, in his hist. critique, &c., narrates the history of the text, versions, and commentators. As he was the first to separate the Introd. of the Old Test. from that of the New Test., and thus do away with an unhistorical confusion of matter, so he merits the praise of having reduced this branch of study to an independent science. But until recently his views were not appreciated. Credner, Einl. in d. N. T., Th. I., 1836, p. 2, and Hävernick, Handb. d. hist.-krit. Einl. in d. A. T., I., 1, p. 1, adopted it, but Hupfeld, Begriff u. Methode d. bibl. Einl. 1844, became its most earnest advocate. In his view Introduction is no longer to be treated as auxiliary to dogmatics, exposition, &c., but as the history of the Old and New Test. Scriptures, as Biblical literature; and we need only adhere strictly to the idea of history, in order to secure a scientific principle, and a proper connection of the material, to the exclusion of everything foreign. Delitzsch, also, regards Introduction as the history of Old Test. literature, not only of the canonical Old Test. scriptures, but those to which they refer, and on which they historically rest.

The true idea and compass of Introduction in general, and particularly that of the Old Test., may be gathered by considering the organism of theol. sciences, with which it must be incorporated. Entire theology as a scientific exhibition of the self-consciousness of the Church in regard to its origin, nature, and aim, includes Biblical theol., which treats of the Old and New Test. as the fundamental archives of the Church, and Ecol. theol., treating of its nature and aim. The former is essentially historical, the latter partly historical, partly systematic. Thus Theology is divided into bibl.-historical, ecol.-historical, and ecol.-systematic. The first of these, again, is naturally subdivided into several disciplines: 1) the external history of the Scriptures, their origin, collection, and preservation; 2) the doctrine of their authenticity, integrity, and credibility, involving historical inquiries. These two are formal branches of study. 3) Archæology, and 4) bibl. theology of the Old Test. and New Test.; these are the material branches of our science.—In accordance with the usual conception of Introduction, it has been divided into a general and a particular Introd., the former treating of the canon, the original languages, translations, and text of the Old Test., the latter of the name, author, age, and peculiarity of each book. Andr. Rivetus (l. c.) first made this division, and Hävernick adopts it, in spite of his declaration that Introd. is a historical science. The impropriety of this division is aggravated by giving the general Introd. the first place; though Schott has reversed this order (isag. hist. crit. in bibl. N. T. SS., Jen. 1830). But this division is incompatible with the historical conception of our science. Keil abandoned it, and has three divisions. First: An inquiry into the origin and genuineness, I. of the Old Test. in general, according 1) to its formation and character; 2) its language; II. of particular books, 1) the pentateuch; 2) the prophetic books, a) historical, b) prophetic proper; 3) the hagiographa; III. of the formation of the canon. Second: A critical history of the transmission of the Old Test. canon. books: I. as to its principles, a hist. sketch of the perpetuation and study of the Hebrew language; II. as to its means, 1) an account of the preservation of the original text, a) by showing the gradual changes of its outward form, b) a description of the MSS.; 2) the spread of the Old Test. by means of ancient versions, their origin, character, and history; III. as to their influence on the contents of the Old Test. SS., in a sketch of critical labors on the text a) in MSS., b) in printed editions. The third division treats of the canon. dignity of the Old Test., and gives a histor. statement, I. of the views of the Synagogue and Church concerning the canon, 1) as to its extent and parts, 2) its divine authority; II. the consequent hermeneutical treatment of the Old Test., 1) among the Jews, 2) in the Christian Church, with a concluding summary of the result, in regard to the authority and treatment of the Old Test.—According to our conception of the science, as a history of the general literature of the Old Test., it falls into three parts: I. the history of the origin of the separate writings of the Old Test.; II. the history of their collection into a canon; III. the history of the Old Test. canon, from its formation to the downfall of the nationality of Israel. This is substantially the division adopted by Hupfeld and Delitzsch.—The method to be pursued in this science is bviously determined by its historical nature. The form adopted must be that of a narrative, and in the order of periods (not the different character of the books), so that chronological continuity may not be broken. But the scientific character of the narrative must likewise be maintained, by showing the internal connection and development of the phenomena; thus the method must also be critical. Hence the recent phrase: historico-critical Introd. (Hupfeld, l. c., p. 14, &c.). The periods must not be determined, alone, by political events, but by the epochs of Hebrew literature; though the political and literary interests of the Jews are closely allied. As the history of Israel is the development of the incarnation of God in Christ, the literature of Israel is the written testimony of that development. Accordingly, with Deitzsch, we get five periods: 1) that of Moses and the Judges; 2) that of David and Solomon; 3) that of the divided kingdoms before their downfall; 4) that of the exile; 5) that of the restoration after the exile. Introductorily to this history, it will be proper, after inquiring into the idea, name, limits, division, method, history, and literature of our science, to treat of the age, origin of Hebrew writing, as well as of the commencement of Hebrew authorship in the age of the Patriarchs.

History and Literature.—In the earliest ages of the Church there was little demand for the discussion of subjects connected with our science; the authenticity and credibility of the written sources of Christian doctrine were not then disputed. As the attacks upon Christianity were mainly directed against its doctrines, the replies were doctrinal. Even such assaults as those of Celsus upon Genesis, and of Porphyry upon Daniel, were less historical than dogmatical. The literature of our science during that period is therefore scanty. The work of TICHONIUS (c. 390): regulæ septem ad investig. et inven. intelligentiam ss. (in the max. Bibl. PP., II., 49, &c.) is hermeneutical. So, chiefly, AUGUSTINE's de doctr. christ. II., IV. (beg. 397, fin. 426; Opp. ed. Bened., III., 1, &c.; sep. publ. by Calixt., Helmst. 1629, ed. 2, 1655, and c. arr. lectt. animadv. illustr. by Teegius, Lps. 1769), containing præc. quædam tractand. ss., and JEROME's libellus de opt. interpret. genere, ep. 101, ad Pamm. But the prefaces to his exeget. works contain useful hints on our science. Less of this character is HADRIAN's (prob. 5th cent.) ισαγωγὴ εἰς τὰς ἁγίας γραφάς, first publ. by D. Hösche, Aug. Vind. 1602, 4to., then in the Crill. sacr. ed. Lond., VIII., 2, 11, &c., ed. Francof., VI., 10, &c., which belongs to Grammar and Hermeneut. So EUCHERIUS (5th cent.) liber formularum spirit. intelligentiæ s. phrases ss. ad Veranium fil. and Instructt. ad Salonium fil. II., II., publ. by A. Schott, Col. 1618, and in the Bibl. PP. Col., V., and max. Bibl. PP. Ludg., VI., 822, &c.; that of Vincent. Lerin., 434, pro cath. fidei antiq. et universit., &c., publ. by Calixt. (with Augustine's de doctr.), Helmst. 1629, 8vo., and S. Baluz., Par. 1663, 8vo., and after. More in point is JUNILIUS (6th cent.), de part. divinæ legis, &c., in the max. Bibl. PP., X., 339, &c.; Gall. Bibl. PP., XII., 77, &c.; sep. issued by Gastius, Bas. 1546, 8vo., Par. 1556, Francof.

1603; also found in Flacius, clavis ss. tract., II. Also, M. AUREL. CASSIOD. (6th cent.), institt. divin. literarum, II., in Opp. ed. J. Garet. Rothomagn., 1679, Ven. 1729, fol. II., 508, &c.; sep. publ. by J. Pamelius, Antw. 1565, 8vo., Par. 1575, 8vo.; in the pref. he calls the work introd. libri. This continued the chief work during the middle ages, the only work produced during that period being NICOL. LYRANUS, †1340, Postilla perpetua s. brevis comment. in universa biblia, Antw. 1634. The revived study of the original text, and of oriental languages, simultaneously with the invention of printing, opened the way for our science. The Reformation especially quickened impulses in this direction, although even then some time elapsed before ev. science took vigorous hold of historical, critical investigations, questions of doctrine having claimed first attention. Hence the Romish Church took the lead, in defence of its canon.¹ The controversy between the Rom. and Prot. Church about the Bible and Tradition soon called forth a number of works from the latter.² The infidelity which sprang up in the

¹ SANTES PAGINUS LUCENCIS, †1541, isag. ad ss. litt. lib. unus, Lugd. 1536, fol., Col. 1540, fol., and SIXTUS SENENSIS, †1599, biblioth. sancta ex præcip. cath. eccl. auctor. collecta, Ven. 1666, fol. and often; publ. by F. Hay, L. B. 1591, 4to.; last, Naples 1742.

² JOH. BUXTORF, †1629, Tiberias s. commentarius masorethicus, Bas. 1620, enlarged and impr. ed.: Tiberias s. comm. mas. triplex, historicus, didacticus, criticus, recogn. et add. non paucis locupl. a Jo. Buxtorffio fil. ed. nov. accur. Jo. Jac. Buxtorffio nep., Bas. 1655, fol. and 4to.; of LUD. CAPELLUS, †1658, Arcanum punctationis revelatum ed. Thom. Erpenius L. B. 1624, 4to.; vindicte arcana punct. rev. in the app. to Comment. et notæ crit. in V. T., Amstel. 1689, fol.; Diatriba de veris et antiquis Ebraeorum literis, ib. 1645, 12mo.; Critica sacra s. de variis quæ in sacris V. T. libris occurrunt lectionibus II. VI., ed. op. Joan. Cappelli, Lutet., Par. 1650, fol.; new ed.: rec. multisque animadv. auxit G. J. L. Vogel, T. I., Hal. 1775, 8vo.; J. G. Scharfenberg, T. II., III., Hal. 1778 and 86; opposed by Jo. Buxtorff fil., †1664, Anticritica s. vindicie veritatis hebraicæ adv. L. Cappelli criticam quam vocat sacram ejusque defensionem, quibus sacros. editionis Bibliorum hebr. autoritas, integritas et sinceritas a variis ejus strophis et sophismatis, quamplurima loca a temerariis censuris et variarum lectionum commentis vindicantur, etc., Bas. 1653, 4to.; by Jo. MORINUS, †1659, Exercitationum biblicarum de Hebraei Græcique textus sinceritate II. duo., Par. 1669, fol. 1686; by BRIAN WALTON, †1661, Prolegomena te Biblia polygl., Lond. 1657, fol.; especially publ.: Br. Waltoni Angli biblicus apparatus chronologico-topographico-philologicus (ed. J. H. Heidegger), Tig. 1673, fol., and Br. Waltoni in Biblia polygl. Prolegomena. Præf. Jo. Aug. Dathe., Lps. 1777, 8vo.; and by HUMPHREY. HODY, †1706, de Bibliorum textibus originalibus, versionibus græcis et latina vulgata II. IV., Oxon. 1705, fol. General Introd. of this period by Protestant writers are: ANDR. RIVETUS, †1643, isagoge s. introductio generalis ad Scripturam s. V. et N. T., etc., L. B. 1627, 4to.; MICH. WALTHER, †1662, officina biblica, noviter adaperata, in qua perspicue videre licet, quæ scita cognitaque maxime sunt necessaria de scriptura s. in gen. et in spec., de libris ejus canon., apocryph., deperditis, spuris, Lps. 1636, 4to., enlarged and impr., Viteb. 1668, 4to., 1703, fol.; ABR. CALOV, †1686, criticus s. bibl. de n. Scripturæ auctoritate, canone, lingua origin., fontium puritate ac vers. præcip., etc., Viteb. 1643, 4to.; JOH. HENR. HEIDEGGER, †1698, enchiridion biblicum ἐπερρημονικόν, lectioni sacræ, analysi generali singulorum V. et N. T. librorum, et delibato capitum argumento, præmissis quib.

17th cent. in England and France, and thence soon spread over the Church, naturally assailed the sacred sources of the Christian Religion. Thus a series of works on both sides appeared,¹ and our science took a prominent place among theological disciplines. H. AUG. HAHN.*

Introduction to the New Testament.—Concerning the idea, plan, &c., of this science, see preceding article.

The principal works upon this subject, which have appeared since 1750, are critical monographs, and therefore do not claim notice here. Among the Church Fathers, Jerome, Chrysostom, and Eusebius did special service to this science, though in an unsystematic way. Jerome was the greatest critic among them, as his comm. and transl. show, in the prefaces to which, and in his de viris illustr., much may be found in the way of a special introd. to the New Test. books. The same is true of CHRYSOSTOM'S Homilies. For higher criticism EUSEBIUS is the chief author, having furnished the tradition of the first three cent. concerning the origin and estimation of the New Test. books. Alone worthy of mention during the next period are: CASSIODORUS, instit. divinarum litterarum, containing remarks upon the canon, the literature, and one chapt. on the criticism of the text; JUNILIUS, de partibus legis div., containing apologetic attempts to show the divine authority of the SS., divisions of the books according to the style of the diction, relative canonicity, &c., &c. The Middle Ages were mainly concerned for the preservation and various translations of the SS., especially under Charlemagne. The Reformation paid little attention to Isagogics, although the criticism of the merits of the Greek text, in comparison with the Vulgate, became important; and in higher criticism, Luther, Zwingli, and Calvin took greater liberties than were subsequently allowed. Among Rom. Catholics of the 16th cent, S. PAGNINUS Lucensis and SIXTUS Senensis are named. The former wrote Introd. ad sacr. litteras, a collection of what was done in the Middle Ages on the basis of Jerome, with a section upon the canon and versions. Sixtus wrote a Biblioth. sancta ex præcip. cath. auctoribus coll., 1566. In b. 7 and 8 he collects and refutes objections to the genuineness of the books of the Bible. Modern Isagogics commenced, among Protestants, in the sphere of lower criticism, with inquiries into the history of the text, MSS., versions, citations, &c., included in the apparatus critici of edd. of the New Test. To this class belong the works of Wallon, Fell, Mill, Wetstein, Albr. Bengel. But Richard Simon (see preceding Art.) is the true founder of the science, who awakened at once a spirit of investigation and theorizing. He began with lower, but pressed also to higher criticism. He wrote: Hist. crit. du Texte du N. T., 1689; Hist. crit. des vers. du N. T., 1690; Hist. crit. d. princip. comment. du N. T., 1693; suppl. in the Nouv. observat. sur le texte et l. vers. du N. T., 1695, all in a negative tendency. This was opposed by Protestants until c. 1750. But when Lessing vigorously defended the right of criticism, the old barriers gave way. A transition is found in Semler: Appar. ad liberalem N. T. interpret., 1767; Vorbereit. z. theol. Hermen., 1760-9. He also opposed the negative tendency, as it shone forth in the Wolfenb. fragments, but still is thought the father of Prot. rationalism. Semler's influence appeared first in Michaelis, Einl., last ed. Eichhorn, however, is fully on the side of modern skepticism: Einl. ins A. T., 1780-3; N. T. 1804-20, distinguishing himself by his theory of a MS. primitive gospel. As Heyne's pupil, he regarded the SS. rather in an æsthetic than theoetiam ad notitiam cujusque libri de auctore, summa, seopo, chronologia, partitione etc. notis . . . inseruiens, Tig. 1681, 8vo., and often, last Jen. 1723, 8vo.; Jo. HENR. HOTTINGER, †1667, thesaurus philologicus s. clavis Scripturæ s., qua quidquid fere Orientalium, Hebræorum maxime et Arabum habent monumenta de religione ejusque variis speciebus, Judaismo, Samaritanismo, Christianismo, Muhammedanismo, Gentilismo; de Theologia et Theologis; verbo Dei ἀγάπη et ἡγάπη, variis Bibliorum exemplaribus, fontium hebræorum integritate, scripturæ accidentibus, partibus, distinctionibus, sensu et commentariis; de Targumim s. paraphrasibus chald., syriac., arab., pers., samarit., græcis et latinis; de Masora et Kabbala, de singulorum V. T. librorum canon. et apocryph. auctoritate in gen., et de lege, prophetis et prophetiis in spec. breviter reseratur, etc., Tig. 1649, 4to., ed. 3, 1696, 4to.; Jo. LEUSDEN, †1699, Philologus Ebr., Ultraj. 1656, ed. 5, 1696, 4to., and Philologus Ebraeo-mixtus, ib. 1663, ed. 4, Bas. 1739, 4to.

¹ THOS. HOBBS, †1679, Leviathan, Lond. 1651, fol. BENED. SPINOZA, †1677, tract. theolog.-polit., contra dissertt. aliquot, quibus ostenditur libertat. philosophandi non tantum salva pietate et reip. pace posse concedi, sed eandem nisi cum pace reip. ipsaque tolli non posse, Hamb. 1670, 4to. RICHARD SIMON, †1712, Aist. critique du V. T., Par. 1678, 4to.; Latin, Amst. 1681, 4to., Rott. 1685, 4to. This work, properly, reduced Introd. to a science. Against these assaults: J. G. CARPZOV, †1767, introd. ad libros canon. Bibl. V. T. omnes, Lps. 1721, 3d ed. 1741, 4to.; this was a special Introd.; and crit. sacra V. T., p. I. circa textum origin., II. c. versiones, III. c. Pseudocrit. G.

Whistoni sollicita, Lps. 1728, ed. 2, 1748, 4to.: a general Introd. But the positive character of this excellent work was distasteful to the negative spirit of that age. In this negative character we have: J. SOL. SEMLER, †1791, Abhandl. v. freier Unters. d. Kanons, 4 Thle., Halle, 1771-75, 8vo., and Apparatus ad liberalem V. T. interpr., ib. 1773. J. GOTTFR. EICHHORN, †1827, Einl. in d. A. T., 3 Thle., Lpz. 1780-3, 4th ed. 5 Thle., Gött. 1823-4. H. F. GÜTTE, Entw. z. Einl. ins N. T. mit Berücks. d. A., Halle, 1787, 8vo. BÄBER, allg. Einl., &c., Wien, 1794. G. L. BAUER, †1806, Entw. e. hist. krit. Einl., &c., Nüremb. u. Altd., 1794, 8vo., 3d impr. ed. 1806. G. C. W. AUGUSTI, †1841, Grundriss e. hist. krit. Einl., &c., Lpz. 1806, 2d ed. 1827, 8vo. L. BERTHOLDT, †1822, hist. krit. Einl. in sämmtl. kanon. u. apokr. Schr., &c., Erl. 1812-19, 6 Thle., 8vo. Most completely by W. M. L. DE WETTE, †1849, Beitr. z. Einl., &c., 2 Bdehen., Halle, 1806-7-12, and Lehrb. d. hist. krit. Einl., &c., 1817, 6th enl. ed. 1845, 1852, 8vo. Rom. Catholics: J. JAHN, †1816, Einl. in d. göttl. Bb. d. A. B., Wien, 1793, 8vo., 2d ed. wholly revised, 1802-3, 2 Thle. in 3 vols.; Latin, ib. 1805, 2d ed. 1815; revised by ACKERMAN 1825. J. G. HERBST, †1836, hist. krit. Einl., &c., Krlsr. u. Freib. 1840-2, 8vo. J. M. AUG. SCHOLZ, Einl., &c., Köln, Lpz. 1845-8, 8vo. By theol. of the Evangelical Church: J. D. MICHAELIS, †1791, Einl., &c., Hamb. 1787 (incomplete). E. W. HENGSTENBERG, Beitr. z. Einl., &c., 3 Bde., Berlin, 1831-9, 8vo. H. A. C. HÄVERNICK, †1845, Hdb. d. hist. krit. Einl., &c., Bd. I, II, III. (completed by C. F. Keil), Erl. 1849, 8vo., 2d ed. Frankf. a. M. u. Erl. 1854. C. F. KEIL, Lehrb. d. hist. krit. Einl., &c., Frankf. a. M. u. Erl. 1853.

ogical aspect. In this Herder's influence is visible, only his warm regard for Religion is lacking. But then already a reaction occurred among Prot. and Romanists. Of the former we have: "Ausführl. Untersuchung d. Gründe f. d. Aechth. u. Glaubw. d. schr. Urkunden d. Christenth.," J. Fr. Kleuker, 5 Th., 1797-1800. Of Romanists: J. L. Hug, Introd., 1798-1808, 2d ed. 1826, 4th 1847, a valuable work for lower criticism. Bertholdt, Einl., 6 Bde., 1812-19, also opposed Eichhorn. But of this school De Wette was unquestionably the master. In his Einl. in's A. T., 1817, he treated only of the history of the canon; of his Einl. in's N. T., the following edd. appeared: 1826, 30, 34, 42, 48. Although sceptical, his strongest opponents acknowledge his merit for precision, clearness, comprehensiveness, and completeness. Bleek: Beitr. zur Evangelienkrit., 1846, occupies the same ground, only is more accurate and considerate, and holds a more intermediate place among present critics. Against De Wette we have Guericke's Beitr. z. hist. krit. Einl., 1828-31; Einl. in's N. T., 1843, 2d ed. 1854, remodelled after Reuss. The same positive position, in a more popular form, is taken by OLSHAUSEN and HOTO V. GERLACH, by the former in his Aechth. ämmtl. Bücher d. N. T. für gebildete Leser, &c., 1832; by the latter in his introd. prefaces to his N. T., 2 Bde., 2 Ausg. 1840, 4 Aufl. 1852. In special Introd.: SCHOTT, Isag. hist. crit. in libros N. T. sacros, 1830, and NEUDECKER, Lehrb. . hist.-krit. Einl. in's N. T., 1840. Both are valuable in material. CREDNER, Beitr., &c., 1832, Einl. in's N. T., 1836, carries out De Wette's hints, with original inquiries into the sources, but is strongly sceptical, especially in his N. T. nach Zweck, Ursprung, Inhalt, &c., 841-3-7. SCHLEIERMACHER's Lectures on the V. T. Einl., in the summer of 1829, and winter of 1831-2 (publ. in Wolde's ed. of his works, Hött. 1845), display great freshness and critical talent, but are more acute than cautious. In regard to material, De Wette's manual forms the basis. The lectures furnish a good view of the state of the science prior to Strauss, 1835, and the new Tübingen school, which pushed negative criticism to an extreme never dreamed of before. The numerous rejoinders to this movement are named in the later edd. of De Wette, Reuss, and Guericke. To Baur's school belong Schwegler, l. nachapost. Zeitalter, 1846; Baur, d. Einl. in's V. T. als theol. Wissensch., &c., Tüb. Jahrb. 1850, IV., 1851, I., II., III. In opposition to his tendency, EBRARD's wissensch. Kritik d. ev. Gesch., ed. 1, 1841-2, ed. 2, 1850, is especially comprehensive; LECHLER, Apost. u. nachapost. Zeitalter, 1851. For historical exhibitions of the subject during the apost. period, cf. Neander, Thiersch, Lange, P. Schaff, &c., Ch. Histories. We must not omit THIRSCH, Vers. z. Herstellung d. hist. Standp. f. d. Krit. d. N. T. Schr., 1845 (to which Baur rejoined: Der Kritiker u. l. Fanatiker); and Otto R. Hertwig's Tabellen in's Einl. in's N. T., 1849. J. G. MÜLLER.*

Investiture, and the disputes concerning it.—Investiture is defined by Godfrey, Abbot of Vendome, to be a sacramentum, i. e. sacrum signum, quo princeps eccl., Episcopus scilicet, a ceteris hominibus secernitur pariter atque dignoscitur et quo super chr. gregem cura ei tribuitur (Tract. de ordinat. Episc. et Invest. Laicor. in Melch. Goldasti Apolog. pro Henr. IV.—adv. Greg. VII. P. criminationes, Hannov. 1611, p. 262). The right of confirming the Bishop in his office, and of conferring its benefices, pertained, even in the earliest Frankish empire, to the King. Both were performed by the King giving the Bishop a ring (as a symbol of his close union with the congregation), or a staff (as a symbol of his dignity and pastoral duties). This transfer of the symbols was connected with the political principle that all Church possessions were beneficia; hence bishops were liable to military service (Eichhorn, deutsche Staats-u. Rechtsgesch., Gött. 1834, I., 202, 505, 516; Sugenheim, Staatsleben im Mittelalt., Berl. 1839, I., 315). The presentation of the symbols involved the formal transfer of the office, and investment with it. In the earliest times either the ring or staff were used, not both. Clovis I. (508) used the ring; Clovis II. (623), Lewis the German, Arnulf, and even Otto I., the staff; whilst Henry II., and Conrad II., gave the ring first as a pledge that they would confer the staff. Subsequently, investiture was performed with both, and was then completed with the sceptre (Mosheim, Instit. hist. eccl.; PLANCK, Gesch. d. christl. kirchl. Gesellschaftsverf., III., 462). But when bishops, since Charlemagne, had to take a feudal oath at investiture, this acquired the significance of an enseoffment. Bishops were often deposed by kings, when the feudal relation ceased, and the bishops had to restore the insignia of enseoffment, with their benefices, to the kings. This prerogative of the temporal powers was early abused for mercenary purposes, which the Church denounced as simony, and the German emperors Henry I., Otto I. (at the synod of Ingelheim, 948), Conrad II., Henry III., strongly opposed the evil, whilst Clem. II. also began to resist simony. Still, during the minority of Henry IV. the abuse was fearfully practised by the regents. Then Greg. VII. (see Art.) became Pope, who regarded the political right of investiture as hostile to the interests of the Church. First of all he denounced Philip of France for its exercise, and called upon the bishops of the kingdom to resist it with all severity, even using spiritual penalties to enforce its abrogation (Greg. Epist. Lib., II., ep. 5, ad Episc. Franc. a. 1074). At a synod in Rome, 1075, he put five counsellors of Henry IV. under the ban for simony, and enacted that thereafter no temporal prince should be allowed to invest with a spiritual office. But as Philip of France and William of England, and others, disregarded this prohibition, Gregory was glad that they did not disturb him, and he directed all his energies against Henry.—Forthwith the strife concerning investiture yielded to that between two rival Popes. Gregory's party nominated Victor III., and after his early death Urban II.; the Emperor, Clem. III. Urban maintained Gregory's measures; in 1090 (Concil. Melfitan., can. 11, in MANSI, p. 723, sq.) he decreed: nullum jus laicis in clericos esse volumus et censemus; at the Council of Clermont, 1095 (Mansi, 816, &c.), he took up the investiture controversy anew. In can. 15, of said

Council, it was forbidden to accept an eocl. office from a layman; can. 16 extended this especially to kings and other princes; can. 17 forbade bishops and priests to bind themselves feudally to a king or layman; can. 18 threatened those who persisted in neglecting these prohibitions, with deposition. But Urban found it impossible to carry out these measures. He died 1099. A crusade drove his rival from Rome, and Paschal II. assumed the chair. He held the same views as his predecessors, but lacked their firmness. In England and France he moved cautiously; but in Germany, which was politically distracted, he was very bold. As Henry earnestly strove to maintain the rights of his throne, Paschal seemed to yield somewhat (Mansi, 1003). But when Henry died, 1106, heart-broken at the rebellion of his sons, Paschal proclaimed that the Church had been liberated by the death of him who had usurped its prerogatives (Mansi, 1209). The laws of investiture were now renewed at the Council of Troyes, at Benevento (1108), and the Lat. Council (1110). Meanwhile Henry V., encouraged by the example of England and France, strongly opposed these laws, retained the right of investiture, regarded the revival of the laws as a hostile measure, invaded Italy, and so terrified Paschal that he consented to a compromise (Feb. 9, 1111). This the bishops denounced. Henry then pressed on and took the Pope and cardinals captive. Paschal opened new negotiations; a second compact was entered into (Apr. 8, 1111), which by oath guaranteed the right of investiture to Henry; in further confirmation, Paschal imparted the host to Henry, when he crowned him. He then returned to Germany. But now the hierarchical party opposed the compact. At a synod in Rome, Paschal acknowledged his error, but said he only, not the Church, was bound. A new Lateran Council (1112, Mansi, XXI., 49, &c.) annulled the compact, placed Henry under a ban, which Paschal confirmed and ordered his legates to publish. Henry at once invaded Italy again, took Rome, and made Paschal flee; he died in exile, 1118. The Romish party elected Gelas. II. († 1119) and then Calixtus II., who forthwith offered Henry new terms of peace. Both agreed to yield the right of investiture, to return all property to the previous owner, and in cases of difference the Church's claims should be decided by canonical, the State's by temporal judges (Mansi, 244). Soon, however, such differences arose that Calixtus, at a Synod of Rheims (1119), placed Henry under the ban (Mansi, 250). Political disturbances rendered it expedient for Henry to yield, and thus originated the Concordat (see Art.) of Worms (Sept., 1122), confirmed by the Lat. Council of 1123 (Mansi, 273, 77, 88). It decreed that the election of German bishops and abbots should take place in the presence of the Emperor, or his commissary, without simony, freely from among the clergy; that the person so chosen should, within six months, receive the imperial fief through the sceptre, and that then he should render that service to the crown to which it had claims. In a disputed election the Emperor should sustain the just party by advice of the Archb. and Bishops. If the Emperor felt aggrieved, the Pope was to interfere. Here the Emperor was allowed to invest with the sceptre, but yielded to the Pope investiture with the ring and staff, together with canonical election, free consecration, restored all attached possessions of the Church, and promised to restore such as, during the period of controversy, had fallen into other hands, and to render the Church all needful aid in matters of complaint. Before consecration the person elected had to take the oath of fealty. Lothaire III., 1125, modified this so that only a general oath of allegiance was required. Thus the aversion of the hierarchical party to the Worms Concordat was moderated. NEUDECKER.

Ionis was, originally and strictly, that long, narrow strip of land along the Ægean Sea, opposite Greece, which formed the commencement of Asia Minor. It stretched from Phocæa to Miletus, and was early inhabited by Greeks (Ionians), who soon distinguished themselves by culture and commerce. They were the first Greeks who became acquainted with the Israelites. Twelve cities, (including Miletus and Ephesus), to which Smyrna was subsequently joined, formed a political and commercial league; but they could not withstand Persian and Roman aggressions. The Jews called these and all other Greeks, Javan (Gen. 10:2; Is. 66:19; Dan. 8:21), and sons of the Javanites (Joel 3:6; Zech. 9:13). The Greek form of the name occurs only in 1 Macc. 8:8. The LXX. erroneously have it India. Strabo, 14. 632; Pliny, 5, 31; and Mela, 1, 17, still mention Ionis as a distinct country, although the cities were then, for the most part, attached to other provinces. Hence Ptol. 5, 2, reckons it, politically, with Asia propria. The population of Ionis consisted partly of Jews, who probably were first taken thither as captives (Joel 3:11, German version; Jos. Antt. 16, 2, 3).

VAHINGER.*

Ireland.—The aborigines of Ireland descended, according to the native tradition, from oriental Scythians, who immigrated thither, by way of Spain. On Tertullian's authority, Christianity is supposed to have been planted there in the 2d cent. Before the 4th cent. missionaries went from Ireland, and in the 4th cent. churches and schools existed at Beglir in Leinster. Jerome says Celestius, a pupil of Pelagius, was the son of Irish Christians. The country was christianized by Eastern missionaries, hence its opposition to the customs of the Romish Church. Palladius, the first Romish priest sent thither, was repulsed (430) and went to Scotland. In 432 St. Patrick, who had been a slave in Ireland, went thither from Gaul, but without holding any connection with Rome. By his zeal Christianity spread over the whole country, and so many monasteries (see Columba) were founded that it was called the island of saints. The zeal which made him the Apostle of Ireland, led his pupils to become missionaries to Germany.—Concerning the attempt of Rome to introduce the observance of Easter, see Caldes.—The happy condition of the Irish Church was disturbed in the 9th cent., by the Norman invasion; MSS. and monasteries were burned, nd churches overthrown. This invasion produced internal feuds, and a state of anarchy which operated disastrously upon the Church and clergy. At this period still, the complaints of Rome refer to peculiar usages, the marriage of the clergy, baptism without chrism, and a native liturgy; but in 1152 the Irish Church became subject to the Pope. Perhaps this was the only means of saving it. In 1155 Hadrian V. authorized Henry II. of England to subdue Ireland, Henry promising to maintain the Pope's rights there. A council at Cashel, 1172, arranged the Irish Church after the Romish order. Until then confession, saints' images, chrism at baptism, the mass, indulgences, and choir-service, are said to have been unknown, whilst the Lord's Supper was administered in both kinds, and the marriage of the clergy allowed. Under the Plantagenets the clergy sustained no high character; bishops were warriors, and were guilty of public and private sins; the monks, also, became mendicants, oppressing both the clergy and the laity. When Henry VIII. endeavored to exercise his eccl. supremacy over Ireland, his measures were violently resisted, especially the attempt to appoint only such priests as spoke English. George Brown, appointed Bishop of Dublin, could, with all his zeal, accomplish but little. Under Edward VI., the English prayer-book was introduced, but not without opposition; the injunction to conduct worship in English seems not to have been obeyed. Mary speedily uprooted the little Protestantism planted there; the people were not ripe for a Reformation, the priesthood was not degraded as in other countries; and many Protestant clergymen sent thither were adventurers, whose heart was not in their work. The violent measures which these used, instead of Christian persuasion, only excited hostility. The act of uniformity, 1560, required the Book of Prayer to be used by all the Irish clergy, and again in the English language; afterwards the Irish language was allowed. In 1602 the Irish New Test. of Wm. Daniel appeared; in 1665 the entire Bible. From Elizabeth's time Rome began openly and secretly to oppose Prot. in Ireland; in this some Irish nobles and the inferior clergy aided, especially the Jesuits of Douay. Insurrections were encouraged against the English government, which compelled attendance upon its worship by a fine of 12d.; Romish worship was prohibited. Thus a strong papal party arose, which acquired power under James II., restored Romish worship, and expelled evangelical clergymen; this movement was suppressed by force. Under Charles I. the government sought to improve the wretched condition of the Anglican Church in Ireland. At the convocation of 1634, the 39 Articles were adopted, and the 104 Articles of the Irish Church of 1615, containing the rejected Lambeth Art., retained. The constitution of the Irish Church was established by Branchall, Bishop of Londonderry, in 100 canons, which inclined to more freedom than the 141 canons of the Anglican Church. Papists were not disturbed in their private worship; their clergy returned and laid the basis for a general up-rising. Puritans from Scotland also settled in the country and gained adherents. Towards the close of 1641 the insurrection broke out, in which from 40-50,000 Protestants (some say only 6000) were murdered. Under Charles II. an attempt was made to revive the Episcopal Church in Ireland, which had fallen into decay under the republic. In 1665 the Act of Uniformity was renewed, and the Corporation Act added, which required all Church and civil officers to take the oath of allegiance, and at least once a year take the sacrament in the State Church. In 1672 the Test Act was passed, requiring of officers a declaration against Transubstantiation. Under James II. the papists flourished, and many Protestants left the country to escape peril of life and property. The Toleration Act of 1689 was not extended to Ireland until 1719; but Romanists were still excluded from all offices, and even exterminating laws were passed, as that, 1694, forbidding any but a Protestant education, and fining any papist who would teach school in £20. Under Anne the Presbyterians of North Ireland received an annuity from the State; their congregations were then in a wretched condition. The relation of the different Churches to each other and to the State continued unchanged until 1782, when Romanists obtained larger rights of property; in 1780 Prot. Dissenters were released from the Test Act. In 1795 a Rom. Cath. Theol. Sem. was established at Maynooth. In 1801, at the union of the Irish and English parliaments, both Churches were proclaimed as the United Church of England and Ireland. The Rom. Cath. have more recently been released of many penalties, and tolerated, if not fully recognized. In 1790 there were 43 Domin. monasteries in Ireland. The question of Rom. Cath. emancipation, raised in 1805, was not settled till 1829; then all offices became accessible to them excepting the Lord Chancellorship and Lieutenant Governorship. The Romish bishops, moreover, are not ex-officio members of Parliament, and can wear their official robes only in their own churches; all processions, also, outside of Romish churches, are forbidden. Their relations to Rome, and the choice of bishops, are free. The chief burden still oppressing them, is that of the tithes. Since 1838 these are levied upon real estate.

[For the present statistics of the Rom. Cath. Church of Ireland, we refer to the Metropolitan Cath. Almanac, annually published by Lucas, Brothers, Baltimore.*¹]

The Rom. Cath. bishops derive their income from their respective parishes, the cathedricum (a tax upon the priests' income), and the dispensation fees. When a bishop is to be chosen, the diocesan clergy, with the approbation of the other bishops of the province, propose three ¹ In 1839 the population, divided among the several Confessions, was:

Province.	Episcop.	Rom. Cath.	Presbyt.	Other Prot.	Total.
Armagh...	617,722	1,955,123	638,073	15,823	3,126,741
Dublin.....	177,930	1,063,681	2,517	8,162	1,247,290
Cashel.....	111,813	2,220,340	966	2,454	2,335,573
Tuam	44,599	1,188,568	800	369	1,234,336
	852,064	6,427,712	642,356	21,808	7,943,940

But by the census of 1851, the whole population has been reduced to 6,515,794.

candidates. Bishops have no separate chapter, but each one has a vicar-general as assistant.—The Episcopal Church of Ireland is at present under two Archb., that of Armagh, who is primate of the kingdom, and that of Dublin. There are the Bishops of Meath, Kildare*, Clogher*, Elphin (Kilmore), Leighlin and Ferns, Dromore*, Down and Connor*, Derry, Cork*, Limerick, Cashel, Killaloe, and Tuam (those marked * are to be discontinued). The Bishops of Meath and Kildare have precedence; the rest rank according to the date of their consecration. There are, besides, 139 dignitaries, 178 prebendaries, 9 deans, 1456 parishes, 833 vicarages. The revenue of the bishops is £128,808, giving £7000 to each; the deans and chapters £85,635; the clergy £520,063, about £370 for each one, and for a vicar £68. Of the clergy, 465 have an income of £30–200; 386 of £200–400; 281 of £400–600; 148 of £600–800; 74 of £800–1000; 48 of £1000–1200; 23 of $1200–1500; 20 of £1500–2000; 10 of £2000–2600; 1 of £2800. As a partial equalization of these incomes a tax of 10–15 per cent. is levied on all above £200, and appropriated in aid of feebler parishes and the church-erection fund. Many parishes are united, and often the curate receives the income, whilst the actual duties of the parish are performed by a vicar for a pitiful compensation. The crown holds 293 presentations, the bishops 1470, Trinity College 21. The Presbyterians of Ireland are mostly of Scotch descent, and lately have shown a strong tendency towards Unitarianism. Their clergymen are voluntarily supported by the congregations, but also receive an annual royal grant. They have 452 churches, 1 synod, 5 presbyteries, and 200 congregations. The Seceders have 100 congregations. The Methodists, Quakers, Baptists, &c., have about 400 societies.—(See Beaumont, Ireland, in a social, political, and religious aspect. Collier, History of Ireland. Rheinwald's Repertorium, V., 237; VIII., 98; IX., 62; XIII., 263; XXX., 88; XXXVII., H. 1).

KLOSE.*

Irenæus, as Eusebius has well observed (Eccl. H., 5, 24), is justly entitled to his name, the peaceful, for although he occupies a prominent place among the polemic writers of Christian antiquity, the only work of his extant being controversial (l. V. adv. hæc.) he was yet filled with the mild spirit of love, and did not seek strife for its own sake. Of the circumstances of his early life we know but little. Only this much is certain: he was of Greek parentage and a native of Asia Minor, being born about the year 140. Smyrna is supposed to have been his birth-place, from certain allusions in his letter to Florinus, where reference is made to the venerable Polycarp, under whose teachings he had sat when a boy (See Euseb. h. e., 5, 20). He had evidently received an excellent theological training in this school, and was well acquainted with Greek literature, especially the works of Plato and Homer, as appears from his writings. From Asia Minor he removed to Gaul. Whether Polycarp induced him to take this step is not known, but we find him, at the
 " — of the Great Persecution, a presbyter in " — um (Lyons) and regarded as a man of lofty zeal for the gospel of Jesus Christ by the martyrs (confessors) of that place, who sent him with a letter concerning the Montanist controversies to Eleutherus, Bishop of Rome. Soon after (178) he himself was chosen Bishop of Lugdunum and Vienne, in the place of Photinus, who suffered martyrdom along with many of his people. How he filled the office is gathered partly from the fact, that, according to Gregory of Tours, almost the whole city was converted to Christianity by the power of his preaching, and partly from the wide-spread influence, which, according to Eusebius, he acquired over the churches of Gaul. Indeed, the fame of this mild and wise bishop extended far beyond these limits. The more the Church of Jesus Christ was imperilled by the persecution of heathen rulers, and false, anti-Christian speculation, the more earnestly did Irenæus stand up in her defence and endeavor to promote her inward unity and peace. A dispute, which arose between the churches of the East and West, in regard to the time of celebrating the festival of Easter, and threatened a great schism, gave him an opportunity to show his irenic disposition. Whilst the Christians of Asia Minor and Palestine held to a close agreement with the original Jewish festival whose place it took, those of the West, to whom the main point was the celebration of the death and resurrection of Christ on Friday and Sunday, believed that these days should be observed not only every year, but every week. The oral discussion between Polycarp and the Roman Bishop Anicetus, as well as their written explanations, led to no satisfactory result, yet they parted in peace and things remained in this state, until Victor, Bishop of Rome, toward the close of the 2d cent., in his zeal for uniformity, proposed to exclude the opposite party from the communion of the Church. Irenæus now appeared as a mediator, and his efforts were crowned with such success that both parties peacefully followed their traditional customs, until the meeting of the Synod of Nice (325). — Of the practical activity of Irenæus nothing more is known. After filling the office of bishop for 24 years, he suffered martyrdom along with many of his people, under Septimus Severus, in 202. — The great service rendered by Irenæus to Christianity in his own and succeeding times, was the powerful resistance he made against the seductive heresies, which, taking their rise even in the days of the apostles (Acts 20: 30; 1 John 2: 19, et al.), began to spread at the close of the 1st cent., and in the course of the 2d acquired an immense influence in the Christian Church. There were Gnosticism, — which in its transcendental dreams passed beyond all bounds of human knowledge, and, drawing largely from the various systems of heathen philosophy, particularly those of Plato, Aristotle and the Stoics, refused belief in the real historical development of the kingdom of God, and rejected the scriptural hope of its completion in a glorified form, — a Judaistic tendency, which either, with vulgar shallowness, regarded Christianity, deprived of its divine contents, as a mere continuation and appendage of Judaism (common Ebionitism), or, in a theosophic form (Clementines), as only a repetition of it on a higher and wider scale,—and Montanism, which, in its reaction against Gnostic errors, ran out into visionary millenarian schemes and a fanatical rage for martyrdom.—All these were opposed by Irenæus with firmness and vigor. Against the Gnostic pride of knowledge he asserted the rights of faith; not as though knowledge were to be despised, or ignorance esteemed above wisdom, but because all true knowledge of divine things must have its root in humble, childlike faith. The fundamental principle of his theology is, that God can only be known through God. Of His own free will He has made himself known in the revelation of the Eternal Logos. The knowledge of Him obtained from His works could not preserve men from idolatry, hence the Incarnation of His Son. This revelation has been transmitted orally and in writing. The written word is contained in the Holy Scriptures, which consist of the writings of the prophets and the apostles, and are the source of our knowledge of the truth and the measure of doctrine. What is dark in them is understood from what is clear. But for a full and certain understanding of their contents, general and particular, is required a living apprehension of the sum of their doctrines, as it has been handed down from the apostles in the bosom of the Church, which “is the pillar and ground of the truth.” This paradosis (tradition) is everywhere the same, and agreement with it is the warrant of true interpretation, whilst it in turn is confirmed by the SS., so that Scripture and Tradition in this mutual relation afford a certain test for truth and a sure basis for the development of doctrine. Thus Irenæus held up in the face of Gnostic subjectivism, a firm, objective rule, but his theory in no wise accords with the Romish traditionalism of after times, which set up dogmatic and disciplinary tenets beside and above the SS. He regarded the Holy Spirit as He lives and moves in the Church, the only true channel and organ of his activity, as the infallible interpreter of what had flowed from his own inspiration.

For a fuller exhibition of the theological principles of Irenæus, see Böhringer's “Kirchengesch. in Biographien,” Bd. I.; Comp. Neander, Ch. Hist.; Möhler, Patrologie; as well as his work on the Unity of the Church; and, lastly, Ritter, “Geschichte der christlich. Philosophie,” Bd. I., p. 345, ss.—Connected with his view of the relation between the Church and the Holy Spirit, Twisten (Dogm. I.) adds his exposition of the difference between the Roman Catholic and Protestant stand-points. His doctrine of the Church, her nature and her attributes Rothe has treated in a masterly manner in his “Anfäng. d. chr. Kirche;” his doctrine of Tradition and Scripture, Jacobi in Th. I. of his work: “d. kirchl. Lehre v. d. Trad. u. h. Schrift;” comp. Sack, Nitzsch, Lücke, “Sendschreiben an Delbrück,” 1826; his doctrine of Tradition and of the Nature of Man, Wolf in Rudelbach-Guericke's Zeitschr. f. d. gesammte luther. Theol. u. Kirche, 1842, 4to.; his doctrine of the Holy Ghost, Kahn, die Lehre v. h. G., I. Th., 1847. His doctrine of the Trinity is briefly set forth in Meier's Gesch. d. Trinitätsl., I. Th., p. 71,—more fully in Baur's Gesch. d. Trin.-Lehre, Th.

I.; his doctrine of Redemption in the Gesch. d. L. v. d. Versöhnung, by the same author; his Christology in connection with his theology as a whole in Dorner's “Entwicklungsgesch. der L. v. d. Person Christi,” p. 465, ss.; his doctrine of the Eucharist in Ebrard's “das Dogma, v. heil. Abendmahl u. seine Gesch.” See also Duncker, “des heilig. Ir. Christologie im Zusammenhange mit dessen theol. u. anthropol. Grund-lehren,” 1843.

KLING.—Porter.

Irenics is a term used to designate measures, or the science, which seek to reconcile conflicts in the sphere of Religion and the Church. The schisms between the Greek and Romish, and Romish and Protestant churches, furnished special occasions for such conciliatory efforts.—As the form of doctrine, Christian life, and its proper theory, would have to pass through various phases, before a special science covering this ground, could be formed, Irenics is of modern date, and but partially developed. That much material for it is furnished in the New Test., by the Apologists, and the numerous eccl. writers, especially mystics and ascetics, cannot be questioned. After the Reformation, also, it frequently accompanied polemics (see Art.). ERASMUS (de amabili ecclesie concordia), GEORGE WICEL, H. CASSANDER, FR. JUNIUS, must here be named with MELANCHTHON, M. BUCER, and others. Against one of these lovers of concord, DAVID PARÆUS († 1615), L. HUTTER wrote his Irenicum vere Christianum (ed. 2, Rost., 1619).—Hugo Grotius († 1645), of the Reformed Church, and G. Calixtus († 1656) of the Lutheran Church, with their followers, did much to further harmony. But the crafty Jesuits, and others, interrupted these efforts; they were derided as Babelism, Samaritanism, neutralism, syncretism, &c. Still new advocates of peace arose: John Fabricius († 1729), of the school of Calixtus, and, still more prominently, John Duræus (1630–78), of Scotland (Irenicorum tractatum Prodromus, Amstelod., 1662, 8vo., a sort of theory of Irenics (see Union).—Proposals of peace also issued from the Romish Church, especially through the Spaniard Christopher Roja de Spinola, but without avail. After the revival of practical piety under Spener, a large number of works for and against union appeared, and finally led to a union of the Lutheran and Reformed Churches in Prussia. This properly furnished the prerequisites of Irenics as a distinct discipline. (For the literature, see J. C. Köcker († 1772, Biblioth. theol. irenicæ: Jen., 1764; Winer's Handb. d. theol. Literaturg. I., 356–60).—Among works aiming rather at union and peace in a practical way, than at furnishing scientific treatises, must be named G. J. PLANCK's († 1833), MARHEINEKE's († 1845), J. A. Stark's Theoduls Gastmahl (7. a. 1828, 8vo.), Ch. F. Böhme, chr. Henotikon: Halle, 1827; Dan. v. Cölln, Ideen u. d. innern Zusammenh. v. Glaubenseinigung u. G.-reinigung, &c.: Lpz., 1823.—When Marheineke, following Planck, treated symbolical theology as a comparative exhibition of the various confessional systems, a section was added upon attempts at union which formed a valuable contribution to the scientific character of Irenics. Möhler's symbolics breathes a similar spirit, though with strong partisan feelings; Leopold Schmid's Geist d. Katholic. &c.: Giessen, 1848, is more liberal. On the contrary, such works as Staudenmaier's († 1856) Zum rel. Frieden d. Zukunft: Freiburg, in B. 1846, 2 Bde., 8vo., only serve to inflame bitter controversy. But since Schleiermacher's Polemik u. Apologetik, considerable progress has been made in Irenica, as especially appears from the third part of J. P. Lange's dogmatics (Heidelb., 1852; cf. his Philosoph. Dogm., 1849, § 20, and pract. Dogm., § 5). He divides Irenica into elementary (the exhibition of the tendency of truth and of the means of grace) and concrete (the exhibition of the operations of this tendency: missionary, confessional, social irenica; cf. § 128).—Going back to fundamentals is the true way to peace, so that bitter controversies may even promote the main object. Sin, however, will ever place obstacles in the way of perfect union, until the complete triumph of the kingdom of God has removed them. For this we must prepare ourselves by holding fast to the saying of Meldenius: in necessariis unitas, in non necessariis libertas, in utrisque caritas. (Cf. Dr. Fr. Lücke u. d. Altar dieses Friedensspruches: Götting., 1850. Dans in Erach u. Gruber Encykl., Irenik, II., 23, 1844). L. PELT.*

Irregularity—is the lack of canonical qualifications necessary to the acquisition and exercise of an eccl. order. The qualifications which the person seeking ordination must possess, are canonically determined, i. e., by canones or regulae gradually framed and adopted by the Church. They are primarily based on 1 Tim. 3: 1, &c.; 5: 22; and Tit. 1: 6, &c.; and, after the idea of a Levitical priesthood was transferred to the clergy, on the regulations of the Old Test., mystically explained. They ultimately resolve themselves into these two, that the candidate rest under no disgrace on account of crime, and that he has no defect rendering him unfit for the office. Innoc. III. in c. 14, X. de purgat. canon. (V., 33) a. 1207, distinguishes nota delicti from nota defectus impediens ad sacros ordines promovendum, and later canonists have followed this division. Earlier canon law uses various terms and definitions to designate such impediments, but since Innoc. III. irregularitas has been permanently adopted (c. 33, X. de testibus [II., 20] a. 1203).—The Greek Church has adhered, in general, to the principles adopted prior to the 6th cent. (cf. Canon. Apost. Conc. Nicaenar. a. 314, c. 9 (c. 11, dist. XXXIV.) Conc. Nicen. e. a., Trullan. a. 682, c. 21). The Evangel. Church has followed later regulations, so far as they harmonized with her principles; but all her confessions and constitutions refer constantly to the Scripture passages cited above.

I. Irregularitas delicti. "A bishop must be blameless" (1 Tim. 3: 2), and eccl. discipline gradually defined what faults constituted irregularity in this respect. Originally were such as required public repentance, in the 9th century every del. maior was excommunicatus. The rule followed was that in juris, and VI. (V., 12): Infamia patet dignitatum (cf. c. 2, Cod. de iur. lat. XII., 1, Constant.). The laws designate various offences, even though secret (del. occultus), as heresy, apostasy, schism, simony, rebaptism, surreptitious consecration, ordination regardless of the hierarchical grades, &c. (See THOMASSIN, vel. et nova eccl. discipl. P. II., l. I., c. LVI-XV. FERRARIUS, bibl. canon. sine irregul. Art. I., nr. 11. LASPETZ, in Erach and Gruber, Encykl., Art. Ordinal., p. 37, &c.) Whilst the Greek Church has, essentially, adhered to these causes, the Evangelical Church, naturally, dropped many of them.—The Romish Church escaped the disadvantageous consequences of offences by means of dispensations (Conc. Trid. s. 24, c. 6, de ref. orb.; s. 14, c. 7, de ref.) The Greek Church adheres to the ancient rigid rules (Thomassin, l. c., c. 60, § 12). In the Evangelical Church a dispensation cannot be granted, unless the congregation to whom a candidate is assigned, assents to his ordination (Moser, Allg. K.-blatt für d. ev. Deutschl. 1855, p. 411, 474, &c.).

II. Irregul. defectus. The irregul. del., already, occasions a defect; but it may also spring from special causes. 1) Def. aetatis. The rules on this point have varied. The present law of the Rom. Church requires the candidate to be seven years old, for the lower orders, when the tonsure may be conferred (c. 4, de tempor. ord. in VI. [I., 9] Bonif. VIII.; Conc. Trid. s. 23, c. 4, de ref.); for the subdiaconate 22 years, for deacons 23, for presbyters 25, for bishops 30 (Conc. Trid. s. 23, c. 12, de ref.). But the Pope may dispense from these rules.—In the Greek Church they require for deacons 20 years, for presb. 30 (Nov. Justin. 137, c. 1; Conc. Trull. c. 12). In the Evang. Church 25 years has usually been regarded as the canon. age; in Saxony 21; dispensations are allowed. The Anglican Church has fixed 23 for deacons, 24 for presb., and 30 for bishops.—2) Def. natalium (legitimorum). Illegitimacy was no bar in the ancient Church (c. 8, dist. 24 Hieronymus), but was made such since the 2d cent., though not rigidly (Conc. Meldenar. a. 845 [in c. 17, can. I., q. VII.], and Recepta de discipl. eccl., l. I., c. 416, &c.). Special reference was had to the children of ordained clergymen (Conc. Pictav. a. 1078 (c. 1, X. de filiiis presb. ordinand. vel non, I., 17), Claramont. a. 1025 (cf. c. 14, dist. 56, Urban II.) and others; see especially dist. 56, Tit. X., l. 17, Lib. VI., l. 11, Conc. Trid. s. 25, c. 15, de ref.), and the law was justified by appeal to Deut. 23: 2 (cf. c. 10, § 6, X. de renunc. I., 9, Innoc. III., a. 1206). But this defect might be removed, a) by legitimization (c. 6, X., qui filii sint legit. IV., 17, Alex. III.); b) by entering a monastery or foundation of regular canons (c. 11, dist. 56, Urban II., and c. 1, X. de fil. presbyt. cit.). This rule, abolished by Sixtus V., was restored by Greg. XV. But such persons cannot become presb. by dispensation (c. 1 de fil. presbyt. ordinand. vel non, I., 17, Innoc. III., a. 1206, cf. c. 20, 25, X. de elect. [I., 6]). The Evangel. Churches do not recognize this defect.—3) Def. corporis, based on Leviticus, dist. 24, Justin. l. VII., c. 2. Canon. de iur. lat. XII., 1, Constant. Later every del. maior was excommunicatus, and every del. minor was excommunicatus for 33, c. 1, de iur. lat. XII., 1, Constant.

that the dumb, deaf, blind (Con. Apost. 77, c. 6, X. de cler. agrotante, &c., III., 6), those having but one eye, especially if the left was wanting, (oculus canonicus, because in reading mass the missal lay on that side), the lame, epileptics, lepers, those who had castrated themselves, and hermaphrodites. In most cases, a dispensation might be granted (FERRARIS, bibl. canon. s. v. irregularitas, Art. I., nro. 12). The Greek Church adhered to the original principle, and its application was maintained by the Evang. Church. 4) Def. animæ, the deranged, idiots, &c. (c. 2-5, dist. 33). 5) Def. scientiæ, based on Jer. 1:9; Hosea 4:6; Mal. 2:7, &c. (dist. 36-38, &c.; Novella, V., VI., c. 4, &c.; Conc. Trid. s. 23, c. 4, 11, 13, 14, de ref.: s. 22, c. 2, de ref.) No dispensations were allowed, only the Pope might permit the order to be conferred, provided its duties were not assumed until this defect was remedied. The Evang. Church always insisted on proper attainments, and subjected the candidates to two or three examinations. 6) Def. fidei—based on 1 Tim. 3:6; 5:22. Persons were not to be ordained immediately after conversion (Canon. Apost. 79; Conc. Nic. 325, c. 2 [c. 1, dist. 47]; Greg. a. 599, c. 2, eod.), especially not clerici. The earlier strictness against the children and grandchildren of heretics was subsequently abated, and the disability of newly converted persons, who gave proof of their faith, was abolished, still neophytes could not at once obtain higher orders. The Evang. Church had rules against granting orders to proselytes. 7) Def. perfectæ lenitatis, applicable to those who had violated the rule: eccl. non sinit sanguinem; hence to all who shed blood in war, (Conc. Tolet. I., a. 400, c. 8 [c. 4, dist. 51], Innoc. I., a. 404 [c. 1, eod.] c. 24, X. de homic. [V., 12] Hon. III.), to prosecutors, witnesses, notaries, judges, and executioners, in cases of capital punishment (Conc. Tolet. IV., a. 633, c. 31; XI., a. 675, c. 6, &c.); also to surgeons. 8) Def. sacramenti (matrimonii), based on 1 Tim. 3:2, 12; Tit. 1:6, and applied to second marriages, (bigamia successiva), and to a clergyman's marrying a widow or a deflowered virgin (big. interpretiva), living with an adulteress, or marrying after a vow of celibacy (big. similitudinaria), thus causing an irregularity non propter sacram. def., sed propter affectum intentionis cum opere subsequuto (Innoc. III. in c. 4, 7, X. de big. non ord.). The Greek Church observes the same rules, whilst the Evang. Church finds no fault with second marriages, or marrying a widow (see Rom. 7:2, 3; 1 Cor. 7:39). 9) Def. famæ (1 Tim. 3:7). To this apply all the causes of irreg. delicti (see above), concerning other causes, see FERRARIS, l. c. 10) Def. libertatis. Slaves and bondsmen must have the consent of their masters (Can. Apost. c. 82, c. 1, 2, 4, seq. 12, 21, dist. 54, c. 37, Can. 17, qu. IV. Tit. X. de servis non ord. I., 18); when ordained thus they become free; if ordained without their master's knowledge, they may be reclaimed within a year (Nov. Just. 123, c. 17, Auth. Si servus (after c. 37), Cod. de pisc. et cler. I., 3). German Canon law maintains this principle. In like manner those in civil service were to obtain release before entering the clergy; persons having accounts to settle were first to adjust them; married persons to obtain the consent of their wives, who were then to take a vow of chastity or to enter a monastery. Greek law allows presbyters to marry, but before any one can be consecrated a bishop, his wife must enter a monastery. Children must have their parent's consent until their puberty (14th year).—(See THOMASSIN, l. c. P. II., l. I., c. 62-92. PHILLIPS, K.-recht, I., § 46-53). H. F. JACOBSON.*

Irving, Irvingites.—Irvingism arose upon the soil of Anglican Christendom. Its origin is closely connected with a more general movement of Christian life, which has taken place in England since the beginning of the present century. To the man after whom it is named it owes its first impulse, though not its general character.—The increased religious activity which, occasioned by the political convulsions near the close of the last century, took place in English and Scotch Protestantism, followed a predominantly practical direction. The work of Christianizing the entire popular life was carried on with the utmost zeal. Bible and missionary societies were very active. The condition of the external world being anything but satisfactory, thousands manifested an impatient longing for a richer effusion of the Spirit of God and for the complete establishment of the kingdom of God through the second advent of Christ. This was then, and is now, characteristic of the religious revival of England and Scotland, so far as parts of the current have not been led into the High Church channel. Prayer-meetings were general among the different Protestant denominations. Haldane Stewart, in a special work, exhorted Christians by prayer-meetings to achieve a new pentecost. Hence even before Irvingism was known, this "apocalyptic tendency" was in existence, and is still cherished by large numbers of the clergy and laity.—Edward Irving was born Aug. 15, 1792, at Annan, county of Dumfries, Scotland; and was piously educated by his parents. Though not very successful in youth in acquiring knowledge, he had a special talent for mathematics. Having devoted himself to theology, he gathered a rich store of knowledge in the general sciences and in the theology of his country; though there are no indications to show that his researches in theology were either original or systematic. An honest, warm, and ardent religious disposition no one has ventured to deny to him. Whenever he had occasion to speak, this inward disposition poured itself forth in a rich and at times excessive imagination, and in very forcible and apt language. His personal appearance, tall, handsome, and full of vivacity, added to the impression. Chalmers learned to value very highly his character and eloquence, and in 1819 received him as his assistant at Glasgow. But he did not attract any attention until 1822, when a Scotch congregation called him as their pastor.—His popularity as preacher in London, especially among the higher and highest classes, was extraordinary. His aim was to call to repentance,—to obedience unto the commandments and practical precepts of the sacred Scriptures; and he taught that the people could be elevated above their depraved condition only by the ordinances and organization appointed in the word of God. His sermons and writings were attractive from their natural freshness, forcible originality and exuberant language; but no less on account of the ease with which he could move in the different spheres of life, especially in the political and higher spheres. In this point he was perhaps somewhat too self-complacent. His exuberance becomes at times too profuse. But a more important point is, how he viewed at that time already the chief elements of Christianity. Along with the pungent, direct, sincere, powerful, and at times stormy exhortations and warnings which were constantly pouring from his lips, he was wanting in a profound, calm and simple view both into the state which Christianity premises, viz.: an original sinful nature which still cleaves to man; and into the deep and complete, although more concealed, gifts of atoning, silently and slowly, yet surely sanctifying, and perfecting grace. As regards the former, he aimed rather "to convince man of his high dignity and likeness unto God, in order to base upon it admonitions to lead a life corresponding with this high origin: as regards the other, he referred far less to the grace of sanctification which we already possess, than to the Ruler and Judge who shall come again. To this his mind was enthusiastically and impatiently directed; and he warned all not to be deceived by the calm which precedes the approaching storm, and admonished to observe the signs of the times in the secret, raging, anti-Christian efforts of the revolutionaries, in the citizen-kingship, and in the ever-increasing power of the popular voice; and to be prepared for the great crisis in Church and State, and for the storm which was to burst upon the whole world. — A theoretical interest seems never to have led him to profounder doctrinal investigations. Predestination he eviscerates without entering more closely upon the doctrine. But though his mind was totally unqualified for forming clear and well-defined doctrinal conclusions, he was, nevertheless, by a supposed practical religious interest, led to attack one of the leading doctrines of Christianity; for after 1827 he denied the "sinlessness of Christ:" i. e., for the sake of representing the human nature of Christ as a real one and in all things like our own, he asserts that like ours it was possessed of inward sinful inclinations, only Christ never yielded to them. As to the practical religious interest by which he was led to this, he was undoubtedly thoroughly sincere: of what advantage, he says, is a God-man to us, who has not become really like us, and whom we cannot therefore really follow? But it is certain also that, following up his premises blindly and with a degree of fanaticism, he had no regard to the necessity of an atonement by a pure Christ, before we can follow him: and that on account of those premises he was also utterly ignorant of what belongs to the communication of a new moral life. For we also miss in him the true idea of regeneration as a new creation from above: not a new person is created; not even something essentially new is conceived into the old person; regeneration is merely "the maintenance of the old substance in its present condition by the operation of the invisible Godhead." (From Irving's work: On the human nature of Christ in HOHL's Bruchst. u. d. Leb. Irv.). Christ himself, he asserts, was thus regenerated; only that in his case this operation upon his fallen flesh took place at the very beginning, and that he consequently from the beginning triumphed over the lusts of this flesh: "From the first moment he found himself in the condition of a regenerated man," and the Spirit of God dwelling in him with measure "thus made his regeneration effectual to the perfection of his faith in his sanctity and to the complete subjection of the desires of fallen humanity." He became holy by the same means as the regenerated Christians: only on this condition can he be called the "head of regeneration." Of course, Irving must then make a difference between the operation of the Spirit which takes place in Christians, and that which took place in Christ, in order that the latter may not become a mere outward pattern. Upon Christ the Spirit operates directly, but upon us through Christ (in his later work: "The Church as furnished with holiness and power;" transl. in THEOL. liter. Anzeig. 1848, p. 256.). — The want of doctrinal precision in these theories is evident: e. g., in the fact that he makes no difference between natural infirmity and natural propensities, and between sinfulness and sinful propensities: if "the bodily propensities require daily their natural food;" the want of the things required to satisfy these furnishes already an inward enticement to sin (see HOHL, pp. 90, 91). But Irving is only the more violently positive, and anathematizes every one who in spite of him teaches that Christ had taken upon himself the unfallen nature of Adam. — This confirms what has already been said concerning the earlier character of his preaching and doctrine; and it also furnishes us with the premises of his views of Christian perfection, which he soon after proclaimed. In order that Christ might be an example to us, his nature had to be sinful: but consequently, also, his entire example must be repeated in us: hence we, also, must perform miracles and works like him (HOHL, p. 157, etc.). The excessive egoism with which Irving formerly already anathematized his opponents, is the same as that with which he adhered to his subsequent views, and required their adoption by others. — Irving took part in a society of men which had been formed for social prayer and the examination and verification of Scripture prophecies, especially of the Apocalypse. There were more than 40 members, mostly clergymen, who met, from Nov. 1826, at the country-seat of Drummond, the banker. Some of these, however, separated from it on account of Irving's Christological views. In 1830 the news arrived from Scotland that at port Glasgow and other places, the prayers for the outpouring of the Spirit had been heard, and that the gift of speaking in tongues and of prophecy had been renewed. The news was joyfully received, especially by Irving; and he had scarcely begun to prepare his adherents to expect similar outpourings, when similar phenomena manifested themselves in social meetings held at first at his ouse, and after Oct. 5, 1831, in his oburch in legent square. "Strange and unintelligible ounds," says Hohl, "were uttered with such a orce of voice and emphasis, that fear and terror eized me." Neighbors in Regent square de- scribed these sounds to the author as so fearful, hat some of those who heard them fainted. At imes also there were intelligible expressions, nd sometimes speeches of the length of 2 or 3 ours. There were calls to repentance, of judg- ment upon England and its church, which had ecome a Babel, and testimonies in favor of rving, the faithful shepherd. The speakers, eprived of self-control and of clear conscious- ness, were seized with violent muscular contor- ions; this was especially the case with females. —Irving no longer doubted the divine origin of hese phenomena, and he was most zealous in rringing down the Spirit more generally by incessant prayers, preaching, warning, and en- ouraging. But being accused of having vio- ated the doctrine and form of worship of the Scotch church by permitting and even exciting hese so-called prophesyings, and being found guilty by the Presbytery of London, he had in 1832 to vacate his church. A congregation of his own followed him to a new chapel. He now, also, declared the Protestant churches as Babel, as he had formerly only the Roman (he had earnestly protested against Catholic emancipa- ion). Through his own agency the Church of Christ was to be restored conformably to the will of the Lord, with a free exercise of spiritual gifts and the government prescribed by the Lord in the Scriptures. He himself received the apocalyptic title of angel. His adherents soon became so numerous, that in a short time even congregations could be formed in London, he models of the future perfect and universal church, and themselves foreshadowed in the even churches of the Apocalypse. But Irving's career was at an end. In March, 1833, he was cited before the Presbytery of Annan, which had been ordered by the General Assembly to investigate his case. The charge against him had reference to his doctrine concerning the person of Christ. Irving appeared; but not to defend himself or calmly to substantiate his views, but loudly to threaten with the vengeance of God. The Presbytery found him guilty, and deposed him from the ministry of the Scotch Church. Deeply suffering, he once more in the fall of 1834 visited his old home, where he died on the night of the 6th of December. He is described at this time as sadly changed; his face haggard, his beard white, his eyes filled with a wild fire, though still with a certain attractiveness. The most important of his former friends, men like Chalmers, still loved and respected him; though they had to lament him as a man who had fallen into grievous error. — The leading peculiarities of Irvingism are: 1, the outpouring of the Spirit and his free manifestation among the members of the Church; 2, the number and nature of ecclesiastical offices. The former, which might have degenerated into a wild spiritualism, clothed itself, remarkably enough, in a stiff formalism of office, which in course of time made the second the leading peculiarity. — It is not known how far Irving took part in the establishment of these offices, nor how far in the part he took he acted independently or was influenced by others. We first hear of the appointment of two apostles, the first of them a certain Cardale; they had been designated as such by the prophetic spirit as early as 1832. The Spirit next impelled the first apostle to impart by the laying on of hands the office of evangelist to one of a number of young men who preached in the streets to the people. This first apostle, moreover, inspired by the Spirit, drew up the complete order of a separate Church. But during the lifetime of Irving only four other apostles had been called; nor are they the leading persons, but Irving himself. The number of twelve was not completed until after his death, when for the first time official, not personal, supremacy becomes a fact. With a surprising rapidity the so-called Apostolical Church, now thoroughly organized, extended itself. In 1835 the office bearers held their first council in London; the continent was divided among the apostles, and they went out to their fields, not indeed as heralds preaching from the housetops, but more as secret spies. In the larger cities of England, Scotland, and Ireland, other congregations had been formed at an early date; the number of prophets had arisen to 100: a number of tracts were written for the dissemination of Irvingism, carefully, however, as yet concealing its peculiarities. Its doctrines and demands were unfolded more boldly in an address to all the clerical and secular heads of Christendom. — The ultimate cause of the movement is the longing for deliverance from the present weakness and degeneracy of Christendom, and to attain to a speedy perfection in the kingdom of Christ, which he is to establish at his second coming. That this perfection is at hand is proven by the sayings of the prophetic spirit, and the new outpouring of the Spirit. But the cause of the sad condition of the Church is, that she lost the highest and most important offices instituted by Christ; offices with which the proper government of the Church, the continuance of the Spirit and illumination necessarily ceased, viz.: the offices of apostles and prophets, to which two offices, those of evangelists and pastors, must be added. Through these four offices Christendom would have been led, according to Eph. 4: 11–13, towards a speedy perfection. But the Church was not faithful, did not sufficiently strive after perfection, became languid in her prayers for the second advent of Christ, and at last forgot them altogether. In punishment of which the apostleship became extinct, and there existed no longer a Divinely appointed organ to maintain and represent the unity of the Church, and to be the channel of the Spirit; although God, in his mercy, in order that the Church itself might not become extinct, suffered that a certain official grace should still adhere to the episcopal laying on of hands, and that a certain grace should also still reside in the sacraments wherever they were administered by ministers ordained by bishops. The Catholic Church indemnified itself for the loss of the apostleship by transferring its functions to the bishops and the Pope; she represents the important truth that the Church needs such a united organ to govern it, but substitutes a creation of its own for that appointed by God. She also exalts the prerogative of the Church to the prejudice of the direct relation of the individual Christian to God and Christ. The latter has again been justly asserted by Protestantism; but the reformers ought to have done this only so far as might serve to reawaken the consciousness of adoption in the hearts of believers. They on the contrary allowed rights to the individual which conflicted with the order of God; with reference to their superiors they arrogated to themselves undue official functions, when they ought to have obeyed, leaving the result to God: it was, moreover, superlative arrogance to act as if they had a mission to the entire Church. Protestantism gave rise to the excessive demand of the right of private judgment: this is the root of that revolutionary spirit, which now opposes itself to all Divine order. But before the final judgment God has again graciously visited his people by the outpouring of the Spirit and the restitution of the offices.—The apostleship is again instituted with its fixed number of bearers; and with them the prophets form the foundation of the Church. The apostles are the hand of the Lord; they, and they alone, possess “supreme jurisdiction and power,” and the right of the imposition of hands through which alone the Holy Spirit is really communicated. The prophets are the eye of the Lord, whose concealed will they reveal; but in this they do not themselves possess an infallible judgment as regards the real character and meaning of their revelations. These must be submitted to the apostles, who must examine them and then declare what is to be regarded as the doctrine and command of God. The prophets alone can call, but the apostles ordain to the different offices.—Subject to the apostles are the evangelists and pastors. The evangelists gather into the congregation: within the individual congregations the “pastors and teachers” exercise “spiritual government.”—This brings us to the congregational government. At the head of it stands the “angel or bishop,” with whom six elders form the “sevenfold eldership, the order of God for spiritual light.” Subordinate to them may be other elders as circumstances may require; this is the priesthood or pastorship of the congregation. Next in order is the diaconship, also ordained by apostolical imposition of hands, and the chief of which are the wardens; and, finally, sub-deacons and deaconesses. The angel, priests, and wardens are the church council. The deacons may be elected by the members; priests and angels are appointed “from above.” Deacons who desire to become priests, and priests whom the angel regards as qualified for advancement in office, are presented during the celebration of the Eucharist in presence of a prophet, and a special pause made for the revelation of the prophetic spirit. All these offices are strictly defined in all their functions according to the will of God.—This hierarchy is to be independent also as regards its temporal support; for the tithes, as well as the celebration of the seventh day, are a permanent command of God.—These offices have been again restored by the Spirit; their design is to transmit the Spirit to the congregation and to govern the latter. The chief means of this transmission are Baptism and the Lord's Supper. Irvingianism boasts that it comprehends these sacraments in their truth as “real acts” of Christ, and as really “effecting what they signify.” It distinctly teaches regeneration in baptism; in the Lord's Supper we must simply believe that the bread is the body, etc. What here distinguishes Irvingism from Protestantism is, that the word finds no place as a means of grace along with the sacraments; that the real “sealing by the Holy Spirit” takes place not in baptism, but in confirmation by means of the apostolical imposition of hands; and that, regarding the Lord's Supper, or rather the “Eucharist,” as the chief part of Christian worship, it places the principal stress not upon the distribution of the body of Christ to the recipients, but upon the presentation of it as an offering of thanks by the hands of the priest.—The admission of children to the communion is also advocated.—Besides the two “sacraments especially necessary to salvation,” confirmation, ordination, and extreme unction, are also regarded as such. Private confession is recommended, absolution imparted by imposition of hands, and fasting enjoined before the reception of the latter. The forms of worship are also distinctly prescribed, and are regarded as essentials; in the eucharistic liturgy a large part has been taken from that of the ancient Greek Church. Besides the eucharistic offering, the public worship consists mostly in prayers. The use of hymns is wanting almost entirely.—However profuse in matters pertaining to its offices and worship, Irvingism shows little interest in those doctrines which are generally regarded as most important. It does not prosecute further the Christology advanced by Irving, but stops with the vague statement that we need a Christ who is really like us. The doctrine of justification is carefully avoided even when the corruption of the Romish Church and the peculiarities of Protestantism are discussed: so also the questions concerning freedom and grace. This indeed is quite natural, since less importance is attached to the atonement and the new creation of the will, than to the perfection of sanctification and the gifts of the Spirit.—Assured that, on account of their offices, the Spirit abides with them, they await the second advent of Christ and of his kingdom. Their views on this point are chiliastic; the kingdom of Christ is preceded by the resurrection of the just, and the latter by the full manifestation of Antichrist. At the coming of Christ those believers who are living will be lifted up into the air to meet their Lord. But before this coming a great testimony, a “work of preparation,” must take place.—All this is nothing new: but it is new, that this lifting up of the saints is to take place before the full manifestation of Antichrist, whose persecution the “Apostolical” Church is in this way to escape; and that this testimony is Irvingism, by the offices of which the preparation is to be effected.—Being called upon for the evidence of its peculiar doctrines and demands, Irvingism at first referred to its miracles. Subsequently it answered, that the "truth itself" was its own principal evidence: that from the labors and works of the apostles we ought to come to the same conclusion as did the first Apostles with reference to Paul (Gal. 2: 7-8). But what that is specifically apostolical did the labors of these men manifest? And what that is really new did they reveal, except the doctrine of the offices? The latter is evident to the spiritually-minded from the Scriptures themselves. The Old Test. types, especially those of the tabernacle, are the principal evidences. Much weight is attached to the word "till" in Eph. 4: 13., to prove that the four offices (4: 11) ought to have continued until the Church was perfected. The fundamental question whether the labors of the Apostles, for which no episcopacy can be substituted, are not really continued in their words, is nowhere touched upon: but it would of course be denied, since not the preaching of the living word, but government and the imposition of hands are regarded as specifically apostolical functions.—Irvingism has made some, though no considerable advance in Germany. The year 1848 was especially favorable to its designs. Berlin and Basle are their principal centres, and W. J. Thiersch is their most important convert. Congregations are found in East Prussia (at Memel, and especially at Königsberg), Posen, Pomerania (in and around Neustettin), Silesia (at Liegnitz), and also in Saxony (Burg).—Around Marburg there is a tendency to Irvingism among the peasants. It is especially remarkable that missionaries labored with some success in the diocese of Augsburg, among mystically inclined Catholics and even priests. In England the "Apostolical congregations" seem, from all accounts, to be declining. It seems that at no time they numbered more than 1000 members. In America, Prof. Schaff ("Amerika," Berl., 1854) knows of but two congregations in the State of New York. In Germany, also, they have evidently passed their culmination.—We must yet mention that after its fundamental views had been fixed, there were no further doctrinal alterations. Fanatical excesses of the laity were restrained by official discipline.—Works of Irvingites: especially important the above "Address to the heads of Christendom:" English works in Rheinwald. Acta hist. eccl., 1837, pp. 793-867." The Liturgy and order of public worship for the Apostolical Church. Thiersch, die Kirche im apost. Zeitalter, etc., 1852; Böhm, Schatten u. Licht in d. gegenw. Zust. d. Kirche, 1855.—Concerning Irving and Irvingism: M. Hohl, Bruchst. aus d. Leb. u. l. Schrift. Irvings, 1839; W. Wilks, Ed. Irving, and eccles. and liter. biography, Lond., 1854.

JULIUS KÖSTLIN. — Reinecke.¹

Isaac, the son which Sarah bare Abraham in their old age. His name is derived from the laughter (Gen. 17: 17; 18: 12) of Sarah at the announcement of his birth, and the joy (21: 6) occasioned by his birth; though it doubtless has allusion, also, to the cheerful, happy temper of this patriarch. This agrees, too, with his character, which was more inclined to quiet enjoyment, than energetic activity. Hence he seems to have confined his abodes to Lahai-roi (25: 11), Gerar, and Mamre. He was led to Gerar by a famine (26: 1), and long remained there, until a desire to be near the sepulchres of his parents impelled him to move to Mamre, where he dwelt until his death (35: 27). His love of a permanent abode, fully harmonizes with the tender quiet nature exhibited in his history. In youth we see him wholly submissive to the will of God (22: 7, 10). The same passive temper is displayed in his marriage with Rebecca, with whom he lived in happy wedlock until death. Following, as an independent chief, in the footsteps of his father, he won general respect rather by his peacableness and concessions than by any vigorous course of conduct (Gen. 26). Still he maintained his dignity, so that the Philistine king counted it an honor to be in league with him. His wealth, also, greatly increased. The points of resemblance between his history and that of Abraham, might easily occur in the circumstances. In his conduct towards his sons, his leading traits of character appear; his pliancy, however, led to a family discord (Gen. 27). Still he exhibits a consciousness that his calling was to preserve the theocracy introduced by Abraham (Gen. 27; Hebr. 11: 18, 20). He attained an age of 180 years, though from his 130-40th year, his sight failed and he suffered from other infirmities. As progenitor of the Edomites and Israelites, he formed the bond of that closer relationship which both nations sustained to each other, and which, despite the constant jealousy of Edom, ultimately led to a sort of amalgamation of both.—If the life of Isaac is not as eventful as that of Abraham and Jacob, it produces a more beneficial impression, in view of his calm fidelity to the spiritual trust committed to him.—The modern attempts to treat these narratives as myths, are in conflict with their matter-of-fact style, and the evident progress they exhibit in the mode of life. We find Isaac living in a more costly style than Abraham (Gen. 21: 29, &c., and 26: 30; 27: 4, 9, 25; 14: 18, and 18: 7, 8). Esau, likewise, has various costly garments.

VAHINGER.*

Isaiah. The prophet, who, under the name of יְרֵמְיָהּ, in the LXX. Ἰσαίας, opens the series of the so-called Great Prophets, has ever been regarded as eminently worthy of the title, ὁ προφήτης ὁ μέγας (Jes. Sirach. 48, 22), indeed, the greatest of all, προφήτων μέγιστος (Euseb. demonstr. evang. 2, 4), who have seen visions and spoken by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. Both Christians and Jews agree in awarding him this exalted rank. It rests, however, on the supposition that he was the sole author of the comprehensive work which bears his name. But the "higher criticism" of modern times, begun by Semler and carried forward by Eichhorn, has determined otherwise, and assigned a large portion of it to another source. This affects particularly the last division (chaps. 40-66), which

¹ The quotations from the works of Irving or of Irvingites, in the above article, are translated from German translations, the originals not being at hand for reference. — Translator.

foretells the deliverance of Israel from the Babylonian exile by Cyrus. The reasons for the opinion are derived from internal evidence. Yet, even admitting two authors, one known and the other unknown, the majority of critics give the highest place to the former.—As regards the person and private life of Isaiah, who, according to the title of the canonical book, was called the son of Amoz, and prophesied under Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, Kings of Judah, we know but little. The time and place of his birth are not recorded. The first we learn of him, is his consecration to the prophetic office in the year in which King Uzziah died (c. 6: 1). Jerusalem was the theatre of his activity, but whether he was born there cannot be certainly determined. He calls himself Isaiah (20: 3) and refers to the consolation, which lies in this name, "Salvation of God," (8: 18)—a name borne at an earlier period by a son of the chief musician Jeduthun (1 Chron. 25: 3, 15), and by one of King David's treasurers (1 Chron. 26: 25); it is also found in the times of the captivity, in the list of those who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra 8: 7, 19; Neh. 11: 7). In the latter passage it occurs in the abbreviated form, יִשְׁעִי, which the Rabbins have used in the title of the present book. Of the father of the prophet we know nothing, save that he was called Amoz (c. 1: 1; 2: 1; 20: 2), which became Ἀμὸς in the LXX., and stands both for יְדֻתָּן and דָּוִד, the Shepherd-prophet; the two have been confounded by several of the Church-Fathers. According to a Jewish tradition, which arose probably from a similarity in sound, Amoz is said to have been a brother of King Amashiah. Concerning Isaiah himself nothing more is told us except that he was married (8: 3), and had two sons, to whom he gave prophetic names (7: 3; 8: 3, 18), Shear-Jashub and Maher-shalhash-baz. Immanuel (7: 16; 8: 8), whom many expositors also count, does not belong to the number (comp. Umbreit, Comm. c. 7, and Stud. u. Krit. 1856, No. 3). Among the various legends respecting our prophet, found in Jewish writers and the Christian Fathers, such as that he was the tutor of Prince Hezekiah, and appointed by him royal annalist, and the like, that appears the most important, which makes him die the death of a martyr under Manasseh. It first occurs in the Gemara to the Mishna (tract. Gebamoth IV.), and has been faithfully transmitted by the later Rabbins. The King is said to have condemned him, because he asserted, in contradiction with Ex. 33: 20, that he had seen the Lord sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up, and made use of other rash expressions; but just at the moment, when he had uttered the name of God, the prophet was devoured by a cedar, which opened of its own accord; whereupon, the king commanded the tree to be sawn in pieces, and when the saw reached his mouth he gave up the ghost (see the literature on this subject in Gesenius I., p. 11). From the husk of this legend, which forms the basis of the remarkable pseudepigraphic work, the ἀναβασις Ἰσαίου, we might feel inclined to extract the kernel, that the prophet was executed under that king, who cruelly shed much innocent blood in Jerusalem (2 Kings 21: 16), could we account for the entire silence of the historic record.—The superscription, even if it cannot as a whole be referred with certainty to Isaiah himself, contains at least the most ancient evidence concerning the duration of his prophetic office, which extends only through the reign of King Hezekiah, and was most active in the 14th year of that reign, when Sennacherib marched from Assyria to Jerusalem, besieged the city and was obliged to retire in utter disgrace and defeat (c. 36). But still it might be that the prophet lived and labored beyond the time of Hezekiah, and Gesenius especially has endeavored to show that the Burden of Egypt (c. 19) can historically belong to our prophet, if it be transferred to the beginning of the reign of Manasseh, when, counting from Uzziah, he would have lived more than 80 and labored more than 60 years.—In the arrangement of the prophecies there seems to be a good deal of confusion and obscurity, but the whole may be divided simply into four books: ch. 1–12; 13–23; 24–35, with the addition of the historical portion, 36–39; 40–66. The first book, which contains evidently the original collection, was most probably arranged by Isaiah himself, and corresponds with at least the first half of the superscription. Both in this and the two following may be discovered marks of an order, in part chronological and in part by subjects, the latter predominating. The last book belongs throughout to a single age and a single author, for "all that it contains flows finished and complete from a central-point, and we admire the dialectic skill of the prophet." (See Umbreit's Comm.). The latest attempt at tracing out the plan and course of these prophecies (c. 40–66) has been made by Rüetschi, in the Theol. Stud. u. Krit., 1854, No. 2. — An excellent history of the interpretation of Isaiah has been given by Gesenius in his Commentary, 1821, Pt. I., p. 56, sq. For the later literature on the subject consult Kiel, "Lehrb. d. hist. krit. Einl. in d. kan. Schriften des A. T., p. 234." — On the pseudepigraphic work, Ἀναβασις Ἰσαίου, see Pseudepig. des A. und Apocr. d. N. Test.

UMBREIT.—Porter.

Ishbosheth.—(LXX. Ἰσβοσθετ, Joe. Ἰσβοσθετ), a son of Saul, the only one who survived the battle of Gilboah. Abner, his relative and commander-in-chief, made him king, to keep the sceptre of Israel in Saul's house. He was a weak man. Though forty years old when Saul perished, he lacked courage to seize the throne, and when he became king, he was entirely in Abner's hands. In him the Bible shows that the divine right of legitimacy is unavailing, unless combined with personal strength. The impotence of Ishbosheth, the king's son, is contrasted with the divine heroism of David, Jesse's son. David did not violently overthrow Saul's dynasty; it perished through its own weakness. In 2 Sam. 2–4, Ishbosheth is named only to show his insignificance. This his name¹ already indicates.—When Ab-

¹ It is noteworthy that Saul's son is called מְגִיבָה and Jonathan's Mephibosheth. In 1 Chron. 9: 39, Ishbosheth is called Esh-baal. The opinion that this

er took Saul's concubine I. reproved him. This the only instance in which he showed independence. Abner, offended, gave a severe answer, which completely terrified the king. Immediately Abner joined David. But David refused to act until Michal would be restored to him; for he loved her, and through her established his relationship to the royal house. I. readily yielded to Abner's demand for her restoration to David.—When I. heard of Abner's death his hands were feeble." The power and authority of his sceptre were gone. Two of his captains took advantage of the general alarm, and to secure, as they thought, David's favor, assassinated Ishbosheth on his bed, and took his head to David. David justly rewarded their iniquity. CASSEL.*

Ishmael (Gen. 16; 21: 9-21; 25: 12-18), the son of Abraham by Hagar (see Art.).—He ranks with Isaac, as Lot with Abraham, and Esau with Jacob. He was born in Abraham's 6th year. After 14 years Isaac was born, and the jealousy which previously existed between the mothers, kindled between their sons. Ishmael persecuted Isaac (Gal. 4: 29). Sent with his mother into the desert, he was rescued from perishing by an angel, and assured that he should become a great nation. Under the blessing of God he grew up in the wilderness of Paran, became an archer, and, by his mother's advice, married an Egyptian woman. His twelve sons became princes of as many tribes, in the Arabian desert, between Egypt and Assyria. He died 137 years old.—The Ishmaelites thus became the second main element in the population of the Semitic, Joktan Arabs (Gen. 10: 25-30) who mainly dwelt further South, and occupied the chief portion of the Arabian peninsula. Arabic writers, also, distinguished the Ishmaelites as immigrants, Arabes facti, adscititii (see Arabia). The Israelites, led by their geographical position, to frequent intercourse with these Arab. Ishmaelites, designated all Arabians, Ishmaelites (Gen. 37: 25, 27, &c.; Judges 8: 24, 26. See Joseph). It is worthy of notice that in Genesis (16, 21) so much stress is laid upon the promise of a numerous posterity to Ishmael. The Ishmaelites occupy an intermediate position between Israel and the heathen, like that of Lot's descendants, the Moabites and Ammonites; and Esau's, the Edomites; a position which often becomes singularly prominent in prophecies against strange nations (Amos 1, 2; Is. 21, &c.), and which has found its great historical development in Mohammedanism.—Paul (Gal. 4: 22) employs the relation of Hagar and Ishmael to Sarah and was the original name is properly rejected by Ewald, because it is not true that the brothers and son of Jonathan were devoted to Baal. But Ewald's opinion that Baal need not designate the heathen God, must also be set aside. There is another explanation. נֶחֱשׁ occurs only in these two names, and obviously refers to their fate. It not only means shame but abasement, humiliation (cf. Ps. 35: 26; 132: 18). In Chron. the term is taken as identical, in the prophets, with Baal, and this word is used to exhibit the disgrace of the royal house in a milder form; for at that time the term Baal was no longer one of so much reproach, as the worship of Baal was no longer feared. But נֶחֱשׁ continued to have a reproachful sense.

Isaac, to represent, allegorically, the antithesis between the law and gospel. — (For the literature, see under Jacob). AUBERLEN.*

Isidore of Pelusium, born c. 340, in Alexandria (Ephr. Antiochen. in Phot. cod. 288) was an older cotemporary of Cyrill the Patr. The Gregory to whom Isidore wrote an epistle (I., 125) may have been Gregory of Nyssa. It is not certain, either, that he was a pupil of Chrysostom, whom he resembled in spirit, and greatly revered (I., 152, 156, 310; II., 42; IV., 424; V., 32). He lived, as presbyter and abbot, in a monastery at Pelusium (FACUNDUS HERM. def. trium. capit. II., c. 4. MANSI, V., 731, &c.). His numerous epistles exhibit him an earnest, intelligent, pious, respected man. He enjoyed the highest influence in the time of Theodosius the younger (Evagr. I., 15). How long he lived is doubtful. Epp. I., 310, 311, to Cyrill and Theod. are of the year 431; another (I., 324) belongs to the next year. Beyond that we have no evidence. He represented the Greek monasticism of his age in its noblest form, and found in seclusion, poverty, and abstinence, the best means of cultivating true discipleship (I., 63, &c.). But the excellence of monasticism consisted, in his view, not in outward self-denial, but in earnest spiritual discipline. He saw its perils, too, and exhorted to labor.—It was natural that he should share the growing depreciation of heathen literature and science; still he admits that a wise Christian may draw honey even thence.—As a monk he practised what he required, and became noted for piety, so that even his garments were thought holy, a superstition which he reproved. Though living secluded, the cares of the whole Church lay on his heart. In his relation to Cyrill, he appears to great advantage; his counsels of moderation in Cyrill's controversy with Nestorius, contrasting with Cyrill's passion and ambition. He cherished high views of the dignity of the priesthood, and in many letters earnestly admonished negligent clergymen of their duty. He severely reproached Eusebius, Bishop of Pelusium, and some of his clergy, for their mercenary practices, and deplored the offence which inconsistent ministers occasioned to persons of weak minds.—In theology Isidore does not belong to the great party leaders. He firmly adhered to the orthodoxy then established in the Greek Church, zealously withstanding all heresies. He dwelt mainly on the doctrines of sin, liberty, grace, pretty much in the sense of Chrysostom. In exegesis he occupies a more important place; many of his letters contain answers to exegetical questions (hence the title of his works: Is. de interpret. div. script. epp.) Earnestly does he urge the study of the SS. as a means of grace. True, the need of much study is our reproach; to Noah, Abraham, Job, God spoke face to face; the Apostles received not the written but spiritual testimony of the Holy Ghost. The expounder of the SS. must take not single words and phrases, but the connection, and faithfully explain them. Still Isidore himself often indulged in what we consider arbitrary allegory.—The Paris edition of his works contains 2000 epistles, though some have been divided, and others duplicated. The number given by Suida (9000), and by Nicephorus (10,000), is doubtless an exaggeration.—I. mentions a treatise by himself, Πρὸς Ἑλλήνας, in which Divine Providence is argued, and the vanity of heathen soothsaying exposed (II., 137, 228). The opinion that this is the same as that named, III., 253 (α λογίδιον περὶ τῆς σιμαμένης), is not sustained; this λογίδιον is probably found in III., 154.—Editions: the first three books, Paris, 1585, fol. These with the 4th book enlarged by C. RITTERSHUSIUS, Heidelb. offic. Commel. 1605, fol. The 5th book by the Jesuit, ANDR. SCHOTT, Antw., 1623, 8vo. (Francf., 1629, fol.). A complete but faulty edition, Paris, 1638, fol. in Morel. (Max. Bibl. VV., PP., Tom. VII.) Isidor. Collationes, started by Card. Barberini, edited by P. Possevinus, Rom., 1670; used in the edition of the Lat. transl. Venet., 1745, Roncon.—(Upon Isidore: TILLEMONT, Mém. t. XV. DU PIN, t. IV., 3, sqq. HEUMANN, diss. de I. Pelus. &c., Gott. 1737, also in his primitiæ Gött. acad.—H. A. NIEMEYER, de Is. Pel. vita, &c., Hal., 1826. Cf. also Acta Sanctor. 4 Febr.).

W. MÖLLER.*

Isidore of Seville, the most noted writer of his time, was born at Carthage, in the latter half of the 6th cent. He had two brothers who both became bishops, the one of Seville, the other of Carthage. He succeeded the former in 600, or 601, and presided over the synods of Seville (619) and Toledo (633). When he found his death approaching, he divided his possessions among the poor, had himself carried into the church, where he prayed aloud for the pardon of his sins, and exhorted the people to love and unity. Four days after he died, April 4, 636. Isidore's learning embraced the literature of his time. As a theological writer he exerted special influence by his de eccles. officiis libri duo, and Sententiarum libri tres (extracts from Gregory M., Augustine, &c.). In his Hist. de regibus Gothorum, Wandalorum, et Suevorum, he follows Gregory's principles, and condemns the forcible means used to convert the Jews in Spain. The seed of literature he scattered long yielded fruit in Spain. The Collectio Canonum et Epistolarum decretalium bearing his name, is a later work. The most complete edition of his works is by Faustin Arevali: Rom., 1797–1803, 7 vols., 4to.—(See DUPIN bibl., V., 11, &c.)

TH. PRESSEL.*

Issachar (= bought with a price, or he brings a reward) was Jacob's fifth son by Leah (Gen. 30 : 16, &c.). The tribe which descended from him was divided into four families (Gen. 46 : 13), and subsequently subdivided (1 Chron. 7 : 1, &c.). At the departure from Egypt it numbered 54,400 men able to bear arms; at the second census, 64,300; and in David's time, 87,000 valiant men (Numb. 1 : 29 ; 26 : 23, &c.; 1 Chron. 7 : 5). Hence in population it ranked next to Judah. In the march through the wilderness, Issachar, with Zebulun, was attached to Judah, and encamped East of the tabernacle (Numb. 2 : 3, 5). At the division of Canaan Issachar had the fourth lot, but its boundaries are not accurately defined. Its 16 cities, of which four belonged to the Levites (Josh. 21 : 28, &c.), lay between the tribes of Asher and Zebulun, on the N., Manasseh on the W. and S., and Jordan on the O. On the W. its territory stretched almost to the Mediterranean. Within its borders lay cities belonging to other tribes (Josh. 17 : 11 ; 19 : 17, &c.). It was, on the whole, a fertile, desirable district. In the N. was Tabor, in its centre Gilboa, in the W. Carmel; thence spread out the extensive and beautiful valley of Jezreel, watered by the Kishon, in which lay the cities of Nain, Endor, Jezreel, &c. (Jos., Ant. 5, 1, 22).—Jacob's blessing (Gen. 49 : 14, &c., & Deut. 33 : 18) plainly indicates that this tribe content with its rich pasture-grounds, would purchase the undisturbed possession of its domain of the adjacent commercial Phœnicians by becoming a carrier of their wares, and paying them tribute. Its territory was crossed by the caravan route from Phœnicia to Arabia Petra (Ezek. 27 : 21; Strabo 16, 4, 21, p. 779; Mover's Phœn. II., 1, p. 309, &c.; Ritter, Ersk. XVI., p. 17, 19). The tribe was not lacking however, in martial valor, as the song of Deborah proves (Judges 5 : 15, &c.). Tola, one of the judges, also sprung from this tribe (Judges 10 : 1, &c.), and 200 heads of the tribe, with their brethren joined David at Hebron to make him king (1 Chron. 12 : 32), and were commended for their political discretion.—(See Reland, Palest.; Lengerke, Kanaan I., 312, 471, 599, 675; Ewald, Gesch. Isr. I., 416; II., 293, 296, 304, 323). RÜRSCHL.*

Italy, Ecclesiastical—Statistical.—It is difficult to trace the spread of Christianity in Italy, since paganism here died gradually, and Christianity was established more by a change of religious forms, than on account of a deeply felt want of religious renewal on the part of its fading people. Long after the emperors had elevated Christianity as the established religion, traces of paganism show themselves; and the monks of the 6th cent. seem first to have succeeded in changing the pagan customs of the inhabitants of the villages into Christian ones. During the whole of the 4th cent. we meet with pagan temples in the most important cities. When Christianity was established at Florence, it was stipulated that the sacred statue of Mars should not be injured. In Lower Italy pagan worship existed as late as the 6th century. Christian life in Italy having been so weak, it is not surprising that this country did not aid much in the spread of Christianity in the West. Subsequently the ecclesiastical history of Italy is almost entirely identified with that of the papacy. Since the suppression of the Reformation, all religious movements have been crushed out until the most recent times. At present, a part of the Italian people manifests a desire to rest contented no longer with the ceremonies of the Church, but to achieve religious independence. In the following lines we shall give an account of the ecclesiastical condition of the different Italian States.—a. The Grand Duchy of Tuscany consists of 4 archbishoprics with a population of 1,730,000. The archbishopric of Florence embraces 10 bishoprics, with 1767 parishes. That of Siena, 8 bishoprics, with 363 parishes. That of Pisa, 4 bishoprics, with 325 parishes. The archbishopric of Lucca contains, besides its own episcopal See with 273 parishes, only the suffraganate of Massa, in loden. Besides cathedrals there are 54 collegiate churches. The secular clergy number 9,000. There are at present 96 monasteries with 2500 monks, and 69 nunneries with 4000 nuns. In Lucca alone, there are 12 monasteries with 391 monks, and 11 nunneries with 453 nuns; the secular clergy number 1054. In 1836 the Protestants at Florence and Livorno numbered 1153, viz.: 521 Lutherans and Reformed, and 632 Anglicans. At Livorno the Protestant church of the Dutch-German society has existed since 1607; the Anglicans have a house of worship at Livorno and Florence. At the same places there are about 200 Greeks with a chapel. The united Armenians number about 100. There are about 300 Protestants at Pisa, and 30-50 at Siena. The only burial-ground of the Protestants is at Livorno.—When Leopold I. was still Grand Duke, a reformation of the Church was undertaken in Tuscany similar to that in Austria, and headed by Ricci, Bishop of Pistoja. Although the National Synod in 1787, and subsequently the Pope, opposed this supremacy of the State, a part of the reforms have, nevertheless, continued to the present. The tithes were abolished, the priests obtained a fixed salary, and applications for dispensations from the Pope were seldom allowed. In 1782, the Inquisition and the court of the papal nuncio were abolished, and the regular clergy made subject to the diocesan bishops. These regulations were sanctioned by the Pope in the concordat of 1815, so that now the election of bishops and canons is also dependent upon the Grand Duke, and neither a papal bull nor decree of the general of an order can be published without his consent. In Tuscany, especially at Florence, the religious fraternities for the care of the sick and dying are doing an excellent work. Of monastics, the begging friars, especially the Capuchins, have the greatest influence among the people. But the participation of the monks in the game of Lotto, furnishes a pernicious example to the people. The literary education of the monks is limited. At Florence there are 172 churches, among which the cathedral of St. Maria del Fiore is known as a masterpiece of architecture. At Pisa, where there are 80 churches, the cemetery of Campo Santo is wholly covered with sacred earth from Jerusalem, which a fleet of crusaders brought hither. Amid the Appenines is situated the celebrated monastery of Camaldoli, to which numerous pilgrimages are still performed. The Abbey of Valambrosa is situated in the same region. The Florentines are not at present distinguished above other Italians in a literary point of view.—b. The Duchy of Parma, in 1842, had a population of 486,000. It is divided into the bishoprics of Parma, with 323 parishes; Piacenza, 362; and Borgo San Donnino, a suffraganate of Rome, with 54 parishes; besides these there are 9 parishes which belong to the Sardinian Bishop of Bobbio, and 5 which belong to the Sardinian Bishop of Brugnato-Sarzana. In the bishopric of Parma the secular clergy number 1005; in Piacenza 1160; in Borgo San Donnino 208. In 1834 there were 6 nunneries with 245 nuns, which were mostly occupied in teaching; and 14 monasteries with 411 monks.

Church and State are related as in Tuscany.—c. The Duchy of Modena contains 400,000 inhabitants, all Catholics. It is divided into 5 bishoprics with 653 parishes. Besides these, 17 parishes belong to the Bishop of Parma, 48 to the Bishop of Lucca, and 31 to the Abbey of Nonantola, which belongs to the Archbishop of Modena. There are 14 monasteries and 10 nunneries. Church and State are related as in Tuscany. The Pope consenting, the priests can be tried in criminal cases by a lay tribunal.—d. The Republic of St. Marino contains 8000 inhabitants. Its bishoprics are Montefeltre, with 6 parishes, and Rimini with 2. The secular clergy number 45. The 3 monasteries of the Minorites, Capuchins and Servite, number 23 monks; the nunnery of the Clarissæ, 28 nuns.—e. The Lombard-Venetian Kingdom is divided into the archbishoprics of Milan and Venice. To Milan belong 8 suffraganates. There are 2303 parishes, 9706 priests, 33 monasteries with 194 monks and 885 nuns. In the city of Milan, among its 79 churches, the cathedral deserves special mention. The ritual used is the Ambrosian. There is no Protestant congregation in Milan, though there is a Reformed one in Bergamo. The archbishopric of Venice is subject to the patriarch of Venice, who holds also the title of Primate of Dalmatia. The city contains 110 churches and chapels, the most noted of which are, St. Marks, the Gemini, St. Giovanni, and St. Paolo. The disposition of the people is Roman Catholic, since this is the faith of the Fathers. Images of saints and the Madonna are found at all the street corners. Before them, lamps are lighted at night, and the lower class bow to them. To the patriarch are subject 10 episcopal Sees. The parishes number 1615; the clergy 7459; the monasteries 43, with 692 monks and 490 nuns. There are 2 non-Catholic parishes with 11 clergymen. At Venice the Protestants enjoy the free exercise of their religion. The greater number are Lutherans, mostly from Suabia. On the small island of St. Lazaro, the Armenians possess the celebrated Mechetarite monastery, the monks of which follow the rule of St. Anthony. Pupils are sent hither from all countries to educate them as priests of the United Armenians.—f. The Kingdom of Sardinia. Here, especially in Piedmont, least in Savoy, there is among the population a strong anti-Roman tendency, which is encouraged by the government. Protestant periodicals and books are not only widely circulated, but at Turin a Protestant newspaper is even published, whilst ultramontane papers meet with little favor. The government is in other respects also superior to those of the other States. The population numbers 4,700,000, of which 550,000 belong to the island of Sardinia. It is ecclesiastically divided as follows: I. The Mainland. 1. The archbishopric of Chambery, with 6 episcopal Sees and above 613 parishes. 2. The archbishopric of Turin, with 11 episcopal Sees and 1013 parishes. 3. The archbishopric of Vercelli, with 6 episcopal Sees and 869 parishes. 4. The archbishopric of Genoa, with 7 episcopal Sees and 603 parishes. In Piedmont, 5 episcopal Sees, with 541 parishes, belong to the archbishopric of Genoa. On the Island are:

1, the archbishopric of Cagliari, with 3 episcopal Sees in 147 parishes. 2, The archbishopric of Oristagno, with 73 parishes, but no suffraganates. 3, The archbishopric of Sassari, with 6 episcopal Sees in 171 parishes. Besides the cathedrals there are 74 collegiate churches. There are 63 theological seminaries, and an academy for the higher theological sciences, at Superga, near Turin. There are 30 abbeys, 460 monasteries, and 144 nunneries. These monastic institutions possess real estate valued at 30 millions of francs; but the real estate has lately been secularized by the government, which measure has helped no little to produce dissatisfaction at Rome. — Even in Sardinia, only the Waldenses are tolerated according to the constitution of 1848; but a Protestant congregation has recently been formed at Turin, whose church was dedicated in 1853. At Genoa, there is a Protestant Swiss congregation. At Annecy, Protestant worship is held every fortnight. At San Mauro, Favale, and Casale, also, Protestant congregations are said to have been formed. The Waldenses, numbering 20,000, live in the valleys of Pérouse, St. Martin, and Luserne. They are formed into 15 parishes. Since 1848 they have been placed on a civil equality with the other Sardinians. Before that time they had to endure much persecution, and owe their existence to Prussian, English, and Dutch mediation. They are intimately related to the Swiss, and belong in doctrine, church government and worship, to the Reformed Church. In 1855 the Synod, the highest ecclesiastical authority among the Waldenses, adopted a new constitution. For a long time these congregations were religiously dead; but at present they give signs of reanimation, and may become a great blessing to Italy. — The constitution of 1848 settles the relation of Church and State. On the mainland the king alone has the right of appointing archbishops, bishops, abbots, and priors: on the island this right is so modified that those appointed, the archbishops of Cagliari and Sassari alone excepted, must be native Sardinians. The other ecclesiastical offices are filled partly by the bishops, and partly by the Pope. The relation of the State to the Pope rests upon the concordat of 1742, as modified in 1817. According to this no papal bull can be published without the king's permission. In 1841 the Pope consented that under certain limitations the clergy were subject to the secular tribunals. — g. The Kingdom of the two Sicilies. In 1844 the Kingdom of Naples contained a population of 6,351,000, and Sicily of 2,016,000. Naples stood formerly as a papal fief in intimate relation to the papal chair; its king, according to the bull of Urban VI., 1099, was, with respect to the Sicilian monarchy, legatus natus of the Pope, exercises papal authority, and possesses therefore in the disposition of ecclesiastical affairs, a more liberal authority than other princes. The Tribunal della monarchia decides primarily in all cases of persons who are directly subject to the Pope, and can set aside the decisions of bishops and archbishops. From the reign of Philip II. the judge of the monarchy as representative of the king, was a clergyman; before that time the king himself decided in all cases. As vassal of the Pope he had formerly to send to Rome a white charger, bearing a certain sum of money. This sign of homage was yielded, however, for Naples only. After 1759 it was wholly omitted, since which time the Pope annually, on Maundy Thursday, protests against the omission. The people are wholly devoted to the Roman Church, and delight in the pomp of religious festivities. Their disposition is kind, but their ignorance profound. The only Church is the Roman Catholic; even the 80,000 Arnauts in Calabria, have united with the Latin Church and acknowledge the supremacy of the Pope, though they receive the Lord's Supper under both kinds, allow their clergy to marry, and still use the Greek in their worship. At the papal court all this is ignored. In 1839 the Protestants numbered 830; at Naples resides the chaplain of the Prussian embassy, as also a French one; the few Protestants at Palermo and Messina form no congregations and have no minister. Since 1818 the Kingdom of Naples is divided into 20 archbishoprics, and 73 bishoprics, viz.: Naples, with the suffraganates of Aversa, Ischia, Nola Pozzuoli; the united archbishopric of Acerenza and Matera, with the suffraganates of the united bishopric of Anglona and Tursi, Tricarico, and Venosa; Amalfi; Bari, with the suffraganates of the united bishopric of Nuvo and Vitonto, Coversani; Brindisi; Capua, with the suffraganates of the united bishopric of Aquino, Pontecorvo and Sora, the united bishopric of Calvi and Teano, Caserta, Isernia, Sessa; Chieta, with the bishopric of Aquila; Conza, with the suffraganates: the united bishopric of St. Angelo de Lombardi and Bisaccia, Lacedogna, Muro, Campagna; Cosenza; Lanciano; Manfredonia; Otranto, with the suffraganates: Gallipoli, Lecce, Ugento; Reggio, with the suffraganates: Bova, Cassano, Catanzaro, Cotrone, Gerace, Nicastro, the united bishopric of Nicotera and Tropeja, Oppido; Rossano; Salerno, with the suffraganates: Capaccio, the united bishopric of Marsico, Nuoro and Potenza, Nusco, Policastro; Santa Severina, with the bishopric of Cariati; Sorrento, with the bishopric of Castellamare; Taranto, with the suffraganates: Castellaneta, Oria; Trani, with the bishoprics of Bisceglia and Andrea. The suffraganates of the archbishop of Benevento, belonging to the Church-State, are: Ariano, the united bishopric of Ascoli and Cerignola, Avellino, Bojano, Bovino, Larino, Lucera, Termoli. Exempt bishoprics are: the united bishopric of Cava and Sarno, Gaëta, the united bishopric of Gravina and Monte Peloso, the united bishopric of St. Marco and Visignano, Marsi, the united bishopric of Melfi and Napolla, Mileto, Molfetta, Monopoli, Nardo, the united bishopric of Penne and Atri, Teramo, Trivento, the united bishopric of Valle and Sulmona. In 1824 there were 368 abbots, 3,700 priests, 27,612 lower clergy, 8,455 monks, 8,155 nuns; in 1841 there were 31,870 secular priests, 12,558 monks, 10,361 nuns; in 1842 there were 32,360 secular priests, 12,741 monks, 10,066 nuns. — The island of Sicily is divided into 3 archbishoprics. The archbishop of Palermo, who is the primate of the kingdom, has a See of 45 parishes. His suffraganates are: Girgenti, with 73 parishes, and Mazara with 33. The archbishop of Messina has the suffraganates of Cefalu, Lipari, Patti, Vicosia. The archbishop of Montereale has the suffraganates of Caltagirone, Catania with 47 parishes, Piazza, Syracuse with 65 parishes. The monasteries are estimated at 658, with 1,806 priests, 893 novices, 1,950 lay brethren, and 942 Terzini. There are 5,000 nuns. The richest monasteries are those of the Benedictines, Olivetans, and Theatines. In the province of Messina there are 15 Basilian monasteries, which arose when Sicily yet belonged to the patriarchate of Constantinople. The monasteries are responsible to no one in the administration of their estates; whence the income of but few of them is known. At the head of the nunneries is an abbess, elected for three years. The priests and monks are allowed to be present at the carnival operas and shows, but not the nuns. The latter are allowed to view them from the closed balconies of houses, which have a subterranean connection with the nunneries. The rules in many nunneries are very rigorous; in others, the nuns have summer vacations which they can spend in the country. The most celebrated monastery in the Kingdom of Naples, as that of Monte-Cassino, whose wealth, however, has been very much reduced. The abbot is elected for 6 years; after his term expires he becomes again a common monk. The most celebrated monastery in Sicily is that of St. Rosalie, near Palermo. The saint once delivered this city from the plague. In Sicily spiritual dramas often take the place of the sermon. The order in the churches is by no means good; wealthy ladies have chairs brought to the churches by their servants, whilst the poorer ones sit upon the floor, not unfrequently nursing their infants. The boys romp noisily through the church. Images of saints are used as advertisements and signs. Ships, wagons, and shops have their particular images. The lemonade venders use the image of Christ at the well of Samaria, or of Moses smiting the rock. The image of St. Anthony is suspended by drivers at the foreheads of their horses. The most esteemed festival of the Neapolitans is that of St. Januarius, whose blood becomes liquid biennially in April and September. The festival is celebrated during 8 days with much noise and pomp. In Sicily a similar festival is that of St. Rosalie, also celebrated during 8 days, and with much glitter and display. The priests are covered with gold. Music, dancing, singing, the ringing of bells and thunder of cannons combine to make such festivals as noisy as possible.—The relations between Church and State have been settled by the concordat of 1818. According to this the king appoints the bishops, and the Pope confirms them. The abbeys which are not under royal patronage are filled by the Pope, but only with subjects of the king. Appointments to parishes are made from January to June by the Pope, from July to December by the bishops. In the churches of which the king is patron, the bishop inducts the presentee if he has found him qualified. The bishops are required to swear allegiance to the king; but they are not generally interfered with in the administration of their Sees; and they have also a right of appeal to the Pope, except in secular matters, when a permission from the king is necessary to such an appeal. The clergy generally live in moderate circumstances, and are not found in cafés as often as the clergy in other parts of Italy. Nor are they as often found in the higher families and societies, since their influence is dreaded. In the villages there is generally one priest to about 1000 persons; in the smaller towns three to 1000, and in the large cities five to the same number.

See F. W. SCHUBERT, Handb. d. allgem. Staatskunde, Bd. I., Thl. 4.: Königsberg, 1839. FLECK, wissenschaftl. Reise nach It., Bd. 1. 2.: Lpz., 1835. RHEINWALD's Repertorium. STRICKER, Ober- u. Mittel-Italien, 1847. BECHER, Statistische Uebersicht d. Bevölkerung d. österr. Monarchie: Stuttg. u. Tübing., 1841. Gelzer, Prot. Briefe aus Süd-Frankreich u. Italien, 1852. Gelzer, Prot. Monatsblätter, 1855, Bd. 5, p. 136 u. 266. I. F. NEIGEBAUER, die Insel Sardinien, 1853. I. F. NEIGEBAUER, Sicilien, dessen polit. Entwick. u. jetz. Zust.: Lpg., 1848. HÖNINGHAUS, Gegenw. Bestand d. R. Cath. Kirche: Aschaffenh., 1836. (ALFRED REUMONT), Röm. Briefe v. einem Florentiner, Bd. 1.2.: Lpg., 1840.

KLOSE. — Reinecke.

Italy, Reformation in. Italy was not left unaffected by the general desire for a reformation of the Church, which showed itself throughout all Western Christendom. In the 15th cent. Savonarola had preached the necessity of a religious new creation. But a peculiar conjuncture of favorable and adverse circumstances, which balanced each other, produced here a peculiar course of the reformatory movements. The hopeless condition of the Church was necessarily more evident in the immediate proximity of the Papal court than at a greater distance; especially amid scenes of daring crime enacted upon the Papal chair by men like Sixtus IV., Innocent VIII., and Alexander VI.; and of total worldliness by Julius II., and Leo X. The political confusion of the country, so much divided and subject to foreign influence, withdrew the attention of the Popes almost entirely from their spiritual calling, and directed it almost exclusively to their security and aggrandizement as secular princes. The corruption prevailing in the higher regions of the Church was general among the clergy of all ranks. The religious and polite literature of the age furnish the most abundant evidence of this. The monasteries were scenes of extreme licentiousness. The highest dignities of the Church were given to relatives or the lowest favorites, or sold to the highest bidder: the lower parishes were often in the hands of the most ignorant and debased monks, because they served for the smallest hire. At the same time, indeed, a new spiritual life had arisen, which, through an enthusiastic admiration of the ancient classics, art and sciences, arrived at a high degree of refinement; but there was no general popular cultivation, and hence it favored only exceptionally the revival of religion: the people continued in the deepest ignorance and superstition, and at best in the mere outward sanctity of Roman formalism. The higher ranks had surrendered to open infidelity or indiffer-entism. Humanism sought a substitute for the despised barbarism of the traditional scholasticism in the study of ancient philosophy; but with the study of ancient literature not only its language and beauties were appropriated, but also its Pagan ideas, which often led to free-thinking, skepticism and total estrangement from the life of Christianity. This was the tone which passed from Florence to the elegant court of Leo X., where, among the nearest associates of the Pope, Bembo, afterwards Cardinal, did not hesitate to say that he had never spent time to less advantage than in reading the Bible: and denounced to his friend, Sadoleto, Privy Secretary of the Pope, the study of it as folly: non enim decent gravem errorem tales ineptiae. Erasmus writes concerning Rome: "theology is studied only from love of gain, and the superstition of the populace is employed for the enrichment of their superiors." He had with his own ears heard how Christ and the Apostles were openly blasphemed there. The materialism and skepticism of the contemporary Italian Humanists is evident from the manner in which the immortality of the soul, freedom and Providence are discussed by the Aristotelian P. Pomponazzo of Bologna. As regards morals, Luther tells us, that several Cardinals were pointed out to him as saints, because they were guilty only of commerce with women; for the greatest vices were general and unblushing. To this pass had Christianity come in the land of the Popes! But, notwithstanding this, the Papacy was still firmly rooted, since it was intimately interwoven with the interests of Italy. The latter was placed through Rome at the head of the nations; and the money which flowed into the Papal treasury from all Christendom, enriched the whole country. Only through the skill and weight of the Roman tactics could Italy hope to maintain its independence against the power of France and of the House of Hapsburg. The power of the Papal court, and the clergy and ceremonies, dazzled those who delighted in outward pomp, and satisfied the meagre religious wants of the majority, who lived in deep ignorance and sensuality.—But there were not wanting those also, who deeply felt the magnitude of the evil and desired its removal; and the study of the sciences, fostered by Humanism, found a more earnest channel in some men, and led them from a barren and effete scholasticism to the investigation of the pure fountain of Christianity. Add to this the new impulse given by the reformatory movements in Germany and Switzerland, which took a strong hold upon many minds. Amid the various unfavorable circumstances of the country and people, however, these phenomena were mostly limited to a few among the cultivated and higher ranks. Nor did the divided state of the country secure sufficient prominence and political influence to any single person, to enable him to protect the Reformation against the overwhelming power of the hierarchy, and to afford it a centre of operation. Thus it happened that the Reformation here nowhere became the matter of a firmly united number; but only of isolated men, around whom were gathered the few who thought like them, but who had soon to yield to an unsparing persecution. The reformatory movements were most extensive between 1530–42, after which Catholicism exerted all its power to suppress them.—That even at the Roman court itself the necessity for a better state had begun to be felt, appears from a fact to which Ranke first directed attention. During the pontificate of Leo X., about 80 pious and learned men, affected by the corruption of the Church and the decline of religion, united at Rome into an Oratory of Divine Love, in order to awaken a more earnest religious spirit. They were men, some of whom subsequently, in the highest Church offices and in ways widely deviating, sought to renovate and rescue the Church and Christianity: but they all alike admitted the necessity of a Reformation. Among them was Cajetan, of Thiene, the founder of the Order of the Theatines, and afterwards canonized; Caraffa, who as Cardinal and Pope sought the safety of the Church in the exercise of strict discipline, and that of the hierarchy in the establishment of a new inquisition; and the noble Venetian, Contarini, who even as Cardinal admitted the necessity of leading back the doctrine of the Church to the Scriptures (see Art.). It seems also that he afterwards became the centre of a new circle at Venice, in which a number of distinguished and deeply pious men met for the purpose of spiritual studies and conversation. Here, of course, there was already a more intimate contact with Wittenberg. But these men, even if they agreed with the German Reformers in their views of dead works, the corruption of the Church, and salvation by faith in Christ alone, nevertheless condemned their separation from the Church and that unity, which was necessarily based upon an hierarchical organization. To this circle belonged Reg. Pole, of England. Marcant. Flaminio, Jac. Nardi and Bruccioli of Florence, Luigi Pruli, a patrician of Venice, and perhaps, also Angelo Buonarici, all alike engaged in reformatory movements. Although Pole had left his country on account of his defence of the Papal primacy against the encroachments of Henry VIII., he, nevertheless, even as Cardinal, showed his deep attachment to the Protestant doctrine of justification; but he thought that he could rest contented with the inward conviction, and was not prevented by it from laboring zealously against the Reformation. It was, perhaps, his influence, also, which led his warm friend, the excellent, though ductile Flaminio, to occupy a similar position. Flaminio was, indeed, opposed to some of the Protestant doctrines, especially that of the Lord's Supper; but in other respects he was one of the most zealous advocates of a Reformation in Italy, and on the most important points of the faith he expresses himself in his works in a thoroughly evangelical manner. But of these men Bruccioli labored most thoroughly in the sense of Protestantism; and he was, perhaps, more than all the others, attracted to the system, although he never separated from the Church. He had not only the courage to advocate the right of every Christian to possess the Word of God as the only rule of faith, but he also undertook to translate the Scriptures into the Italian (1530–32), and to accompany with short annotations. The many editions of this work within a few years show the extent of its circulation, and the prevalent desire for religious information direct from the pure fountain.—It is not venturing too much to say that his inward evangelical tendency, which, however, did not separate from the dominant Church, counted everywhere numerous adherents among the educated classes of Italy, if they were not wholly estranged from religion. Many prominent examples might yet be mentioned, but a few of the most important and best authenticated must suffice. Men like the Bishop Foscarari of Modena, San Felice of Cava, and Cardinal J. Morone, even suffered persecution on account of it. Grimani, patr. of Aquileja, escaped a similar fortune only by the powerful influence of Venice. Folengo, a pious benedictine of Monte Casino, endured all kinds of annoyances on account of his comments on the Psalms and the Catholic epistles, in which he had unequivocally expressed his leaning towards the Protestant doctrine of justification and his opposition to many of the most important institutions of the Church, such as fasting, mechanical exercises of devotion, confession, frequent masses, and the sanctity of the outward priesthood. In a similar spirit the excellent Fregoso, Cardinal and Archb. of Salerno, directed his work on Prayer against the unevangelical and superstitious devotional formalism of the Church; for which reason, however, it was soon placed upon the Index. Several works of Luther, translated into the Italian, were even published under his name and eagerly read; for the zeal of the friends of the Reformation had recourse even to such means, in order to escape the Papal prohibitions and the violent measures of the inquisition, which sought in every way to oppose a barrier to the spread of the Reformation from Germany and Switzerland.—On account of the extensive intercourse of these countries, especially with Upper Italy, the reformatory works of Luther had, at an early date, already found their way hither, and had been eagerly sought after. At the beginning of 1519 Frobenius, of Basle, informed Luther of the large sale of them in Italy, and of the favor with which they met there. The Bull of Leo against them could not prevent their continued sale. Venice especially seems to have been an entrepot for them. At the Diet of Nuremberg, in 1524, the Legate Campeggio complained of the number of Luther's books which were read there. In 1540 Melanchthon speaks of the large transportations of books from the Fair at Frankfurt to Italy, in spite of the Papal edicts.—It was well known now how great the danger of infection was, even to those who were most intimately connected with the interests of Rome. The advisers of Paul III. warned him, that even the fathers of the Council, which was to convene, might be seduced to the Lutheran heresy, if the books of the heretics were put into their hands. Only detached portions, accompanied with a refutation, were to be laid before them for consideration, or rather condemnation. But the adherents of the new ideas sought the more to defeat these measures of caution, and to circulate Italian translations of Protestant works. The Loci Theol. of Melanchthon and his Commentary on Matthew, Bucer's Comment. on the Psalms, and several works of Zwingli, were circulated under fictitious names. Luther's Catechism and Explanation of the Lord's Prayer and Calvin's Institutes and Catechism were published anonymously.—The attendance of German students at the Universities of Bologna and Padua contributed also to the spread of the new doctrines. Less calculated to gain friends for the Reformation was the missionary zeal of the German and Swiss mercenaries who entered Italy in 1526. It is known how, after the taking of Rome, they publicly manifested their hatred and contempt of the Papacy. But on account of the difference of language and the oppression exercised alike on friend and foe, their religious influence was necessarily very weak. In the misery of the times, however, which they helped to increase, public opinion saw a visitation of God on account of the extreme corruption of the Church and hierarchy; and therefore lent a more ready ear to those who preached the necessity of a Reformation.—Protestantism seems to have gained a firm footing, and decided adherents, first at Venice, on account of its active commerce with Germany, its more independent position, with reference to the Papacy, and the early and constant sale of the works of the Reformers. As early as 1520, Luther received tidings from Venice of the great want which was felt of advancing the evangelical cause in the favorable soil of Italy by preachers and writings. In 1528 he received no less joyful news of the advance of the Word of God there. No little may have been contributed to this result by the refugees who gathered here for safety from all parts of Italy. At Venice the friends of the gospel watched with the deepest interest the course of the Diet of Augsburg (1530); for they had heard the most unsatisfactory reports of the negotiations which Melanchthon, too anxious to maintain peace, was carrying on with the Legate Campeggio, and they feared the worst from his submissive compliance, for the good cause and its adherents. In their name L. P. Roselli wrote a letter to Melanchthon, urging him to persevere to the last. Such was the spirit which animated the Evangelicals at Venice, and which they manifested at a later date. Even priests were found among them. We mention only Baldo Lupetino, and M. Flacius Illyricus, the subsequent champion of Lutheranism. Through such men, who generally sought a personal acquaintance with the Reformers, the Venetians continued in constant intercourse with Wittenberg. In 1539 Melanchthon wrote a letter to them which affords us an interesting view of the condition of the Evangelical cause among them. The letter seems to have been occasioned by his anxiety on account of the spread of the book of Servetus against the Trinity. But it shows also an apparent apologetical design, and with the utmost Melanchthonian caution represents the Reformation as a removal merely of a few external abuses, and a restoration of the ancient and pure Catholicity. The author, perhaps, hoped in this way to secure for his co-religionists the protection and favors of the leaders of the Republic, and, at the same time, to nip the bud of a dangerous tendency among them.—But also in most of the cities of the Venetian territory the Protestants were spreading; such was the case especially at Vicenza and Treviso, for the government seems nowhere to have disturbed them. One person alone, a German, who too openly manifested his zeal for the Lutheran heresy in the Diocese of Vicenza, was surrendered to the spiritual tribunal (1535). Only after 1542 a heavy persecution burst upon the Venetian Protestants at the instigation of Rome. However numerous they were, they had nevertheless not yet been organized into compact congregations; they had always been compelled to cover themselves in the deepest secrecy; and they were not only without a common pastor and teacher, but dissensions had also crept in among them. The man, who, on account of position and energy formed a centre of union, was Balthasar Altieri, who for some time resided here as secretary of the English ambassador. In the present distress he wrote to Luther, requesting him to secure the intervention of the German Protestant princes with the Senate, that the Protestants might be allowed the free exercise of their consciences, at least until a Council should decide on matters of religion. He also invoked Luther's authority to lay aside the dissensions of the Venetian Protestants. For, on account of the commerce of Venice with Switzerland, as well as with Germany, the two tendencies of Protestantism came here almost unavoidably into contact, and thus hither also the unfortunate sacramental controversies found their way. Bucer, in his untiring conciliatory zeal, had already endeavored to reconcile the conflicting views among the Italians; but he could accomplish nothing. Luther's authority was invoked to settle the dispute. But his answer was not calculated to fulfil this expectation; he openly and strongly expressed his suspicion of every compromise, and his invincible repugnance to the Swiss; and he even warned against the writings of Bucer. Melancthon deeply lamented the spirit of these letters, from which he expected no good results. For the Italians, naturally inclined to speculation, were at any rate not easily quieted; and were at this time occupied with various difficult questions besides that of the Lord's Supper. It is not improbable that in the territory of Venice, especially at Vicenza, secret associations were beginning to form, which occupied themselves with such questions of speculative theology, especially that of the Trinity; whence, subsequently, proceeded that Antitrinitarian tendency, through which soon after the Italian Protestants fell into ill repute far and wide.—About 1542 the principles of Protestantism were disseminated in Istria, another portion of the Venetian domain, by Vergerio, B. of Capo d'Istria, and made rapid though soon interrupted progress. He had spent much time in Germany, had been active in the interests of Rome against Protestantism, and had taken part in the colloquy at Worms in 1540; but was suddenly gained for the new ideas by the study of

Luth. books, which he had undertaken to refute. The first whom he gained for the new ideas, was his brother, the Bishop of Pola. The two now labored in common, and with much success, to evangelize their dioceses, until, in 1545, the Inquisition interfered, and Vergerio (see Art.) was forced to flight.—Next, after Venice, Ferrara became a rallying-point for the friends of the gospel among the educated classes. It was Renata, wife of Hercules II., Duke of Este, and daughter of Louis XII. of France, who attracted them thither. Having been instructed in the reformatory doctrines by Margaret of Navarre, she, in 1527, brought them with her to Ferrara. A number of men was soon gathered at her court who shared the religious opinions of this excellent and highly educated lady. They were partly scholars who found employment in the University or at the court, mostly adherents of the moderate Church tendency; partly also refugees who had to forsake their homes on account of their decided Protestantism. Among the latter were several Frenchmen; Clément Marot, the poet and versifier of the Psalms; Calvin himself, who, in 1536, sojourned here for several months; and Hubert Langnet, distinguished in the history of the French Reformation. Among the Italians were the moderate Flaminio and Calcinai, the friend of Contarini and Pole; the more decided Peter Martyr Vermigli, Agnus Palearius and Celio Sec. Curione; the latter of whom gained for Protestantism Peregrino Morata, the tutor of the brothers of the Duke.—From hence, perhaps, the Reformatory impulses also reached Modena, which also belonged to the dominions of the Duke of Este. Already, in 1530, a Papal rescript commanded the inquisitors of this and the Ferrarese diocese to watch the heretical infection among the monks. But the movement did not become a public one until, in 1540, when the learned Sicilian, Paolo Ricci, arrived at Modena, and begun to gather a congregation. Ladies of high rank, especially a Countess Rangone, protected the new doctrine. The letters (from 1540–44) of Cardinal Morone, who was Bishop of Modena and Papal Legate in Germany, complain bitterly of the progress of Protestantism in his diocese, and that from all sides he had to hear that Modena had become Lutheran. But here, also, the sacramental controversies sowed dissension, and Bucer tried, in a letter to the Protestants of Modena and Bologna, to affect a reconciliation (1541). For in Bologna, whose University was attended by many Germans, the doctrines of the Reformation had also gained many earnest friends. Eminent among them was Gior. Mollio, a minorite, who acted for some time as preacher and professor. The presence of John v. Planitz, the Saxon ambassador, gave an opportunity to the Protestants of this city, in an address to him, to express their regard for the German princes, who had restored the gospel in their own country, and labored for its triumph in other countries, even to the Papal States. They urged him to labor in favor of a general council, from which they hoped the removal of the yoke of Antichrist and the freedom of Christians to follow their convictions. They prayed him that he should obtain for them permission from the Emperor, for the present, at least, to use the Bible, without, on that account, being regarded as heretics. Other cities of the Papal States, such as Faenza and Imola, were also affected by the Protestant movement. Even in Rome itself there were many who secretly favored Luther.—The influence of the new spirit reached as far as the remote Naples. The German soldiers, who came hither in 1527, are said to have sattered the first seeds of the Reformation; and the soil was so well prepared, that an imperial edict of 1536 sought by the severest penalties to prevent the Luth. infection. But in the same year the Emperor himself sent to Naples the man, whose silent labors opened many of the noblest minds to the light of the gospel. Juan Valdez (see Art.) arrived from Germany as Secretary and Viceroy. Office, education, mind and character secured an immense influence for the labors of this pious man. An unobtrusive circle, composed however of the most eminent persons, gathered around him for mutual edification and the revival of a living, inward, Biblical Christianity. Among them were Count G. Caraccioli (see Art.) nephew of Paul IV.; P. Carnesecchi, Roman Protonotarius; G. Gonzaga, Duchess of Trajetto; Vitt. Colonna, the widow of Pescara, the victor at Pavia; and Isab. Manrica, the noble confessor. Valdez died already in 1540; but he continued to labor through two men, who, though before already inclined to the gospel, were brought by him to a full decision—viz.: Pietro Martyr Vermigli and Bernard. Ochino (s. Antitrin.) sent to Naples as prior of his order, and gained for the gospel by the reading of several works of Bucer and Zwingli, Martyr labored in a way similar to Valdez, especially by lectures on the Pauline Epistles, to which not only his monks, but also the most considerable of the clergy and laity, crowded. It happened at the same time, that Ochino, a Capuchin friar, then enjoying a general and enthusiastic admiration, who had been twice elected general of his order, and had been the confessor of Paul III., and was the most celebrated preacher of Italy at that time, was called in 1536, and again in 1539, to preach the Lent Sermons at Naples. Through the reading of the Scriptures he also had come to a knowledge of the only foundation of salvation in faith; but he had been advanced in his knowledge by Valdez, and he now with his powerful eloquence proclaimed to large crowds of people the doctrine of justification. Although none of these men as yet thought of separating from the Church, their course nevertheless excited suspicion. Cajetan soon took notice of it. Martyr was called upon to justify himself; but the interposition of several cardinals, especially of Contarini, averted for the time the danger which threatened him. Soon after, having now labored at Naples for nearly three years, he was transferred as prior to Lucca, where he found a new sphere for his evangelical efforts, and gained new friends for the Reformation both among the monks and laity. But new charges against him induced him to separate openly from the Papacy, and to seek safety abroad. He was accompanied by his three intimate friends, P. Lacinio, afterwards professor at Strasburg, Th. Trebellio, and G. Terenziano. Eighteen of his pupils shortly followed him; among whom were C. Martinengo, who died at Geneva as minister of the Italian congregation; Em. Tremellio, afterwards Professor of Hebrew at Sedan; and Jer. Zanchi, whose name is illustrious among the most learned theologians of Germany. At Florence Martyr met Ochino, whom he induced also to leave his position and home in favor of freedom of conscience. The learned Cel. Sec. Curione for a time supplied the place of Martyr at Lucca, and labored at other places also to advance the Reformation, until he also had to seek safety in Switzerland.—Hence an extensive Protestant movement was spreading through all Italy. Many saw that a Reformation could not be expected from the Church and hierarchy, and therefore withdrew from it—some quietly, others with open opposition and a close union with the German and Swiss Reformers. Many, however, still hoped for a Reformation from within, either through a general council, or by any other concessions. The evangelical tendency, which was favored even by many eminent men among the clergy, attained at last to such importance, that Paul III. himself was not altogether free from its influence. He called several of the most prominent of those men into the Cardinal's college; Contarini first, then Sadolet, Pole and Fregoso, but also Caraffa, the hierarchical zealot. To prepare the way for a council, he formed these men, with several other prelates, into a congregation to elaborate a scheme of a reformation. It is of no little significance that in this scheme (Consilium de emendanda Ecclesia, 1537) the assertion of flatterers, that the power of the Pope was unlimited, is designated as the source of those abuses, which had brought the Church to the verge of destruction. The Pope seemed not averse to a real reformation of his court. Steps were also taken for negotiations with the Protestants. Contarini, accompanied by Bishop Morone, was sent in 1541 as legate to the colloquy at Ratisbon. Among the four doctrinal points on which an agreement had been reached with Melancthon and Bucer, was also the essential one of justification. But here already the extreme opposites showed themselves: Luther was suspicious, and Caraffa took great offence at the formulas agreed upon; political machinations were also set in motion, and strict directions were sent to the legate, which made every compromise, especially on the questions of the Primacy and the Constitution of the Church, an impossibility. Thus Contarini had to return without effecting his purpose. The strict Roman party now gained a decided ascendancy with the Pope. The salvation of the Church was now to be reached in the complete restoration of mediæval Catholicism with all its consequences, and all its enemies were to be crushed by thorough measures of violence.—The first measure was the erection of a general supreme inquisitorial tribunal at Rome, which was to decide in matters of faith, with unlimited power over life and death, and with unsparing rigor against every one, without regard to person or position. On July 21, 1542, was published the bull instituting the new congregation of the holy office, consisting of six cardinals, with Caraffa at their head. They could everywhere delegate priests with an equal power: the secular arm was everywhere required to yield ready assistance. The Pope alone had the power to pardon. Tuscany, Milan, and Naples soon admitted the new Roman institution; all the Italian States furnished the necessary assistance; even Venice itself could not refuse it, only that here secular assessors took part in the examinations of the tribunal. Even literature fell under the scrutiny of the Inquisition: after 1543 no book could be printed without its license, and soon catalogues of prohibited books made their appearance. At last, in 1545, the Council of Trent assembled; but, as an obedient tool of the papacy, and under the direction of papal legates, merely to define the Romish system as distinguished from the Protestant, and to reject also every approximation towards the latter. Thus even the moderate tendency which had endeavored, on the ground of the scriptural doctrine of justification, to effect a reformation in doctrine and church government, became untenable. — A general persecution now brought on the decisive moment for Protestantism in Italy, and a thorough sifting of the hitherto confused elements took place. Compact congregations had almost nowhere been organized, however promising the prospects at various places. The associations of the friends of the gospel had no connecting bond, found no sympathy among the ignorant and oppressed populace, nowhere the protection of the governors. Being mostly of the higher and cultivated classes, their position and relations weighed heavily with many of them. There was besides all this a great variety of views, the germs of dissension and of aberrations in important points of doctrine. All this sufficiently explains the issue of the hopeless conflict of the scarcely awakened new life with the overwhelming power of hatred and bloody persecution on the part of a hierarchy, which was daunted by no means to secure its authority. The weaker were intimidated into recantation; the bolder were driven to an open rupture with the papacy. Many saved themselves by flight; many sealed their confession with imprisonment and at the stake. — Rome itself was the chief director of this persecution, which extended over the whole of Italy. The Protestants at Naples, Ferrara, and Lucca were scattered. Their lot was imprisonment, exile, execution, and at last voluntary expatriation. All Italy trembled. The prisons of the Inquisition at Rome were filled from every direction. The persecutions became even more severe when Caraffa, in his 79th year, became Pope as Paul IV. (1555). His great aim was to purge and restore the Church; and to this end, the extirpation of dissenters became his most eager desire. He did not spare the highest; even the chiefs of the moderate party experienced his persecutions. Cardinal Morone was shut up in the castle of St. Angelo until the death of the Pope; Foscari, bishop of Modena, and San Felice, bishop of Cava, were imprisoned; and Cardinal Pole was summoned from England to defend himself. — Under Pius IV., also, the persecuting zeal of the Inquisition did not abate, though the Pope himself found little pleasure in it. But its bloody activity received a new increase of energy when the zealous Dominican Ghislieri, the faithful aid of Caraffa, and superior of the Inquisition, was elected Pope as Pius V. (1566). He, who had charged the troops which he had sent against the French Huguenots that they should at once kill every heretic who might fall into their hands, knew no mercy. "Romæ quotidie aliquot comburuntur, suffocantur, decollantur." writes T. Eglin, "omnes carceres et custodiæ sunt impletae, adeo ut indices de novis carceribus extruendis laboretur." From all quarters of Italy victims had to be sent to Rome; among the most distinguished of which we may mention Pietro Carnesecchi, formerly apostolical protonotarius, and Antonio dei Pagliarici (see Art.). — The numerous Protestants of Venice also felt the effects of the papal persecutions, although the republic admitted the Inquisition not without resistance and under various restrictions. In 1546, Paul III. warned against the spread of heresy, and many found themselves under the necessity of voluntary expatriation, whilst some recanted, and others were incarcerated for life. In the cities of the Venetian territory the persecution was especially active, for Ghislieri was Inquisitor thereat that time. But after 1557 some protection was afforded to those who were sojourning there for literary or commercial purposes. This perhaps encouraged the native Protestants to call a pastor and secretly to organize themselves into a congregation. This brought on the decisive stroke. They were betrayed and imprisoned, and the Senate now also suffered the death penalty to be executed upon them. The horrid extirpation of the small Waldensian congregations which had existed at St. Pisto and Montalto in Calabria since the end of the 14th cent., forms one of the most gloomy episodes in the gloomy history of Protestantism in Italy. So also the Protestant congregations which had been formed in the Vellin and in Locarno, met the same fate as the Reformation in Italy (See Art. Switzerl. Ref. in.). — Literature: D. GERDES, Specimen Ital. Reform.: Lugd. Bat., 1765; TH. M'CRIZ, Hist. of the Progr. and Suppression of the Reform. in Italy: Edin., 1827; D. ERDMANN, die Ref. u. ihre Märtyrer in Ital.: Berl., 1855; E. F. LEOPOLD, üb. die Ursachen der Ref. u. deren Verfall in Ital. (Zeitschr. f. hist. Theol., 1843, II. 2.); RANKE, die röm. Päbste, vol. 1; F. MEYER, die ev. Gemeinde in Locarno, vol. 1: Zür., 1836; F. TRECHSEL, die prot. Antitrinitarier vor Faust. Socin., vols. II.: Heidelb., 844.

CUNITZ. — Reinecke.

Iturea, one of the five provinces into which, at the time of Christ, ancient Bashan was divided. In Luke 3: 1, Philip, Herod's brother, is called tetrarch of Iturea and Trachonitis. As Jos., Antt. 17, 11, 4, assigns to Philip, Batanea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis, 18, 4, 6, and Trachonitis, Gaulanitis and Batanea, older writers have concluded (Reland, p. 106; Welstein I., 671; Bachiene II., 4, p. 276) that Iturea is identical with Batan. and Auran., or Gaulan. But this supposition is unnecessary, as Jos. might easily overlook so small a province, which he mentions but once (13, 11, 3). Classic authors reckon it with Coelosyria (in the wider sense) and describe it as a mountainous district with many ravines and caves, whose wild inhabitants lived on plunder, but were skilful bowmen (Strabo XVI., p. 753, 55; Plin. H. N., 5, 19; Cic. Phil. II., 24; Virg. Georg. II., 488; Lucan. VII., 230, 514). Under Pompey they submitted to the Romans; but Iturea was first joined to the province of Syria (Tac. Ann. 12, 23, 1; Dio Cass. 59, 12). The name resembles that of Ishmael's son (Gen. 25 : 15; 1 Chron. 1 : 31; 5 : 19), and is still preserved in the present province of Dschedur (Merasid, I., 277) S. W. of Damascus (Burkhardt, Reisen in Syrien I., 477); but the ancient Iturea may have been larger.

ARNOLD.*

Ivo, Bishop of Chartres (Carnotensis), a forerunner of Gratian in the history of jurisprudence, author of a Pannormia and a decretum. In the complete edition of his works, Paris, 1647, fol., containing 287 letters, throwing much light upon his times, 24 discourses, and brief chronicles of Frankish kings, the Pannormia is wanting. Of the year of his birth, and parentage nothing is known. He studied the classics and philosophy in Paris, theology under Lanfranc in Bec; in 1078 became prior of the monastery St. Quentin, which his learning as a theologian and canonist illustrated, and in 1090 bishop of Chartres. He was one of those men whose reputation promoted the interests of the papacy; but he was not servile; on the contrary he freely denounced the abuses of Rome. In the Investiture controversy, his natural moderation and gentleness led him to occupy an intermediate position. The same spirit breathes in his epistles. He died 1115. — (Comp. Neander, Ch. Hist.; Hist. litt. de France X., p. 102, VII., p. 150, &c.).

HAUBER.*

J.

Jabal appears in later Israelitish tradition as one of the three sons of Lamech, with whom the first period of history closes, whilst his three sons stand as representatives of the three classes (agricultural, educational, and military), and open a new period. Another account regards Noah as concluding the first period, and his three sons the progenitors of the several great races of mankind. The former makes Jabal the progenitor of the nomade herdsmen, his brother Jubal the father of musicians, whilst their half-brother—Zilla's son—Tubal Cain, is the inventor of articles wrought from brass and iron (Gen. 4 : 20, &c.; Ewald, Gesch. Isr., I., 320, &c. 1. Aufl.). Their precise abode cannot be ascertained.

RÜTSCHE.*

Jabbok, one of the Eastern tributaries of the Jordan. Rising among the hills of Bashan, it once formed the boundary between the Ammonites and Israelites (Numb. 21 : 24; Deut. 2 : 37; 3 : 16; Josh. 12 : 2; Judges 11 : 13, 22), and enters the Jordan nearly on the latitude of Sichem. It is the modern Wady Zerka, a small, but deep and wild mountain-channel, whose banks are overgrown with reeds and oleander. At high water there are two streams which meet, from E. N. E., and form the main current, but at a point further S. than that usually given on the charts; further N. it is said to run for some distance parallel with the Jordan, about 4 English miles from it (Burckh., Reise, &c., II., 597, &c.; Gesenius, p. 1059, &c.). In Burckhardt's time it still formed the boundary between Moerad and El Belka. But it must be assumed that the present Nahr Amman, the largest stream near the Zerka, which is much longer in a N. W. course, was considered the real source of the ancient Jabbok; for Zerka proper rather divides Gad and the half tribe of Manasseh (Reland, Palest.; Burck. l. c., 612; Seetzen in v. Zach's Correspond. XVIII., 427; Winer; Lynch's Expedition, &c.; Förbigr. in Pauly's Realencykl.

IV., 1; v. Lengerke, Kanaan I., 43, &c.; Ritter, Erdk. XV., 1, p. 270; 2, p. 1035, 1040, &c.). As the interior of the region beyond the Jordan has never yet been satisfactorily explored by Europeans, the designation of the course of the stream is not certain. It is at the ford of Jabbok that the incident in Gen. 32 : 23, &c., is located (See Hebrew for "wrestling"). The Jabbok was formerly confounded with the Jarmuch, which empties into the Jordan further N., called Hieromax by Pliny (H. N. 5, 16. See Seetzen and Burckh., l. c.).

RÜTSCHE.*

Jabin, the name of two Canaanitish kings who dwelt in Hazor, and whose sway extended over the entire valley of the Jordan. The first one named, united with other princes of Canaan, and marched with a large army against the Israelites under Joshua. His hosts were routed at Lake Merom. The cities of the vanquished rulers were then taken; Hazor, being a fortress, was destroyed, lest the enemy might recover and occupy it again (Josh. 19 : 36; cf. Jos. Antt. 5, 5, 1). Subsequently Solomon rebuilt it (1 Kings 9 : 15). Jabin was slain at the taking of Hazor (Josh. 11 and 12 : 29; cf. Lengerke, Kanaan I., 675, &c.; Ewald, Gesch. Isr. II., 1, p. 253, 1. Ausg.). — Under the Judges we meet with another Jabin in Hazor. This will not seem surprising if we consider how speedily the Canaanites revived after Joshua's rapid victories, and restored their overthrown cities. This Jabin must also have been a powerful king, for he had 900 iron chariots, which were very terrible to the Israelites, and oppressed them for 20 years, until his general, Sisera, though aided by other kings (Judges 5 : 19) was discomfited by Barak and Deborah (see Art.). His oppressive rule was thus utterly annihilated (Judges 4 : 2, &c.; Ps. 83 : 10; cf. Ewald, l. c., 378, &c.).

RÜTSCHE.*

Jablonski, Daniel Ernestus, the son of a bishop of the Bohemian Brethren's Church, named Figulus, who changed his name into Jablonski, from Jablunka, in Silesia, the place of his birth, and a grandson of the celebrated Bishop Amos Comenius (see Art.), was born, Nov. 26, 1660, near Danzig, where his father, after manifold persecutions, had found an asylum. Assisted by the Bohemian Brethren, Jablonski studied at the school of Lissa, in Poland, and at the University of Frankfort on the Oder, devoting himself particularly to the Oriental languages. After having visited Holland and England, he became pastor of a Reformed church at Magdeburg (1683), then Rector of the school at Lissa (1686), next court-preacher at Königsberg (1690), and, finally, court-preacher at Berlin (1693). In the year 1698, the Bohemian Brethren in Poland, on the occasion of a Synod held at Lissa, elected and consecrated him one of their bishops. The University of Oxford conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Theology. At Berlin, in addition to his court-chaplaincy, he was a member of the Consistory, a Church-Counsellor, and President of the Royal Academy of Sciences. Jablonski labored as a scholar and as a churchman. In the former respect he prepared a new edition of the Hebrew Old Test., Biblia Heb. punctis, &c.: Berol., 1699; superintended the publication of the Talmud (1715-1721), wrote the Historia Consensus Leucomiriensis: Berl., 1731, &c. In the latter respect, one of the dearest wishes of his heart was to bring about a union between the Lutherans and the Reformed. But his negotiations to this end proved abortive; while those with the Archbishop of Canterbury (1711), concerning the introduction of the service of the Church of England, and, if possible, of the Episcopal system, were broken off by the death of this prelate. After a ministry of 58 years, 48 of which he spent at Berlin as court-preacher, Jablonski died, May 21, 1741, in the 81st year of his age.—His son, Paul Ernestus Jablonski, was Rector at Frankfort on the Oder, and highly esteemed on account of his learning and upright character. T. PRESSEL.—De Schweinitz.

Jabneh (Jabneel, Josh. 15: 11), mentioned as a border city of Judah, W. of Ekron, but by Jos. Antt., 5, 1, 22, assigned to Dan, was first taken from the Philistines and razed by Uzziah (2 Chron. 26: 6). Subsequently it is often called Jamnia (LXX., Jos. 15: 46), and mentioned as a populous city, inhabited by Jews and heathen (PHILO. opp. II., 575, Magn.) between Joppe and Ashdod (1 Macc. 4: 15; 5: 58; 10: 69; Judith 3: 1 (al. 2: 28)). After being long held by the Syrians the Highpriest Simon captured it (Jos. Antt., 13, 6, 7); then the Jews retained it (ib., 13, 15, 4) until Pompey attached it to Syria (Jos. Antt., 14, 4, 4; B. J., 1, 7, 7). Afterwards it was bequeathed to Salome by her brother (Antt. 17, 11, 5). In the Jewish war Vespasian took it (B. J., 4, 8, 2). After the destruction of Jerusalem it became the seat of the Sanhedrim, and a celebrated Jewish Academy, whose history Lightfoot (opp. II., 87, &c.) wrote (cf. Mischna Rosh haaschana, 4, 1; Sanhedr., 11, 4). It was not located at the sea, but had its own harbor (Ptolem., 5, 16, 12) hence Pliny, H. N., 5, 13, speaks of two Jamnias, and Jos., l. c., calls it both a coast, and an interior town. The harbor is said to have been taken by night by Judas Macc. and burned, with its boats, so that the flames were seen at Jerusalem (2 Macc. 12: 7, &c.). Jabneh lay 12 Roman miles S. W. from Diospolis, about 2½ miles N. E. from Ashdod (Itiner. Ant., p. 150; Euseb., Onom.) and 206 stad. from Askalon (Strabo, 16, p. 759). There is still a dilapidated village bearing the ancient name—Jebna—nearly 4 m. from the sea, on a small eminence on the W. side of Wady Rubin. As Jamnia became an episcopal See, and afterwards a place of Mohamm. pilgrimages, ruins of Christian and Islam periods are found in the vicinity. The Crusaders erected the fortress of Ibelin there (See Reland, Palest., 370, 434, &c.; v. Raumer, Paläst., 184; Pauly's Realencykl., IV., 17; Robinson, Palest.; Ritter, Erdk., XVI., 91, 99, 101, 125, &c., 139). RÜRTSCHL.*

Jachin and Boaz, the names of the two brazen pillars which Hiram cast for Solomon, and stood in porch of the temple (1 Kings 7: 15-22). The difficulty of the passage just quoted is increased by Jer. 52: 21, &c.; 2 Chron. 3: 15-17. With all his efforts the historian failed to give for us a clear, definite description of these works of art. Hence the difference of opinion as to the significance of the names and pillars themselves, their position and object, their height and form. See Hirt, "d. Tempel Sal. u. Gesch. d. Bauk. bei d. Alten," I., 120, &c.; Stieglitz, "Gesch. d. Bauk.," § 67; Winer, R. W. B.; Keil, "d. Tempel Sal.," 1839; Bähr, "d. Sal. Tempel mit Berücksicht. s. Verhältn.," &c., 1848; Kugler, "Gesch. d. Bauk.," 1855, pp. 127-30; "Kunstgesch." 2. Aufl., 84; Schnaase, Exkurs, I., 264. Nearly all these authors see in these pillars traces of Etruscan, Phœnician, or Oriental art, and suppose they stood free, in front of the porch, as independent, distinct monuments, not belonging, architecturally, to the edifice; hence their peculiar, symbolical names: "he makes firm," and "in him is strength." But as the rest of the building was constructed in the spirit of the Old Test., and after the pattern of the tabernacle, it seems impossible that so prominent a place would be assigned to pillars modelled after the pattern of those in heathen Phœnician temples.—The pillars were designed to support the projecting roof of the porch (Meyer, "d. Temp. Sal.," 1831; "Blätter für höhere Wahrheit," I., 13; IX., 31; Grüneisen, im Kunstblatt, 1831, Nr. 73, &c.). Thus 1 Kings 7 is most easily explained; and Ewald thinks (Gesch. d. Volkes Isr., III., 1, p. 28, &c.) that the fuller text of 1 Kings 7: 19-22 in the LXX., shows that a crossbeam lay on both pillars, on which the other beams of the roof rested. Hence the height of the pillars; one shaft 18 cubits high, and a chapter of 5 cubits, 23 in all, and 12 cubits in compass (1 Kings 7: 15). According to Jeremiah 52: 21, the shaft was hollow, four fingers in thickness, or, as Ewald explains, had hollow channels four fingers deep. The chapter was oval, terminating above in lily-leaves; the centre was encircled with a network of chain interwoven sevenfold, above and below which were four pomegranates for each point of the compass, from each of which were suspended in brazen rings or ropes, 24 pomegranates, making 200 in all. The lily was the flower of holiness, the pomegranates a symbol of the Word of God (Bähr, l. c.), the chain network a symbol of the divine covenant, the brass and massiveness a symbol of stability. — (See in the Cotta'schen Kunstblatt, 1844, p. 97, &c.; 1848, p. 5, &c.; Illmanns u. Umbreits Stud. u. Krit., 1850, H. 3, p. 421, &c.; H. 3, 614, &c.). H. MERZ.*

Jacob, son of Isaac, יַעֲקֹב, יַעֲקֹב, was the third of the Israelite patriarchs. His name he derived from the fact that in birth he held the heel of his older twin brother Esau (Gen. 25 : 26 ; Jos. 12 : 4). Fact and name — יַעֲקֹב = seize from behind, treat with cunning — were also prophetic of the character of Jacob in his spiritual character (Gen. 27 : 36) ; for Jacob was (see Ewald, Gesch. d. Volk. Isr., I., pp. 350, 92) the most striking image of all the virtues and weaknesses of the people, which not in vain bears his name. It appears from the patriarchal family, also, that a sense for divine things is no hereditary gift of nature. Abraham, the hero of faith, was succeeded by Isaac, a man of quiet, gentle disposition, but not without infirmities, and, upon the whole, of little importance. Jacob, again, is of much more importance ; but his carnal nature is also much stronger. He is particularly distinguished by that shrewdness, which in everything seeks its own advantage, and which is still characteristic of the Jews. This appears from the manner in which he obtained the birthright from Esau, the blessing from Isaac, and his herds from Laban.¹ But he was the man of the election of grace — not that which refers to eternal salvation, but to a historical position in the kingdom of God — Rom. 9 : 10–13 ; hence God did not cease to strive with his perverse nature, until Jacob had been changed into Israel. From this position his entire life must be viewed, and it will divide itself into four periods : 1, his abode with his father, that of his youthful sins ; 2, his sojourn in Mesopotamia, that of his chastening ; 3, his patriarchal career in Canaan, that of his confirmation ; 4, the close of his life in Egypt. — Jacob's birth, also, like that of Isaac, is a miracle of grace, though no longer in the same degree : after a barrenness of 20 years, Rebecca, as an answer to the prayer of her husband, gave birth to twin sons, Gen. 25 : 20. In this case grace appears especially as election by race, since God set aside, even before the birth of the children, the first-born, who had a natural right on his side, in favor of the younger (v. 23). But the fulfilment of this divine counsel, of which he had no doubt heard from his mother, whose favorite he was on account of his quiet and excellent conduct (while the father, fond of venison, preferred Esau the hunter), Jacob could not in patience and faith leave unto God ; but thought it necessary to execute or at least hasten it ; first by shrewdly turning to his advantage the faintness and hunger of Esau in order to purchase the birthright of the latter for a mess of pottage ; afterwards fraudulently depriving him, at the suggestion and with the help of his mother, of the paternal blessing, which Isaac, of course contrary to the design of God, intended to bestow upon Esau. But sin is ever followed by punishment. Instead of obtaining possession of his blessing and birthright, Jacob must avoid the vengeance of Esau, by flight into Mesopotamia ; and Rebecca, partly to dispose the father favorably to this journey, partly also to preserve to Jacob the blessing of the divine election, and to keep the patriarchal family in its purity, obtained from Isaac the command that Jacob should seek a wife among his relatives there. At the departure, Isaac, who had now become clearly conscious of Jacob's designation, blesses him ; and it is remarkable that this blessing confers upon the elect the specific gifts of the covenant and the promise ; whilst the earlier one intended for Esau (v. 27–29) moved more in the general sphere of nature (27 : 46 ; 28 : 5). — 2. Nor does God forsake his elect. On the eve of leaving the holy land and journeying to a more or less heathen country Jehovah once more reveals himself to him in his entire reality and grace, partly to guard him against apostasy from his God and designation ; partly to afford to him a powerful stay amid his approaching trials and afflictions in the faithful protection of God and his angels. This is the immediate purpose of the beautiful vision of the ladder, in which Jehovah at the same time solemnly transfers to Jacob the patriarchal promise ; and which, especially in this connection, obtains a wider and deeper meaning (see John 1 : 52), since it typifies the last purpose of the promise — the most intimate union of heaven and earth, God and man, Gen. 28 : 10–22. For Jacob himself this vision with the words spoken is the complement and ratification of the paternal blessing ; he is thereby placed formally in possession of all the rights of the covenant and the promise, and God himself promises to fulfil them faithfully and entirely. — In Mesopotamia, where he arrived in his 77th year, Jacob experiences the jus talionis ; since he is in various ways defrauded by Laban, and has to endure various adversities. On his arrival he becomes acquainted with Rachel at the well, conceives a love for her, and serves her father seven years for her. But instead of her Leah is brought to him, just as formerly he himself had fraudulently taken the place of Esau. After another service of seven years he obtains Rachel also. During this second septennium his children, except Benjamin, are born to him. Having experienced this pleasure, he desires to return home ; but the covetous Laban does not permit him, promises him as his wages, the speckled, spotted and brown sheep and goats. God now blesses him richly, although Laban changes his wages ten times. But even here Jacob thinks it necessary to assist the divine blessing by his own cunning, and therefore, during the period of conception, put pilled rods in the watering troughs before the flocks, and afterwards set the faces of the flocks toward the ring-streaked. His increasing wealth excites the envy of Laban and his sons ; Jacob, therefore, after a service of six years, resolves to return home, which he is also ordered to do by divine command. But having no clear conscience towards Laban, he departed secretly with all his own; Laban pursued him, but was commanded by God not to injure him. They made a covenant with each other, and separated in peace. Gen. 29: 31—3. Jacob thus returned to Canaan; outwardly richly blessed, but inwardly, notwithstanding all the humiliations which he had experienced, not yet thoroughly purified. This purification was now to take place; for from this time he appears as the bearer of the patriarchate, though Isaac still lived for some time yet. God again gave him a token of his grace; for, on re-entering the holy land, the angels of God appeared to him as an assurance of the protection of which he felt in need of against Esau (Gen. 32). The fear of the vengeance of Esau, who was approaching with 400 men, apparently with hostile design, terrified Jacob deeply, but also became the means of his inward renewal. Thus the most important relation of his life, that to Esau, against whom his sinfulness had come to its outward expression, was now also to become the means of his repentance. In an humble, fervent prayer, which, as characteristic of this inward turning-point of his life, has been thought worthy of record (32: 10—13), he poured out his heart to Jehovah: he then sends presents to Esau (v. 14—22), put his family across the Jabbok during the night, but he himself stayed behind (v. 23—25). This nightly solitude of Jacob had its inward meaning in connection with the other events: he intended to speak out his whole soul before God, since he is overwhelmed with the sense of his sin and guilt against his brother. He felt that not only Esau, but God himself opposed him; and that he must first be reconciled with God, before he could be reconciled with Esau. God now really appeared to him in bodily form. Before this, when mere outward protection had been needed, mere angels had appeared to Jacob; now, when the inward life of faith is the point in question, God himself meets him. The angels appear as friends, but God appears to him as still an enemy whom he must yet overcome; over against the world the elect of God is secure, but as regards his own sin he must yet wrestle with God in a penitential agony. Even though Jacob did not, perhaps, at once know the man who wrestled with him, nevertheless the thoughts with which his entire soul was filled soon taught him who he was; this he also signified by the blessing which he craved, and by the name Pniel which he afterwards gave to the place. Jacob, therefore, really met God as his enemy, whose anger he has excited by his sins; he wrestled with an angry God, until he converted his anger into a blessing; for whilst he wrestled outwardly, he prayed and wept inwardly (Eph. 12: 4—5; Col. 4: 12; Rom. 15: 30). This is the key of the entire scene. Wrestling in penitence and faith, Jacob overcame the anger of God. But God disjoined Jacob's thigh, as a memorial of his crushed natural man. Jacob, however, once more received from God himself the blessing which he had formerly usurped; and the new name of Israel, as a sign that he had vanquished the anger of God and man (Esau). At the break of day Jacob had become a new man: the result of the struggle was, that by the utmost effort of the soul Jacob was brought into the relation to God, which Abraham had formerly held (B. Baur, Rel. des A. T., I., p. 101). Nothing in the text justifies us in referring, as is done by some, the scene to the sphere of mere internal vision; nor in dividing it into two distinct parts, making the wrestling to be an "image of the perverseness of Jacob's former life," and of the ineffectual struggle of God with his sinful nature; and his praying to be the turning-point of his renewal.—Jacob soon after discovered that Esau's anger was also overcome, for the brothers met in peace. After a short sojourn at Succoth, Jacob made his abode near Schechem (ch. 33, comp. John 4: 5, etc.). He had now to make a series of sad experiences in his family, which tried his faith, but also anew revealed to him the favor of God. The violation of his daughter by the son of the king of Schechem is followed by the horrid vengeance of Simeon and Levi (ch. 34). Being thus compelled to leave the country, Jacob, at the command of God, removed to Bethel, where he purged his household of the strange gods which they had brought from Mesopotamia (ch. 31: 19, 30, etc.), or had adopted in Canaan (34: 1, 9, 16, 29; 35: 1—8). To reward this fidelity and to prepare him for the loss of his beloved Rachel, God again appeared to him at Bethel, renewing the name of Israel, and the patriarchal promise; thereupon Jacob also renewed the name of Bethel (v. 9—15). Journeying southward, Rachel died near Ephrath, or Bethlehem, when she had given birth to Benjamin. His sorrow was increased by the violation of his concubine by his son Reuben (v. 22). Thus, at once blessed and bowed with grief, Jacob returned to his father at Hebron. Soon after Isaac died, and Jacob now became patriarch in the complete sense of the word. This event is solemnly introduced by the enumeration of Jacob's 12 sons (v. 23—9). Since Jacob was born in the 60th year of his father (25: 26), he was 120 years old at his father's death; and since Joseph was born in the 91st year of Jacob, he was already 29 years old at the death of Isaac, and was therefore already in the last year of his Egyptian captivity (Baumgarten, theol. Comm. z. Pent., I., 298).—The partiality shown to Joseph by Jacob (37: 3, 4), was again followed by its proper punishment in the supposed death of his favorite (ch. 37). But this calamity was providentially converted into a blessing (50: 20). Joseph having attained to high honors in Egypt, not only preserved his family in time of famine, but also removed them to Egypt, where it was to grow up into a nation, and learn civilization, so that afterwards under Moses it might achieve its independence.—4. Thus Jacob spent the evening of his life in Egypt. This last era in his life is signalized by a vision, in which God sanctions his removal to Egypt, and promises his blessing (ch. 46: 1, etc.). He arrived in Egypt in his 130th year (ch. 47: 9), blessed Pharaoh to whom he was presented, and obtained from him Goshen as his abode (ch. 46: 28; 47: 12). Here the patriarch lived 19 years (ch. 47: 27, 28). When he felt his death approaching, he caused Joseph to swear that he would bury him in the family burial-place in Canaan (47: 29-31). To reward Joseph for his great services to the family, he adopted his two eldest sons; giving a preference to Ephraim the younger, above Manasseh (ch. 48). He now prophetically blessed his twelve sons (ch. 49), describing in poetic language the character, name, past life, and future history of each. The right of primogeniture was transferred to Judah, since Reuben, Simeon, and Levi have proved themselves unworthy of it by their misdeeds. Judah was therefore made the prince among his brethren, and bearer of the promises. In this way Jacob was made worthy of bringing the Messianic promises a step further; for he predicted the reigning tribe, and a kingdom of Israel under the sceptre of Judah, which was never to end (see concerning this debated passage, the Comm. on Gen. by Tuch, Knobel, Baumgarten, Delitzsch, etc.; but especially the work of Diestel, der Segen Jacobs, the latest researches of Hengstenberg, Christol. des A. T., 2d ed., I., p. 54-104. Kurtz, Gesch. des A. B., I., 2d ed., p. 314-338; II., p. 546-563. Hofmann, Schriftbeweis, II., 2, p. 480).—Concerning the genuineness of the blessing of Jacob, see, besides Diestel, especially Kurtz, I., p. 331-338.—When Jacob died, Joseph caused him to be embalmed by the Egyptians, and to be buried with much pomp and lamentation in the cave of Macphelah.—Literature: Tuch, Knobel, Ewald, bibl. Realwörterb., Roos, Baumgarten, Delitzsch, Kurtz, Hengstenberg, Beitr. zur Einl. ins A. T., 2d and 3d vol., Heim, Bibelstunden, Tuttlingen, 1845.

* Concerning the position from which Genesis views these facts and traits, see KURTZ, Hist. of the Old Test.

AUBERLEN.—Reinecke.

Jacobites, is the name under which, after the middle of the 6th century, the Syrian and sometimes also the Egyptian Monophysites are known. To the Monophysites, or the Eutychianizing party, which arose about the middle of the 5th century (see Art. Eutychianism, Ephesus, Chalcedon, and Monophysites), belong the Syrian Jacobites, the Copts, Abyssinians, and Armenians. These four churches are distinct only in ecclesiastical jurisdiction and several unimportant rites, whilst they agree in all important matters of doctrine. The first three have a still closer connection with each other, since the Abyssinian or Ethiopic Church has always been dependent upon the Coptic; and since the patriarchs of the Syrian Jacobites and Copts were accustomed upon assuming their office to recognize each other by sending a confession of faith in the form of an epistola synodica (see RENAUDOT, liturg. orient. collect., T. I., p. 254, 335, 432. ASSEMANI, bibl. or., T. II., p. 126, 363, and diss. de Monoph. § III.). The Monophysite doctrine had been spread among the Syrians, under the auspices of the Emperors Zeno and Anastasius, especially by Xenajas, B. of Mabug, P. Fullo, and Severus, P. of Antioch. Under Justin I., on the other hand, a large number of Syrian bishops had been exiled, since they refused to adopt the resolutions of the Council of Chalcedon. During the distress some Monophysite priests, held in durance at Constantinople, found in the presbyter Jacob Barâdai the man who could restore their cause. He accomplished their expectation. Elevated by them to the dignity of an oecumenical Metropolitan, he hastened from place to place through Asia Minor, clothed in beggar's garb and shrinking from no toil; and encouraged the faithful, established congregations, and appointed everywhere bishops, presbyters and deacons. At that time Maris, B. of Singar, was the only Monophysite bishop who was still in office. Through the efforts of Jacob their number again increased to nearly 100,000, whence they called themselves Jacobites.—Jacob was monk and presbyter in the monastery of Phasilta, near Nisibis, and, after 541, B. of Edessa (Assem. II., 332). From that time until his death, in 578, are 37 years. From the mean clothing in which he passed in the service of his party through the East, he received the surname of Barâdai; sometimes also Zanzalus, (τζάντζαλος). Jacob supported Sergius, elected patriarch by the Monophysites after the death of Severus, against the Cath. patriarch, Ephraem of Amid; and after the death of Sergius he himself inducted Paul as patriarch, whilst Athanasius was the Catholic successor (see Dionys. Telmahr. chron. in Assem. I., 424; also Barhebr., II., 331). Of literary labors Jacob has left little or nothing. An Anaphora attributed to him has been translated into Latin by Renaudot (Liturg. or. collect., T. II., p. 333). An Arabic work on the Jacobite doctrines attributed to him, which the Maronites, Abr. Echellensis (in Eutych. vindic., P. II., p. 280, 283), and Nairon (Euopolia, p. 28, 29, 35, 41, and diss. de Maron., p. 21, 38, 39) mention under the title of Catechesis, as also an appendix to it and a homily, have been justly denied to be his by Assemani.—It was from this Jacob that the Jacobites received their name. At times they are also called Severians, Dioscurians, Eutychians, and Theodosians. We are limited here to the Jacobites in the more restricted sense, viz.: the Syrian Jacobites, who dwelt in Syria proper, in Mesopotamia and Babylonia.—The distinctive doctrines and rites of the Jacobites are the same as those of the Monophysites. 1. They teach a single nature in Christ, which arose from the conjunction of the divine and human (ex duabus naturis, non in duabus). Hence they are often charged with docetism. But the later Jacobites, as also the Copts, Abyssinians and Armenians, say that Christ, even after the incarnation and the union of the two natures, had retained a true human as well as divine nature. They also add: "Christum non modo ex duabus naturis compositum fuisse, sed etiam ex duabus personis." That the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son, is denied by Xanjas: the Syrian Church, however, remained wholly unaffected by the controversy concerning the "filioque." The prevalent expression among them is: S. S. procedit a Patre et accipit a Filio.—2. They reject the conclusions of the Council of Chalcedon, and recognize, on the other hand, the second Synod of Ephesus.—3. As teachers or saints they regard Jacob of Sarug, Jacob of Edessa, Dioscurus, Severus, P. Fullo, and Jacob Barâdai; they reject Eutyches.—4. In the Lord's Supper they made use of leavened bread. They differ from the Copts in mixing, like the Nestorians, some salt and oil with the bread. The latter must also be freshly baked, panis quotidianus, as they call it. The Jacobite teachers also asserted that the number of wafers should always be an odd one, except the number 2, which also was allowed.—5. They always make the sign of the cross with only one finger.—6. The election of bishops and patriarchs was often made by the lot. Image and saint worship, especially that of Mary, they adopted from the Greek and Roman Churches. Some Catholic authors try to burden them with as many heresies as possible; whilst others, such as Renaudot and Assemani, treat them with great liberality.—The Patriarch of the Syrian Jacobites is styled "Patr. of Antioch," since the succession is derived from Severus Antiochus. But since the Jacobites, as being heretics, were never tolerated at Antioch by the Greeks, their patriarchs always resided in other cities and monasteries, especially at Amid (Diarbekr), until, in 1166, the monastery of St. Ananias, called Deiru-s-Sa'farâni, near the City of Mârdin, became for a long time their permanent residence. During the great schism, which lasted from 1364 to 1494, the legitimate patriarch continued to reside at Mârdin, the Ciceronian at Sîs, the "Syrian" at the monastery of Barsumas, near Malatja, and the Patr. of Tur-Abdin in the monastery of St. Jacob at Salach. After the 16th century the residence of the patriarch was mostly at Caranis, i. e., Amid. The see of the B. of Antioch adjoined at Arisch, on the boundary between Palestine and Egypt, that of the Coptic P. of Alexandria; concerning Jerusalem the two were in dispute: in later times the city possessed both a Coptic and a Syrian Jacobite patriarch. Subordinate to the patriarch was the head of the more eastern Jacobites, the Primas Orientis, called also the Maphrian or Fructifier, with reference to his office of ordaining bishops and confirming the patriarch by the imposition of hands. Subject to him were the Jacobites beyond the Tigris and a portion of Mesopotamia; the rest of Mesopotamia, as also Syria Proper, Phœnicia, Palestine, Cilicia, and Armenia, were subject to the patriarch. The first Maphrian, ordained by Jacob Barâdai, was Achudemes. His seat at present is Mosul, but his office has become merely titular. An election and ordination of a new patriarch may take place whenever the Maphrian, as president, and twelve bishops, to whom the votes of the other bishops must have been delegated, are assembled. A Maphrian can be elected only in the presence of the patriarch. In doubtful elections recourse is had to the lot. After 878 the patriarch elect often assumed a new name; but since the 14th cent. the name Ignatius became the permanent one. The patriarchs of the Syrian Jacobites are enumerated in Barhebræus' Syr. Chronicle and its continuation (in Assem., bibl. or., II., 321–386). Assemani (bibl. or., II., diss. de Monoph. § X.) describes the Ordines and induction into office. It is not uncommon to ordain a married man as deacon or presbyter, though it is not allowed to contract marriage after ordination; if this should take place, the offender is degraded to the laity. Monasticism was always highly esteemed. The most noted monasteries are enumerated by Assemani (T. II., diss. de Monoph., § X.). The monks do not belong to the clergy, though bishops are always elected from their number. The various Liturgies used by the Jacobites have been translated by Renaudot (Lit. or. collect., T. II., 1716, 4to.) into Latin. The first of them, both extant in the Greek and also used by the orthodox, is ascribed to James, the brother of the Lord. The Missale Chaldaicum ad us. eccl. Maronitarum, published at Rome, in 1592, is also Jacobite, though somewhat accommodated to the sense of the Papacy.—During its most flourishing period the Jacobite Church possessed many distinguished men. Its authors are given by Assemani in his Biblioth. orientalis. The most distinguished are John, B. of Asia (see Art.); Thomas of Harkel; Jacob of Edessa: patr. Dionysius; John, B. of Dara; Mose Bar-Kipha; Dionysius Bar-Saltbi, B. of Amid; Jacob, B. of Tagrit; and especially Gregorius Abulfarag Barhebræus (see Art.).—Amongst the Eastern emperors, Zeno and Anastasius alone had favored the Jacobites. Justinian's efforts to reunite them with the Church were unsuccessful. Under the later emperors, as well as under the Mahometan supremacy, the Syrian Jacobites were much persecuted, whilst their Egyptian brethren were much more favorably situated (Assem., T. II., diss. de Monoph., § VII.). During the age of Gregory XIII. (1572–85) their entire number in Syria, Mesopotamia, and Babylonia was reduced to 50,000, most of whom were poor inhabitants of villages. Subordinate to the patriarch were five metropolitan bishops and six bishops. In 1740 Pococke found in Damascus, among 20,000 Christians, only 200 Jacobites; Buckingham, in 1816, speaks of 2000 Jacobites among the 20,000 inhabitants of Mârdin, near which he found two Jacob. monasteries. Their number varies but little, perhaps, at the present time. In Syria, according to Robinson, their number is very small. Their largest congregation seems to be in the city of Sadad.—Since the 14th century various though unsuccessful efforts were made to unite them with the Rom. Church. More successful were, in the 17th cent., the labors of Achigian, who afterwards became the patriarch of the Cath. party. His successor was Peter (Ignatius XXV.); who, however, was exiled by the opposition. At a subsequent period the work was resumed, so that for a considerable time already a patriarch of the Papal Jacobites has resided at Haleb. But the Syrian Catholics at Damascus and Rasheia have only quite lately become united with Rome. On Mt. Lebanon there are several small monasteries inhabited by Roman Jacobite monks (Robinson's Palest., vol. 3.)

E. ROEDIGER.—Reinecke.

Jacob von Mies, called Jacobellus (Bohemian, Jakoubet), on account of his small stature, was one of the principal originators of the controversy which prevailed in Bohemia, in the latter half of the 14th century, respecting the reintroduction of the cup in the Lord's Supper. Little is known of his early years. Born at Misa, in Bohemia, he studied at Prague, receiving the degree of Bachelor of Arts at the same time with Hus, and then obtained the charge of a parish at Trina. Afterwards he was called to Prague, where he was first stationed at the Church of St. Michael, but eventually became preacher in the Bethlehem Chapel. The opinions expressed by Petrus Dresdensis, induced Jacob von Mies to examine the question of the Lord's Supper, from a scriptural and ecclesiastical point of view, and he arrived at the conclusion, that the withdrawal of the cup from the laity, was contrary to the Bible, and to the custom of the early Church. In 1414 he began fearlessly to promulgate his views, by means of sermons and public disputations, and practised, in the Communion, what he taught. Many of the clergy followed his example; others, with the archbishop at their head, strongly opposed him. Hus, who was at Constance, emphatically sustained Jacobellus. The controversy was continued by publications, of which the most important, written by Jacobellus, were: Demonstratio per testimonia scripturæ patrum atque doctorum communicationem calicis in plebe christiana esse necessariam (in v. d. Hardt, T. III., p. 804, sqq.); and De remanentia panis post consecrationem, in which he positively denied the transubstantiation of the bread. In 1415 (June 15) the Council of Constance issued its Decretum contra communionem sub utraque et contra Jacobum de Misa. Jacobellus replied to this decree, and the controversy increased. In spite of its bitterness, he remained in his office. With the exception of the dogma of the Lord's Supper, his doctrines agreed with those of the Romish Church; and he even defended the doctrine of purgatory against the Waldenses. He died at Prague, in 1429. Comp. J. C. Martini, Diss. de J. de M., &c., Altdorf, 1753; Schröckh, Ch. Hist., Th. 33, p. 330; &c. NEUDECKER.—De Schweinitz.

Jacob's Well, so called because dug by Jacob on the land he bought near Sichem (Gen. 33:19; LXX. 48:22; Joshua 24:32. Cf. John 4:5, etc.). It is still pointed out under the old name (also called The well of the Samaritan by Christians). It is hewn in the rock, near the foot of Mt. Gerizim, at the opening of the valley, on the highway from Jerusalem to Galilee, about a mile and a half East of the present Nablus. Maundrell, (Journ., 62, &c.) says it is 105 feet deep; Wilson (Lands of the Bible, II., 54, etc.), more correctly, 75 feet, covered with a stone arch, and closed with one or two large stones. It contained "living" (fresh, not rain) water, but Robinson and Wilson found it dry. The spring was probably closed up or exhausted. It bears evident marks of high antiquity; near it are the ruins of an old church, which the Crusaders, already, found fallen down. Not only modern Samaritans, but a tradition reaching to the 4th cent., attest the identity of this place (Itin. Burdig., p. 276, sq. ed. Parthey; p. 587, ed. Wesseling). Jacob dug this well in a region well furnished with water, that he might have undisputed right to it (Gen. 26:19, &c.). The "Christian in Palestine," in plate 27, furnishes a view of the place.—(See Robinson, Palest.; Ritter, Erdk., XVI., 654, etc.; among older writers only Hamelsveld, bibl. Geogr., II., 396, &c.). RÜETSCHL.*

Jacobi (Passaranti), a Dominican, of noble parentage, in Florence. He was distinguished in the 14th cent. as a pulpit orator, and religious author. Most noted is his "Lo specchio di vera penitenzia" (Flor., 1495, 1585; Ven., 1581; Flor., 1681), first written in Latin, in elegant style.—(Cf. MARFEE, storia della litterat. ital., Mil., 1825, I., 229–31; Script. Ord. Praed., I., 645). He died in Florence, June 15, 1357.

TH. PRESSEL.*

Jacoponi da Todi, a Franciscan of the 13th cent., distinguished by his spiritual songs. After having become Doctor of Civil Law, he was led, by the sudden death of his wife, to devote himself to a religious life. His eccentric and indecent manner of displaying his humility, by exposing himself to ridicule, made the Franciscans hesitate to receive him. But a poem on contempt of the world satisfied them of his sanity. He is regarded as the author of the "Stabat Mater." He died Dec. 25, 1306. (Cf. WADDING, Annal. Min. (Rom., 1733), V., 407, etc.; RADERI, Viridarium Sanctorum).

TH. PRESSEL.*

Jael, the wife of Heber, the Kenite. When Sisera, the general of Jabin, King of Hazor, was vanquished by Barak, and in his flight was invited by Jael to take refuge in her tent, to which a strange man would otherwise not have been admitted, she put him to death (Judges 4:17, &c.), as a national foe, against whom, in time of war, such treachery was thought allowable (Judges 5:24, etc. Bertheau on the passage. Ewald, Gesch. Isr., II., 1, p. 267, 381 (1. Ausg.).)

RÜETSCHL.*

Jair (in the N. T., Mark 5:22, Ἰάϊρος) is called, Numb. 32:41, a son of Manasseh, who took the tent villages of Gilead, and called them Havoth-Juir. But the sons of Machir, another son of Manasseh, had previously taken Gilead itself (39, 40), and Nobah, who may likewise have belonged to the tribe of Manasseh, completed the conquest (42). From Deut. 3:14, we learn that these villages of Jair were in Bashan, and from Joshua 13:30, that they were 60 in number, and might be called cities (cf. 1 Kings 4:13; 1 Chron. 2:21–23). In 1 Chron. 2:23, we learn that this district was retaken by the Geshurites and Arameans. Hence we must presume that 30 of the cities, of which Segub held 23, were subsequently retaken. It is a matter of fact that the Judge, 2) Jair, who of course may have borne the same name as his ancestor (Judges 10:3, etc.), held these 30 cities, whether he obtained them by conquest or inheritance; 1 Chron. 2:23, implies the former supposition. If then, Jair, the Judge, or his father, took 30 of these towns from the Geshurites or Arameans, nothing is more certain than that David restored the rest to Israel (2 Sam. 8:3–6). Hence under Solomon we find 60 cities with walls and gates. Thus the whole matter is based upon plain historical facts. For it is well known that Israel lost many places taken under Moses, which were subsequently reconquered, even though such reconquests are not always explicitly stated.—3) Another Jair was Mordecai's father, Esther 2:5.—4) Jairus, a ruler of the synagogue, whose daughter Jesus restored to life (Mark 5:22; Luke 8:41; Cf. Matth. 9:18). The declaration of Jesus implies that death had not fully set in, although, but for his intervention, it would certainly have taken place. The case shows that Jesus never took advantage of mere appearances.

Vaihinger.*

James in the New Testament. The N. T. itself knows of only two apostolical men of this name, viz.: the Apostles James the Elder and James the Less. Ecclesiastical tradition, however, as well as modern theology, have separated into two parties; one of which has divided James the Less into two, viz.: the Apostle James, the son of Alphaeus, and James the Just, the brother of the Lord; whilst the other has maintained the identity of the two. — That James, the son of Zebedee, or the Elder, and James, the son of Alphaeus, or the Less, were distinct, is evident from the catalogues of the apostles (Matth. 10:2-3; Mark 3:17, 18; Luke 6:14-15; Acts 1:13). James the Less, however (ὁ μικρός, Mark 15:40), the son of Alphaeus and Mary (Matth. 27:56; Mark 15:40), appears in evangelical and apostolical history, at the same time as a brother of the Lord (Matth. 13:55; Mark 6:3; Gal. 1:19), and leader of the Church at Jerusalem (Acts 15:21); in Josephus (Ant., 20, 3, 1) as brother of the Lord with the surname δικάτωρος, and in Hegesippus (Euseb., H. E., II., 1) with the surname δίκαιος. This difference of name seems to suggest a difference of persons. — But the hypothesis which has really made a third James of James the Just, seems to have its origin in apocryphal and legendary interests. As regards the latter, it is known that the ancient Church was fond of multiplying the names of saints. As instances take the names of John, Mark, Epaphras, Luke, and especially Judas, Lebbeus, Thaddeus. In the duplication of James the apocryphal interest was most prominent. We know from the Clementines that the Ebionites strove to elevate the authority of James, as being the brother of the Lord, above that of all the other apostles (see the Clement. Homil., and Credner's Einleit. in das N. T., p. 575). Already, in the age of the apostles, the Jewish Christians called him, with emphasis, the brother of the Lord, and thrust him forward as superior in authority to the other apostles (Gal. 1:17, 2:9; v. 12). The duplication became complete through the apocryphal gospel of Peter (see Orig. in Matth., T. X., 3), and the apocryphal Apostolical constitutions (II., 59, in the ed. of Ueltzen, cap. 55). On the other hand three highly important witnesses of the highest antiquity speak in favor of the identity of the apostle and J. the Just. Hegesippus evidently speaks of them as identical (Euseb., H. E., II., 23; comp. Schneckenburger, Annot. ad. ep. Jac., p. 143): διαδέχεται δὲ τὴν ἐκκλησίαν μετὰ τῶν ἀποστόλων ὁ ἀδελφὸς τοῦ κυρίου Ἰάκωβος. Jerome, in his Catalogue, translates incorrectly, "after the apostles;" Rufinus correctly, "with the apostles." He assumed the government of the Church at Jerusalem with the apostles: i. e., he did not become sole bishop, but the co-operation of the other apostles was, from the nature of the case, understood. As bishop he is distinguished from the apostles, although he still continues one of them. — Concerning the parentage of James, Hegesippus (H. E., IV., 22) speaks plainly. He says that

James the Just had been succeeded as bishop by Simeon, son of Cleopas, who was descended from the same uncle of the Lord, and that all had given this distinction to him as the second relative of the Lord. According to Hegesippus, then, James the Just is James, the son of Alphaeus. The second witness, Clemens, of Alexandria, speaks still more plainly (Eus., II., 1). After his resurrection the Lord delivered the Gnosis to James the Just, to John and Peter, who communicated it to the other apostles. Clemens then says expressly: there were two named James, viz.: the Just, who was thrown from the pinnacle of the temple, and another who was beheaded. Add to this the testimony of Origen (Comm. in Matth., c. 17), and of the Gospel to the Hebrews, according to which latter Christ appeared after his resurrection to James the Just, the brother of the Lord. This is no doubt the same appearance which Paul mentions (1 Cor. 15:7). Thus the matter of identity stood until Eusebius laid the foundation for the distinction. Eusebius seems frequently to hide his uncertainty beneath obscurity. He is thus obscure as regards his opinion concerning the testimony of Clemens, which he quotes, lib., II., 1. But in I., 12, he evidently wishes to place the brother of the Lord among the 70 disciples. This is the subject of the chapter; and now, after he had spoken of the various appearances of Christ after his resurrection, and had lastly mentioned that to James, he adds: ἐξ δὲ καὶ οὗτος τῶν φερομένων τοῦ σωτῆρος μαθητῶν, ἀλλὰ μὴν καὶ ἀδελφῶν ἦν. — Even in this passage it is surprising that the words μαθητῶν, ἀλλὰ μὴν καὶ are found only in the Codex Regius (see the ed. of Heinichen, p. 76). More decisive is the passage in Comm. ad Iesai on 17:5. ROTH, Anfänge, I., p. 265). However, after the time of Eusebius the legendary tradition becomes more prominent. The words of Cyril of Jerus., indeed, καὶ τοῖς ἀποστόλοις, καὶ Ἰακώβῳ τῷ ταύτης τῆς ἐκκλησίας ἐπισκόπῳ, might still be interpreted in harmony with Acts 5:29: ὁ Πέτρος καὶ οἱ ἀπόστολοι. With Gregory of Nyssa (de resur. Or. II.) and Chrysostom (Hom. V. in Matth.) the distinction becomes still more decided, but neither of them has historical grounds. Gregory has no weight whatever, since he proceeds from the false premise that James the son of Alphaeus was called major as apostle; and that the other was no apostle, because called minor. Chrysostom proceeds from the ground that the brother of the Lord for a long time did not believe, but that the Apostle James believed; and hence they were different persons. Epiphanius regarded the brother of the Lord as also an apostle (see Hæres. 29, contr. Nazoræos, comp. THEILE, Comm. in ep. Jac., p. 37). Jerome contradicts himself (see Natal. Alexandri, H. E., IV., pars. I., p. 58). Augustine calls the B. of Jerusalem apostle also (contra Cresconium. Comp. Euseb., by Heinichen, the note, 219). Ecclesiastical antiquity, therefore, closes with a decided difference of opinion, though not with a decided duplication of James the Less. After the Reformation the question is resumed in the interest of theology. According to Luther the author of the Epistle of James is "some good, pious man." But also Grotius and Rich. Simon are in favor of the distinction; in more recent times, Herder, Clemens, Credner, Schaff, De Wette, Neander, Niedner, Kern, Winer, Stier, Rothe, and perhaps a large majority of recent theologians. In favor of their identity are Natal. Alexander, Baronius, Lardner, Pearson, Buddeus, Baumgarten, Semler, Gabler, Eichhorn, Pott, Hug, Bertholdt, Guericke, Schneckenburger, Meier, Steiger, Gieseler (Eccl. History), and Theile (Comm. in Ep. Jac., Proleg., p. 36); so also Lange (Leb. Jesu., II., Bd., p. 140. Positive Dogmat., p. 623; Das apost. Zeitalt., I., 189). The question has been especially treated by Zaccaria, Pott, Kern, Demme, Wieseler. More recently Ph. Schaff has written in favor of making a distinction (Das Verhältn. des Jac., Brud. d. Herrn. u. Jac. Alph., Berl., 1842); most lately in his Gesch. der Christl. Kirche, I Bd., p. 311. Merckersburg, 1851. We will now give the reasons for making the distinction, in which we follow Winer. 1, James Alphei could not—"since Jesus had a brother of this name," quod erat demonstrandum—be called without confusion ἀδελφὸς τοῦ κυρίου, when he was a mere cousin (ἀνεψιός). The usual refutation of this reason advances two points: 1, the more extensive use of the word brother among the Hebrews for near relationship in general; 2, the expression in the Clementines, hom. II., 35: Ἰακώβου τῷ λεχθέντι ἀδελφῷ τοῦ κυρίου. But it must rather be shown that James Alphei was really the brother of the Lord. According to Hegesippus (Euseb., III., 11) Alpheus Cleopas (Cleopas-Alpheus, see Art.), the father of Simeon, second B. of Jerusalem, was a brother of Joseph, and hence Simeon was a cousin of Jesus. The wife of this Alpheus was Mary, who is commonly, though erroneously, regarded as a sister of the mother of Jesus; for Wieseler has shown (in the Stud. u. Krit., 1840, 3, p. 648) that John 19:25, should be read: Now there stood by the cross of Jesus his mother, and his mother's sister (Salome)—Mary, the wife of Cleopas, and Mary Magdalene. The sons of Alpheus, therefore, are really only step-cousins of the Lord on the father's side. How then did they become his brothers? The general custom of the Israelites furnishes the simplest hypothesis (see John 19:26-7). Cleopas had died; Joseph, the foster-father of Jesus, was (according to Hegesippus, Euseb., III., 11) his brother; he now became the foster-father of the sons of Cleopas also; and henceforth the families of Joseph and of Alpheus—the other Mary, therefore, and her sons, James and Joses, Simon and Judas, besides several daughters—formed a single family (Matth. 13:35; Mark 6:3). After Joseph had also died, the older brothers of Jesus, especially James, who very probably were older than Jesus, assumed the government of the family (Mark 3:31; John 7:3). In this way the sons of Alpheus became, according to Jewish law, the brothers of Jesus. According to Schneckenburger's hypothesis, on the other hand, the mother of Jesus removed, after the early death of Joseph, to the house of her sister, the wife of Alpheus. We must, however, even in this case, suppose an adoption to have taken place. But we know that Joseph was still living when Jesus was twelve years old, and perhaps a considerable time thereafter. We know nothing of the kind of Alpheus (Cleopas in Luke 24:18, is evidently a different person). It is therefore most probable that both families were united in the house of Joseph.—2. "The oldest tradition regards James the brother of Jesus as not an apostle." We have seen that the scope of this tradition really proves the opposite.—3. "In the superscription of the Ep. of James the apostle calls himself only θεοῦ καὶ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ δούλος. An apostle would not have done this." And yet Paul calls himself thus in the Ep. to the Philippians, and John in the two lesser epistles calls himself merely πρεσβύτερος. The apostles often call themselves δούλος καὶ ἀπόστολος, so that it is easily seen what δούλος means above. But for James, whose apostolical office had passed over into the episcopal, it was most proper to designate his position with this single word, which denoted at once the apostle and bishop; and the more proper, since he wrote to Jewish Christians, whom he wished to warn against apostasy.—4. "John, in c. 7:5, assures us that the ἀδελφοὶ of Jesus did not believe in him (as Messiah??) at a time when James Alphei had already become an apostle. And yet, according to Mark 3:31, the brothers manifest merely such an unbelief, as that in which Mary participated. Their unbelief (John 7:3) was of the same kind as that of Peter (Matth. 16:23) and of Thomas (John 20:25); which did not reject the Messiahship of Jesus, but was merely a want of hearty confidence, resignation, and obedience, which made it difficult to the disciples, and at times even to his mother, to understand the path of suffering and obscurity which Jesus followed. His brothers wished that he should at once, and publicly in Jerusalem, unfold his work. If they had not been sincere in this, we would be forced to regard them as scoffers; but of this we have not the faintest intimation.—5. In Acts 1:13, 14, the ἀδελφοὶ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ are mentioned besides the apostles. But James minor is excluded from the ἀδελφοὶ by being enumerated among the apostles with the surname Ἀλφαίου." (Here belongs also John 2:12). Here we might ask: In Acts 1:14, does the expression: with the women, and Mary the mother of Jesus, exclude Mary from the women? But it must be observed, besides, that not only the three apostolical names of James, Simon, and Judas occur among the brothers, but also Joses with his sisters (according to Mark 6:3). We thus have a circle of brothers and sisters of Jesus besides the apostles, among whom also there are brothers. Winer maintains that these ought to be designated by ἄλλοις ἀδελφοῖς; but this would be necessary only, if in the catalogue of apostles the name ἀδελφοὶ were added to those particular apostles. This not being the case, Winer's correction would make all the apostles brothers of Jesus. The constant occurrence of a special circle of brothers of Jesus besides the apostles can only be explained by the fact, that the two were not identical. That the brothers of Jesus are at times mentioned specially, is easily explained from their authority among Jewish Christians. In 1 Cor. 15:5, Peter is mentioned besides the apostles: does this exclude him from the apostles? As regards Gal. 1: 19, James is here evidently numbered among the apostles. The explanation of Neander, that the name of James had occurred to the apostle only after he had written: "Others of the apostles saw I none," is utterly untenable. That, according to Hess, only ὁ υἱὸς ἀδελφοῦ is to be referred to James, not also τῶν ἀποστόλων, only shows how strongly this passage favors the identity. We see how these last reasons for a third James show really the contrary. As favoring the identity we mention the following reasons; 1. Ancient tradition. Hegesippus, Clemens, and Origen are here in decided opposition to the fabulous apocryphal and legendary accounts. The later fathers from Eusebius onward have no weight in determining the question, independent of the fact that they partly favor the identity.— 2. The utter untenableness of an apocryphal apostolate besides that instituted by Christ. The later theology is persuaded, in this case, from the Clementine legends, that in the age of the apostles already, a brother of the Lord, though no apostle, could, on account of his relationship to Christ, gradually ascend to apostolical dignity; ay, even above it. For the supposed third James really appears in Gal. 2: 9, as, with Peter and John, one of the three pillars of the Jewish Christian Church. This James, with Peter and John, is evidently an apostle to the circumcision, as Paul to the Gentiles. But this James elevates not only the author of the Ep. of Jude, "the brother of James," to the apostleship; but even Simeon, his successor as B. of Jerusalem. But where in the N. T. do we find the least trace of the call of these new supernumerary apostles? If, on the other hand, we remember the emphasis with which the formal call of the twelve is stated, and often repeated; how expressly the substitution of Matthias for Iscariot is referred to a solemn act of the entire apostles' college; and how reluctantly Paul was recognized as apostle, it seems certain that in this age the claim of relationship was not sufficient to convert three non-apostolical men into apostles.¹ We may be sure also that Paul would not have forgotten to urge it against the adherents of James, who endeavored everywhere to undermine his apostolical authority, if in this they had appealed to an apostleship of a third James improvised by the bigotry of their party.— 3. The even greater improbability that names of real apostles should be utterly extinguished by apostles introduced subsequently. Acts, c. 1, knows only the apostles, James the Elder, and James, the son of Alphaeus. This James, we are told, it suffers to pass away without a trace remaining, whilst, perhaps in c. 12: 17, already, and certainly in c. 15, and c. 21, it introduces an entirely new James, without even intimating that he was a new one, the brother of the Lord. That, according to De Wette, the author of the Acts had exchanged James Alphaei with the brother of the Lord, or forgotten to distinguish them, is a mere evasion, and would utterly destroy the authenticity of Luke. De Wette has also forgotten that in such a case the process of exchange must have taken place also with Simeon and Judas, the adherents of James. James Alphaei, Judas Thaddeus, and Simon, must all three have totally disappeared; whilst three others of the same name and of apostolical authority, must have arisen, viz.: James, the brother of the Lord, Judas, the brother of James, according to the Ep. of Jude, and Simeon, the brother and successor of James, according to the account of Hegesippus. Hence appears, 4. The utter untenableness of a duplication of three names in the apostolical circle. In the catalogue of the apostles we find the names of James Alphaei, or son of Cleopas, Lebbeus Thaddeus or Judas, and Simon Cananites or Zelotes, in close connection. In the list of the brothers of Jesus, we find, besides Joses, the names of James, Judas, and Simon; and we know how they were his brothers, viz.: as the sons of Cleopas. Here would be the first wonder, viz.: that three brothers of the Lord should have the same name as three of his apostles, and yet be different from them. The second wonder is that these brothers are also called James Alphaei (= Cleopas), Judas Alphaei, Simon Alphaei, without being in any way connected with the Apostle James Alphaei. But according to Mark 15: 40, the Apostle James the Less had also a brother named Joses: just as with the brother of Jesus. No doubt the third wonder. For now we must admit a duplication of even four names—James Alphaei the apostle, his brother Joses, and his companions Judas and Simon; the four brothers of the Lord—James Alphaei, no apostle, and his brothers Joses, Judas, and Simon. Or rather, the identity appears at every point: Mary, the mother of the Apostle James the Less (Alphaei), is also the mother of a Joses, as we find him with James the brother of the Lord. A Joses is brother of the Apostle James Alphaei, and Joses is brother of the brother of the Lord, James Alphaei. A Cleopas is father of the Apostle James, and a Cleopas is father of the brothers of the Lord. A Simon Zelotes is found among the apostles, and a Simon is cousin of the Lord—a man of apostolical authority, brother and successor of James. As regards this James, he is called simply the Less, and yet is to be divided again into a major and minor, or into a minor and a minus vulgo maximus. He is at all times James Alphaei; and yet at one time an apostle, at another time not. He enjoys at all times the most decided apostolical authority; and yet he is at one time an apostle, and at another time not. But most remarkable of all would be this: concerning James Alphaei we thus have the apostolical name without any history and labors; whilst concerning James, the brother of the Lord, we have a rich apostolical history without any trace of the apostolical name. Thus also Simon and Judas, the apostles, have totally vanished, whilst, on the other hand, the apostolical men, Judas and Simon, have unexpectedly nade their appearance, the one with his epistle, and the other with his episcopate; whilst the age of the apostles has not given us the least clue to distinguish this unheard-of duplication, we mean of names, offices, relationship, and mutual connection. From all these reasons we conclude that there were only two of the name of James, and now pass on to consider them separately.—

¹ Stier (Andeutungen, I., 412) and Wieseler (Stud. u. Krit., 1842) try to evade this improbability by supposing that James, brother of the Lord, in Gal. 1: 19, was distinct from the mere James in Gal. 2: that the latter was the Apostle Alphaeus, and the former a respected though unofficial person in the Church. This conflicts with the oldest tradition, according to which the brother of the Lord was B. of Jerusalem.

I. James the Elder, son of Zebedee. Zebedee, the father of James and John, was a Galilean fisherman, dwelling on the shores of the sea of Genesareth, perhaps near Capernaum (Matth. 1:21-22). His wife, Salome, with several other women, accompanied the Lord, and provided for him (Mark 15:40-41; 16:1; Luke 8:3; Matth. 27:56). The father did not interfere when the sons were called by the Lord (Matth. 4:21). From her history in the Gospels, it seems highly probable that Salome was a sister of the mother of the Lord (John 19:25). It is certain that she was an enthusiastic, faithful, and self-denying adherent of Jesus; at the same time, a woman of aspiring soul, who felt her own worth in that of her excellent sons, and could ask for them the first places next to Christ, the King, in his kingdom (Matth. 20:2; Mark 10:35). Such was the family in which James and John were born. In most of the events of his life James remains united with John, though it cannot be determined with certainty whether he was also a disciple of the Baptist. Contemporaneously with John he was called to the discipleship of Jesus (Matth. 4:21). Sometime thereafter he was also with him invested with the apostleship (Matth. 10). Being always named before John, it is concluded that he was the older brother. Mark, in his catalogue, gives to him the second place, next after Peter; he is here, also, with John called Boanerges, i. e., the sons of thunder. This name has been referred to the fact narrated in Luke 9:54. This may have been the occasion; but the name was certainly not given to express reproach, just as little as Simon's surname of Peter. Surnames given by the Lord were always designations of the specific charisma, the natural apostolical endowment which was afterwards sanctified by the Holy Spirit. If John undoubtedly participated in what was censurable on the occasion of the names, as appears from Luke 9:49; James, on the other hand, participated in the character of elevation, grandeur, purity and fiery energy, which the name expressed. John seems to represent primarily the thunder, James the lightning. It is to be noted that Luke, also, in his second catalogue, Acts 1, names him next after Peter. James was early favored with the most intimate companionship of Jesus (Mark 1:29), and here he stands between Peter and John (Mark 5:37; Matth. 17:1); and in two instances, according to the best readings (8:51; 9:28), Luke places John first (c. 8:51; 9:28). Once again he appears alone with John in the same spirit, as when formerly he wished to call down fire from heaven upon the Samaritan city. The prayer of Salome appears, according to Mark 10:35, as also the prayer of the two sons of Zebedee themselves. They wished to obtain the seats of honor in the kingdom of Jesus. The request was made at the time when the disciples were expecting the near establishment of the Messianic kingdom at Jerusalem, and were discussing who was to be the greatest among them. Happening also at a time when Jesus had foretold his humiliation and death, their boldness assumes a higher meaning. If they were not without ambition, it is nevertheless an ambition which enabled them, as his nearest companions in his kingdom, to follow him unto death. At this particular moment their request was a word of enthusiastic hope, which regarded the danger of the Lord as nothing. Whether James felt more the human side of the request, we know not; enough, the usual circle of three is enlarged unto four, since Andrew is admitted to the eschatological revelations of Christ on the Mount of Olives; but to prepare the passover, Peter and John alone are sent to Jerusalem (Luke 22:8). In Gethsemane, however, James again occupies his position among the three (Matth. 26:37). The next which we learn of him is his decapitation by Herod Agrippa (A.D. 44. WIESLER, Chronol. des apost. Zeitalt., p. 594). When his accuser saw him suffering martyrdom, he repented and confessed himself also a Christian. He was then led away with James, asked his pardon, which James imparted with a fraternal kiss, and the words: "Peace be with thee." It was no doubt his prominent position in the Church, which made James the first victim of persecution. The supposition that he was engaged chiefly in the government of the Church at Jerusalem, is substantiated not merely by his execution; but also by the fact, that he, with Peter and John, was specially distinguished by the Lord, but that the others were engaged in the more general affairs of the Church. Thus the older son of Zebedee opened the list of apostolical martyrs of Christ, whilst the younger closed it, Simon alone, perhaps, excepted. James seems to have shared the quiet nature of John: but whenever he spoke, his words were strong expressions of power. Every feature of his life is a simple, grand lineament of fire. Nothing is more certainly attested, than that he early closed his career at Jerusalem.—

II. James the Less, the Just, the brother of the Lord, or James the son of Alphaeus. We shall portray him as he first appears in the Gospels and Acts, is next reflected in his epistle, and is finally represented by tradition. Our earliest accounts of the brothers of Jesus we receive from John 2:12. We may conclude from this passage that there was a distinction between the circle of his brothers, and that of his disciples; although there was no doubt a spiritual relationship, one of faith, between them even at the beginning of Jesus' public career: otherwise the brothers would not have connected themselves with the disciples. Soon after, being rejected by his native town, Jesus took up his abode at Capernaum: here his brothers are enumerated, viz.: James, Joseph, Simon, and Judas. Somewhat later than this Christ called his apostles, in the catalogue of whom we find three of the same name as the three brothers who are best known to us: according to Luke (6:15), James Alphaei, Simon Zelotes, and Judas the brother of James (the same in Acts 1:13). In Matthew,

Simon is called the Cananite; and instead of Judas, he gives, next to James Alpheï, Lebbeus Thaddeus (10:3), Mark calls him simply Thaddeus. — The Acts (1:13), again, enumerate James Alpheï, Simon Jacobus (Zelotes), and Judas the brother of James, in rapid succession. He is prominent at the convention of the apostles (Acts 15). Here frequent mention is made of the apostles and presbyters (v. 4, 6, 23, 24). As he appears in this connection, we cannot suppose that he is reckoned among the presbyters: for he is the most important speaker after Peter, and his word gives the final decision, which is sent in the name of the apostles, elders, and brethren. We here become acquainted with an Apostle James, who occupies the same position as Paul and Peter; for whom the Jewish traditions have no doctrinal force whatever: and the doctrine which he helps to establish in reference to the Gentile Christians has no religious, but only an ethical purport, viz.: to be a bond of connection between Jews and Gentiles. But this same Apostle James is also the brother of the Lord, as appears from Gal. 2. It is now no longer possible to mistake this Apostle James and the James of Acts 20. He is James simply, the old and well-known one, having the same character, viz.: the supporter of Paul, rejoicing in the work of the latter, but also the same cautious mediator between the freedom of Pauline Christianity and the prejudices of the Jewish Christians and people in general. His advice to Paul, that he should purify himself by a Nazarite vow of the charge that he was subverting Jewish customs among the Jewish Christians, we cannot regard as a result of inspiration: nor was its purpose reached. At any rate, the Apostle James is not responsible for the caricature by which the legal Jewish Christians represented him to the distant churches. How early they did this, appears from Acts 15:24; and the disclaimer here given must also be applicable to subsequent times. — We have seen that the "brethren of the Lord," 1 Cor. 9:5, did not separate themselves from the circle of apostles; just as little as Cephas, who with them is specially mentioned. But the passage also shows the increasing authority which the brethren of the Lord enjoyed among the apostles. Paul indicates that at the time of his conversion the Apostle James had stood, for himself at least, very far in the background as compared with Peter (Gal. 1:19), although he designates him, from his later position, with the honorable distinction which the Jewish Christians awarded to him. But that this brother of the Lord, the most distinguished one, was an apostle in the common official sense, is shown from the text. On this condition alone could Paul adopt the language of the Jewish Christians, which designated James, with Peter and John, as a pillar of the Church (Gal. 2:9). On the occasion here spoken of James manifested his unity with Paul, by giving to him the right hand of fellowship. Hence also we are not authorized in regarding the εὐχὴ ἀπὸ Ἰακώβου (c. 2:12), who afterwards came to Antioch, as the heralds of a change in the views of James; but merely as legalistic Jewish Christians of the Church at Jerusalem. The last meeting of Paul with James at Jerusalem (Acts 21), is of a later date. It happened about A. D. 60. In A. D. 62, James suffered martyrdom. His epistle he wrote no doubt near the end of his life. The fundamental idea of this epistle is: Christianity in its relation to the external O. T. law, is the law of freedom (1:25), or also the royal law of love (2:8); the law written by faith upon the heart (1:25): as inwardly, it is one with the new birth (1:18); and outwardly, one with the activity of faith (c. 2); one in itself as the truth of the commandments (2:10); in its aim, mercy (2:12); in its form and method, wisdom (3:13); in its prerequisites, humility and abnegation (c. 4); in its complete development, a patience which overcomes the world, a miraculous power of salvation (5:11). In its origin Christianity rests upon the absolute grace and free pleasure of God, upon the word of truth planted in the heart (1:21), upon the patience of Christ and the hope of his coming (5:6, 7). Sin has its root in doubt (1:6); becomes actual in evil lust, and ends in death. The main obstacle in passing from sin to redemption is fanaticism, which James portrays in all its features (c. 5). James thus stands in direct opposition to Jewish legalism, since he portrays Christianity as the fulfilment of the O. T. law. He was probably led to write his epistle by seeing how fanatical sedition was beginning to stir the nation, and bringing the Jewish churches also in great danger of apostasy. Many things in the epistle are allegorical. He is acquainted, like Paul, with the doctrine of justification by faith. Both, however, distinguish between inward reconciliation by faith through grace, and the outward proof of faith amid trials. That he clearly understands the righteousness of faith which precedes every act of faith, is evident from the distinction which he makes between Abraham as just (before God), and as justified at the forum of history. At the forum of God the believer is just by faith; at the forum of the Church by acts of faith. As regards the relation of the doctrinal type of James to that of the other apostles, it is not sufficient to find, with Neander, this doctrinal type to consist in the unity of the spirit with the other apostles: "only that this spirit had not yet elevated itself above the O. T. position to such freedom, as in the case of the other apostles, and that the thoughts were not so fully developed." James is first of all an apostle: i. e., Christianity is to him the fulfilment of Judaism as the New Testament, as the new, absolute, eternal principle of religion; and so far he occupies the same position as Paul and John. But he is moreover the apostle to the Jews: i. e., he views Christianity in its intimate connection with the old covenant as the new and perfect law of inward life, of liberty. As regards his method of expressing his thoughts, we must remember that he wrote to Jewish Christians, to whom a logical form would have been unintelligible. The purity of his Greek has been an enigma to many. James, it would seem, knew no liberty except that which had conformed itself to the standard of the law: and in this sense he calls the law the law of liberty. He represents the Christian dogma in the form of the Jewish ethos. He has ransferred the O. T. law as such from the sphere of religion to that of national custom. This precisely was his work, and it was his to make the last effort to gain the Jews as a nation or Christianity.—Concerning the results of this effort, we are informed by history. That he took a delight in the Nazarite vow, appears from Acts 21. The gospel of the Hebrews also represents him in this light. Josephus (Ant., XX., 1) informs us that, during the interim between the departure of Festus from Judea and the arrival of Albinus (about A. D. 62), the high priest Ananus had caused to be stoned to death, a brother of Jesus, called also Christ, by the name of James, who was reputed to be a very just man. Hegesippus (Euseb., H. E., II., 23), after having described James as a Nazarite, says that at the passover he was hurled by the scribes and pharisees from a pinnacle of the temple, whither he had been led by the people to declare whether Jesus was the Messiah, and afterwards stoned to death. Eusebius adds that the wisest Jews and even Josephus had regarded the subsequent destruction of Jerusalem as a judgment of God for this murder.

J. C. LANGE.—Reinecke.

James of Edessa (so called from the place of his labors; also J. Orrhoënus, Arab. Ar-Rohāwi = the Edessene), was one of the most noted Syrian scholars and writers, who mainly applied his learning to the furtherance of Biblical knowledge. Born near Antioch, he early entered the monastery of John Bar-Aphthonius, at Kinnesrin, learned Greek there, and closely studied the Bible. He continued his studies at Alexandria, then returned to Syria, and became B. of Edessa, in 651 (Assem., bibl. or., I., 426, 468; II., 335, &c.). Impatient of the disregard of order he laid down his office in 655, and spent 11 years as teacher, especially of Greek, in the monastery of Eusebona, at Teleda. Thence he withdrew to the great monastery of Teleda, and spent 9 years in correcting the Syriac version of the O. T. His successor at Edessa having died, J. was recalled to that post, but died four months afterwards, June 6, 708 (Assem., l. c., II., 336). Although highly esteemed by the Maronites, he was unquestionably inclined to Monophysitism. He was full master of his mother tongue, and one of the first Syrian linguists; Barhebr. says he also knew Hebrew. But he specially devoted himself to the Greek, from which he translated many books (including some liturgies) into Syriac. He was a prolific writer. Fragments of his critical ed. of the Syriac version of the O. T. have reached our time, in two Paris MSS.; this ed. seems to have been based upon a Syriac version of the LXX. (See, besides Asseman., l. c., A. G. Hoffmann, in the Hall. Encykl., 2 Sect., Bd. 13, p. 165–7). E. RÖDIGER.*

James of Jüterbock (also Jacobus Cisterciensis, Carthusianus, de Paradiso, de Polonia), was one of the forerunners of the Reformation, for which his mysticism, pious earnestness, and frank rebukes of the evils of his age, involving all classes from the Pope downwards, aided to prepare the way. He was born c. 1383, became a Cistercian, of de Paradiso, in Poland, then went to Cracow to pursue literary studies, obtained the doctorate, and subsequently became abbot of de Paradiso. His strict asceticism offended the members of his order, and in advanced age he left it, joined the Carthusians, and entered a monastery at Erfurt. There he taught, became prior, and died, 1465. Works: Sermones notabiles et formales de tempore et de sanctis; Libelli tres de arte curandi vitia (in J. Wesseli, Opp., Amst., 1617); Liber de veritate dicenda; Tract. de causis multarum passionum (in Pezelii Biblioth. ascet., VII.); De indulgentiis; De negligentia Prælatorum (Walch. Mon. med. æv., II., Fasc. 1); De septem eccl. statibus opusculum (Walch. l. c., Fasc. 2). In the last work he argues that no ecclesiastical improvement could be expected, unless the Papacy, and entire curia would be subjected to a thorough reform. "The Council, not the Pope, is the representative of the Church, to it the Pope is subject even in matters of doctrine." He granted the difficulties in the way of a reform by a Council, but urged the necessity of attempting it.—(See TRITHEMII, Catal. illustr. virorum., I.; ULLMANN, Reformatoren vor d. Ref., I., 229, &c.).

NEUDECKER.*

James of Nisibis (the Great), the teacher of Ephraem, and relative of Gregory Illum., was B. of Nisibis (Zoha), and took part in the Council of Nice (Assem., bibl. or., I., 169; III., 587). He spent his earlier years as an ascetic in the mts. of Kurdiatan; many miracles are ascribed to him (cf. THEODORET, H. E., I. 2. c. 30). He is less known by his writings, than by the honor which he has enjoyed. Abr. Ecchaelensis (Eutych. vindic., II., index op. no. 37) confounds him with James of Sarūg. All that remains of his pen is comprised in an epistle to the bishops of Seleucia, and 18 religious discourses. Of these Mechitar owned the MS., from which Assem. had a copy taken for the Vatican Library (Assem., l. c., I., 557, &c., 632). Card. Antonelli published an edition with a Latin translation and notes, 1756, fol.; it appeared in Venice 1765, in the collection of Armenian Fathers; the Armen. text, Constant., 1824.—(Cf. C. F. Neumann's Gesch. d. Armen. Literat., p. 18, &c. Biogr. Univers., art. Jacques de Nisibe).

E. RÖDIGER.*

James of Sarūg, a distinguished teacher and writer of the Syrian Church, born in Kurtam, on the Euphrates, 452, became presbyter 503, and in 519 B. of Batnān, in the district of Sarūg, where he died, Nov. 29, 521 (Assem., bibl. or., I., 290). He had the title Doctor (Syr. Malpāna), and is sometimes called "the flute of the Holy Spirit," "the harp of the believing Church;" also Tibelūta = universal (Doctor). He is commemorated by the Jacobites and Maronites. Although venerated by the Jacobites (who held many older orthodox teachers in honor) his theological views were in the main orthodox (Assem., l. c., I., 310, 326; III., 387). He was a fertile writer; 763 homilies in verse (lines of 12 syllables, hence called Jacobite, Assem., I., 299; II., 322), expositions, an anaphora, a form of baptism, hymns, and letters, are ascribed to him. Barhebr. had 182 of his homilies (Assem., II., 303). Much has been falsely ascribed to him (I., 332), some things because written in his verse. The Vatican Library contains 5 of his circulars, 6 prose tracts, and 233 homilies. Occasionally a reproachful allusion to Nestorians occurs in them; but they mostly treat of a section or fact in Biblical history, or of some Bible person (Assem., I., 304-40). They are still used in Syrian Churches, especially the expositions, at public worship. They are transl. into Arabic. Some of his hymns are found in the Brev. ferile Syr., and the Officium Domin. (Rome, 1787). His poetic eulogy upon Simon the Stylite has been transl. into German by Zingerle, in his Leben, &c., d. Simeon, &c., Innsbr., 1855, 8vo. (p. 279-98). E. RÖDIGER.*

Jannes and Jambres (2 Tim. 3:8) are, according to Jewish tradition (as Theodoret in l. remarks), the names of the Egyptian magicians who withstood Moses and Aaron (Ex. 7:11, 22; 8:3, 15). They apparently succeeded in imitating the first two miracles of Moses, but utterly failed in the third, and acknowledged to Pharaoh that only divine power could have wrought them (Ex. 8:15). In this instance, as in that of the witch of Endor, the wonders wrought by the magicians are not to be regarded as mere frauds, but as the operations of the black arts, pointing to interferences of the secret powers of the world of darkness in the affairs of this world (Cf. Acts 16:16-19; 19:19. See Satan). The names of these men are, doubtless, traditional. They are mentioned in the targum of Jonathan on Ex. 7:11, and in the Talmud, where the second is called Μαμβρης (as also in a variation on 2 Tim. 3:8). The Pythagorean Numenius calls them by their usual names. Plin., 30, 1, and Apul. Apol., p. 94, names them as Jamnes and Jochabel. Pfeiffer attempted to show their signification from the Egyptian (dub. vex., 1, 253); and Ewald seems similarly inclined (Isr. Gesch., 2, 72), by explaining (as Pfeiffer does) αμβρης to be a sacred book, with which their designation as ισογυμματαίς, by Numenius, corresponds. In the N. T. they are correctly set forth as types of a spurious gift of miracles, and compared with those whose piety and faith are not genuine. VAHINGER.*

Janow, Matthias of, the most noted forerunner of Hus, was the son of a Bohemian Knight, Wenzel of Janow, who still lived in the early part of the reign of Emperor Charles IV. He was one of those Prague students who intimately attached themselves to Milicz in his last years. From Prague he went to Paris, where he spent six years, and received the degree of M. A., hence called in Bohemia Magister Parisiensis. His early ambition led him to visit Rome, and ask a canonry of Urban VI. He succeeded, and on Oct. 12, 1381, was admitted as Canon of St. Vitus, in the Castle of Prague. The confessional was assigned to him, and he continued at that post until his death, Nov. 30, 1394. Though he effected little by preaching, he was most faithful in his particular office, which afforded him full opportunity of discovering the evil and the good in all classes, and the spiritual wants of the people, as his writings show. These he collected under the title: De regulis veteris et novi testamenti, though they might more properly have been called: Inquiries concerning true and false Christianity. He labored at it from 1388-92. It has never been publ. in full. Some sections may be found in Dr. J. P. Jordan's "Vorläufer d. Husitentums, &c.," Lpz., 1846. Although he nowhere recommends departure from the unity of the Church, his relationship to the Reformation appears in his constant reference of religious experience to Christ, and bases the true unity of the Church on him alone. He also advocated frequent communion: but at the remarkable Prague Provincial Synod of Oct., 1388, was compelled publicly to promise no longer to admonish the laity to daily communion. The doctrine, however, of the benefit of frequent communion, he was not required to renounce. His subsequent investigations into the early practice of the Church convinced him that originally the communion was administered in both kinds. Subsequently he deplored that he had allowed the Synod of 1388 to extort the promise from him. Towards the close of his life he became continually more conscious of the disagreement of his belief and teachings with those of the Romish Church. Hence his remarkable declaration: "All that remains for us, is to desire a Reformation by the overthrow of Antichrist himself, to lift up our heads, and see our redemption near." — (Cf. NEANDER, Ch. Hist. PALACKY, Gesch. v. Böhmen., III., 1, p. 173-80).

TH. PRESSER.*

Jansen. Jansen's Augustine. Jansenism.

—Scarcely any other subject so thoroughly discloses the nature of modern Catholicism, and the wrong it did itself in refusing the Reformation, which the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries demanded of the Catholic Church.

As the Reformation touched the entire being of the Church, her life and her doctrines, so did Jansenism. As the writings of Augustine, next to the Epistles of Paul, gave to the faith of Luther and Calvin both matter and form, the counter-reformation necessarily contracted a secret hostility to those writings. Augustine indeed was still acknowledged, and his mighty influence on the middle age had crystallized in the doctrine of the Thomists and the Dominicans, and was so prevalent at Trent against the Semipelagian Scotists, the Franciscans, and the Jesuits, that the virtual triumph of the Jesuits was concealed under equivocations. Still the victorious party boldly followed out the inferences from the concessions thus made. The Franciscans in 1567 and 1579 obtained the condemnation of seventy-six theses of the Augustinian Bains, professor at Louvain; the Jesuit Molina, in 1588, propounded bold Semipelagianism under a new dress, and the congregatio de auxiliis, summoned by Clement VIII., in 1597, to settle the dispute raised by the Dominicans against it, was dissolved by Paul V. in 1607, without reaching a decision. The more thoroughly the Catholic Church became set against the Reformation, the more thoroughly Semipelagian must she become in life and doctrine by the law of nature. Thomism itself had stiffened into Scholasticism, and the writings of Augustine had at once the full power of novelty and of venerable antiquity for Düver-gier de Hauranne, afterwards Abbot of St. Cyran, and Jansen, when these young theologians studied them together at Bayonne, in 1612.

Cornelius Jansen was born in the village of Accoy, in Leerdam, North Holland, on the 28th of October, 1585, and studied theology at Louvain, in the Spanish Netherlands, under the presidency of a friend of Baius. After spending some time with his university friend, Duvèrgier, in Bayonne, the native place of the latter, he returned to Louvain. He declined a philosophical chair in that place, from his aversion to Aristotle as the father of Scholasticism. Plato, he found, had higher ideas of God and virtue than many of the Catholic theologians. He afterwards took the presidency of the Pulcheria College, and taught theology there. His correspondence with St. Cyran from the 19th May, 1617, onward, has been preserved to us through the hatred of the Jesuits. By incessant study of the writings of Augustine he convinced himself, that the Catholic theologians of both parties had entirely forsaken the doctrine of the ancient Church. St. Cyran visited Louvain in 1621, and the two friends divided their labor for the reformation of the Church between them, Jansen taking doctrine, St. Cyran organization and life; forming intimate connections with eminent clergymen in Ireland, and with leaders of the congregation of the Oratory. In spite of suspicions of the Spanish Inquisition, he was nominated, in 1630, Royal Professor of Sacred Literature at Louvain. The two friends had thus far sought to enlist the cardinal-minister, Richelieu, in their project; but while the growing power of France was threatening Spain with the loss of her Netherlands, Jansen advised the erection of a Catholic, independent country out of the Belgian Provinces; and finding this suggestion offensive to the Spanish interests, attacked the pretensions of France in his Mars Gallicus, sparing neither kings nor cardinal-ministers. The work occasioned the imprisonment of St. Cyran, and obtained for Jansen (who had now played "the pedant and ass" long enough) the bishopric of Ypres in 1636. In 1627 he set about his work on Augustine in earnest, and had just finished it, when he died of the plague, on the 6th May, 1638. The title is: Cornelii Jansenii, episcopi Iprensis, Augustinus seu doctrina Sti. Augustini de humanæ naturæ sanitate, ægritudine, medicina adversus Pelagianos et Massiliensis, published in 1640, in 3 vols., fol.

The first volume gives a history and an exposure of the more refined Semipelagianism. The second goes on to treat of reason and authority in theology. There was too much devotion to human knowledge and heathen philosophy; it nourished the sense of human ability. Philosophy and theology had entirely different spheres; one the intellectual faculty, the other hearing and memory, revelation and tradition; and in tradition Augustine was inspired and infallible as to the doctrine of grace.—Good and evil are absolute opposites, and the first man could have had no germ of evil in him. The fall was due to freedom of will, which was positively good and divine, submitting itself to God in love, yet could be lost, because Adam might love himself for his own perfection. Grace, which, however, was not enough to restrict his freedom, was then not a donum superadditum, but constitutional in him; without it the fall would have been necessary.—Original sin is not mere imputation (reatus), but a propagated corrupt nature; the lustful flesh polluting the soul. The unconquerable ignorance and wicked lust of the soul, which are themselves complete sins, are punishments of original sin. "Manichæism and Pelagianism put lust before sin; Augustine puts it after."—In our fallen state we have freedom indeed to abstain from particular wicked acts, but not to abstain from sinning. Yet the sinning is man's free act; since the will has put itself under bondage. The third of the five points, which the Pope condemned in Jansen's book, was the sentiment, that merit and demerit in our fallen state do not require freedom from all necessity, but only from violence and natural necessity.—The apparent virtues of those not converted by the grace of God, are really sins (a genuine Augustinian doctrine, which the Pope had already condemned in Baius, but, as Jansen presumed, only for the sake of peace at the time). The fall involves misery, as happiness consists essentially in sinlessness. (Here is a sample of the deep spirituality of Jansen's doctrine; where the Jesuits would say the Almighty could make sinners happy and saints miserable).—The third volume takes up the grace of Christ. Every good motion is divine grace. Law and preaching are only means of grace; and grace is not mere revelation, but medicinale auxilium. Grace now gives not only freedom of choice, as before the fall, but will and act, in the whole conduct, and in each point of it; is ever actualis, accomplishing its end; yet does not make man a lifeless instrument, but only takes its course through our will.—All goodness begins with faith. But this will be of no avail, unless the donum perseverantiæ be added.—Grace itself is not knowledge and justification, not a mere imputation (against Jesuits and Protestants), but the vital indwelling of divine love, of God himself, overcoming sinful lust. Fear does not put evil away from the heart; Attritio is not contritio. Fallen man, to be free, must be a servant, but only by his will becoming vitally one with the divine.—Predestination to conversion, perseverance, and salvation is a perfectly sovereign act of God; and God predestines others to evil; to whom the partial goodness granted them turns to condemnation. Where a human counsel agrees with the divine, an indifference of the human will makes the counsel virtually ungodly. All presupposes the free act of the fall, which, in Jansen's infralapsarian view, made a radical change in the condition of man.—Thus to have his fortune in God's hand, instead of his own, must certainly minister confidence to man. The reprobate are of material service to the temporal and eternal good of the elect, by exhibiting the attributes of God, and the sinfulness of man, and thus stimulating the elect to virtue. The elect are the smaller number.

The Jesuits made various efforts to prevent the printing of this work; and after its publication the Pope issued a bull censuring it, but aiming to hush the controversy. But in 1643 Dr. H. Arnauld published his De la fréquente communion, based on the predestination doctrine of Augustine and Jansen; which raised a widespread and vehement controversy. See Art. H. ARNAULD. The Dominicans in France went against Jansen, those of Spain and Italy for him. The Sorbonne was divided; and after an earnest contest between parties throughout France, which was carried by delegates from both sides to Rome itself, the Pope, in 1653, issued the bull, Cum occasione, condemning five points. The Jansenists questioning the infallibility of the Pope in the matter of the fact of those points being found in Jansen's Augustine, the Pope further declared, in 1654, that they were found there, and their condemnation, as the doctrine of Jansen, must be subscribed. Hundreds of the "partizans of grace" now subscribed it under frivolous pretexts. Meantime Arnauld, provoked by an instance of bigoted anti-Jansenism, wrote a "Letter to a Person of Quality," for which, on the 31st January, 1656, after a hard contest, he was expelled from the Sorbonne, followed by eighty doctors, who refused to subscribe his expulsion. Now also Pascal began, in his Lettres à un provincial, to scourge the Thomists, who, with their outward, mechanical conception of predestination, shared with Jansen's Augustine the harshness so offensive to the Tridentines and Jesuits, yet went against Jansen and Arnauld. Port Royal, now in its bloom, was visited with the torture of subscribing a condemnation of Jansen, and those who refused were imprisoned. The king found, however, that too many bishops took the ground of "respectful silence," and secretly obtained, in 1668, the Papal sanction for a compromise, substantially on the basis of the distinction of fact and droit, and of respectueux silence. All parties seemed satisfied, first of all that the Jansenists directed their "golden pens" mainly against the reformed. The king had hoped for silence from his compromise; but the Jansenists took advantage of it with the Pope in sundry ways, and so offended the king, that Arnauld fled, in 1679, to the Spanish Netherlands. He was preceded thither by Quesnel in 1678, and followed by the Benedictine Gerberon in 1682; and there he labored indefatigably till his death, in 1694. Quesnel's New Testament, published in 1693, gave a fresh start to the crippled Jansenism; but now a controversy among the Jansenists themselves between the old idea of "respectful silence" and a new opinion, that one might sign the condemnation without losing place, gave Louis an opportunity to bring the Pope back, in 1705, to his former requisition of condemnation of the five points as the doctrine of Jansen without reservation. Upon the refusal of the nuns of Port Royal, the convent was abolished in 1709, and demolished in 1710. Noailles, who had sanctioned Quesnel's New Testament, now, as Cardinal Archbishop of Paris, becoming offensive to the Pope also, by his assertion of the rights of bishops, the Pope, in 1708, forbade the reading of Quesnel's Commentary; taking occasion particularly to condemn the Jansenist doctrine of the right and duty of the laity to read the Scriptures. In 1713 appeared the bull Unigenitus, condemning 101 points from Quesnel's New Testament: among them some almost literally Scriptural and even quite Tridentine. The bull was received without qualification neither by the assembly of the French clergy, nor by the Parliament, nor by the Sorbonne; and the king thought to make an end of the matter by a National Council. But the Pope would not risk such a measure, and the old Gallican jurist, Dupin, thought "the king could not allow the Pope to call the Council, nor the Pope the king; nor could the Papal legates be allowed to preside in it." So Louis XIV., at his death, in 1715, left the matter of Jansenism, which for half a century he had used all means to settle, in the greatest confusion. The frivolous regent, the Duke of Orleans, cared nothing for either side; exiles returned, and the Sorbonne was not compelled to accept the bull. The Pope tried the power of a threat of deposition, and even of the ban, upon Noailles in 1716; but above all the din rose an appeal of many bishops, in 1717, from the Pope and his bull to a general Council. The bull, they held, encroached upon the Catholic faith and morality. This stirred both parties to greater activity and virulence; till the minister, Dubois, wishing to be cardinal, and the regent wishing to amuse himself without disturbance, enforced the prohibition of dispute about the bull, and compelled the Parliament to register it in 1720. Noailles and other bishops thence took the pretext of submitting with explanations; and, in 1720, Noailles, infirm with age, submitted with reserve; though the appeal and the Gallican views of rights of bishops produced the addition of concessions from the non-French Catholic bishops to the bull Unigenitus. Only stiff appellants, chiefly pastors, resorted to the distinction of the ecclesia congregata and dispersa. Benedictines and Carthusians, who insisted on the appeal, fled to Utrecht. The Oratorians, at their general convention, in 1727, refused to accept the bull; but after the refractory ones were expelled, the congregation was compelled to accept, by royal command, in 1746.—The populace espoused the cause of the appellants. Francis of Paris died, in 1727, from his own austerities, with the appeal in his hand; and over his grave even children fell into convulsions and ecstasies, and testified and prophesied against the bull. When the king shut up the tomb in 1732, the convulsions increased in houses and conventicles, and great books with plates were written about them. In some cases the convulsions ran into crucifixions, and even into terrible licentiousness. The Jansenists of the first generation had insisted, that confession should be made only to regular pastors, not to monks or Jesuits; the suppression brought them to allow it to appellantist priests, except on the death-bed. Dispute on this point occupied the Jesuits, and even divided the king and the Parliament, till the Pope prudently decided, in 1754, that only the publicly and judicially recognized opponents of the bull should be refused the sacraments.—In the tumult, which preceded the dispersion of the Jesuits, these controversies sank into silence. The pressure in Church and State produced an unnatural union of earnest, ascetic piety, of fanaticism, and of infidelity, under the name of Janenism, in the years preceding the Revolution. The literature on these controversies, from the all Unigenitus onward, amounts to between three and four thousand volumes in the great library at Paris. The pastoral clergy, who, in 1789, sat in the rank of the clergy in the estates, and whose transition to the citizen class was so decisive, were mostly of the so-called jansenistic party; likewise the constitutionalist ratorians. In the reign of terror many Janenists boldly appeared and bled for the Church and the throne; and only twenty years ago the jansenist principles survived unterrified against the assumptions of the Jesuits in Lanjuinais and Montlosier. The ascetic elements of Janenism have appeared particularly among the lower clergy of France.—In Italy, Ricci, Bishop of Pistoria, whom Napoleon distinguished in 1796, was, in some sense, a Jansenist, as were many who aided the reforms of Joseph II.; also the Archbishop of Tarentum, Joseph Caccia-Latro, prominent under the Napoleonides, who laid down his office in 1817. In Rome Janenism is still, if not feared, yet hated, as Calvinism itself. REUCHLIN.—E. D. Yeomans.

Januarius. The Romish Church commemorates fourteen martyrs of this favorite name. The best known of them is St. J., B. of Benevento (Anniv., Sept. 19). The legend says he lived and suffered under Diocletian (Scripta, Acta Sanct., Vol. 5, p. 380, &c.), another account says he died 305 (Annal. eccl., ad a. 305, n. 3, ed. Col. Agr., 1624, II., p. 845). Beyond this his contemporaries say nothing of him. Tradition reports that he was cast into a fiery oven for refusing to sacrifice to the gods. Having escaped this unhurt, he and other Christians, who had shown sympathy for him, were thrown to the wild beasts. But these, also, refused to harm the followers of Jesus. Timothy, the heathen judge of Campania, under whom this was done, then became enraged, and ordered the prisoners to be put to death at Puteoli. But J. smote him with blindness. This led Timothy to seek his victim's help, but J. had no sooner restored his sight, than Timothy again ordered J.'s execution. His corpse was taken to Naples, the inhabitants having been moved to procure it by a special revelation. He thus became the patron saint of Naples. Later legends added other items to this account. The Neapolitans, especially, attribute the protection of their city against the eruptions of Vesuvius, and its deliverance from several threatening perils to the intervention of J. Some strange stories are told concerning the blood of St. J., which is kept in phials in a chapel of the Cathedral of Naples, along with his head.—The martyrology of the Rom. Church mentions a J. (Anniv., Jan. 7), who is said to have suffered with Felix. And in a list of martyrs, who suffered in Africa, a J. (Anniv., Jan. 19) is named. On July 10, two of the name are commemorated; July 11, is the day of one who suffered in Nicopolis; July 15, of one who suffered in Carthage; Aug. 6, of one who suffered in Rome; Oct. 13, of one who suffered in Cordova; Oct. 24, of one who suffered in Carthage; Oct. 25, one in Sardinia; Dec. 2, of one whom the Vandals put to death; and Dec. 15, of one who suffered in Africa.—March 2 and July 17, are the anniversaries of two female martyrs, Januaria.

PAUL CASSEL.*

Japheth, son of Noah (Gen. 6:10; 9:18; 10:1, where the three sons are mentioned; Gen. 9:23, 27; 10:2, 21, where this is not the case). 1. Profound views of the world are connected with the mention of Japheth in the Scriptures. The degree of moral sense, which the three sons of Noah manifest when the nakedness of their father is discovered, is the measure of their influence in the history of the world. Ham sees the nakedness of his father, and is satisfied with telling it to his brothers. Shem and Japheth, without seeing the nakedness, cover their father with a garment. Chaste modesty and filial piety cannot be portrayed more beautifully. This chastity of the heart and eye is rewarded with being made the bearer of God; for this alone is the fountain from which the knowledge of God proceeds. Noah blesses Japheth with the words: "God shall enlarge Japheth, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant." The words, "he shall dwell in the tents of Shem," cannot refer to God, but to Japheth. Indications in the Hebrew text seem to show that Shem suggested the act of filial piety, and Japheth merely consented. Hence the higher blessing to Shem: "Blessed be the Lord God of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant." Shem has God for his portion; Japheth has extension and temporal dominion: but as Japheth consented to the filial act of Shem, he is also to participate in the portion of the latter: i. e., dwell in the tents of Shem = have part in the God of Shem; and also to participate in this way in the service of Ham due to Shem. All this has already become fulfilled in a gigantic measure.—2. The Scriptural difference between Shem, Ham, and Japheth is not the difference between the brown, black, and white races. To say that Japheth means handsome, and therefore white, is wholly untenable. Even if in Ham a reference is had to his dark color, which may be granted, we are not bound to admit a similar reference to color in the others. The differences which subsequently existed between the descendants of Canaan and of Aram are easily recognized. The Euphrates seems to be the local boundary between Shem and Ham. The name of Shem, corresponding philologically, and afterwards historically also, with that of Aram, refers to the highland, from which Canaan, even more than his brethren, is distinguished as netherland. Canaan, in Gen. 9:26, already, represents Ham, as Aram the sons of his brother, Arphaxad. But, according to the Scriptures, all mankind has descended from Noah. Whatever, therefore, was not included in Ham and Shem, the living opposites in which was manifested the struggle which the confession of the God of Shem had to endure, belonged to Japheth. He embraced whatever was immense in distance, extent, and number. In the sons of Japheth, enumerated in the Scriptures, we will scarcely be able to find all the ancient nations known to modern geographical science: only those are mentioned, which were known at that time. But virtually the Japheth of the Scriptures is the enlarged one, who embraced everything which was not included in Shem and Ham. All this extent was once to dwell in the tents of Shem. There lies a necessity in the explanation which regards Japheth as the father of the "distant, boundless extent," and which finds this idea in the name: for this explanation corresponds with the spirit of the Scriptures, as also with the views of other nations.—3. As sons of Japheth are named: Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshech, and Tiras. Of these the best known are Madai and Javan. Ezekiel mentions, among other nations from the land of Magog, the powerful northern nations of Gog, Meshech, and Tubal. With these are mentioned Gomer, and Togarma his son. In Ezekiel, Gomer no longer takes the first place; Gog and Magog stand at the head. The Gomer of the Scriptures is undoubtedly the Cimmerian nation of classical antiquity. Magog denotes the people inhabiting Mt. Caucasus. It is evident from the word itself that Magog is a compound of Gog. But the latter is the Sanscrit yugam, Lat. jugum, Gr. ζυγόν, yoke; and denotes a mountain ridge. Ma, perhaps = at, upon, behind; or, what is less evident, large. Magog represents all the northern mountain people, which modern ethnography has embraced under different names. Hence also, subsequently, every terrible nation which came from the North, such as the Scythians and Goths, were called Gog and Magog. The Scriptures manifest a special acquaintance with two northern nations; which, according to our other accounts, do not occupy this prominent position, viz.: Tubal and Meshech, the Tibareni and Moschi. This may have resulted from commercial and other relations, as seems evident from Ezek. 27:13. Tiras is mentioned only in Gen. 10:2. From the indefinite extent assigned by antiquity to Thrace—all Europe north of Greece—we may reasonably conclude that Tiras is Thrace.—It cannot be maintained that the Scriptures, in its mention of the seven sons of Noah, wishes to indicate a migration of nations in the modern sense. It enumerates all the nations then known, and which it did not class among the descendants of Ham and Shem. The later exegesis does not pursue a mistaken course in respect to these sons of Japheth, when, with increasing knowledge, it includes among them all nations with which it becomes acquainted, so that China, also, and India, are found among them. All are by the Scriptures included under Japheth, though they may not be expressly mentioned. It is otherwise with the special generic accounts concerning Gomer and Javan. It proceeds from the principle that there must be some inward connection between those who are descended from the same ancestors. It can, therefore, be asserted that Askenaz, Riphath, and Togarma, who are named as brothers, are regarded as inwardly related. The Scriptures give us a hint as regards Askenaz. In Jeremiah 51:27, Ararat, Minni, and Askenaz are called out against Babel; and in the next verse the kings of Media. Since Ararat and Minni point us to the Armenian highland, and, in general, the northern nations were called out against Babel, Askenaz can be understood only in connection with the Armenian countries. Thus, in fact, the passage is understood by Moses of Chorene. The termination of Askenaz is also frequently found in Armenian proper names. Still further confirmation is afforded by the proper interpretation of the passage in Josephus, which is justly regarded as the most obscure in his works. He says that the Ἀσκανάζες were at that time called by the Greeks Πρυγίαις. We must not forget that Josephus gives the opinions of his age, though many of them may be employed in Biblical interpretation. The Arsacide dynasty, as is well known, was named the Ascanian. Arsaces himself was called Ashek. This Ashek is regarded as identical with Arshak, and from him the Ascanians were descended. This Arsaces, according to Moses of Chorene, dwelt in the city of Pahl, in the land of Cushan. These inhabitants of Cushan he regards as Parthians, and their city of Pahl is the well-known Rhaga, which, according to Greek accounts, was among the Arsacides called Arsacia (whence Ascania). The derivation of the name from the Greek πρυγίαις is futile. Raga is derived from the Sanscrit râg, râgan, king; and must hence be regarded as the regal city, a meaning which corresponds with that of Pahl and Arsacia. In this way Josephus becomes plain. They are the Rhégines, the people of Rhaga, otherwise called Ascanians.—If we follow up the name of Askenaz, it will bring us into Phrygia, where, in the form of Ascanius, it is often met with. This will also bring us to the wide-spread legend concerning Troy. Askenaz has also been interpreted by Franks, especially since the 10th cent. on the part of the Jews. From this has originated the derivation of the German from the same source. It is not probable that Scandinavia also is derived from it, as some maintain: for Scanzia, in which stress is laid upon the z, is a mere corruption of Scandinavia.—For a long time, already, the name of Japheth has also been connected with Japetos, for which also there seems to be much reason. For the Scriptures did not create the names contained in its ethnographical table: it only gives them as already existing, but in its own form. On the other hand, it gives us plainly to understand the idea which the name of Japheth was understood to express. That Japetos, according to Greek tradition, was also the ancestor of primitive races, his genealogy shows us. The effort to derive the name from ἰάπτω must be regarded as unfounded.—The name of Japheth is no further mentioned in the Bible. It was seldom used as a proper name. Very few learned men, or Talmudist teachers, bear it. In the 17th cent. an Egyptian scholar passes under this name.—"Japheth shall dwell in the tents of Shem." This has been fulfilled in Christ. But only those sons of Japheth possess the redeemer of Shem who have a chaste eye, and hold the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience.

PAULUS CASSEL—Reinecke.

Jason, the name of several Jews of the Maccabean period. 1) In 1 Macc. 8:17, one of the embassy sent by J. Maccab. to Rome, to renew the league with the Romans, was called Jason, the son of Eleazer. 2) A Greek Jew, Jason of Cyrene, wrote the history of Jud. Macc., and his brothers, and of their wars, &c., in five books, from which the material of the two books of the Maccabees is taken, and dressed up with rhetorical ornaments. Jason's books were lost (1 Macc. 2:19, &c. Cf. De Wette, Einl. in's., I. T., § 302, &c.; Ewald, Gesch. Isr., IV., 531, &c.). 3) The Jason most noted was the brother of the high-priest Onias III., who sacrificed his religion and country to self-interest and ambition, by buying the high-priest's office of Antiochus Epiph. for a large sum of money, and then abusing his high position, by trying through its influence to force upon his countrymen Hellenistic customs and worship, and robbing them of their civil rights (2 Macc. 4:7, &c.). As he himself changed his original name (Jesus) to Jason (Jos., Antt., 12, 5, 1), so, to further Greek culture, he founded a gymnasium below the citadel at Jerusalem, sent an embassy with 500 drachmas of silver to the games at Tyre, as an offering and gift to Hercules of Tyre, and gave Antiochus a splendid reception into the Holy City (2 Macc. 4:11, &c.). But after three years (173 B. C.) Jason was supplanted by one Menelaos, a brother of Simon the Benjamite (2 Macc. 3:4; 4:23), who outbid him to Antiochus, in the sum of 300 talents of silver. Menelaos became high-priest, and Jason had to flee to the Ammonites (2 Macc. 4:23, &c.). After some time, however, during the second campaign of Antiochus against Egypt (170 B. C.) the report of A.'s death was spread about, and Jason, at the head of 1000 men, marched against Jerusalem, and took it, the citadel excepted, in which Menelaos maintained his position; many citizens were slain. But Jason had soon to flee again to the country of the Ammonites; he was accused before Aretas, King of Arabia, had to flee from city to city, until he finally reached Parthia, where he died in wretchedness (2 Macc. 5:5, &c. Cf. Ewald, l. c., IV., 333, &c.).

RÜETSCHL.*

Jazer (LXX., Ιαζήρ; Jos., Antt., 12, 8, 1, Ἰαζήρ; ProL., 5, 16, Γαζήρ); was a considerable city, with territory, in Gilead, at the time the Israelites invaded the country of the Ammonites E. of the Jordan (Numb. 21:32). It fell to the portion of Gad, was rebuilt, and assigned to the Levites (Numb. 32:1, 3, 25; Josh. 13:25; 21:39; 1 Sam. 24:5; 1 Chron. 6:31). Lying on the extreme eastern limits of Israel, it successively fell again into the hands of the Moabites (Is. 16:8, &c.; Jer. 48:2), and (after the exile) the Ammonites, from whom Judas M. took it (1 Macc. 5:8). Ono- last. says it lay 10 Rom. miles W. of Rabbath-Ammon or Philadelphia, and 15 m. northward from Heshbon. In agreement herewith Seetzen in v. Zach's monatl. Corresp., XVIII., 429, &c.) found ruins on a small tributary of the Jordan hence not a "μικροῦ ποταμοῦ" as Euseb. says), whose name Sz'ir plainly indicates its ancient designation. But it is disputed what Jer. 48:32 means by "the sea of Jazer," as no large water, but only some ponds (which the original may signify), can be found near. Possibly a small lake, formerly there, has sunk away (Cf. Gesen., Comm. on Jer., I., 549, &c.; Hitzig on Jer., 347, and on Is., 196, note *, according to the LXX.).—This Jazer must not be confounded with Hazor (Jer. 49:28). 8 miles S. W. of Philadelphia. — (Cf. Reland's Palest., p. 825; Burckhardt's Travels, p. 355; v. Raumer's Paläst., p. 229, &c.; Pauly's Realencycl., IV., p. 3; Ritter, Erdk., XV., 2, p. 104, &c.).

RÜETSCHL.*

Javan, the Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, Coptic, Persian, &c., name of the Greeks (Schol. ad Aristoph. Acharn. 106). All were called Ionians (Ἴωνες, Hom. II., 13, 685), the name of the tribe best known to Orientals. Lassen (Ind. Alterthumsk., I., 729) says the Indians designate all distant Western nations Javana, the name meaning young, and referring to their more recent descent from Indo-Germanic races. By means of traffic the Hebrews early became acquainted with the Greeks. Hence Gen. 10:24 reckons Javan as a son of Japheth (see Art.), and the representative of Japhetic tribes in the S. W. Greeks are met with as dealers in slaves in the Phœnician markets (Tyre. Ezek. 27:13; Joel 4:6. Cf. Is. 66:19; Zech. 9:13). In Dan. 8:21, Alexander M. is called king of Javan. (Cf. Tuch, Comm. on Gen., p. 210; Knobel, d. Völkertafel, p. 78, &c.).—In Arabia there was a city of this name, to which Ezek. 27:19, refers.

RÜETSCHL.*

Jebus and the Jebusites. The Jebusites appear as a Canaanitish tribe (Gen 10:16), related to the Amorites, in the wider sense, for their king, Adoni-Zedek, is called an Amorite (Josh. 10:5), and, like the Amorites, they occupied the hill-country (Numb. 13:29). At the time of Joshua they inherited what was subsequently called the mountain of Judah, hence the southern portion of the country, and held the fortress which they called Jebus (see Jerusalem). In the enumeration of the Canaanite nations the Jebusites are often named last (Gen. 15:20, &c.), but they were among the bravest and most stubborn opponents of Israel. It is true, Joshua slew Adoni-Zedek, but nothing is said of his having taken their city; hence we find them soon again in league with Jabin of Hazor, &c. (Josh. 11:3, &c.), and though once more vanquished by Joshua, they still held their fortified city (Josh. 15:8, 63). It was assigned to Benjamin (18:28); but that tribe could not get possession of it (Judges 1:21; 3:5; 19:11, &c.). David first took the city and its fortress, and made it the metropolis of his kingdom (2 Sam. 5:6, &c.; 1 Chron. 11:4, &c.). The possession of this important point was necessary to the security of Southern and Central Palestine (Cf. Ewald, Gesch. Isr., II., 1, p. 288, 583, &c.). The Jebusites were thus conquered but not exterminated (2 Sam. 24:16; Josh. 15:63); Solomon made the remnant tributary (1 King 9:20, &c.; Zech. 9:7). Even after the exile there were Jebusites in the land (Ezra 9:1; Neh. 11:3; 7:57. Cf. Leng-erke, Kanaan, I., 192, 643, 662, n. 4; Bertheau, Comm. s. B. d. Richter, p. 13, &c. Ritter, Erdk., XV., 1, p. 117, &c.; XVI., p. 13, 363).

RÜTSCHE.*

Jehoahaz (LXX., Ἰωαχάζ; Vulg., Joachaz), was the son and successor of Jehu (see Art.) as king of Israel. He reigned 17 years (for in 2 Kings 13:10, we should read 39 for 37. Cf. 2 Kings 13:1; 14:1; 12:1). He found the kingdom greatly reduced, and it was still more enfeebled under him, by the oppressions of Syrians, so that he had but 50 horsemen, 10 chariots; and 10,000 footmen left him. The brave king (2 Kings 13:8) was greatly humbled by his misfortunes, and turned from his idolatries to Jehovah for help. The Lord promised a deliverer, who appeared in the person of Jeroboam II., then born (v. 5). Ewald (Gesch. Isr.) thinks, with some probability, that the incident in 2 Kings 5:1-6, 23, occurred under the reign of Jehoahaz.—2) A younger son (2 Kings 23:31, 36) and successor of Josiah of Judah. After the unhappy death of his father, the army elevated him to the throne, instead of his older brother, Jehoiakim (Cf. 2 Kings 11). In 2 Kings 23:24, he is called Eliakim, and in Jer. 22:11, Shallum. This supplanting of Jehoiakim seems to have resulted from an intrigue with the king of Egypt, who gladly seized the opportunity of interfering in the affairs of the country. The people seem to have regarded Jehoahaz as best suited to carry out his father's policy, otherwise the younger son would not have been chosen (1 Chron. 3:15). But Jehoahaz, although averse to Egyptian domination, allowed himself to be allured to Riblah (Ezek. 19:3, 4; 2 Kings 23:33), where he was insidiously fettered, and taken prisoner to Egypt. He reigned but three months. Jeremiah foretold his sad fate (Jer. 22:10, &c.). He died in Egypt, after probably living a long time in wretched imprisonment. (2 Kings 23:34. Cf. Ewald, Isr. Gesch., 3, 417). VAININGER.*

Jehoiachin (for variations in the form of the name, see Esther 2:6; Jer. 22:24, the LXX., and Vulgate), was the son and successor of Jehoiakim (see Art.), king of Judah. After his father's fall, he ascended the throne in his 18th year (2 Chron. 36:9, has 8, through a copyist's mistake), and, under the guidance of his mother, reigned wickedly (2 Kings 24:9; Ezek. 19:5, &c.; Jer. 26:22; 13:18). The Lord determined to punish him (Jer. 22:24, 30). The Chaldeans, leagued with the Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites, surrounded the city (2 Kings 24:2, 10), and when, finally, Nebuchadnezzar himself appeared, J., after reigning but three months and ten days (2 Chron. 36:9), resolved to forego the terrors of a siege, and surrendered himself and his mother to the mercy of the enemy. His princes and court officers accompanied him to Nebuchadnezzar's tent. They hoped thus to secure at least the authority of vassals. But J. and his court were banished to Babylon, with a large number of the best warriors and others, making in all 10,000. Among the captives was Ezekiel the priest (Ezek. 1:2). N., bound by a promise, or to keep a check on Egypt, did not then wish to destroy the nation, but utterly crushed its power. The temple also, and palace of the king were robbed of their treasures. Over those who remained N. set the third (probably youngest) son of Josiah, then 21 years old, as king; he assumed the name of Zedekiah (1 Chron. 3:15). Jehoiachin remained in captivity 37 years, when Evil-merodach liberated him (2 Kings 25:27). Although he had not reigned according to the will of God, the nation longed for his return, a desire which was encouraged by false prophets (Jer. 28:4). But Jeremiah (22:26, 27) expressly proclaimed that he would never be restored. VAININGER.*

Jehoiada, high-priest in the time of Athaliah, and of Joash of Judah (2 Kings 11; 2 Chron. 23; Jer. 29:26), a man in whom, after a long season of languor and degeneracy, the primitive spirit of the Levitical tribe (Ex. 32:26-9; Dent. 33:8-11; Mal. 2:4-6), and of the sacerdotal house (Numb. 25:7, 8, 11-13; Ps. 106:30, 31) revived. His high age also (2 Chron. 24:15) places him in the list of ancient worthies. To his praise be it said, that he counselled the young king, Joash (2 Kings 12:3; 2 Chron. 24:2), in the light of whose history we must study the full account of the seal of Jehoiada (2 Kings 11; 2 Chron. 23). By a secret understanding with the Levites and commanders of the army, he effected the overthrow of Athaliah, and the elevation of Joash (7 years old) to the throne of Judah. The plan was skilfully devised, and executed with decision (Cf. BUDDEI, hist. eccl., V., T. II., 393-7. Keil on Kings, p. 416, &c. Bertheau on Chronicles, p. 358).—The matter of chief interest for us in this whole case is the theological question it involves. In the Scriptural report of this event, the violent revolutionary overthrow of the reigning government is evidently approved of. Although Athaliah is nowhere called queen, both in Kings and Chronicles she is represented as having exercised supreme authority for six years (2 Kings 11:3; 2 Chron. 22:12); the preparation of the bloody scheme also implies this. What now is the practical application of the case? (Rom. 15:4), J. did not act under the direction of a special revelation, but upon private convictions (2 Chronicles 23:1, &c.). Hence older theologians appeal to this case, in determining the ethical limits to civil subordination (see Luther in J. GERHARD, Loci Theol., XIV., 363, 366. CHEMNITZ, Loci Theol., II., 63, ed. Frankf. THEOD. REINKINGK, de regimine seculari et ecclesiastico, p. 13, 16. F. BUDDEUS, Theol. Moral., p. 581, 2. Hugo Grotius de jure belli et pac., p. 141). But this view is hazardous, for a revolution may be prompted by fanaticism, as well as by mere frivolity. The application of this incident must be justified by duly settling the limits of such application. Two things then must be noticed: first, the government of Athaliah had reached the acme of its iniquity; next, a fair probability presented itself of subverting this wicked reign, and re-establishing a righteous government. But now the question remains open, whether, in the sphere of Gentile nations, these two things can ever concur. If they cannot, an application of the incident in this sphere must be rejected, though not in an external mechanical way, but according to the law of the Spirit, and of the Bible self. It might then also be scripturally proven, that Schleiermacher affirms upon the nature of the idea of morality, that every violent overthrow of an established government must be condemned (Christliche Sitte, p. 265-7). This then is the point which Christian ethics must establish, if, as it is bound, it will confirm its doctrine with the seal of divine authority. The name of Jehoiada must be the touchstone of the ethical doctrine concerning civil government.

BAUMGARTEN.*

Jehoiakim, the eldest son of Josiah, and successor of his brother, Jehoahaz (see Art.), 609-598 B. C. His original name, Eliakim, was changed, at Necho's request, to the synonymous Jehoiakim (2 Kings 23:34). The defeat at Megiddo encouraged the heathen party, and Jehoahaz likewise disappointed the hopes of his friends (2 Kings 23:32). It was, therefore, easy for the king of Egypt to put Jehoiakim in his brother's place, and secure from him the tribute of a vassal (2 Kings 23:33, 35; 2 Chron. 36:3). Thus the heathen party triumphed, and introduced idolatry beside the worship of Jehovah. Jeremiah reprov'd and earned in vain (26:1, &c.). Not only were idols, cast down by Josiah, restored, but their number was increased (Jer. 7:18, 30, &c.; 8:2; 11:10, 12, &c., &c.; Ezek. 6:4; 8:3, 7-13, &c., &c.) Moreover, Jehoiakim injured the exhausted country by the erection of splendid buildings, and by oppression and injustice (Jer. 22:11-17). Pharaoh Necho seems, after removing Jehoahaz to Riblah, to have gone to Jerusalem (2 Kings 23:33; 2 Chron. 36:3. Cf. Herod., 2, 159). After arranging matters in Judea according to his mind, and securing himself against revolt, Pharaoh turned against the sinking power of Syria, and established himself at Carchemish (Jer. 26:20, &c.; cf. 22:17, and 13). But the aspiring power of Babylon could not tolerate this. Under the youthful hero, Nebuchadn., a Babylonian army routed the hosts of Egypt at Carchemish, in Jehoakim's fourth year, and pressed its conquests into Syria (Cf. Jer. 46:1-12; 25:1, &c.). It is usually assumed that at this time (or even, according to Daniel 1:1, in his third year) J. subjected himself to Nebuchadn., and became tributary to the Chaldeans. But Jer. 36:11, &c., 29; 47:1, &c., contradict this, and we are compelled to consider the three years of 2 Kings 24:1, as the last of that king. It was in the eighth year of his reign that J. became subject to Nebuchadn. (2 Kings 24:1), after having experienced many difficulties (2 Kings 24:2; Ezek. 16:57; Jer. 49:23-27; 35:1-11). But three years later, when Habakkuk had added his testimony to that of Jeremiah, a new expedition of the Egyptians (2 Kings 24:7) induced Jehoiakim to revolt from Nebuchadnezzar, whereupon N. drove the Egyptians out of Syria (2 Kings 24:7), and inflicted a severe punishment upon Jehoiakim. In this war the army was composed not only of Chaldeans and Elamites (Jer. 49:34-49), but of Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites. J. let himself be allured into the enemy's camp and was captured and slain (Jer. 22:18, 19; 1 Chron. 36:6).

VAHINGER.*

Jehoram (Sept. 'Iwópáμ). 1) The son of Ahab, and, after the death of his elder brother, Ahaziah, king of Israel, reigned (2 Kings 3:1) twelve years (896-884 B. C.). The words of Elisha seem to have taken effect in him, for (doubtless in spite of his mother's opposition) he abolished the worship of Baal, at least from the court and its vicinity, and confined himself to the calf worship instituted by Jeroboam. From 2 Kings 9:18-28, we conclude that he did not destroy the idolatry of Baal in Samaria. He had more political power than Ahaziah. By the aid of the kings of Judah and Edom he reduced Mesha, king of Moab, to his former vassalage (2 Kings 3:4-27). The Syrians gave him more trouble. It is true, that through the intervention of Elijah their repeated invasions were frustrated (2 Kings 6:13-23); but when Benhadad led his whole army against Israel, his long siege of Samaria caused a famine there (2 Kings 6:24, &c.). But a rumor arose in the Syrian army that the kings of the Hittites and Egypt were coming upon them, whereupon they hastily raised the siege, and departed, leaving their tents, with great booty, behind (2 Kings 7:6, &c.). Emboldened by this, J. with his royal namesake of Judah united in an expedition against the Syrians, who still held Ramoth-Gilead. In this battle he was dangerously wounded, carried to Jezreel (2 Kings 8:29, &c.), where Jehu slew him (2 Kings 9:24). By Jehu's (see Art.) command the entire posterity of Ahab was exterminated (2 Kings 10:6, &c. — 2) The son and successor of Jehoshaphat in Judah, reigned (alone) 8 years (2 Kings 8:17). He began to reign in the 5th year of Jehoram of Israel. His father had previously associated his son with himself as co-regent (2 Kings 1:17; 9:27; 1 Kings 3:1; 22:42). He married Athaliah (see Art.), the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, and thus already betrayed a lack of theocratic feeling. This wicked woman completely ruled her husband (1 Kings 21:25; 2 Kings 8:18). It was she, doubtless, who advised him to adopt the Phœnician measure of establishing his throne, and enriching himself, by the murder of his brothers (2 Chron. 21:2-4). His misdeeds, which justly merited the overthrow of his kingdom, and the rejection of David's house, had not God been pleased to spare it for his ancestors' sake, are indicated in 2 Kings 8:19. Politically the kingdom declined under him. The Edomites (see Art.) revolted under him, and also the Levitical city of Libneh (2 Kings 8:22). The Philistines and Arabians (dwelling near the Ethiopians) were stirred up against him (2 Chron. 21:16, 17); the king's children, whom they carried away captives, were ransomed, and subsequently slain by Athaliah. His wicked life came to a painful end. Smitten with an incurable disease of the bowels, perhaps a chronic diarrhoea with colic, his decayed intestines passed from him, and he died. Denied a royal burial, his corpse was simply interred somewhere in the city of David. In Chron. 21:12, we must probably read Elisha for Elijah, who had died some time before.

VAHINGER.*

Jehoshaphat (Sept. 'Iwosápár; Vulg. Josaphat, God is Judge), the son and successor of Aza, in Judah, reigned from his 35th to his 60th year of age (1 Kings 15:24; 22:42), 18 years coterminously with Ahab, of Israel, then 2 coterminously with Ahaziah, and 5 coterminously with Jehoram of Israel (in 2 Kings 1:17; 3:1, the text has been corrupted). He pursued the policy of his father, and was even more zealous against the high places (2 Chron. 17:6), and for the full restoration of the true worship. Although not wholly successful, he purged the land of many evils (2 Chron. 17:3, 6; 1 Kings 22:43). He also adopted a method for securing the spread of true religious knowledge among the people, which, had his successors carried it out, would have produced the happiest effect. He appointed five influential laymen, nine Levites and two priests, to visit all the cities of Judah, and instruct the people in the law. It is probable that besides the instruction thus transiently imparted, houses for prayer and public instruction were established in their route. So deeply interested was Jeh. in this measure, that in the 18th year of his reign, on his return from the unfortunate campaign against the Syrians, he himself traveled over the country, and sought to confirm what had been done (2 Chron. 19:3). In Ps. 74:8, allusion is made to the destruction of synagogues. As this Psalm, with eight others, was composed in the time of Athaliah and Joash (see Vaihinger, d. Psalmen d. Rhythmus d. Urchrift gemäss metrisch übersetzt u. erklärt), it follows that J.'s arrangement survived him. J. also caused the civil code to be reconstructed and strictly executed (2 Chron. 19:5-11). Zebadiah presided over the civil court, and Amariah (1 Chron. 5:37) over the ecclesiastical court. In external relations J. also adopted what seemed happy measures. Like his father, he saw that the alienations between Israel and Judah only enfeebled both, and concluded a lasting peace with the royal house of the 10 tribes (1 Kings 22:45). This was done, not from indifference to idolatry, but from political considerations, which, however, led to evil consequences for his own house (see Jehoram and Athaliah). On the same ground he joined Ahab against the Syrians, for which Elisha severely reproved him (2 Chronicles 19:2, 3; 20:34). But, notwithstanding the prophet's counsel, he subsequently made a similar compact with Ahab's son, Jehoram, against Moab. On this expedition, also, he gave proof of his piety (2 Kings 3:4). But soon thereafter, Moab and Ammon leagued with Edom (in 2 Chron. 20:2, we must read דָּרָא for דָּרָא), invaded Judah, and reached Engedi when J. heard of it. He forthwith assembled the people, and prayed to God for deliverance. The prayer was heard and help promised (2 Chron. 20:5, 17). Spiritual agents (Ewald, Isr. Gesch., 3, 190, 1, Aufl.) were employed to discomfit the enemy (Cf. 2 Kings 6:16. &c). This incident is very obviously a different one from that in 2 Kings 3:1 (Cf. Joel 4:2, 12). The valley in which J. offered thanks after this victory is called the Valley of Blessing, a name which it may have borne in common with that mentioned by Joel (Jehoshaphat = of God's judgment). It was the Valley of the Kidron, for no other in the vicinity would correspond with the narrative. The proximity of it to Jerusalem would enable the citizens to participate in the service.—The maritime expedition in which J. united with Ahaziah, from Esiongeber, took place in the 19th year of J.'s reign, whilst that against Moab occurred in the 21st, and the invasion of the three confederates in the 23d of his reign (cf. 1 Kings 22:52). It assumes, however, the entire subjugation of Edom, which must have been effected in the early part of J.'s reign (Ewald, l. c., 3, 179, 188). There was then no king in Edom (1 Kings 22:48). J. wished to reopen the navigation of the Elamitic gulf, begun by Solomon, but failed (1 Kings 22:49). Thereupon Ahaziah (see Art.) invited him to take part in a new expedition, but J., profiting by past providences, declined. And yet in Chronicles (2 Chron. 20:25) we have a different account of the matter. The two accounts seem to conflict with each other, unless we regard the instance in 1 Kings 22:50, as a renewed proposition.—When Jehoram succeeded Ahaziah, Jehoshaphat aided him against Moab (2 Kings 3), and secured a happy result (Cf. 2 Kings 3:9 with 1 Kings 22:48). In all these instances he seems to have been animated by the hope of bringing Israel back to the true worship of Jehovah. But his worldly measures to secure this end, not only failed, but brought mischief upon his own house and kingdom. *VAIHINGER.

Jehovah. יְהוָה is the Old Test. proper name of God, wherefore called by the Jews שֵׁם הַשָּׁמַיְם רַבָּא, the great name, שֵׁם הַמְּיוֹהָר, the only name, most frequently שֵׁם הַמְּפָרָשׁ.—I. The pronunciation and grammatical explanation of the name. The tetragrammaton יְהוָה has as ἀπόκρυφον in the Masoretic text, on account of a K'ri perpetuum, the points of אֶרְוֹנִי; on the other hand, where אֶרְוֹנִי stands in apposition as Isaiah 22:12, 14, etc., those of אֱלֹהִים (not, however, when the יְהוָה and אֶרְוֹנִי belong to different members, as in Ps. 16:2. The prohibition to utter the name is derived by the Jews from Lev. 24:16, by means of an interpretation of the passage already given by the LXX. (δραμαζωρ το ονομα κυριου), which is entirely incorrect.—How ancient this awe of uttering the name is, cannot be definitely determined. The first trace of it shows itself already in some of the later canonical books of the O. T. in the relatively less frequent use of יְהוָה in the LXX., which, in this respect, is followed by the writers of the N. T., κύριος being universally substituted for it. On the other hand, Sir. 23:9, ονομασας τοι αγιου μη συνδυαζεις only means, that the name of God shall not be unnecessarily used. With reference to the Samaritans, Josephus reports, Ant., XII., 5. 5, that they built ἀναμνηρον ισραηλ on Gerizim. He also says, Ant., II., 12. 4, that it was not allowed to him to speak about the name. Compare with this what Philo says, in de mut. nom. § 2 (ed. Marg., I., 580), and ad Mos., III., 25 (II., 166); still it is remarked in the latter work, § 11 (152), that consecrated persons were allowed to hear and utter the name in the holy place. The Mishna contains rious statements about the matter, as in Bechoth, 9. 5, Sanhedrin, 10, 1, Thamid, 7, 2, d schasaka, 14, 10. (Comp. JAK. ALTING, exercitatio grammatica de punctis ac pronuntiatione tetragrammati יהוה, in RELAND's decas exercitationum philologicarum de vera pronuntiatione nominis Jehova, 1707, p. 423, sq.). Whilst now, according to the Jews, the knowledge of the pronuntiation of the name has been lost since the destruction of Jerusalem, many earlier and later Christian theologians say that an original pronuntiation exists in the pronuntiation of יהוה. They regard it as a combination of י = יה, ה = יהוה, and ו = יהוה (comp. Stier, Lehrgebäude der hebr. Sprache, p. 327). That such a formation of words is entirely abnormal to the Hebrew, need scarcely be remarked. The abbreviation of the name into יה does not necessarily presuppose the pronuntiation of Jehovah. The Jewish tradition, that the name comprehends the three periods, is also justified by the pronuntiations given below. Just as little does the circumlocution of the name in Rev. 1:4; 4:8, by ὁ ὢν καὶ ὁ ᾔων καὶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος evidence for the reading Jehovah, because ὁ ἐρχόμενος does by no means stand for ἐρχόμενος (so BUXTORF, dissertatio de nomine יהוה in Reland, l. c., p. 386), it rather signifies nothing else than the coming one, wherefore, as soon as the future of the Lord became present, 11:17 (according to the correct reading), and 16:5, only ὁ ὢν καὶ ὁ ᾔων stand (see Hengstenberg, Beitr. zur Einl. in's A. T. Bd. II., p. 236, sq.). Concerning the attempt made in favor of the reading Jehovah by the comparison of the Latin Jupiter, Jovis (see already, Fuller in Reland, p. 448, Gataker, in same, p. 494), whereby the more complete forms, Diespiter, Diavis, are overlooked, also concerning the hypothesis, that in the pronuntiation, Jehovah, an Egyptian name of deity, consisting of the seven vocals, יהוהוהוה, is preserved, see Hengstenberg, l. c., 204, sq., Tholuck, vermischte Schriften, I., p. 394, sq.—To obtain the pronuntiation and grammatical explanation of the name, we need only go to Ex. 3:13. When Moses asked for the name of him who sent him, he said: יהוה אשר אֵלֶיךָ. Thus shalt thou say to the children of Israel, Ehjeh hath sent me unto you: and when, in v. 15, it is further said: Thus shalt thou say, יהוה the God of your fathers hath sent me unto you, it is clear, that יהוה is to be regarded as a noun formed from the third person of the imperfect of יהוה (the older form for יהוה), and either יהוה (יהוה) or יהוה (יהוה) is to be read. The latter pronuntiation is just as possible as the first, which is now received by the most; although the latter formation is the more common in names derived from the imperfect of the יהוה roots, as יִמְכֶּה, יִמְכֶּה, etc., show (see Caspari, über Micha, p. 5, sq.). According to Theodoret (quæst. 15, in Ex.) the Samaritans read the name 'Iaβé, the Jews 'Aia. Clemens of Alexandria, Strom. 5, 6, utters the name 'Iaou

(although, perhaps, 'Iaous is to be read, see Hengstenberg, l. c., p. 226). No weight is to be given to the fact, that in Diod. 1, 94, the God of the Jews is called 'Iaw, and by Philo, of Babylon, in Euseb. præp. evang., 1., 9, 'Taw: for apart from the consideration, that the form יהוה, presupposed for this pronuntiation, is contrary to all analogy of the Hebrew, these forms of names are evidently formed after the mysterious name of Dionysius, which appears among the Greeks in the form 'Iaxos, but in the Semitic form runs יהוה. See, on this point, Movers, die Phönicier, I., Bd., p. 539, sq., especially p. 545 and 548).—The abbreviations of the name of God occurring in the Hebrew, in the pronuntiation Jahve or Jahva, can now easily be explained; viz., by apocope of the word arises יהוה, and from this, on the other hand, by further abbreviation יהוה, on the other by contracting the vocals יהוה and יהוה. The formation of nouns from the imperfect is very common in Hebrew, as well in the case of appellations (see Delitzsch, Jesurun, p. 208, sq., as especially of proper names (comp. יִשְׂרָאֵל, יַעֲקֹב, etc.). The names thus formed, expressing the fundamental meaning of the imperfect, designate a person according to an attribute, which continually manifests itself, and therefore is characteristic. This brings us, II., to the meaning of the name יהוה. This is, first: he who is, further, according to Ex. 3:14, he who is, who he is. God is Jehova, so far as he has entered into a historical relation with mankind, and continually manifests himself in this relation as him who is, and is, who he is. But as this historical relation is mediated by the revelation in Israel, he becomes first known as Jehovah according to the relation in which he has placed himself with the covenant-people. More particularly, however, there is a twofold meaning in the name. 1) God is he, who he is, so far as he, in his historically known existence, is he who limits himself, and is not limited by anything beyond himself (comp. Hofmann, der Schriftbeweis, I., p. 81, sq.). In this view, the name leads into the sphere of divine freedom—not in the sense of arbitrariness, but of absolute self-dependence. From this follows, 2) the absolute consistency of God, or this, that in everything, in word as well as in deed, he essentially agrees with himself. So far as the name, as it occurs in Ex. 3:13, sq.; 6:2, sq., is used in relation to the divine decree of election and the promises flowing therefrom, his immutable faithfulness is contained in the second point. That God, as Jehova, is the immutable one, is declared, Mal. 3:6 (comp. on this passage Hengstenberg, Christologie, 1, Aufl., 3, Bd., p. 419). The name seems to refer to both the absolute self-dependence and absolute consistency of God in Isaiah 41:3; 43:13; 44:6, etc.—Many, especially Jewish theologians, love to translate יהוה by "the eternal one," and certainly this attribute of the divine being is contained in the idea of Jehovah, as already.

Abraham, Gen. 21 : 33, called on the name of Jehovah as that of the eternal God.—The comparison of the name Jehovah with the general designation of the Divine Being אֱלֹהִים and יְהוָה will aid in elucidating it, as far as these expressions stand alone, without the article, and without being limited by the use of an adjective or a dependent genitive. We start out from this point, that the historical manifestation of God is essential to the idea of Jehovah, according to what has been already remarked, whereas Elohim as such does not yield to a historical process, but is absolutely transcendent to the world, a difference which is already manifest in the relation of Gen. 1 : 1, sq., to 2 : 4, sq. Accordingly, whatever falls under the general cosmical activity of God is referred to Elohim or El; on the other hand, the government of God in his kingdom on earth is referred to Jehova. Therefore God is merely Elohim to the heathen world, before he reveals himself to it in his theocratic glory of judge and redeemer (see already, Gen. 9 : 26, sq.). Specially instructive as regards this difference is Num. 16 : 22, comp. with 27 : 16. Compare also Ps. 19, where in reference to the revelation of God in nature v. 1, El is used, on the contrary, in reference to the revelation in the law, from v. 7 to the end, Jehova is used. Connected herewith is the fact, that God only as Jehovah is the living God, and he is called this not because he is the author of all being, but because he makes himself known and felt in historical manifestations, in word and deed (comp. Deut. 5 : 23; Joshua 3 : 10, etc.). Thus Jehovah is the living God, who doeth whatsoever he pleaseth, Ps. 115 : 3, who hears prayer, makes known his counsel, manifests himself as saviour and judge, etc., as opposed to the gods of the heathens, who reveal and do nothing. Wherefore, there can be no greater oath in Israel, than Jehovah lives (יְהוָה חַי, never אֱלֹהִים). How clearly conscious the O. T. is of this difference, is shown by certain modes of expression running through it, of which we mention the following: All expressions which refer to revelation, occur almost always only in connection with יְהוָה; so כֹּה אָמַר, מַעֲוֹת, נֶאֱמַר, דָּבָר יי, etc., also שֵׁם. Moreover, the theophany belongs to Jehovah, wherefore, the angel, in whom God appears, is generally called מַלְאָךְ יי. And as it is Jehovah, not Elohim, who has intercourse with men in human form, the anthropomorphisms are almost entirely transferred to Jehovah, ex gr. the hand of Jehovah, mouth, eyes, voice of Jehovah, very rarely of Elohim. Especially remarkable is the change of expression in Gen. 7 : 16.

According to all thus far said, the name Jehovah is so connected with the idea of God in the Old Test., that, III., its origin can only be sought for in the revelation of the O. T. (comp. Hävernicks spec. Einl. in den Pentateuch, 2. Aufl. von Keil, 1856, p. 75). With reference to the hypothesis, which would derive the name from Egypt, Phoenicia, and India, compare Tholuck, in literar., Anz., 1832, No. 27–30, also his vermischte Schriften Tbl., I., p. 376 sq. In later times, Röhk (die ägyptische u. semitische Glaubenslehre Anm., 175, p. 146) has again asserted the Egyptian origin of the name, in that he combines it with the name of the Egyptian god of the moon, Joh. But not only Exodus 5 : 2, but also the entire history of the exodus from Egypt is against such a derivation of the name.—The only question remaining is that with regard to the time of the origin of the name. The decisive passage on this point is Ex. 6 : 3. According to some this passage declares, that the name יְהוָה was first revealed to Moses, and that the knowledge of it was wanting to the patriarchs. (Thus, already, Jer. Ant., II., 12, 4). The passage thus interpreted stands in irreconcilable contradiction with the jehovistic sections of Genesis, especially with 4 : 26; 12 : 8, et al. According to another interpretation, this passage declares, that the name יְהוָה was not yet known to the patriarchs, that the perfect experience of what God as יְהוָה was, was wanting to them. (See especially Kurtz, Gesch. d. Alten Bundes, Bd. I., 2. Aufl., p. 345, sq., comp. with Bd. II., p. 67). The passage is then analogous with Ex. 33 : 19, where also mention is made, not of the revelation of a new title, but (comp. 34 : 6) of a more complete disclosure of a quality of the divine essence. The passage regarded in itself admits of both interpretations; although the first must, on account of the connection with v. 7, include the thought of the second. The following considerations make against the first interpretation: 1) The at least sporadic occurrence of יְהוָה also in those parts of Genesis which must be referred to the elohistic original document; 2) the occurrence of יְהוָה in the name of the mother of Moses יוֹכֶבֶד, Ex. 6 : 20, a circumstance which led Ewald to the supposition that the name Jehovah was used earlier at least among the maternal ancestors of Moses. Also the names occurring in the genealogies of Chronicles I. 2 : 25; 7 : 8; 4 : 18), Achija, Abija, Bithja are justly made to have weight by Keil (über die Gottesnamen im Pentateuch in der lutherischen Zeitschrift, 1851, II., p. 227). That the name Jehovah does not occur more frequently among the proper names known to us from the earliest times, proves nothing against the existence of this name, because it also appears very rarely among the proper names of the next following centuries, only frequently since the time of David. Finally, 3) It is altogether improbable that Moses, who had a revelation of the God of the fathers to bring to his people, should do so with the use of a name of God heretofore unknown to them. There is valid reason to suppose, therefore, that the origin of the name is pre-Mosaic.

OEHLER.—Beck.

Jehu (יְהוּ), son of Jehoshaphat, the son of Nimshi. King of Israel. His history is related in 2 Kings 9 and 10. It is an evidence of the terrible judgment that befalls apostates from God. Its object is to show that divine retributions are visited upon daring sins. Jehu as no other significance than to be the instrument to execute such a fearful retribution. The measure of sin in the house of Ahab was full. During his reign, and that of his son, Jehoram, the queen Jezebel, the wife of Ahab (see the Art.), continued to practice the abominations of Baal, despising all Jewish doctrines and customs. Already, during the lifetime of Ahab, the entire destruction of his house was predicted by Elijah. Jehu became the avenging sword to execute this prediction. He is described only as being the executor of this judgment of God, and he regards himself only as being such. He had no other mission than to execute vengeance, and not to awaken a new divine life. He was anointed as king by a disciple of Elisha, in order to be a sword against transgressors, and having destroyed the house of Ahab, and burned the house of Baal, his mission was at an end. He reigned 28 years in Samaria. (3103–3131 of the Creation, or 885–857 A. C.). See 2 Kings 9 and 10.

PAULUS CASSEL.—Beck.

Jephthah (יִפְתָּח; LXX., Ἰεφθά; Vulg., Jephthē; Luth., Jephtha), an Israelite hero in Gilead, whose history is narrated in Judges 11 and 12. To estimate him justly, we must have reference to these two chapters alone, and to no extrinsic information. We know only their Jephthah, and none other. He was the son of a Gileadite by a harlot. After the father's death the legitimate sons thrust him out, and suffered him not to inherit with them. Jephthah, deprived of his rights and homeless, fled to another country, where he became the chief of a band of adventurers. He is called "a mighty man of valor;" it seems, therefore, that by brave deeds at the head of his men he had made for himself a name. Hence the Gileadites in their distress applied to him for help. In the wars with the Ammonites, the Israelites beyond the Jordan were by their proximity chiefly exposed to depredations. Gilead, therefore, became the scene of the distress which Ammon brought upon Israel. The great men of Gilead are ready to offer the chieftaincy to him who will venture the struggle with Ammon. Jephthah possesses their confidence, and they make the offer to him. In order to explain the sacrifice of his daughter, it has become customary to portray him as a wild and ungodly man, hardened in robbery and murder. For this there is not the least reason: for more than any other judge he bases his resolution and actions upon God and his word. He does not repay the Gileadites for their former rigor, but says to them: "If ye bring me home again to fight against the children of Ammon, and the Lord deliver them before me, shall I be your head?" They call God to witness that it is their sincere intention to place him at their head. They proceed together to Mizpeh, and made him their captain. The words "Jephthah uttered all his words before the Lord in Mizpeh," can only mean that J. accepted his new office on the testimony of God; and that he undertook his present work in honor of God and his cause. So much the narration tells us. For the Israelites had sunken through their sins: and the hero who was to rescue them could labor and fight only as in the sight of God. The negotiations with Ammon, also, show this. "What hast thou to do with me," asked J. of the king of the Ammonites, "that thou art come against me to fight in my land?" The king has no resource but to justify himself by remote historical reasons: that Israel had been a standing injustice to Ammon, ever since it had come from Egypt; for it had taken away his land from Arnon to the Jabbok and Jordan. Jephthah, well acquainted with the journey of Israel through the wilderness, replies in a convincing manner. He shows that by divine right Israel possessed the land of the Amorites. Very characteristic is the following: "So now the Lord God of Israel hath dispossessed the Amorites from before his people Israel, and shouldst thou possess it? Wilt not thou possess that which Chemosh thy god giveth thee to possess? So whosoever the Lord our God shall drive out from before us, them will we possess." That is, your title of possession and ours are the same. Besides, he says, three hundred years have already passed to assert this claim. He concludes: "I have not sinned against thee, but thou doest me wrong to war against me: the Lord the Judge be judge this day between the children of Israel and the children of Ammon." The Spirit of the Lord had come upon him, and he burned for the victory in order to seal the rights of Israel and the testimony of God. Everything was lost, if he should not gain the victory. This explains the vow which he made to God, viz.: "If thou shalt without fail deliver the children of Ammon into mine hands, then it shall be that whatsoever cometh forth of the doors of my house to meet me, when I return in peace from the children of Ammon, shall surely be the Lord's, and I will offer it up for a burnt-offering." The Lord gives him a complete victory, and he returns home in triumph. When he came to Mizpeh, his daughter comes to meet him. She it is, then, who becomes the victim of his vow. He cries out: "Alas, my daughter! thou hast brought me very low, and thou art one of them that trouble me: for I have opened my mouth unto the Lord, and I cannot go back." The daughter replies, that J. should do to her according to his vow. It is a deeply stirring tragic act, which the Scriptures describe. After J. had gained all, he loses what is dearest to him. He has gained power, but has no heir. But after the victory he is faithful to the God to whom he had cried before the battle.—It is inconceivable how J. has merited this sad stroke: For that God is gracious to him, appears from his decisive victory. The vow itself is an expression of his burning zeal to save Israel. He wishes to thank God with all his heart. To make a vow was very natural from the Israelite customs. If, then, his vow brings a great sorrow upon Jephthah, God no doubt wishes to inculcate some great principle. In his vow J. evidently left it to the guidance of God, to point out the sacrifice which he desired. In his zeal to vanquish the enemy and give thanks to God, J. cannot remember any particular object sufficiently valuable to dedicate unto God. He therefore leaves it to God to point out the sacrifice. He vows with all his heart; God accepts the vow, and suffers it to be realized in a manner which went beyond the expectations of Jephthah. Hence his only daughter comes out to meet him. God did not choose an animal, or an object of mere property: gratitude to God must proceed from the deepest love of the heart. A broken heart is acceptable to him. Self-conquest and the surrender of what is dearest is well-pleasing to him. This precept could become intelligible to Jephthah through his sorrow, when the fulfilment of his vow revealed to him its nature. His vow had, against his will, become a reality. God had shown him the measure by which He estimated what was dearest, and had directed it that J. should discover in grief the true nature of gratitude and offering to Him; for grief makes sacred the offering. What man gives without his heart's blood cleaving to it, is a mere work, no sacrifice. J., therefore, is only instructed, not punished, by his grief; he discovers the true nature of a sacrifice. This precept appears typically in more than one instance in the old covenant. God desires no human sacrifice. That he demands it of Abraham, is a mere trial from which he delivers his joyfully obedient follower. But in the case of J. grief must be added, since without it his sacrifice would be no sacrifice. God had not tried him, but he has tried God. In the case of Abraham we discover the nature of a constant faith; in that of J., the nature of divine verity, which bursts all forms and pretences, and demands its own rights.—That he is not absolved from his vow, makes it evident that no bloody sacrifice is intended. Otherwise God, in the manner of idols, had directed the bloody sacrifice of a child. From this ethical precept itself of the narration, we premise the exegetical evidence of an unbloody sacrifice. The opinions relating to the fate of Jephthah's daughter have had their own history. Great importance has been attached to the fact that the ancient Jewish interpretation, as given in the Talmud and Midrach, accepted also by Josephus, regards the bloody sacrifice as really accomplished. This interpretation is readily explained from the views of that age concerning vows.—In J. we are to learn the danger of a vow wrongly expressed: the vow was a wrong one, since it included possibilities which were contrary to the law. We are further to learn from it a one-sided conscientiousness in the interpretation of vows. J. is censured for the obstinacy with which he seems to have avoided an absolution from his vow by a priest: i. e., the views of a later age were transferred to him. As he is reported to have fulfilled the vow, it was concluded that he had sacrificed her, because another fulfilment except by a sacrifice was beyond the views of the age. The Church Fathers accepted the Jewish interpretation, which also prevailed up to the Reformation. Protestant interpretation followed later Jewish commentaries, which had set aside the Talmudist tradition, and proven very convincingly that J. had, indeed, consecrated his daughter to God, but had not sacrificed her. Catholic interpreters generally retained the former interpretation. Rationalism, also, has generally accepted the older view. Calmet, Michaelis, Studer, Ewald, and Munk, defend the bloody sacrifice: Salmshütz is an exception to the above. We will try to show that the sacrifice was an unbloody one.—We have already remarked that the Scriptural narrative gives us no reason to regard J. as a wild barbarian: he has been invested with such a character, however, in order to make this bloody sacrifice possible. Though appalled by the fearful consequence of his vow, he was, nevertheless, sufficiently strong to fulfil it. As soon, however, as we admit that the bloody sacrifice was necessarily involved in his vow, we must also admit that a human sacrifice was consciously involved in it. If the words, "Whatsoever cometh forth of the doors of my house to meet me, when I return in peace, shall surely be the Lord's, and I will offer it," necessitates him to the bloody sacrifice of his daughter, he must necessarily have had a human sacrifice in contemplation; for it is impossible that he could have thought or spoken this of an animal merely. That a person should come forth from the door of his house to meet him, was, at least, as probable as that an animal capable of being sacrificed should do so. Jephthah was not master of his senses, if he did not think of this. He already included the possible dedication of a person, for the phraseology of the vow evidently contemplates more than the offering of a mere animal.—Jephthah's vow no doubt intended men, as was allowed also by the Mosaic law. But burnt-offerings of men were not allowed. A vow was like a contract agreed upon between two parties. Hence it had to be clearly expressed, so that the vower could in no manner evade it. This is the case with J.'s vow. The words, "It shall surely be the Lord's, and I will offer it up for a burnt-offering," contemplate a twofold possibility which he had in his mind. The person who may meet him, shall belong unto God; and the animal to be brought as a burnt-offering. This we must admit, if we do not suppose that J. had already meditated bringing a human sacrifice. His trouble is not accounted for by the fact that he had to offer up a human person; but that it was his daughter from whom he was to separate. From the Oriental seclusion of the daughters he had not expected that she would come to meet him. He had thought of an offering from his property; now one from his inmost heart is demanded. To this conclusion we are also brought by verse 39. If he had sacrificed her as a burnt-offering, this would have been plainly stated. It would not have been said: "He did with her according to his vow;" but "He offered her for a burnt-offering." That this is not said, indicates, indeed, that a painful vow had been fulfilled in her case, but that she had not been made a burnt-offering. For a mere hesitation to report her case is not admissible in the Scriptures, but least of all in the Book of Judges.—How the vow was fulfilled, is not told; it was sufficient to indicate the deep precept, to which the narration pointed. The painful import of the vow, which took the vower himself by surprise, and the fidelity with which he nevertheless fulfilled it, were the chief points of the pathetic act. The vow is fulfilled: the manner of doing this is therefore left in the background. There the hints, nevertheless, which may lead us to a just conclusion as to the fate of the daughter.—She was J.'s only daughter, and dwelt with him. From this alone we may suppose that she was yet unmarried (v. 34). When she became acquainted with J.'s vow, she requested two months to bewail her virginity. This would be a strange request if she supposed that she was to be made a burnt-offering. If "to bewail her virginity" meant only to bewail "her youthful life," it is hard to see why this should take place upon the mountains. It is also contrary to human nature that a child which is to die, should during the interval separate herself from her father. But since the narration lays special stress upon the bewailing of her virginity, this latter must have some relation to the fulfilment of the vow. If a virgin bewails her virginity, it must be because this remains an undeveloped bud; being prevented, not by death, but by life itself.—Among ancient nations the marital relation was the completion and crown of youth. Their young men and maidens are dry branches if they do not ripen into this relation. The union of a youth with a virgin is heretofore the brightest festival of the ancients, their religious festivals alone excepted. Hence, that a maiden, instead of being married, should find her mission in preserving her virginity, is an idea foreign to the Biblical sphere. It almost seems as if an unmarried woman had no place in it. Hence it has remained an uninterrupted tradition among the Jews, that it is a calamity for a maiden to remain unmarried. The Mishna classes an ascetic woman among those who corrupt the world. It is an extremely true picture of ancient life, according to which the daughter bewails her virginity, by which she is excluded not only from the joy of her heart, but also of her entire female nature. She, the only ornament and joy of her father's house, is to wither; and her house is to become a dead one.—Jephthah fulfils his vow, and devotes his daughter to God. "What shall meet me, shall surely be the Lord's." He marries his daughter unto God; and with this, all mere human joys perish. She consecrates to God her chastity, but she bewails it; and the daughters of Israel lament with her. She brings her sorrow as an offering, as the father brings his. Only in this way can we understand the words added: "And she knew no man." What would these words import, if she had really died as a sacrifice? And yet they stand in close relation to the preceding: "He did with her according to his vow." They become plain when we regard them as expressing the fulfilment of the vow; i. e., if we refer them to the future, not to the past. J. fulfilled his vow and she knew no man; hence the daughters of Israel went yearly to lament her four days. Her chastity was the offering which J. made. In what manner she devoted her life to God, cannot, of course, be known. It was sufficient for the precept involved in the narrative to give the result that a vow had been made with God, and had been fulfilled by the faithfulness of a maiden for the sake of her father. The daughters of Israel praised the daughter of J. four days every year. Wherefore the praise, if she had been slain a sacrifice? In the latter case her father would not have been dependent upon her voluntary offering. But the vow to belong unto God throughout an entire life of chastity, is based in the pure heart of the daughter. If she keeps the vow, it is her glory as well as her sacrifice that for the sake of her father's sacred word she forgot joy of heart and hymeneal song.—How modestly it is added, that the daughters of Israel went with her upon the mountains to bewail her virginity! If her life was intended, these tears might have flowed at home just as well. But her virginity was the subject of their lamentation; this could not be uttered in the city and in presence of men. Modesty required the solitude of mountains for this. The pure heart of the maiden does not unfold itself before the eyes of all, but pours forth its wailing of love in sacred seclusion.—There is a tragical feature connected with the three great heroes, Gideon, Jephthah, and Samson, around which the histories of the Book of Judges are clustered. Gideon consecrates the conquered gold as an ephod unto God, and thus creates a snare for Israel. Samson bears upon his head the consecration of God, and perishes triumphantly in that power which he had previously lost. Jephthah is the most excellent of the three. He sacrifices unto God his love, his joy, and the hopes of his house. He is therefore justly classed by the apostle among the bearers of a heroic faith and victorious trust in God (Hebr. 11:32). The Scriptures narrate another act of heroism on the part of Jephthah, by which he humbled Ephraim. It would seem that the latter was envious of J.'s triumph, by which he had gained for Gilead the glory of saving Israel. Jephthah inflicted upon them a severe overthrow, and afterwards judged Israel for six years. With him the judgeship departed from Gilead.

PAULUS CASSEL.—Reinecke.

Jeremiah, the Prophet. I. The name יֵרֵמְיָהוּ (Jer. 27:1; 28:5, 10, 11, 15; 29:1. Dan. 9:2; in Greek Iereμίας) is not with Simon (Onomast., V., T., p. 535) to be derived from יָרָם (יהָ, elatus Domini), but according to many analogies (ex. gr. יִפְרִיָה, יִבְנִיָה) from יָרָם, and can only mean: Jova jacit, projicit, dejicit, or ejicit (comp. Hengstenberg, Christol. 2 Aufl. II., p. 400). The prophet of this name, whose book occupies the second rank among the prophetæ posteriores (comp. Havernick. Einl., II., 2, p. 26. De Wette, Einl., p. 13 and 155), was the son of the priest Hilkiab of Anathoth, in the land of Benjamin (1:1; 11:21, sq.; 29:27; 32:7, sq.). Concerning Anathoth (now Anata) comp. Joshua 21:18; 1 Chron. 6:60; Neh. 11:32. According to Eusebius (Onomast., s. v.) and Jerome (on Jer. 1:1; 11:21; 32:7) it was situated three Roman miles, according to Josephus (Ant., X., 7, 3) 20 stadia, consequently, as the two statements differ only about half a Roman mile, about a half geographical mile north (Isaiah 10:30) of Jerusalem. Comp. Robinson, Palestine; Zeitschr. f. d. Kunde des Morgenl., Bd. II., p. 354, sq. That the father of the prophet was the same with the high-priest Hilkiah (2 Kings 22:4, sq.; 2 Chron. 34:9) has been supposed by a number of ancient and modern commentators (Clem., Alex., Jerome, Kimchi, Abarbanel, Eichhorn, v. Bohlen, Umbreit), which is refuted as well by the simple

סִי-הַכֹּהֲנִים 1:1, as by the consideration, that the place of residence does not justify an inference in favor of a high-priest, or especially of such an one from the house of Eleazer (comp. 1 Chron. 6:4 in the Hebr. with 24:3, and 1 Kings 2:26). According to Jer. 1:6, Jeremiah was called to be a prophet while yet young, according to 1:2; 25:3, in the thirteenth year of Josiah, i. e., 629 A. C. It was at the time, therefore, when Josiah (2 Chron. 34:3) had already commenced his reformatory labors, and also the time, when the overthrow of Assur by the fall of Nineveh (626 A. C.) was near at hand—a time, accordingly, when the chief internal and external enemies of the theocracy, idolatry, and Assur, received heavy blows. But the reformation of Josiah was not lasting, and the place of Assur was immediately filled by the more terrible power of the Chaldeans. According to 11:21, it is probable that Jeremiah prophesied for a time in Anathoth, but later we find him established in Jerusalem, where he proclaimed the word of the Lord now in the temple (7:2; 26:1), then at the gates of the city (17:19), then also at other places (18:1, sq.; 19:1, sq.), also in the king's palace (22:1; 37:17), by word, writing (29:1, sq.; 36:2, sq.), and signs (18:1, sq.; 19:1, sq.; 27:2). The first 22 years of his prophetic labors passed away without any special personal events, and only the substance of his address during this period is preserved in chapters 2–10. The year 605, however, constitutes a decisive turning-point. This was the first year of Nebuchadnezzar (25:1), the year of the battle at Carchemisch, of the beginning of the spread of the Chaldean rule over Upper Asia, an event, which, in connection with the destruction of Egyptian rule over Judea (2 Kings 24:7), involved the beginning of Chaldean dominion and the exile. It is true, Jeremiah had long before prophesied the destruction of the theocracy by a nation from the north, but that this nation should be the Chaldeans he had not yet said. He says it first in the significant prophetic address, chap. 25, which is very properly to be regarded as the outline of the entire compass of Jeremiah's prophecy. Evidently it was the important event of this year, the collision of Egyptian and Chaldean power at Carchemisch, and the victory of the latter, that furnished the external historical impulse to this enlargement of the prophetic vision. It is true, Nebuchadnezzar did not seize upon Media immediately after this battle, because, according to Baronius (Jos., Ant., X., 11, 1), the intelligence of his father's death recalled him to Babylon. But four years later (the eighth of Jehoiakim, comp. Jos., Ant., X., 6, 1) he returned and made Judea tributary (2 Kings 24:1). If Jeremiah's situation was perilous before the appearance of the Chaldeans on the scene of action, because he prophesied destruction in case of impenitence (26:1, sq.), it became much more so, after that event had given occasion to a twofold progress in the labors of the prophet. As to the first, it is very significant, that Jeremiah, after the battle of Carchemisch, sketches for the immediate future a definite prophetic programme, not only of the theocracy, but also of the Chaldean kingdom, and of the nations subjected by it (chapter 25, 27, 29). Although he does not say so in express words, yet it is evident, that he regards the supremacy of Nebuchadnezzar as an fait accompli in the fourth year of Jehoiakim. The victory at Carchemisch appeared to him as the principle, which, as the first manifestation of a divine decree, carried in its bosom all the subsequent results. Wherefore, from the year 605 onward he regarded Nebuchadnezzar as being, if not de facto, at least de jure, and that de jure divino, the lord and master of all the nations named, chap. 25:11, sq. Comp. concerning this form of implied prophecy, Havernick, Einl., II., 2, p. 46, sq.—The second sign of progress in Jeremiah's labors as prophet at this time, appears in the fact, that in the same fourth year of Jehoiakim, he received a command from the Lord that he should write down his prophecies (chap. 36). That such a command should come to him just in this year, is a plain evidence, that his prophetic labors were brought to a point of decisive conclusion. What we read in chapters 25–29, is the quintessence and centre of Jeremiah's prophecy: having reached this point it was complete and ready to be fixed in writing. At the same time, however, a last attempt was now to be made, by the combined force of the appeals in this form, to impress the hard heart of the nation (36:3, 7). But it resisted this divine appeal. Then, a few years after the battle at Carchemisch, Nebuchadnezzar really came to accomplish the things prophesied concerning him. Jehoiakim was subject to him three years (2 Kings 24:1). He dying an ignominious death (comp. 2 Kings 24:6. 2 Chron. 36:6, with Jer. 22:18, sq.: 36:30), was succeeded by his son Jehoiachin, who only reigned three months. Nebuchadnezzar, who had determined, as it seems, to weaken the Jewish states, first sent his troops against Jerusalem, although there was no rebellion against him existing. Jehoiachin resisted these; but when Nebuchadnezzar himself came, he yielded (נָשָׁב), 2 Kings 24:12). The policy of N., when he wished to reduce a state to harmlessness, consisted in removing into exile its best elements (see the Art. Babyl. Capt.). Thus he did with Judah (2 Kings 24:13–16; Jer. 29:1; 52:28). Jehoiachin (whose end is related, Jer. 52:31–34; 2 Kings 25:27–30) was succeeded by his uncle Zedekiah, son of Josiah (Jer. 37:1; 2 Kings 23:34). Under Zedekiah the situation of the prophet became more painful in proportion as the impiety and obduracy of the nation, and especially of its leaders increased (Jer. 21:24). It is true, he even yet proclaimed grace on the condition of repentance (21:11, sq.; 22:3 sq.; 34:4, sq.), and the people really made a beginning of reformation (34:8, sq.),—but it was transitory. Zedekiah, who, according to 2 Chron. 36:13), swore allegiance

Nebuchadnezzar, broke his oath. He looked to Egypt for aid (Ezek. 17:15; Jer. 37:5). But this aid only came after the Chaldeans had besieged the city. Their marching off against the Egyptians, awakened deceptive hopes. Jeremiah destroyed these (37:6-11), and here properly begins the period of his sufferings. It is true, that previous to this time, he was not free from all kinds of troubles and dangers (Jer. 11:18; 15:20, sq., 18:18, sq.; 20:1, sq.), but from this time forward his persecutions were continuous and extreme. He was first cast into prison (37:11-26), and persevering here in proclaiming the decree of the Lord, he was cast into a dungeon full of mire (38:1-13), from which he was taken at the intercession of Ebed-Melech (39:16-18). This was the height of his suffering, and how dreadful it was appears from chap. 39.—Finally, in the eleventh year of Zedekiah, Jerusalem was captured. Concerning the fate of the prophet at this time there are evidently two accounts, inasmuch as, according to 39:11-14, it appears, as if he had already been liberated in Jerusalem, whilst, according to 40:1, sq., he is taken in chains to Rama, and only there liberated. The contradiction here is only in appearance, as is also indicated by וַיֵּשֶׁב בְּתוֹךְ הָעָם, 39:14. For, if Jeremiah, after his liberation by the captains, remained among the people, he might easily, in the confusion, have been treated by the soldiers as the other people were treated (comp. Hitzig, Jer., p. 325). After his release he went to Gedaliah at Mizpeh (40:1-6); after G.'s death, the people compelled him to accompany them to Egypt; although he opposed the expedition most decidedly as being displeasing to God (41:17; 43:7). The Jews settled at Tahpanhes (Taphn. LXX.). There he once more prophesied, announcing destruction, both by word and signs (43:8-13, 44), not only to his nation, but also to Egypt and its king. This is the last notice that we have of Jeremiah in the Bible. What is further reported about him is traditional. According to Jerome (adv. Jovin., 2, 37), Tertullian (Scorp., 8, comp. Seder ol. rabba, 26), he was stoned in Egypt, but, according to Epiphanius, at Tahpanhes (περί τῶν προφητῶν, etc., Opp., II., p. 239, comp. FABRIC., Cod. pseudep., V., T., p. 1110, sqq.). Another tradition has it, that Alexander the Great had his ashes brought to Alexandria (Dorotheus, συγγράμ. in Chron. pasch., p. 156, ed. Dindorf, p. 292). His grave is now shown at Cairo (Lucas, Reise in's Morgenland, I., p. 37).—As greatly as Jeremiah was persecuted by his countrymen during his life, so greatly was he honored by them after his death. His person was transformed into an ideal, and a multitude of wonderful traditions glorified him (2 Macc. 2:1, sq.; 15:14, sq., Epist. Jer.), and his countrymen, by degrees, came to regard him as being by so much the greatest of all the prophets, that they called him ἐκπονήτης, and believed in his return at the end of days, in which sense Deut. 18:15, was interpreted. Even in the New Test. reference is made to such a belief, as still then existing, Matt. 16:14; John 1:21; Coll. 6:14; 7:40. Comp. Sirach 49:6-8. Carpov, introd., P. III.,

C. 3, § 2. Bertholdt, Christ. Jud., § 15, p. 61-67. The same, Einl., IV., p. 1415, sq. De Wette, bibl. Dogmatik, § 197.

II. From this historical representation, it can be perceived under what peculiarly difficult circumstances Jeremiah exercised his prophetic office. It can be truly said, that he fulfilled the most difficult mission that was ever committed to a prophet. Being by nature of a tender and timid disposition, more like John than like Peter, or the Baptist, or even Elias, nevertheless the task was laid upon him to carry on a warfare of life and death with powerful and bitter enemies. And, as if the enmity of his own nation was not enough for him to endure, he was required to proclaim to foreign nations judgments, threatened them by Nebuchadnezzar (25, 27, 46-51). On this account he became the object of hatred and contempt from all sides, especially to his own nation. His life was in constant danger (11:21; 20:10, sq.; 38:4, sq.), his honor was continually brought into contempt (20:7-9; Lam. 3:14). He, therefore, curses the day of his birth, like Job (20:15), and desires to be rid of his office (20:9). But the consciousness of his calling allowed him no rest (20:9), and in this weak one also the strength of the Lord became more perfect (1:18, sq.), which he also greatly needed. Everything was against him, and he stood alone, at least at the time of the greatest misfortune, without a protector or even a companion in office. For, of the prophets who were contemporaneous with him, Zephaniah and the prophetess Hulda (2 Kings 22:14; 2 Chron. 34:22) prophesied in the time of Josiah, Habakkuk (see the Art.) and Uriah (26:20, sq.) in the time of Jehoiakim, consequently during the first and more peaceful period of his life. Ezekiel and Daniel, it is true, survived with him the great catastrophe, but they lived at a distance, even already in exile, and he could find no support in them. We read, it is true, that some of the people and princes were his friends (26:16, 24), that even King Zedekiah was secretly attached to him, but what was all this against the hatred of the great mass of the people and their leaders, of the princes, priests, and false prophets. His position was so peculiar and his mission so extraordinary, that we must regard him as the antitype, not of John the Baptist (Hengstenberg, Christol., II., p. 400), but of Christ. The first destruction of Jerusalem typified the second. And as Jeremiah was the prophet of the first, so was Christ the prophet of the second (Matt. 23:29-39; Luke 13:34, sq.; 19:41-44; 23:27-31).

III. With regard to the literary character of Jeremiah we can say of him in general: le style c'est l'homme. As a writer he appears in one view as a brazen wall, in another as soft wax. As a brazen wall, because no worldly power was able to prevent him from uttering his prophecies; as soft wax, because we are persuaded, that the man who spoke these powerful words was of a tender disposition and broken heart. On this account his style lacks the grand, bold terseness and concentration, which we admire so much in Isaiah and Hosea. His periods are long and verbose. When he quotes from others, he does it in such a way as to take away all that is severe and harsh. Comp. KUEPER, Jerem. librorum ss. interpretes (Berlin, 1837), p. XIV.: "Sæpius complura epitheta adduntur et difficiliora vel audaciora aut fusius explicantur, aut formis ætate Jeremiæ usitatoribus receptis in speciem leviores abeunt." This peculiarity shows itself also in the dialectics of the prophet. Whilst he holds fast to his fundamental thoughts with a monotony so steady, that the contents of his prophecy seem almost meagre, on the other hand, the execution manifests such a richness, that the unity and connection of the thought seem to suffer thereby. There is no dialectic development of conclusion from premises in his writings, but we behold, as it were, a series of tableaux pass before our view, each of which presents the same chief person and the same scene, but in manifold groupings (comp. Nägelsbach: Der Prophet Jerem. und Babylon, Erlangen, 1850, p. 32, sq.). These tableaux constitute the strophes, into which the discourse of the prophet evidently divides itself, so truly, that pretty equal measure and similar structure recur in all (comp. Ewald, die Propheten des A. B. II., p. 13). This peculiarity of his dialectics refutes the objection, that Jeremiah is illogical, and repeats continually (comp. MAURER: non ad certum quendam ordinem res dispositæ sunt et descriptæ, sed libere ab una sententia transitur ad alteram. The transitions are certainly not logically mediated in words, but the logical progress still exists internally, and the repetitions are just the necessary consequence of the tableaux-form style. But there is also another kind of repetition very frequent with Jeremiah, viz., this, that he not only very often quotes himself (a table of these self-citations are in the treatise above-named, p. 128, sq.), but also frequently repeats what others have said. Jeremiah lived especially in the Pentateuch, and of its five books especially in Deuteronomy (comp. Kueper, l. c., and König, Altest. Studien, 2. Theil: Das Deuteronomium und der Proph. Jer.). On account of this reproduction of the thoughts of others, it is objected, that he lacks originality and power (comp. Knobel, Prophetismus der Hebräer, II., p. 267, sq.) But this objection is as groundless as the other, that he lacks poetry. With regard to the first, it must be first proven that Jeremiah himself produced nothing, or only a little and that not important; for, in itself, to absorb one's self in predecessors is more matter of praise than of blame. With regard to the want of poetry, I refer simply to Umbreit (Commentar, p. XV., sq.), who attributes the highest poetical talent to Jeremiah. Moreover, that the style of Jeremiah is not polished, cannot be denied. The judgment of Jerome refers to this: "sermone aliis prophetis videtur esse rusticior,"—although, on the other hand, CUNÆUS (de rep. Hebr., Lib. III., cap. 7) says justly: Jeremiæ omnis majestas posita in verborum neglectu est, adeo illum decet rustica dictio. Finally, with regard to the language, it is yet to be remarked, that the influence of the Aramaic idiom is very perceptible in Jeremiah. Compare Hävernicks, Einl., I., 1. p. 231, sq. Knobel, Jeremias chaldaizans, dissert. Vratisl., 1831.

IV. If we proceed now to the Book of the prophet, we meet first of all the question concerning the arrangement of the same. The views on this point are manifold, and for them we must refer to the introductions and commentaries. We shall content ourselves with a statement of the question and an expression of our view concerning it. This much is certain, the book of Jeremiah, within the introductory first and the closing 52d chapter, whose authenticity is very doubtful, is divided into two chief parts of unequal length. The first part embraces chap. 2-45: theocratic prophecies, to which chap. 45 (referring to Baruch) is to be regarded as an appendix. The second part embraces chap. 46-51: prophecies against foreign nations. Thus far the arrangement of the book is clear. Comp. De Wette, Einl., p. 323. Also in the first part there can only be dispute about the arrangement of chap. 21-36, for the chap. 2-20, as also 37-44, follow each other in chronological order. But before we pass to the disputed point (chap. 21-36), it is necessary to look at another subject.

We read, viz., chap. 36, that Jeremiah, at the command of the Lord, committed his prophecies to writing in the form of a book. This book, once burned and then made anew, can, if we compare 36:1 with v. 5 and 32, not well have been completed in its last form before the sixth year of Jehoiakim. But now, that our present book cannot be the one then completed, is evident not only from the fact, that there are many sections in our book that were written after the sixth year of Jehoiakim, but also from the circumstance, that in 1:2, sq., the period of time within which the things recorded in the book occurred is designated, on the one hand, as the 13th year of Josiah, and on the other, as the 5th month of the 11th year of Zedekiah. It is seen from this, that Jeremiah added what he prophesied after the 6th year of Jehoiakim, and that he made a new conclusion after the 5th month of the 11th year of Zedekiah, for which the catastrophe that then occurred gave a very natural occasion. Still even this date is overstepped by the contents of the book, for we find in chap. 40-44 many events of a later date, everything, viz.: that occurred from the destruction to the last prophecy in Egypt. Therefore, either the prophet himself made the additions, without changing the date in 1:3, or some one else incorporated the discourses composed after the 11th year of Zedekiah. That, however, the book does not now contain the original order of its parts, is in the highest degree probable. For not only does 1:2, sq., and 36:2 seem to indicate a chronological arrangement of the original work, but also the character of the arrangement now followed in the critical part of the book, favors the supposition, that we are not to regard it as the work of the prophet, as will hereafter appear.

If we now turn our attention to the arrangement and sequence of the parts, the discovery of these is made easy, because all the sections are designated by superscriptions. The fundamental type of these superscriptions is: יהוה הַדְבָר אֲשֶׁר הָיָה אֶל יִרְמְיָהוּ מֵאֵת (7:1; 11:1, et al.), which, however, occurs also breviated and modified, according to circumstances, (comp. Ewald, Proph. d. A. B., II., 12). Thus the following sections result: I. chap. 2. II. chap. 3:1-6, 30. III. 7:1-10, 11. IV. 11:1-13, 27. V. 14:1-17, 27. VI. 18:1-20, 18. This is the series of the portions containing the exclusively prophetic discourses. It is remarkable, that just these portions, which are destitute of all chronological designations, are nevertheless chronologically arranged, whilst the following portions, which are full of dates, generally do not at least follow in chronological order. For it can now be regarded as fully settled, that the above-named six sections follow each other in this order of time, inasmuch as the first and second belong to the time of Josiah, the third and fourth to that of Jehoiakim and Jehoiachin, the fifth and sixth to that of Zedekiah, which, however, we are not able to show more particularly here.

The seventh section embraces chap. 21:1-24, 10, and with this section begins the series of chapters, extending to chap. 36, in the order and sequence of which interpreters at all times have felt the absence of a fixed principle. We shall see how far this reproach is well grounded. In the first place, chap. 21 is evidently connected with chap. 20, because in both the name Pashur occurs at the beginning (20:1: 21:1). Chapter 22 is connected with chap. 21, because the former begins with the same subject with which the latter closes (comp. 21:12, sq., with 22:3, sq.). Chapter 22, however, is an integral part of a larger whole, which embraces chap. 22 and 23, and contains prophecies against the chiefs of the theocracy, prophets, and kings. With the latter chap. 24 is connected, because it belongs to the same historical period, viz., the period after the overthrow of Jehoiachin, with which the preceding portion (22:24-30) concludes.—The eighth section embraces chap. 25:1-29, 32; chap. 25 constitutes the central prophecy, which, chronologically considered, certainly does not stand in a right relation to chap. 24. But how are chap. 26-29 connected with chap. 25? In the first place, chap. 27 stands in the most evident internal connection with chap. 25, if you compare v. 2, sq., with 25:15, sq. Chap. 28 is connected with chap. 27, not only because, according to v. 1, it belongs to the same time, but also because it contains, like chap. 27:9, sq., a severe testimony in word and deed against the false prophets. The same reason connects chap. 29 with 28, apart from the fact, that chap. 25 is closely connected with chap. 28 by the mention of the 70 years, v. 10 (comp. 25:11). Chap. 26, however, which in itself has no kind of connection with 25, but has, notwithstanding, such a connection with 27-29, viz.: because its subject is the conflict of the prophet with the false prophets. But it must precede chap. 27, because, according to v. 1, it belongs to the beginning of the reign of Jehoiachin, whilst chap. 27, in spite of the title, in which יְהוֹיָכִים instead of יְדַכְיָה is a palpable error (comp. vs. 3, 12, 19, sq.; 28:1), belongs, evidently, according to its whole contents, to the time of Zedekiah. Thus, therefore, chap. 26 is not directly connected with chap.

25, but only through the following chapters, and thus stand in a kind of double relation, in that they, by the duplicity of their contents, are, on the one hand, closely related to each other, and on the other, with chap. 25. Section IX. embraces chap. 30-33, prophecies of a comforting and messianic character. That they stand connected is explained by their contents, and by the express command, 30:2,—that they stand here is explained by the historical basis of chap. 32 and 33, which belong to the last period of Zedekiah's reign.—Chapters 34, 35, and 36 constitute each a separate section, as appears from the title as well as from their contents. They stand together here, however, because they all three have the common tendency to place in the clearest light the disobedience of Israel against the word of his God, by contrasting it with the obedience, which the heathen tribes rendered to the command of their human ancestor. They stand, finally, in this place, because the first of them belongs to the time of Zedekiah. Chapters 37-44 are continuous historical narrations, and present no difficulties in regard to their arrangement. Chapter 45 refers to a private person, but that the discourse should take the form of a separate chapter, is evidently an honor that is shown to the faithful servant of the prophet. Chapters 46-51 contain the prophecies against the foreign nations, concerning their relation to each other, and to chap. 25 (their existence is presupposed in this chap., v. 9 and 11). I refer to my treatise: Jer. u. Bab., p. 27-32.

The insight into the original arrangement of the book is made more difficult by the relation of the Alexandrian text to the Masoretic, because both differ materially in arrangement. It may be premised here, that Jeremiah was especially honored in Egypt, where he last taught and probably closed his life, by the Jews living there, just on account of this circumstance. They regarded him as pre-eminently their prophet, as the Egyptian prophet (comp. Chron. pasch., p. 156. FABRIC., Cod. pseudep., V., T., p. 1108. Apocr. N. T., p. 1111. Hävernicks, Einl., I., 1. p. 45; II., 2. p. 259). The study of him was very diligently pursued, and it is not improbable, that, as FABRIC., Cod. pseudep., V., T., l. c., says: "Codices græcæ versionis jam privata quorundam Apocryphis se delectantium studio interpolati, jam librorum oscitantia manci fraudi beato Martyri fuerunt." The Alexandrian version departs from the Hebrew text, partly in the arrangement of the chapters, partly in the text itself. In the latter respect the difference is so great, that it is supposed to be necessary to believe in two different versions of the text: a Palestinian and an Alexandrian, and several critics, as J. D. Michaelis (Anm. z. Übers. des N. T., T., I., p. 285) and Movers (de utriusque recensione vaticiniorum Jeremiæ indole et origine, Hamb., 1837), give the so-called Alexandrian the preference. But this position is untenable. An impartial examination shows most strikingly, that the Alexandrian translator did not understand the Hebrew, and that he was intent on translating as briefly and as fitly as possible, and in the Alexandrian sense. All the differences, therefore, can be explained by the defectiveness of the translation, as has been shown by De Wette, Einl., sixth edition, p. 131, sq., 327–331; by Kueper, l. c., p. 177, sq.; by Hävernich, II., 2. p. 250, sq.; Wichelhaus, de Jeremiae versione Alexandrina, Halle, 1847, p. 67, sqq.; and by Nägelsbach, l. c., p. 86, sq.—The second above-named difference consists in this, that the LXX. introduce the prophecies against the foreign nations at the 13th verse of chap. 25, and so, that they do not stand in the order in which the Masoretic text gives them. The following table will exhibit the difference:—

LXX.	Masor.	LXX.	Masor.
25: 15, sq.	49: 35, sq.	31.	48.
26.	46.	32.	25–15, sq.
27, 28.	50, 51.	33–51.	26–44.
29.	47: 1–7; 49: 7–22.	52.	52.
30.	49: 1–5; 28–33; 23–27.

In several editions of the LXX. ex. gr. in Reineccius, the chapters stand in the Masoretic order. Comp. Joh. Gottfr. Eichhorn, Bemerkk. über den Text des Pr. Jer. im Repert. f. bibl. und Morgenl., Lit. I., p. 141, sq.

The integrity of Jeremiah has been, in proportion, but little called into question. Modern critics pronounce 10: 1–16 the work of Pseudo-Isaiah (comp. contra E. Meier, Gesch. d. post. National-Lit. d. Hebräer., Lpz., 1856, p. 391): the same also should have revised 30, 31, 33, 50, and 51; the same was done to chapters 25 (vv. 11–14), 27, 28, 29, by a later person, chap. 48, first by Pseudo-Isaiah, then also by a later hand (so Hitzig). All these doubts rest on dogmatic suppositions. Concerning them compare the introductions and commentaries. Of the genuineness of chap. 50 and 51, see Nägelsbach, l. c.

Of a different kind are the doubts as to the genuineness of 39: 1, 14, or, at least, of a part of these verses. These doubts are based on external signs: a) Chap. 38 closes with the words:

וְהָיָה כִּבְרֹךְ יְרוּשָׁלַיִם, containing a premise without a conclusion. b) The conclusion can only be found in chap. 39: 3, or 11, or 15. c) The vv. 1–2 and also 4–10 are an abbreviated and modified reproduction of 52: 4–16. d) The notices of the taking possession of the city are not necessary at this place, they break the connection, etc. For these reasons I am also disposed to regard 39: 1–14 as partly interpolated. I also think it necessary to regard the passages, 50: 41–46 and 51: 19, as glosses, see my treatise, Jer. u. Bab., p. 126, sq.—Chap. 52 is in a condition similar to chap. 39: 1–14. This chap. is either a modified counterfeit of 2 Kings 24: 18; 25: 30, or the reverse relation exists. My opinion is, that chap. 52 is not, at least in this position, the product of Jeremiah. According to another view (comp. Louth, de s. poes. Hebr. ed. Michaelis, p. 416) chap. 52 does not at all belong to liber vatt. Jer., but is the procemium to Lamentations, which were originally connected with the prophetic book (see the Art.). Besides the works already named, the following critical treatises can be consulted: intempestiva lectionis emendandae cura e Jerem. illustrata (4 Programme von Dr. Mich. Weber, Wittenberg, 1785, '88, and '94); J. Andr. Mich. Nagel, dissert. in var. lectt. 25 capp. priorum Jer. ex duobus codd. Mss. hebr. desumptas., Altorf, 1772; Ant. Fr. Wilh. Leiste, observ. ad Jer. Vatt. spec. I., Gött., 1794; Joh. Jac. Guilcher, observ. crit. in quaedam Jerem. loca in the Symbolis Haganis Cl. I.; Jeremias vates e vers. Juxtarum alex. emendatus a G. L. Spohn, Lpz., 1824.—As to the characteristics of the prophet compare: Niemeyer, Karakteristik der Bibel, V., 472, sq.; Roos, Fusstapfen des Glaubens Abraham, hrg. v. Wilh. Fr. Roos, 1838, II., p. 281, sq.; Sack, Apologetik, p. 273, sq.; Hengstenberg, Christologie, 1. Aufl., III., p. 495, 2. Aufl., II., p. 399, sq.; E. Meier, Gesch. d. poet. Nat. lit. der Hebräer, 1856, p. 385, sq.; Zinzendorf, Jeremias, ein Prediger der Gerechtigkeit.—The most important exegetical works are: The patristic commentaries of Jerome and Theodore. Of the period of the Reformation, the commentaries by Calvin and Ecclampadius. Later: Piscator (Herb., 1614); Sanctius (in Jer. et Thren., 1618); Ghislerus (Comm. in Jer. cum. catena PP. graecorum, et comm. in Lamentt. et Baruch. Lugd. Bat., 1623, 3 Tom. Fol., comp. Fabric., bibl. gr. ed. Harl. III., p. 734; Seb. Schmidt, 1685; Herm. Venema, Leov., 1765, 2 Voll., 4; Benj. Blayney's Jerem. and Lamentt., Lond., 1784; J. D. Michaelis, observ. phil. et crit. in Jer. vatt. et Thr. ed. J. F. Schleusener., Gött., 1793; Chr. Fr. Schnurrer, observ. ad vatt. Jer. Tuh., 1793–97; Hensler, Bemerkk. über Stellen in Jer. Weiss., Lpz., 1805; Gaab, Erkl. schwerer Stellen in den Weiss. Jer., 1824; Dahler, Jérémie traduit sur le texte original, accompagné de notes, Strassb., 1825, 2 Voll.; Rosenmüller, Scholien; Maurer, 1833; Ewald, 1840; Hitzig, 1841; the same, die proph., BB. d. A. T. übers., Lpz., 1854; Umbreit, 1842; Heim and Hoffmann, die vier grossen Propheten erbaulich ausgelegt aus den Schriften der Reformatoren, Stuttg., 1839; Ersch und Gruber, Art. Jeremia von E. Rödiger. E. NÄGELSACH.—Beck.

Jeremiah, Lamentations of (אִיכָה), because they commence thus, or קִינָה, threni or lamentationes), stand, according to the most ancient accounts we have of the succession of the books in the canon, immediately after the prophetic book of Jeremiah: Jos., c. Apion, I., 8; Melito of Sardis in Euseb., H. E., IV., 26; Origen in Euseb., H. E., VI., 25 (Ἰερემίας οὐκ ἀρνήσκει καὶ τῇ ἐπιστολῇ ἐν ἑνὶ Ἰερემίᾳ); Concil. Laodic. Can. 60 (in Mansi, Concill. nov. et ampliss. coll., II., 574). Ier., Βαρούχ, ἀρνήσκει καὶ ἐπιστολαί; ΕΠΙΦΑΝ., de mens. et pond. c. 22, 23, Opp., II., 180, ed. Petav.; ἔστι δὲ καὶ ἄλλη μικρὰ βιβλος, ἣ καλεῖται Κινῶδ, ἥτις ἐρμηνεύεται ἀρνήσκει Ἰερემίον αὐτῇ δὲ τῷ Ἰερემίᾳ συναπτεται, ἥτις ἐστὶ περισσὴ τοῦ ἀριθμοῦ καὶ τῷ Ἰερემίᾳ συναπτεται; HIERON., in Prol. galeat. et al.—The Talmud first separated the smaller book from the larger, incorporated it with the five Megilloth, and placed it with these among the hagiographa. Comp. Thenius, Comm. zu den Klagl., p. 115. That some regard chap. 52 of the prophecy by Jeremiah not as the conclusion of this work, but as the introduction of Lamentations, has previously been remarked. The book contains, in five chapters, five lamentations over the down-

II of the kingdom of Judah, and the destruction of the holy city by Nebuchadnezzar. It is difficult so to characterize the contents of these that each shall be the bearer of a specific thought, although this has been attempted by several (Lowth, de s. poes. Hebr.; Ewald, poet. BB., I., p. 145, sq.; Keil, in Hävern., Einl., III., p. 510). The alphabetical succession of the verses (see below) made such a disposition difficult for the poet. Still it is evident, that chapter 3, as well on account of the number and of the increased artificialness of the alphabetical arrangement, as also on account of the contents, forms the climax of the whole. If sorrow bows down into the depths, but comfort lifts up on high, then this 3d chap. represents evidently the height, for it is full of glorious comfort, and perhaps it is not without design, that of the 66 verses of this chapter, just the second third part, consequently the middle, not only of this chapter, but of the whole book, is of such comforting character. It is also not to be overlooked, that chap. 3 is divided trichotomically, inasmuch as every letter of the alphabet recurs three times in succession. — As has been already observed, the four first of these Lamentations are arranged alphabetically, similarly to Psalms 25, 34, 37, 119, et al. Chap. 1 and 2 consist of each 22 triple verses. Chap. 3, as said, has 22 triplets, each of which repeats its letters three times. Chap. 4, has 22, composed of two members each; chap. 5, finally, although it has also 22 verses, is still not alphabetically arranged. Another dissimilarity consists in this, that in chap. 2, 3, 4, Δ stands before Υ , whilst in chap. 1, the correct order is observed. The different attempts to explain this variation, see in Keil, Hävern., III., p. 512, sq. That the prophet Jeremiah is the author of Lamentations is guaranteed by its contents and style (comp. Pareau, Comm. in Thren. Lugd. Bat. 1790, observ. gener., § 6–8; Kueper, Jer. II., 55, interp., p. 45–47), is confirmed by tradition (comp. LXX., 1:1: καὶ ἐγενετο μετὰ τὸ αἰχμαλωτισθῆναι τὸν Ἰσραὴλ, καὶ Ἱερουσαλὴμ ἰρημωθῆναι, ἐκάθισεν Ἱερεμίας κλαίων, καὶ ἐδρησεν τὸν δῆμον τοῦτον ἐπὶ Ἱερουσαλὴμ καὶ εἶπε: πῶς ἐκάθισεν, etc., Hieron., l. c., Talm., Baba bathra, Fol. 15, Col. 1), and is acknowledged by the critics with few exceptions: De Wette, Einl., p. 409; Ewald, l. c., p. 145 — the latter expresses himself somewhat indefinitely. Consult also: Tarnov, Comm., 1707; J. Th. Lessing, observ. in Tristia Jer., 1770; Pareau, Thr. Jer. phil. et crit. ill., 1790; Schleussner, cursæ exeg. et crit. in Thr. (in Eichh., Rep. XII.); Thenius (Kurzgef. exeg. Hdbch.), 1855. — Translations: Riegler, 1814. Conz, in Bengel's Archiv., IV., p. 161, sq., 422, sq.; Goldwitzer, mit Vergl. der LXX. u. Vulg. u. Krit. Anm., 1828; Wiedenfeld, 1838; Ewald, poet. Bd. d. A. T., 1839. E. NÄGELSBACH. — Beck.

Jeremiah, Epistle of, occurs in many MSS. and editions, as the 6th chap. of Baruch. But it is wholly independent of that book. For, apart from its import, many MSS. omit it, or assign to it another place. Theodoret would not have passed it over, in his Comm. on Baruch, had he found it there. It is a verbose, rhythmical, admonitory address of Jeremiah the prophet, to the Jews who were about to be led away to Babylon, warning them against idolatry, in imitation of Jer. 29 and 10:1–16. All evangelical theologians admit that it was written originally in Greek, and is an Alexandrian production; only Romish theologians (excepting such as Jahn, Einl., II., Theil, 867) insists upon its authenticity. In 2 Macc. 2:2, there is a reference to v. 4; but ἀπεσθὲ θεοὺς ἀργυροῦς is so indefinite that the reference is disputed. That v. 3 has reference to Dan. 9:24, is also questionable. The latest Comm. on this ep. is that of Fritzsche, kurzgef. exeg. Handb. zu d. Apokr., d. A. T., p. 205, &c. E. NÄGELSBACH.*

Jeremiah II., Patriarch of Constantinople, born at Akkali (Anchialus on the Black Sea). Although not remarkably talented, he was appointed Metropolitan of Lerissa, Thessalia, in his youth; and when scarcely 36 years of age was chosen Patriarch of Constant. by a Synod held there, May 5, 1572. In this office he displayed much zeal. His life is of special interest for us, on account of the correspondence opened with him, in 1573, by the Tübingen theologians, in which Crusius and Andreä were prominent. Although several letters were sent, together with copies of a sermon, and the Augsburg Confession in Greek, their efforts to convert the Patriarch, or bring their University into closer connection with Constantinople proved fruitless. After considerable delay, Jeremiah yielded to their urgent solicitation for his opinion of the Augsburg Confession, and in a reply, covering nearly 90 pages, folio, attempted to refute it in every point, excepting its agreements with the Greek against the Romish Church. He died in 1594. (Cf. the diary of Stephen Gerlach, Sr., publ. by his grandson, Samuel Gerlach, 1674. CHR. F. SCHNURRER, orat. acad. historiam liter. illustr., ed. H. E. G. Paulus, Tübing., 1828, p. 113. Theol. Quartalschr., 1843, p. 544. Karamsin, Gesch. d. russ. Reichs, Bd., IX., p. 181, &c.). TH. PRESSEL.*

Jericho (LXX., Ἰεριχώ; Jos., Ἰεριχὺς; Strabo, XVI., 2, 41, Ἰεριχούς), the largest city in the valley of the Jordan, lay on the W. side of the river, and N. of its entrance into the Dead Sea. It is one of the oldest cities of Palestine, and was a royal residence before the Israelites took it (Joshua 2:2, 3; 8:2; 10:1, 28; 12:19), belonging to the Kenites (Judges 1:16, cf. 4:11). For the account of the wonderful conquest of the city, see Joshua 3:16; 4:12; 6:1, &c. Notwithstanding the curse pronounced by Joshua upon any attempts to rebuild the city, we find it soon after (Judges 3:13) occupied by Israelites (cf. 2 Sam. 10:5; 1 Chron. 20:5), though not fortified. Hiel, the Bethelite, was signally punished for an attempt to restore it (1 Kings 16:34. See Maurer, Comm. on Joshua, p. 59, &c.). Subsequently, Elijah spent his last days there, and a school of prophets was located in it (2 Kings 2:4, 5, 15). It lay in the plain (Deut. 34:3; Joshua 4:13; 5:10) in which the Chaldeans took King Zedekiah (2 Kings 25:4; Jerem. 39:5). After the exile the inhabitants returned thither (Ezra 3:34; Nehem. 7:36), and the men of Jericho helped them to build the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:2). The Syrian, Bacchides, subsequently fortified the city (1 Macc. 9:50), over which one Ptolemy was placed, who occupied the fortress Dagon (Jos., B. J., I., 2, 3; 1 Macc. 16:11, 14, 15). Herod M. (see Art.) took and plundered Jericho, but, after diverting the revenues of the city from Cleopatra to himself, beautified it with palaces, and re fortified the citadel, calling it Cypros (Jos., Antt., XV., 4, 1, 2; 16, 5, 2; 17, 6, 5; B. J., I., 21, 4, 9; 33, 6). — In the N. T. Jericho is mentioned as the place in whose vicinity the Lord restored two blind men, and where he tarried with Zaccheus (Matth. 20:29, 30; Mark 10:46, 47; Luke 18:35, &c.; 19:1-10). The fearful wilderness between Jericho and Jerusalem is still the haunt of robbers (cf. Luke 10:30). Under the Romans Jericho was the chief city of a toparchy, and was visited by Vespasian shortly before his departure from Palestine (Jos., B. J., 3, 3, 5; 4, 8, 1; 9, 1; 5, 2, 3). During the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, Jericho is said to have been overthrown, but again rebuilt (Euseb. and Hieron. in Onomast.). Afterwards it is but rarely named. N. Adamnanus (c. 680) describes the site of the city as without a human habitation, excepting the house of Rahab, and as covered with barley-fields and vineyards. During the Crusades sugar-cane was cultivated in the adjacent plain, of which the water-courses of Syrian structure still furnish evidence. Its present inhabitants pay no attention to the cultivation of the soil. The fertility of the oasis on which Jericho stands, to be attributed to the Ain es Sultân (probably referred to in 2 Kings 2:19-22), was anciently celebrated. Palm-trees grew there, hence its name (Deut. 34:3; Judges 1:16; 3:13; 2 Chron. 28:15), roses (Sir. 24:18). The plant brought back by pilgrims as the Jericho rose, is not a rose, nor even indigenous there. Cf. Ritter, Erdk., XV., 1, p. 511; Robinson, Palest.) and balsam (Jos., Antt., 4, 6, 1; 14, 4, 1; 15, 4, 2. B. J., I., 6, 6, 18, 5; 4, 8, 3). Josephus gives a glowing description of the surrounding country, calling it an earthly paradise. And yet in the midst of this fertile plain, easy of cultivation, there is at present a wretched, filthy village of c. 200 inhabitants, Erika or Ri'hah (Merâs, I., 496), a single deserted palm-tree, reminding one of the Palm city. N. of the village is the castle, a tower 30 feet square, and 40 feet high, almost in ruins. Tradition calls it the house of Zaccheus. Robinson supposes it was built in the 12th cent. Remains of water-courses, and traces of walls near Ri'hah, indicate the site of ancient Jericho; although the location of the earlier city, and that rebuilt by Herod, or during the Byzantine period, cannot be ascertained without further researches. (See RELAND, Palest.; Robinson; Gadow, Ztschr. d. deutschen. morgenl. Gesellsch., II., 1848, p. 55, &c. Ritter, l. c.).

ARNOLD.*

Jeroboam. 1) The son of Nebat, of the tribe of Ephraim, was the first king of the ten tribes, 975-54 B. C. He was born at Zereda (1 Kings 11:26; 2 Chron. 4:17; Judges 7:22; Joshua 3:16; 1 Kings 4:12), near which place Solomon established his great brass foundries (c. Kings 7:46). In the fortification of Jerusalem, Jeroboam displayed such skill that

Solomon made him ruler over the party furnished by the tribe of Joseph (1 Kings 11:28). But he took advantage of the growing opposition of that tribe to such exacted services, and having been symbolically designated by the prophet Ahijah, as the future ruler of the ten tribes, he headed an insurrection against Solomon. The scheme failed, and he fled to Egypt, where he remained until Solomon's death (1 Kings 11:14, 18, 40). But as soon as he heard of this event (according to the reading of the LXX., cf. Ewald, Isr. Gesch., 3, 117, &c.) he returned and abode in his city, protected by his tribe. Rehoboam, instead of taking warning from the discontentment excited by his father's severe exactions of service and taxes, in which Judah seems to have been measurably shunned (it is not named in 1 Kings 4:7-20), assumed a still more imperial tone. Ten tribes revolted, and all Rehoboam's attempts to bring them back to allegiance proved futile. Jeroboam became their king, and proved himself competent for the office. He fortified Sichem and Peniel, at the junction of the Jabbok with the Jordan; at first he lived in Sichem, but afterwards at Thirza (1 Kings 12:25; 14:17). That he understood how to secure the affections of his people is evident from the general sorrow exhibited at the death of his promising son, Ahijah (14:13, 18). On this occasion, however, the prophet told him of God's displeasure with him, for having failed to use his power for the maintenance of the true religion. For in order to confirm and perpetuate his reign, he put a stop to pilgrimages to the temple in Jerusalem, by building temples in Dan and Bethel, where sanctuaries previously existed (Judges 18:30; Gen. 28), and there reinstating the worship of Jehovah under the similitude of a golden calf (1 Kings 12:27-29). But this arrangement aroused considerable opposition, not only among the priests and Levites, but among the more thoughtful of the people. Hence it led to large emigrations to Judah (2 Chron. 11:13-16). But J. persisted, and appointed priests from among the lowest classes. The success of the measure was owing to the taste of the people for sensuous forms of religion. This idolatry became so deeply rooted that none of J.'s successors ventured to abolish it. Hence the frequently recurring phrase: he walked in the way of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, &c. (1 Kings 16:26; 12:25-33, &c.) He also changed the feast of Tabernacles from the seventh to the eighth month, thus the more to estrange Israel from Judah, and he probably succeeded in this because in the north the vintage occurred later in the season. If J., in his adherence to these untheocratic arrangements, proves himself, on the one hand, a man born to rule, he belongs, on the other hand, to those rulers who adopt any measures to secure their end. This was his weakness, and laid the mine which ultimately overthrew his house. Ahijah must have been sadly deceived in him (cf. 1 Kings 11:38; 14:7, 8, &c.). It must have been hard for him, as well as for the prophets of Judah, one of whom went into the revolted kingdom to testify against Jeroboam (1 Kings 13:1, &c.), to reconcile the opinion that the revolt had been providentially ordered, with its sad consequences. In that kingdom it was hoped to secure for the prophetic offices a position independent of royal supremacy; but, instead of this, the office became involved in endless conflicts with the throne (Ewald, l. c., 3, 131, &c.). Jeroboam died after reigning 22 years, and was succeeded by his son, Nadab.

2) Jeroboam II., the son and successor of Josiah of Israel, 825–784 B. C., 2 Kings 14: 23. But this leaves an interregnum of 12 years, whereas, according to 2 Kings 14: 29, his son Zachariah immediately succeeded him. Hence Thenius assigns 51, and Ewald 53 years to his reign (825–772 B. C.). He was a warlike, wise, and energetic ruler, under whom the sinking kingdom seemed to revive again (2 Kings 13: 5), as did Judah under Josiah. His renown was foretold, especially by Jonah, in prophecies which have been lost. He restored the old boundaries of the nation, and made Ammon and Moab vassals (2 Kings 14: 25, &c.), though he did not exterminate them (Amos 1: 3; 2: 3). In consequence of his victories the population of the tribes beyond the Jordan so increased that a new census was ordered (1 Chron. 5: 17). Throughout the kingdom temporal prosperity abounded to the end of his reign. But as both king and people lacked moral and religious steadfastness (Hosea 7: 3–7), this prosperity only led to luxury and licentiousness (Amos 4: 1–8), and even to shameful idolatry (Hosea 4: 12–19; 7: 1–7). The prophetic office, once so mighty an agency in Israel, lost its power (see Amos, Hosea), and was suppressed by Jeroboam (Amos 5: 10, 13; Hosea 4: 4). Thus the sluices of iniquity and violence were thrown wide open, and J. finally hastened the downfall of the kingdom. For when the fear of the prophets was gone, royalty in Israel lost its necessary counterpoise, and sank helplessly to ruin. The prophets named foresaw this, and were commissioned to proclaim the approaching downfall of the nation. VAHINGER.*

Jerome (Sophronius Eusebius), is justly styled the most learned Father of the Western Church, although, in originality, depth, and loftiness of thought, inferior to Tertullian, Cyprian, Ambrose, and Augustine. He was born in 331 (see Shröckh, K. G.), at Stridon, a border-town between Dalmatia and Pannonia, which the Goths afterwards (377) overthrew. He, with his friend Bonosus, received his first instruction in his Christian father's (Eusebius) house, but was soon sent to Rome, and there taught Roman literature by the grammarian, Donat, and orator Victorinus. At the same time he studied Greek philosophy. But there he likewise experienced Christian influences. He tells us (Comm. in Ezech., 40) with what feelings of awe he saw the relics of martyrs in the catacombs. He was baptized in Rome, and then traveled through Gaul, along the Rhine, and tarried awhile (372) in Aquileja (Aglar in Friaul). There he joined Evagrius, Innocentius, and Heliodorus, in a journey to the East. During a fever, which seized him in Antioch, he had that dream which led him forever to renounce the study of heathen authors, and give himself wholly to divine things (see Apolog., II., T. II., p. 560. Cf. HEUMANN, de Ecclasi Hier. &c., Diss., I., 655). Still we find him, subsequently, making diligent use of the classics in his study of the Bible (see Ep. LXX. ad Oceanum, &c.). He became severely ascetic, retiring to the desert of Chalcis. His feeble body failing under his austerities, he repaired to Antioch, and, against his will, was ordained presbyter by B. Paulinus. Although past a student's age, he was not ashamed to sit at the feet of Gregory Naz. in Constantinople. Matters arising from the Meletian controversy in the Church of Antioch led him to go to Rome with Paulinus and Epiphanius. There Damasus perceived his learning, and engaged his services (though not as an amanuensis). Some think the domineering manner of Damasus made Jerome somewhat pliant and servile. Soon his piety and learning drew around him a circle of Christian women, widows and virgins (Marcella, Paula, and her daughters, Blasilla and Eutochium, Principia, Fabiola, Asella, Sophronia, Melamia, Felicitas, &c.), to whom he expounded the Scriptures, and gave counsel in questions of conscience, so that he acquired a growing influence over them. This subjected him to ridicule and even suspicions. But disregarding this, Paula, and her daughter, Eustochium, accompanied him on a pilgrimage to the holy places in Palestine. Alexandria and the monastic societies of the Nitrian Desert also claimed their attention. Jerome retired to a cell near Bethlehem, Paula supplying his wants. Houses for the entertainment of pilgrims arose, also a nunnery, over which Paula presided, besides a residence for monks, at the head of which stood Jerome (Ep. c. VIII., ad Eustochium, and PALLADI, hist. Lausi., p. 114, 115). There he abode, in pious and learned employment, until his death (September 30, 420), meantime, also, participating in the controversies of the Church. He was buried in Bethlehem. When he was canonized, his remains, it is said, were taken to Rome, and deposited in the Church of St. Mary Maggiore (but see Shröckh). All sorts of wonderful stories were circulated about him, both before and after his death. Ecclesiastical art has even decked him with a Cardinal's hat, on account of his relation to Damasus. The lion and death's head seen in his pictures, symbolize his anchoritism, and his writing or reading position refer to his literary character. And, indeed, he owes his renown mainly to his learning, for upon the theology of the age he exerted no great influence. He was painfully jealous of his orthodoxy (Epp. XV., XVI., ad Damasum papam). Once an ardent adherent of Origen, whose writings he translated into Latin, he afterwards opposed him, and thus broke friendship with B. John of Jerusalem and Rufinus (see Origenistic Controversy). About this time, (394) he (60 years old) was acquainted with Augustine (then 40 years of age). Although he could not fully agree with A., he greatly respected him (Epp. LVI., LXVV., CI., CII., CXXXIV., Opp., I., 1043). In the Pelagian controversy (see Art.) he was wholly with A., and called the Synod of Diospolis (Lydda, 415) synodum miserabilem. But he hardly apprehended the real essence of Augustinism, for he gave great prominence to work-holiness, and only condemned the extravagance of Pelagius' proposition: posse hominem sine peccato esse si velit, and facilia esse Dei præcepta (Ep. 133). In his other theological views he cherished, in opposition to Origen, a strong realism, especially in regard to the resurrection of the body (Opp., II., 118). He most zealously contended for the perpetual virginity of Mary, against Helvidius, for the meritoriousness of fasting and celibacy, against Jovinian, and for the worship of martyrs and their relics, against Vigilantius (see Art. Cf. Opp., II., 206, sq.; 231, sq., and Ep. 50, ad Domnionem; 385, &c. — But his great work was the Itala, the Latin version of the Bible, from which the Vulgate sprang (see Latin versions, &c.). He also merits high consideration as an exegete, on account of his superior knowledge of the Hebrew and Chaldaic languages, although he followed Jewish traditions too closely, and even indulged in allegories and witticisms. One valuable result of his exegetical labors was the sundering of the Apocrypha from the canonical books of the O. T.; the latter he allowed to be read for edification, but not to have doctrinal authority (Prolog. galeatus). His geographical and antiquarian writings (Opp., III., 121, &c.) laid the basis for Biblical archæology, and his work upon Biblical authors (de vir. illustr. s. de scriptoribus eccles.) the foundation for patristics. He also translated into Latin the history of Eusebius, the lives of the anchorites Paulus, Hilaria, and Malchus, and the monastic rules of Pachomius. His numerous letters possess historical value, referring as many of them do to the movements, vices, and follies of his age, and furnishing a sort of autobiography. — Luther, Clericus and others could not endure him (Luther's Tischr., Walch, XXII., 2070. J. Clerici, Quæstiones Hieron., Amstel., 1700, 12mo.). Erasmus highly commends him, and, aided by Æcolampadius, first secured the publication of his works (Basel, 1516–20, IX., fol.). This ed. was followed by the ed. of Marianus Victorius (Rome, 1566–72, IX., fol.), and the Prot. Adam Tribbechovius (Frankf., 1684, XII., fol.); then the defective Benedictine ed. of J. Martianay and Anth. Pouget (Paris, 1706, V vols.). Various editions of his separate works, Epistles, &c., have also appeared (Valarsi first arranged the epp. chronologically). The so-called Comes of J. (see Lectonarius) belongs to a later period; so the Martyrology ascribed to him, and some letters. Erasmus and Martianay furnished biographies of J.; SEB. DOLCI (Max. Hieron., vitæ suæ scriptor. Anconæ, 1750, 4to.), and the Jesuit, Stilling (in the Actis Sancti, VIII., 418, &c.), panegyrics. — Besides the general Church and patristic histories of Tillemont (XII.), Cave (I.), Oudin (I.), Schönemann (I.), Rössler (IX.), Schröckh (K. G., XI., 5–244; VII., 122; IX., 246), see Zimmermann upon Solitude; ENGELSTOFF, L. Hieron. Stridon., interpret., &c., Havn., 1798, 8vo. COLLONBOT, Hist. de S. Jérôme; Erach and Gruber, 2, Sect. 8, Th.).

HAGENBACH.*

Jerome of Prague, a witness of the truth, and forerunner of the Reformation, the true friend of John Hus, whose martyrdom he shared, was superior to Hus in learning, but of a rasher temperament. He was surnamed after his native city, his patronymic being v. Faulfisch. His father, Nicholas v. Faulfisch, and mother (whose maiden name is unknown) were of noble birth. He was born c. 1360–70. Of his early education nothing is known. At the University of Prague he studied theology, then visited Heidelberg, Cologne, and Paris, where he obtained his Master's degree, after having (1399) received the Doctorate of Theology. From Paris he went to Oxford, thence returned to Prague. His visit to England was of great moment for him, for there he became acquainted with Wicliffe's views and books, which he afterwards zealously circulated in Bohemia. His learning was soon acknowledged at home, and though he never became an ecclesiastic, Wladislaus II. of Poland invited him to organize (1410) the new University of Cracow, and Sigismund of Hungary desired him to become his preacher. But the clergy then already suspected him of Wicliffe's heresy, and persecuted him. Sbynek, Archbishop of Prague, had previously ordered Wicliffe's books to be burned. Charged with heresy, Jerome had to flee; he reached Vienna, and there, at the instigation of Hungarian priests, was imprisoned, but soon liberated through the influence of some Prague friends. He returned to Prague, and attached himself closely to Hus, whom he made better acquainted with Wicliffe's views. Meanwhile, the University was violently agitated. Its numerous German teachers favored scholastic nominalism, and were the more embittered against Hus and Jerome, because they represented Bohemia at the University, and had effected a restriction of the rights of foreigners, limiting them to one vote instead of three (Pelzel, Lebensgesch. d. Königs Wenzel, II., 543, &c. Urkundenbuch, p. 125). The Germans left, Prague felt the loss, and the priests seized the opportunity to incite the populace against Hus and Jerome. J. avenged himself by fiercely denouncing indulgences, relics, and monks, some of whom he imprisoned, and even had one cast into the Moldau. When John XXIII. proclaimed a crusade against Ladislaus of Naples, Jerome caused the bull to be carried about the streets by a lewd woman, and then burnt it, with some indulgence briefs, at the pillory of the new town. All this served to incite Hus to take more decided steps. Meantime the Council of Constance had convened, and Hus (see Art.) was imprisoned as a heretic. Jerome hastened to defend him, but unavailingly. After the execution of Hus, Jerome was in danger. He left Constance, and from Ueberlingen addressed letters to Sigismund and the Council, offering to answer every accusation, provided he received a guarantee of personal safety. As the emperor would not give this unconditionally, Jerome thought it better to return to Prague; but on his way he was taken prisoner by the Duke of Bavaria, at Hirschau (April, 1415), sent in chains to Constance, and delivered to the Council. After six months' rigid incarceration, he yielded to his foes, and recanted, Sept. 23, 1415, solemnly renouncing his own doctrines, and those of Wicliffe and Hus, endorsing the condemnation of Hus, and promising to assent in full to all the teachings of the Romish C., and even to submit to its rules; and, finally, he was compelled to say that he did all this without constraint (v. d. HARDT, Magnum œcumenicum Constant. Concilium, IV., 520, &c. Narratio de Mag. Hieronymo Pragensi, &c., in Hist. et Monum. Jo. Hus atque Hier. Prag., Norimb., 1715, II., 522, &c.). But soon new accusations were preferred against him, which, despite Cardinal d'Ailly's desire to suppress them, Gerson insisted upon entertaining. By this time Jerome had regained courage and faith: he solemnly retracted his previous recantation, boldly avowed his adherence to the doctrines of Wicliffe and Hus, and addressed the Council with eloquent earnestness. The Council condemned him (May 30, 1416), and he courageously endured the flames, proclaiming his faith in the gospel, and commending himself in prayer to God. His ashes were thrown into the Rhine. An eye-witness of his martyrdom, Poggius Florentinus, asserted (see v. d. Hardt, l. c., III., 64, &c.) that he suffered unmoved the pains of his execution.—(See Leben d. Hier. v. Prag, by J. F. W. Tischer, Lpz., 1802; Hier. v. Pr., by L. Heller, Lübeck, 1835; Hus u. Hier. Studie v. Jos. Alex. Helfert, Prag, 1853, p. 151, &c., 208, &c. (not impartial).)

NEUDECKER.*

Jeromites, or Hermits of St. Jerome; the name of several branches of the same Order, which chose St. Jerome for their patron, adopted the rule of St. Augustine, and flourished in Spain, Portugal, and somewhat in Italy. They arose in 1370, in the parish of Toledo, through the efforts of Vasco, a Portuguese, and Franciscan tertiary, and Peter Ferdinand Pecha, chamberlain of Peter of Castile. Gregory XI. confirmed the Order, which rapidly spread in Spain and Portugal, and was even transplanted to America. It was devoted to literature, had its chief monasteries in Guadalupe, St. Justus, in the Escorial (through Philip II.), and at Boleim, in Brazil. It attained to high distinction, but gradually declined, then was dissolved, and maintained itself in Brazil only. The dress was a white coarse coat, a small black cowl, and the scapulary. In public they wore a long black cloak. The nuns of St. Jerome were a branch of this Order, founded by Mary Garcias of Toledo, in the Monastery of St. Paul, 1375. They took no vow, spread in Spain, and wore a white frock with a brown scapulary. They were first required to take vows under Julius II., and were then attached to the Jeromites. The third General of the Jeromites, Lupus Olivetus (others say Lupus d'Olanedo), formed from members of the Order, an independent congregation, called the Congregation of the Hermits of St. Jerome of the Observance, with rules drawn from the works of Jerome. This branch was confirmed in 1426, by Martin V., and from 1429 it spread into Italy. In Spain, under Philip II., it was united again (1595) with the other Jeromites, but maintained itself in Italy, where it still has a few monasteries under the name of the Congregation of St. Jerome of Lombardy. In Italy Peter Gambacorti, or Peter de Pisis, founded (1377) the Hermits of St. Jerome, in a desert of Montebello; it was composed of converted robbers (also called Pauperes Eremitæ s. Hiero- nymi). They had a strict rule, which was relaxed in 1444, and exchanged for that of St. Augustine, in 1568. Then the Order widely spread again, many members, hermits of Bavaria and the Tyrol, joining it. Now but few of its monasteries remain. Charles of Montegranni, in Fiesole, founded another congregation of Jeromites in 1406, Congregatio Fesularia, which was dissolved under Clement IX., 1668.—(Cf. HELLOT, Hist. des ordres monastiques, III., 423, &c.; IV., 18, &c.).

NEUDECKER.*

Jerusalem, the Patriarchate of, owes what it attained to, more to its name and location, than to itself. This is not the place to treat of the beginnings of the Jewish-Christian congregation of James and Simeon (see the Art.), the oldest overseers, who were afterwards cited as the first bishops. We are indebted to Eusebius for a long register of "bishops," of whom, however, he makes but little further mention, although he lived in the country. According to Euseb., III., 35, Simeon was succeeded by Justus, under whom many Jews were converted to Christianity, then follow Jewish names: Zaccheus, Tobias, Benjamin, John, Matthias, Philip, etc., who still belong to the period of the sojourn of the congregation at Pella. The first heathen-Christian overseer is Marcus, Euseb., V., 12. The next succeeding one of note is Narcissus, of whom Euseb. relates, that during the reign of Severus he became distinguished for his piety and miracles, also took part in the controversy about Easter, fled from persecution, when his office was filled by Dins, Germanus, and Gordius, in succession; returned later and shared the administration, to a high old age, (116 years,) with Alexander, the former Bishop of Cappadocia (Euseb., V., 23, 25; VI., 9, 11). Alexander founded a library at Jerusalem, which still existed in Eusebius' time (Euseb., VI., 20). The register of bishops given by Eusebius is repeated by Nicephorus with little variation, and is continued beyond the time of Justinian (Niceph. chronogr. compend., vol. I., p. 764-68, ed. Bonn. Comp. besides Le Quien, Oriens christ., III., p. 145, sqq.). Jerusalem raised itself in the 4th cent. by the building of churches and as the possessor of Christian relics, and was also drawn into the ecclesiastical and dogmatic controversies, a Synod being held there in 415. But these circumstances, with others, did not secure the patriarchate, and into the fifth century it was subject to the Bishop of Cesarea. The Council of Nice, in can. 7, acknowledged its pre-eminence of honor, but did not remove its dependence. Supported by this distinction, already Cyril, and after him John, opposed with all zeal the superiority of Cesarea, as did also Juvenal (about 420-58) (Theodoret, H. E., II., 26. Sozom., IV., 25. HEKRON, epist., 38, ad Pammach. contra errores Johannis). Finally, the Emperor Theodosius II. conferred the patriarchal honor, and the Synod of Chalcedon adjusted a dispute between Juvenal of Jerusalem and Maximus of Antioch, by decreeing that the former should rule over the three Palestinian provinces, the latter over Phœnicia and Arabia. Thus Jerusalem was raised to the same rank of honor with Alexandria and Antioch.

The Persian, Arabian, and Turkish conquests separated the holy city from the general progress of the Church. Its ecclesiastical character was maintained, notwithstanding the increasing embarrassments. The Christian conquest of 1099 marks the first break, as it placed the patriarchate in the hands of the Latins. The conquerors found the episcopal chair vacant, the last patriarch having fled to Cyprus, where he soon after died. Against the strong opposition of the clergy, Arnulph, an immoral man, was made the first Latin patriarch and guardian of the sacred relics, supported by 20 canons. His successor, Dagobert, was a better man. He gave the civil government a hierarchical character (Wilken, Geschichte der Kreuzzüge, I., p. 306; II., p. 53. Guilielm., Tyr., IX., 16-18). But progress in this direction met with other hindrances. The relation with the Papacy did not remain undisturbed. After Antioch had liberated itself from Roman connection, William of Jerusalem made a similar attempt, 1138, but allowed himself to be restrained by Innocent II. At the same time disputes arose about the dependence of Tyre on Antioch, which a Roman legate settled in favor of Jerusalem (Wilken, l. c., II., p. 695). The internal affairs of the diocese also were in a confused state, several districts being subject to the chief city without the mediation of a metropolitan. There were four metropolitan seats under Jerusalem: Tyre, Cesarea, Nazareth, and Petra (Canis. Lectt. antiquæ, IV., p. 436).—In 1187 the city was transferred by Heraclius to Saladin. A hundred years later Nicolaus made every effort to reserve it from Ptolemais, and even in 1316 Peter, Patriarch of Jerusalem, appeared as Papal legate in Paris, to urge a new crusade (Wilken, l. c., VII., p. 727, 783).

In general, it may be said of the 88 years of Western rule, that, with promised freedom, it at the same time led to oppression of the native Greek cultus. After this period the Greek patriarchate again assumed its rights. Saladin expelled all the Latins from their establishments, 1187, but a remnant, which found shelter under the direction of the Order of St. Francis, in a cloister of Mount Zion, and maintained this asylum by the protection and support of Western princes. The patriarchs of the city from this time forward opposed all Latin churchdom. But, on the other hand, they connected themselves with the Russian Church. The Confession of Faith of 1643 was subscribed by Parisius of Jerusalem. As a result of the disturbances caused by Cyrillus Lucaris (see the Art.), it came to pass, that the Greek Church was also freed on this side from foreign influences. This was reached by Synods at Constantinople (1638), under Cyrill of Berea, at Jassy under Parthenius (1642), and a third at Bethlehem and Jerusalem. The patriarch of the latter city, Dosithus (1672-1706), expelled all Latins from his Church, made journeys to Georgia and Russia, and called an ecclesiastical convention, 1672, which again rejected the Protestant doctrines, but acquitted Cyrillus Lucaris of the charge of Calvinism (Libri symb. eccl. Gr. ed. Kimmel, Proleg., p. 75, sq.). This time, therefore, an ecclesiastical act really proceeded from Jerusalem, for the transactions of these Synods can be regarded as the last part of the Greek Confessions (see the Art. Jerusalem, Synods at).

As for the rest, the latest accounts describe the increasing weakness and poverty of the patriarchate at Jerusalem. From 68 bishops and 25 suffragans in its best times, it by degrees limited itself to fewer districts, and was compelled to tolerate all other Confessions of the united Greeks, Latins (who, in 1847, received a titular patriarch of their own). Armenians, Jacobites, and Evangelicals. It also remained dependent on Constantinople, where, for a long time, even the patriarchs of Jerusalem resided, and transferred the administration to a college of vicars (Watzils), which was composed of the bishops of Lydda, Nazareth and Petra, the archimandrite and other assistants. Thus lately the Patriarch Athanasius lived on one of the islands in the sea of Marmora, and permitted the affairs to be governed by a Synod of 150 managers at Constantinople. He died 1843, and the vicars elected Cyrill of Lydda as his successor. Cyrill resides at Jerusalem, and has brought to pass a better state of things. The pilgrims are better cared for, and the 12 monasteries and 5 nunneries are more strictly managed than formerly. Six native married priests preach in Greek, and have the care of souls. Subject to the patriarch are still the Bishops of Nazareth, Acca, Lydda, Gaza, Sebaste, Nabulus, Philadelphia and Petra. The Greek-orthodox congregation at Jerusalem numbers not quite 1000 souls, and in the whole diocese there are only about 17,000. Comp. DAN. PAPERBROCHTUS, in Actis Sanctorum, III., Prolegom. Heineccius, Abbildung der alten u. neuen gr. K. Anhang, p. 61. Robinson, Palestine. Ritter. Erdkunde, Thl., XVI., p. 490, sq., 500. Tobler, Topographie von Jerus., I., p. 276. A. Scholz, Reise, Lpz., 1822, p. 192. Wilson, Lands of the Bible, II., p. 569. GASS.—Beck.

Jerusalem, Synods held there. Their number is greater or less, according to the limitation of the idea of a Synod. But in any case, that of the Apostles (see Apost. Council), and that of 1672, are of main ecclesiastical and theological interest. We shall, therefore, only glance at the rest. Baronius reckons as the first that convened (Acts 1:15, &c.) to fill the vacancy of Judas; the second that at which deacons were chosen (Acts 6:1-6); and the third that of the Apostles named above (Acts 15). A smaller assembly is mentioned in Acts 21:28.—The libellus synodicus refers to a convention held in J., under Narcissus and 14 other bishops, to settle the time of observing Easter.—In 355 many bishops were convened in Jerusalem to consecrate the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, built by Constantine, when he directed them to strive first to heal the divisions then distracting the Church, so that they might the more devoutly attend to the service. Accordingly Arius was restored to fellowship, and the emperor requested to allow his return to Alexandria. To complete the triumph of Arianism the Synod placed Marcellus of Ancyra on trial, for refusing to participate in its proceedings. But new order of the emperor, requiring the bishops who had been in Tyre to hasten to Constantinople, rendered a postponement of this case necessary. Euseb. (Vit. Const., IV., 47) says this Synod was the largest he knew, next to the Council of Nice, with which he compares it.—About 349, after the Synod of Sardica, B. Maximus constituted a Synod at which Athanasius was acknowledged.—In 415 a Synod was held at J., over which B. John presided, at which the presbyter Paul Orosius appeared as accuser of Pelagius. Nothing was done but to refer the case to Innocent I.—About 536 Peter of Jerusalem held a Synod there, attended by 45 bishops, at which the Severians, condemned already at Constantinople, were excommunicated.—From the acts of the 2d Council of Nice, some have concluded that after the Gen. Council of 553, a Synod was held at J., confirming the resolutions against the three chapters.—In 634 Sophronius, Patriarch of J., convoked a Synod there of all the bishops of Palestine, which, in the circular it adopted, avowed dyotheletism and denounced monotheletism.—In 730 the Patr. Theodorus held one against iconoclasts.—During the Crusades, under the kingdom of Jerusalem, several Synods were held there: 1099, 1107, 1143.—The most important Synod held there was that of 1672. On March 16, of that year, Dositheus, Patr. of Jer., convened the Oriental prelates of his diocese. 53 met, including the ex-patr. Nectarius, six metropolitans, archimandrites, presbyters, deacons and monks. The Synod called itself ἀσκή, ἐκδοξίας, ἡ ἀπολογία, and mainly opposed Calvinism, condemning Cyrillus Lucaris, who had introduced it into Greece. John Claude (see Art.) had affirmed that Cyrillus set forth the true doctrine of the Greek Church upon the Lord's Supper, wherefore the French commissioner to the Synod, Olier de Nointel, requested its opinion upon Cyrillus's confession. The assembled fathers said the Calvinists well knew the distinctive doctrines of the Eastern Church, and merely strove to conceal them, so that they might not seem to stand beyond the pale of every Church. In regard to the confession of C., they stated: "scripsit illam non Patriarcha, sed homo obscurus Cyrillus, ex dolo factus." The Synod vowed solemn adherence to the confession of Mogilas, and published a confession of 18 chapters and 4 responses, which were directly opposed to the confession of Cyrillus. This Confessio Dosithei, was not a private affair, but subscribed by 67 bishops and clergy, and forms an integral portion of the libri Symbolici of the Greek C.—It excited violent opposition, many charging the Synod with Romish propensities, for which its utter silence in regard to points of diversity between the Greek and Rom. Churches, gave occasion.—(For the acts of this Synod, see HARDUIN, XI., 179, &c. AYMON, Monuments authent., p. 259, &c. Especially J. KIMMEL, libri Symbolici eccl. orient., Jen., 1843.)

TH. PRESSEL.*

Jerusalem, the new Bishopric of St. James in. The Evangelical C. of our day has, for the first time, succeeded in securing a footing in the Holy Land. The low religious state of the Jews there has led the American Board of Foreign Missions, in 1818, to send two missionaries to Palestine. In 1832 the London Jewish Missionary Society also entered the field. In 1840 followed the expedition of the Great Powers to the East, the result of which awakened in some hearts the hope that at length Palestine would be wholly emancipated from the Osman rule. Frederick William IV. of Prussia, with true political foresight, seized the opportunity of securing for Evangelical Christians in the East a position never yet obtained for them (see Petermann, Beitr. z. e. Gesch. d. neuest. Reformen d. ottom. Reichs, Berlin, 1842). Prussia having failed, at the ratification of the treaty of July 15, 1840, in obtaining the desired support for its proposition in favor of religious liberty for Eastern Christians, submitted to the Queen of England, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Bishop of London, a plan for founding in common a Protestant bishopric in J., which should unitedly represent the German Evangelical and Anglican C. in Palestine. This arrangement contemplated a fraternal relation of both Churches in the movement. The higher clergy of England cheerfully approved of the proposition, but took a different view of the movement from that entertained in Prussia; for they hoped that the new bishopric would 1) prove an excellent centre of operations for their mission among the Jews, and 2) open the way for a full union "of discipline as well as doctrine between their own Church and the less perfectly constituted one of the Protestant Churches of Europe."—The endowment of the See was fixed at £30,000. England undertook to raise its half by a general collection; Prussia resolved annually to pay £600 in support of the See, until it could be supported in Palestine itself. The Bishop is alternately appointed by England and Prussia; but the Primate of England may veto the appointment of Prussia. On the whole it is an Anglican C. bishopric, the Bishop being, until other local arrangements are made, subject to the Archb. of Canterbury. The relation of German Evangelical Christians to the See are determined by the following rules: 1) the Bishop shall take German congregations under his care, and aid them to the extent of his power. 2) They are to be furnished with German pastors, whom the Bishop, after receiving proper testimonials and evidence of their fitness, shall ordain according to the Anglican ritual, then pledging themselves to due eccl. obedience. 3) The Liturgy used by them is one selected from the Prussian Liturgies, and carefully examined by the Anglican Primate. 4) The Bishop confirms German catechumens according to the Anglican form.—On October 5, 1841, Parliament passed an act, allowing institution and consecration to a person not a subject of the British crown, and dispensing such a one from the usual oaths, provided that deacons and priests ordained by him shall not be allowed to hold office in England.—England had the first choice, and, after the declination of Dr. McCaul of Ireland, appointed a convert from Judaism, Dr. Michael Solomon Alexander, Prof. of Hebrew and Rabbin. literature in King's College, London, to the new see. He was born at Shönlanke, Posen, in 1799. On

Jan. 21, 1842, he, with his wife and children, entered Jerusalem. The Porte was told that he came simply as a high Church official from England, to have only spiritual supervision over English Christians, or persons related to them. At that time, besides the missionaries of the American Board, stationed in J. and Beirut, Nicolayson and four assistants, employed by the Church Miss. Soc. of England, were in the city, and owned a plot of ground, designed for a Church, on Mt. Zion. The Jewish-Christian part of the congregation consisted of but three families. Alexander died, Nov. 23, 1845, in the desert near Cairo. Prussia nominated Samuel Gobat, of Berne, Switzerland, previously missionary in Abyssinia.—At present the diocese has a Church (Christ) on Mt. Zion, where the gospel is preached in Hebrew, English, German, Spanish, and Arabic; a separate cemetery; a school, with a house of two apartments, attended by Jewish, some Mohammedan, and Christian children; a hospital for the Jews, affording them opportunity also for reading the Scriptures; a hospital for proselytes, &c., with German deaconesses, almost wholly supported by Germany; a house of industry for proselytes, and a school of industry for Jewesses. Thus far from 7–9 Jewish converts have been annually received. For Christians of other churches, Bible readers are appointed. In consequence of the firman, which secures to the Protestant C. of Turkey the same rights guaranteed to other churches, small Protestant congregations, with schools, have been formed in Bethlehem, Jaffa, Nablus, and Nazareth.—The movement excited much discussion at first, not only among Romanists and Puseyites, but even among Evangelical Christians in Germany, Switzerland, and France, especially as the plan adopted seemed partial to England and the Anglican Church.—(See Rheinwald's Repert., Bd., 36, 3, p. 268, &c.; 45, 4, p. 95, &c.; the Neues Repert., 1845, 1, 84, &c.; 2, 176, &c.; 3, 250, &c. We may consider as official, Abeken's evang. Bisthum in Jer. Gesch. Darlegung mit Urkunden, Berlin, 1842).

GÜDER.*

Jesse (יֵשׁוּעָ, Matth. 1: 5, 6, &c.), a son of Obed, a grandson of Boaz, by Ruth, and David's father. Usually the Messiah is called David's son; but Isaiah 11: 1, 10, traces him directly to Jesse. There he is, by metonymy, called the root, for the offshoot (Is. 53: 2; Rom. 15: 12). In Rev. 5: 5, he is called the root, in 22: 16, the offspring of David. This honor is conferred upon Jesse on account of his faith, which he conveyed to his son David. For this family certainly cherished the tradition of the patriarchs with special fidelity; and served to develop it. The faith expressed so beautifully by David in many Psalms, was, doubtless, a product of ancestral piety, which descended upon him in larger measure than upon his brethren (1 Sam. 16: 7, 10; 17: 12). The power of the Spirit, however, then revealed itself in a superior external fitness (1 Sam. 17: 34–36; reminding one of Samson), without, of course, excluding intimate communion with God, as many Psalms prove. The same, indeed, is still true, though it is otherwise regarded by the morbid sentiment of our age.

VAIHINGER.*

Jesuits, the members of a monastic Order, founded at Siena, 1367, by the noblemen, John of Colombini, Gonfaloniere, and Francis of Mino Vincentini; it was a secular Order, under the rule of St. Augustine. They were also called Apostolic Clerks, because they sought to follow the example of Christ and his apostles in piety and deeds of charity. Having chosen St. Jerome for their patron, they are also called a Congregation of Jerome. As they prepared medicines for the relief of the poor, and for this purpose distilled brandy, the people called them "Padri dell' aqua vita." The Order was at once confirmed by Urban V., and spread especially in Italy. Pius V. attached it to the Order of mendicants, and Paul V. elevated it to a religious Order (1606). But it had in it the germ of decay, and Clement IX. dissolved it, on account of disorders, in 1668. The monks also had sisters of the Order, Jesuitesses, simultaneously founded by Catharine of Colombini. These still exist in Italy, under the rule of St. Augustine, and observe, besides the customs of the dissolved male Order, still stricter monastic discipline.

NEUDECKER.*

Jesuits, Order of. In discussing this subject, we will consider its establishment, its nature and constitution, its history and abolition, its restoration and fortunes to the present time.

I. Its Establishment. Don Inigo Lopez de Recalde, the youngest son of the Knight Beltran of Loyola, was born 1491, in the Province Guipuzcoa, Spain. His confinement by sickness, which was brought about by a ball that shattered one of his feet, while engaged in defending Pampeluna against the French, formed an epoch in his life. The history of Jesus and the saints now constituted his chief delight. On his recovery, he betook himself to the cloister Montserrat, made a general confession, exchanged his rich attire for the garb of a mendicant, and hung his armor before the image of Mary. At Manresa, where he lived sometimes in a solitary cave, sometimes in the Dominican monastery, he practised severe penances, and indulged in corporal chastisements and fasts. Every eighth day he received the sacrament. He beheld in a state of ecstasy the mystery of the Trinity represented by three keys of a harp attuned to harmony, and, above the elevated host, the glory of the divine Light, and in it the God-Man. He himself assures us that at Manresa, during prayer, there appeared to him, from 20–40 times, the humanity of Christ, now in the form of a white body of medium size, without visible clothing, then, of a large golden disc (res quædam rotunda tanquam ex auro et magna)—no doubt a symbol of the sun. This faculty of sensual contemplation was peculiar to him, and is a key to the right understanding of his exercitia spiritualia.—Those fond of instituting a comparison between the spiritual experiences of Ignatius and Luther, will discover a great difference in their respective characters. The soul-conflict of Luther originated in a profound sense of sin and damnation; that of Ign. in a complacent desire to rival and surpass the most eminent saints. The one achieved a victory by the weapons of the Word, the other rioted in visions and fancies. The former found peace in the righteousness of faith based on the merits of Christ, the latter, in an unconditional submission to the authority of the Romish See and the righteousness of his own deeds. In both the year 1521 formed an epoch, and, while Luther asserted before the Diet at Worms the freedom of conscience from all human authority, Ign. was becoming one of the staunchest defenders of the declining Papacy.—On his return from Palestine, he studied grammar at Barcelona, and philosophy at Alcalá. He lived on alms, and devoted himself to the care of the sick. Arrived in Paris, 1528, he prosecuted the study of grammar in the College Montaigu, and philosophy and theology in the College of St. Barbara. The persecutions that assailed him, served but to inflame his zeal, and he succeeded in gaining to his interests Peter Faber, Franz. Xavier, Alphons Salmeron, Jacob Lainez, Nic. Bobadilla, and Simon Rodriguez. On 15th August, 1534, these assembled in the Church of Montmartre, and, having taken the vows of chastity and poverty, resolved to devote themselves to the care of the sick in Jerusalem, and to foreign missions, or, in case of failure, to submit to any work the Pope might lay upon them.

Whilst in Venice, January, 1537, the war between the Republic and the Turks, which prevented them from going to Jerusalem, gave an unexpected turn to their designs. Elevated to the priesthood, they traversed the country, condemning vice, praising virtue, and recommending contempt of the world. Even Bishops, unable to withstand their energy, became their friends. As at Manresa, so here Ign. had visions, in one of which he saw the Father hand over to the Son the care of the Society, which he now called societas Jesu, and heard Christ say: Ego vobis Romæ propitius ero. In Rome they wrought with incredible zeal. Their fame spread so rapidly that, at the request of John III. of Portugal, Franz. Xavier and Simon Rodriguez visited his realm. By the bull Regimini militantis, September 27, 1540, Paul III. sanctioned the Society. The reluctance of Ignatius to become its general was overcome by the advice of his confessor, who admonished him not to resist the Holy Spirit.

To brand Ignatius, the founder of this gigantic institute, a pure fanatic, would be doing him gross injustice. An iron will was the main trait in his character, and in his person were singularly combined enthusiasm and prudence. When Loyola died, July 31, 1556, his Order comprised 13 provinces, seven of which were in Spain and its colonies, three in Italy, and its influence extended to Brazil and the East Indies. On March 13, 1623, he and Franz. Xavier were canonized by Greg. XV.; and the appropriate bulls issued by Urban VIII., Aug. 6.

II. Its Nature and Constitution. This can be best studied in the exercises of Ign. and the laws of the Society. The object of the former is by means of meditation pursued under the tuition of a director to form in the soul an irrevocable resolution to fulfil the end of life. It is divided into periods of four weeks, the first of which is devoted to meditation on sin; the second, on the birth and life of Christ; the third, on His passion and death; the fourth, on His glorification. Each meditation, generally of an hour's length, begins with a preparatory prayer, in which is invoked the grace of God, which is succeeded by two preludes, the first designed to make present, by a lively representation, the place, persons, and circumstances of the Biblical fact; the second, to a prayer for the feelings, thoughts, and resolutions appropriate to the subject under consideration. Now follows the meditation proper, which ends in a conversation with Jesus, who is supposed to be now more than ordinarily near to the soul. Of special importance is the so-called application of the senses. The subject having been thoroughly convinced of sin and his own damnable guilt, now makes use of his senses to represent hell: he sees its narrow walls immersed in fire, hears the shriek of despair, smells the stench of brimstone and rottenness, tastes the bitterness of the tears there shed, and feels in his limbs the flames that devour souls. The last meditation of each day of the second week is devoted to this peculiar exercise. Outward circumstances are made to correspond to the inward state of the subject. During the first week, which is devoted to self-examination, the windows are hung with blinds, and the penitent prostrates himself on the ground or on his knees, while, during the last week, the sun is allowed to shine into his chamber, and everything wears the garb of joy. The final end of the first week's doings is the making of a general confession, and of the second, to determine one's vocation in life. The progressive stages of the exercises are called via purgativa, illuminativa, and unitiva, and their ultimate design is to develop the highest energy of the will, and subject it to the authority of the Church.

The Order is composed of four classes: novices, scholastics, coadjutors, and professed. The noviciate, which is preceded by the exercises and an examination of the intentions of the applicant, continues two years, and must be devoted to Church-offices, pious reading, meditation, prayer, &c. Each one applies the discipline with a whip twice a week. During hours of recreation and walks none but devotional subjects dare be discussed. The probation over, the novice becomes a scholastic, and, as such, studies for two years rhetoric and literature, for three years philosophy, physics, and mathematics, and, after having taught these branches five or six years, is allowed to take up theology, which is continued from four to six years. The course of study is prescribed in the ratio studiorum, the oldest of which dates from 1586. He now enters upon another year of probation, repeats the exercises of his noviciate, studies with special care the Institutum S. J., and is finally elevated to the priesthood, and assumes the vows either of coadjutor spiritualis, or of a professed. The coadj. assumes the three vows of a monk, solī Deo et non homini, and promises special attention to the instruction of youth; the professed add a fourth (professi quatuor votorum), which binds them to unconditional obedience to the Pope. The societas professa, in number the smallest, comprises the authorized membership of the general congregation, and inhabit the professed houses, which are forbidden the possession of property. By a bull of Paul III., June 5, 1546, Exponi nobis, the Society obtained the privilege of selecting assistants from the ranks of the laity, whose business was confined to menial occupations.

At the head of all stands the General, who is represented in each province by a provincial (præpositus provincialis), to whom are subordinated the superiors of single houses. To each superior are given consultors and an advisor. Besides these there are prefects, e. g. præf. studiorum generalium, inferiorum, bibliothecæ, ecclesiæ, concionum, &c.—The power of the general, to whom all owe obedience, is limited by the general congregation, composed mainly of the professed, which assembles, 1) to elect a general; 2) to consider the deposition of a general; 3) when the provincials, &c., think a meeting necessary; and when, 4) the representatives of the provinces in Rome favor it. During the time of election, its members receive nothing but bread and water. In the event of deposition, which may find place in case of certain offences, such as dishonesty in money transactions, &c., the general is to be induced to hand in a voluntary resignation, or, if the charges be not sustained, the object of the meeting is to be kept a secret (De aliis rebus agatur, propter quas convocata societas videatur, et quod ad Præpositum attinet, dissimuletur. Declar. C. ad Concl., Prt. IX., cap. V., § 5).—The bond which unites all the members in one compact body, is obedience to the superior. Omnem sententiam ac judicium nostrum contrarium cæca quadam obedientia, abnegando et id quidem in omnibus, quæ a Superiore disponuntur, ubi definiri non possit, aliquod peccati genus intercedere, Const. Part. VI., cap. 7, § 1. This obedience required the abnegation of all earthly attachments, and the practical abandonment of father, mother, brother, and sister. No correspondence could be carried on without consent of the superior, who perused every letter, and was made fully acquainted with the thoughts and feelings of all under his control. Under such supervision the patient gradually lost his individuality, and was merged in the spirit of the Society. He dare not freely move his head, but must keep it erect and gently inclined forwards, the eyes must tend towards the earth, and, during conversation with another, must only look at the lower part of his face. The forehead must not be wrinkled, the nose not turned up—in short, the Regulæ modestiæ were to be impressed on the gait, gesture, voice, &c. It would be a mistake, however, to conclude that the individuality of a man was utterly annihilated. Only so much of it had to yield to the spirit of the Order as conflicted with its designs. This excepted, it displayed wonderful tact in making use of peculiarities of constitution, and in assigning each man his proper position in the general organization. Hence that great diversity of talent and labor, of which Macauley speaks in the 6th chap. of his History of England: "They guided the councils of kings. They deciphered Latin inscriptions. They observed the motion of Jupiter's satellites. They published whole libraries, controversy, casuistry, history, treatises on optics, Alcaic odes, editions of the Fathers, madrigals, catechisms, and lampoons.—None of them had chosen his dwelling-place or his avocation for himself. Whether the Jesuit should live under the Arctic circle or under the equator, whether he should pass his life in arranging and collecting manuscripts at the Vatican or in persuading naked barbarians in the southern hemisphere not to eat each other, were matters which he left with profound submission to the decision of others."

To attain its object—the restoration of mediæval Catholicism—the Soc. turned to account everything that might conduce to it. Religion and its exercises, science and art, were nothing but means to accomplish this design. Its operations were threefold in character: Foreign missions, domestic missions within the R. Cath. Church itself, and the conversion of heretics, particularly Protestants. Directing the attention of our readers for the first to the article on Missions of the Catholic Church, we will dwell briefly on the two last. While reviving the faith of lukewarm Catholics, they won back whole territories that had fallen under the power of Protestantism. Relieved of many obligations incumbent on the clergy generally by Paul III., the Jesuits devoted their undivided attention to the duties of their office. In their preaching—which formed one of their chief occupations—they enforced the importance of the institutions of the Church, of confession, of prayer, and of the education of the young. To give greater efficiency to confession, the priests underwent a special preparation for the discharge of its functions (Reg. sacerdot., 10–12). Only in casus necessitatis were they allowed to confess women. These were 1) when the woman was of noble birth and rank; 2) when, on account of any services, she had claims on the Order; 3) when it might be presumed that the husband would not object. The inviolate secrecy of confession was strongly insisted on by Aquaviva, 1590, who vehemently opposed the opinion that, in certain circumstances, its seal might be broken (Instr. V. de notitia habita per Confessionem). The sacrament of penance once more obtained universal favor in Catholic countries, and the importance attached to it is clearly seen in the expression of French missionaries who labored in the age of Louis XIV.: ou la confession, ou l'enfer, il n'y a point de milieu (Gieseler, Eccl. Hist.). Nor were they less zealous in the religious and literary education of the young, and in the training of a priesthood exclusively devoted to the Catholic Church. The ancient languages and the exact sciences were cultivated as a means for disciplining the mind and imparting to it a practical tendency, while philosophy, in its Aristotelian-scholastic form, became the hand-maiden of theology, which was based on the Summa of Thomas Aquinas, and everything discarded that might have the least tendency to weaken faith or excite doubt.

Though the Jesuit Order can justly boast of a long list of learned men, yet it cannot be admitted that it advanced the interests of true science, which, rejecting all partial tendencies and prejudices, has its end in itself, and presupposes a liberty of thought and investigation that found no place in its domain. It paid pecial attention to polemics and casuistry, and, by means of its theology, wielded an immense influence over the scientific character of the Church. Neglecting the mysticism of the middle ages, which had also been more or less ignored by the Protestantism of the 16th cent., it laid most stress on the doctrines that stood in direct opposition to the cardinal points of the Reformation. Thus, at the Council of Trent, where many inclined more or less strongly to a modified Protestant view of justification by faith, Lainez and Salmeron succeeded in imposing the scholastic doctrine on the subject. To vindicate the unlimited independence of the Papal power, appears to be its main object. Some of its members were bold enough to defend the mediæval opinion that, even in temporal things, kings should be subordinated by the Pope (comp. extracts of Azorius, Ozonius, Cornelius a Lapide, Rob. Bellarmine, in Gieseler, Ecol. Hist.). It even elevated to the rank of a formal dogma of the Order the infallibility of the Pope, in such sense that no one can sin who, in opposition to conscience, yields obedience to the Pope. To magnify his authority General Lainez, at Trent, 1562, derived the Papacy immediately from God, and held the civil power to be a transfer by the people. Upon this view was based the right, yes, the duty of dethroning a non-Catholic or tyrannical ruler. Thus spoke the Jesuit, Robert Person, of Elizabeth of England; so, too, Mariana, in his de rege et regis institutione, and Bellarmine, particularly in his work on the authority of the Pope.—In accordance with this view of popular sovereignty, the Jesuits of the 16th cent. defended the doctrine rejected by the Council of Constance, that it was right to murder tyrants, and thus openly sanctioned the maxim, that the end justifies the means (comp. extracts in Perrault, la morale des Jesuites, III., 276; Ellendorf, die Moral u. Politik d. Jes., p. 400). The Jesuits, Ribadeneira and Mariana praised the Dominican, Jacob Clement, for having murdered King Henry IV., Aug. 1, 1589, and Balthasar Gerard, who shot Prince William of Orange, July 7, 1584, confessed at his trial that a Jesuit in Trent had confirmed him in his murderous design.—The Jesuits from the start inclined to Pelagianism, and the Protestants to Augustinianism. The Spanish Jesuit, Luis Molina (see Art.), carried the former tendency to its last result. He invested the human will with power to dispose itself to acts which were considered to be effects of supernatural grace, and made justification to be the joint product of grace and free will. The theological faculty condemned 34 propositions extracted from the writings of Leonard Hess and John Hamel, who denied the direct and verbal inspiration of the Scriptures.—In the department of morals the Jesuits obtained a mournful celebrity. Ranke and other historians are mistaken in supposing the immoral principles of the Order to have originated in the period of its decline. Already, in the censura præcipuis doctrinæ capitibus, of Cologne, 1560, sin was explained as a deliberate and voluntary violation of the Divine law, and the assertion made, that in this life man has nothing to do with a morality that included his entire being. Protestantism based its ethics on the moral law of conscience and Scripture; Jesuitism dealt in mere opinions and measured morality by probabilities. By a probability was meant that which had some weighty authorities on its side. Thus all moral certainty was annihilated, and dissolved in mere probabilities or possibilities. The second fundamental principle of Jesuit casuistry is the methodus dirigendæ intentionis, which enabled a man to commit a violation of the law without incurring guilt, provided he intended not to sin, and aimed at the accomplishment of a praiseworthy end. The third is the restrictio or reservatio mentalis, which allowed a person, in order to effect a laudable design, to put a meaning in a promise or oath different from that conveyed by words, or make them secretly to depend on conditions of which others are ignorant. The Benedictine, Mabillon, justly remarked that the moral system of the heathen was better than that of this Order. Of those who were specially active in developing and applying it, we mention Cardinal Toledo, a Spaniard, †1596; Emanuel Say, a Portuguese, †1596; Thos. Sanchez, †1610; Franz Juaréz, †1617; Vincenz Fillucio, an Italian, †1622; Leonard Less, †1623; Stephen Banny, a Frenchman, †1649; the two Germans, Paul Laymann, †1635, and Hermann Busenbaum, †1688; and the Spaniard, Escobar, †1669. If it be true, as some say, that the Order must not be held responsible for such monstrosities, it will be hard to understand how it happened that for a period of 100 years such men—the most distinguished of its moralists—could have taught principles inconsistent with its genius. Moreover, facts demonstrate that, even in our day, Jesuits act on the very same policy. Comp. Imhof, die Jesuiten in Luzern, 1848, p. 73; Gieseler, l. c.

III. External History and Operations. Next to Italy, the Jesuits were received with special favor in Portugal. They became the confessors of the royal family, educated the successors to the throne, and really governed the kingdom. They experienced great difficulty in obtaining a foothold in Spain, where they met with determined opposition from the Dominican, Melchior Canus (see Art.), who regarded them as forerunners of Antichrist, and from the royal librarian, Urias Montanus. They succeeded at last in locating at Alcalá and Salamanca, and were not without influence in the country. The national antipathies of France at first prevented their settlement in this land. Through the preaching of Edmund Augier they were enabled to make Lyons the centre of their operations in this empire. They even succeeded in inspiring the younger members of the Sorbonne with their spirit. Though Henry IV. had passed over to the Catholic Church, they refused to pray for him, because he had not yet been absolved from the Papal bull. The Parliament expelled them from the kingdom. In 1603, Henry IV. recalled the decree of condemnation, and it was only at the end of sixty years' struggle, that they obtained unrestricted freedom of action. About this time the gates of Venice were closed against them. Though the conflict between the Papacy and this republic touching the relations of the spiritual and civil powers had been adjusted, the republic steadfastly refused them admittance. Ignatius had early discovered the importance of the German missions, and established in Rome, 1552, the Collegium Germanicum. From Vienna, Cologne, and Ingolstadt, as centres, they started on the career of conquest. In 1556, they founded a Royal Institute in Prague, and, in 1561, Archbishop Nic. Olaus of Gran built them a College in Tyrnau. Treves, Mayence, Spire, Aschaffenburg, and Würzburg, became seats of universities. In 1559, they settled in Munich, which became the Rome of Germany. The excellence of their schools overcame the objections of Protestants, who entrusted their sons to their care. Violence increased the progress of the restoration. Duke Albert V. of Bavaria compelled the Protestants of Lower Bavaria either to return to the Catholic Church, or to quit the country, and caused his ward, Philip of Baden, to be educated in the Catholic faith. Most conspicuous, however, in point of zeal, was Bishop Julius of Würzburg, who, accompanied in his Church-visitation by the Jesuit, Gerhard Weller, 1584-86, went from village to village, offering his Protestant subjects the alternative of a return to the Catholic Church, or expulsion from the country. Three hundred cloisters were erected to secure the victory. In 1588, the young Archbishop Wolf Dieterich of Salzburg forced his Protestant subjects to re-enter the Cath. communion, and in 1595 the Bishop of Bamberg destroyed the Evangelical Church in his dominions. During the reign of Rudolf II., 1578, began the restoration in Austria, where, in a short time, 13 towns were re-converted. What the Archduke Charles of Steyermark began, his son Ferdinand completed. In Upper Austria, Hungary, and Bohemia, blackened ruins covered the sites of Protestant Churches. The Jesuits followed in the wake of the victorious Catholic armies, and Protestants themselves aided their work by theological janglings on the differences between the Lutheran and Reformed Confessions. In Belgium they obtained a foothold, 1542. Their colleges crowded Courtray, Ypern, Bruges, Antwerp, and Brussels. Thence they penetrated the United Netherlands, 1592, in which year, according to Ranke, the number of Catholics in this country amounted to 345,000. In 1569, William Allen established a college at Douay, and, in 1579, at Rome, for the benefit of England. Young Jesuits followed the example of Person and Campian, who had gone over to this country in 1580. About 200 martyrs attested the zeal of this Order during the reign of Elizabeth, who branded, 1582, conversion to Catholicism as high treason, and, in 1585, expelled them. Charles II., though outwardly respecting the service of the Anglican Church, concluded a secret treaty at Dover, 1670, in which he bound himself to the Romish communion, and James II. submitted himself to their direction. In Poland, Stanislaus Hosius (see Art.), Bishop of Ermeland, 1569, established the first college for their use in Braunsberg, and other cities, as Posen, Wilna, &c., followed his example. Through John III., who was secretly received into the Romish Church by the Papal Legate, Anton Possevin, Catholicism was introduced into Sweden. His marriage, however, to a staunch Protestant lady brought about a reaction, and, when his successor, Sigmund, King of Poland, attempted to check it, the Swedish nobility transferred the crown to Charles, 1644. They were more successful in Poland, where their pupils stormed the Evangelical Church of Cracow, 1606, of Wilna, 1611, of Posen, 1615. The opposition of the Russians thwarted the designs of Possevin, who, as early as 1581, conferred with Czar Ivan IV. Wassielwitsch on the propriety of re-uniting the Prussian Church to the Roman on the basis of the Florentine Council. They established a College, 1603, in Galata, in the suburbs of Constantinople. Though expelled from Turkey, 1628, they re-entered it under cover of another name, and rested not till they had effected the strangulation of their chief opponent.

The limits of this article forbid our giving an account of their nefarious doings in Hungary, Silesia, and other countries, and we pass on to consider

IV. The Internal Development of the Order to its abolition. After the death of Ignatius, Jacob Lainez (1558-1565) discharged the duties of General-Vicariate, and, at a general convocation, 1553, was elected to this position. He was succeeded by Franz. Borgia, 1564, Duke of Candia, who expended his estate in building the Collegium Romanum, 1551. He laid greater stress on piety and morality than on learning, and was canonized by Clement X., 1671. His successor was P. Eberhard Mercurian, of Belgium—a weak man and the tool of others. Now followed, 1581, Claudius Aquaviva, a Neapolitan, in point of administrative talent the most distinguished the Order ever produced, adroit and shrewd in movement, mild in demeanor, but possessed of an iron, inflexible will. At the general congregation, 1592, he succeeded in gaining a victory over his Spanish enemies, and, at that of 1607, another over the machinations of both Rome and Spain. Equally abortive were the plans set in motion by the Dominicans to procure his downfall. During his reign, the Order achieved its most brilliant victories. From his pen we have industria pro superioribus, and the oldest ratio studiorum, 1586. He died 1615. He was succeeded by the Roman, Mutius Vitelleschi (1615-1645), the “angel of peace,” as he was styled. In his reign, the Order held its first centennial celebration, 1640. Its energies, however, now began to decline. His successors, Vincent Caraffa (†1649), and Francis Piccolomini (†1651), failed to stem the tide of corruption. By the side of Goswin Nickel, a German, who had given offence by his self-will, the general congregation placed the Genoese, Joh. Paul Oliva, as assistant, who acted in this capacity till 1664, and, in 1681, became general. The original spirit of the Order was rapidly waning. It gradually became a secular institution, and the colleges, banks of exchange. To replenish their coffers, the Jesuits turned merchants, and engaged in business. The rise of Jansenism, which inculcated the principles of Augustine, and insisted on a rigid morality, hastened the catastrophe that finally overtook the Order. In his Lettres provinciales, 1656,

Pascal (see Art.) exposed its casuistry with such elegance and biting satire as to turn the tide of public opinion against it. Yet more ruinous to it were the liberal, philosophic doctrines which had begun to prevail in France, in the time of Louis XV. Choiseul in France, Wall and Squillace in Spain, Tanucci in Naples, Carvalho (Pombal) in Portugal, who became prime ministers of their respective governments in the middle of the 18th cent., combated it as detrimental to the prosperity of a nation. Even in Rome it had declined, more or less, in favor. Interference in the civil concerns of Portugal brought about its expulsion from this country, Sept. 3, 1759. In August, 1761, the French Parliament declared its casuistry incompatible with the laws of the empire, and abolished it, Aug. 6, 1762. An insurrection against the Spanish minister Squillace, March 23, 1766, occasioned the transportation of its members to Civita Vecchia, March 31, 1767, and on April 3, appeared the royal decree for its abolition. Naples enacted the same measures, Nov. 5, 1767, and Parma Feb. 7, 1768. Though it must be admitted that the overthrow of the Order was the work of cabals and despots, there is yet cause for rejoicing that a society so injurious to the interests of humanity was abolished. Compelled by circumstances he could not control, Clement XIV. issued his bull, Domine ac Redemptor noster, July 21, 1773, applying the decisions of Portugal and the Bourbon court to all Catholic Christendom. The attacks made upon Ganganelli in Cretinetti-Joly's work: Clement XIV. et les Jesuites, Paris, 1847, have been successfully repelled in the work of the Oratorian Augustin Theiner: Histoire du Pontificat de Cl. XIV., Paris, 1852.

V. Its Restoration and Later History. Notwithstanding the Papal decree, the organization was not totally dissolved. Some of its members joined the Redemptorists or Signorians. In Russia it held on its old course, and elected as Vicar General, Stanislaus Czerniewicz, of Poland. The third vicar, Frans Kareu, obtained a brief from Pope Pius VII. which permitted the establishment, March 7, 1801, of the Order for all Russia, and Ferdinand IV. one for its restoration in the two Sicilies, July 30, 1804. Pius VII. finally restored the Order to its ancient position by the bull, solicitude omnium sollicitudinis, August 7, 1814. France, Germany, the Netherlands, Brazil, and Portugal protested, and it was only in the States of the Church, in Spain, Naples, Sardinia, and Modena, the Jesuits at first succeeded in gaining admission. Their proselyting zeal awakened the fear of Emperor Alexander of Russia, who had been one of their warmest friends, and when they succeeded in converting Prince Alexander Galizin, December, 1814, they were expelled from Petersburg and Moscow, January 1, 1816, and March 25, 1820, visited with a decree of eternal banishment from the whole empire. On Oct. 18, 1820, Father Luigi Fortis was elected General. Leo XII. transferred to them the Collegium Romanum, 1824, and put into their hands the education of the clergy. Father John Roothaan succeeded Fortis, July 9, 1829. Greg. XVI. placed under their charge, Oct. 2, 1836, the celebrated College of the Propaganda. Roothaan, who died May 8, 1853, was succeeded by Peter Beckx, the Provincial of Austria.¹—The Order having, on the death of Ferdinand, (Sept. 29, 1833), of Spain, espoused the cause of Don Carlos, the people stormed the College at Madrid, July 17, 1834, and expelled the Regent Maria Christina, July 4, 1835. Portugal was only opened to it about July 10, 1829, through the influence of Don Miguel, but again closed, May 24, 1834, by Don Pedro. Though possessed of a large convent in Insbruck, 1844, they were not popular in the Tyrol. The number of young Prussians who studied in Rome became so numerous, that King Frederick William III. forbade his subjects the frequentation of foreign Jesuit Colleges, July 13, 1827. In Great Britain the Catholic Emancipation Act was passed, 1829, and though the Jesuits were excluded, the progress of Catholicism in that country proves their secret presence and operations. In Belgium they appear to have gained a complete victory. Louis XVIII. having granted them the privilege of missionating, Sept. 25, 1816, they soon planted colonies in some of the principal cities, and established a congregation in Lyons, 1822. During the reign of Charles X. their influence became so great that the king was compelled, Jan. 5, 1828, to dismiss Villele from his ministry, and put in his place Martignac. The revolution of July drove the Jesuits, whose number had increased to 436, from France, and their colleges were destroyed. Under Louis Philippe, they quietly returned, and were tolerated. All Paris was enchanted with the eloquence of the Jesuit, Xavier de Rassignan. Yet there was more or less opposition to the Order, and to adjust difficulties, Father Roothaan recalled his associates, and the government abolished the principal houses of the Order in Paris, Lyons, Avignon, and St. Acheul. Soon after their restoration, they again came into possession of their old colleges in Sitten and Brieg, Switzerland, and the Council of Freiburg, Sept. 19, 1818, presented their institutions in the Canton with a fund of one million Swiss francs. The revival of a democratic government in some of the

¹ For the sake of convenience, we subjoin a catalogue of all the Generals of the Order:—

Name.	Day of Election.	Day of Death.
1. Ignatius of Loyola, Spaniard,	Apr. 15, 1541.	July 31, 1556.
2. Juan Luis de S.	July 2, 1555.	Jan. 18, 1566.
3. Francis Borgia, Spaniard,	July 2, 1565.	Oct. 1, 1592.
4. Theobald Mathias,	Apr. 28, 1573.	Aug. 1, 1593.
5. Claude de Aquino, Neapolitan,	Feb. 26, 1580.	Jan. 21, 1595.
6. Michael de S.	Mar. 14, 1581.	Feb. 9, 1596.
7. Vincent de S.	Jan. 1, 1585.	June 8, 1598.
8. Francis de S.	Dec. 31, 1589.	June 17, 1591.
9. Albert de S.	Jan. 31, 1592.	Mar. 25, 1593.
10. Giovanni de S.	Mar. 17, 1594.	July 31, 1595.
11. John Peter Oliva, German, (died 1600) Gen. Trier and extended successor,	July 31, 1594.	Nov. 28, 1601.
12. Charles of Neapoli, Belgian,	July 5, 1595.	Dec. 21, 1599.
13. Thomas Gonzalez, Spaniard,	July 6, 1597.	Oct. 27, 1700.
14. Michael Augustus Tombari, Modenese,	Jan. 31, 1700.	Feb. 28, 1720.
15. Francis Remy, Bohemian,	Nov. 20, 1700.	Nov. 20, 1705.
16. Ignatius Vianon, Milanese,	July 2, 1704.	Nov. 4, 1705.
17. Anthony Costantini, Genoese,	Nov. 20, 1705.	Oct. 2, 1711.
18. Leopold Ricci, Florentine,	May 31, 1710.	Nov. 28, 1720.
19. Stephen de S.	Oct. 17, 1710.	July 7, 1715.
20. Gabriel Lischewitz, Polish,	Sept. 17, 1710.	Sept. 10, 1715.
21. Francis Xavier Kareu, Polish, from March 7, 1801, Gen. for all Russia,	Feb. 1, 1700.	July 20, 1800.
22. Gabriel Gruber, German,	Oct. 20, 1800.	Mar. 20, 1805.
23. Theobald Bronschoy, Polish, from August 7, 1816, Gen. of Restored Order,	Sept. 2, 1800.	Feb. 2, 1810.
24. Augustus Fortis, Venetian,	Oct. 20, 1800.	Jan. 27, 1829.
25. John Roothaan, Amsterdam,	July 9, 1829.	May 8, 1853.
26. Peter Beckx, Antwerp,	July 7, 1853.

Cantons promised to thwart their designs, but the impolitic call of Dr. Strauss to the theological chair of Zurich, and the insurrection of the peasants occasioned thereby, Sept. 6, 1839, tended rather to promote them. After having experienced a series of alternate fortunes and misfortunes, they were banished the country, Sept. 3, 1847. The revolutions of 1848 proved disastrous to their interests. They were compelled to leave Genoa, March 1, Naples, March 11, Sicily, July 31. Even Pius IX. found himself under the necessity of expelling them from his States, March 29. April 17, 1848, the Redemptorist mission in Bavaria was abolished, and, April 6, in Vienna. On April 10, the Jesuits were driven from Linz, and on 8th of May Emperor Ferdinand extirpated the Order out of his territories. Disasters, however, appear not to have broken their zeal. For, after the victory of the French troops, July 3, 1849, they returned to Rome, to Austria, 1854, and conducted missions with incredible energy in Germany, Bavaria, Prussia, Westphalia, &c. In France also they obtained a firm foothold.—In the year 1626, the Order comprised 10 European and 6 foreign departments, or 39 provinces, 15,493 members in 803 houses, of which the professed were 25, colleges 467, missions 63, presidencies 165, seminaries 36; in 1749, 22,589 members, the professed houses 39, colleges 669, missions 273, seminaries 176; from 1838–1844, in the four countries, Italy, Spain, France, Germany, 16 provinces and vice-provinces; in 1838, in 173 houses lived 1246 priests, 943 scholastics, 887 lay brothers, total 3067; in 1844, 1645 priests, 1281 schol., 1207 lay b., 4133 in 233 houses; in 1847, the number—5510 members, showing an increase of 2443 in 17 years.

The only objects of the Order seem to have been the extension of Catholicism and the subjection of the world to the Church. Protestants, if they would not be recreant to their principles, cannot grant it any toleration, and, in Germany, particularly, where, in our day, the Jesuits are straining every nerve to accomplish their purposes, the Reformed and Lutherans ought to lay aside all differences, and unite in a common defence against a common foe.—Of the sources of information, we mention the seven volumes of historiæ soc. Jesu by Orlandini, Sacchini, Possinus, Jouveny and Cordara, extending from 1540–1625; the Imago sæculi primi Soc. Jesu., Antwerp, 1640 (comp. Ranke, III., 381; Wolf's allgem. Gesch. d. Jes. 2. A. Lpz., 1803, 4 vol.; Sugenheim's G. d. J. in D., 1540–1773, 2 vol., Frankf., 1847; Kortüm: Die Entstehungsg. d. J.-Ordens, Mannheim, 1843 Schröckh's K. Gesch., and Gieseler. Of Jesuit historians, Histoire religieuse, politique et littéraire de la Compagnie de Jésus, Paris, 1844–46, 6 vol., and F. G. Buss, die G. Jesu, ihr Zweck, Mayence, 1854. The best representation by Ranke, in his History of the Popes. Comp. Jordan, de Jesuit. u. d. Jesuitismus, Altona u. Lpz., 1839; Orelli, das Wesen d. J., Potsdam, 1846, and Bode, das Innere d. Gesells. Jesu, Lpz., 1849. G. E. STERTZ.—Ermentrout.

Jesuitesses. Whilst Ignatius, (see Jesuits), before his journey to Jerusalem, tarried in Barcelona, he, one day in the church, attracted the notice of Isabella of Rosella, a distinguished woman of the place. On her return home she persuaded her husband to go in search of the stranger. He found him, and made him his guest. At table Ignatius spoke so fervently in favor of a godly life, that Isabella's heart was captivated. On his return from Jerusalem (1524) to Barcelona, Isabella entertained him. Her purpose became fixed. With two other women she followed him to Rome, and desired to be placed under the spiritual guidance of Ignatius. His plans had meanwhile changed, and he sought to escape their wishes. But the women persisted, and obtained from Paul III. an injunction in their favor. Ignatius soon experienced more trouble from this source than in the management of his company. At his entreaty Paul III. released him (1546) from his new charge. He then hastened to release Isabella from the duty of obedience, and from being a spiritual daughter she became a worthy mother (Ribadeneira, Vita Ignatii, Lij. I., 10, 13; III., 14).—Another society of Jesuitesses, wholly distinct from the former, was constituted early in the 17th cent., in Germany and Italy, and without Papal approval, which is known only through the breve of Urban VIII., Pastoralis Romani pontif., of Jan. 13, 1631 (Bullar. M. Luxemb., V., 215, &c.). These women had regular colleges, and houses of probation, rectresses, visitors, and a general, in whose hands they placed solemn vows. They did not live secluded, but went about performing spiritual services. Urban, in the breve above-named, dissolved them, not thinking their public duties suited to female modesty (cf. Helyot, VII., 569. Sainjore (Rich. Simon), Biblioth. crit., I., 289).—Another society, at first called Jesuitesses, was formed by Joanna, widow of the Marquis of Montferrat, and confirmed, April 7, 1607, as the Order of "The daughters of our beloved Lady." Its object was the religious instruction of young women, and its rules like those of Ignatius, but it was placed under the Benedictines (Helyot, VI., 398, &c.).—We may more truly regard the Order of the "Women of the sacred heart, or faith of Jesus," founded by Mlle. Barat, of Paris, for the instruction of women, and confirmed by Leo XII., Dec. 22, 1826, as a branch of the Society of Jesus. This order is more closely affiliated with that of the Jesuits.

G. E. STERTZ.*

Jesus Christ.—In the fulness of the time ordained of God from eternity for the salvation of man, after an interval of 400 years, from the completion of the canon of the Old Testament, began the final and fullest series of the revelations of God to his people Israel. Herod the Great, in the year 717 of the city of Rome, had been established king of Judea. In his reign the Angel Gabriel appeared to Zacharias, of the course of Abia, while ministering at the altar in the temple at Jerusalem, and announced to him that his wife Elizabeth should bear to him a son, of whom Isaiah and Malachi prophesied as the forerunner of the Lord to prepare the way before him. This annunciation was made to Zacharias in the month of April, in the year 748 of the city of Rome, and six ears before the Christian era, according to the common reckoning. Six months later, in October, Gabriel announced to a virgin named Mary, in the retired mountain town of Nazareth, in Galilee, that she should be overshadowed by the person of the Holy Ghost, and become the mother of the promised Messiah. Mary was already espoused to Joseph, of the lineage of David; and immediately after this annunciation proceeded to visit her cousin Elizabeth, in a Levitical city, probably Jutta, in the hill country of Judea. Confirmed in the revelation respecting herself by the prophetic salutation of Elizabeth, she returned, after three months, to Nazareth, and was received by Joseph to his own house as his wife.

Soon after the departure of Mary, Elizabeth bore a son who, to the surprise of all the relatives, received the name of John. About the same time the Emperor Augustus published a decree that a census should be taken, and a tax levied upon the whole Roman Empire, including that of Herod the Great. This vassal of Augustus complied so far as to have the census taken, but the taxation was not assessed until ten years later, under Quirinus, then the Roman governor of Syria. That command of the pagan emperor caused the fulfilment of an ancient prophecy that the promised Messiah, the King of the Jews, should be born in the city of David. It required Joseph to return to Bethlehem to be enrolled for the required taxation, at the ancestral residence of the family of David. Mary accompanied Joseph in this journey; and, in her poverty finding no suitable place of entertainment, gave birth, in a manger, to the promised Messiah—Christ, the Lord. This event occurred, not on the day observed as its commemorative festival in December, but in June or July, in the year 749 of Rome, and five years before the common reckoning of the Christian era. Only the shepherds of the place who watched their flocks by night on the plains below, learned from angelic songs that a Saviour then was born in that lowly condition in Bethlehem.

Eight days after his birth this child received the seal of the covenant of his people with the name of Jesus = Saviour, Deliverer, and at the end of forty days was presented, according to the custom of the Levitical laws (Lev. 12: 6-8), at the temple, where He was saluted by the aged Simeon as the Light of the Gentiles, and the glory of his people Israel. This testimony of Simeon was also confirmed by the prophetess Hannah, who had passed a long life in acts of devotion around the temple, like Simeon, waiting for the consolation of Israel. Thus in all the lowliness of the Son of Man, shone conspicuous in manifold forms, tokens of the glory of the only begotten Son of God. Neither were these tokens restricted to the Jewish nation, for He was to be the Light of the Gentiles, as well as the King of the Jews. While Joseph continued to linger at Bethlehem, either engaged in private occupations, or under the supposition that the Son of David should be reared in the city of David, came the wise men of the East,—either from the region of Arabia, or of Parthia above Babylon, to Jerusalem, inquiring for him that was born King of the Jews. They must have obtained some knowledge of the promised Messiah from Jews being in their country. Their profession as astrologers gave them a religious character. A remarkable conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in the sign of the Fishes, which was the national emblem of Israel, occurring in the year 747, to which was added, in the year following, that of Mars, seems profoundly to have impressed them of some extraordinary event among the Jewish nation. Then the marvellous appearance of a singular star in the heavens confirmed their expectation of an universal Deliverer, and awakened a conviction that this extraordinary personage might already have arisen in Israel. In the winter of 750 they were induced by these considerations to enter upon their long and difficult journey; and about the last of February they arrived at the capital of Judea. Their inquiries awakened the jealousy of the king and the interest of the people. Knowing that the Scriptures designated Bethlehem as the birthplace of the Son of David, they proceeded thither—that sign in the heavens, whatever it may have been, conspiring with the word of God to direct them to the infant Saviour. Joyously entering the house over which the star seemed to hang, they saluted reverently the young child, notwithstanding the poverty of the parents, and presented their royal gifts. Thus was Jesus recognized by Gentile princes as the Saviour of the world.

The jealousy of Herod soon endangered the life of the child, by a cruel decree ordering all the children of Bethlehem, who were two years old and under, to be put to death. But God preserved the life of the child; warning Joseph by an angel, to flee with Him and the mother into Egypt before the execution of the bloody decree. Herod soon died at Jericho, just before the Passover, in April, 750, and his kingdom, according to a revision of his will by Augustus, was distributed to several of his sons: to Archelaus, Judea, Samaria, and Idumea; to Herod Antipas, Galilee and Peræa; to Philip, Batanæa, Gaulanitis, and Trachonitis. Warned by an angel, Joseph soon returned with Mary and the child to Palestine; not to Judea, where Archelaus reigned with a cruelty resembling that of his father, but to Nazareth, in Galilee, his former residence. From this place He finally entered on his public ministry, not as the son of David, the king of Israel, but as a prophet from Nazareth, a place wholly unknown in Jewish Scriptures, thus fulfilling the prophecy that he should be unknown to his people. To the men of Nazareth nothing was known of the miraculous circumstances attending the birth of Jesus. They, among whom He lived to the age of manhood, knew Him only as the son of Joseph the carpenter, while his parents silently pondered over the mysterious character of the child. Jesus belonged to a numerous family, which called into habitual action the duties of a son and of a brother. The sisters of Jesus are mentioned, but whether they were in reality such, or whether they were the daughters of Alphæus, brother of Joseph, and adopted by him after his brother's death, does not appear. As the first born, Jesus, after the death of Joseph, took the charge of the family and supported them by continuing the occupation of his foster father. Thus lived Jesus for thirty years in the deepest retirement and obscurity. Once only did He give any indication of his higher calling and Divine character. At the age of twelve years, He went up for the first time with his parents to Jerusalem, at the feast of the Passover, March or April, 761. There in the temple, his Father's house, He showed them the higher relations which he sustained to God as his Father, but they continued in great measure unconscious of the full import of his words, until his public ministry compelled all to recognize in the carpenter of Nazareth, the King of Israel, the Saviour of the world, who, in his infancy, had in vain been announced by angels and men, the star in the East, and the Holy Scriptures. Before entering on his public ministry, one other attestation of his Divine character remained to be made according to the Scriptures. Ancient prophets had announced that one should go before Him in the spirit and form of Elias, as his forerunner to prepare men for the revelation of himself.

It was now the 779th year of Rome. Tiberius, a voluptuous, gloomy tyrant, in Jan. 765, had been accepted as regent, and Aug. 19, 767, had been proclaimed Emperor of Rome. The kingdom of David, which had been re-established under Herod the Great, at his death had again been dissolved. Archelaus had been set aside, and Pontius Pilate, in 779, appointed governor of Judea, a capricious ruler who sought by every means to insult and oppress the Jews. The tetrarchy of Abilene had become a fourth dependency of the Roman Empire under Ly-sanias.

The ecclesiastical and moral condition of the country was equally unhappy. One Joseph, named Caiaphas, was high-priest from 778 to 790, whose father-in-law, Annas, had held the same office from 760 to 767. Both belonged to the sect of the Sadducees—in morals and habits of thought, closely allied to the corrupt Roman magistrates, while equally jealous of the influence of the Pharisees in a strict observance of Jewish laws and rites. Such were the political and ecclesiastical relations of the country when Jesus entered on his public ministry. John the Baptist, who had passed his youth in solitude in the hill country of Judea, began in the autumn of 779 to preach in the wilderness between Jerusalem and the Jordan, north of the Dead Sea. Preaching repentance and proclaiming the near approach of the kingdom of heaven, he fulfilled his prophetic mission as forerunner of the Lord, to prepare the way before him, and make ready the people for the coming of the Son of Man. Jesus announced himself to John by presenting himself in the wilderness for baptism by him in the Jordan, Dec. 779, or Jan. 780. It became him to fulfil all righteousness; and, accordingly, though he knew no sin, it became him as a man to receive the sign of repentance by this public rite of baptism. John, by this act, gave a visible and palpable sign that Jesus was the Christ of God, not merely belonging to the kingdom of heaven, but actually setting up that kingdom in the world. In token of his heavenly mission the Holy Ghost, in the form of a dove, descended and rested on Him, arming him for his work and indicating the gentleness of his ministry, while a voice from heaven proclaimed him God's well beloved Son.

But before presenting himself before his people as the Saviour, He, like the first Adam, encountered the temptation of Satan. Immediately after his baptism he withdrew into the desert west of the Jordan, where for forty days and nights he was assailed by the power of the tempter. Oppressed with hunger from long fasting, He is urged by the deceiver to exert his miraculous power for his own relief, by converting the stones into bread. This might convince the most incredulous. Next, as Lord of the world, He is urged to assume his power and begin his rule. And again, to commit himself to the protecting power of God, who should bear Him up and give his angels charge to keep Him in all His ways, by casting Himself from the pinnacle of the temple to the ground far below. But these various wiles of the great deceiver were alike powerless over the sinless Son of God.

At the conclusion of these forty days of fasting and temptation in the wilderness came a delegation from the high council of the nation to John the Baptist, inquiring whether he were not himself the expected Messiah? With great humility he turns their attention to another who is preferred before himself, and openly declares Him to be the Son of God, of whom the prophets spake. The day following, John beholding Jesus returning from the wilderness, points the attention of his disciples to Him, saying, "Behold the Lamb of God!" the true paschal lamb that taketh away the sin of the world. Upon this annunciation Andrew and John attached themselves to Jesus as his disciples, and these again were soon joined by James the brother of John, and Simon Peter, brother of Andrew, all fishermen of Galilee, and disciples of John the Baptist. The next day, when about to return to Galilee, Jesus called Philip, who also brought his brother Nathaniel to Jesus. With these six disciples he returned homeward, and on the third day met his mother at a marriage-feast in Cana of Galilee. Here, at the unseasonable call of his mother, and to confirm the faith of his disciples, he wrought his first miracle, though the time for entering on his public ministry had not fully come. Judea, rather than Galilee, was also the appropriate place for the manifestation of his miraculous powers. From Cana Jesus proceeded with his relatives and his disciples to the home of the latter in the neighborhood of Capernaum, and soon returned to Jerusalem, to the feast of the Passover in March or April of 780 of Rome, and the 27th of the Christian era. Here He gave signal proof of his divine authority and power in purifying the courts of the temple from the profane merchandise of the money changers. Amazed at this fiery zeal, the Jews demand some token of his assumed authority. "Destroy this temple and in three days I will build it up," referring to this final miracle of his resurrection as the fullest attestation of divine authority over the temple of God and the people who profaned his Father's house. Many her miracles were wrought by Him during the week of the Passover, the effect of which was to awaken the jealous hostility of the chief priests and rulers of the Jews. To Nicodemus, a Pharisee and member of the Sanhedrim, He taught the necessity of regeneration as an indispensable condition of admission to the kingdom of heaven. Having in these various ways fully attested his mission from heaven without fully entering upon it, He returned to Galilee with his disciples, who betook themselves again to their customary occupations.

John, though distinctly directing his hearers to one infinitely greater than himself, still continued his ministry, baptizing near Salim, perhaps in the south of Judah, not far from his native place.¹ Late in the autumn of 781, Jesus, calling together his disciples, returned to Judea, apparently over the Jordan, to co-operate with John in calling men to repentance. Here multitudes resorted to Him and were baptized by his disciples, for this outward symbol could not with propriety be administered by the great Author of Salvation himself. The disciples of John, murmuring at this diversion of the multitude from his ministry to that of Jesus, gave their master an opportunity again more fully to declare Him to be the Christ, the Son of God. But the declaration only drew the attention of the Pharisees to both as dangerous men, whom the people were blindly following. Jesus, therefore, that He might not seem to counteract the ministry of John, which He only sought to aid, as He heard how the Pharisees regarded his own ministrations, withdrew, and retired to private life at Nazareth, December, 781. On his way he revealed Himself to the woman of Samaria as the Messiah of the Jews, and at the request of many of the Samaritans who believed on Him, he tarried with them two days, and passed on to the seclusion and retirement of his own domestic circle in Galilee. Though urged by those who had witnessed his miracles at the feast at Jerusalem, and who knew something of the thronged attendance upon his ministry near the Jordan, He did no mighty works among them save the healing of the nobleman's son at Capernaum. This He did, not as an act of his public ministry, but out of compassion for the affliction, and at the earnest entreaty of the father, who left his dying child to seek relief from Jesus at Nazareth.

About three-fourths of a year were passed by Jesus in His retirement, when the imprisonment of John the Baptist again called Him into public life. In September, 781 of Rome, He went up to Jerusalem, where He healed the impotent man at the pool of Bethesda on the Sabbath-day. At this the Jews were greatly incensed, as a violation of their laws and a profanation of the day. In the discussion which followed Jesus appealed to the Lord as his Father, whose works of mercy suffered no suspension on the Sabbath-day,² thus openly declaring himself the Son of God. This apparent blasphemy so exasperated the Jews that they sought to kill Him. From this date He becomes the object of the deadly hatred of the priests, who eagerly seek for an opportunity to compass his death in uniformity with their laws. Under the malignant eye of the priests and scribes, Jesus accordingly takes up the ministry of John, by the preaching of repentance, and the near approach of the kingdom of heaven, to prepare the way for his own intro-

¹ This suggestion of the author respecting the locality of Enon appears to be quite peculiar and untenable. Dr. Barclay has, with great probability, identified the waters of Enon:

“John was baptizing in Enon, near to Salim, because there was much water there.’ The name Salim has hitherto directed the attention of travellers to the neighborhood of the ancient Shalim, a city of Shechem, east of that place; but all research has utterly failed to identify the fountains of Enon, the many waters or fountains, as the meaning of the text is, which were convenient for the baptism of John. But Dr. Barclay has recently discovered a remarkable assemblage of fountains and pools on the margin of the desert beyond and below the Mount of Olives, six miles north-east of Jerusalem, which seem to satisfy the conditions of the narrative, and give at last a fixed position to this floating, uncertain locality. In one of his excursions in the wild rugged wilderness east of Olivet, Dr. Barclay discovered ‘a delightful, grand, and fearful wady,’ shut out from all the world by rocks and precipices, which tower heavenward to ‘a sublime height.’ From the base of these flow many waters from different springs, which, being united, form a powerful stream, and become the head-waters of the Wady Kelt of the desert, the Cherith of Elijah the prophet (1 Kings 17:3, 6); ‘and surely a more admirable place of seclusion could nowhere be found. Some of its yawning chasms are absolutely frightful to behold.’ One of these springs is a siphon spring, occupying about twelve minutes in its ebb and flow, disappearing three minutes, then gushing out in a volume sufficient ‘to drive several mills.’ At the distance of a mile or two above are various pools, varying in depth ‘from a few inches to four fathoms or more,’ and ‘supplied by some half-dozen springs of the purest and coldest water, bursting from rocky crevices at various intervals.’ ‘Richer land I have never seen than is much of this charming valley: capable, too, of being made yet richer by the guano of goats, many large mounds of which—the accumulation of long ages—are here found. Several kinds of cattle were voraciously feeding on the rich herbage near the stream; and thousands of sheep and goats were seen approaching the stream, or resting at noon-day in the shadow of the great rock composing the overhanging cliff, here and there. The cooing dove and the kharking raven are here seen in strange affinity. And many birds of many kinds, from the chirping little sparrow to the immense condor-looking vulture, were sweetly carolling, or swiftly flitting across the valley, or securely reposing upon its lofty cliffs; and the most delicious perfume pervaded many spots in this beautiful little Eden. Rank grasses, luxurious reeds, tall weeds, and shrubbery and trees of various kinds, entirely conceal the stream from view in many places; forming around its pebbly little pools just such shady and picturesque alcoves and bowers as classic poets picture out for the haunts of their naiads, sylphs, and fairies.’

“This being the only accessible water for many miles, herds of gazelles, that graze on the neighboring hill-sides, resort here in great numbers; and the dense forests of cane-brakes are the favorite resort of wild boars, which abound below.’

“One of the wadys, within a mile and a half of this place, bears the name of Salim. Shalim, Saleim, &c.; but, without insisting on this coincidence, or detailing the author's course of argument, we accept his conclusions, and rest with him in an ‘assured conviction that this is, indeed, no other than the Enon near to Salim, where John was baptizing, because there was much water there.’—Tr.

duction of that kingdom. His work is the same as that of John, but with the difference that He goes among the people preaching as he may gain a hearing; the Baptist preached to those chiefly who came out to him; John spake even of another who should come after him, and of himself only as his forerunner and herald to prepare the way of the Lord. Jesus declares himself as He that was to come, of whom John and all the prophets spake, confirming the word spoken by miracles and signs from heaven innumerable and incontrovertible.

Galilee was chiefly the theatre of the ministry of our Lord. Here He was better known and might expect a more favorable hearing. The people were neither so bigoted in their superstitions nor bitter in spirit as the inhabitants of Judea, but equally as far from the kingdom of heaven. Immediately after his return from the Feast of Tabernacles He separates Himself finally from his family and his home in the mountains at Nazareth, and takes up his abode at Capernaum, on the coast of the sea of Galilee. This city was on the great line of travel between Gaza and Damascus, between Egypt and Assyria, and all the East. It was accessible by land and water, and a convenient centre for his circuits and missionary tours in every direction. The burden of his ministry was everywhere in substance the same as that of John—repentance and faith as a preparation for the kingdom of heaven. Multitudes flocked around Him from all quarters, attracted by his strange doctrines and astonishing miracles, among which was the miraculous draught of fishes by four of his former disciples, who had toiled all night and caught nothing. From the boat of Peter, at a short distance from the shore He taught the vast multitude that pressed around to the margin of the water. Then directing Peter to put out into the sea, He gave him to understand that the multitude of fishes was but a token of the greater multitudes of men whom he should yet gather into the kingdom of heaven. On coming to the shore He next called Andrew the brother of Peter; and soon after added to these James and John, the sons of Zebedee the fisherman. These all even forsook forever their occupations and their family, and became the constant attendants of Jesus in his ministry from place to place, partners not only of his daily toils, but of the perils to which He was exposed from the settled malice of the leaders of the people. The next day was the Sabbath, when He taught in the synagogue at Capernaum, and healed a demoniac, then repairing to the house of Peter, He restored to health Peter's wife's mother, sick of a fever. The events of the day, on being known abroad, caused the people, when the Sabbath was ended, to bring together a great multitude of demoniacs and invalids of every kind to be healed.

In the former part of his ministry in Galilee our Lord directed his efforts particularly to the common people, frequenting the largest assemblies, and seeking as far as possible to win all to the knowledge of his doctrines and acceptance of the truth. But gradually He sought to withdraw Himself from the notice of the public, suspended his missionary circuits, attached Himself chiefly to his disciples, and silently passed from place to place, to sustain and enforce the convictions already made, rather than to gain new converts.

Manifold were the forms of his instructions: sometimes in a protracted discourse in the synagogue, in the court of the temple, or under the open heavens; frequently in brief remarks, in reply to some inquiry, or in a word fitly spoken as the occasion required; now, in a proverb verified in himself, and now, as in his sermon on the mount, in an exposition of his doctrine, contrasted with that of the Pharisees. Not unfrequently He availed Himself of comparisons to illustrate his meaning, or silence an opponent. Often He veiled his instructions under the garb of a parable illustrative of the true nature of the kingdom of heaven which the multitude failed to comprehend, but intelligible to the more enlightened.

He taught that the time had fully come for the advent of the Saviour according to the prophetic promises of the Jewish Scriptures, and that he of whom John the Baptist spake was the promised Messiah. To the woman of Samaria, the blind man at Jerusalem, and to Pilate He distinctly declared Himself to be the Messiah, Christ the King of the Jews. But with these exceptions He revealed not Himself directly as the Messiah, seeking rather by word and deed to enforce the conviction that He was none other than the Saviour that was to come. He declared Himself not a son of man like any one of the human family, but in a sense altogether peculiar and distinct, THE SON OF GOD, and THE SON OF MAN also in a sense equally peculiar and distinct. He became flesh and dwelt among them to whom He spake as a man, but He was not of this world, He was with the Father before the world was, and after a little time He was to return again on high to his Father in heaven. The Jews so universally associated with the expected Messiah the idea of a sovereign who should reign over them on earth as their king, and establish the throne of David, that He carefully suppressed this appropriate designation of Himself and his office among men. They who truly believed on Him could not fail to acknowledge Him as the Son of God, the Saviour of the world, but the revelation of his spiritual kingdom, and of the sufferings and death through which He was to pass away to his reign on high, was only made to his disciples at the latest hour. Not until then were they prepared for this great mystery of his mysterious character.

All that Jesus said of Himself was confirmed by signs from heaven, and miracles which He wrought in attestation of his Divine mission. They distinctly revealed the coming of the kingdom of heaven on earth. They taught, as nothing else could teach, forgiveness of sins and deliverance from all evils, spiritual and temporal, by this same Jesus of Nazareth. By raising the dead to life He manifested his power over death and the grave; by healing them that were possessed of devils he discovered his power over the devil and his angels. To the disciples whom John sent from his distant dungeon to inquire whether He were in reality the Messiah from whom the prophets spake, He simply replied: 'Go tell John what things ye have seen and heard—the blind see, the lame walk, the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the gospel preached unto them.' That was enough—He that was to come had come. The scriptures were fulfilled. The Saviour was in their midst. Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world.

Most unworthily did they to whom Jesus came preaching the gospel of the kingdom, requite his mission among them. They wondered at the miracles which He wrought. They accounted Him a great prophet,—perhaps one of the old prophets, or possibly John the Baptist raised from the dead. Few inquired whether He were the Son of David, the Christ of God. To-day they are ready to hail Him as the King of the Jews. To-morrow they demand again of Him a sign from heaven. Their spiritual leaders, entertaining a more profound impression of the character of Jesus, arrayed themselves in settled hostility against Him.

At this stage of his public ministry our Lord chose his disciples, twelve in number, corresponding to the tribes of Israel, to become the founders of the Christian Church. They were to become the apostles, not of one nation, but of all the world, though beginning their ministrations, like their great Master, with the Jews. Peter was at the head of these Apostles, not as having any supremacy or superiority over them, but as the first disciple and foremost in zeal for his Lord. The twelve met, not like the seventy, as the heralds of the Lord, but as his ministers, representatives, and aids, invested with like miraculous powers to preach his gospel. These He carefully enlightened into a knowledge of his Word, and sought by every means to correct their misapprehensions, and give them just views of the future kingdom of heaven.

Our Lord now prosecuted his ministry an entire year in Galilee without intermission. In the winter of 782 He returned to Capernaum, thronged by a vast multitude, for whom provision could only with great difficulty be made to supply their daily wants. The chief priests and scribes here sent from Jerusalem emissaries to watch his proceedings. Among the multitude of those whom Jesus healed was a demoniac, blind and dumb. While the astonished assembly exclaimed, "Is not this the Messiah!" the emissaries of the Scribes and Pharisees at Jerusalem, in their malignant hatred of Christ, ascribed these miraculous powers to Satan himself, the prince of devils. This drew Him into a protracted discourse, exposing the absurdity and malignity of these blasphemers. In the afternoon of the same day Jesus repaired to the shore of the lake, when, in the parable of the sower, the tares, and other similitudes, He taught the multitude on the land, as He sat in a ship before them. Late in the evening He dismisses the assembly, and in sailing by night to the opposite shore, stills the raging of the wind on the sea, heals on the day following the two demoniacs of the inhospitable Gadarenes, and according to their request, returns the same day to Capernaum, when He teaches the multitude awaiting his return, heals their sick, teaches again in the afternoon by the sea side, and becomes at night the guest of Matthew, whom He had called from the receipt of custom to be his disciple; whereupon the Pharisees murmur that He consorts with publicans and sinners, and the disciples of John murmur that He mingles in scenes of festivity, when it became him and his disciples to fast rather, in view of the loss of this prophet in Israel. These complaints are interrupted by Jairus, a ruler of the synagogue, entreating Him in behalf of his dying child. In passing through the crowd to this scene of sorrow, the woman with bloody flux is healed. The daughter of Jairus, already dead, is restored alive to her parents; then on leaving the house of Jairus two blind men following him, are healed, and at a later hour a dumb demoniac is released from his tormentors. So unwearied, so unceasing are the labors of Jesus, in his efforts to win men to Himself. Going about doing good He passes over all Galilee, and in the beginning of March, 782, is again at Capernaum, attended by a great multitude from all Palestine, who resort there to hear the great prophet of Nazareth, and to be healed of their maladies. The sermon on the mount, the healing of the centurion's servant, and restoration to life of the son of the widow of Nain, fall into this period of our Lord's history.

Perceiving how ineffectual were all his individual efforts for the people through the counter working of their spiritual leaders, Jesus resolved to multiply his labors, by sending out his disciples to preach and work miracles in his name. In the absence of the apostles in this tour, John was beheaded by Herod, at the instigation of Herodias. Immediately on the return of the apostles, March, 782, Jesus, wishing to give them opportunity for rest from their labors, and desiring retirement for meditation and prayer in view of his own death, of which He was firmly impressed by that of his forerunner and friend, set sail for the desert region on the north-east shore of the sea, near Bethsaida Julias. The multitude, from whom He sought to withdraw, soon passed around the head of the lake, and, in eager crowds, broke in upon the seclusion of Christ and his apostles. Touched with compassion for the enthusiastic throng, He begins without delay to instruct them and heal their diseases; and at even, with five loaves and two small fishes, feeds the multitude to the number of 5000. Finding their wants relieved in this distant place, in this miraculous manner, the people unitedly declare Him that prophet that should come, their deliverer and king, so universally, so ardently expected. To guard his disciples from the contagion of this delusion, Jesus directs them to embark in haste and then return again to the western shore of the sea, and retired Himself apart to a mountain. The disciples, themselves tossed in the midst of the sea by baffling winds and waves, labored in vain through the night to bring the ship to land, until Jesus came to them in the morning watch, walking on the sea, and immediately they came to their landing. But even the disciples, though amazed beyond measure at these miracles, failed to comprehend and improve the moral which they taught, insomuch that when Jesus, in the synagogue at Capernaum, declared Himself to be the bread which cometh down from heaven, whereof if a man eat he shall never die, they were confounded and scandalized. Many of his followers, from this discourse, turned back and went no more with him.

This disaffection of the people spread so far as to interrupt, in a great measure, our Lord's public ministration. His own ministry is fast drawing to a close, and it only remains now for Him to direct his efforts chiefly to his apostles, to prepare them to carry forward his work the more successfully as he ceases from his labors. He now resorts no more to the most frequented places of public resort, but shunning the Jewish population, repairs to distant parts, on the borders of the land where the Jewish and pagan forms of religion were commingled, and neither was earnestly defended. Whether He went up to the Passover in the spring of this year, 782, does not appear. Little is known of his public life in the interval from the Passover to the feast of Tabernacles. The defence of his disciples for plucking the ears of corn on the Sabbath, and his healing the man with a withered hand on the Sabbath-day, his final visit to Nazareth and violent expulsion from the place, fall within this period of time. Encountering the more determined opposition of the Scribes and Pharisees, our Lord soon departs into the region of Tyre and Sidon, heals there the daughter of the Syrophenician woman, and by a wide circuit passes over into the region of Decapolis beyond the Jordan. Here, by healing a deaf and dumb man, He again gathers about Him a great multitude whom He instructs, working miracles in their behalf in restoring the lame, the blind, the dumb, the maimed; and feeding them, to the number of 4000, besides women and children, with seven loaves and a few fishes.

The feast of Tabernacles, Oct. 12-19, 782, begins a new epoch in the life of our Saviour. His own brethren, still undecided what to believe respecting him, urge him to go up to Jerusalem, and openly declare himself in the presence of the people as the Messiah. But the time had not yet come for such a revelation of Himself; He therefore dismisses them as though not intending to go up to the feast, and then privately follows them with his disciples. In the midst of the feast, whilst the multitude are divided in angry discussion respecting the character of Jesus and his doctrines, He presents Himself in their midst at the temple, and openly vindicates his right to teach and work miracles, and explains his relations to his Father in heaven. But the people are only all the more divided and incensed. "Is not this the prophet, the Christ?" Some only reason against the absurd conclusion. Others are ready to lay hands on Him. The chief priests and Pharisees send officers to arrest Him, who, themselves confounded by his discourse, return saying, "Never man spake like this man." This raises an angry division among the members of the Sanhedrim themselves, and every man goes to his own house, while Jesus retires to the Mount of Olives.

After the feast Jesus retired to the remotest region of Galilee, in the neighborhood of Cæsarea Philippi, where He might better prosecute his great endeavor to prepare his apostles for their work after his decease, by enlightening them into a fuller knowledge of his mediatorial office and work on earth. From Peter, in the name of the twelve, He receives the declaration that whatever others may say of Him, they believe Him to be the Christ, the Son of God. But they have not yet advanced to a comprehension of the mysteries of redeeming grace connected with the death and resurrection of our Lord. He distinctly declares to them his approaching death and resurrection, and warns them of the trials that await them. Six days after this conversation, He gives to Peter, James, and John, in his own transfiguration, a glimpse of the glorified state of the righteous, and a further revelation of his death at Jerusalem, of which Moses and Elias spake, as they talked with Him in the transfiguration. The next day, on coming down from the mount, He heals a demoniac, upon whom the disciples, in his absence, had tried in vain their powers; and with this act of mercy closes his public ministrations in Galilee. Shunning all public demonstrations, He passes privately through the country, confining his attention exclusively to his disciples, to whom again He foretells his departure from them. Still they only receive in sorrow the declaration, without comprehending its fearful import. On his way He returns for the last time to Capernaum, the centre of his benevolent and unavailing mission in Galilee, pays unjust tribute by miracle to avoid offence, teaches his disciples, under the similitude of a little child, the requisite qualifications for the kingdom of heaven. Leaving Galilee at the time of the latter harvest He would pass through Samaria, but encountering the opposition of the Samaritans, He lingers awhile on their borders, heals the two lepers near one of their villages, then turning Eastward, passes over the Jordan into the Pæra beyond. Here He enters on a new field of labor, and begins at once to proclaim the gospel of the kingdom of heaven. The ensnaring interrogations of the Pharisees respecting the law of divorce, the interview with the amiable young ruler whom Jesus loved, the mission of the seventy whom He sent out as heralds and ministers of his kingdom, are incidents of his ministry in the region beyond Jordan, as He travelled slowly through village and city on his way to the lower fords where He received baptism at the hands of John the Baptist. From this place He went up to Jerusalem at the feast of the Dedication, Dec. 20, 782, merely to improve this final opportunity to win, if possible, converts from the assembly. As he walked in Solomon's temple a multitude of Jews surrounded Him, demanding an explicit declaration whether He were the Messiah or not. He tells them of his oneness with the Father. They are ready to stone Him. He appeals to his works, and when in their rage they would cast stones at Him, escapes out of their hands and returns to his former position near the Jordan, where for a time He renews his labors with success. Certain Pharisees warn Him of the dangerous proximity of Herod, to whom Jesus replies, "It cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem."

In March, 783 of Rome, and in the 30th year of Christ, He raised Lazarus to life after he had been four days in his grave. This extraordinary miracle made a profound impression upon the Jews at Jerusalem, and brought the rulers to decisive action respecting Jesus, the Prince of life. The Sanhedrim convened, and Caiaphas, the high priest, unconsciously designated Jesus as the real paschal lamb, who at that approaching festival should die for the people; but they were yet in doubt how to accomplish this end, because of the people, many of whom believed in Jesus as the Messiah. It was not in accordance with the counsels of heaven that He should become a victim of popular tumult, or of the secret malice of his enemies. He must be led as a lamb to the slaughter, and be made an offering for the sin of the world in the sight of the assembled multitude who should convene for the sacrifice of the Passover. Our Lord accordingly withdrew to the retired village of Ephraim, a few miles North of Jerusalem, where He attached himself exclusively to his disciples. From this retreat Jesus again went over the Jordan into the Peræa, and from thence joined himself to other pilgrims going up to the Passover. Again, the third time, He foretells to his disciples, while on the way to Jerusalem, his betrayal, death, and resurrection on the third day. They are alarmed and astonished, but, not understanding what He said, quiet their forebodings in the expectation of the Messiah's kingdom. Under this delusion, Salome, the mother of James and John, even prefers her ambitious request in their behalf for the chief posts of honor under his reign. On the 30th of March, 783, He crosses over the Jordan, heals the two blind beggars by the wayside, near Jericho, and is entertained in that city by Zachæus, the rich publican. The day following, Friday, March 31st, He, with his disciples, tarries at Bethany while the attendant multitude of pilgrims pass on to the city of Jerusalem. On Saturday, the Sabbath of the Jews, while a guest of Simon the leper, with Lazarus and Martha his sister, Mary anoints the feet of the honored guest with precious ointment—an act which Jesus accepts and explains to the company in answer to the murmurs of Judas Iscariot, as done beforehand for his burial. From this time, as at Jericho, Jesus accepts all public demonstrations of honor, as a manifestation of his royal rights as King of the Jews. In the evening many came out from the city to see both Jesus and Lazarus, whom He had so recently raised from the dead, which so exasperated the chief priests and rulers of the people that they secretly conspired to compass the death both of Jesus and of Lazarus, the living witness of His most miraculous work.

Monday, April 2, a vast multitude, who had come up to the Feast of the Passover, came out to Bethany to conduct Jesus into the city. In the afternoon of the same day Jesus makes his triumphal entry into Jerusalem as the son of David, in fulfilment of the prophecy of Zechariah, borne, not upon a war horse, as an earthly monarch or military conqueror, but riding meek and lowly upon the foal of an ass, while the attending throng rend the air with their acclamations, shouting Hosanna to the Son of David. As a prevention against the secret malice of his enemies, Jesus, after having presented Himself in the temple, returned the same night to Bethany, for his hour had not yet come. On his way to the city the next day, Monday, April 3, seeing a fig-tree putting forth leaves, in token of fruit, but bearing none, He cursed it as an emblem of Israel, "that under the ancient dispensation bore no fruit, and now in the spring of the new year gave promise of none for their Messiah, now hungering to receive it." At the temple in Jerusalem He publicly exercised his prophetic office, instructing the people, healing the sick, and again purifying the temple of profanations to which it was subjected by the abuses of the money changers and the traffic of the tradesmen. Late in the evening He again returned to Bethany; and the next day, Tuesday, April 4, on his way to the city, by the example of the fig-tree, already withered, He taught his astonished disciples that the iniquity of the Israelites was already full, and that their judgment could linger no more; teaching them, at the same time, the power of faith and of prayer. In the temple Jesus vindicated the authority under which He acted and taught in answer to the cavils of the chief priests, scribes, and elders; silenced the insidious efforts of the Pharisees and Herodians to entangle Him in his doctrines, and those of the Sadducees touching the resurrection of the dead, baffled the cunning of the lawyer who sought to draw Him into a discussion respecting the great commandment, exposed the hypocrisy of the Scribes and Pharisees, foretold the overthrow of the temple and the destruction of the city, and commended the liberality of the poor widow above all the offerings of the rich to the treasury of the temple. On the Mount of Olives, as He retired at night to Bethany, He discoursed at length to his disciples of the destruction of the holy city, the final judgment, and his second coming in the clouds of heaven, and concluded by declaring to them that after two days He should be betrayed and delivered to be crucified, while they should be persecuted and dispersed. At this same hour the council of the Sanhedrim were convened in the house of Caiaphas, the high priest, deliberating how they might, after the feast, take Jesus by subtlety and kill Him. In the midst of their consultations the traitor Judas presents himself a ready agent for the accomplishment of their murderous intent. Thus, by their cherished malice, they were to be, in the councils of heaven, the unconscious agents in bringing to the altar the true Paschal Lamb—the Lamb of God slain from the foundation of the world to take away its sins.

Wednesday, April 5, was passed in retirement at Bethany by Jesus, in company with his disciples. As in Galilee and in the Peræa, so in Judea, Jesus closed his public ministry by giving his latest counsels to his disciples. To them how important, how sacred these final counsels and prayers! To Him how needful, how precious this hallowed day of rest, though but the hush of the warring elements—the awful calm that precedes the tempest!

Thursday, April 6, the stated day for celebrating the Passover, Jesus sends Peter and John into the city to bespeak an upper chamber, where He may keep this festival with his disciples. When here assembled in the afternoon, Jesus says to his disciples: "With desire I have desired to eat this Passover with you, before I suffer." Then after the distribution of the first cup, the ritual of the Passover begins, a part of which consists in chanting the 113-114 Psalms. Then washing his disciples' feet, as a significant expression of that humility and purity which becomes his disciples, and discoursing of these graces, He partakes with them of the Paschal Lamb, announces the startling declaration, that he who should presently betray Him is sitting at meat with Him. Thus the traitor himself, as if innocent of the intention, exclaims, with the others, Lord, is it I? is it I? Then, being distinctly designated, Judas, under the disguise of injured innocence, leaves the assembly to execute his dark design. This solemnity ended the sacrament of the Old Testament, Jesus proceeds to institute the corresponding sacrament of the New Testament, sealed also, like that, with blood—the blood of the Lamb of God shed to take away sin. This sacrament was to be a perpetual memorial of Himself—and the means of confirming and strengthening his followers in all their conflicts in life. Then, after singing the second part of the sacramental songs of the Passover, Psalms 115-118, Jesus discourses at length of his immediate death and return to his Father, warns them that they will all desert Him in this last extremity, and appoints a meeting with them again in Galilee. To Peter He had already foretold his denial of Him and the gift of the Holy Spirit, the Comforter, and his own invisible presence with them until He should come again to reunite them to Himself. This intimacy and identity of Himself with his disciples, He illustrates at length by the union of the vine with the branches, offering up to his Father one final prayer in their behalf. At some time after midnight He dismisses the assembly. April 7th, 783 of Rome, and the thirtieth of Christ, according to the common date of the Christian era.

From the chamber of the last supper Jesus repairs to the garden of Gethsemane, beyond the Kedron, in the valley of Jehoshaphat. Here in his agony for the sins of the world, taking with Him three of his most trusty disciples, into the deepest seclusion of Gethsemane. He falls prostrate upon the earth and prays. Three times He repeats the same prayer, and returning as often to the three disciples, finds them in weariness and sorrow, fast asleep. In this hour of his abandonment by the Father, and of the onset of the powers of darkness, an angel appears unto Him, strengthening Him. But as the traitor approaches, He arouses his disciples, that they may be witnesses of his voluntary surrender to his enemies. The Sanhedrim, receiving from Judas the proposal to betray his Master, readily risk the tumult which they feared, rather than lose the opportunity they had sought so long, to lay their hands on Jesus. Assisted by a portion of the Roman cohorts from the tower of Antonia, the servants of the chief priests and Pharisees now come, under the guidance of Judas, to arrest their victim. While the traitor gives to his confederates the concerted signal of his treacherous kiss, Jesus advances to meet them. Struck with awe at his presence, they fall prostrate to the earth, thus manifesting their own impotency before Jesus surrenders Himself into their hands. The disciples, amazed, bewildered, overwhelmed with horror at the spectacle of their Lord and Master, Christ, the Son of God, in the hands of his enemies, fly from the scene. Caiaphas, the high-priest, elated with the arrest, convenes hastily at this unwonted hour the Sanhedrim, to effect if possible the trial of Jesus before the offering of the morning sacrifice at 9 A. M., and thus surprise and forestall the sentiments of the fickle multitude. In the meantime he consigns his victim to the guardianship of Annas, his father-in-law, on the south-west angle of Mount Zion. To the impertinent interrogations of this official, Jesus deigns not to reply: but while detained a prisoner here, Peter and John, receiving courage to follow their Lord afar off, mingle unobserved with a crowd of attendants around a fire in the court without. Then Peter denies his Lord first to the damsel that kept the door, then to one of the servants, a friend of Malchus. At this instant the cock crows, and Peter, stricken with horror at the denial, as his Lord had forewarned him, goes out into the porch. It is now between one and two o'clock at night. In the meantime the Sanhedrim had assembled, and Jesus is brought before them in the house of Caiaphas. The testimony of the witnesses is frivolous and contradictory. Then, under the solemnity of an oath, Jesus is constrained by the court, in answer to the inquiry, to declare Himself the Messiah, upon which they pronounce Him worthy of death, as a blasphemer against God, and resolve to submit their decision to the Roman governor, who alone has power to inflict the penalty of death. It was in accordance with the determinate counsel of God, that Jesus, the Mediator and Saviour of the world, should suffer the death of the cross as a spectacle to the world. At this stage of the trial, Peter the second time denies his Lord, first to a damsel present at the door, then before the bystanders, who recognize him, by his provisional dialect, as a Galilean and a disciple of Jesus. At this instant, between 2 and 3 o'clock, the cock crows, the meek, reproving glance of Jesus, before the tribunal of Pilate, falls upon his faltering disciple, just now so confident, so courageous. That look overwhelms in sorrow this frail and fallen disciple. He goes out and weeps—and weeps bitterly. Judas the traitor also relents, but his repentance comes too late, his protestations of the innocence of the victim of his betrayal are rejected with scorn and contempt by the council, and, frantic with remorse, without the soft relentings of godly contrition, he goes away and hangs himself, vainly seeking relief in death itself from the consciousness of the innocent blood he has betrayed.

About 9 in the morning Jesus was brought before the judgment-hall of Pilate, perhaps at the palace of Herod the Great, on the south of Mount Zion, the whole council of the Sanhedrim

standing without, lest they should be defiled by entering the court of this foreign prince. When pressed by Pilate for a specific accusation against the prisoner, from which they sought in vain to excuse themselves, knowing that the charge of blasphemy, of which they had found him guilty, was of no consideration with Pilate, they represented him to be a disturber of the public peace, claiming to be Himself the King of the Jews, and diverting the tribute from Cæsar. In answer to the interrogations of Pilate, Jesus admits the charge, but with such explanations as convinced Pilate that He was at most but a harmless enthusiast, and that it was on the part of the Jews a malicious persecution of an innocent captive. But they allege that He has been a seditious disturber of the peace in Galilee. This suggests to Pilate an expedient to relieve himself from this unwelcome trial by sending Jesus to Herod, now in attendance at the feasts, who has jurisdiction over Galilee. Herod, finding nothing either satisfactory or suspicious in Jesus, sends Him back to Pilate, who is disturbed and troubled by a message from his wife, at this instant received, charging him to have nothing to do with this just person. Twice he declares that he finds no fault in the object of their persecutions. Thrice he proposes to them to consent to his release. To appease their malice, he subjects their victim to the torture of the scourge, and appeals both to their sympathy and their generosity to consent to the discharge of their prisoner, according to an established custom of releasing an offender at the time of the feast. But only the more exasperated they exclaim: "Not this man, but Barabbas," a notorious culprit, in prison for sedition and murder. Pilate, alarmed and perplexed by the charge of the Jews, that Jesus claimed to be the son of God, and profoundly impressed with the harmlessness of this mysterious character, makes a final but ineffectual effort to relieve himself, and save the life of this innocent victim of the jealousy, rage, and fanaticism of the Jews. But, seeing that they would not be appeased, and might carry their complaints against himself up to the capricious, jealous tyrant at Rome, under whom he holds his office, Pilate washes his hands in protestation of his own innocence, and gives his reluctant consent to the crucifixion of the reputed King of the Jews, the Son of God. "I am innocent of the blood of this just man, see ye to it. His blood be on us and our children." An imprecation soon fearfully fulfilled upon them.

At 9 o'clock in the morning, the time of the morning sacrifice, Jesus, the sacrificial Lamb of the covenant, is led as a lamb to the slaughter, without the city, bearing the cross upon which He is to be offered for the sins of the world; but sinking beneath the burden of the cross, a stranger from the city of Cyrene, on the coast of Libya, in Africa, an idle spectator of the scene, is compelled to carry the cross. Refusing the stupefying draught usually administered to blunt the pangs of this dreadful death, He bears our sins upon the cross, suffering the just for the unjust, that He might reconcile us unto God; the soldiers, the executioners of the sufferer, dividing among themselves his garments, the poor perquisites of their dreadful office. The chief priests are standing by, and join with the careless crowd, and they that are passing by join in their mockery and railing of His sufferings. From 12 to 3 o'clock, P. M., the hour of the evening sacrifice, the heavens are shrouded in darkness, as if to hide from the avenging eye of God this scene of guilt and woe. Then at this hour of the evening sacrifice Jesus cries with a loud voice, bows his head, and gives up the ghost. Man, for whom He dies, has no apprehension, but all nature gives deep signs of woe. The earth quakes. The rocks are rent. The veil of the temple, which shrouded the holy of holies, is rent asunder; and the sepulchres of the dead are thrown open.

During these six hours, from 9 A. M. to 3 P. M., from the morning to the evening sacrifice, while the Redeemer of men hung upon the cross, in slow anguish expiring under the mighty burden of our sins, and the hidings of his Father's countenance, few were the words He spoke. On his way to the place of crucifixion, to the women who followed Him with emotions, so unlike those of the railing multitude, and weeping as they went, He said: "Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me, but weep for yourselves and your children," warning them of the approaching judgments which were about to fall on the devoted city and its inhabitants. When lifted up on the cross, under the first experience of that dreadful torture, He exclaimed: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." To the impenitent malefactor on the cross at his side, who sought a remembrance of himself, He said: "This day shalt thou be with me in Paradise." While several women of Galilee stand at a distance, spectators of the scene. Mary, the mother of Jesus, with Mary, the wife of Cleophas, or Klopas, and Mary Magdalene, draws near the cross, in company with John. Then Jesus, beholding his mother, commends her to the filial care of that beloved disciple. This was his third utterance on the cross. Then in the last extremity of anguish, while the heavens were shrouded in darkness, and all nature gave signs of woe and of wrath divine, while the railing multitude stand in mute amazement, as if death-struck themselves, Jesus exclaims: "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me." Again, immediately upon this complaint, He exclaims: "I thirst." That exclamation moves one of the attendants to apply to the mouth of the Sufferer a sponge dipped in vinegar. Again, on refusing the vinegar, He says: "It is finished." These propitiatory sufferings for the redemption of lost men are ended now. "The cup which my Father giveth me to drink, have I not drunk it. It is enough. It is FINISHED." Then crying with a loud voice: "Father, into thy hands I commend my Spirit," He bowed his head and gave up the ghost. These seven utterances comprehend all that remains on record of the last words of the dying Redeemer during his agony on the cross.

To hasten the work of death, that the bodies might be taken down before the Jewish Sabbath, the legs of the surviving malefactors are broken, and death relieves them of their pangs. The body of Jesus is pierced with a lance to ensure his certain death, and blood and water flow forth, indicating that a suffusion of the heart has accomplished its work. The body is delivered to Joseph of Arimathea, an honorable counselor of the Sanhedrim, and a secret disciple of Christ, who, in company with Nicodemus, deposits it in a new sepulchre in a garden near by, guarding the door of the sepulchre by a great stone rolled against it. Several of the women, among whom were Mary Magdalene, and Mary, the wife of Klopas, lingering at the cross, were also witnesses of this disposal of the body of Jesus. The day following, the Sabbath of the Jews, was spent by the disciples of Jesus in silent sorrow and despair. At the instigation of the chief priests and Pharisees, the door of the sepulchre was sealed with the signet of the government, and a Roman guard set to bar any attempt to remove the body.

The women, latest at the cross and earliest at the sepulchre, ignorant of these precautions of the government, had made preparations for embalming the body, as the last office of affection for their Lord; and Mary Magdalene coming to the sepulchre at the faintest dawn of the first day of the week, finds the stone rolled away; and supposing that the enemies of Jesus had taken away her Lord, returns and reports to Peter and John the sepulchre opened and body removed. In the meantime the other women, the wife of Klopas, Salome, the wife of Zebedee, and Joanna, find at the sepulchre an angel, who announces to them that Jesus whom they seek has arisen from the dead, as He had foretold in Galilee, and directs them to signify to Peter and the disciples, that the Lord would reveal Himself to them there according to his word. These now return and announce to the other disciples what they have seen and heard at the sepulchre: but the disciples themselves, in their deep dejection and despair, receive these reports of the women as idle tales, and believe not. Peter and John, however, at the report of Mary Magdalene, hasten to the tomb, and, amazed and distressed at finding it open and empty, turn back again into the town, while Mary Magdalene still lingers behind at the place where last she had seen the body of her Lord deposited. Here she first beholds two angels in the tomb where the body of Jesus had lain, and then, Jesus Himself standing before her, whom she supposes to be the gardener. Jesus saith to her, Mary! and instantly recognizing her Lord, she would have fallen at his feet in joyful adoration. But Jesus charging her not to linger in any act of devotion, because He had not yet ascended to his Father, directs her also to inform his disciples of his appointed meeting with them in Galilee. Respecting her report they remain as unmoved and incredulous as by the intelligence and message of the other women. It seems good therefore to the Lord Himself personally to assure his disciples of his actual resurrection, to reassure their faith and encourage them to collect his scattered followers for the revelation of Himself to them in Galilee. To Peter, first of all, he reveals Himself in the course of that same day, to assure that fallen disciple of his forgiveness; next, in the afternoon, to Cleopas and another disciple, also on their way to Emmaus. These immediately return and report to the ten, who had assembled in secret, for fear of the Jews, how their Lord had appeared unto them; and they, in turn, relate to Cleopas and his companions the appearance of Jesus to Peter. At the same time the Lord Himself suddenly appears in the midst of them to soothe their spirits, quiet their fears, and quicken their faith. He shows them his hands and his feet, eats in their presence, and when they have become sufficiently composed, reveals unto them the Scriptures fulfilled by his death and resurrection, and imparts unto them the Holy Ghost. Still the disciples continue at Jerusalem chiefly in the hope that Thomas, who was not present when Jesus revealed Himself to them, might be convinced of his resurrection. — On the next Lord's day, Jesus again appears to the eleven, and compels even Thomas to acknowledge him as his Lord and his God. The disciples now return into Galilee, and betaking themselves to their customary occupations for support, await the appointed appearing of their Lord. By the sea of Tiberias Jesus first revealed Himself to seven of his disciples, and again reinstated Peter as his apostle, and foretold his future martyrdom. At another time He appeared on some unknown mountain in Galilee to more than five hundred, and gave to them his great commission to go and preach his gospel to all nations, giving promise of his presence with them to the end of the world. The apostles again go from this mountain to Jerusalem, where on several occasions Jesus appeared to them. On Thursday, May 18th, He led them forth as far as Bethany, then turning up the eastern slope of the Mount of Olives, above Bethany, and there giving to them his final counsels, and charging them to remain at Jerusalem until they should receive the requisite gifts of the Holy Ghost, to be witnesses unto Him not only in Jerusalem, Judaea, and Samaria, but to the uttermost parts of the earth. He lifts up his hands and prays; and as he prays he is parted from them and carried up into heaven, and a cloud receives him out of their sight, to be seen no more on earth until, in the general judgment, He shall so come again in the clouds of heaven, when every eye shall see Him, and they also that pierced Him and all the kindreds of the earth shall wail because of Him.

Chronology of the Christian Era.—To determine the date of our Lord's advent on earth, we must first recur to the death of Herod the Great, which occurred in the fore part of April, in the year 750 of Rome (see Art. Herod), and four years before the customary date of the Christian era. At the beginning of March of this year, Herod took his final departure from Jerusalem. The child Jesus was presented at the temple 40 days after his birth, and at a period subsequent to this was sought by the wise men of the east while Herod was yet at Jerusalem. These data refer the birth of Christ to the first half of the month of Jan., 750. The building of the temple affords another date by which to settle our proposed onology. This restoration of the temple occupied the space of 46 years (John 2:20) from the passover; but Herod began this work in the 18th year of his reign (Jos. Antt., XV., 11, 5, between April 734 and 735. This passover therefore falls in the year 780. Deducting from this period the brief visit of our Lord at Cana, mentioned above, the time occupied in going there from Cana, from the Jordan to Jericho, together with the 40 days of the temptation after the baptism of our Lord, we reduce the date of his baptism to the beginning of Jan., 780, or the last of Dec., 779. At this time Jesus was about 30 years of age (Luke 3:23). This refers his birth back to the same season of the year, 750 or 749. The order of the classes of the priests suggests another mode of computation less reliable than the preceding. Zacharias belonged to the class Abia, the eighth of the twenty-four into which the priests were divided for the service of the sanctuary. His course at the temple occurred 15 months before the birth of Jesus, that is, in the year 748. His course in this year required him to be at the temple from the 17th to the 23d of April, and from the 3d to the 9th of Oct.; but in the winter the shepherds would not be in the fields with their flocks by night. The Talmud informs us, that the flocks, about the first of Nov., at the commencement of the winter rains, were gathered to their stalls. Assuming, with greater probability, that Zacharias was at the temple in April, 748, when the angel appeared to him, we find the birth of John the Baptist to fall in the month of Dec. of the same year, and that of Jesus in about the month of June following, 749. Astronomy is also brought under contribution to settle this vexed question of the birth of Christ and the appropriate date of the Christian æra. The wise men of the east, as astrologers, were not ignorant of the confident expectation on the part of the Jews of the advent of the Messiah, nor of the tradition of the Jews that a conjunction of the planets Jupiter and Saturn in the sign of Fishes in the Zodiac should precede the birth of Christ, as it did that of Moses, by three years. Now Kepler has shown that such a conjunction of those planets actually occurred in the year 747, and again in 748, in connection with the planet Mars. This remarkable conjunction drew the attention of these astrologers strongly to the more wonderful event which the Jewish nation were earnestly expecting. The appearance, therefore, of this phenomenon in the heavens, the star of the Messiah appearing in the heavens, they at once received it as an indication of the advent of the expected King of the Jews, and as soon as possible they proceed to Judæa to do homage to him that was born the King of the Jews, and destined to become the King of nations. Taking, therefore, these statements of these wise men respecting the appearing of the star, and adding two years or less, we find that the birth of Christ must fall within the year 749, or earlier than 750; but as stated above it would not have occurred antecedent to that same year, 749 (Compare Luke 3:23 with John 2:20). From all these considerations the conclusion is, not indeed with mathematical certainty, but with the highest degree of probability, that Jesus was born in the summer of the year of Rome 749, instead of the common æra 752 or 753. The traditions of the Church are of no authority, for they are not agreed either in regard to the year, the month, or the day of our Lord's advent. Neither does it appear when the decree of Cæsar went forth; we only know that the actual assessment was made under the administration of Cyreneus, some years later, in 759, according to Josephus's Antiquities, XVIII., 1, 1.

Duration of our Lord's Public Ministry.—According to the data given above, the baptism of Jesus occurred about the close of the year 779, or beginning of the year following. The 15th year of Tiberius (Luke 3:1) must be computed either from Jan. 1st, 779–80, of the Roman year, or from the first of Nisan, March or April, 779–80, of the Jewish year. In Dec. of this year, when Jesus returned to Galilee (John 4:3), John the Baptist was living, and Jesus had not begun his own ministry when He took up that of John; but at the Passover mentioned by John (6:4), Jesus was fully engaged in his ministerial work. John the Baptist, after having been confined for some time in prison, had just been beheaded. His imprisonment, therefore, from which we date the ministry of Christ, must have occurred some six months previous to this event. Now in Dec., 780, Jesus was in retirement at Nazareth. His entrance on his ministry at the imprisonment of John must have been subsequent to this date, and may with confidence be dated from near the term of the feast of Tabernacles, in the year following, Oct., 781. About the time of the Passover, March or April, 782, John was beheaded. The feast of Tabernacles (John 7:1) and of Dedication (John 10:22) fall within this year; and at the Passover of the year following, April, 783, our Lord's ministry was ended on the cross. The public ministry of Christ in Galilee must therefore have continued but about one year, from the autumn of 781 to that of 782, when He passed over into the Pæria, and thence to Jerusalem, so that the whole course of his ministry comprised about one year and a half.

Date of our Lord's Death.—The death of John the Baptist occurred before the Passover, 782. Two passovers are mentioned subsequent to John's death (John 6:4 and 12:1; 13:1). His death therefore occurred at the period of the Passover of the year 783, on the 15th of the month Nisan, according to the computation of Wieseler, on Friday the 7th of April. Astronomers have shown, by careful computation, that the darkness attending the crucifixion occurred at the full moon, and accordingly could not have been occasioned by an eclipse of the sun.

The Kindred of Christ.—The genealogical tables of Matthew and Luke both give the lineage, not of Mary, but of Joseph. Our present inquiry must be limited to the brethren of Jesus. These are said to be James, Josès, Simon, and Judas (Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3). Were these then in reality brothers of Jesus? The answer to this inquiry depends on the question of the relation of James, the son of Alphaeus, to that James who was at the head of the Church in Jerusalem, surnamed the Just, and in the epistle of Paul denominated the brother of Jesus. For reasons which cannot here be adduced, we believe them to be one and the same. James, therefore, the son of Alphaeus, a brother of Joseph, was in reality the cousin of Jesus, as were also Josea, Simon, and Judas, known by the names of Lebbaeus and Thaddeus. The mother of these cousins of Jesus was Mary, the wife of Klopas (Matt. 27:56; Mark 15:40, 47; 16:1). The mother of these four sons was Mary, a sister of Mary the mother of Jesus, bearing the same name (John 19:25), as was very common with the Jews. They were accordingly the cousins of Jesus, on the part both of their father and their mother. Is it not then a reasonable supposition that Joseph, after the decease of his brother Alphaeus or Klopas, may have received the widow, his brother's wife, with her children, sons and daughters, into his own family; and that thus, from this circumstance they may, according to the usage of the country, have been denominated brothers and sisters of our Lord? But there are writers of the highest authority who maintain that these four were sons of Joseph and Mary, and brothers, in the strictest sense, of Jesus, and that James, the son of Alphaeus, was his cousin. The traditions of the Church on this subject are contradictory and unreliable. Whether other children, after the birth of Christ, were born to Joseph and Mary, does not indeed appear; but we rest in the conviction that the Apostle James, surnamed the Just, the head of the Church at Jerusalem, and author of the epistle bearing his name, and the apostles called also Lebbaeus and Thaddeus, author of the epistle of Jude, and Simon, carefully to be distinguished from Simon Zelotes, and Josea, were all the sons of Alphaeus, the brother of Joseph. Their mother was also the sister of Mary, the mother of Jesus. They probably lived with Jesus, in the family of Joseph, after the death of their father, and in the current phraseology of the time were known and designated as the brothers of our Lord.

LICHTENSTEIN.—Dr. Coleman.

Jesus Christ, the Godman.—The doctrine of the Scriptures is that the Son of God "was made flesh," or "became man," and Justin and the Alexandrians, especially Origen, having ascribed to him both the ανδρωποτης and the θεοτης, it was easy to include the two definitions in the term Godman, θειανδρος, θειανδρωπος. This, however, was not done very early. The Monothelites first borrowed it from the Pseudodionys. Areop. ep. 4, ad Cajum, and made use of it sneeringly in controversy; whilst the substantive θειανδρωπος only occurs sporadically and occasionally in the Greek patristic, and among the Latins there is no corresponding expression at all. So also in the theology of the Reformation, the term "Godman" is seldom met with. It is only in modern speculative theology that it is introduced in various senses and for different purposes, in imitation of the Klopstock poetry. Although a vox propria, and an expression also admitting of different interpretations, it is still, as a specification of one person in two natures very convenient and proper. We must only be careful in explaining it. The word can scarcely be said to be a definition. It rather directs to the multitude of different dogmatic definitions of the person of Christ, which have obtained scientific authority and currency in the Church, and which require further explanation.

The term "Godman" predicated of Christ expresses of itself nothing more than that he is both God and man—that the θεοτης as well as the ανδρωποτης, belongs to him. But in what way these two predicates, apparently contradictory, belong to the same Godman, and how the divinity is related to the humanity, is not seen. Our business accordingly will be to show first: the truth of the judgment contained in the word "Godman" that Christ is God and also man; and, secondly, to explain scripturally, dogmatically, and symbolically, the coexistence of these two predicates.

That Christ was truly man in opposition to Docetic Gnosticism, was most clearly proven by the Church fathers. The expression "son of man" which he applies to himself is not conclusive, for he uses it rather in the sense of Dan. 7:13, to show that he was come from heaven. But the whole tenor of the evangelical history is, that the birth and life of Jesus were purely human. The Scriptures do not say that he was omniscient already in the cradle, but that he increased in wisdom and stature. They do not say, with the Monothelites, that he determined by his world-governing volition to learn how hunger and fatigue and pain would feel, and that he would avail himself of his humanity for this purpose; but they speak of him as truly man, subject to all the infirmities incident to the natural life of man. His psychological life was also purely human; he experienced sorrow and joy, pain and pleasure; he wept at the grave of a friend.

But this man says of himself that he is God, and the Scriptures testify the same. To the Virgin Mary he was announced as the son of David (who, according to 2 Saml. 7:19; Ps. 110; and Is. 7, was the Lord God himself, the υιός υψιστου, Luke 1:32). He was not begotten, but was conceived by the Holy Ghost, and was born as man. This pre-existence of Christ is taught John 1:1, &c. It has been attempted to interpret this passage differently, and to make ὁ λόγος mean ὁ λόγος του εὐαγγελίου, ὁ λόγος ἀκηκούσας, which would be to say: "In the beginning was the gospel preached;" or, "in the beginning was the incarnate Jesus, whom we preach;" and all that follows would then refer exclusively to the incarnate one as such. But this interpretation has been satisfactorily refuted. As the way was historically prepared for the coming of Christ in the flesh, so it was prepared also for the apostolic doctrine concerning it, by terms and ideas already in use to give it expression. Thus John, directed by the Holy Ghost, had already taken up and applied the idea of מֵימַר דִּיהוּה, not indeed as understood by Philo, but as it obtained in the Jewish theology of the Targum. "In the beginning was the word;" and "in the beginning" it was he word of God, not to the creature, but to God himself (καὶ ὁ λόγος ἦν πρὸς τὸν θεόν and emphatically repeated: ὁὗτος ἐν ἀρχῇ πρὸς τὸν θεόν). As he thought expresses itself in a word, and the word is identical with and corresponds to the thought, and yet is distinguishable from and independent of and objective to it, so the nature of God is expressed and made objective in the λόγος, not for the purpose of revealing himself extra to the creature, but at first, ἐν ἀρχῇ, that God might be objective to himself, and as a self-speaking and self-existing divine word might speak to God. Thus this ἀρχῇ is not as in Gen. 1:1, the beginning of time, but it is eternity, the beginning, which is the basis of all time.—By this λόγος, God made the creature, and reveals himself to the creature, and this λόγος was made flesh in Jesus, i. e. became man.

The Baptist accordingly announced Christ, not simply as the servant of God, promised Isa. 40, but as ἀνέστην ἐρχόμενος (John 3:31), and Jesus also calls himself the Son of God. At first he only speaks of the Father relative to himself, and of his relation to the Father, as the representative of mankind to God, and as the plenipotentiary and representative of God to mankind (high-priest and apostle), and only in v. 26 mysteriously alludes to his eternal sonship. It was at the feast of the Tabernacles that he first openly asserted his eternal divinity (John 8:38), and afterwards (John 10:30) at the feast of dedication. From these passages, we may learn how the expression "Son of God," as used by Jesus, was understood by the Jews. They understood it in a metaphysical sense, and considered it blasphemy. If they had mistaken his meaning, Jesus would have corrected them; but he admitted their interpretation, and subsequently assented to it before the high-priest under the solemn sanction of an oath. He was often greeted as the Messiah by the people, and no one took offence, but to speak of himself as the Son of God was regarded as awfully profane, a clear proof that it was more than synonymous with "Messias," and implied more than a mere resemblance, or divine approbation. The word son implies a generating activity. Elisha was called the son of Elijah, not on account of any resemblance to him, but because he became what he was by means of Elijah; and the New Test. believers are called the children of God, because they are born of the Spirit. Christ could be called a son of God, inasmuch as God delivered him from the birth throes of death in raising him from the dead; but he was called the Son of God before his resurrection, for the reason that he came down from heaven, i. e. because he was with the Father from eternity, as the word spoken ἐν ἀρχῇ from the Father to the Father, the self-expressing word (John 1:1, &c.).

Thus the Scriptures teach that the man Jesus was and is God, and of course that Jesus Christ is both God and man, or more briefly: Godman; but not as if the two predicates, the humanity and divinity, were joined together in the way of addition; as if to the color of steel we were to add the predicate of hardness. The Scriptures teach something more definite and precise—not that Christ is God and also man, or man and also God; but that he is the son of God become man—not indefinitely as a Godman in any sense whatever; but very distinctly as the λόγος ἐνανθρωπείς. In this way the proposition itself leads to the question: How is the co-existence of the two predicates God and man in one person to be thought of? At first view it seems to involve a contradiction, and to be irreconcilable. God is eternal and infinite, man is created and finite—God is happy in Himself, active or inactive, man is capable of suffering and does suffer. How can the same person be eternal and not eternal, infinite and yet finite, happy and yet be miserable?

Such a mechanical juxtaposition of predicates and mutual attributes obtained already in the early Church, and in modern times has reappeared in various forms. In the first place, God and man are regarded as two distinct constituent parts, and together make up the Godman. In the crudest form it comes to this: the eternal world-ruling λόγος, still retaining this position, placed himself in connection with the man Jesus, and by him, as his organ, works, as the Holy Ghost worked by the prophets. Nestorius expressed it somewhat differently. He did not say: Jesus was a man bearer or organ of the divinity (θεοφόρος); but the "forma servi" in Jesus was θεοφόρος; the bearer of Deus Verbum. He never used the phrases: "Immanuel is God," "Immanuel is man," the "son of Mary is the uncreated God," &c. He would say: "Immanuel is God and man." When the crown prince becomes a general, we can say: "Charles is crown prince," and also Charles is "a general;" but not necessarily "Charles is crown prince and general." But when copper and zinc are melted together and become brass, we cannot say, "brass is copper," and "brass is zinc;" but we would have to say "brass is copper and zinc." Nestorius thought of the Verbum Dei, and the "forma servi" as two additive constituent parts, and the forma servi, not as pure forma, but as a subsistence. He held that the Deus Verbum created a forma servi, and joined himself to it. He may not have thought of the mode of union as that of an agent and instrument; it may have been a sort of indwelling, by which the forma servi was possessed by the Deus Verbum, as demoniacs are by demons; still the λόγος and the forma servi, which he creates, remain two distinct subsistences or constituent parts.

Another erroneous view equally proceeds from this same personification of the irreconcilability of the divine and human attributes, and seeks to get out of the difficulty by giving up the new idea of both divinity and humanity. The Godman is a mixed nature, a middle grade between God and man. He is not really true God, nor true man, but a sort of demigod, superior to man, but inferior to God. In the first view the ideas of God and man are preserved in their integrity, but they stand by each other, as two merely united, not identical parts. In the last their identity is maintained, but it is at the expense of their integrity. There the "Godman" is a man united to God; here the Godman is a mixed up being, consisting of divine and human properties. To this rubric evidently belongs the view for which Eutychius was condemned. Christ, as to his inferiority, was not ὑποτακτός with other men.

These views at first sight appear to be opposite extremes, and are often so exhibited, whilst in fact they are inwardly allied. Both rest upon the denial of the truth that the son of God became man. The scriptural ἔγενετο (John 1:14), is not allowed its right. It is regarded as an inexplicable mystery, that he who from eternity was and is God, should enter the sphere of time and become not God, but man—be it so. It is precisely this entering of the eternal into human development, which the Bible teaches. He who is the author of all time and space, by an act of self-privation, places himself within the limits of time and space, of human existence, of volition and thought, of feeling and experience. Here in the idea of God is involved the conception of life and volition, and the possibility of self-limitation; not a modification in which God loses himself, but in which he holds fast to himself and can resume himself.

In the divine nature this is made possible by the Trinity. The triune God is he who is himself the eternally living God, and as life belongs to the eternal nature of God, so does the Trinity. God, according to his eternal nature, is He who distinguishes himself from himself, and thus the possibility of exhibiting himself in time, in this distinction from himself; i. e. to take up in himself the distinction between his supertemporal-eternal, and his inter-temporal being, is founded on his eternal nature.

In the human nature this is possible, inasmuch as substance and consciousness are not the same. No man is every moment conscious of all that he is, or that he carries within him, as the substantial contents of his spirit. Sleep, fear, insanity, sometimes entirely suspend consciousness, whilst aback of it the substantial contents of the spirit remain undisturbed and reappear when the cause is removed. Thus the incarnate Son of God, in a purely human way, could possess the fulness of the Godhead as his substantial contents without being conscious of it, i. e. without being omniscient.

The Scriptures teach that such a becoming man, such an entering another mode of existence, took place with Christ. On the one hand, they unhesitatingly speak of the eternal, and incarnate Logos by the same name. There is no more impropriety in this than in speaking of the apostle at one time as Peter, and at another as Simon. If Lucius, the king's son, for the purpose of redeeming a captive brother, were to become a slave, and called himself Caius, it would be proper to say: "Lucius became a slave," or the "king's son became a slave;" or "Caius was the king's son and became a slave;" or the "king's son is a slave." In the same way the Scriptures speak of Christ: "the word was made flesh;" "grace and truth came by Jesus Christ," parallel to the "king's son became a slave"—"Caius came and redeemed his brother." "Christ thought it no robbery to be equal with God, but took on himself the form of a servant;" parallel to Caius who laid aside his dignity as the king's son and became a slave—for Caius and the king's son and the slave are one and the same person. It is wrong to suppose that all the passages of which "Jesus Christ" is the subject, refer to him only as incarnate, and never to him as he was before his incarnation.

On the other hand, the Scriptures teach (Phil. 2:6) that the Son of God actually exchanged the form of his world-ruling existence for the form, the σῆμα ἀνθρώπου. His humiliation was twofold. In the first place being ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων, "he thought his being equal to God no robbery" (as when a man violently holds on to something without right)—but having a right to it, he freely gave it up. He emptied himself accordingly in taking upon himself "the form of a servant" (the form of human existence, and that too of unglorified human existence, subject to the consequences of sin), "and was found in fashion as a man." And, secondly, "being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself even to the death of the cross."

That the Logos humbled himself and became man, that he condescended to the existence form of the embryonic soul of a child, that he, in whom the fulness of the Godhead in the form of his eternal presence dwelt, bodily reduced himself to a being in whom that fulness lay concealed in the form of a germ capable of development—that he became the soul of a child, the germinating centre of a human life, and as such entered the womb of a human mother, and constructed himself a body from earthly material—at first an animated filament that developed itself, to a body—this is the truth, which both these erroneous views equally ignore. So soon as this truth is apprehended and retained, it is impossible for us to suppose that the Logos has united himself to a man, the son of God to the son of Mary. Just as little can we indulge the equally absurd opinion that Christ is something intermediate between God and man—as to think that Lucius assumed some intermediate grade, chamberlain for instance, between prince and slave. Just as Lucius was really and truly the king's son, of royal descent and character, and as much the heir of the throne after, as well as before he became a slave, and as, on the other hand, he really and truly became a slave, and was no better off than other slaves, so Christ was still really and truly God, and also a pure and perfect man. For just as Lucius only gave up the existence and manifestation form of his royal dignity, his residence at court, and his share in the government, so Christ only gave up the "form of God," "being like God." And if he was a sinless man, endowed with miraculous power, this by no means interfered with the reality of his human nature. For sin and bondage to nature do not belong to the substance of humanity, but are accidents introduced by sin, and at variance with the true idea of human nature. The sinlessness of Jesus, moreover, was not in the form of his eternal inability to sin, but in his purely human willingness to sin (Heb. 2:18; 4, 15), and his omnipotence was not in the form of his eternal world-ruling power; but in the purely human form of miraculous power, the dominion over nature in particular instances and cases.

Nestorianism ignores that original funda-

ental truth of the doctrine of the Godman, and assumes that the Logos created a son of Mary and then united himself to him. Eutychianism participates fully in this view, and supposes that these two constituents of Christ upon their contact immediately unite together into one, and mutually communicate their properties (περιχώρησις, permeatio). In opposition to this Leo, in epis. Flav., asserts with truth: nam impie duarum naturarum ante incarnationem unigenitur Dei Filius dicitur, quam efarie, postquam Verbum caro factum est, natura in eo singularis asseritur. And the Chalcedon synod with equal truth rejected the proposition: χριστὸν ἐκ δυο φύσεων γεγονέναι; and, also, πρὸς τὸν ἐν μιᾷ φύσει εἶναι.

This brings us to the symbolic definitions. If the Logos became man, the two attributes that he is God and that he is man, in their absolute and undiminished integrity, may and must be predicated. The Godman is God, and he is man. In the early Church, the two attributes were designated by the term of the two φύσεις (ἐν δυο φύσεων ἕνω.). Schleiermacher has correctly remarked that this terminology is not very accurate, and if we call to mind the many mistakes to which it has led in modern times, it must be admitted. "How can the divine and human be so comprehended in any one term, as if the two, mutually co-ordinate, were closer definitions of one and the same general idea." Here nature is used in the most abstract and diluted sense. A subsistens: the divine essence, and a not subsisting; the human existence form, or constitution, into which the subsisting essence enters, are comprehended under the same conception of φύσις. This must necessarily lead to the misapprehension of the two φύσεις as two subsisting things or constituents; a mistake that was obviated by the theory of the anhypostasis of the human φύσις, but that nevertheless crept in again during the middle ages, and soon became prevalent.

If we would correctly apprehend the ancient Church doctrine of the two natures, we must take φύσις in the abstract sense in which it was used. The divine nature consists in this, that Christ is God, the predicate "God" belongs to him; the human nature is this, that the predicate "man" is assigned to it. His divine nature is the divine essence which subsists in the Logos from eternity, and which in his becoming man he still retained. His human nature is the man's nature, or mode of being and constitution, which for itself does not subsist, but which as a universal attribute exists in all other men, and since his incarnation also in him: the natura hominum. To have human feeling, will, and thought, and as a human soul to animate a human body, is human nature. We must, however, never think of human nature as a concretum, a subsistens, a "son of Mary," with which the son of God united himself, or mixed himself up.

The eternal divine essence and the human constitution belong to Christ (according to the Chalced. Formul.), 1) ἀρρίστως, for the reason that the attributes which make up the θεός are not changed or modified, and those by which Christ is "man" are equally the unchanged essentials of the nature of men—and ἀσπύχτως, for the reason that the first belong to him fully and unqualifiedly, and these last equally unchanged produce nothing of the mixed nature of a demigod—2) ἀδασπίτως and ἀχωρίτως, for the reason that these are not two constituents, which are joined together, and under particular circumstances might again be separated (as impossible as it would be to separate Lucius into a king's son and a slave). Totus in suis, and totus in nostris, says Leo in the epist. Flav., which was received so enthusiastically in the second session of the Chalced. Synod, as a full and satisfactory exhibition of the truth, and after a most careful examination, was adopted in the fourth session unanimously as a correct expression of orthodox doctrine. Humana augens, he adds, inasmuch as he nova natiuitate generatus est, sinless, and in his person has elevated human nature, freed from the accidents of sin and death, to that glorified state which no longer veils the glory of the divine nature, but contributes to its adequate exhibition (John 17:5). Divina non minuens, inasmuch as he laid aside only the forma of the super-temporal world-ruling eternity, that he might make possible and accomplish the glorification of the divine nature in time and space.

This correct view of the old-church doctrine was however soon lost again. Had the ancient Church, in opposition to Apollinaris, maintained that it was not the Logos as such (as the world-governing I) that took the place of a human νοῦς, but that the Logos became man, and that the Logos become man in this way had a purely human thinking (νοῦς) and physical life (ψυχή)—the Latin church would scarcely have so mistaken it, as if the Logos had joined himself to a man consisting of spirit, soul, and body. Augustine (de consecr. 2) already says: Christi persona constat et conficitur ex Deo et homini; Anselm: filius Dei hominem assumpsit. The question between Abelard and the Lombards was precisely this: an duæ naturæ PARTES illius personæ sint dicendæ, or, an Deus, homo factus, factus sit aliquid? Abelard said: The Lombards indeed hesitate. Thomas says distinctly: non est una tantum hypostasis in Christi. Duns Scotus ascribes to the human nature of Christ a proper, if not an independent existence. This fundamental view of the middle ages, Luther also adopted and designated the divinity and humanity as two "parts" (Gross Bek v. Abdm. s. 202 der Irm. Ausq.), and upon it builds his theory of the impartation of the divine attribute to the human. The theologians of the Form of Concord still more distinctly express this view. The divinity of Christ (said Andrea at Maulbrun) hunc hominem Christum ad dextram suam collocavit; and the Form of Concord aff. 6, says: Quomodo HOMO, MARIE FILIUS, Deus aut filius Dei altissimi appellari posset, aut esset, si ipsius humanitas cum FILIO DEI non est personaliter unita? And sol. decl. ep. 8: POST FACTAM INCARNATIONEM, non quælibet natura in Christo per se ita subsistit, ut utraque sit persona separata. In this way the anhypostasis of the human nature is invalidated. It means nothing more than that the human nature (the "Mariæ filius") although itself a subsisting concrete, still, from the first moment of its origin, it was so closely connected with the "Dei filius," that now (post factam incarnationem) it is no more "a particular person," but exists simply as a part of the person of Christ. As a part, as concretum, hypostasis, it is however regarded. Hence the distinct assertion of the Lutheran divines of the Form of Concord school, that the expressions "natura humana," "natura divina," concrete as well as abstract, may be used. From this the following theories may be deduced: The Son of God produces, or creates in the womb of the Virgin, "a human nature" in the concrete sense, a son of Mary, with which he at once unites himself personally. By means of this personal union of the Son of God with the concretum of the "human nature," the latter becomes possessed of the divine properties (omnipresence, for instance), although in the state of humiliation no use is made of them. Thus, in the state of humiliation the omniscient world-governing Logos is united to a not omniscient son of man in one person. In the state of exaltation, on the other hand, the "human nature" avails itself of this property, and becomes actually omniscient, omnipresent, &c.

It is evident that this theory neither conducts to a consistent nor scriptural view of the person of Christ, nor does it agree with the doctrine of the ancient Church. It contains the Nestorian fundamental view of the natures as concrete parts, together with the Eutychian addition of the mixing up of these two parts. As the medieval scholastic doctrine of the person of Christ was a relapse to the view rejected at Chalcedon, so is this ubiquistic-scholastic theory a relapse from the Reformation theology into that of the middle ages.

The age of the Reformation was marked already by a deliverance from that erroneous view and a return to biblico-patristic Christology. Zuingli, humanistically and exegetically trained and well read in the Church fathers, was unwittingly led to the correct view, when he said: Christ took upon himself forma nostra; or, dignatus est ignari hominis formam habitumque inducere. With him human nature was not concrete, but simply the human form or mode of existence. For this reason Luther and Zuingli, in their discussions concerning the person of the Godman, misunderstood each other, neither of them knowing the other's stand-point. On the contrary, Calvin, with Zuingli, entertained the Chalcedon view, and spoke of Christ assuming the nature of man, human nature abstractly understood. The son of God assumed the nature of man, and so certainly became man, that Zuingli and Calvin do not hesitate to call him already who became man "Christ." Christ with them is not the result of the union of the Logos with a "human nature;" but the Logos is himself Christ, inasmuch as he assumed the nature of man. That Melancthon, the "Præceptor Germaniæ" together with his school, appealing expressly to the Church fathers, opposed the ubiquistic theories, is too well known to be more than merely mentioned.

In accordance with all this, the Reformed and Philippistic theologians, in opposition to the Lutherans (in the narrow sense), declared that the expressions "natura humana" and "natura divina" could only be used as abstracta, and made full account of the anhypostasis of the natura humana. They indeed corrected the equivocal use of the phrase unio duarum naturarum, and taught: unio est immediata inter personam divinam et naturam humanam, mediata inter naturam divinam et naturam humanam. The divine person assumed a human constitution. In this way, the human and divine properties are so far mediately united that they inhere in one and the same person (precisely as the properties of the king's son and a slave are mediately united, inasmuch as Lucius become a slave has the properties of both in his person). The Logos has given up not the divine nature, but the "form of God," the "being like God," i. e. the form of the world-governing, the all time and space comprehending eternity, and has assumed the time and space-existence-form of human living, feeling, willing, and thinking. He became a human life-centre, a human soul, as such entered the womb of the virgin, then formed himself a body, and then developed himself spiritually and bodily in a purely human way. For the purpose of redeeming us he assumed the constitution of human nature, subject to the consequences of sin, only that he was without the accident of sin and possessed the accident of miraculous power; and in this consisted the status humilis. Having accomplished the work of redemption, the human nature in him, as the first born, was freed from these accidents, i. e. was glorified from the time of his resurrection, and thus began the status gloriæ. Man he is and remains in eternity and lives in a visible body in heaven, that sphere of creation into which sin and death have never entered, and where an unveiled revelation and manifestation of the glory of God are possible. But in connection with the glorified human nature, there is another higher and fuller revelation of the divine nature, a full marriage of the divine δόξα, a participation in the world-ruling dominion of the Father (Sessio ad dextram), which with the unglorified was not compatible. This dominion of the exalted Christ will also be completed in the pure human form and mode of his existence. He has not given up that which is essential in human nature (the νοῦ ἔναι, life in an organized visible body). (Luke 24:51; Acts 1:11; Col. 3:1, 2; Phil. 3:20). He can still, in a way that to us is an absolute mystery, really be with and in his people, and dwell in them.

The later Lutheran theology, that of the Erlangen school, has made an earnest and commendable effort to set aside the view of the scholastics of the middle ages. Dr. Thomasius, first in 1845 (Zeitschr. p. f. Prot. u. Kirche, Heft 2), expresses the opinion, that the Logos, in the state of humiliation, united himself, and, at the same time, assumed the attributes of human nature. Thus the limited Logos is ever united to a "human nature" in a concrete sense. In the state of exaltation the divine nature resumes its divine attributes, and communicates them to the human nature. The view of the two natures as two parts is here still retained; but a first attempt is made to show the untenability of the Lutheran scholastic of 1577. On the other hand, and with more energy, Dr. Hoffmann, in his "Schriftbeweis," has recently carried out the doctrine, that the Logos became man, only that with him, it seems to be somewhat affected by the view of the begetting of Jesus by the Holy Ghost. If it was the Logos, who became man in the womb of the virgin, he could not have been begotten, for he who already exists cannot be first begotten. So also the form of the statement: the Son of God ceased to be God, in order to become man, is absurd. He did not cease to be God, he only gave up the form of God. It should be the principal business of our day to rectify the doctrine of the Godman, and carry it back to its original Biblical patristic purity and distinctness. DR. EBARD.—Dr. Wolff.

Jesus Christ, His three-fold office. Eusebius, already (H. E., I., 3), ascribes to Jesus the three-fold office of Prophet, Priest, and King. Calvin (Instit., II., 15) treats the doctrine as a distinct topic in theology. It was adopted, also, by the Heidelberg Catechism (Qu. 31), and Reformed theologians treat of the work of Christ under this form. Of Lutheran theologians, John Gerhard was the first to adopt it, but since then it has obtained currency in that Church.—The propriety of thus contemplating the work of Christ is very obvious. For it is certain that in the O. T. prophecies the Redeemer is set forth as the perfect and complete Prophet, as the servant of God who should occupy a prophetic, priestly, and royal position, as the royal seed of David, or second perfect David, and, finally, as a priestly King. He himself, also, plainly assumed this three-fold character. His being anointed as the Messiah also involves this idea. For as Elijah was anointed to be a prophet (1 Kings 19:16), so Christ should be anointed by the Spirit to preach to the wretched; and as the kings of Israel were anointed (1 Sam. 10:1; 16:13; 1 Kings 1:13, &c.), so Christ was anointed King of righteousness (Hebr. 1:8-9); and as the high-priest was anointed (Ex. 28:41, &c., &c.), so also was Christ to be the everlasting High-priest (Hebr. 7:16).

Old Testament prophecy promises a perfect Prophet in the Messiah. Thus, in Deut. 18:15, the Lord approves of the awe of the people, and promises them, that as they sent Moses to Him, to hear the law for them, so He would send a prophet to them, whom they should hear. The God who revealed Himself in the thunder and lightning of Sinai, so that the people feared to approach Him, would come to them through a Prophet. Here we have the first glimmerings of the antithesis between the law and gospel, and true Biblical theology should greet and appreciate such tender intimations.—Isaiah, chapters 40-66, are but indirectly connected with this prophecy of Moses. Here it is not so immediately a prophet, as a servant of God, that is exhibited. Israel, as the servant of the Lord, designed (not prophetically, but nationally) to give light to the Gentiles, is himself blind and deaf (42:19), and needs a prophet: Isaiah toils in vain (49:4). But a future servant of God will perform both the prophetic work of Isaiah for Israel, and the national work of Israel for the Gentiles (49:6), because he will be more than a prophet, and will bear the burden of our sins

(53:4, &c.). It is an דָּוִד which he will bring. Hence the idea of the servant of God here includes the office of a prophet (ch. 49), priest, and king, the King before whom the kings of the earth shall ultimately bow (49:23).—In Deut. 18, therefore, we have the promise of a prophet, and in Isa. 40-66, the promise of a servant of God, of whom prophetic labors, sacerdotal self-sacrifice, and royal power are predicated.—But royal rule is not only ascribed to this future Redeemer as a predicate, or as the issue of his fate; but the promise of a seed of David is the radical form of Messianic prophecy, a seed that should ascend David's throne. Until David's time Israel was promised redemption, but (Deut. 18:15, excepted) not a Redeemer. Deliverance from future servitude was promised to Abraham's seed (Gen. 15); and the promise was temporally more and more completely fulfilled by Moses, Joshua, and David. This led David to think of building a temple for the Lord. He would secure the abode of the Eternal among his people, by walls of stone. But this was not God's plan (cf. John 4:23, 24), Israel was to learn that its temporal deliverances only foreshadowed the true redemption. This fact, however, was not taught theoretically, but they were to be educated into the idea, and to this end a new prophetic perspective is opened to their view (2 Sam. 7). Not David, but David's son, after David's death, should build the Lord a house, and his throne the Lord would establish forever. It is true no definite individual is here named (v. 14), but David clearly perceived that the promise pointed to an organic one (σπέρμα, not σπέρματα, Gal. 3:16), in whom it should reach its full bloom. At the same time he felt that his sinful race was not worthy to build a house for the Lord, or reign upon an eternal throne, and therefore uttered the significant words in 2 Sam. 7:19 (cf. 1 Chron. 17:17). David saw that the Lord was looking upon him, but that Jehovah here showed himself as a man, who at the same time was God. He understood that the promise to his posterity would be consummated in the manifestation of Jehovah as God and man (see Ps. 2:6, 7; 110; Matth. 22:42, &c.).—Solomon had a clear conviction that Nathan's prophecy was not finally fulfilled in him and his temple of stone (1 Kings 8:26-27), and when, after his death, the house of David, and the nation declined, the eye of prophecy was unwaveringly directed to one definite future branch of David, who should be the promised seed (Is. 7:14; 9:6; 10:21; 11:1, &c.). Thus believing Israelites were led to expect a Messiah who should combine sacerdotal self-sacrifice with his prophetic functions, and by means of both establish a kingdom of peace. To the carnal eye, however, his royal and prophetic characters were sundered, and the sacerdotal one wholly obscured. The carnal masses of Israel expected a worldly, temporal Messiah, who should simply secure to Israel temporal deliverance, and found an earthly kingdom. They considered "the prophet" as being distinct from the Messiah (John 6:14. Cf. Mark 8:27; John 1:21. Cf. 1 Macc. 14:41). Believing Jews had purer views of the promised servant of God (Matth. 3:3; 12:18; Luke 3:4; cf. Isa. 40, &c.); and our Lord himself proved to them his claims to the three-fold character predicted of him, by his works, his sufferings, and his death.—When he went about teaching and proclaiming the kingdom of God, and confirmed his word by signs, he performed prophetic functions, and was so acknowledged (Luke 7:16; 9:8; John 4:19; 7:40; Luke 24:19). But the N. T. goes further than simply to claim for him a prophetic character in form, and declares that he was, and is, the prophet, the revealer of the Father in an absolute sense (Hebr. 1:1, &c.); the personal Word of the Father, in whom the Father ἐν ἀρχῇ communed with Himself (πρὸς τὸν Θεόν), through whom He created all things, and by whom He revealed redemption to the fallen race. Hence Christ is prophet in his very being; his whole person and being is the revelation of God (John 14:9). He is the incarnate manifestation of the eternal law of God, for he is man as God wishes man to be (Matth. 3:17; John 4:34; 5:19, &c.); and he is, at the same time, the living, impersonated Gospel, in whom abides the grace of God incorporate (Luke 4:17, &c.; John 1:36). Here his prophetic and sacerdotal nature become identical.—In Hebrews (7, &c.) he is set forth as the eternal High-priest; for he offered himself up, as the only ever-sufficient sacrifice, in whom all previous typical offerings were superseded and annulled. It is no objection to this view, that in other parts of the O. T. the idea of a hostia predominates, for this is only a formal diversity. For it is the clear doctrine of the Scriptures, that Jesus, on the one hand, absolutely met the demands of perfect holiness made upon man, and that his life was a spotless offering to God; and, on the other hand, that he suffered for man the penalty of death, and thus paid down to God his life a ransom (λύτρον) for us, which we could not have paid. Thus he vicariously (cf. Levit. 16:33) assumed our guilt and punishment, and became a sin-offering for us. And this sacrifice he offered not, like a common Israelite, through the mediation of an ordinary priest (for who would have been worthy to officiate here), but he offered himself, by voluntarily submitting to the death which his sacerdotal holy life brought to him.—But inseparable from his death is the crown (of thorns), as this is from royal dignity and power. He had not denied his royalty when the people ascribed it to him (Matth. 9:27; 18:20, &c., &c.), for he was, and called himself a king (John 4:26; Matt. 22:42, &c.). But he accomplished his royal mission in a manner opposite to that expected of him by the people. Filled with the fulness of God (and therefore also of human power), in a word, the head and crown of humanity, invested with all power (for his miracles were as well the δυνάμεις of a king as the σημεῖα of a prophet), he exercised his royal authority only as the lowest servant of men, until, as the culmination of all, he received from Pilate, before whom he avowed his kingship, the crown of thorns (John 18:37; 19:2, 12–15, 21). So closely did the kingly and priestly offices approach each other. As a reward for this royal self-denial, he received a crown of glory (Hebr. 2:9; Phil. 2:

9, 10), was made head of the Church, and Lord over all (Isa. 53:10–12; Eph. 1:21, 22). But in this aspect, also, the two offices meet, for he is likewise exalted to be our sacerdotal mediator before God (1 John 2:1; Hebr. 7:25; 9:24; Rom. 8:34), pleading for us upon the ground, that we belong unto him (1 Pet. 2:9; John 17:6, &c.). His intercession is that of a royal priest and sacerdotal king, not that of a prophet for his disciples.

We have seen that the Bible sets forth the redemptive work of Christ under the three aspects of prophet, priest, and king, and this in a manner which shows that they are not mechanically, but most intimately connected in his mediatorial nature. Theology, therefore, is not only justified in making this a distinct category in its system, but required to do so, by the fact, that in the N. T. Redemption, in its very essence, divides itself into this three-fold form of operation, Christ is the prophet, the priest, and the king, of whom all others in the O. T. were but feeble types; and if this three-fold character was essential to his messiahship, it must be shown in theology, that the three offices are clearly distinct from each other, and yet combinedly exhibit the whole work of Christ.—But even had man not fallen (a supposition which surely involves no impossibility, excepting to the most rigid supralapsarianism) we must assume that a mediatorial office of this three-fold character would have existed. For, in abstracto, we must hold that even sinless man would have had to pass through a human development; so that we cannot avoid inquiring whether, in that case, a union of God with mankind, like that which took place at the incarnation of Christ, would not have occurred. At once to deny this would be simply to assume that sin was indispensable to the development of a degree of divine glory which could not otherwise have been revealed. Assume: no Christ without a fall, and the inference is unavoidable, that the fall was rather a happy than an unhappy event. This would sap the foundation of Christian ethics, and give pantheism the victory (see Liebner's Christologie, p. 180).—If the idea of a sinless condition of mankind is conceivable, we obtain that also of a revelation of God to man, by which man would not be brought out of error and falsehood to the truth, but out of a state of partial knowledge to complete knowledge (analogously with Jesus; Luke 2:22). Then the distinction between prophets and other men would not have arisen; every man would be a prophet, a recipient and channel of divine revelation, which would be a revelation not in words only, but of the fulness of life to the inner man (cf. Joel 3). But not a revelation to a man in a diffused mass of mankind, but to and in an organically formed organism, at the head of which would be a revealer κατ' ἔκδοξιν, a λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ, in whom the fulness of the Godhead would be visibly revealed.—But this same supposition of man's maintained purity, also involves the idea of the sacerdotal offering of himself to God. For every member of such a sinless race, would have spontaneously yielded himself to God as a living personal offering; and as mankind would then not have been a confused mass, but an organic ructure (for sin made mankind such a mass; redemption restores it to its original design ph. 4:16), this sacerdotal offering would have reached its summit in a sacerdotal head of mankind, who, as the absolute child of God, could have offered unto God the fulness of human powers.—All this would necessarily have involved the royal dignity of this head of mankind (Hebr. 3:1).

This is not an idle fancy. Jesus was in reality—apart from his redemptive work—in his own nature, such a prophet, priest, and king. Apart from his work, in his own person, he was the incarnate word of the Father, in whom the fullness of the Godhead was manifested bodily. Apart from his assumption of our guilt, he was, in his person, the high-priest who, in his sinlessness, presented the fulness of human abilities to the service of God. And in his own person he was the man, and therefore the king of the race. If, therefore, the pure idea of a mediator, as such, necessarily falls into these three aspects, the work of redemption will necessarily exhibit a parallel division. Christ, who, in his person, is prophet, priest, and king, performed mediatorially the functions of these offices, for man's redemption.—On this basis Evangelical theology has constructed its doctrine of the three-fold office of Christ; treats these offices, as inwardly pervading, and connected with, each other, and teaches that, even in his state of exaltation, he continues, for his people's sake, to perform them.

DR. EBRARD.*

Jesus, Holy Child, Congregation of the Daughters of. It exists in Rome, and was founded by Anna Moroni, of Lucca. In early youth she went to Rome, poor, and managed to amass a small fortune. In advanced life she resolved to found an institution for teaching girls such female work as would enable them to earn a livelihood. Clement X. confirmed the institution. The number of these daughters (members) is 33, corresponding with the years of Christ on earth; the novitiate lasts 3 years; the members assume the vow of poverty, chastity, and obedience. Novitiates may withdraw before taking the vow, but must leave back whatever they brought with them. Their discipline is strict; their dress a full dark brown garment and white cowl. Early in the 15th cent. there were "Sisters of the good Jesus."

NEUDECKER.*

Jesus Christ, Orders of, were Orders of temporal Knights in Spain, Portugal, and the Church States. In Spain the Order was founded in 1216, by Dominicus. The Knights bound themselves to practise monastic duties, and defend the Church. Honorius III. confirmed the Order, but its object and plan were subsequently often changed. It then assumed different names, and was, finally, merged into the Congregation of St. Peter the Martyr, which arose under Pius V., and consisted (as yet) mainly of cardinals and persons belonging to the Inquisition.—The Order in Portugal sprang from the Knights Templars. When Clem. V., in March, 1312, declared the Templars dissolved, King Dionysius took their part, by securing to them their possessions in Portugal. After the death of Clement, the king negotiated with John XXII., and, in 1317, founded, out of the Templars, a new spiritual Order of the above name. The members were called "Knights of Jesus Christ," and the secured property of the Templars was conveyed to them. John XXII. confirmed, 1319, the new Order, assigned to it the rule of St. Benedict, with some Cistercian precepts, and thought he could appoint members to it. Since 1550 the Grand Mastership of the Order was connected with the crown of Portugal. In 1789, the Order in Portugal was secularized and divided into Grand Cross, Commanders, and Knights; since then its members are chosen from the military and civil ranks. The recently deceased banker, Rothschild, belonged to the Order.

NEUDECKER.*

Jew, the Wandering. As a counterpart to the Christian legend, that the beloved disciple of the Lord would never die (John 21:23, &c.), we have that of an enemy of Christ, said to be doomed, under the goading of a guilty conscience, to a ceaseless wandering around the earth, until the second advent. This legend has, like all legends, assumed a variety of forms and interpretations. The oldest Christian writer who mentions it is Matthew of Paris (†1259). According to the account in his historia major, which he says he had from the lips of an Armenian bishop, who received the story directly from the Jew, his name was Cartaphilus. He was janitor at Pilate's palace; and when the Jews, after the condemnation of Jesus, were dragging him from the palace, this Jew struck him on the neck, and mockingly said to him: "Go on, Jesus! go faster; why linger so?" Whereupon Jesus turned upon him with a stern look, and said: "I go, but thou shalt tarry till I come again." The janitor was then 30 years old, but every 100 years he was seized with a syncope, from which, after some time, he revived, and found himself in the age and state in which he struck the Lord. Subsequently, Cartaphilus was baptized by Ananias, and called Joseph, which led to his being confounded with Joseph of Arimathea. As a Christian he was strictly ascetic, hoping by a life of penitence to secure final pardon. This wandering Jew lived in the East, in the two Armenias.—In the West the story assumed another form, and is first mentioned in the 16th cent. He is called Ahasuerus, and is said to have been seen in Hamburg (1547), and then in Danzig, Magdeburg, Lübeck, Vienna, Reval, Paris. His peculiar dress and manners attracted attention. Dr. Paulus, of Eizen, B. of Schleswig, heard him relate: that he was a sandal-maker in Jerusalem in our Lord's day, and was one of those who most loudly cried: "crucify him." On the way to Calvary Jesus passed his house, and leaned to rest against the door-post. But Ahasuerus, who was standing in the door, with a child in his arms, ordered Jesus off (some say struck him), when Jesus looked sternly at him, and said: "I will stand here and rest, but thou shalt keep going until the last day."—About the close of the 17th, and beginning of the 18th cent., however, the legend, in England, took its original Eastern form. A stranger showed himself, who said he was an officer of the chief council in Jerusalem, and told a story of himself essentially agreeing with that of Cartaphilius. Both Oxford and Cambridge sent professors to question him, and found him ready to answer them. He related many things about the apostles, Mohammed, Tamerlane, Soliman, &c., all of whom, he said, he had known. He knew the dates of all the crusades. Some thought him a deceiver, or insane, others believed him.—Whether all this is an allegory of restless scepticism, or of the wandering, and yet, in physiognomy, fixed character of the Jews, we leave the reader to decide for himself. But this fantastic legend has furnished material for many romances and poems (Schubert; A. W. v. Schlegel; Julius Mosen, N. Lenau, &c. Quinet; Béranger; Eugène Sue. Klingemann turned it into a drama).—(See Dr. J. G. Th. Grässe, d. Sage vom ewigen Juden, &c., &c., Dresd. u. Lpz., 1844, 8vo.) HAGENBACH.*

Jewish Christians; Jewish Christianity; Judaists, Judaising Christians, &c. (Ebionitism, &c.).—These terms have recently been involved in much confusion, arising from diverse and confused views of the relations of the early Church. Some (Schwegler, &c.) have unduly extended the application of the term Ebionitism; others (Schliemann, &c.) have limited the phrase Jewish Christians to those of Jewish descent, which would then include Paul and Barnabas. All difficulty will be obviated by using the phrase to designate those tendencies which at first maintained that Judaism was continued in Christianity, and then that the latter was identical with the former: tendencies which may be traced from the 1st Ep. of Peter, and the Ep. of James, down to the Ebionites and Clementines. These several tendencies appear as canonical and heretical, as a mild and then coarse form of Jewish Christianity.—Its history, in this wider sense, exhibits three periods: 1) that in which it reigned alone; 2) that of its co-existence with heathen Christianity (as a tendency); 3) its heretical period.

Primitive Christianity was Jewish; it stood in immediate union with Judaism. The question of its relation to heathenism had not yet practically arisen. Christianity was thought perfected Judaism. The Church was still a part of Israel, and all its hopes were fixed upon Israel's conversion. The congregation in Jerusalem was the chief one, but the only one to which others in Palestine held a filial relation. At its head stood the twelve apostles, called to preach to Israel. The appointment of deacons, and afterwards of presbyters, formed the first step towards independent organization. The confession of the crucified and arisen Jesus, as the Christ of God, distinguished the Church from Israel, and formed the germ of a new life and doctrine. Christians observed the law, like their Jewish brethren; they had not yet apprehended their relation to the law. They participated in the worship of the temple, but also held separate meetings, which seemed less designed for worship than to promote fraternal feelings.—When the mass of the Jews became more hostile to Christianity, and when some heathens became converts, and a congregation of these was formed at Antioch, and Paul devoted himself to the conversion of Gentiles, so that a Gentile Christianity sprang up beside the Jewish, the relative position of the latter was essentially changed. Then came up the question of the relation of Christianity to heathenism, and Judaism. Jewish Chr. split into a milder and more abrupt tendency. The former class adhered to the law, but did not require its full observance of heathen converts (see Apostle's convention). The latter imposed, even, circumcision on all, and soon organized themselves into zealous opposition to Paul. They appealed to the course of James, in justification of their principles. Exclusive congregations of Jewish Christians existed, probably, only in or near Palestine. With Jerusalem for their centre, they formed a separate part of the Church, more exclusive than the Gentile portion. After the death of James and the three pillars (Gal. 2:9), we find James, the brother of our Lord, at the head of Jewish Chr. In the N. T. this milder stand-point of Jewish Chr. was extended by the Epp. of James, Jude, and 1 Peter, and by the Apocalypse, to which the gospels of Matthew and Mark must be added (see the several Artt.). All agree in regarding Chr. as Judaism perfected, and in holding forth the harmony of the O. and N. T. They also treat the whole subject in a practical way, dealing in facts, not propounding principles, and connecting everything with the person of Christ; but without going into abstractions. In accordance with the O. T. He is chiefly regarded as a King; hence great stress is laid upon the glory of His second coming, and prominence given to the last things. More distinctively James exhibits Jewish Christian doctrine in its simplest, purest form: following the sermon on the mount, he regards Chr. as the νόμος τῶν αἰώνων. Jude forms the transition to Peter, who stands between James and Paul. The Apocalypse stands between Jewish Chr. and the system of John.—The entire position of Jewish Chr. in that period seems to have been provisional, just as the union effected at the Apostle's convention was precursory, but finally decisive. It had either to be absorbed in the general Church, or amalgamate with Gentile Chr., or run into various sects. That Gentile Chr. would fully adopt rigid Judaism, became obviously impossible even before Paul's death.—What contributed to the suppression of Jewish Chr., was, 1) the more rapid numerical growth of Gentile Chr., and, 2) the growing obduracy of Israel against the gospel. When Jewish Christians were forbidden to take part in the worship of the temple, or when they were cut off from Israel as apostates, cannot be certainly determined. They were hardly tolerated until the destruction of Jerusalem. The time of their prohibition from taking part in the worship of the temple, must have been decisive. Many, doubtless, rather gave up the Messiah than their mode of worship. Those who adhered to Christianity would, partly, be inclined to join their Gentile brethren, but partly, also, seek to fortify themselves in their exclusiveness. The Epistle to the Hebrews (see Art.) alludes to the vacillation and apostasy of many.—The destruction of Jerusalem, especially as completed by Hadrian, and the erection of the Ælia Capitolina, brought about the actual decision between these two forms of Christianity. Torn away from its ecclesiastical centre, Jewish Christianity hastened to its dissolution.—(See hionites). UHLHORN.*

Jezebel (זִיזְבֵּל probably an abbreviation of זִיזְבֵּל = heavenly home), was the daughter of Ethbaal, king of Sidon, who became king of Tyre after he had dethroned his brother Phelles Jos., Antt., VIII., 13, 2; adv. Apion, 1, 18). Commercial considerations primarily induced Ahab to marry her; but she, whom Josephus calls a δραστήριον τε καὶ τολμηρὸν, exerted a dominant influence over her weak husband, and led him to perpetrate cruelties not natural to him. Her father having originally been a priest, she was zealous for his religion, and, being ambitious, she, like her daughter, Athaliah, formed the scheme of getting the two kingdoms to adopt heathenism, so that the united crown might descend upon her family. She pursued this scheme with great perseverance, got the king of Judah in league with Israel, her daughter married to the heir of that throne, and persuaded Ahab to build a large temple of Baal in Samaria (1 Kings 16: 32; 18: 19; 2 Kings 3: 2; 10: 25-27), and another of Ashtoreth, probably in Jezreel (1 Kings 16: 33; 18: 19). Ahab himself was drawn into idolatry, and many of his subjects followed his example, whilst others were captivated by its sensual attractions, so that the worship of God was in danger of being wholly supplanted. Impatient of opposition, Jezebel persecuted the prophets, putting many to death (1 Kings 18: 4, 13). But they would not be silenced, especially Elijah, whom she bitterly hated (1 Kings 19: 2; 18: 10). These persecutions were probably constantly kept up, although the Bible is silent in reference to individual cases. Elijah's complaint (1 Kings 19: 14) proves what a reign of terror that must have been. Jezebel was, however, equally violent and revengeful in other cases, and did not shrink from the worst means to accomplish her end, as the case of Naboth shows (1 Kings 21: 1-13), and the treachery against Jehoshaphat (1 Kings 22: 30). After Ahab's death she still pressed her schemes. But the prophets were also vigilant; and at the proper time Elisha anointed Jehu as king, who utterly extirpated Ahab's family, and the idolatries which Jezebel had introduced. Still her boldness and firmness clung to her; and when Jehu drew nigh to Jezreel, her summer residence, she tried by cosmetic arts to soften the conqueror's heart (2 Kings 9: 30), in the hope that as his wife she might play out her game. But Jehu could not be moved. She was cast headlong from the window, and her mangled body was devoured by dogs (2 Kings 9: 10; 1 Kings 21: 23; 9: 23), after having, for 36 years, perpetrated her iniquities. Her example teaches that God would not tolerate a union of Israel with the Canaanites.

VAIHINGER.*

Jezreel (LXX. Ἰζρελ. Vulg. Jezrael, hence later Esdrelon, Judith 1: 8; 4: 5; 7: 3, and in the middle ages Stradela) was originally a Canaanite city (Josh. 17: 16), and subsequently fell to the portion of Issachar, and is not to be confounded with the city of the same name in Judah (1 Sam. 25: 43). The site is now occupied by Zerin, known during the Crusades as parvum Gerinum (Guil. Tyr., 22, 26). The town lay in the fertile valley of Jezreel, at the point where the Tubania (Ain Jalud = Goliath's fountain), which enters the Jordan at Bethshean or Scythopolis, and the Kishon, separate. In David's time it was one of the important towns of Palestine (2 Sam. 2: 8, &c.) which remained true to the house of Saul until Ishbosheth's death. Ahab chose it as the royal residence (1 Kings 18: 45; 21: 1). Here Jehu put Jehoram and Jezebel (see Art.) and Ahaziah to death (to the last case, Hos. 1: 4, may refer). The adjacent plain was named after the city (Judges 6: 33; Hos. 1: 5; Judith 1: 8), though sometimes called the field of Dothaim (Judith 4: 5), the plain of Megiddo (2 Chron. 35: 22), or simply great plain (1 Macc. 12: 49). It stretches from Mt. Carmel to the Jordan, and is watered by the Kishon and Tubania, with their branches. It is the largest and most fertile plain of Palestine, being 24 miles long from E. to W., by 12-15 wide from N. to S., of triangular form. Esdraelon (Campus Legionis, from the town Ledschun, Jos., B. J., IV. 1, 8, or simply μέγα πεδῖον, Antt., XX., 6, 1), is the natural boundary between Galilee and Samaria.—This plain possesses historical importance as the highway for caravans (Gen. 37: 25) from Galilee through Samaria to Jerusalem, and as the field of many great battles (Judges 4: 7, 13; 5: 6; 6: 33; 7: 12; 1 Sam. 29: 1; 31: 2; 1 Kings 20: 26; 2 Kings 9: 15-37; 23: 29; 2 Chron. 35: 22 [cf. Herod., 2, 159]; Judith 7: 3; Jos., B. J., 3, 10; 1 Macc. 12: 49). The last was that in which Napoleon, April 16, 1799, with 3000 men, routed 25,000 Turks. In Rev. 16: 16; 19: 19, it is prophetically designated as the scene of the future slaughter of nations.—Although at present it has few inhabitants, on account of the Bedouins, and only Zerin, with some twenty dilapidated houses, occupies the heights of Jezreel, all travellers speak of the richness of the soil. Schubert (Reise, 3, 163, &c.), was delighted with it, and reminded of Ps. 65: 13. No advantage, however, is taken of its spontaneous fertility, because of the unprotected state of the locality.

VAIHINGER.*

Joab, son of Zeruiah, David's sister (1 Chron. 2: 16, cf. 2 Sam. 17: 25). In 2 Sam. 2: 13, he is first named, as captain of David's forces against Abner. But he was, doubtless, one of David's earlier adherents (1 Sam. 22, cf. 22: 3, 4, 11-18; 26: 8), or David would have entrusted Abishai with the chief command. It seems to follow, also, from his not being named in 2 Sam. 23: 8, &c., that he was then already David's general (cf. 23: 18, 24); and Amasa would have taken precedence of him, had he not been associated with David prior to David's abode in Ziklag (1 Chron. 13: 18). On account of his talent for commanding an army, David, as king, made him leader in most of his wars (2 Sam. 10: 7; 11: 1; 12: 26; 18: 14; 20: 13). In the revolt of Absalom, David assumed the chief command, partly that he might fall back on the other divisions of the army, in case of a defeat. Hence he is mentioned as commander-in-chief in 2 Sam. 8: 16; 20: 13. On account of his fidelity to David some of his crimes were overlooked, as his slaying of Abner, Absalom, and Amasa (2 Sam. 3:27; 18:14; 19:13, and 20:10. Cf. 3:39; 16:10; 19:22; 11:15; 19:1-7; 3:27; 24:3). He combined great faults with eminent talents and virtues; pride, arbitrariness, and revenge, with firmness, fidelity, and bravery. Hence David's hesitation to punish him; and yet, that justice might be maintained, he committed the execution of the penalty deserved by Joab, to Solomon, who discharged the duty, and the more promptly, because Joab joined Adonijah (1 Kings 2:22. Cf. 2 Sam. 3:28, 29). The divine vengeance likewise overtook his posterity, as though in fulfilment of Ex. 20:5. VAHINGER.

Job. The book of Job is the greatest production of the ancient Israelitish philosophy (Chokmah), and as such belongs, with the three others of its kind, to the Cetubim. It bears all the marks which distinguish Proverbs, Canticles, and Eccles. from the prophetic books; it is a work of reflection and art. The prophet deals in historical facts, past or to come; this book presents an incident which lays no claims to historical actualness. The author uses an apt traditional story as a frame-work for the development of a great idea. Substantially the tradition was true, but the incident was wrought in a poetical form supplied by the writer of the book (Luther). Res vere gesta, sed poetice tractata (Grotius). Truth and fiction are interwoven. Prophecy, moreover, is the interpreter of Redemption, and the mediator of its progressive revelation; hence its sphere is within Israel. The book of Job presents an incident which occurred outside of this sphere, and sustaining no avowed relation to Israel. The author is consistently mindful of this; hence we do not find a single allusion to the law, the prophets, or the worship of Israel. His own position as an Israelite, the author does not deny, for in the narrative parts he always calls God, Jehovah; but he is always true to the character and relations of his hero, as being not an Israelite. Job uses the name Jehovah but twice (1:21; 12:9), Eloha, however, 41 times. Even many designations of divine attributes, common in the Thora, are not found in Job, and so, in general, of the dogmatic terminology of the Isr. religion; and only the earliest form of heathenism, star-worship (31:26-28), is named, though the expression: Jehovah of hosts, or Elohim Sabaoth, never occurs. This name belongs to the period of Isr. kings. His theme was to show that communion with God was possible on the basis of the ante-Israelitish, primitive revelation; that there, too, God continually reveals himself, in an ordinary way, through the conscience, and extraordinarily, in dreams and visions; that there, too, we meet with longings and strivings after the redemption, known to Israel by the clearer word of divine promise. The book of Job stands related to the other O. T. books, as Melchisedec to the Abrahamic covenant.

The scene is located in יִזְרְעֵל, a land of which we only know that it lay, as stated at the close of the book in the LXX., ἐν ταῖς ἐπείαις τῆς Ἰδουμαίας καὶ Ἀραβίας. According to Gen. 10:

23; 22:21; 36:21, the inhabitants were of Aramaic descent, and subsequently amalgamated with Nahorites and Horites; hence not Idumean, but in frequent intercourse with Idumeans of Teman (not Tema on the borders of the Nedscha and Syrian desert), and Arabians (of the Abrahamide-Arabic family Schuach), and exposed to the inroads of the Sabaeans (who probably dwelt near the Persian Gulf (cf. Gen. 10:7, 28; 25:3) and the Chassidim (either Chaldeans of Mesopotamia, or of the Chaldean mountains), who traded with the caravans of Tema and Sheba, which passed the country of Uz. — When Job lived there is not related. If those, so graphically described in ch. 24 and 30, were remnants of the subjugated Horites (which is probable), a period not antecedent to that of the patriarchs would be indicated (especially as the people of Uz were Arameans, not Edomites). There is, also, nothing in the book against the opinion that Job was cotemporary with the patriarchs of Israel; indeed the age he reached (42:16) points to a high antiquity, as well as the kind of money and musical instruments named (42:11; 30:31; 21:12; cf. Gen. 33:19; 4:21; 31:27; Josh. 24:32). A character drawn from that period, also, suited the author's purpose. Had Job belonged to a later age, his ignorance of Israel's God would have been a cause of reproach. — The book exhibits in Job a righteous man, who fell from a pinnacle of happiness into an abyss of woe; and whilst he cannot solve the riddle of his misfortunes, his friends, by their wrong views of Providence, and unkind judgment of his case, only deepen his misery. In the prologue a key to the mystery is furnished, and the result demonstrates the truth of the explanation given in the prologue. — It is impossible to understand the book, unless we remember that afflictions are set forth in the Scriptures in four leading aspects: 1) as a punishment of sin, and so dispensed by God in anger (Ps. 6:2; 38:2; Jer. 10:24, &c.; τιμωρία, poena), or for the reproof of his erring children (Deut. 8:5; Hebr. 12:6, &c.); 2) to purify the righteous, and free them more and more from evil, and so sent in love (Prov. 3:11; תּוֹכַח or תּוֹכַחָה; παιδεία, Hebr. 12, &c.; 1 Cor. 11:32); 3) to prove his people, God suffers them to be afflicted, so that thus their fidelity, earnestness, and love may testify to the power of his grace in them (Rom. 8:38, 39); 4) martyrdom (Matth. 5:11, &c.). This distinction between the several kinds of afflictions, Job's friends failed to perceive. Hence their injustice to him. His afflictions were designed to prove him; in him to illustrate the grace of unfaltering devotion to God, even under the darkest dispensations. There are afflictions of the righteous, which are neither a punishment nor a chastisement on account of sin, proceeding not from the anger, but from the love of God, the object of which is to vindicate, perfect, and reward the piety of the righteous. This is the fundamental idea of the book of Job (see Ztschr. f. Prot. u. Kirche, 1851, pp. 65-85, for details). And this was the lesson which Job finally learned from the lips of Jehovah himself, who, at the close of the book, comes forth and solves the problem, which had proven too difficult, as well for Job as for his friends. — But before Jehovah appears to end the dispute, we meet with four discourses (ch. 32–37) of a speaker whose presence was not before indicated. His name agrees with the locality of the incident (Gen. 22 : 21; Jer. 23 : 25). He is represented as a young man whom modesty had so far kept from speaking. He rebukes Job for justifying himself, at the expense of God's righteousness, and Job's friends for having nothing to say but in his condemnation. This is in harmony with the plot. But to meet all the demands of the case, he should not only defend Job's righteousness, but also expose the false view of the friends, that afflictions were always a punishment of sin. Instead of doing this, however, he simply carries out the sentiment expressed by Eliphaz, in 5 : 17. He does not get beyond the train of thought pursued by the three friends (see Gleiss, Beitr. z. Krit. d. B. Hiob, 1845. Hengstenberg, Ev. K. Z. Nr. 16–19, 1856; Kosegarten, Allg. Monatschr. f. Wissensch. u. Lit., 1853, p. 761, &c.). Jerome and Gregory M. had a like unfavorable view of Elihu's discourses, the former seeing in him a representative of a false philosophy, inimical to true faith, the latter a self-confident idle babbler. It is evident that these portions of the book were written by another and later author. For although there is no striking discrepancy of matter between them and the preceding discourses, the difference in style renders it impossible that the same author should have composed them. At ch. 32 a strange spirit breathes upon us; the diction becomes forced and affected; the poetic power declines; flat tautologies abound; and we get the impression that the writer aims at what he cannot reach. Still, this section of the book must not be undervalued. It exhibits a nearer approximation of sentiment to the doctrine of the N. T. than the other portions. Its author felt a defect in the book of Job which every Christian must feel, and sought to supply this defect; and although he does it in the spirit of the O. T. times, especially of the period preceding the exile, he stands nearer the light of the N. T. than the author of the original portions of the book. If the motto of the latter might be: εὐδὴν κατὰ κράτος τοῖς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ, Rom. 8 : 1, that of Elihu's discourses might be: κρινόμενοι ἐπὶ κυρίου παιδευόμεθα ἵνα μὴ συν ἑσὶ κόσμῳ κατακριθῶμεν. — Elihu's discourses, therefore, though not a part of the original work, form an integral portion of canonical O. T. literature. The other parts of the book remains as the poet produced them.

As to its form, this book is a dramatic tragedy. It is a drama. The prologue (ch. 1–3), as the first part, presents the riddle. Then in the three controversial discourses which follow (ch. 4–14; 15–21; 22–26), the plot deepens. In the fourth part (ch. 27–31), Job's monologues prepare the way for a solution. This follows, though not ἀπὸ μηχανῆς, in the fifth part (ch. 38–42 : 6). Then comes the epilogue or exodus, in which Job, needfully purified by repentance, is justified and crowned as triumphant in his faithfulness to God. — No offence can be taken at our calling a book of the Bible a drama; for this, as well as every other form of poetry, may be exalted to such divine use. The narrative style of the introduction and conclusion, or the absence of action, constitute no valid objection to our view of the book as a drama; for although here, as mainly in Euripides, the epic form is used, the dramatic spirit predominates, and though outward physical action is here wanting, the development of actual facts is carried on in animated reciprocal discourses. In some of our best modern dramas (Goethe's Iphigenia, and Tasso) there is also but little physical action. This want is made up in the book of Job by the variety and distinctiveness of the dramatic personæ: Satan, Job, Job's wife, his three friends, all strongly drawn characters. Each of the three friends represents a different phase of character: Eliphaz, the confiding pathos of old age, and aspiration after prophetic dignity; Bildad, the moderation and caution of one less rich in thought; Zophar, vehement, but transient, passion. The dramatic art of the book is also displayed in their growing opposition to Job, as the plot advances, until he finally regards them as leagued with his foes to heighten his afflictions. — We even go further, and assert confidently that the book is a tragedy. Brennius, already, called it such. Job is really as tragic a hero as Œdipus. His sufferings fall upon him like a tormenting riddle. Over these he easily triumphs, until the strange admonitions of his friends render them still more inexplicable. Then a severe struggle ensues, in which he, at times, mounts to the very heavens in bold defiance, and then sinks into the depths of despondency. His temptation had invested God with a false character, and with the spectre thus raised up he contends like a Titan. Nature and grace, madness and faith, defiance and humility, fiercely struggle with each other in his soul. At length the better principles prevail. Jehovah comes forth, and the spectre vanishes. Human freedom is not destroyed; it becomes manifest that human trials are not dispensed by absolute arbitrary power, but by divine wisdom, controlled by infinite love. The hero triumphs, the idea of a blind fate is annihilated. — The dramatic skill of this book is fully sustained by the loftiest elevation of style. Though abounding in imagery and illustration, everything is true to nature, and to history. Hence the powerful impression it has always made. It was a mine of wealth for Shakspere and Goethe. Bacon of Verulam says: Si quis eximium illum Jobi librum diligenter evolverit, plenum eum et tanquam gravidum naturalis philosophiæ mysteriis deprehendet. Kepler, after describing the Copernican system, expresses the hope of quite different cosmological discoveries, but non antea discenda quam librum hunc Deus arbiter seculorum recluserit mortalibus. Goldsmith derived the fundamental thought of his "Vicar of Wakefield" from this book. Fr. H. Jacobi says of it: Whether a history or a fiction, whoever thus wrote was a divine seer.

That such a master-piece of religious reflection and creative art, could belong to no other period than that of Solomon, might be assumed, were it not proven from every point of view. It belongs to the philosophical literature of Israel (cf. Delitzsch, Hohelied, p. 9; Bruch, Weisheitl. d.

Hebr., 1851; Oehler, Grundzüge d. alttest. Weish., 1854). As only a selection of Solomon's 3000 proverbs has reached us, so but a few works of Isr. philosophy have been preserved. The proverbs of Solomon in the book of Proverbs, and Canticles, represent the time of Solomon; the introductory proverbs (ch. 1-9) the later period of the kings; and Eccles. the post-exile period. In regard to contents, these portions exhibit a threefold progress, in form a threefold retrogression. In Solomon's time the maschil and hymn were in their highest bloom; in Prov. 1-9, already, the maschil is rhetorically analyzed, its uniformity of structure gone, and the richness of its strophic form has been diluted; in Eccles. the beauty of the old artistic form has vanished. The book of Job undoubtedly belongs to the first of these periods. On every page it bears traces of having proceeded from the gnosis of Solomon's time, as that issued from the faith of David's age. The frequent allusions to natural history, also, and indications of general knowledge, corroborate the view, that the book was the product of a period in Israel's history, when the nation, through traffic and intercourse with other people, had attained to such general intelligence. The characteristics of that period are reflected in the book.—This view is further confirmed by its doctrinal relation to the other canonical books, especially the thora (law). The Mosaic law by no means lays down the proposition: no suffering without the guilt of the sufferer, or, every affliction is a divine punishment of sin (cf. Deut. 8:2, 5). Had Job been an Israelite, the cases of Abel, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph, and of Israel itself, would have served to comfort him. This book, therefore, does not stand opposed to the thora, in this respect. Neither does the thora affirm that divine justice completes its work in this world already; it speaks expressly of a here and hereafter. All it needs is that its doctrine be developed. Such a carrying out of the doctrine we have in the book of Job (cf. 19:21-25, 26-29; and 17:16; 20:11; 21:26). The hope expressed by Job refers to a future state, beyond death, because: 1) the presumption is in favor of explaining "upon the earth" (v. 25 referring to the destruction named in v. 26), in accordance with the parallels, and not 41:25; 2) the plain sense of "after my skin," implies an incorporeal state, not mere emaciation; 3) taking the passage in connection with 14:13-15; 16:18-25, it seems proper that Job should now express the hope of justification even beyond the grave. But to assume that he referred to a resurrection of the body, conflicts with the grammatical construction of the passage (the second clause of v. 26 is not in apposition with the first), and with the import of the words used; for it is highly improbable that in using 'רָוַח he thought of a body decayed in death, and by 'גִּידָה designated a body risen and glorified; especially the ideas of infirmity and sinfulness were always associated in the O. T. with "flesh." It is not the hope of a bodily resurrection which Job here avows, but that of a future beholding of God, hence, by surmounting previous conceptions of Hades, that of a future life (see K. W. G. Köstlin, de immort. spe quæ in libro Jobi apparere dicitur., 1846). The drama concludes with showing that Job was rewarded here already for his unwavering love to God. But the result does not exceed the promise of the thora. Altogether the book of Job furnishes no other solution of the question, why the righteous often suffer, and the wicked prosper, than that given in Ps. 37; 38; and Jer. 12:1-3. In this respect the author of Eccles. occupies an advanced position, by referring to a final general judgment. To call the book of Job, therefore, the first and last theodicy, is going too far, for a full vindication of the justice of God is impossible, without a clear perception of a future state. But the prevailing representations of that state, found in this book, agree with those of the psalms of Solomon's time, and Solomon's proverbs; there is no corporeal life beyond the present, only an existence in sheol, as a shadow of our present life. This is a strong proof of the cotemporary relation of the book to those psalms and proverbs (Ps. 88:11, &c.). And yet it breathes out longings after a higher state, just as Ps. 17:15; 49:15, &c.—The relationship between this book (including Elihu's discourses) and Ps. 88, 89, is remarkably close. Heman and Ethan, the authors of those psalms, were not David's musicians of the same names, but contemporaries of Solomon (cf. 1 Kings 5:11). The resemblance is seen not only in words the last two used by no other O. T. writers), but in parallel verses (cf. Job 16:19, with Ps. 89:38; 7:7, with Ps. 89:48; 14:14, with Ps. 89:49; 14:10, with 88:5; 30:10, with 89:9; 31:34, with 89:8); here not the same expressions occur, as though the one quoted the other, but there is a resemblance which could not be incidental, but indicate a common philosophical relationship. Without, therefore, going so far as to attribute a common authorship (Heman) to the book of Job and these Psalms, we simply affirm our conviction that said book was written by one of the philosophic poets of Solomon's court, and one who had endured a spiritual experience resembling the sufferings described. (This is the result reached by Rosenmüller, Hävernick, Vaihinger, Hahn, Schlottman, Oehler, Keil, and Hoffmann).—The place where the book was written cannot be decided. But it is more than probable that the author had seen Egypt, from his precise allusions to Egyptian animals and mines (see Wilson, Lands of the Bible; Ritter, in Piper's Jahrb., 1852), though the mines may have been in Arabia or even Palestine; for the author mingles figures derived from Egypt (7:12; 9:26; possibly 3:14) with others that are Asiatic (3:8, &c.), and drawn illustrations from all foreign lands, East and West.

בְּעֵתִים אִמִּים אֲכַדִּין רַפְּאִים קִרְשִׁים

Of all other books of the O. T., that of Job has been the last to be fully understood. The Greek Fathers had to depend upon the LXX., without being able to compare that version with the primitive text; but all the defects of the LXX. abound threefold in its version of this book,—it omits whole verses, misplaces others, and supplies blanks with apocryphal additions. Origen knew this (ep. ad Afric. § 3, sq.), but had not sufficient knowledge of the Hebrew to correct the evil. And as the whole book can only be understood by ascertaining the sense of single parts, it was impossible for the Greek Fathers to master it. The enigmatical book engaged much attention; from the 2d century it was read (cf. James 5:11) during passion-week (see Harnack, Gottesd. d. kathol. Kirche, p. 358); but typology and allegory could not supply the lack of grammatico-historical exegesis. The Itala was more defective than the LXX. Jerome calls the book, in the Itala, decurtatus et laceratus corrosusque. His own independent translation was far in advance of his age, but he himself acknowledges its imperfection, in his account of the way in which he made it. He purchased, non parvis numis, a Jewish teacher of Lydda, then the seat of a Jewish academy, but after going through the book with this Jew, he confesses he was no wiser than before: cujus doctrina an aliquid profecerim nescio; hoc unum scio non potuisse me interpretari nisi quod antea intellexeram. Hence, as though he would accuse the book itself, he calls it obliquus, lubricus, figuratus, like an anguilla vel muræna. There were then three Latin versions of the book: the Itala, the Itala improved by Jerome, and Jerome's; and their disagreement caused much confusion, as Augustine complains. The Syrians were better off with their Peschito, rendered directly from the original text; but Ephraem's Comm. is like a sermon which departs far from the text, containing excellent thoughts, but not opening the sense. The following period furnished nothing better. Among its commentators we find great names: Gregory M., Bede Ven., Th. Aquinas, Albertus M., &c.; but no progress was made in the exposition of the book, for the means were wanting. A new era for it dawned toward the close of the middle ages, when Jewish converts gave impulse to the study of the Hebrew. Nich. de Lyra, author of the Postillæ perpetuæ in universa Biblia (completed 1330), possessed, for that period, a thorough knowledge of the original text, the necessity of which he felt, and regarded the literal sense as prerequisite to the discovery of every other. But he was too dependent on the rabbins, and hampered by the servile, unevangelical ecclesiasticism of his day. The breaking of these bonds ushered in the dawn of a true exegesis. Luther, Brentius, and other Reformers possessed peculiar qualifications for the study of the book. But even they had only presentiments of its import. Luther fully realized its difficulties. Though aided by Melancthon, and the Hebrew scholar, Aurogallus, it sometimes took them four days to get over as many lines. Jerome Weller, a man schooled in adversity, also acknowledged his inadequacy for the work, and was glad, after passing through 12 chapters, to leave the rest for others. The most comprehensive work of the Reformation on Job was Calvin's 150 sermons. The exegesis of the ante-rationalistic period surpassed the efforts of the Reformers only in philological learning; we mention Mercier and Cocceius of the Reformed Church, S. Schmid of the Lutheran C., and John de Pineda of the Romish C.; the Comm. of the last author (Madrid, 1597) is a very learned compilation, admired and used by Protestants, but excessively jealous for the Vulgate. In the apprehension of the fundamental truth of the book, however, the commentaries of the Reformers have not yet been surpassed.—A new epoch in its exposition began with the Comm. of Albert Schultens of Holland (2 vols., 1737); he first paid due attention to the Semitic and especially the Arabic peculiarities of the book. But in proportion as that which was Israelitish was considered in connection with its Orientalisms, was its divine excellency appreciated. Meanwhile this book suffered less from the perversions of rationalism than others; there were no miracles or prophecies in it, to be explained away. Indeed as it came to be regarded as a master-piece of poetry, the exposition of it was promoted by the translations and critical commentaries of an Eckermann, Moldenhauer, Stuhlmann, &c. What advantage the Church Fathers would have taken of such a translation as that of Böckel, or the Swiss layman (Noten z. hebr. Texte d. A. T. nebst einer Uebers. d. Buchs Hioba, Basel, 1841)! Rationalism paved the way for a new period in the ecclesiastical interpretation of the book of Job. The Comm. of Samuel Lee († Dec. 16, 1852, at Barley), Vaihinger (1842), Welte (1849), and v. Gerlach (in his Bibelwerk, Bd. 3. d. A. T.), Hahn (1850), and Schlottmann (1851), are the first fruits of this period, rendered possible by the antecedent works of Umbreit (1824, 1832), Ewald (1836, 1851), and Hirzel (1839, 2d ed. by Olshausen, 1852): the first of which is distinguished by its enthusiasm for the lofty poetry of the book, the second by a lively appreciation of its tragical character, and the third by its healthy skill and excellent method. The translation of Köster is valuable; he first directed attention to the strophic structure of Hebrew poetry, but started an error which still prevails, by making the Masoretic verse a constituent part of the strophe. The translation of Stöckel is also meritorious, although he fell into the opposite extreme from Köster. Sommer was the first to explain the strophic character of ancient Hebrew poetry, in his Biblical treatises (Abhandl., Bd. I., 1846), though he makes no special application to the book of Job. The book, including Elihu's discourses, is throughout strophic, though not in the way of a servile adherence to the form, at the sacrifice of truth, or the beauty of the dialogue.

F. DELITZSCH.*

Joel, the son of Pashuel, one of the oldest Israelitish prophets, prophesied in Judah and possibly in Jerusalem itself (1:13, &c.; 2:1, 9; 4:1, 6, 8, 18–20), upon the occasion of a devastation, drought, and plague of locusts. In 1:1–2:17, he describes the desolation (in which he sees a precursor of the day of the Lord), and then the destroyer himself, adding an earnest exhortation to general fasting and prayer. The exhortation seems to have proven effectual (2:18, &c.), and hence the encouraging promises which follow (3:1–2, cf. 2 Chron. 20:1–30). Having indicated the antecedent signs of the day of terror which should overtake the foes of Israel (3:3–5), he describes that day itself (4:1–17), and refers briefly to the Messianic blessings which should flow upon Judah and Jerusalem from the destruction of their enemies. — Ephraem Syrus, Jerome, &c., already, explained the locusts as a figure of future foes of the people of God, heathen forces, a view which Hengstenberg still vindicates (Christol., &c., 2d ed.), but abandoned by most modern commentators (Delitzsch, in Rudolb. and Gericke's Ztschr., 1851, p. 306, &c.; Keil, Einl. in d. kanon. Schr. d. A. T., 325, &c.). This view conflicts with the natural impression made by the first part of the book, in whole and in part, and with the relation between the first and second part; and it is not probable that Joel, on whose horizon the great oriental powers had not yet risen, should give such a description of foes, especially as he would then repeat it in a symbolical form. There is no trace in 2: 1, &c., of anything that does not correspond with a literal sense. — The second point disputed is the period of Joel. Credner, Meier, Hitzig, Ewald, Hofmann, Delitzsch, Keil, &c., hold that he lived under Joah, 870–850 B. C.: Hengstenberg, De Wette, Knobel, &c., under Uzziah or Jeroboam II., c. 800 B. C. Hofmann (Weiss. u. Erfüll., I., 201; Schriftbew., II., 1, p. 86, &c.; 2, 491, &c.) and Delitzsch place him 20–30 years later than Obadiah. The external proof of this (his not mentioning the Syrian invasion, 2 Kings 12: 17; 2 Chron. 24: 23, &c.) is not conclusive, but the view is supported by the character of the whole book. Not only is no mention made of the Assyrians, but none of those sins of the nation which God punished by the Assyrian inroads, and which Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah rebuke. A better spirit still prevailed; the people listen to the warnings of the prophets, and repent. It is remarkable that Joel (4: 1–3) speaks of the impending dispersion of Israel, and division of the holy land, which was to precede the day of judgment upon the heathen, as something well known. This would seem to imply a later period for his prophecy. It only proves, however, how deeply the mind of the nation was impressed with the fundamental truths of the songs of Moses (Deut 32. Comp. Joel 4: 21, with Deut 32: 43). — The leading truths with which Joel enriched the treasures of Messianic prophecy, are the outpouring of the Holy Spirit and the definite allusion to the day of the Lord. — Ewald praises the fluent style of Joel, considering the depth and fulness of thought found in the book, and Umbreit the calm reflection which he combines with vividness of description. His vivid poetical delineation of the desolation of the land, and graphic description of the locusts, have been much admired. Still more impressive are his touching complaint and call to repentance, and his grand description of the holy war and judgment of God (4: 9, &c.).

AUBERLEN.*

John, the Apostle, and his writings. The most prominent of the apostles of our Lord, are John, Peter, and Paul. As compared with Peter, John is of a quiet, thoughtful, and receptive disposition; every word of his beloved Master he seizes, holds fast, and reflects upon; being happy in losing himself in the contemplation of the glory of the Son of Man, and in the experience of His love. The quiet peculiar majesty and glory of Christ, as they are represented in the Gospel of John, were certainly not hidden from the other disciples; but he alone, on account of his disposition, was able to reproduce them. He possessed the nature of a living mirror, which not only received the full glory of the Lord, but was also able to reflect it. The other writers of the gospels have preserved of the acts and words of Christ, what momentarily produced the greatest effect, externally viewed, as the sermon on the mount, etc. But John discovered a glory in things to them unimportant, as the conversation with the Samaritan woman, etc., and he was able, on account of his receptive disposition, to retain and faithfully reproduce them.

On the other hand, Paul more resembles John in inwardness, than Peter does, but it is a different kind of inwardness; Paul's being dialectic, John's purely contemplative. Paul looks more at the appropriation of salvation, John at the founder of salvation; Paul at conversion, John at the fullness of life in Christ. Hence, Paul is a much milder character than the ἁγίος (Mark 3: 17) John. It is true, John has often been called "the apostle of love," because the word, ἀγάπη, is often found in his writings. But this word occurs at least as frequently in the writings of Paul, and is used by him in its relation to faith as its fruit, whilst it is used by John in contrast with hatred and wickedness. On the other hand, the passage, Luke 9: 51, sq., by no means justifies the inference, that he was of a violent temperament (Lücke, I., p. 16). He was much rather what the French expressed by the words: il est entier; he had no sense, no capacity for what was relative or mediating, and he was not, therefore, a man of accommodating, or conciliatory disposition. He was a man who is what he is, entirely and thoroughly, who could only have been thoroughly Christian or thoroughly Satanic. In him grace obtained a quite permanent and decided victory over natural depravity. He was trained piously from early youth by his mother, Salome, who (Mark 16: 1; Matt. 20: 20) belonged to the number of those who found their comfort in the promises of the old covenant, and longed for the Messiah. John was trained up by her in the fear of God, and in the hope of the salvation of Israel. So soon as the Baptist appeared, John connected himself with him, with all the energy of his receptive disposition. The Baptist, who was to prepare all for Christ, was specially adapted to prepare the ἐπισκοπὸς τοῦ κόσμου, as the instrument who would be able to catch all the rays from Christ's person. None of the other disciples apprehended the substance of the Baptist's preaching (John 1: 26–36) so clearly and energetically as John. The other Gospels have reported concerning the preaching of the Baptist, and only quite briefly added the notice, that he also pointed to the coming Messiah. But it is just this latter matter, that John has apprehended as the centre of the Baptist's labors, and has preserved the prophetic discourses of the same concerning the nature and sufferings of Christ, which the others have not done.

John connected himself with Christ with equal decision and absoluteness, so soon as the Bapist pointed to him (John 1:35, sq.). This resoluteness exhibits itself also in his temper, so far as it was not yet entirely sanctified, or still under the influence of erroneous views. When the inhabitants of a Samaritan village would not receive Jesus, he asks, whether He would not command fire to come down from heaven and consume them. According to his temper and temperament he is everywhere and always receptive, not forward, not officious, but reserved, expectant, observant, and docile. But he is at the same time determined and decided. He is of a yielding disposition, but he yields only to one thing, unto this entirely and unconditionally. And because he is of such a yielding disposition, he needed this decidedness.

The same decision of character, the same incapacity to tolerate what is relative and to be in suspense, exhibits itself also in his view of salvation. Paul regards this as something progressive, as a contest between the old and new man; John as the already completed victory of light over darkness. Whosoever is born of God, he is light, and has the life, and does not sin. Paul speaks of sin as a weakness; John, although he well knew it as such (1 John 1:8, sq.; 2:1), treats more of sin as wickedness. He knew, also, that the victory of light over darkness is only won by apparent subjection and destruction, as was the case with Christ, who through death overcame death, so also in each individual and in the whole of believers (Rev. 2:8, sq.; 7:14; 20:4). But he also viewed this victory, although as regards time still future, as decided from eternity (comp. 1 John 4:4; 5:4, and 3:6 and 9). For John only two states of the heart were possible: for and against; and he does not bring into view the circumstances attending the transition from the one to the other. Such a temper, sanctified by grace, would never have been able to win the heathen world for Christ: John could never have done the work which Paul did, by being a Jew to the Jews, and a heathen to the heathen. But still such a person, as John was, was necessary to preserve pure and to purify the Church. This was his high mission; he was as well a messenger of the Judge as of the Saviour, was called by the Spirit to prophesy of judgment and to offer salvation. He was to complete the doctrines of the other apostles, and thus perfect the διδασχὴ τῶν ἀποστόλων. He had to purify the Church from primitive pollutions, and to judge rising Gnosticism. He had to judge for all coming time the abomination of anti-Christianism, in that he was called to present in the Apocalypse an external criterion of what was Christian and what anti-Christian. In short: his relation to Christ was thoroughly feminine and receptive, but being filled by Christ, his relation to everything anti-Christian was thoroughly masculine, and as a raging fire. An ancient hymn admirably describes his character in the words: volat avis sine meta, &c.

The apostolic labors of John, during the first thirty years after the ascension of the Lord, were, in conformity with his personal peculiarity, quiet and retired. He was the only disciple who did not forsake the Lord at his crucifixion, but remained fearless at the cross. After the resurrection, John remained with the other disciples at Jerusalem, without, however, being prominent among the apostles. If we had not Gal. 2:9, we would not even know that John, in connection with Peter and James, was greatly respected by the Church. His labors during this period were hidden from the public eye, and had more to do with the edification of established congregations than with the conversion of Jews or Greeks. It is difficult to say how long he remained in Jerusalem. When the persecution recorded, Acts 8:1, took place, he, with the other apostles, remained in Jerusalem. But when Paul, three years after his conversion, came to Jerusalem (Gal. 1:18, sq.), in the year 40 ær. Dion., he only met there with Peter and James. From this, however, it does follow, that the other apostles had then already finally left Jerusalem, for in the year 51 (Acts 15) they are all again there. Seven years later, however, in 58 (Acts 21:18), only James and the πρεσβύτεροι are there. The dispersion or departure of the other apostles seems to have taken place in the interval between 51 and 58. An ancient tradition (Clem. Alex. Strom., VI., 5) reports of John, that he left Jerusalem twelve years after the death of Christ (45 ær. Dion.). In any case, he did not then go immediately to Ephesus, where unanimous tradition places him at the end of his life. Particular accounts of his residence in the interval are altogether wanting. The tradition that he went to Parthia is as groundless as that according to which he preached in India. The strongest probability favors the opinion that he went to Antioch when Paul departed on his first missionary journey (46 ær. Dion.), in order that he might fill the vacancy made by the departure of Paul. This much, however, is certain, that John became later, but certainly much later, the successor of Paul at Ephesus. In any case, this took place only at the death of Paul (64 ær. Dion.), or afterwards: for Paul makes no mention anywhere of John being there. But that he subsequently directed from Ephesus the churches in Asia Minor is the unanimous tradition of the Church Fathers. Polycrates, a bishop of Ephesus in the 2d cent., says, in a letter to Victor of Rome, concerning John: οὗτος ἐν Ἐφέσῳ κακοίμηται. Irenæus (hær., III., 3, 4, in Eus., IV., 14, comp. Eus., III., 23) says: ἀλλὰ καὶ ἡ ἐν Ἐφέσῳ ἐκκλησία, ὑπο Παύλου μὲν τεδεμελιωμένη. Ἰωάννου δὲ παραμεινάντος αὐτοῖς μέχρι τοῦ Τραϊανοῦ χρόνων μάρτυς ἀληθῆς ἐστὶ τῆς ἀποστόλων παραδωσιως (Trajan reigned 98–117). Irenæus also says (II., 22, 5, Grabe, 162), that John lived and labored with a circle of disciples μέχρι τῶν Τραϊανοῦ χρόνων in Asia (proconsular Asia, of which Ephesus was the chief city). Irenæus is here a witness so much the more reliable, because one of these disciples of John, the martyr Polycarp, had been his teacher and spiritual father (Iren., III., 3; Eus., V., 20 and 24). Ignatius of Antioch and Papias were also among the disciples of the aged John (Eus., III., 22; Iren. in Eus., III., 39). Jerome (vir. ill., 9) places the death of John 68 years after the death of Christ, consequently in the year 101 ær. Dion., Eusebius in the year 100.

Moreover, tradition is unanimous, that John was banished to the island of Patmos for a time by a Roman τύραννος. Clemens of Alexandria (quis div. salv., cp. 42) relates the beautiful story of the recovery of a youth who had fallen among robbers by John as a μῦθος οὐ μῦθος, and fixes the time thus: ἐπειδὴ τοῦ τυραννοῦ τελευτήσαντος ἀπὸ τῆς Πατμοῦ τῆς νήσου μετήλθεν εἰς τὴν Ἐφεσον. He speaks here of the exile on Patmos as something known to his readers and to all the world. Origen also relates (on Matt., III., p. 720): ὁ δὲ Ῥωμαίων βασιλεὺς ὡς παραδοσὶς διδάσκει πακιδίχασε τὸν Ἰωάννην μαρτυροῦντα διὰ τὸν τῆς ἀληθείας λόγον, εἰς Πατμον τὴν νήσον. Only after this does he cite Rev. 1:9. Tertullian (præscr. hæc., cp. 36) called the Roman Church happy where Paul was beheaded, and from whence John, after being wonderfully delivered out of a cauldron of boiling oil (comp. Acts 14:20; 28:5; Mark 16:18), was banished to Patmos. Irenæus (in Eus., III., 18) says definitely, that John was banished to Patmos under Domitian. Even cotemporaneous heathen writers have not omitted to relate (according to Eus., l.c.), τὸν τε διωγμὸν καὶ τὰ ἐν αὐτῷ μαρτύρια, αἵ γε καὶ τὸν καιρὸν ἐπ' ἀκριβεῖς ἐπισημῆσαντο, viz., the fifteenth year of Domitian (95-96 ær. Dion.). The year following, upon the advent of Nerva, he was permitted to return to Ephesus.

If we pass now to the literary labors of the Apostle John, we find them divided into two chief parts; the one part consisting of the Gospel together with the first epistle, which is closely related to it, the other consisting of the book of Revelation. Beginning with the Gospel we remark, that at the first glance we see that it is different from the other three gospels, as well in regard to chronological order as to the selection of matter. In regard to the latter, John, as is known, has much that is peculiar and new, and he only agrees with the others in a few sections (1:21-27; 6:5-21; 12:1-15, and the chief points of the history of Christ's sufferings). By omitting the history of Christ's birth he differs from Matthew and Luke; the accounts of the festival-journies are peculiar to him. That, therefore, in regard to matter he completed the other gospels, is a simple fact, and the question, whether he intended to do so admits of no doubt. But he also completes the other gospels in another and deeper reference. First, he alone has preserved the utterances of our Lord concerning His eternal relation to the Father and His eternal oneness of essence with the Father (3:13 and 17, sq.; 5:17, sq.; 6:33 and 51; 7:16 and 28, sq.; 8:58, &c.). Secondly, he has preserved and recorded the utterances of our Lord concerning the mystical life-union and communion, which exists between Him and believers (3:8; 6; 14:16, sq.; 15:1, sq.; 17:21-23). That John thus completed the image of Christ and of his doctrine given in the other gospels, resulted not merely from his individuality and personal peculiarity, but also from a need then existing in the Church.

It is well known, that at this early period Gnosticism arose in the Church, a heathen speculation, which as represented by Cerinthus, with whom John came in contact, taught, that the world was not created by God, but by a power far removed from God; that Jesus was a son of Joseph and Mary; the æon Christ was united with him at baptism, but that previous to his sufferings the Christ departed from him, and only the man Jesus suffered. Against this form of heresy John had to contend, and that he did so designedly in his gospel, is apparent from a careful comparison of the doctrines of Cerinthus with John, 1:3 and 14 and 33-34 and 49; 3:13, 14; 5:23 and 26; 6:51 and 62; 8:58; 13:23, sq.; 17:1, 2 and 16 and 19; 18:6 and 11 and 37. The whole plan of his gospel was constructed, as he himself says, chapter 20:31, "that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God," — in other words, to refute Gnostic heresy. This plan made it necessary that he should observe a more strictly chronological order than was necessary in the other gospels.

The first epistle is closely related to the Gospel in language, style, tone, ideas, and manner of expression; especially remarkable, as proving this relation, is chap. 2:12-13, where he six times repeats the object for which he writes and has written, although he has as yet written nothing important. For chap. 1:1, sq., simply announces that that which was from the beginning, which he had heard, and seen, and handled of the word of life, he declared unto them. But we look in vain in this epistle for a declaration of that which he saw and handled. Immediately, in verse 4, he gives us the contents of his message, "that God is light," and connects practical inferences with it. Then begins the second chapter, in which he again explains the reason why he writes and why he wrote. From this internal evidence we are almost involuntarily forced to the conclusion, that this first epistle was written to accompany the Gospel, presupposing its existence in the hands of those to whom this is addressed. But whether this be so or not, it is evident from chap. 4:2, sq., that the Apostle had to contend with such as denied that Jesus was the Christ. And to lead to faith in Christ, the Son of God, he wrote his gospel (John 20:31).

As a separate article will treat of the book of Revelation, we will pass it by here without any further notice.

Thus the life, labors, and writings of the Apostle John present themselves as an organic and harmonious unity. In this congruence and harmony exists a proof for the genuineness of the three-named Johannean writings, which is stronger and more convincing, than any analytical and critical proofs could be. The external proofs also for the age and genuineness of these writings are stronger than those in favor of any other book of antiquity.

The evidences for the genuineness of the Gospel and of the first epistle are decisive. As the writer calls himself an eyewitness of the life of Christ (1:14, comp. 1 John 1:1), we have to choose between genuineness and wilful and conscious fraud. If we consider in addition, that the author everywhere seems intentionally to avoid naming the sons of Zebedee (1:35, 42; 13:23; 18:15; 19:26; 20:2), that he constantly designates himself as "the disciple whom Jesus loved," that whilst he always distinguishes between the two Judas' (12: 4; 13: 26; 14: 22), and always gives Thomas his surname (11: 16; 20: 24; 21: 2), on the contrary, always calling John the Baptist only Ἰωάννης—all this explains itself on the supposition that John himself was the writer.

With this indirect evidence of the gospel is connected a strong, unbroken chain of external evidences (Comp. Ebrard's Krit. der ev. Gesch., § 139). Already, at the time when it was not the custom to quote the writings of the N. T. by giving their titles and authors, we find a mass of undeniable reminiscences out of John. When Ignatius (Philad., 7) says abruptly of "the spirit of God": ὁ δὲν γὰρ πόθεν ἐρχεται καὶ ποῦ ἐπάγει, it only has a meaning when viewed as referring to John 3: 8. Such reference he also has (Philad., 9, Rom. 7) when he calls Christ "the door of the Father," "the bread of heaven." Polycarp (Phil., 7) quotes literally the passage, 1 John 4: 2, sq. Justin Martyr is entirely penetrated with Johannean thoughts and ideas; he calls Christ the ζῶν ὕδωρ, the λογος τοῦ θεοῦ, the μετανοήσις, speaks of his σάρκοποιήθηαι, of regeneration (comp. Otto, de Justin Martyris scriptis et doctrina, Jena, 1841), and refers here and there to single passages of the gospel (especially to John 14: 2, 3).

Marcion's opposition to the gospel of John (Tert. adv. Marc., VI., 3) shows that then it was acknowledged by the Church as genuine and canonical. Valentinus does not attempt to question its genuineness, but attempts to support his Gnostic system by allegorical interpretations of this gospel (Tert. de præser. hæc., 38; Iren., III., 11, 7), and his disciple Heracleon even wrote a commentary on this gospel in this sense, of which Origen has preserved numerous fragments (Iren. opp. ed. Massuet., Paris, 1710, tom. I., p. 362-378). Theodotus cites the passages, John 1: 9; 6: 51; 8: 56, et al. Ptolemæus (Ad. Floram) the passage, John 1: 3. That the Montanists acknowledged this gospel as apostolic, follows from the fact, that Tatian not only quotes John 1: 3, 5, literally, but he also made a harmony (Diatessaron) of the four canonical gospels (Eus., IV., 29; Epiph. hæc. 46), which (according to the testimony of Barsalibi, who had the same before him in a Syrian translation) commenced with John 1: 1, sq. Theophilus of Antioch (about 169) wrote a commentary on the four canonical gospels, which Jerome (cp. 53, vir. ill., 25) himself read.

The heathen Celsus also was acquainted with the four gospels, and (II., 59) mentions the exhibition of the marks of the nails on Jesus, which only John reports.

Connected herewith are three proofs more. First, the testimony of Hippolytus in the work περὶ πασῶν αἵρεσεων, found on Mount Athos, edited by Miller, critically examined by Bunsen, and acknowledged by him, Gieseler, et al., to have been written by Hippolytus. Second, the celebrated fragment of Apolinarius, in which he says against the Quartodecimarians: καὶ λεγούσιν, ὅτι τῇ ἰδ' τὸ πρόβατον μετὰ τῶν μαθητῶν ἔφαγεν ὁ κύριος τῇ δε μεγάλῃ ἡμέρᾳ τῶν ἀζύμων αὐτοὺς ἑπαθεῖν, καὶ διηγούνται Ματθαῖος αὐτῷ λέγειν ὡς νενοήκασιν. ὁ δὲν ἀσύμφωνός τε νόμος ἢ νοήσις αὐτῶν, καὶ στασιαζέτω δοκεῖ κατ' αὐτοὺς τὰ εὐαγγέλια. The gospels, which seem to oppose and contradict each other, can only be the first three on the one hand, and that of John on the other—a proof that in the second half of the second century the gospel of John was spread throughout the whole Christian Church, and was received as genuine and canonical. Thirdly, Papias, already (Eus., III., 39), was acquainted with and cited the first epistle of John (κεχρηται δ' ὁ αὐτὸς μαρτυρίας ἀπὸ τῆς προτέρας Ἰωάννου ἐπιστολῆς).

These facts, taken collectively, overthrow the supposition that the gospel of John was composed by an imposter after the death of John, in the second century. Already, fifty or sixty years after the death of John, do we find this gospel the acknowledged and precious common possession of Christendom, and the sacredness and apostolic authority of the Johannean writings are asserted by none with more energy than by the circle which formed itself around the apostle and under his influence, of whom Polycarp and Irenæus are the most prominent.

It was reserved for later times and for rationalistic criticism to attack the age and genuineness of the Johannean writings. But up to this time they have come triumphantly out of these critical contests. The attacks of Evanson (Dissonance of the four generally received Evangelists, 1792), Eckermann (theol. Beitr., 1795), Schmidt (Bibl. für Krit. u. Exegese, II., 1) were triumphantly repelled by Priestley (Letters to a Young Man), Simpson (an essay on the authenticity, &c., 1793), Storr and Süsskind—the attack of the frivolous Vogel (der Evst. Joh. vor dem jüngsten Gericht, 1801) by Süsskind and Schlecker, the attacks of Horst, Chudius, and Ballenstedt by Süsskind, Nöldecke, Wegscheider, Eichhorn, et al. Bretschneider himself recalled his objections (in Tzschirner's Predigermag., II., 2, p. 154, sq.) after the replies of Stein, Usteri, Hensen, Crome, and Rettberg. After that, in later times, Weisse and Schweizer attacked simply the integrity instead of the authenticity of the gospel of John, Lützelberger (die kirchliche Tradition über den Apostel Johannis und seine Schriften., Leipzig, 1840) and Schweigler (über den Montanismus und die christliche Kirche des 2. Jahrhunderts., Tüb., 1841), seconded by Baur and Zeller, they only furnished the evidence, that, in order successfully to dispute the genuineness of the gospel of John, it is necessary first to reject the entire history of the Church and of the literature of the first two Christian centuries.

That the two other epistles, the second and third, were only admitted into the pericopes (canones) of parts of the early Church, is explained by their individual and occasional contents. They appear as "ἀποκρυφόμενα." This circumstance does not at once tell against their genuineness. But since the author calls himself "ὁ πρεσβύτερος," and since there was another John besides the Apostle John, who was known by the name ὁ πρεσβύτερος (Papias in Eus., III., 39; Dionysius in Eus., VII., 25), the supposition is probable, that these two epistles belong to him, as was already thought by many in the early Church (Eus., III., 25: καὶ ἡ ονομαζομένη δευτέρα καὶ τρίτη Ἰωάννου, ἢ τοῦ εὐαγγελιστοῦ τογχανουρα, ἢ τοῦ ἐτέρου ομωνύμου ἱερέως). The similarity of style asserted by many as existing between these two epistles and the first, does not decide against the supposition; for they reduce themselves to three quotations from 1 John (2 John 5-6, comp. with 1 John 5:3; 2 John 7, comp. with 1 John 4:1, sq.; 3 John 11, comp. with 1 John 3:6) which are quite similar to the quotations from the epistles of Paul (2 John 3 and 8, and 3 John 6, 7, 8, 15), and these quotations are only new proofs for the genuineness and age of the first epistle. That the Apostle John should have experienced an opposition (not of doctrine, but of authority) such as is described, 3 John 9, is certainly not probable, whilst as shown towards the presbyter John it exhibits nothing very remarkable. The supposition, therefore, that the second and third epistles were written by the presbyter John still commends itself as the most probable.

As thus these two epistles contain an ancient testimony for the genuineness of the first epistle, as also of the gospel (comp. 3 John 12, with John 19:35), so does the appendix of the gospel (John 21) contain a similar proof. This chapter, according to verse 24, as also according to the style and treatment, was written by the Apostle John, who, however, did not append it immediately to his gospel. Only after he had received the Revelation, and it became thereby evident, what the Lord meant by the words: "If I will that he tarry till I come," was it added, without doubt, by the presbyter John (comp. John 21:24, with 3 John 12). And as this chap. 21 is not wanting in any MS., it must have been added shortly after the writing of the gospel, and in any case before it was widely circulated beyond Ephesus. DR. EBRARD.—Beck.

John of Avila (Juan de Avila), the apostle of Andalusia, in the 16th cent., was born about 1500, at Almodovar del Lampo, in the diocese of Toledo. His father sent him at the age of 14 years to Salamanca, to pursue the study of law; but as this was repugnant to his taste, he soon returned to his paternal home, and spent three years in rigorous ascetic exercises. Upon the advice of a Franciscan, his parents gave him permission to study philosophy and theology at Alcala de Henares, where Domingo de Soto became both his teacher and friend. He had not yet finished his course, when his parents died; and John, after taking orders, would have gone as a missionary to India, had not the Archbishop of Sevilla prevailed upon him to devote his energies to his own country. John now commenced preaching, in strains of fiery eloquence, in the whole province, and attracted large crowds. His popularity drew upon him the ill-will of the envious, and upon the trivial charge that he unduly exaggerated the dangers of wealth, so as to bar the gates of heaven to the rich, he was imprisoned by the Inquisition. His misfortunes did not shake his trust in God, and after his release he resumed his task, first in Andalusia, and afterwards in other parts of Spain. His sermons were composed in a figurative style, and mainly devoted to the glorification of St. Mary. We have of him: Sermones del santissimo sacramento, de la incarnacion del Hijo de Dios, del espiritu santo, las festividades de la santissima virgen Maria. To the high dignities that were offered to him, including that of Cardinal, he preferred the life of an itinerant missionary. At the same time he spared no efforts to establish schools and seminaries, without which he knew his preaching would have no permanent effect on the morals of the people. Thus were founded the schools in Sevilla, Ubeda, Baeza, Granada, Cordova, and Montilla. A disease which afflicted him the last twenty years of his life, confined him to Montilla, and there he was visited by many who chose him their spiritual guide, such as John of Gott, founder of the Charity friars, Francis Borgia, Lewis of Granada, the Dominican. In this retirement he composed his "Epistolario espiritual." He died May 10, 1569. His life has been written by Luis de Granada (comp. Obras del V. P. M. Luis de Granada, T. III., p. 451-456), also by Luis Munoz (Vida del Ven. Varon el Maestro Juan de Avila), and by Antoni de Capmany (Teatro historico de la elocuencia española). Comp. J. Shermer, sämtliche Werke des ehrwürdigen Juan de Avila, etc., Regensburg, 1856.

WAGENMANN.—Seidensticker.

John the Baptist, the son of Zacharias, the priest, and Elizabeth, a relative of the mother of Jesus, was born six months before Jesus, in the latter half of 749 (of Rome), in the mountains of Judea; Rabbinical tradition assigns Hebron, recent authors Jutta, as the place of his birth (Luke 1:5, &c.; 26:36, 39). His birth and mission were announced and foretold by Gabriel (Luke 1). After spending a season of preparation for his great work in adjacent desert places (Luke 1:80; 3:1), he publicly entered upon his mission about the midsummer of 779, preaching repentance, and declaring that the Messianic kingdom was at hand (Luke 3:1-3; 3:23; Matth. 3:1-4; Mark 1:4-6, cf. Matth. 11:19; Luke 7:23).—In opposition to the deadness and self-righteous formalism of the Judaism of that period, we discover in John a personal realization and self-conscious completion of the O. T. legal economy, as this leads men, through repentance, to God, and yet, from its inability to secure true peace, leans upon a prophecy of the fulness of time as its divine complement. Hence, the central theme of John's preaching: "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand," was directed most earnestly against the leaders of the people, and enforced by solemn threatenings. That, however, which gave such force to this summons, as no previous prophet's appeal possessed, was the prophetic certainty of the Messiah's nearness. Whether he baptized from the commencement of his ministry cannot be determined (Luke 3:1, 2), but he soon employed the customary lustration, though in a manner peculiar to himself, and required those who obeyed his call to be baptized in Jordan, as a symbol of their confession of the necessity of penitent conversion. It was a baptism of repentance, for the remission of sins (Luke 3:3; Acts 13:34; 19:4; Matth. 3:11), in distinction from Christ's baptism with the spirit and with fire (Mark 1:8; Luke 3:16; John 1:26). Though no proper sacrament, and therefore inadequate to the mediation of the grace promised in Christ, it was still, as an institution for the whole nation, nothing less than a bold declaration of general postacy from the divine basis of genuine Israelism, as an individual act, the solemn acknowledgment of personal guilt (Matth. 3:6; Mark 1:5), and, as a transaction of the Baptist, the symbolical enactment of the purity necessary to admission into the state of one expecting, and entitled to expect Christ and his salvation.—Such a preacher, in such circumstances, could not fail to produce great agitation. In consequence of the numbers he baptized, he was called the Baptist (Jos. Antt. XVIII., 5, 2). Crowds thronged around him from Jerusalem, Judea, and Perea, including many Pharisees and Sadducees (Matth. 3:5–7; 11:7, &c.). At first some thought he was the Christ (Luke 3:15), but afterwards he was regarded as a prophet (Matth. 11:9; 21:26; Mark 11:32; John 1:15; 5:33; Acts 13:25), and even after his death he was thought to have revived again in Christ (Matth. 14:1, &c.; 16:14; John 10:41). The Sanhedrim could, therefore, not let him pass unnoticed; and although he did not appeal to a higher authority, when the priests and Levites demanded his credentials, he plainly assured them that he would not desist from his work (John 1:19–28).—Meanwhile, Jesus (see Jesus Christ) also presented himself for baptism, and John became assured not only that the Christ was already in the midst of the people, but that Jesus was he (Matth. 3:13–17; Mark 1:9–12; Luke 3:21, &c.; John 1:32–4). Although they personally knew each other before, yet this was John's first knowledge of Jesus as the Messiah (John 1:31, 33).—The idea which John had prophetically of the person and work of the Messiah, could, of course, only be relatively more definite than that of earlier prophets, since he also had to do with one specifically greater than himself, the full revelation and development of whose character was still future. As John significantly called himself a voice (Is. 40:3), so he ever considered himself the forerunner of one mightier and worthier than himself, whom he set forth as the true founder of the kingdom of God (Matth. 3:11; Luke 3:16; John 1:2; 3:28). Indeed, in John 1:15, 27, 30, 34 (cf. Micah 5:2; Mal. 3:1), the Baptist avows Christ's pre-existence, calls him ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ, and then "the lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world." Unenviably he yielded to Christ's superiority, and rejoiced in the growing brightness of the risen morning star (John 3:22–36).—When Jesus first entered upon his ministry (John 2:13, &c.), he labored for a season simultaneously with the Baptist, who gradually ascended the Jordan. John probably penetrated into the domain of Herod Antipas, and even into Samaria (John 1:28; 3:23; 10:40). That he should continue his labors after becoming convinced that Jesus was the Messiah, and should retain a circle of disciples and assistants (John 3:25; Matth. 9:14; Luke 11:1) is explained by the fact, that this fully comported with his mission as Christ's forerunner. The nation could only be successively reached by such a continued prosecution of his work. How long, precisely, he thus labored cannot be said, but hardly for more than two years. He then incurred the displeasure of Herod Antipas, and after about six months' imprisonment (Josephus says in Machabrus), he was beheaded (Matth. 14:3, &c.; Mark 6:17, &c.; Luke 3:19, &c.; Jos., Antt., XVIII., 5, 2). It was during his imprisonment, that he sent messengers to Christ with the remarkable inquiry reported in Matth. 14:2, and Luke 7:19, a question asked, not because his previous convictions were theoretically shaken, but because, amid the gloom of his incarceration, the course which Jesus was pursuing did not seem to answer his own views and expectations (Matth. 3:12; 11:4–6). His execution occurred shortly before the miracle recorded, Matth. 14:13, &c., near the close of Christ's first journey into Galilee, and so, probably, between the feasts of Purim and the Passover of 782 (cf. John 5:35; 6:4).—Jesus himself has fully characterized John as a burning and shining light, which suddenly attracted general attention (John 5:33, 35), calls him the Elias who was to come (Mal. 1:23; John 1:21; Luke 1:17; 9:19), the greatest among those till then born of women, and more than a prophet, although the least in the kingdom of heaven was greater than he (Matth. 11:7, &c.). All previous prophecy, pointing beyond itself, reached its all-comprehending climax in John. Hence he ever remains, for each individual, the necessary transition to membership in the kingdom of heaven, though he himself did not attain to this high privilege. He was a friend of the bridegroom, but as the marriage was not yet consummated, he could not be a guest (John 3:29; 9:14; Mark 2:18; Luke 5:33). But he faithfully performed his work of urging others to the wedding, and if his nation disregarded his message, the fault lay not with him (Matth. 11:16, &c.). His disciples informed Jesus of his death (Matth. 14:12). But they had been previously jealous of the greater success of Jesus (John 3:25, &c.), and some of them, at least, in opposition to the spirit inculcated by John, maintained a separate society after their master's martyrdom (Acts 18:15; 19:1, &c. See Johnites).—(See WITSII, miscell. sacr., II., 367, &c.; WINER, R. W. B.; WIESELER, synopt. chronol.; LICHTENSTEIN, Lebensgesch. d. Herrn Jesu C. in chronol. Uebersicht., Erlng. 1856). GÜDER.*

John Buridanus, born at Bethune, in Artois, a noted philosopher of the 14th century, attached to the sect of Nominalists, was a pupil of Occam, and a member of the philosophical Faculty at Paris, where he was highly appreciated as a teacher. Little that is reliable is known of his life. It is said that he flourished under Philip of Valois about 1348; according to others, was, as early as 1320 or 1327, rector of the University at Paris, went as ambassador to Rome, quitted Paris when the Realists became dominant, and, having emigrated to Germany, assisted in founding the University at Vienna. As he is classed rather with philosophers than with theologians, we cannot here expatiate on his doctrines. With Durandus and Occam, he belongs to that period of scholasticism, in which the union of philosophy with theology commenced to relax. Like Duns Scotus he treated not only logical and metaphysical, but also ethical and psychological questions, and was particularly interested in the problem of free-will. To the latter he owes his celebrity; he was, however, not so much concerned to arrive at a definite conclusion with regard to this problem, as to show the difficulties incident to its theoretical solution (utrum sit possibile, quod voluntas ceteris omnibus eodem modo se habentibus, determinetur aliquando ad unum oppositorum aliquando ad aliud?). He finally falls back on the requirements of practical life, and shields himself by theological and philosophical authorities, "Nullus debet de via communi recedere propter rationes sibi insolubiles, specialiter in his, quæ fidem tangere possunt aut mores. Qui enim credit omnia scire et in nulla opinionum suarum decipi, futuus est." For an illustration of this problem B. devised the famous simile of a hungry ass, who, standing between two bundles of hay, must either starve or, without a determining reason, decide for one or the other bundle (Comp. Spinoza, Eth. II., p. 49, schol.). It is, however, not certain that this is actually the origin of the proverbial phrase "Buridan's ass" (see Bayle's Dictionary). B. wrote Commentaries on Aristotle's Politics, Ethics, Physics, Metaphysics, and Logic, also a book, "super summas," a manual of philosophy, it would seem. Complete ed. of his works: Paris, 1500, 1516, 1518; of the Comm. on Ethics and Politics, at Oxford, 1637 and '40; on Logic and Metaphysics, London, 1641. See FABRICIUS, bibl. lat. med. ævi; Jöcher, Gel. Lex.; Bayle, Dict. I., p. 708, sqq.; Tennemann, Gesch. der Phil., Bd. VIII.; Ritter, Gesch. der chr. Ph., IV. p. 604, sqq. WAGENMANN.—Seidensticker.

John Damascenus, called by the Arabs, Mansur, which the Greeks translate μακρομύνης, and by the Church, on account of his eloquence, Χρυσορροίας, was one of the latest eminent Fathers of the old Greek Church. We have little reliable information concerning his life, for which the legendary biography by John, Patriarch of Jerusalem, is the principal source. He was born towards the end of the 7th, according to others, in the beginning of the 8th century, in Damascus, subject, at that time, to the Saracens. His father, Sergius, a high functionary (διοικητής τῶν πραγμάτων δημοσίων) in the service of the Caliph Abdelmalek, engaged a learned monk, Kosmos, to instruct his son in philosophy, languages, mathematics, and theology. After his father's death, says his biographer, he was himself appointed to an important office; but a letter, forged by Leo Isauricus, who hated him for his attachment to image-worship, made him appear guilty of treasonable correspondence with the emperor, and the revengeful caliph punished him with the loss of his right hand. Addressing his prayers to the Holy Virgin, and vowing to her and to her Son his life, the severed member was miraculously rejoined to the mutilated arm. He renounced henceforth all worldly pursuits, and declined the offices which the caliph, convinced of his innocence, proffered to him. The facts of the case may have been, that the machinations of Leo Iconoclastes, against whom John D. defended the adoration of images, caused the disgrace of John at the court of the caliph, and determined him to resign himself to a monastic life. He gave all his property to his relatives, to the poor, and to churches, and entered the convent of Sabas, near Jerusalem. After going through a course of ascetic practices, he spent most of his time in the quiet pursuit of letters. Once only, towards the end of his life, when the adoration of images was prohibited by the Emperor Constantius Copronymus, he left his seclusion, and defying the emperor's resentment, and the anathema of the bishops, he again became publicly the zealous advocate of image-worship in Palestine, Syria, and even in Constantinople. The year of his death is uncertain, but was between 754, when he protested against the Iconoclastic Synod in Constantinople, and 787, when the Œcumenical Council at Nice honored his memory with a eulogy. See Leo Allatius, Prolegomena de Joanne Damasceno, in Opp. Damasc. ed. le Quien, T. I., and Fabric., Bibl. Gr., vol. viii.

The most important literary achievement of J. D. is the πηγὴ γνώσεως (source of knowledge), comprising the following three works, the two former of which constitute a sort of introduction to the last. 1, the Κεφάλαια φιλοσόφου, or dialectics, treat almost exclusively of logical and ontological categories, and follow, in the main, Aristotle and Porphyry. The categories, in their application to the mysteries of Christian belief, have, in part, been remodelled, so e. g., the Aristotelian conception of Substance. 2, περὶ αἰρέσεων ἐν οὐρονία, de hæresibus, contains in 103 articles, a chronological synopsis of the heresies in the Christian Church, with a few articles on the errors of Pagans and Jews: the first 80 are almost verbally transcribed from the work of Epiphanius; the remainder partly treat of the heresies from the time of Epiphanius to that of the image controversies (according to Theodoretus, Sophronius, Leontius of Byzantium, &c.), and partly of fictitious sects, which merely represent possible and actual errors of belief. 3, the third, and most important work, ἑκδοαὶ ἀρετῆς τῆς πίστεως ὁρθοδόξου, is not so much a strict system of dogmatics as a collection and digest of doctrines, culled from the works of his predecessors, especially Gregory of Nazianzus, Athanasius, Basil the Great, Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom, Epiphanius, Cyril, Nemesius, and occasionally Anastasius Sinaita, Leontius of Byzantium, Maximus Confessor. For Pseudodionysius Areopagita he seems to have a particular predilection. From these various sources the book contains rather loosely connected extracts, not of tenets only, but also of exegetical and philosophical interpretations, which, being compiled from so many different authors, do not always correspond. The work is divided into 100 sections or 4 books (the latter is probably a later arrangement), and treats of the following subjects: a) God's existence, essence, unity, and the possibility of knowing Him. Though D. takes the ground that it is neither impossible to know God, nor possible to know Him all, that His essence is neither entirely expressible, nor entirely inexpressible, he nevertheless inclines to the transcendental character of the idea of God, assigning to human thought incapacity for its conception, and referring men, in the end, as Areopagites does, to the records of divinely revealed truth. It may be considered as a characteristic feature of John's theology, that it principally dwells on God's metaphysical attributes, hardly touching on the ethical ones. b) The Trinity. Great prominence is given to the dogma of the T.; for J. D. not only repeats the doctrines of the Greek Church, as well as the arguments of the Greek Fathers, but he resumes a scientific construction of the dogma within the established creed, though admitting that there are certain bounds to the enquiry, which human reason cannot scale. Ἀδύνατον γὰρ εὐρεῖν εἶναι ἐν τῇ πύσει εἰκόνα ἀπαρράλκτως ἐν αὐτῇ τὸν τρόπον τῆς ἁγίας τριάδος παραδεικνύουσαν. The Trinity, therefore, cannot be adequately conceived nor defined. His prime object appears to be, to found the personality of the λόγος, and of the πνεῦμα ἅγιον, upon the unity of the Divine essence, and further, to describe the nature of co-existence, and of personal difference in the Triune, and the reciprocal relations of the three persons—περιχώρησις—with all attainable strictness. This he attempts to achieve rather by the negative process of excluding fallacies, than by positive demonstration. Whenever he ventures upon the latter he fluctuates between Peripateticism, tending to Tritheism, and Platonism, leading almost imperceptibly to Sabellianism and Modalism. c) On the Creation, Angels, and Demons. He recapitulates the doctrines, as he found them, concluding with a rather lengthy exposition of his views on heaven, heavenly bodies, light, fire, winds, water, earth, chiefly based on the authority of the Fathers. Some singular opinions of his own he attempts to support by Scriptural passages. d) J.'s remarks on Man, his creation and nature, contain a psychology, in nuce, and are taken from Aristotle, and other Greek authors, in part directly, and in part through the medium of Nemesius, περὶ φύσεως ἀνθρώπου. As a teacher of the Greek Church, he lays particular stress on the doctrine of free-will, and its efficacy for good. In this connection he also treats of Providence and predestination, following, in his remarks, Chrysostom and Nemesius. e) The fall of man and its consequences are meagerly adverted to in the vague oratorical manner of Semipelagian writers, no notice being taken of the great development which this doctrine had received in the Western Church. f) The person of Christ. Of all dogmas this is argued with the greatest fullness. J.'s observations on the personal unity in Christ's twofold nature, conceived by him as enhypostasis—not anhypostasis—of the human nature in the Logos, his interpretation of the communicatio idiomatum (which, however, amounts to merely a verbal one), and his comments on volition and the operation of volition in Christ, evince considerable ingenuity and dialectic skill. Nevertheless, all his scientific arguments only prove, that from the given premises—the absolute antithesis of Divine and human nature, and the preponderance allowed to the Divine—it is impossible to conceive Christ's being and life under an idea that is concordant in itself, and satisfactory in a psychological and ethical point of view. Moreover, his polemical treatment of the subject could not but impede a methodical solution of the problem. Supplementary to this exposition of Christology are his controversial tracts, against the Akephali: περὶ συνδέσμου φύσεως, and against the Monetheletes: περὶ τῶν ἐν Χριστῷ δύο θελημάτων καὶ ἐνεργειῶν καὶ λοιπῶν φυσικῶν ἰδιωμάτων, &c.; comp. Baur, Gesch. der Dreieinigkeits, II., p. 176, sqq.; Christologie, II., p. 257. g) Baptism is held to be necessary for the forgiveness of sin and for eternal life. Body and soul, to be purified and saved, need regeneration, which comes from the water and the spirit. Baptism is allegorically represented as sevenfold. h) Faith is the acceptance of the παράδοσις τῆς ἐκκλησίας καθολικῆς, and of the teachings of Scripture; it is also confidence in the fulfilment of God's promises, and in the efficacy of our prayers. The former depends on ourselves; the latter is a gift of the Holy Spirit. On the relation of faith to works, on regeneration and sanctification, John repeats the Semipelagian views of the older Greek teachers, with still less insight than they had, into the true nature of these doctrines. His remarks on the cross, and on adoration, reflect the miraculous spirit of the times. i) The Eucharist is represented as the means by which God completes his communication of Himself to man, and thus restores to him immortality. John did not, however, as has been asserted, teach transubstantiation in the full acceptance of the term; for though he admits, that the Eucharist is the actual body of Christ, he does not consider it identical with that which was glorified in heaven, nor does he deem the bread and wine mere accidental phenomena. j) On Mary, the Immaculate Conception, Relics, and the Worship of Images, he expresses himself more explicitly in works to be mentioned hereafter. The authority for adoring the cross, images, &c., he finds not in Scriptures, but in tradition. k) The Scriptures. He confines himself to a few observations on inspiration, and the value of Holy Writ, repeats the canon of the O. T. according to Epiphanius, and includes in the books of the N. T. the canons of the apostles, according to the Trullan canon. While discoursing on Scripture, several questions that present themselves are incidentally adverted to, e. g., the four different formulæ used in Scripture to designate Christ, the origin of evil, which can neither be assigned to God, nor to an evil principle, independent of God. He further attempts a Scriptural vindication of celibacy, treats of the abrogation of circumcision, of Anti-Christ, resurrection, and the last judgment. These are the principal contents of John's main work. He has by no means done equal justice to all its parts; while atonement, sin, grace, and the means of salvation receive only a cursory notice, the doctrines of a more speculative character, as those on God, Trinity, and the person of Christ, are treated with great diffuseness, and not without useless repetitions. His partiality to speculative doctrines in preference to those of an anthropological and soteriological character, as well as his Pelagian views on free-will, mark him as a genuine son of the Greek Church. As such he did not undertake to perfect the dogma, but received it with all the deficiencies inherent in the Greek system.—The style of his discourse, owing to the diversity of his sources, is not uniform; while, for the most part, it has strength and fluency, it sometimes lapses into rhetorical prolivity and affectation. Comp. C. J. LESTRÅM: de expositione fidei orthodoxæ auctore J. Damasceno, Upsal, 1839; and Ritter: Geschichte der Christ. Phil., II., p. 553, sqq. This work acquired great authority in the Greek Church, and, after its translation into Latin, by Johannes Burgundius, of Pisa, even in the Western Church. In its Latin garb it was used by the Lombards, and later by Thomas Aquinas and other scholastics. While John is represented by some as the founder of scholastic philosophy, others, as Cramer (in Fortsetz. von Bossuets Weltgesch.), deny to him this position. Mosheim (hist. eccl. ant. et recent., p. 307) is nearly right in observing, that John unites the scholastic and didactic (i. e., positive) kinds of theology. He interweaves, as we have seen, the materials of tradition, in the case of several important dogmas at least, with dialectic comments, and his ἱερόθεος is the first comprehensive attempt to reduce the Church doctrine to a system. He, therefore, marks a transition from the productive period of the old Church to the scholasticism of the middle ages; but as he neither remodels the previously gathered material in a dialectic form, as Anselm did, nor employs the schematic, syllogistic method, peculiar to the scholastic writers, he cannot strictly be classed with the latter.

Besides the three works referred to, John wrote, 4) a little treatise on the Trinity, perhaps an extract from other works of his. 5) an Introduction into the Principles of Dogmatics, containing an explanation of the terms, οὐσία, ὑπόστασις, πρόσωπον, ὁμοούσιος, εἶδος, γένος, ἄρμονος, &c. 6) The expositio et declaratio fidei, found in Arabic, and given by Le Clerc, in a Latin version, is of doubtful authenticity. Of greater importance than these are J.'s polemical and apologetical writings. 7) His three Apologies of Image-Worship, remarkable for their frankness towards the emperor, belong to the best ever written on the subject. 8) a treatise against the Jacobites, a branch of the Monophysites. 9) another against the Manichæans, but this may be spurious. 10) A dialogue between a Christian and a Saracen. This is taken by Le Quien, to a great extent, from a book of Abukara, a disciple of J. D., who is said to have noted it down from oral instructions of his teacher. 11) The ἱερά παράλληλα, the most comprehensive of J.'s works, is a collection of moral and doctrinal sentences, with quotations of parallel passages from the Bible and the works of the Fathers. These quotations constitute the greatest value of the book, as among them are many from works that have been lost. 12) Treatises on the principal sins, on virtue, vice, fasting. 13) The Commentaries on St. Paul, compiled, for the most part, from Chrysostom, share the prevalent fault of those times — a too indiscriminate recourse to allegorical interpretation. 14) Homilies, Odes, Hymns. The homilies are insignificant discourses on festivals; the odes, composed for similar occasions, have in old and modern times earned much praise, which should, however, be qualified; neither are all of them of undoubted authenticity. A number of other writings bear the name of J. D., but, in all probability, none of them proceeded from his pen. The most interesting of them is a sort of Christian novel, Barlaam and Josaphat, or Joasaph, printed in the Anecdota Græca ed. Boissonade, vol. IV. The first complete edition of J.'s works was projected by the Synod of the French Clergy at Paris, 1635 and 1636, but not published till 1712, at Paris, in two folios, by the joint labor of Le Quien and Leo Allatius, who augmented it with valuable prolegomena. Comp. Remi Ceillier, in Histoire générale des auteurs sacrés et ecclésiastiques, Tom. XVIII., p. 110–165; Fabricius, Bibliotheca græca, Tom. VIII.; Schröckh, Kirchengesch., XX.

LANDERER.—Siedensticker.

John, Jacobitic Bishop of Dara, in Mesopotamia, lived during the first half of the 9th century, and was the cotemporary of Dionysius of Telmahar, to whom he dedicated his Chronicles (s. Barhebræus, in Assem., bibl. or., II., 247). He has been erroneously placed in the 8th, the 7th, the 6th, even the 4th century. A MS. in the Vatican contains three Syrian works of J.: 1, de resurrectione corporum, in 4 books; 2, de hierarchia celesti et ecclesiastica, in 2 books; 3, de sacerdotio, 4 books. See Assem., II., 118. We find also mention of a book, de anima (Assem., II., 219), and of an Anaphora (Catal. liturg., in Schulting, III., p. 106, nr. 29). E. RÖDIGER.—Siedensticker.

John Eleemosynarius, Patriarch of Constantinople (606–616), a Saint. He received the honoring surname of Almsgiver, on account of his great beneficence and kindness towards the poor and unfortunate. He was likewise admired for his equanimity, charity, forbearance, and pious devotion. He died on Cyprus, where he had found a refuge from the hostility of the Persians, 616. His anniversary is on January 23d. E. RÖDIGER.—Seidensticker.

John Diaconus, biographer of Gregory, see Gregory I.

John, Monophysite Bishop of Ephesus, called Episcopus Asiae, as Ephesus was the most prominent bishopric of Asia Minor; was born at Amid, and lived, during the 6th century, for the most part in Constantinople, where he was highly esteemed at the court, especially under Justinian. This emperor, in the 19th year of his reign, gave the bishop authority to proceed against the heathens, many of whom resided in Constantinople, as patricians, grammarians, sophists, attorneys, and physicians. Phocas, who was one of these, preferred a voluntary death by poison to a compulsory conversion. On his tour through Asia, John converted 70,000 persons, and built 96 churches, mainly at the expense of the imperial treasury. This success procured him the epithets of "Apostle of the Heathens," and "Destroyer of Idols." He is probably identical with Johannes Rhetor, mentioned by Evagrius and by Theodorus Lector, and designated by the former (V., c. 24) as his fellow-citizen and relative. John is the author of an historical work, in three parts, written in Syriac, and of some importance for the Church history of the East. It was not known except by quotations contained in Dionysius of Telmahar (Assem., bibl. or., I., 359, sqq., 409, sqq.; II., 48, sqq., 875, sqq.), and in the Chronicles of Barhebræus (Chron. syr. ed. Bruns et Kirsch, 2; cf. Assem., bibl. or., I., 312, 328, 329). Will W. Cureton discovered its third part (incomplete) among a number of Syrian MSS. in the British Museum, which Dr. Tattam and A. Pacheco had brought from the Syrian convent of St. Mary, in Egypt, 1843, 1847, and 1850. C. published it under the title: The third part of the eccl. hist. of John, Bishop of Ephesus, now first edited by W. Cureton, Oxford, 1853, 4°, 418 pp. It appears, that the two first parts contained, in 12 books, the history of the Church to the year 571. The third part, in 6 chapters, of which only the 2d and 3d are complete, refers to events as late as 585. The book is of great historical value, as it relates many facts, otherwise unknown, and as its author, though partial to the Monophysitic sect, speaks of contemporary events, to which he was not unfrequently an eye-witness.

LANDERER.—Seidensticker.

John Jejunator (Νηστευτής, the Fasting), so called on account of his rigorous ascetism; also called Cappadox from his native country, and John IV., as Patriarch of Constantinople (582–595). He was of low extraction, and owed his elevation, as his friends said, to his piety, or, as his enemies declared, to his hypocrisy. He has become famous by his controversy with Rome about the title, which he assumed, of œcumenical patriarch (See Art. Gregory I). He died Sept. 2, 595, and has been admitted by the Greeks to the number of Saints, for his pious, exemplary, beneficent course of life. Gregory I., on the other hand, reproached him, in the harshest manner, with duplicity, pride, and falseness. The following books are ascribed to him, but their authenticity is questionable: 1. Rules on penance, ἀκολουθία καὶ τὰς τῶν ἱερομολογούντων. 2. Instructions to confessors, λόγος πρὸς τὸν μάλιστα ἱθαροῦσαι τὸν αὐτοῦ πνευματικὸν υἱόν. Both books are printed in: MORINUS, de disciplina in administratione sacramenti pœnitentiæ, Paris, 1651. 3. Discourses περὶ μετανοίας καὶ ὑπερηφανίας καὶ παρρησίας. 4. περὶ ψευδοπροφητῶν καὶ ψευδοδιδασκάλων καὶ ἁδίων. The latter two were formerly ascribed to Chrysostom. 5. On baptism. 6. A collection of letters, which is lost. (See Gregory Epp. V., 18 sqq., 43, 64, and others. Theophylact. hist. VII., 6. Isidor. de script. c. 26. Trithem. de scr. eccl. c. 224. Oudin. de scr. eccl. I., p. 1473, sqq. Fabric. bibl. gr. X., p. 164, sqq., and the works on Church history of Schrockh, Gieseler, Gfrörer, Kurtz. WAGENMANN.—Seidensticker.

John of Nepomuk (also called Johannko and Johannek in Bohemian chronicles), was the son of Welfin, a citizen of Pomuc, a small town in the Circle of Klattau, Bohemia. He took orders, and his name appears on record, Dec. 9, 1372, when he signed himself, "Joannes olim Welfini de Pomuk, clericus Pragensis diœcesis, imperiali auctoritate notarius publicus." In 1380 he was minister at the Church St. Galli, in Prague, also secretary and notary of the Archbishop; 1381, he became doctor of canonical law; soon afterwards, Canon, and Vicarius generalis in Spiritualibus to John von Jahnstein, Archbishop of Prague; in 1390, the Metropolitan Chapter of St. Vitus, in Prague, admitted him as one of its members, with the title, Archidiaconus Zatecensis in ecclesia Pragensi. His own position, as well as King Wenceslaus' hatred for him, allow us to infer, that he took an active part in the disputes between the archbishop and the king. He was put to the rack, the king himself assisting, and then dragged to the Moldau bridge, gagged, and with his hands pinioned to his back, and his feet tied to his head, was thrown into the river, March 20th, 1393. These historical facts have been greatly enlarged and adorned by legendary additions, in the biography of John, by Bohuslav Balbinus. These report that miraculous signs attended his birth and martyrdom, and signalized the place of his burial. Various futile attempts have been made to reconcile the points of conflict between the legend and historical account. Dr. Otto Abel (Die Sag. v. heil. Joh. v. Nep., Berlin, 1855), supposes the legend was invented by the Jesuits, after the restoration of Popery in Bohemia, as a popular counterpart to the martyrdom of Huss and Ziska. TH. PRESSER.—Seidensticker.

John of Paris. His doctrine on Communion has been alluded to in the Art. Impanatio. He was a Dominican, and a teacher of Divinity at Paris, in the latter half of the 13th century. In the controversy between Boniface and Philip, he advocated the cause of Philip with great zeal, going so far as to declare—which, in France, he might safely venture—that Boniface had no good title to the papal throne. He died at Bordeaux, 1506.

John I.—XXIII., Popes.—John I., a Tuscan, was consecrated as Roman bishop, August 13, 523. An edict of the bigoted Eastern Emperor, Justus II., against the Arians of Italy, induced their patron, Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, to intercede for them in Byzantium. At the head of the embassy, sent for this purpose, was John, who had to plead a cause for which he had no sympathy, so dependent was the Roman bishop on the German ruler. It is quite likely that the answer of the Emperor, seemingly favorable, was meant for deception, and that the Romans, with the Bishop at their head, instead of seeking relief from the intolerance of Greek orthodoxy, solicited aid against the Goths. After his return to Ravenna, he was cast into a prison, in which he died May 18, 1526. A Roman tradition reports, not without some complacency, that in Constantinople the Emperor bowed down before the Bishop of Rome, and that at High Mass the seat of the latter was raised above that of the Patriarch. John is numbered among the martyrs, though his miracles were never held of great account. Comp. Muratori Script. T. III., P. II., Baronius, ad h. a. Acta Sanct. (Bolland.) 27 Maji, Jaffé, Regesta Pontif. Roman. ad h. a. —II., a Roman, surnamed Mercurius, was consecrated Dec. 31, 532, and buried in St. Peter's, May 27, 535. —III., son of a distinguished Roman, was consecrated July 14, 560. The confirmation of his election by the Byzantine Emperor was delayed four months, and this subordination to the Greek government continued during the thirteen years of his episcopacy. He was buried July 13, 573. No important event occurred under his reign. —IV., a Dalmatian, was consecrated Dec. 25, 640. He displayed no less zeal in founding convents and endowing the churches of Rome, than in his strife against his Greek rival. The Monothelite creed of the Patriarch Sergius, promulgated by the Emperor Herodius as Ἡρῳδῆς, was denounced by J. as heresy, and condemned by a Roman synod, 641. It is said that before his death (Oct. 12, 642), the Emperor Constans gave him the promise to withdraw the Ἡρῳδῆς, but the controversy continued under his successors (Comp. Baronius, Pagi, Jaffé, l. c.) — V., a Syrian, elevated to the papal dignity in May or July, 685, buried Aug. 2, 686, hardly ever left the bed during the short time of his insignificant pontificate. The authenticity of the letters assigned to him, and of the book de dignitate pallii, has been contested. (Anastasius and Jaffé, l. c.) — VI., and VII., were both Greeks, and quite insignificant. The former was consecrated Oct. 10, 701, and buried Jan. 10, 705; he was defended by Roman soldiers against the Exarch, who was ordered to drive him from the apostolic See. — VII. (consecrated March 1, 705, buried Oct. 18, 707), is described as weak and spiritless. He did not venture to express an opinion on the Trullan canon, submitted to his examination by Emperor Justinian II., for fear of giving offence to somebody. (Anastasius and Jaffé, l. c.) — VIII., a Roman, succeeded Hadrian II., Dec. 14, 872. He evinced much tact, and harbored great schemes, but was destitute of elevated motives. The spirit of his administration was in keeping with the ideas of the Pseudo-Isidorian collection, to which Nicholas I. had first ventured to appeal. John's designs found no hearty response in the little minds with whom he had to deal, and the general anarchy was inauspicious to their execution. On the other hand, the Pope, as well as the clergy, in their strife after power, were actuated only by worldly ambition, and knew no other arms than cunning and intrigue. With these they were neither able to control the rude powers which sapped the foundations of the Carolingian monarchy, nor to erect on its ruins the fabric of ecclesiastical dominion. When Louis II. died 875, without an heir to his land and crown, Charles the Bald repaired hastily to Rome, and accepted, (Christmas, 875,) as a boon of the Apostolic chair, the Imperial diadem, to which he had no lawful claim. It has been asserted by the Church Annalists, that the compact then entered into by Pope and Emperor, confirmed and amplified Pepin's donation; but, in fact, only for the surrender of Capua, can documentary proof be adduced, namely, the letter of the pope in Mansi Concil. xvii., p. 10, and even that is couched in ambiguous language. The Pope did not gain much by this alliance with Charles. The Emperor's intercession with the bishops of Neustria did not lead to their submission to papal authority, nor was he able to shield the Pope against the Saracens, who plundered the Campagna, and exacted of J. an annual tribute. As, after the death of Charles the Bald, it did not appear likely that the crown would pass to his descendants, the Pope, who had taken refuge in Provence, supported the pretensions of Count Boso, who was to supersede the reigning dynasty (comp. the letter in Mansi, xvii., p. 121); but Boso became only the founder of the Arlate, while the empire and Italy reverted to the Carolingian, Charles the Fat, whom the Pope had to crown after all. The controversy with the Eastern Church, on the question of ecclesiastical jurisdiction over Bulgaria, was continued under John. He first acknowledged Photius as Patriarch of Constantinople; but, finding him little disposed to yield the disputed point, he solemnly excommunicated him. John found his death, as the Annales Fuldenses relate, through a conspiracy of his own curia. The assassins first tried poison; when this did not operate quick enough, they slew him with a hammer, Dec. 15, 882. We have of John VIII., 308 letters, most of which may be found in Mansi Concil. XVII. Comp. Muratori III., P. I. II., Jaffé, l. c. Giesebrecht Geschichte der deutschen Kaiserzeit I., 139-148. — IX., a Benedictine, of Tivoli, was consecrated June, 893. He convened two councils, one at St. Peter's, where the wrong done to his badly abused predecessor Formosus, was redressed; the other at Ravenna, which passed an act for the better protection of Church property against thieves and incendiaries. J. displayed an honest zeal in defining the rights and regulating the discipline of the Church. He died July, 900. About his life see Muratori T. III., P. II., about the synods, Mansi XVIII. — X., owed his promotion to the dissolute Theodora, who, attracted by his handsome figure, made him successively archbishop of Bologna, of Ravenna, and finally pope (May 15, 914). The profligacy of his times, especially in Rome, surpassed that of the most degenerate period of paganism. The popes were merely the contemptible creatures of the Roman nobility. John was the first pontiff that took the field against an enemy; heading some troops which he had levied in the smaller towns, he drove the gangs of Saracenic robbers from their strongholds and cavern recesses on the banks of the Garigliano. He came to a miserable end by the legitimate consequences of the same vices that had been instrumental in raising him to his high rank. Marozia, the daughter of Theodora, and her husband, Guy, Marquis of Tuscany, finding John too much in their way, thrust him into a prison, where he died either of want, or by the hand of an assassin. Comp. Muratori, Jaffé, l. c. Bower, History of the Popes; Höfler; die deutschen Päbste, I., 18. — XI., a natural son of Marozia and of Pope Sergius III., was hardly 20 years old when his mother seated him on St. Peter's chair. Spiritual government was not thought of; in fact, Rome was, by all Christendom, detested like a pestiferous swamp. Alberic, himself a son of Marozia, put an end to the government of his mother, and of the Pope, his step-brother, by expelling the former and imprisoning the latter. John regained his liberty, but soon after departed life, Jan., 936. (Comp. Jaffé, Höfler, Giesebrecht, l. c.) — XII., a son of Alberic, and grandson of Marozia, whose vices he seemed to have inherited. After the death of his father, who had lorded it over Rome, he succeeded to the dignity of Roman patrician, and in Nov., 955, after the death of Agapetus, he became

Pope, though only 16 or 18 years old. His own name was Octavianus, but, upon his accession, he called himself John XII., thus inaugurating the practice which has ever since been followed by the popes, of assuming an apostolic name. Ambitious to extend the boundaries of the States of the Church, he soon found himself involved in a disastrous war with Berenger II., and his son, Adelbert, who not only occupied the Exarchate, but, forming an alliance with the Greeks and Saracens, threatened Rome itself. In this extremity, John implored the assistance of Emperor Otho I., who crossed the Alps with a large army, and, having entered Rome, vouchsafed to the pope not only personal safety, but also his title to the States of the Church. The extent of these promises, however, has been subject to controversy, and it is not without a reason that the Vatican record, by which Pepin's donation was confirmed and enlarged, is withheld from critical scrutiny. Both Otho and the Empress Adelheid received from the Pope the imperial diadem; and, for a short time, a happy concord seemed to unite the temporal and spiritual heads of Christendom. But John had to make the discovery, that instead of an ally, he had found a master in Otho, who wielded the imperial sceptre in the spirit of Charlemagne. He used his power, however, not so much in resisting papal authority, as in curbing the insolent nobility of Rome; and John himself had to feel the Emperor's severity more as a Roman patrician than as pontiff. The Emperor took from the Pope and the higher officials in Rome an oath, that they would never enter into an alliance with Berenger or his son. But when the Emperor, in violation of pontifical prerogatives, held a synod at Pavia, 962, the Pope, who had so far concealed his rancor, broke his oath, and leagued himself with the son of Berenger. He even asked the pagan Hungarians and schismatic Greeks for aid against the Emperor. This was his ruin, for the Emperor entered Rome a second time, Nov. 2, 964: the Pope fled, and the Romans had not only to renew their oath of allegiance, but to swear that they would never consecrate a pope without the concurrence of the Emperor and his son. At a synod at St. Peter's, over which Otho himself presided, John was charged with the crimes of murder, adultery, and perjury, and summoned to appear in his defence. As he failed to obey these summons, he was deposed, Dec. 4, and excommunicated, and Leo VIII., a layman, appointed in his stead. After the Emperor's departure, John, supported by the Roman nobility, returned, and convened another synod at St. Peter's, which rescinded the resolutions of the former one. The Emperor was about entering Rome for the third time, when John died of apoplexy, while he was engaged in an adulterous intrigue, May 14, 964. He was a man of most licentious habits, associating with women of every station, and filling the Lateran with the noisy profanity of a brothel. Comp. Liudprand, Historia Ottonis, in Monum. Germ. Script. III.; Muratori, Jaffé, Höfler, l. c. Giesebrecht, l. c. I., p. 424-445. — XIII., of noble family, and, previous to his election, Sept., 965, Bishop of Narni, was not consecrated till Otho's consent had been obtained. The nobility, not relishing his severity, instigated a riot against him, and kept him as a prisoner. But the Pope effected his escape, and returned to the city about a year after, when the Emperor himself made his appearance, visiting the disorderly factions of the city with unmitigated severity. Having appointed a prefect as representative of his power, the Emperor went to Ravenna, followed by the Pope. Here a great and influential Council was held, Easter 967, and the Emperor guaranteed to the pontifical chair all the territory to which it had ever been entitled, including Ravenna. John crowned the younger Otho as emperor and associate king of Germany; also his wife, Theophania, the daughter of the Greek Emperor. He took pleasure in furthering the Emperor's favorite idea, to establish a mission among the north-eastern Slavonians. Died 972. — XIV., previous to his elevation, Peter, Bishop of Pavia, and arch-chancellor of the Emperor, was elected, through the influence of Otho II., in Nov. or Dec., 983. But, unfortunately, his patron died at Rome Dec. 7 of the same year. Boniface VII. (see this Art.), returned in April, 984, from Constantinople, and imprisoned John in the Castle del Angelo, where he was starved to death or assassinated. (Comp. Muratori, Jaffé, etc., l. c.) — XV. His inglorious reign lasted from Sept., 985 to April, 996. Rome was, in reality, governed by Crescentius, who presided and ruled at the Castle del Angelo as Patricius. The Pope fled to Tuscany. Though he was afterwards tolerated in the Lateran, he remained destitute of all authority. By way of compensation for his lack of power, he enriched himself and his relatives with the revenues of the Church. Concerning the dispute about the bishopric of Rheims, see Sylvester II. (Comp. Jaffé, Höfler, l. c.). Another John XV., son of the Roman Rupertus, who is said to have been pope four months after the murder of Boniface VIII., is a dubious personage, and not recognized by modern critics. (Comp. Willman's Jahrbücher des deutschen Reichs unter Otto III., pp. 208-212). — XVI., Philagathos, a Calabrian Greek, Bishop of Piacenza, was supported by Crescentius, May, 997, as anti-pope, against Gregory V. He fell into the hands of Gregory's friends, and, after being barbarously mutilated, was confined in a convent. — XVII., born in the March of Ancona, surnamed Sicco, followed Sylvester II. He was consecrated June 13, 1003, and died Dec. 7 of the same year. — XVIII. Fasanus succeeded him. He gave his support to the favorite plan of Henry II., to establish a bishopric at Bamberg, and made Bruno, of Querfurt, the Prussian apostle, archbishop. (Jaffé, Bower, l. c.). — XIX., of the family of the Counts of Tusculum, procured, after his brother Benedict VIII.'s death, the papal tiara by violence and bribery, and held it with no better spirit, 1024-1033. He came near selling to the Patriarch of Constantinople the supremacy over the Oriental Church. The only remarkable event during the reign of this hated and despised pontiff, was the coronation of the Salic Emperor, Conrad, Easter, 1027. (Comp. Jaffé, Bower, l. c.). — XXI., should have been counted XX.; the confusion begins with John XVII., who is also counted XVIII. It is possible, that at the time of the schism, 1045, one of the anti-popes, whose own name happened to be John, was erroneously entered among the popes of that apostolical name. At all events, when Petrus Juliani, cardinal Bishop of Tusculum, a native of Lisbon, was elected pope, Sept. 13, 1276, he styled himself John XXI. He was a man of erudition, but weak and incompetent. Whether he is identical with Petrus Hispanus, the author of many medical and philosophical works, is not certain. His efforts to unite the European powers for a crusade were unsuccessful. It is said that he found his death, May 16, 1277, at Viterbo, by the falling of a ceiling. (Bower, l. c.)

—XXII., a Frenchman, of low extraction, cardinal bishop of Porto, was elected at Lyons, Aug. 7, 1316, after an interregnum of two years, and a stormy conclave of forty days. As his election was effected by the French party among the cardinals, the papal see was not removed from Avignon. While cringing before the French Court, he presumptuously arrogated to himself the right of deciding between the two competitors for the imperial crown of Germany, Lewis of Bavaria and Frederick of Austria. After repeated threats, he excommunicated, 1324, Lewis of Bavaria; but the latter appealed to a general council at Nuremberg, charged the Pope with heresy, and, after being crowned at Rome, he effected the deposition of the Pope by a synod. Though the Ghibelline Anti-pope, Nicholas V., who was to supersede John, could not maintain himself, the authority of the apostolical chair greatly suffered from the literary attacks which Lewis directed against it. The Franciscans sided, in this dispute, with the Emperor, the Dominicans with the Pope. The latter embarrassed his own position by holding, as a private opinion—which he had to disavow publicly—that the souls of the blessed sleep in death till the time of universal resurrection. He amassed incredible treasures by most unscrupulous financiering, and levied the annatæ with so much rapacity, that he has been erroneously considered by some as the originator of the system. He died Dec. 4, 1334. Comp. Baluzius Vitæ Papar. Avenionens. I., Bower a. a. VIII. p. 331. Ohlenschlager. Staatsgeschichte des römischen Kaiserthums, 1755.—XXIII., Baldassarion Cossa, of Naples, a man of great talents, but worthless character, had the weak Alexander V. (see this Art.), completely under his control, and was charged, at Constance, with having poisoned him. He carried his own election by the use of threats and bribes, May 17, 1410. About his journey to Constance and his deposition, see the Art. Council at Constance. He effected his escape from the prison at Heidelberg, humbly prostrated himself at Martin V.'s feet, and lived as cardinal bishop of Tusculum and dean of the Holy College at Florence, where he died, Nov. 22, 1419. The name of John, which seemed to augur disgrace or insignificance, has since been avoided by the popes. See John's life by his secretary, Dietrich von Niem in v. d. Hardt Magnum æcum. Constant. Concil. II., P. XV.

Dr. G. Voigt. — Seidensticker.

John Parvus, Jean Petit, born in Normandy, acquired an unenviable notoriety for defending, by order of the Duke of Burgundy, the murder which the latter had committed on the Duke of Orleans, brother of the King of France. He took the ground, which the League afterwards adopted, that putting to death a traitor was not only permissible by the law of nature and of God, but meritorious and honorable. This apology of murder was condemned by the University of Paris, and branded as heretical by the Council of Constance, 1455. Jean was expelled from the University, but richly rewarded by the duke. He died July 15, 1411, at Hesdin. Comp. Barante, Histoire des ducs de Bourgogne, 1824, tom. III., p. 108, sqq.

Th. Pressel. — Seidensticker.

John X., Patriarch of Constantinople (Beous), at first zealously opposed the union of the Greek and Roman Churches, which the Emperor Michael Paleologus tried to consummate at the Council of Lyons, 1274, but he changed his views, and was appointed Patriarch of Constantinople in the place of the deposed Josephus Galesius, 1275. His warm advocacy of the union brought upon him the hatred of its orthodox opponents. He resigned his office under Michael, whose successor, Andronicus, banished him to the neighborhood of Mt. Olympus, and soon after to the Castle of St. George, in Bithynia, where he died, 1298. His writings, a part of which Leo Allatius has admitted into the "Græcia Orthodoxa," mostly treat of the union and cognate questions. Gass.—Seidensticker.

John, Patriarch of Thessalonica, lived in the latter part of the 7th and the beginning of the 8th century. He wrote in favor of picture-worship, to which he tried to reconcile the Jews, who considered that practice a scandal. A passage from his work, which was read at the 2d Synod of Nice, expresses the same view, that the Synod sanctioned as orthodox.

Gass.—Seidensticker.

John Philoponus, also called Alexandrinus, after his native city, and Grammaticus, on account of his learning. About his life we have no reliable information; Ritter and Nauck place him in the 6th and latter part of the 5th century. This accords with the fact, that Ammonius Hermiæ (about 485) was his teacher, and Simplicius, who emigrated, 529, to Persia, his cotemporary; and it is likewise confirmed by a direct reference which he makes to his time (de ætern. mundi., XVI., cp. 4), namely, to the year 245, ær. Dioclet., which is 529 A. D. But conflicting with this chronology is the statement of Photius (Bibl. cod., 240), that J. P. dedicated his work on Creation to Sergius, Patriarch of Constantinople (610–539), and that he composed his Διακρίσεις on the suggestion of the same Sergius. This statement is at variance not only with the adduced evidence, but also with the facts, that John was engaged in the Aritheistic controversy (560), that he wrote against Johannes Scholasticus (565), and addressed several works to Justinian. If, therefore, he dedicated his work to a Sergius, this could not have been the Patriarch of Constantinople, but another one of the same name, perhaps as Ritter supposes, the Monophysitic Patriarch of Antiochia. — J. Philoponus was a man of extensive learning and untiring assiduity, a skilful dialectician, and very proficient in mathematical and grammatical researches. Though holding, in the main, Christian doctrines, he did not yield a simple and unconditional assent to Church creed and tradition, and his attempts at completing, elaborating, and amending the Christian dogma by philosophy, render his position not unfrequently ambiguous and questionable. He stands on a line with Nemesius, Æneas of Gaza, Zacharius Scholasticus; and has, in spite of his literary celebrity, earned only limited applause. Nicephorus Call. (H. E. XVIII., 47) calls him an acute peripatetic, and admits his admirable powers in arguing, but deprecates the unsoundness of his views; Simplicius and Photius reflect upon him even in stronger terms. These strictures apply chiefly to his objectionable theory of the Trinity. Though his principal work on dogmatics, Διατητής ἡ περὶ ἐνώσεως, is lost, we know, by extracts, its aim and object sufficiently well (comp. LEONTIUS, de sectis Act. 5, apud Galland., XII., 641; JOH. DAMASC., De hæres., I., p. 101–7. ed. le Quien, NICEPH., Coll., XVIII., ep. 57; MANSI, Concil., XI., p. 301). Nature and hypostasis, he declares, are identical. A double nature in Christ is incompatible with one hypostasis. To the objection, that in the Trinity there are confessedly three hypostases, and but one nature, he replies, that in the Trinity three particular and individual existences, or hypostases, are comprised under the idea of unity, but that this unity is merely the generic term, in which the several particulars are contained, the κοινός τοῦ εἶναι λόγος. If this be called nature, the latter amounts only to a generic, abstract idea, inductively derived from particulars, but if φύσις signifies something existing for itself, it is equivalent with the particular, individual being, and therefore with the hypostasis. Applying this argument to Christ, he concludes that to the unity of his hypostasis belongs also unity of nature. This doctrine has been called the Tritheism of Philoponus. He himself disclaimed teaching three Gods, and even quoted passages of similar import from older expounders of the Trinity. But the older writers, basing their views on the realistic philosophy of Plato, understood by unity of Divine nature something real, something existing independently of a mere mental conception, and accorded to the doctrine of one substance or nature in the Triune the same importance as to that of three hypostases. But if the Triune, according to Aristotelian logic, denoted nothing but three individual divinities classed under one generic term, such a position not only conflicted with the established interpretation of the Trinity, but obscured and endangered the belief in God's unity. Philoponus, however, was not the founder, as Leontius states, but merely the precursor of the Tritheists. He is said to have discussed the subject of Trinity, also, with Johannes Scholasticus, and to have written for Severus, the Monophysite, and against the 4th Œcumenical Synod (PHOT., codd., 55, 75; NICEPH., cp. 46). Of his works, which are extant, the principal one is "De æternitate mundi," in which the attempt is made to establish the Christian dogma of Creation by reason alone, without resorting to Biblical authority. Philoponus joins issue both with Aristotle and Plato, but allows the former to come nearer the truth than the latter. The ideas, as creative thoughts of God, are eternal and inherent in Providence; their realization adds nothing to Divine perfection. By his εἶς God was eternally Creator, and his essence acquired no new characteristic by the ἐνέργεια. The world itself cannot be eternal, for the effect cannot equal the cause. Matter was created by God; the opposite doctrine annuls the unity of an ultimate cause.—Less than in this book have the interests of Christianity been consulted in another: περὶ ἀστρολόγειας, which we know by the notice of PHOTIUS (cod., 21–23), of NICEPH., (l. c., cp. 47), and of TIMOTHEUS (de receptu hæret., in Cotel. mon., III., p. 414, sqq.). In this treatise he makes an important concession to philosophy by the separation of the sensual from the spiritual creation. The rational soul is not only an αἶθερ, but an imperishable substance, entirely distinct from all irrational existence, in which matter is always associated with form. In consequence of this inseparable connection of matter and form the natural body is destroyed and annihilated by death. The resurrection of the body is the new creation of the body. The work: Commentariorum in Mosaicam mundi creationem libri septem (περὶ κοσμοποιίας), dedicated to Sergius (ed. Cordarius, Viennæ, 1630, and Galland. Biblioth., XII., p. 473), was written with an apologetical aim, and is replete with physical and philosophical learning. Its object is to reconcile the Mosaic account of creation with the facts derived from our experience. It reminds of similar attempts in our times, many of which it surpasses in acumen and extensive learning. — In the "disputatio de paschate," printed behind the last-mentioned work, Philoponus tries to show, that Christ, on the 13th day before the lawful pascha, partook with his disciples of a mystical repast, not of a real lamb. Nauck has rejected this book without a sufficient reason, as "absurd jargon." Though in the manuscript of Cordarius no name is attached to it, and in the Bibl. Coisl. ed. Montf. that of John of Damascus, a reference at the close of the treatise (Usteri, p. 121) to the Hexaëmeron of Philoponus, makes it probable that the latter is the author of the book. Usteri has made use of it in proving the authenticity of the fourth gospel (Commentatio critica, in qua evg. Joh. genuinam esse ostenditur, Turici, 1823), and has appended a reprint of it, in Greek, to his dissertation.

We merely mention: περὶ τῆς τοῦ ἀστρολόγου χρήσεως (ed. Hase, Bonn, 1839), περὶ ἀγαλμάτων against JAMBlichus (Phot. cod., 215), and his grammatical works: Συναγωγή τῶν πρὸς διάφορον σημασίαν διαφόρως τινουμένων λέξεων, Περὶ διαλέκτων, Ἰονικὰ παραγγέλματα, and the Commentaries on Aristotle, published at Venice, 1509, 1534, 1535, etc. There is no collective edition of J.'s works. Comp. FABRICIUS, X., p. 639, Harl.; BRUCKER, Hist. Phil., III., p. 529, Lips., 1743; RITTER, Gesch. d. Phil., VI., 500; WALCH, Hist. der Ketzereien, VIII., p. 693; J. G. SCHARFENBERG, De Johanne Philopono, Lips., 1768; Trechsel, in Stud. und Kritiken, 1835, p. 95, sqq. The works of Bauer and Meier, and Nauck's art. in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclop. GASS.—Seidensticker.

John Presbyter. In a celebrated passage, quoted by EUSEBIUS (H. E., III., 39), Papias declares, that in forming his Christian convictions he had consulted teachers of truth, such as had imbibed the precepts which the Lord entrusted to faith, and which, therefore, proceeds from truth itself. "But if," he adds, "any of them had communication with men of earlier times (τοῖς προπυρίτοις), I enquired of them, what Andrew, Peter, or Philip, or Thomas, or John, or Matthew, or any other of the Lord's disciples had said (ἔλεγον), also, what Aristion and the Presbyter John, the disciples of the Lord, tell (λέγουσαν). For I thought, I could not profit so much by books as by living and enduring discourse." Eusebius calls attention to the double occurrence of the name John, once in connection with Peter, James, and Matthew, where it evidently denotes the apostle; the second time with Aristion, when it is qualified by the term: ὁ πρεσβύτερος. There could be no doubt; then, he thinks, but that another John existed, a teacher of Papias, who, without being counted an apostle, still might be called a disciple of Christ. This passage, Eusebius continues, also confirms the report, that two men in Asia Minor, with the name of John, had intimately associated with Christ, and that, at Ephesus, there were two graves inscribed with the name of John. Eusebius very probably owes this observation to DIONYS. ALEX. (ap. Euseb., VII., 25), who, upon this occasion, makes the same surmise, as Eusebius, about the origin of the Apocalypse. In Constit. apost., VII., 46, also, mention is made of a second John, Bishop of Ephesus, and successor to the apostles, who had been appointed by the Evangelist John.

There are many difficulties, which involve the person of this Presbyter John. 1) Papias calls him πρεσβύτερος, using the same term that only a few lines before occurs in the meaning of "older." The question now is, whether it here designates the office of presbyter. Credner insists, that the word must have the same signification in both passages; but it is more likely that πρεσβύτερος is used in contradistinction to the ἀπόστολος, and refers to the public character of the man. 2) It is neither asserted by Papias, nor repeated by Dionysius and Eusebius, that John was presbyter at Ephesus, and again, the report about two Johns being buried at Ephesus, was even primitively not generally believed. Comp. JEROME: de viris illust., cp. 9, "Johannis Presbyteri—cujus et hodie alterum sepulcrum apud Ephesum ostenditur, etsi nonnulli putant, duas memorias ejusdem Johannis evangelistæ esse." 3) It is, further, surprising that no mention of this presbyter is found in the oldest records. Neither Polycrates nor Irenæus know of him. The latter, in fact, not only ignores Presbyter John, but he calls Papias, together with Polycrates, the pupils of John the Evangelist. Here is then, evidently, an error on one side, and it is not likely that Papias or Eusebius committed it, while Irenæus, who is fond of ascending to the highest authorities, may have confounded the two namesakes, who were contemporaries, and of whom the greater, by his eminence, obscured the fame of the other.

The fact, that there existed in Asia Minor another John, the teacher of Papias, who belonged to the wider circle of Christ's disciples, would be of little relevancy, had this John Presbyter not at various times been deemed the author of several books in the N. T., which are called after John, but cannot with certainty be attributed to the Evangelist. With regard to the two shorter letters, JEROME (l. c.) says: Reliquæ autem duæ—Johannis presbyteri asseruntur. Of modern critics, Grotius, Beck, Fritzsche, Bretschneider, and Credner have advanced the same opinion. The dubious position of both letters in the oldest canon, and the circumstance, that the author simply calls himself ὁ πρεσβύτερος, seem to favor this theory. Nor can it be urged against it that John Presbyter would not have spoken so authoritatively in the immediate neighborhood of the Apostle John, for the latter may at that time have departed life, which, indeed, as Credner remarks, can be inferred, with some probability, from the use of different tenses (ἔλεγον and λέγουσαν) in the passage of Papias. On the other hand, the very close connection that exists between the longer and the two shorter epistles of John, is, certainly, a strong argument in favor of the same author. As to the epithet, ὁ πρεσβύτερος, there is no good reason why the apostolical head of the congregation should not have applied it to himself, and its omission in the first epistle is accounted for by the absence of any superscription at all. Of greater importance is the attempt to claim for John P. the authorship of the Apocalypse. Anciently this hypothesis was favored by Dionysius (Euseb., VII., 25), and by Eusebius (III., 39). Even more confidently has modern criticism of the Apoc., on the impulse of Lücke and Bleek, returned to this supposition. De Wette and Neander do not oppose it. The era of J. P., his Asiatic associations, his eminent position, but especially the chiliasm of his pupil, Papias, well agree with it. Bleek adverts also to the circumstance, that Aristion and Presbyter, as teachers of Papias, were probably employed near Hierapolis, not far from Laodicea, to which city one of the seven letters of the Apoc. is directed. Though these reasons are not sufficient to establish probability, and though the exceptions that Hitzig takes against this view are worth considering, it is at least an hypothesis justified under the critical difficulties of the question. Comp. Lücke, Comment. zum Evang. John. 3d ed., I., p. 27, sqq., and his Versuch einer vollst. Einl. in die Offenb. Joh., 2 ed., II., p. 896, sqq.; Bleek, Beiträge, p. 192; Guericke: Fortgesetzte Beiträge zur Einl., p. 4, sqq., and his Gesamtgesch., p. 47; also the articles of Jachmann and Wieseler, in Pelts theol. Mittheilungen, 1839 and '40, and Grimm in Ersch and Gruber, Encyclop.

This is the place where we may briefly advert to the fabulous person of Prester John, of so much renown in the middle ages. From the 12th to the 13th century, rumors of a Christian king-priest in Asia were repeated by Latin and Oriental writers, and generally believed in the West. Johannes quidam, qui ultra Persidem et Armeniam in extremo oriente habitans rex et sacerdos cum gente sua Christianus est sed Nestorianus (Otto von Freisingen, VII., ep. 33). So firm was the belief in his existence, that Pope Alexander III. sent from Venice, 1177, an apostolical letter to this presumed Joannes Rex Ind. In the 14th century Presbyter Johannes is heard of in Æthiopia. More than once he is called a Nestorian, while it is well known that the Nestorians extended their influence far into Asia. One of their patriarchs in Bagdad, with the name of Joan, is said to have been in communication with a king of the Kerait, who had been converted. The Portuguese historian, Joao de Barros, tells positively, that, among the Tartars, there were Christian princes belonging to the Nestorian sect, who were called by the heathenish Tartars, Vang-Khan, and, by their own subjects, Jovano, corrupted from Jonas. All this seems to indicate an early spread of Christianity among Eastern nations, but the name of "Presbyter John" is not accounted for. Whether the Nestorian patriarch, Joan, gave his name to the Tartar prince whom he baptized, or whether Joannes Rex is to be derived from the Chinese title, Vang-Khan, or whether, as J. J. Schmidt suggests, the high regard in which John the Baptist was held in Central Asia, among the Christian Zabians, led to the adoption of that name, remains a matter of mere conjecture. Comp. Ersch and Gruber, Encycl.; J. J. Schmidt, Forschungen im Gebiete der älteren Bildungsgesch. der Mongolen und Tübeter, Petersb., 1824, p. 162, Ritter, Erdkunde von Asien, I., p. 283, sqq. Gass. — Seidensticker.

John of Salisbury (Sarisberiensis, Salisb., Severianus, Parvus, Petitus), was one of the most distinguished thinkers, writers, and churchmen of the 12th cent. Born (c. 1110,) at Salisbury, in humble circumstances, he went to France, c. 1136, and enjoyed the instructions of such men as Abelard, William de Conchis, and probably Carnotensis (Metalog. I. 5; II. 10). By learning and teaching he not only acquired the literary treasures of his age, but unusual familiarity with ancient lore. In Paris he received the doctorate, and publicly lectured. After spending some years with his friend, the Abbot Peter, of Moutier-la-Celle, he returned to England, with recommendations from Peter, and Bernard of Clairvaux, was made chaplain to Archb. Theobald of Canterbury (1151), and rendered him and Becket important services. On a commission to Rome, 1156, he took occasion to speak plainly to Hadrian IV. of the corruption of the Church and the papacy, though he warmly vindicated the unity and liberty of the Church, and the rights of the episcopate, against all secular encroachments. Hence, he recognized the claims of Alexander III., stood firmly by Becket, as archbp., to his martyrdom, and afterwards procured his canonization (1173). After serving Becket's successor, Richard, for some years, he was appointed (1176) B. of Chartre, and worthily discharged the duties of this office until his death, in 1180 (others say 1181, or Oct. 24, 1182).—John of S. also occupies an important place, for his age, as a writer. Besides his valuable letters to popes, bishops, &c. (302 epp. ad diversos, ed. Masson. Paris, 1611; 7 epp. in Duchesne; and 93 epp. in the corresp. of S. Thom. Cantuar.) he wrote: 1) Policraticus s. de nugis curialium et vestigiis philos. libri VIII. (Ludg. 1691); 2) Metalogicus, l. IV. (Ludg. 1610; Amst. 1664, in the bibl. Patr. Lugd. T. XXIII.), an exhibition of true and false science; 3) A poetical sketch: Entheticus de dogmate philosophorum. These are his chief productions. In addition, he wrote: Vita ac Passio St. Thomas (Becket), Vita Anselmi, (in Wharton's Anglia sacra) a penitential, treatises de malo exitu tyrannorum, de statu Rom. Curie, de mathematica, speculum rationis, spec. statitice. The latest ed. by J. A. Giles, Lond., 1848, 2 Parts. — Reuter (l. c.) says he neither had the acuteness of Abelard, the profoundness of Anselm, nor the beautiful symmetry of Hugo St. Victor, though he somewhat resembles each. He excelled in a critical talent, and possessed great learning. — (See Hist. de la France XIV., 89 sqq.; Du Pin, Nouv. bibl. IX., 167; Schlosser, Vincenz v. B. II., 64; J. Schmidt, Joan. Parv. Sarisb., &c., 1838; H. Reuter, J. von Salisb., Berl., 1842; H. Ritter, Gesch. d. Philos., Bd. VII., 605, &c.). WAGENMANN.*

John Scholasticus, also called Climacus, distinguished himself, during the second half of the sixth century, as a monk and zealous promoter of monastic life. He became abbot of a monastery at Sinai, where he died about 606, aged almost a hundred years. He received the name Climacus from his treatise καίμαξ τοῦ παραδισίου, scala paradisi, which aided the development of ascetic mysticism in the Greek Church. It is a sketchy description of those states of the soul, and physical transitions, which are gradually to purify man and to lead him to the highest point of Divine life. The object of the work is not entirely theoretic and contemplative, but just as much practical, wherefore it is not to be wondered, that this treatise was celebrated among Greek monks for centuries, and was widely circulated. It was first published in Latin: ex Ambrosii Camaldulensis versione Venet. 1531, 1569. Colon. 1583, cum enarrationibus Dion. Carthus. Colon. 1540, 1601, also an editio Græcobarbara maximi Margunii, Venet. 1590. The Latin text cum scholiis Johannis de Rhaitu (which is to have occasioned the writing of the scala paradisi), also in Bibl. PP. max. Lugd. X., p. 390.—By the same author there yet exists: Liber ad religiosum pastorem, qui est de officio cœnobiarchæ ed. Matth. Rader. Monach. 1606, 1614, cum scholiis Eliæ Cretenensis. Both together in Johannis scholastici, qui vulgo Climacus appellatur, opera omnia gr. et lat. interprete Matthia Radero Lutet., Paris, 1633. Comp. besides the notices in Cave, and Oudin, and FABRICII, B. G. VIII., p. 615, ed. I.; concerning his life: DANIELIS Monachi vita Johannis Climaci gr. ex M. S. FLORENTINIS—in actis SS. Antv. d. 30. Mart. p. 835.

GASS.—Beck.

John Scholasticus, the patriarch, was born in the village of Sirimis near Antioch. In this city he became advocate and presbyter, and then held the office of an apocrisiarius at Constantinople. In 564 he was made patriarch, in the place of Eutychius, by the Emperor Justinian.

All that we know of John in a theological view is, that he wrote an address on the Trinity, which was opposed by John Philoponus (Phot. Cod. 75). This Scholasticus was more distinguished as a canonist. As presbyter at Antioch, he made a Collectio canonum, in which he embraced 85 so-called apostolical canons. A second collection, Nomo-canon, is also attributed to him, which also contains civil laws, and other Capita ecclesiastica. Both these collections are found in Latin and Greek in H. JUSTELLI's Bibliotheca juris canonici (Par., 1662, Tom. II., pp. 499, 603, 660. GASS. — Beck.

John St., Knights of (Johannitæ. Fratres hospitales s. Joh., Milites hosp. s. Joh. Hierosol., Hospitalarii), or of Rhodes, or Malta, an order which originated, 1048, in the association of a number of merchants of Amalfi, for the protection of pilgrims to Jerusalem. There they built, at the sepulchre of Christ, not only a church, but a monastery, under Benedictine rule. In a short time a hospital for poor and sick pilgrims was added, as also a chapel (St. John's), and the monks were called Johnites and Hospitaliers. Then, under Abbot Gerhard Tonque, Paschal II. (1099) granted it a special constitution, and Godfrey of Bouillon gave it large possessions. Gerhard's successor, Raymond du Puy (de Podio), who called himself Custos or Procurator, extended (1118) the duties of the Order by obligating the members to fight against infidels, and divided the society into three classes, knights, priests, and serving brethren, all which soon merged into a spiritual order of knights (warriors), ruled by a Magister hospitalis. The Order speedily acquired influence, power, wealth, and special privileges from the popes, and secured possessions, exempt from feudal claims, in almost every country. This prosperity soon worked the degeneracy of the Order, and unhappy feuds arose between it and the Templars, so that Alexander III. had to interpose. In 1187 the Order transferred its seat to Ptolemais. In 1241 new strifes broke out between it and the Templars, and this, with its spirit of self-aggrandizement, led to the loss of Palestine. When Ptolemais was taken by the Sultan of Egypt (1291), the Order made Limisso, in Cyprus, its seat, but in 1309 it took Rhodes, and held it until 1522. From the courage with which the Turks were repelled in 1311, 1312, the Grand Master bears the title F. E. R. T. (fortitudo ejus Rhodum tenuit). The Turks continued dangerous foes, twice besieging the island (c. 1450 and 1480), and taking it in Oct., 1622. The Grand Master Villiers then went to Candia, Sicily, and Rome, and the Order had no settled place until Charles V. gave them (1530) the islands Malta, Gozzo, Comino, and Tripoli, on feudal tenure, binding them to resist the Turks and pirates, protect Tripoli, annually furnish the governor of Sicily with a white falcon, acknowledge the king of Spain as patron of the Bishop of Malta, and restore Malta to Naples, should they ever retake Rhodes. From this time they were called Knights of Malta. The Reformation subjected them to some heavy losses. Henry VIII., of England, confiscated their estates there, and a like misfortune befel them in the Netherlands, North

Europe, and Germany. In 1586 Soliman II. besieged Malta, but was repelled. They retained Malta until the French revolution; in 1798 it was betrayed by some knights into Napoleon's hands. Ferdinand of Naples, the last Grand Master who resided in Malta, then went to Trieste, and laid down his office. The Order elected Paul I. of Russia in his place, though the Pope objected, as Paul belonged to the Greek C. In 1799 Max Joseph abolished the Order in Bavaria. In 1800 the English got possession of Malta, but by the Peace of Amiens they were to relinquish it; they failed to do so, however, and by the Peace of Paris, 1814, had their claim to it confirmed. In Germany and Italy the Order rapidly declined, though in 1826 the Pope allowed them to hold a chapter in Ferrara. In Prussia it was abolished, and its property confiscated, 1810–11, but in 1812 a decoration of the Order was instituted for the nobility, under the king, with the title Prussian Knights of St. John. The cross of the Order was retained, but decorated with four crested Prussian eagles, and a crown; on the left breast the knights wear a quadruple white cross. The old Order was restored, Jan. 6, 1853. In Austria, also, the Order ceased; in Bohemia it still continues, and in Russia is under the protectorate of the emperor. The seat of the chapter was at Catania, Sicily. Recently commanderies of the Order have been re-established in the Lombardo-Venetian territories.—During its bloom the Order consisted of seven nations or tongues, which sent delegates to the Chapter: 1) Provence, with the Grand Commander as President of the Treasury; 2) Auvergne, with the Marshal of the Order, who commanded the land forces; 3) France, with the Grand Master of the Hospital; 4) Italy, with the Admiral; 5) Aragonia, Navarra, and Catalonia, with the Grand Conservator; 6) Germany with the Grand Commandery of the Order; 7) Castile and Portugal, with the Grand Chancellor. To these, 8) England was previously added, with the Commandant of the Guard and Cavalry; its place was taken (c. 1795) by Bavaria, whilst Poland and Lithuania were first made a Grand Priory, and then the Russian branch. Each nation, again, was divided into priories, districts, and commanderies. The highest office of the Order was that of the Grand Master of the Hospital at Jerusalem, and Guardian of the poor of Christ; the Grand Master was chosen from the Chapter, which was his council. He enjoyed many important privileges; hence the government of the Order was partly monarchical, and partly aristocratic. The conditions of admission required noble descent, the payment of a large sum, and a participation for a time in contests against unbelievers; but the Pope or Chapter General might dispense from these. The age of sixteen was required. At seventeen the novitiate began, at eighteen the vows were taken. Only such as had entered without a dispensation could acquire office; these were designated, Knights of Righteousness; those admitted by dispensation, Knights of Grace. Although mainly composed of Roman Catholics, and specially favored by the Pope, Protestants and Greek Christians were also admitted. In all spiritual matters the Order was subject to the Pope, in temporals it had sovereign power. Its coat of arms was a silver, octagonal cross, in a red tunic, with a crown encircled by a rosary, and a small Maltese cross below, with the inscription: Pro fide. In time of peace the knights wore a long black cloak, with a white octagonal cross on it, and on their breast. In war their dress was a red tabard with a simple cross on the breast and back. — (See N. Niehammer, Gesch. d. Maltheserord. nach Vertot, Jena, 1792, 2 Th.; W. F. Wilke, Gesch. d. Tempelherrenord., Lpz., 1826, I., 82, &c.).

NEUDECKER.*

John's Fire was fire kindled, anciently by almost all nations, and still, in some places, on the eve of the anniversary of John the Baptist (June 24), in open air, on hills or mountains, also in streets and market-places, with various attendant usages. The fire was kindled by the friction of pieces of wood, young persons then ran around and through it, all kinds of flowers, herbs, garlands, &c., were thrown into it, priests blessed it, the surrounding crowd sang and shouted, a wheel of straw was fired and rolled down a hill, cattle driven through the fire, torches were carried through the fields, &c. &c. The fire was thought to possess virtue to heal or ward off diseases (epilepsy, &c.), conflagrations, lightning, witches, and to secure fruitfulness. The origin of the custom cannot be certainly ascertained, but it unquestionably is connected with the fire and sun-worship of the ancient heathen Arian nations (reminding us of the Indian Agni, the Persian Mithra, Vestal virgins, and the Roman festival of Palilia), as the Celts, Germans, Slavi. It is probably associated with the idea of the summer solstice, the season of exposure to diseases caused by extreme heat, of ripening harvests, and also of the longest days and shortest nights. — Though the Church was cognizant of the relation of the summer solstice to John's-day, it at first zealously denounced the heathen customs of kindling fires, &c. (Augustine hom. de S. John, sermo 8; Conc. Constant., a. 680, can. 65); but the Romish spirit of accommodation soon yielded to popular feeling, and attempted to invest those customs with religious significations. Theologians of the 12th and 13th cent. already (JOHN BELATH, summa de div. offic., and DURANDUS, rationale div. off. 7, 14) refer John's fire to John 1: 8, &c. Others trace the fire to a legend of the burning of the relics of the Baptist in Sebaste, and the dancing to that of Herodias, &c. These explanations, however, spring from a desire to disconnect the custom from all relationship with old heathen usages. During the last few centuries this, like many other popular heathen practices, has either been prohibited or gone into disuse. — (See, besides general works on eccl. archæology (as Rheinwald, p. 246) — PACIANDI, de cultu S. Joh. Bapt. antiq. christ. Rom., 1758; DE KHAUTZ, de ritu ignis, &c., Vindob. 1759; Ersch and Gruber, Encycl. II., 22, p. 265; especially J. GRIMM, D. Mythol. p. 578, 81, 83, &c. Collections of German traditions and customs by Kuhn, Panzer, Meier, Schmitz, Wolf, &c.)

WAGENMANN.*

Joktan, a Hebrew Shemite (Gen. 10: 25; 1 Chron. 1: 19), the progenitor of thirteen nations in Arabia, whither his tribe emigrated before Abraham's time (Gen. 10: 26–30). This earlier emigration is implied in the statement that Peleg's family did not emigrate until in the fourth generation. As Abraham is called a Hebrew (Gen. 14: 13), we may suppose, with Ewald (Isr. Gesch. 1, 337), that the Joktanites also went by this name, changed however, from עֶרְכָּא to עֶרְבָּא, with allusion to the steppes they inhabited (Is. 21: 13). The etymology of the name Joktan is truly Semitic, or like primitive Hebrew, but it was subsequently arabicised, hence the Arabs call their progenitor Kachtan (= Joktan). They unanimously pronounce the Joktan Arabs the true aborigines of Arabia, who occupied the southern peninsula, and possessed Yemen and Arabia Felix. In Yemen, S. of Mecca, on the Red Sea, there is a district still called Kachtan, in which Edrisi, the earlier Arabian geographer, locates a town called Beischat-Jaktan. Even the sepulchre of Joktan is still pointed out near Keschin (NIEBUHR, 2, 287, &c. Pocock, Spec. hist. Arab., p. 32). Northern Arabs are thought of less pure Arab blood, the Ishmaelites excepted. The descendants of Joktan, therefore, early settled that part of Arabia (Felix) to which the proximity of the sea, and a fertile soil attracted them. Were the inhabitants of Arabia better known, the tribes mentioned in Gen. 10: 26–29 might still be found there, for their different clans set great store upon keeping distinct. — (See ALB. SCHULTENS, hist. imperii vetust. Joctan. in Arab. felice ex Albufeda. Haderov., 1786, 4to.)

VAIHINGER.*

Jonah, the Prophet. The small prophetic book bearing this name is distinguished from all the other prophetic books in this, that not prophecy, but the prophet, is the chief subject of it. The leading contents of Jonah's preaching in Nineveh is mentioned in only a few words, chap. 3: 4. It treats mainly of the personal history of the prophet. This is also unique in its character. In the first place, his mission was an extraordinary one — to go as a stranger and preach repentance to distant, proud Nineveh. Then this mission, as appears to us, could not have been entrusted to one more unworthy, for he was cowardly and fled. By a wonderful discipline he was arrested and changed. He went to Nineveh, preached, and — contrary to his expectation — the city repented, and was saved. If he was previously faint-hearted, he now became insolent. That Nineveh was not destroyed offended him, and besides, that the vine which gave him shade should suddenly wither, filled him with chagrin, and he wished to die.

There is scarcely a portion of Biblical history that, since Lucian (Ver. hist. L., I., p. 94, sq., ed. Reitz), has been and is still more ridiculed, than this. Since the rise of Protestant criticism, the most diverse attempts have been made to discover the ideal sense (since the real was subject of ridicule). Besides the attempts to apprehend only portions of the narrative as symbols of some kind of an idea, even a historical one (as ex. gr. already, Abarbanel regarding the sleeping of Jonah (1:5) as hinting, that the following is to be understood as a dream, and Clericus (Biblioth. anc. et mod., XX., 2, 459), supposing that by the whale was signified a ship with the sign of a whale), or to obtain another than the normal grammatical sense by philosophical explanation (Anton, in Paulus N. Repert., II., p. 36, sq., translates 2: 1, בִּטְחָן הָיָה "on the belly of the whale"), there are many others who regard the whole either as a myth, or tradition, or as an allegory. Those who affirm the mythical character of the portion point to the myth of Hesion and of Hercules, the latter of whom sprang into the throat of the sea-monster which threatened the former, and after three days' abode came forth unharmed (Diodor. Sic., IV., 42; Apollod., II., 5, § 9-12). Others refer to the myth of Andromeda (PLINY, H. Nat., V., 14, 34; IX., 4; Strabo, XVI., p. 759). Baur (in Illgen's Zeitschr., 1837, VII., p. 201, sq.) discovers in Jonah even the sea-monster, Oannes, which taught the Babylonians art and manners (Beros. in EUSEB., Chron., I., 20, sq.; Richter, p. 48). — The number of the allegorists is, therefore, very large. They are most completely enumerated by P. Friedrichsen, krit. Uebersicht der versch. Ansichten von d. Buch Jona nebst einem neuen Vers. üb. dass., Lpzg., 2. Aufl., 1841. I mention only the learned Hermann von der Hardt, who attempts to demonstrate in numerous treatises (Jonas in carcharia., Helmst., 1718; ænigmata Jonæ, 1719; ænigmata prisci orbis et al.), that the history of the prophet is an allegorical shell for the history of the kings Manasseh and Josiah. The view, that the history is a national Hebrew tradition of the prophets with historical kernels, not to be more closely defined, and with didactic objects in view, is at present most widely accepted by the representatives of modern criticism. Of these we mention B. Knobel, Proph. d. Hebr., II., p. 369, sq.; Winer, Realw. s. v.; Ewald, Pr. d. A., B. II., p. 554, sq.; De Wette, Einl., p. 358, sq.; E. Meier, Gesch. d. poet. Nat. Lit. d. Hebr., p. 503, sq. — For all those, to whom Christ is the Son of the triune God, the centre of the Scriptures, and as well as the security and touch-stone for the truthfulness of its historical narrations, for all such the words of the Lord, Matt. 12: 39, sq.; 16: 4; Luke 11: 29-32, contain an incontrovertible guarantee for the reality of the facts contained in the book of Jonah. By this is by no means said, however, that Christ also guarantees the form in which the present book of Jonah relates the facts.

That Jonah (יְהוֹנָתָן, Iōnās) is identical with Jonah, son of Amittai of Gath-hepher, mentioned, 2 Kings 14: 25, is not to be doubted. This being so, then we know that Jonah belonged to the kingdom of Israel, and when he lived. For Gath-hepher was in the tribe of Zebulun (Josh. 19: 13), and 2 Kings 14: 25, takes us back at least to the time of the second Jeroboam, who reigned, 825-784. Accordingly Jonah was a cotemporary of Joel, Amos, Hosea, and (if we do not err) Obadiah. At the same time it is to be well observed, that this historical fact explains Jonah's mission to Nineveh. For Assyria was then on the point of elevating itself to the government of the world. The kings of Israel had already placed themselves under his protection (Hosea 5: 13). How proper was it not now, that the Lord should give this mighty nation, which was to exercise so great an influence on the destiny of the theocracy, a presentiment of his power and glory!—how encouragingly must not this have reacted on Israel, and how humiliating the example of penitent Nineveh for impenitent Israel! There is great difference of opinion as to the time when the book of Jonah was written. The interpreters of it waver between the time of Menahem (771 A. C.) and the Maccabees. Comp. the introductions and especially Delitzsch, über das B. Jona in Rudelb. u. Guer. Zeitsch., 1840, II., p. 112, sq.

The most important modern treatises on Jonah, besides those named, are: Grimm, der Pr. Jonas übers. with Nügelbach's annot. Düsseldorf, 1798; Goldhorn, Exkurse zum B. Jonas. Ein Beitrag zur Beurtheilung d. neu. Erkl. d. Pr., Lpzg., 1803; Hitzig, die 12 kl. Pr. erkl. (im kurzgef. Hdbch.), 1838; Krahmer, A. W., d. B. Jonas hist. krit. untersucht. Quedlinburg, 1846; Schreg, die kleinen Propheten übers. u. erkl., Regensburg, Manz, 1854.

E. NÜGELBACH.—Beck.

Jonas, Bishop of Orleans (Aurelianensis), one of the most distinguished princes of the Frankish Church in the 9th century, succeeded Theodulph (821), and held the See under Lewis the Pious and Charles the Bald. He attended the Paris Council of 829, and died 844. In his de cultu Imaginum (publ. Colon., 1554, 12mo.; also in Bibl. max., XIV., 167, &c.), written by command of Lewis, he advocates a medium position between that of Claudius of Turin (see Art.) and of image-worshippers. He seems, despite his learning, to have shared many of the prejudices of his age, as well as in regard to the efficacy of the sacraments, and rights of the priesthood, as to image-worship and relics. He also limited the atoning virtue of Christ's death to sins committed before baptism; subsequent sins had to be washed out by a baptism of tears and blood (cf. his Libri tres de instit. laicali, in D'ACHERY, Spicileg., I., 258, &c.). Instead, however, of a merely outward righteousness, he demanded a radical change of heart, condemned the moral laxity of his times, and deplored the decline of discipline. And yet he treats ethics in a very external way, as appears from his enumeration of eight mortal sins (I., III., c. 6). Finally, he wrote a work which D'Achery entitled (Spicil., I., 323, &c.): de institutione regia; it is a letter of counsel, &c., to the young king, Pepin, and contains precepts which the Paris Council of the following year adopted (cf. SCHRÖCKH, K.-gesch., XXIII., 294, 416, &c.).

HAGENBACH.*

Jonas, Justus (originally Jodocus), was born at Nordhausen, June 5, 1493. In 1508 he went to the University of Erfurt, to study jurisprudence. There he became intimately attached to Eoban Hess, the poet, and by his advice visited Erasmus, with whom he afterwards maintained a correspondence. Meanwhile he obtained the degrees of Mag. Art. and Doct. of civil and eccl. law; also a canonry at St. Severus Church. But he, too, had been deeply impressed by Luther's movement, and in 1519 devoted himself to theology. Erasmus, in a letter of July 1, 1519, warmly encouraged him in this (Vol. V., 27 of the London ed.). Luther, also, expressed his joy that Justus had formed this resolution (Letter of June 21, 1520). In 1521 he entered into the closest fellowship with Luther, accompanied him to Worms, and soon became provost of the cathedral at Wittenberg. On Sept. 24 the University made him a licentiate, and on Oct. 14, 1521, a Doctor of Theology. Thenceforth he toiled in Wittenberg as one of the most zealous promoters of the Reformation. His great gift was eloquence; Melancthon calls him orator. As he had declined the professorship of canon law, properly connected with the provostship, his labors were divided between preaching and theological lectures. In 1529 Mathesius heard him expound some Psalms and the Catechism. Among the addresses of Melancthon, we have two of J.'s academic lectures: "de gradibus in Theologia," and "de studiis theologicis." He also co-operated in the translation of the Bible, furnished a metrical version of Ps. 124 ("Wo Gott der Herr nicht bei uns hält"), and in 1523 wrote in defence of the marriage of priests. He translated many of Luther's and Melancthon's Latin works into German, and the reverse. He, with Agricola, were appointed to prepare a Catechism (see Schneider's krit. Ausg. d. kl. Kat., XX.). In all the great movements of the Reformation he took part, and his legal knowledge was of great service. In 1527-8 he served as Visitor, in 1529 was on Luther's side at Marburg, and his letters on this occasion are a valuable historical source. In 1530 he aided Mel. in finishing the Augustana, and he attended the Frankfort convention of 1538. — His removal to Halle in 1541 gave a new turn to his life. Archb. Albert of Mayence had grown weary of his opposition to the Reformation there, and Justus with Andr. Poach were called thither by evangelical citizens. On Good Friday he preached his first sermon at St. Mary's, and soon after was chosen minister and superintendent; the same year, yet, the Ulrich Church embraced the gospel. Justus then prepared a concise liturgy, which was used, unaltered, for a century. But he did not succeed in driving the monks from Halle. He kept up an active correspondence with Luther, whose letters to him are most valuable. Justus was present at Luther's death, and followed the corpse to Wittenberg, preaching funeral sermons at Eisleben and Halle. It was a heavy blow for him also; his sorest troubles then commenced. He was commanded by Duke Maurice (Nov., 1546) to leave Halle; Christ. Türk, the Chancellor of Maurice, hated Jonas; Jonas had, also, expressed himself violently against Charles V. When John Frederick took possession of Halle, Jan. 1, 1547, Jonas returned for a short time; but after the battle of Mühlberg, he, with his pregnant wife, and seven children, had again to flee, in great terror (see Voigt's Briefwechsel d. berühmten Gelehrten mit Herz. Albrecht, 341, &c.). He labored for a time in Hildesheim, but never again found a permanent home in Halle. After tarrying awhile in Weimar and Jena, Duke John Ernest called him, 1551, as court-preacher to Coburg, from which place he arranged the eccl. affairs of Regensburg. After John Ernest's death, he was appointed, 1553, superintendent at Eisleben, where he died, Oct. 9, 1555. He was thrice married. His eldest son was drowned in the Saal; his son Justus became involved in the affair of Grumbau, and was executed (June 20, 1567) at Copenhagen. — The best old work on Jonas is the Comment. histor.-theologica de vita et obitu Justi Jonæ, by LAUR. REINHARD, Weimar, 1731; G. CH. KNAPP, Narratio de J. J., 1817, then improved in Knapp's Script. varii argumenti, Halle, 1823. His writings have never been collectively published. SCHNEIDER.*

Joppa (more properly Jopa; modern name: Jāfa, not Jaffa), so-called from its lofty situation, its steep and somewhat terraced streets, on the termination of a long ridge. Some old writers thought it an antediluvian town (Mela, 1, 11; PLIN., H. N., 5, 14). It has great antiquity, and is associated with many old heathen and Christian traditions, as the myth of Andromeda (Jos., B. J., III., 9, 3; Pausan., IV., 35, 6; Hieron. ad Jonam., c. 1, 3), the legend that Noah there built the ark, &c. It is situated on the Mediterranean, at the S. end of Sharon, and has a much frequented but dangerous harbor (Jos., l. c.), but still the best along that part of the coast. Located near Lydda (Acts 9: 38), 150 stadia S. W. of Antipatris (Jos., Antt., XIII., 15, 1), 9 miles W. of Ramleh, and 36-40 N. W. of Jerusalem, it always was the port of the last city, a mountain road from which ended at Joppa. Hence it was the chief commercial town along that coast. Before the exile the Israelites never got possession of it, hence it is rarely named in the O. T. It lay near Dan, but was held by the Phœnicians (Movers, Phœn., II., 2, p. 176, &c.), and said to have been founded by them, as from it they carried on a brisk inland trade with the Israelites (2 Chron. 2: 15; cf. Ezra 3: 7). At Joppa, Jonah (1: 3) took ship in his flight from the mission to Nineveh. Jonathan and Simon Maccab. (2 Macc. 12: 3, &c.) took it from the Syrians and fortified it (1 Macc. 10: 74, &c.; 12: 33, &c.; Jos., Antt., XIII., 14, 4; do., 9, 2). Afterwards Pompey attached it to the province of Syria (Jos., Antt., XIV., 4, 4), but Cæsar restored it to Hyrcanus (Jos., l. c., XIV., 10, 6), then Herod, and next Archelaus obtained it, and finally, it was again attached to Syria, and formed a separate toparchy of Judea. — At Joppa Peter restored Tabitha to life, and had his remarkable vision (Acts 9: 35; 10: 5, &c.; 11: 5). After Cestius laid it waste, in the Jewish war (Jos., B. J., II., 18, 10), it became a refuge of Jewish pirates (Strabo, XVI., p. 759), until Vespasian took it (Strabo, III., 9, 2). He erected a castle there, and the town was speedily rebuilt. In the course of succeeding centuries it was often destroyed and rebuilt, and especially during the Crusades frequently changed hands. It was early made an episcopal See, as is shown by signatures of the Councils of Ephesus, 431, and Jerusalem, 536. Baldwin I. fortified it, as also did Louis IX. of France, whilst the Mohammedans often laid it waste. But its advantageous location still secured its resuscitation. — The modern city lies in lat. 32° 3', 6'', and long. 32° 24' (from Paris), and has about 5000 inhabitants (Lynch says 13,000), four-fifths of whom are Mohammedans. It is governed by a Mutesellim, under the Pacha of Jerusalem. No ancient ruins are found there. Though unattractive, with its wall and ditch, one gate on the land side, another opening toward the sea, three monasteries (Greek, Latin, and Armenian), five mosques, one synagogue, a small Prot. congregation, and several schools—the site is beautiful, with its fertile adjacencies, and the temperature delightful, the thermometer rarely falling to the freezing-point, and the heat being moderated by the sea-breeze. Fruits abound, its watermelons being especially sought after. The orchards are separated by cactus hedges, 15 feet high, and one of them, not the largest (Lynch), contained 2500 orange, and 1500 citron trees. In 1799 it was sacked by Napoleon. It is still visited by Turkish, English, and Austrian steamboats, carrying tourists and pilgrims to Jerusalem. — (See Reland, Palæst., p. 176, &c., &c.; Winer's R. W. B.; Ritter, Erdk., XVI., 47, &c., &c.; Lynch, Exped., &c.; Tobler, Topogr. v. Jerus., with a view of Joppa). *RÜRTSCH.

Jordan, the יַרְדֵּן, always with the article, it occurs only twice, Ps. 42: 7, and Job 40: 23, without it (concerning the etymology see Geenius, Thesaur., p. 626), Ἰορδάνης, Ἰορδάνος, in Pausan. V. 7, 3, the greatest, indeed the only river in Palestine, for the other waters of this country are only brooks, wādi's. In the Bible the Jordan is mentioned on the following occasions, apart from the geographical references, as beyond Jordan, at the Jordan, etc.; Lot's choice of the plain of Jordan (Gen. 13: 10, 11); Jacob's passage through the Jordan to Mesopotamia (Gen. 32: 10); the refusal of the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half of Manasseh to pass over the Jordan (Num. 32. Joshua 1: 12–18; 22: 1–10); its passage in a miraculous manner at Jericho (Joshua 3: 4); it is mentioned in the Book of Joshua as the boundary of the following tribes: of Reuben (13: 23); of Gad (13: 27); of Judah (15: 5); of Ephraim and Manasseh (16: 1, 7); of Benjamin (18: 12, 20), of Issachar (19: 22); of Naphtali (19: 33, 34). Generally it constituted the boundary between the Eastern and Western tribes (22: 25). It is also mentioned, in connection with important events, in Joshua 22: 10; Judges 3: 28, 7: 8, 12: 5, 6; 2 Sam. 19: 19; 2 Chron. 4: 17; 2 Kings 2: 8, 14; 14: 5, 10–17; 6: 2–8. The prophets praise its beauty (Jer. 12: 5; 49: 19; 50: 44; Zech. 11: 3). In the Apocrypha it is mentioned 1 Mac. 5: 24–54; 9: 42–49. In the N. T., finally, it is the scene of the labors of John the Baptist, and of the baptism of the Lord (Matt. 3: 6 sq.; Mark 1: 5 sq.; Luke 3: 3 sq.). The present course of the Jordan has been, in later times, as exactly determined, especially by Molyneux and Lynch, as any of the better known rivers of Europe. Its course embraces the middle part of the remarkable chasm in the Syrian plateau, which extends from the mouth of the Orontes to the Red Sea. It has its sources at the southern slope of Lebanon and at Hermon. Josephus

B. J., I., 21, 3; III., 10, 7; IV. 1, 1) mentions two Jordans, the one taking its rise at the Paneion, the other, called the "little Jordan," at Dan or Daphne. Both are the brooks which now rise at Bānjās (Cæsarea Philippi, see Article) and Tell el-Kādhi (Dan, see Article), and unite about three English miles south of Tell el-Kādhi. The third and most important source of the Jordan, which arises from Hāsbeiah, Josephus does not mention at all. This takes up many smaller streams from the west and pours them into the sea Hūleh. This sea receives besides many streams from the eastern and western mountains, especially in its north-west corner, in 'Ain el-Mellābah.

This is the sea Merom (מֵרֹם) of the O. T., Josh. 11: 5, 7. Josephus calls it Σαμπαζωνίτις or Σαμοζωνίτις λίμνη (comp. especially B. J. IV. 1, 1). Concerning it and the sources of the Jordan, see, in addition to the works to be mentioned hereafter: Maj. Robe, Country around the sources of the Jordan in Robinson's Biblioth. sacr. Vol. I., 1843, p. 9–14. W. M. Thomson, The sources of the Jordan, the lake el-Hūleh and the adjacent country, with notes by E. Robinson. The same, Vol. III., 1846, p. 186–214. Extracts from Dr. H. Hänel's Reisetagebuch in: Zeitschr. der D. M. Gesellsh., Bd. II., 1848, p. 427–431. Wilson, the Lands of the Bible, Vol. II., p. 161–180. The Jordan proceeds from the southern extremity of the sea in slow, and then from the bridge of Jacob, in rapid falls through a strip of high, unfruitful table-land, to the sea of Tiberias. The sea Merom is about 100 Paris feet above the level of the sea; the sea of Tiberias about 300 feet below it, so that the stream has a fall of 400 feet in the space of about nine miles. About one and a half miles below the sea Merom an old basalt bridge of three arches, yet in good condition, crosses the stream, called Dachir Beni or Benât Jákûb (bridge of the sons or daughters of Jacob), so named after the legend, that Jacob here crossed the Jordan on his return from Mesopotamia, Gen. 32: 22; 33: 17, 18. This bridge was built after the crusades, and probably simultaneously with the erection of the numerous khans on the great caravan-route from Egypt to Damascus. Besides this, no other bridge crosses the Jordan, but there are fords, of which mention is made already in Judges 3: 28; 12: 5, 6. Concerning the basin of the sea of Genesareth, see the respective Article. From this point the Jordan has been navigated twice its whole length, first in August, 1847, by Lieut. Molyneux, whose expedition to the Jordan and the Dead Sea appeared in the Journal of the Geogr. Soc., Vol. XVIII. 1848., p. 108 sq.; then by the American expedition under Lieut. Lynch, see Narrative of the United States expedition to the river Jordan and the Dead Sea: New York, 1849, 8vo., partly also in his official report to the Senate of the United States (30th Congress, 2d Session, Executive, No. 34, Feb., 1849), and enlarged as Official Report of the United States Expedition to explore the Dead Sea and the river Jordan: Baltimore, 1852, 4vo. From the sea of Genesareth to the Dead Sea the stream is called Urdunn, or es-Scheriâ el-Kebir, and flows rapidly in a tor-uous channel with a fall of about 1000 feet. This channel Lynch found sometimes broad, sometimes narrow, sometimes shallow, then deep, at the entrance into the Dead Sea, 180 yards wide and three feet deep. The water is cloudy, of a clay color, but sweet and refreshing, and has a rapid current, so that often some of the pilgrims, who yearly bathe in it on Easter Monday, in commemoration of the baptism of Christ, are drowned. This bathing-place is opposite Jericho. It is a general opinion, that of old the Jordan overflowed its banks, in the spring, like the Nile. Such an overflow does not occur now, and there probably was never anything more than the swelling of its waters after the spring rains, comp. Josh. 13:15; 1 Chron. 13:15; Sir. 24:36 (26). At the entrance of the Jordan into the Dead Sea ("the end of the Jordan," Josh. 15:5; 18:19) the plain of Ghôr is a salt-marsh. The opinion that the Jordan, in ancient times, again flowed out of the Dead Sea, and through the Wâde el-Arabah to the Gulf of Ailah, is contradicted by the structure of the ground, for the Wâde el-Arabah rises again from the Dead Sea, on far southward to the water-shed, and then falls into the Red Sea. But that the stream, in ante-historical times, may have had this course, is more than probable, comp. Ritter, Erdkunde XV., p. 770 sq.

Finally, we have yet to mention the more important tributaries of the Jordan. On the east side, from north to south, are: 1) the Hieromax of Pliny, H. N. V. 16, not mentioned in the Bible; in the Talmud Jarmoch, whence by the more ancient Arabic geographers (Edrisi ed. Jaubert. I., p. 333. Abulfeda ed. Reinaud, p. 48. Merâsid III., p. 339) Yarmûk, now Scherîât el-Mandhûr, from the resident Menadhere-Arabians. It rises in Hauran and Jaulân (Auranitis and Gaulonitis) and empties into the Jordan about six miles below the sea of Genezareth. 2) The Wâdi Zerka, the Jabbok of the O. T., see the Article. Among the brooks which flow in on the west side, is the Cherith of the

O. T., נַחַל כְּרִית, where Elijah was concealed, and fed by ravens, 1 Kings 17:3-7. Robinson (Pal. II., p. 534, sq.) and Wilson (The Lands of the Bible II., p. 5) find it in the Wâdi Kelt, although, according to the words of the Bible ("Get thee hence and turn eastward, i. e. from Samaria"), the Wâdi Fâri'a may also be meant, which, farther upward, somewhat south from where the Jabbok empties on the east side, falls into the Jordan. Concerning the Jordan, comp. in addition to the Travels (especially Robinson II., 498-509, III., 559-569, 603-621), and the works named above, especially Ritter, Der Jordan und die Beschiffung des Todten Meeres. Ein Vortrag. Berlin, 1850, 8vo. Erdkunde Bd. XV. 1, p. 152 to the end. ARNOLD.—Beck.

Jornandez (called, in Gothio, iburnaups, Ibornaud, eberkühn, also Jordanus, Jordanes, probably his monastic name), furnishes in his book the only, scanty, account we have of him. He lived c. 550, and was a Goth by descent, and in sentiment. His grandfather, Peria, was a notary of Prince Candax, and J. held a like office, but he does not say under whom; but most likely at the court of the Alani. Like most other Ostrogoths, he was a zealous Catholic. Subsequently, he became a monk (de Getar. s. Gothor., &c., c. 50; cf. Du CANGE, s. v. conversio). He was still a monk, probably in an Italian cloister, when he began his history of the Getæ. He seems afterwards to have become a bishop; at least mediæval writers often call him such. But where he resided, or had his See, is unknown. Some think at Ravenna, because he so vividly describes it (l. c., c. 29); but it had no bishops, but archbishops. Nothing else is known of him; not even whether he died before his friend Vigilus (†555).—Two of his works remain: de origine actunque Getarum, or de Getar. et s. Gothor. origine et rebus gestis (c. 551), and de regnorum et temporum successione, or Jordani episcopi liber de origine mundi et actibus Romanorum cæterarumque gentium, or De gestis Romanorum (c. 552). The former is dedicated to a friend, Castilius, the latter to Vigilus, whom Grimm supposes to be the Pope of that name (538-55). The former closes with the death of Vitiges (542, or 543), but adds a statement regarding Germanus (†550, or 551). Though the latter work is a compilation, it is important as furnishing portions of books since lost, and valuable accounts of eastern and northern countries. J. Grimm, and Krafft (K.-gesch. d. germ. Völker, I., 1, 77, &c.) have vindicated his view of the identity of the Goths and Getæ. Should this opinion prove correct, his history would greatly add to our knowledge of German antiquity. Cas- sel, however (Magyar. Alterth.), and H. v. Sybel (Ed. Schmidt's Ztschr. f. Gesch. Wiss., 1846, Bd. VI., 516, &c.) have questioned it. Among the sources from which J. compiled was Cassiodorus's de origine actunque Getarum, in XII. columnis, which has been lost. It was scarce even in J.'s time; he obtained the use of a copy for only three days, though he had before seen it. J. acknowledges that he quoted much from memory, adding matter of his own. The fragment from O. wears a mythic character. Another source used by J. was a collection of traditions by Ab- lavius (probably of the 5th century), also lost. They relate to the 2d-5th centuries, and were in the form of myths and songs. Other sources were Tacitus, Strabo, Claudius Ptolemæus, Pompon. Mela, both the Dions (whom he thought but one person), Pomp. Trogus, Symmachus, Dex- ippus, &c.—The other work of J., consists, be- sides original matter, of almost literal extracts from Florus, Marcellianus, Comes, Eusebii chron. lib. post Hieron. interp., &c. It is of little value.—J. modestly disclaims all pretensions to learn- ing, and his works exhibit no erudition. Grimm pronounces him a wretched compiler. His style is partly obscure, heavy, and labored, though copyists may deserve some blame for these faults. His historical, as well as geographical statements, are often unconnected and confused. Facts and perversions are often mixed up, with- out his seeming to see the contradiction. Wri- ters and subjects are confounded, important matters omitted, and insignificant things en- larged upon. And whilst he usually follows authorities in a servile manner, at times he makes arbitrary alterations.—Whatever minor objects he may have had in view in writing these works, the main one was evidently to extol the Gothic nation, and, above all, the royal family of the Amali. He was an Ostrogoth, and related to that family. And his partisan aversion to the Arians renders his statements in regard to them unreliable.—The works of J. seem also to have had a political aim, viz., to effect a closer union between the Romans and the Goths, by showing that both had long been friends and confederates, and that the hope of both nations rested in the perpetuation and closer cementing of the bonds which united them.—(Upon the editions of these works, cf. J. A. FABRICII, Bibl. Eut., lib. III., c. 17, T. I., p. 660, and T. III., p. 251; BÄHR, Gesch. d. Röm. Lit. Suppl., 1 Abth., p. 134.—Monographs: D. G. MÖLLER, Diss. circ. De Jornande, Altdorf, 1690, 4to.; DU BUNT, Abhh. d. churf. bair. Akad. d. Wiss., 1763, Bd. I., 97; S. FREUDENSPRUNG, comm. de Jornande, Monaci, 1837; Akad. d. W. 5, März., 1846; Ak. d. W. zu Berl., 1848, phil. u. hist., Abhh., p. 1–60; H. DE SYBEL, De fontibus libri Jordanis, De or. actuque Get., Diss. inaug., Berol., 1838.) J. WEIZSÄCKER.*

Joseph, of Arimathea, a rich man (Matt. 27:57), a disciple of Christ, but prevented by fear from publicly confessing him (John 19:38), was an honorable counsellor (Mark 15:43), and was born in Arimathea. The form of his name does not point to Rama in the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. 18:25) not far from Gibeah and Geba (Judges 19:13; Isa. 10:29; Hos. 5:8), but much rather to Romathaim (רֹמַתַּיִם, 1 Sam. 1:1), which took its name from the two parts of which the town was composed, and was situated in the land of Zuph, whence it had the surname Zophim, 1 Sam. 1:1, sometimes also called simply Rama, 1 Sam. 1:19; 7:17. Josephus calls it (Antt. V., 10, 2) Ramatha, Will. Tyr., p. 785, Ramula juxta Liddam, the Arabs (Abulf. tab. syr. p. 79) Ramlath, now Ramla.—Joseph has been regarded (by Erasmus, Michaelis) as a counsellor in his native town, as a municipal counsellor at Jerusalem (Grotius), also as a counsellor of the temple (Lightfoot); but, from Luke 23:51, it appears that he had a voice in pronouncing judgment on Christ, consequently he was a member of the chief council. He therefore lived in Jerusalem, where he had a piece of ground in which was a tomb hewn out of the rock (Matt. 27:60). The question concerning the situation of this tomb is connected with the question concerning the situation of Golgotha, for it was not far from this, John 19:42. See the Art. Sepulchre, the holy, at Jerusalem. The tradition (comp. ASSEMANI, bibl. 3, 1, 319) that Joseph was one of the seventy disciples, and the other report (ITTIQ, diss. de pat. ap. § 13, p. 21), that he first preached the gospel in England, are simple fables.

VAHINGER. — Beck.

Joseph, the son of Jacob, by Rachel, became especially endeared to his father on account of his pious spirit, integrity, and filial devotion to his aged parent, which exhibit him in strong contrast with his ruder brothers (Gen. 30:22, &c.; 37:2, 3; 39:9; 41:16; 42:18; 45:8; 50:19, &c.), and won for him favor with God and man (39:2, 21; 41:37, &c.). The vanity he seems at first to have displayed, and subsequent severity (KURTZ, Anc. Cov.) were but transient spots in an otherwise pure and noble character. To this excellence of character was added the gift of prophecy (37:5, &c.; 40:5, &c.; 41:1, &c.). This made him (like Daniel) a worthy representative of Israel among the heathen, and secured for him political honors. As a statesman he exhibited extraordinary talents, but ultimately retired in faith with his family, from civil functions, within the sacred circle of his father's house (48:1, &c.; 50:24, &c.; Hebr. 11:22).—The interesting history of Joseph is so familiar, that we may omit details. Its significance may be contemplated in a three-fold aspect. First, as it concerned himself, it furnishes one of the most beautiful and instructive illustrations of a special Providence (50:20). It is this, connected with the attractive character of Joseph, which has made his story so generally popular.—In regard to his family and nation, the history of Joseph shows how the Lord transplanted the house of Jacob to Egypt, that it might there enjoy the most favorable opportunities of growth and development into a nation (45:7; cf. Ps. 105:17, 23, &c.). This could not have so readily been secured in Canaan, where the descendants of Abraham would have been more exposed to the seductions of heathenism, and wasting conflicts. In Egypt a fertile district was assigned them, and yet it was arranged by Joseph's wisdom, under Divine guidance, that they should not only be geographically separated from the natives, but kept still more distinct by their occupation, herdsmen, which was an abomination to Egyptians. There, likewise, by proximity to the most cultivated nation of that period, Israel might appropriate many of its elements of civilization, and yet be surrounded with guards against prevailing idolatry, until, after passing through the needful process of national growth and training, they would be prepared to occupy the promised land.—The Church has always regarded Joseph and his history as typical of Christ. To urge the analogy in reference to single points, as that Joseph was sold for twenty pieces of silver, that he also had two malefactors beside him in his

* They are the following: the Get. hist. alone: Edit. Aug. Vindelice., 1515, fol. ap. J. Stiller, together with Paul Warnefrid de gest. Longob. An impr. ed. by Fornerius, from a cod. Ms. Pithoei, in his opp. Cassiod., Par., 1588, fol.; Ed. ex recognit. Bonavent. Vulcanii, Lugd. Bat., 1617, 8vo. (copied from Fornerius); BRONSKIUS, in opp. Cassiod., Genév., 1650, a new rev. of Fornerius's ed.; H. GROTIUS, de reb. Goth., &c., Amstelod., 1655, 8vo. A reprint of Fornerius.—Ed. GAZIUS, 1679, Notomag., fol., vol. I., ex., p. 379, commended by Muratori as the most accurate; Ed. MURAT., Scriptt. rerr. Italice. Mediol., 1723, T. I., fol., follows Garet's ed., with the readings of a Cod. Ambros.—Both histories: FRID. SYLBURGIUS, Hist. Rom. scriptt., Francof., 1588, fol.; Corpus hist. Rom. scriptt. lat. vet., Genév., 1609 et 1652, fol., T. II.; JAN. GRUTERUS, hist. Augusta Scriptt. latt. minores., Hann., 1611, fol., ex cod. Palat.; FRID. LINDENBROGIUS, ed. Hamb., 1611, 4to., much better than previous ones, collated with a cod. Palat. et Ardebatens.; Bibl. Patr. Max. (Lugd.), T. XI., p. 1052, &c., reprint of the ed. Grut.

deepest sufferings, one of whom (the chief butler) found favor, &c., would be of small moment. But in a deeper sense the type holds good; indeed, Joseph's history may be styled a graphic delineation of the essence of all typology. He has, as a type, nothing to do with the promise, therefore he is the more significant. It belongs to his historical position, that his life exhibits certain principles of the kingdom of God, which, in the nature of the case, had their highest fulfilment in Christ. And, in this more comprehensive view, the details of his life, considered as ordered by God, acquire importance, by directing attention to the inward relation of the type to the antitype. Notwithstanding Joseph's importance, he does not become a fourth patriarch, along with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. With these the patriarchate, with its covenant and promise, closes. A new phase in the history of revelation begins with Joseph; he left the narrow family circle in which he grew up, to open fresh paths for the kingdom of God, just as Christ left the sphere of the Old covenant in order to establish the New. And this occurred in both cases according to the same laws of development. To Joseph's time the ungodly elements (Ishmael, Esau) were excluded from the holy family; now, when the family is to become a nation, all the sons of Jacob remain within its sphere, within which the antagonistic elements show themselves, first among the twelve progenitors of the tribes, then in the nation at large—the opposition between the true spiritual and the carnal Israel. In this fact we find the real essence of the typical relation of Joseph to Christ. "In the person of Joseph God most beautifully delineated Christ and his kingdom in a bodily form. The sum of the figure is: 'As Joseph's brother did to him, so do the Jews unto Christ.'" (Luther). The righteous man in whom the true character of Israel is depicted, is hated by the fleshly majority of his brethren, sold, delivered to the Gentiles; among these, too, must he suffer, because he condemns their sins. But the way of suffering leads to glory, and this proves of primary advantage to the Gentiles, because Israel rejected him. Only after a long time Israel is driven to repentance by the judgment of God; then he whom they rejected reveals himself as their brother, pardons them, and bestows upon them abundance of blessings. Thus the type points still to the future.—(Cf. HEIM, Bibelstunden, p. 540–9; VITRINGA, obs. s. VI. 21; KURTZ, Sacred History, p. 94). As the history of Joseph is so closely interwoven with that of Egypt (see Art.), other accounts of him, besides the biblical, merit notice. All these concentrate in the history of the Hyksos (cf. KURTZ, Old Cov.). Josephus (c. Ap. I., 14, 26, quotes two passages from MANETHES Ægyptiaca, which he supposes refer to the arrival and residence of the Israelites in Egypt, and to their departure from the country. He also cites (l. c., 32) Cheremon's account of the withdrawal of a large number of diseased persons from Egypt, under the leadership of the scribes, Moyses and Josepos, whose Egyptian names were Tisithes and Peteseph. JUSTIN likewise correctly relates (Hist., XXXVI., 2) some leading incidents in Joseph's history, and calls Moses his son. Hengstenberg, Hofmann, Delitzsch, and others, agree with Josephus in considering the Hyksos (=Shenherd-kings, or captive shepherds) identical with the Israelites. Hengst. and Delitzsch think Salatis means Joseph (cf. Gen. 42:6). Del. even assumes that the Isr. ruled for a time in Egypt, but this is untenable. And as the Hyksos certainly were dominant, and even Manetho clearly distinguishes between them and the leprous people mentioned, whom the Egyptian tradition identifies with the Jews, most scholars now consider the Hyksos identical with one or several of the Pharaoh dynasties, and suppose they obtained dominion in Egypt about the time Jacob and his family emigrated thither, and that Ex. 1:8. refers to their expulsion.—(For authorities, see Art. Jacob). AUBERLEN.*

Josephus, Flavius, the well-known Jewish historian. I. The leading facts of his life. Related, through his father, to the priesthood, and through his mother to the royal family of Asmoneans (see Maccabees), he was born A. D. 37, the son of Matthias Ephias (hump-backed), and a daughter of Jonathan the high-priest (Autobiogr., 1; Antt., XVI., 7. 1; c. Ap., I., 10). In early youth he showed great talent (this may be an imitation of Luke 2:46, 47), and was destined for the priesthood, and hence successively joined the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes, and then spent three years with the recluse, Banus. But a man of his active, practical, ambitious spirit preferred the popular, dominant sect of the Pharisees, to either the speculative Sadducees, or ascetic Essenes; to it, therefore, he adhered, so far as he could consistently with his Hellenist culture and tastes. In 63 (almost simultaneously with Paul, and with like adventures. Life, 3), he visited Rome, became acquainted with Nero and Poppea (a patroness of Judaism, Antt., XX., 8. 11), who dismissed him with rich presents. Not long after his return to Judea, the insurrection (66) of the Jews against the Romans broke out. He joined it, and received command of Galilee, and for some time operated there energetically, but when Jotapata was taken he surrendered himself to the Romans. (Life, 87–4). His prophecy of the future greatness of Vespasian saved his life, and secured the favor of V. and Titus (B. J., III., 8, 9; Suet., Vesp., 5; G. OLEARIUS, dissert. de vatic. Jos. de Vesp., Lps., 1699, 4to.; TH. A. STROHBACH, Diss. de Jos. Vesp. imp. prædic., &c., Lps., 1648, 4to.). In honor of them he took the surname Flavius. He was at the destruction of Jer., accompanied Titus to Rome, where, under imperial patronage, he devoted himself to study (Life, 75, &c.; c. Ap., I., 9, 10.) After Domitian's death he seems to have withdrawn from the court. He was still living in the 5th year of Trajan (A. D. 103), but hardly survived him.—II. His still happily extant works are: 1) The wars of the Jews (περί τοῦ Ἰουδαίου πολέμου or Ἰουδαϊκῆς ἱστορίας περί ἀλώσεως), in seven books, originally written in Syro-Chaldaic for Jews in Asia (Pref., 1, 2). This is lost, for the Hebrew translation, made from a Latin version in the 9th cent., by a Jew in France, could not long pass for the original (see Ersch and Gruber, Allg. Encykl., II., 23, 184). This Greek work, designed for the Emperor, and educated persons (Life, 65; c. Ap., I., 9). was written in Rome, not before 75, and as the account of an eye-witness, is inestimable. A Latin abstract, attributed to Hegesippus, is added to the works of Ambrose of Milan. 2) The Antiquities of the Jews (Ἰστανή Ἀρχαῖα), in 20 books, published in a. 94, contains their history from the creation to Nero's 12th year. His main source was the O. T. for earlier times, and for later periods Nicholas of Damascus (see MÜLLER, Fragm. Hist. Gr., III., 342, &c.). His chief aim was apologetic (see Pref., VIII., 4, 3; XII., 2, 3, 1). Both works roused violent opposition; the former especially from Justus of Tiberias, to whom the 3) Autobiography, is a reply. It appeared as an appendix to the Archæology, but at least seven years after it. 4) Against Apion (see Art.), two books in vindication of the antiquity and nobility of the Jews. Whether, 5) the work, Εἰς Μακκαβαίων λόγος, &c. (which appears as 4 Maccab. in many ed. of the LXX.), was written by Jos. is not certain. 6) Περὶ πατρός is certainly spurious (Phot. bibl. cod., 48). Jos. intended writing four books on "God and his nature," and a work Upon the laws (Antt., XX., 11, 2; III., 5, 6; VIII., 10). That Upon Customs (IV., 8, 2), and the contemplated Αἰτιολογία (I., 1, 1; cf. Pref., IV.; I., 10, 5; III., 6, 6) were probably never completed.—III. The personal character of Jos. was not very elevated. He owed his prosperity as much to selfish craft as to real talents. Many Pharisaic faults are obvious in him (cf. Ullmann, Stud. u. Krit., 1859, 4, p. 809–44). The old Jewish heroism had degenerated in him into artfulness and cunning. Still he remained a genuine Jew, and ranks with Philo as the chief apologist of Judaism. His credibility as a historian is unquestionable; only in a few cases national prejudices or personal interest may have led him astray. The works of fiction he cites, he thought authentic.—For strictly theological purposes, his works yield but little. As a Jewish theologian he forms a sort of transition to modern Judaism, combining rabbinical superstition and pharisaic scrupulousness with bold rationalism. He had no truly religious apprehension of the O. T. In many respects he is the counterpart of Philo. For the archæological, geographical, and historical explanation of the Bible, however, the works of J. are invaluable.—Concerning the noted allusion to Christ (Antt., XVIII., 3, 3), it is evident that none but a Christian could have written it, and J. was as far from being such as a thorough Jew and Pharisee of that day could be. And yet Jos. must have made some allusion to one who occupied so prominent a place in the closing history of his nation; and if he had said nothing about Christ, there would have been no reason for inserting such a paragraph, as Christians of the 1st and 2d centuries would not have thought of looking to Jos. for a historical confirmation of their system. Most probably Jos. spoke of Christ as a sorcerer and μαγός, and approved of his crucifixion, and this was modified by a Christian hand, with the retention of some original phrases. Doubtless Jos. reckoned among the misfortunes which befel the Jews at the time of Pilate, the dissensions caused among his people by the influence and labors of Christ, not their crucifixion of him. For Jos. must also have had the operations of Paul in view. He might still have disapproved of the execution of James (XX., 9, 1), especially as James was an observer of the law of Moses.—Early Christian copyists not only avoided J.'s unpleasant allusions to Christ by modifying his statements, but sometimes by an entire omission of the passage. The silence of Photius, in the paragraphs upon Jos., and his remarks upon Justus of Tib. (bibl., § 33), are proof that Antt., XVIII., 3, 3, was not in his copy of Jos. It is probable that J.'s real opinion of Christ is given in Antt., XVIII., 3, 4. That loathsome narrative, which is not most distantly connected with the Jews, is his version of the supernatural birth, which formed a fundamental fact in Christianity, and he designed thereby to expose the Christian faith, on this point, to contempt. It is the earliest trace of the blasphemous Jewish story of Jesus being a son of Panthera (cf. Origen, c. Cels., and Sepher toledoth Jeshua).—On this subject see FABRIC., bibl. gr. ed., Harl., Bd. V.; HAVERCAMP's ed. of Jos., II., App.; HASE, Leben J.; WINER, R. W. B.; EWALD, Gesch. Christus, 1855; LAMBECIUS, Bibl. cæs. Vindob., VIII., 10, &c.).—Literature: Best ed. of Jos., HUDSON, 1720; HAVERCAMP, 1726; W. DINDORF, Par., 1845, '47, 2 Bde., Roy., 8vo.; IMM. BEKKER, Lpz., 1855, '56, 6 Bde., 12mo. The best ed. of the B. J., is that of CARDWELL, Oxf., 1837, 2 Bde. (Lat. and Greek). Translations: COTTA, Tüb., 1736, fol.; B. J. and Life, FRIESE, 1804; GFRÖRER, 1836. In English, WHISTON, best ed., Philad., 1859, 4 vols., roy. 12mo.; R. TRAILL's B. J., Ja. Taylor, 2 vols., roy. 8vo., Lond., 1851). H. PARET.*

Joses (a transformation of Joseph), a brother of Jesus (Matth. 13: 55; Mark 6: 3) see Art. James in the N. T., and Jesus Christ, Life of.—Another Joses is mentioned, Acts 4: 36. A more correct reading would be Joseph (see Barnabas).

Joshua.—This name designates one of the most prominent persons of the O. T., viz.: the son of Nun of the tribe of Ephraim, the minister and companion of Moses (Ex. 24: 13), who, at the command of Jehovah, was entrusted with the leadership of Israel (Num. 27: 18–23), not, however, until trial had been made both of his courage (Ex. 17: 9–13) and of his faith (Num. 14: 6–9, 24). He was solemnly consecrated to his office by the laying on of hands by Moses (Num. 27: 18–23; Deut. 31: 14, 23). From this time forward, Joshua pursued his course with a firm step, and he belongs to the few persons of the O. T. whose official conduct is without reproach. A twofold work rested upon the successor of Moses and the finisher of his work: first, the conquest and extermination of the Canaanite nations, and then the division of the land and securing its peaceful possession (Josh. 1: 1–6, comp. 22: 4; 23: 5, 14, comp. König, alttestam. Studien I, 10, 11), and it is just this which Joshua accomplished. Three times Joshua's personal appearance decided the battles of Israel against his enemies (Josh. 10, 11). After these victories he divided the country between the tribes of Israel and marked the limits of each (11:23; 13; 21 chaps.). He also gave the people rest by bringing the tabernacle permanently to Shiloh (18:1, comp. 1 Sam. 3:21), and thus fulfilled the prophecy of the dying Jacob (Gen. 49:10). Joshua was thus honored, because he alone was obedient to all that was commanded him (11:15), and, with his house, remained steadfast when a general apostasy threatened (24:15. Cf. 24:20-24; 23:31; Judges 2:7).—The earlier miracles wrought under Joshua are not as immediately connected with his person, as those of Moses with his. But in his name, already, lay a promise of special Divine aid. This aid was granted at the Jordan and at Jericho (3:11, 13; 4:18; 5:13-15), but most wonderfully at the battle of Gibeon (Josh. 10:11, 12). There, at the word of the man whom God chose for Israel's saviour, the natural order of things was made subservient to the destiny of Israel. J. did not fully complete the work begun by Moses. The accounts in 13:1-6; 18:3; 11:22, are not contradictory. The conquest of Canaan was real and total, and the whole of it was divided among the tribes, as directed; but this occupation did not involve the full subjugation of all the hostile nations separately. The subordination of J. to the high-priest, and Israel's vacillation, lay in his way (Numb. 27:24; Josh. 19:51; 18:3; 24:19, 23).—But though the character of a perfect successor of Moses was not realized in Joshua, we look for its completion in another Joshua (Saviour), given and named by God himself (Matthew 1:21. See Jesus Christ). An interesting extra-Israelitic notice of Joshua's history is found in Procopius and Suidas, see Bochart, Geogr. Sacr., p. 520. Fabricius, Codex pseudepigraph. I., 889-894. Bertheau, israelitische Geschichte, p. 271. For the interpretation of the Book of Joshua we recommend: Josuae Imper. historia illustr. ab And. Masio: Antwerp, 1574; a still very useful work; König, Alttestamentl. Studien 1: Heft, 1836. Keil, Commentar über das Buch Josua: Erlang., 1847.

BAUMGARTEN.—Beck.

Joshua, The Book of, opens the series of historical books of the O. T., which represent, in a continuous succession, the period from the death of Moses to King Jehoniah. Modern criticism has endeavored to invalidate the integrity of this book also, but without success. The only apparent contradiction in it has been explained in the preceding article. Against a dismemberment of the book, König, Hävernicks, and Keil have satisfactorily demonstrated its closely connected character. That many and grand miracles appear in the history of Joshua, has its simple explanation in the fact, that it treats of a new beginning and course in the history of the people of Israel. So also each and all the accounts of miracles in this book can be easily understood from their divinely ordered connection. Moreover, it must not be overlooked as a historical mark of these reports of miracles, that the wonders of Jehovah appear here quite palpable, that they were to introduce and start the new life and labors of Israel. As regards the author of the book, the Talmud, and, last of all, König, regard Joshua as such. That Joshua really wrote his memoirs, is declared, Josh. 24:26. The last address of Joshua shows how deeply he was impressed with conviction, that the nation was still far from its destiny, and we can with certainty receive this report of Joshua's prophetic view of Israel as historic truth. Then, also, there was a necessity for Joshua to record the events of his life for the future, and it is also easily conceivable that he should append his memoirs to the law. There are also certain marks in the book itself, that point to synchronism or a high antiquity. Here belongs the עֲבָרָנִי, 5:1 (comp. 4:23; 5:6, the designating Sidon as עֲבָרָנִי, 11:8, whilst Tyre is prominent later; the old limitation of boundaries, 11:17; 12:7, the absence of Bethlehem among the cities of Judah (see König, p. 75). Meanwhile, since the book itself reports the death of Joshua, it, in any case, did not come from the hand of Joshua in the form in which we have it now. The additions of the second hand explain also the variations in Numbers 15:20-32; 19:15, 38 (comp. Hävernicks Einleitung. III., 55).—Besides the canonical book of Joshua there is also a Samaritan chronicle with the same name, which, however, contains great variations from, and extensions of, the original history. Chronicon Samaritanum arabicum ed. Joh., Juynboll, Lugd., Bat., 1848, 4.

BAUMGARTEN.—Beck.

Josiah, the fifteenth king of Judah, son and successor of Amon, reigned 31 years, 639-609 B. C., and distinguished himself by his piety and zeal for the honor of God. Two parties, one adhering to the ancient religion and policy of Israel, the other favoring heathenism and foreign alliances, had long predominated in the land. The former, truly national party, which was well-nigh suppressed under Manasseh and Amon, obtained ascendancy over Josiah in his earlier years (2 Kings 21:16; 24:4. Cf. Jer. 1-6; Zephani.), and so prepared the way for a reformation. Josiah began to reign in his 8th year, and during the guardianship of his mother, the priesthood and some true prophets may have had influence upon his education, as was the case with Joash (2 Kings 11:2), but it was, more probably, the better spirit which had sprung up in Israel, that mainly led him, in his 20th year (not 18th, as in Kings. See Movers, Untera. u. d. Chronik, p. 334, &c.), to restore the pure worship of God. His solicitude to repair the temple (2 Kings 22:3-7; cf. 2 Chron. 34:8-12), presupposes a removal of idolatry, and had not this been previously done, the people would not at once have made a new covenant with Jehovah (2 Chron. 34:3-7). External causes also prompted Josiah. The Scythians invaded Palestine, probably in the 13th-18th year of his reign (Jer. 6:3-6, 21-25. Cf. Ewald, Gesch. Isr., 3, 388, &c., 480), and the prophet called the nation to repentance. At the same time Nabopolassar founded the Chaldean monarchy, and if Judah should endure threatening storms, internal union was necessary. Happily the prophets were then laboring to revive the law. The Scythians may not have besieged Jerusalem (as Ewald, l. c., 392, supposes from Ps. 54), but that they took some fortresses appears from the example of Askalon (Zeph. 2: 4-7: Herod., I., 105), and from the change of the name of Bethshean to Scythopolis, they seem for some time to have overrun Palestine. PLINY (H. N., V., 16, 20), says they built that city. Jeremiah, also (6: 6), expresses fear for the city, lest these northern hordes should sack it. From 2 Chron. 34: 3-7, we learn how much Josiah had to do to exterminate idolatry, as also his efforts to extend the reformation over the kingdom of Israel, to restore his dominion to its original limits. The work of preparation having been completed, Josiah, in the 18th year of his reign, sent a commission, with Shaphan at its head, to Hilkiash the high-priest (2 Chron. 34: 8, 9; 2 Kings 22: 3), to receive from him the money collected for repairing the temple. Whilst engaged at this Hilkiash found the books of Moses, and gave them to Shaphan to read. Shaphan handed the roll to Josiah, who was deeply moved by its contents, and sent to Huldah, the prophetess, for counsel (see Pentateuch). The event acquired great importance from the fact, that the Pentateuch was thenceforth publicly acknowledged as a part of the Biblical canon.—A general convocation of the people was now ordered (cf. Ex. 24: 78; Josh. 24: 25; 1 Chron. 15: 12; Neh. 9: 18), for the threefold purpose of preparing them for the passover, of reading to them the law, and obtaining their general assent to the extermination of idolatry (cf. 2 Chron. 20: 29, &c.). And, as Josiah saw that Israel was without a ruler, he formed the bold purpose of bringing that kingdom also into his reformatory measures, and under his dominion (2 Chron. 34: 33; 2 Kings 23: 15-20). This he undoubtedly attempted more than once, and was thereby involved in frequent conflicts with adjacent nations, as appears from the fierceness of the Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites against Israel (Obadiah; Jer. 48, 49). This protectorate extended to Naphtali (2 Chron. 34: 6), and seems to have induced many Israelites to participate in the solemnities at Jerusalem (2 Chron. 34: 9; Jer. 31: 5, 6).—With this zeal for the restoration of piety, Josiah combined a firm purpose to re-establish law and social order in his kingdom (Jer. 22: 15, &c.). But corruption was so prevalent and deeply rooted, that no general, permanent change could be effected; the reformatory movement proved to be but superficial, and Josiah was mercifully taken away by death, before the inevitable ruin came. In the 31st year of Josiah's reign Pharaoh-necho, king of Egypt, set out upon an expedition against the Chaldeans. He sent his army by way of the Mediterranean to Akko, and perhaps a part to Joppa, that from thence he might march them across to the Euphrates (cf. Herod., II., 159). Josiah seems to have had nothing to fear from this movement, as the Egyptians would pass through the upper portions of the kingdom of Israel; and they did not think it necessary to ask his permission to do this, as that kingdom was supposed to belong, then, to the Assyrians (2 Chron. 35: 21). But Josiah, who had obtained quiet repossession of that country, thought otherwise. He saw, too, that it was incompatible with the interests of his kingdom, to allow the Egyptians a firm foothold in the adjacent north. Should the Egyptians return victorious, it would be much more difficult to withstand them; should they be defeated, the Chaldeans might demand satisfaction of Josiah for allowing them to pass quietly through his domains. These considerations seemed to require him to oppose the progress of the Egyptians. But his previous good fortune may also have awakened in Josiah a desire to increase the power of his kingdom, and make it rank with Egypt and Chaldea. His policy was unquestionably correct, and had his plan succeeded, the kingdom of David would have reached its culmination. But the spirit which animated Josiah was lacking in the nation, and the people were too depraved to carry out his grand scheme. Josiah, however, supposing himself strong enough to cope with Pharaoh-necho, and probably encouraged by favorable predictions, went forth to meet the Egyptians on the plains of Megiddo (Esdraselon), and whilst fighting courageously in the front ranks of his army, fell in the battle. He was carried to Jerusalem, and there died of his wounds (2 Chron. 34: 28; 35: 24; cf. Zech. 12: 11; 2 Kings 23: 30, says on the field of battle). Great lamentations followed his death, and were annually repeated (Jer. 22: 10). With his death the last support of the kingdom was gone. The great importance of this battle may be judged from the words of Herod., II., 159: Καὶ Σύροιαι περὶ ὃ Νεκὺς συμβαλὼν ἐν Μαγδόλῳ ἐνίκησε· μετὰ δὲ τὴν μάχην Καδύτιν πόλιν τῆς Συρίας εἰούσαν μεγάλην εἶλε.

VAHINGER.*

THE NEW YORK PUBLIC LIBRARY
REFERENCE DEPARTMENT

This book is under no circumstances to be taken from the Building

[illegible]

